OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, May 6, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE

Mr. ALFRED STORK (Skeena) presented the first report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries as follows:

Your committee recommends that it be authorized to have its proceedings and such evidence as may be taken printed from day to day or as may be required for use of the members of the committee and of the House and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion for the adoption of this report must be preceded by notice.

FUEL SUPPLY

COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION—PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the special committee appointed on Monday, March 15 to investigate our present sources of supply of anthracite and bituminous coal, the dependability of such sources, and other matters in relation thereto be composed of the following members namely: Messieurs Armstrong (Lambton), Bury, Campbell, Flemming, Garland (Bow River), Gershaw, Howden, Lapierre, MacDonald (Cape Breton South), McLean (Melfort), Neill and Nicholson with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): May I point out to the government that a committee similar to that now proposed was appointed in the session of 1923 with precisely the same powers and for the performance of the same functions. That committee went into the subject exhaustively, taking evidence covering practically several hundred pages; before it appeared the head officials of both railways in Canada. Now, I do not believe that the appointment of any special committee at this date, entering as we are upon the fifth month of the session, will get us anywhere on the coal question. The facts are all well known, and the government is perfectly aware that the matter is solely a question of transportation. The committee appointed in 1923 made recommendations looking to a national fuel supply and although the government accepted those recommendations, they failed to put them into effect.

In view of the strike in England and Wales to-day there will be a fuel famine during the coming fall and winter such as has never been experienced before. The onus for a proper fuel supply in this country rests not upon any committee or commission, but entirely upon the government of the day. The best part of the Canadian merchant marine, the vessels that could sail the lakes, this government has sold, and now the country expects that the national railways shall be mobilized to solve this problem. When the matter was discussed by the previous committee it was admitted that the $7 rate would be satisfactory and take care of all overhead. Why has not the Prime Minister accepted that rate? He has referred this important matter to the decision of the railway commission, so that we shall receive no report upon it before August next when it wil be too late to get a supply of fuel. The Montreal Board of Trade, I may point out, realizing the gravity of the present strike situation in Great Britain, predicts a coal famine and economic newspapers and banking journals declare that there is likelihood of another strike taking place in the United States before the summer comes. Now, why refer this question to a committee? What object can be served by such a reference? The object of the committee as stated in the Prime Minister's motion is to investigate our present sources of supply of anthracite and bituminous coal and the dependability of such sources. It seems to me that if the committee were to investigate the dependability of the present government to solve this problem it might be more to the point. The government, in my opinion, are depending altogether too much upon Sir Henry Thornton and appear to be absolutely incapable of taking the initiative themselves. All the evidence that was given before the special committee appointed a couple of years ago, evidence contained in several hundred pages, shows quite clearly that this is purely and simply a transportation question. Sir Henry Thornton's officials and his experts who were examined before that committee were quite agreeable to the $7 rate but the government have refused to act upon the recommendations of that committee. I repeat, they are allowing Sir Henry Thornton to usurp their powers and to exercise the functions which they should discharge themselves. Had I received anything like reasonable support when I discussed this question before something might have been done.

Now there is no necessity whatever for a committee to inquire into the sources of supply in Canada, for we all know what they are. The government do not need any advice at all upon that subject. I would urge the deputy leader of the House from Brandon (Mr. Forke) and the vice-regent from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) to try if possible to get the government moving in this matter and to shoulder the responsibility that properly belongs to them. There is no reason why the country should suffer because of inaction on the part of the government. The matter has now been made a football for long enough. One commission, the railway commission, failed to act on its own volition until instructed by parliament, and their report will not be in until midsummer and will be of little or no value to end or solve the question. The appointment of a committee only gives the government a chance to shelve its responsibility with regard to a situation that will become very acute next winter. The resolution just mentions sources of supply and says nothing at all about Alberta, the Maritimes or transportation.

As I said on March 15 last, in the debate of 1924, a vote was taken and my resolution for a national coal supply was adopted.

Where are we going to be next fall if the coal strike in England continues for six months or a year; are we going to be frozen? On the government of the day, Mr. Speaker, as long as they are the government, is the responsibility for finding a solution of this question. I do urge on the government that this industry is in such a critical condition to-day in the Maritimes and in the west that we should adopt the principle of subventions, bonuses and subsidies, a good protectionist doctrine, and put the industry on its feet. While I have the utmost regard for the mover of the resolution, I fear its adoption would mean further delay, and the only tangible result would be the presentation and filing of another report to supplement these two reports that I hold in my hand. Sir Henry Thornton agreed to a seven dollar rate, but later he said conditions had changed and he withdrew that rate. To hear him making his pronouncements on railway matters, you would think he was superior to the railway commission and even to parliament. Again, Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to take immediate action so that this very serious situation may be dealt with in time to save the people of Canada, particularly those residing in the central provinces, from all the misery and discomfort that must inevitably follow another shortage of fuel next winter.

[Mr. Church.]

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) always seeks an opportunity to make a speech when the question of coal comes before this House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He needs to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does he? I have not noticed recently anything serious in the coal situation, with all respect to my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton). What is proposed to be investigated by this committee is not the situation that was dealt with by the committee of which my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest has just spoken. There is no need to investigate sources of supply; we all know where these are available. But some members of this House, particularly those from the province of Ontario are interested in securing coal from the west, and naturally hon. members from Alberta desire to supply the fuel necessities of Ontario from the coal mines of their province. To bring this about, it was advocated by some of our Ontario members that transportation could be reversed on the Great Lakes; in other words, that the coal be brought down to Fort William, and there transhipped to bottoms which would carry the coal to the lake ports from which in turn it could be distributed to the southeastern portion of this province. That phase of the subject was not investigated thoroughly by the previous committee. I do not see any advantage in investigating the whole problem of coal transportation, because that has been already very fully gone into and the results, as my hon. friend stated, are contained in the volume he held in his hand. But it is felt by some members who are interested in this matter that they can prove the practicability of cheapening transportation costs on Alberta coal by transhipping it at Fort William as I have already mentioned. The work of this committee will not interfere in the slightest degree with the movement of coal to supply next winter's requirements of the central provinces. We are well aware of what the strike in Great Britain may mean to our fuel situation, but we are chiefly interested in supplying the central provinces with our own coal, and the government is quite alive to the whole problem.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly agree with the minister that this question was not discussed by the former committee; I cannot recall any phase of the coal situation that was not taken into account by that committee, and I think he will find from the reports that this and all other features of the coal problem were considered. The minister does not in this parliament, nor did he in the former parliament, seem to be seized with the seriousness of the situation. Let me draw your attention to these facts, Mr. Speaker. On January 22 last the member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) brought to the attention of the minister what he considered to be a very serious situation, and on January 25 the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) also called the attention of the minister to a similar condition. On that occasion the minister replied:

> There may be a serious emergency so far as the miners of Alberta are concerned, but at the moment there is no emergency at this end.

At that very time the situation was serious in eastern Ontario. Only two months before that the minister must have been aware of the emergent conditions, because he is reported in a Canadian Press despatch from Ottawa, dated December 28, under the heading, "Hon. Charles Stewart warns the public of possible acute situation," as follows:

> Hon. Charles Stewart in an interview here strongly recommends householders "to immediately protect themselves by laying in supplies of whatever fuel they can obtain at present prices."

And so on. So at that time there was a serious fuel situation according to the minister; but on January 25 he stated there was no emergency at this end, although at that time there was an alarming situation. The minister seems to be imbued with the same spirit to-day in dealing with this subject: he is going to wait until this committee reports, just as he did before—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I interject? I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, the situation is so serious to-day that the government should assume full responsibility. This government has achieved an unenviable reputation for appointing committees and commissions of one kind and another which have never accomplished anything. We had a pulpwood commission appointed by the leader of this government, and what did they do? They went gypsying in a modern way, enjoying a trip in excellent cars, Pullmans and so on, until the Finance minister had to send out a message calling them home, removing them from the job and the payroll. I cannot see that anything will be accomplished by this committee; the matter is so serious to-day that the government should set themselves to its settlement, and deal with it and take the responsibility.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this to close the debate?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the mover speaks the debate is closed, but if it is quite clear that such will not be the case, it is all right.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The right hon. Prime Minister rose to speak, and I pointed out that that would close the debate, as he had made the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just wished to say a word in explanation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am quite content to have the hon. gentleman speak on the understanding that the debate is not thereby closed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I merely wish to make an explanation. So far as the government are concerned we are simply seeking to meet the wish of the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), who expressed the desire that this committee be appointed. In order to meet the wish of the hon. member the government agreed to appoint a committee, but if hon. gentlemen opposite think such a committee would serve no purpose, we are quite prepared to withdraw the motion.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): As this matter is of the greatest importance to the province of Nova Scotia, from which I come, and which province has the greatest developed coal resources in the whole Dominion, I might point out that in the composition of this committee Nova Scotia has no representation. The province of New Brunswick, which has comparatively small coal resources, is represented; the province of Alberta is also represented, and I would like to ask why there is no representative on that committee from the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has asked why there is no representative of Nova Scotia on that committee. My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that the whips of the different parties were requested to hand in the names of those members whom they wished to serve on that committee. As most of the hon. members from Nova Scotia happen to be on the opposite side of the House, the names of Nova Scotia members would be handed in from his own side of the House. I am informed that there is one representative of Nova Scotia on that committee, in the person of the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. MacDonald).

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I desire to add a very few words to what has already been said with regard to this matter On March 15 the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) moved a resolution which was seconded by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), asking that attention of the House be given to the development of the coal resources of Canada and the delivery of this product at the lowest cost, in order to meet the urgent need for this fuel for manufacturing and domestic uses, and that a committee be appointed for this purpose. In consequence of that resolution the Prime Minister has to-day moved that the names of those who compose that committee be Messieurs Armstrong, Bury, Campbell and so on. May I point out that the purposes alleged in this motion are somewhat different from those set out in the motion proposed by the hon. member for East Lambton. The special committee named in this motion is to investigate our present sources of supply of anthracite and bituminous coal, the dependability of such sources, whether the prices are fair and reasonable, and other matters in relation thereto. The proper course to pursue in regard to the motion would be to recognize the fact that in 1923 a committee investigating this question made a report, and I would suggest that the present committee take up the work where it was left off in 1923, in order that there may be no duplication or unnecessary expenditure of public money with respect to this matter.

Might I also point out that the report made on that occasion was very, very definite. The report is printed on pages 8 and 9 of the Journals of the House, No. 6, Mines and Minerals, and the reference to that committee dealt not only with the question of mines and minerals in a general way, but also with the coal supply in a very definite way, particularly with respect to our dependence upon the United States. I would suggest that following the preparation of that report, and the hearing of witnesses at considerable expense, this new committee should not duplicate that effort. All that need be done is to amend the motion in such a way as to make it clear that the committee is to report upon the matter from the report of the last committee up to date, or in other words dealing largely with the question of transportation. It must be common ground with every member of this House that we have already established beyond question our sources of coal supply. We know what they are, in a general way, and further than that, we know in a particular way in what provinces they are and their extent, and the particular difficulty under which we labour at the present moment is the cost of transportation.

In that committee this matter was dealt with at some length and the government was recommended to take certain definite action. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) has complained, and it seems to me very properly, that the government has failed to carry out those recommendations. I would suggest that this examination be held for the purpose of ascertaining the cost of transporting coal from the great coal regions of Alberta to central Canada, and from the Maritime provinces to Montreal and other cities of eastern Canada. That is the real difficulty confronting us. It is not necessary to waste time determining the extent of our coal resources; we need not waste time ascertaining whether or not the fuel is good, because its quality has already been established, and it has largely been used in Ontario during the past season.

In this regard, despite what has been said by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), I should like to place on record the great sense of obligation the people in Alberta have to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church). In season and out of season he has urged the desirability of the use of Alberta coal by the citizens of Ontario, and most of the people of Alberta realize that no better friend of the development of the coal areas of Alberta can be found anywhere than in the person of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest. I do deprecate this matter being made a political football, and being treated purely as a matter of politics. This country is confronted with what may become a very serious situation with regard to fuel during the coming winter. If, peradventure, there should be difficulty in the mining of coal in the United States, added to the difficulties now prevailing in Great Britain, I am sure every member of this House would feel that he had neglected some part of his duty if he did not, at this time, do everything in his power to assist in bringing to light every possible suggestion whereby the coal of Alberta may be used in Ontario during the coming winter.

I am divulging no secret when I say that large financial interests in England are already prepared to put substantial sums of money into Alberta for the purpose of developing the coal areas there. The largest group engaged in coal mining in Great Britain are prepared to invest this money, which means that one question which should engage the attention of this committee, apart from those matters particularly raised by the hon. member for Lambton, must be the cost of transportation. That is the one problem concerning the Canadian people at this time, and if my right hon. friend—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would it not be wise to add the cost of distribution as well?

Mr. BENNETT: Very well, and if my right hon. friend would be good enough to accept the suggestion in the spirit in which it is made, he might recast his motion, not for the purpose of making it conform to any suggestion of mine, but to harmonize it more with the report made in 1923, and with the motion of the hon. member for East Lambton, whereby a very great deal of good would be accomplished. We would not waste time, we would not duplicate effort, and may I also suggest that when it is being done, perhaps it would expedite matters if the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) were appointed to that committee.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): As I am responsible for placing the resolution on Hansard, I wish to say a few words in support of it. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) has referred to the two previous committees that inquired into this question, one appointed by the Senate and one by the House of Commons. Their reports are available to everyone. I read those reports very carefully before placing this resolution before parliament, and the proposition that I have in view in connection with the transportation of coal from the northwest and from the eastern part of this country to the central provinces is an entirely different proposition from anything that has been dealt with in those two reports.

My proposition, in a few words, is simply this: That the coal be carried from the west to Port Arthur and Fort William, and then be transferred into boats and carried on down the lakes as far as Toronto, if you like, from the west, and as far as Kingston, we will say, from Nova Scotia. The proposition is a feasible one, because you will be able to save an enormous sum of money in freight rates. Take, for instance, the freight rate from Port Arthur and Fort William down through lake Huron, on through the river St. Clair and on to lake Erie; the coal can be carried by boat, including the cost of loading and unloading, for just about $1 a ton. What better argument could a man use in support of this proposition? I have investigated the loading and unloading facilities that have been perfected within the last few years, and I am convinced that coal can be carried and delivered at ports along lake Huron, the river St. Clair and along lake Erie for less than, or say, $1 per ton from Port Arthur or Fort William. If we can carry grain at 1½ cents a bushel from Fort William or Duluth to Buffalo, surely we can carry coal at a similar rate. Compare that rate with the rail rate; compare it with the rate which the railway commision will be compelled to put before you in their decision; the railway rate is an entirely different proposition.

While I do criticize the government for not appointing this committee weeks and weeks ago—it is now nearly two months since I placed the resolution on Hansard—while we have lost a lot of valuable time, I believe that we shall be able to place before parliament a great deal of valuable information that will help materially to solve this problem.

I do not wish to take up any more time in support of the proposition, but I am convinced that the committee, if they will get to work immediately, and attend faithfully to their duties in that regard, will be able to show some good results before the close of this session.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I rise merely in connection with a remark passed between myself and the minister when he was speaking in the first instance. I pointed out to him that I thought there was very great occasion for the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) to talk on this subject whenever he could get an opportunity. He has to; all of us ought to, if for no other reason than the reason of endeavouring to get some action some time out of this government. That of itself is quite sufficient justification. If we could get into the heads of this government a better sense of their responsibilities to-day, it would be a grand thing if we went on talking even for a considerable time. I refer to what the right hon. the Prime Minister says. After all, he says, if you do not want this I do not want it, and I will take it back. We are only doing this, he says in effect, because you want it. That is not what we want, Mr. Speaker. We want coal for the people of this country. We want the government to take hold of this matter and to bring down and introduce such measures and such resolutions as they believe in themselves, such measures as will get us coal, not merely resolutions which are introduced for the purpose of being withdrawn, resolutions which they do not believe in unless we say Amen to them.

We have had a delay now since the 15th of March; nothing has been done since that date, and what we would deprecate more than anything else is a further shelving of this question. If the government will make use of this committee, and if the committee will get busy at once and the government will put into effect their recommendations at this session of the House, the committee will be a very good thing, but if the government uses this committee as they have used committees in the past simply for the purpose of delay and shelving a question, then indeed it is a bad thing for the householders of the province of Ontario and of the province of Quebec, and for the miners of Alberta and Nova Scotia, that this motion is introduced.

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Having spoken in support of the resolution of the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) when this question was up before, I desire to make an observation or two.

The committee does not need to study the problem of disposing of Nova Scotia coal in the central provinces, for I believe that every hon. member of this House has come to one conclusion, that Nova Scotia coal as a domestic fuel can be successfully used in the central provinces only by one method, and that is by the establishing of coking plants at centres in Ontario and Quebec. I believe that the government can take action on that point without a committee.

Secondly, with regard to Alberta coal, there are just two problems. The first problem is the cost of mining the coal. Hon. members from Alberta have admitted that over-production, too many mines and lack of full time work for the miners, are causing the cost of Alberta coal to be higher than it should be. That question will have to be in some way regulated, or else the cost of Alberta coal will be too high to the users in Ontario and Quebec.

The second problem is whether Alberta coal of a grade that will meet the competition of American coal can be brought to the central provinces without the imposition of a duty against anthracite. That becomes a question of fiscal policy for the government.

The hon. member for East Lambton is quite right in what he says as to the method of handling coal. I know something of the cost of lake transportation, but all grades of Alberta coal cannot be handled by boat at Fort William, thence to Ontario ports, and transhipped by rail to Ontario points. The scheme is feasible, but it is feasible only with certain grades of Alberta coal, and there comes in the question whether you are going to ask domestic users in Ontario to take all grades of Alberta coal when some grades will so slack in handling as to be unsuitable.

My feeling is that this committee should confine itself entirely to the control of the supply of Alberta coal, the cost of transportation, and the methods of handling. If the supply of Alberta coal is regulated in such a way that the better grades which can be handled without slacking will be able to be brought east, I believe, as I said in a former speech, that the railways should make more money on a $4 rate to Fort William than on a $7 rate right through to Toronto. The better grades can be handled from Fort William for $1 a ton to all ports on lakes Huron, Erie and Ontario. That policy is one which I believe the government can adopt, and I have myself pressed the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) to take up that matter at once. It means the establishing of certain docks at lake ports to handle this coal; but it also means control of the supply in Alberta.

In this regard may I say: A great many men entertain fear of the word "nationalization". I do not. We have demonstrated in Canada that the attitude of the Canadian public towards a nationally owned project is the attitude of good citizens. We have not had strikes on our national railways and we have not had trouble with those railways; we have had success. The province of Ontario has further demonstrated that an intelligent people can have a public utility and administer it well. I do not believe that the province of Alberta is going to get one hundred per cent efficiency out of its coal mining so long as new coal mines are being opened up indiscriminately. I also believe that the province of Ontario is going to pay too high a price for Alberta coal and will receive some low grades, without some control. Every additional thousand tons of coal ordered may mean the opening up of some new mine and a consequent increase in competition. I point out to the Minister of the Interior that the greatest problem he has to face in connection with marketing Alberta coal in Ontario is the controlling of the supply. If the best mines only are operated in such a way that the miners will get full pay the cost will be kept down. If that can be done I believe that Alberta coal can be transported to Ontario, and we can make a great national asset out of the coal we have in that province. I say to the Minister of the Interior again, that the problem of transporting Alberta coal is not a difficult one. The control of the mines in Alberta is a difficult matter. On that point the government must take its stand and it does not need a committee to supply it with the necessary evidence.

Motion agreed to.

PEACE RIVER ELECTION

RULING OF MR. SPEAKER ON PETITION ASKING THAT RETURN OF MR. KENNEDY BE DECLARED VOID

Mr. SPEAKER: I am now ready to give my ruling on the point of order raised on Tuesday.

A petition has been presented to the House by James Arthur Collins praying that the House of Commons of Canada may determine and declare that Donald Macbeth Kennedy, of Waterhole, province of Alberta, was not duly elected and returned at the election held 29th of October, 1925; that his return is void; and that he the petitioner be declared duly elected and is entitled to be returned as the member for the electoral district of Peace River, in the House of Commons of Canada.

On the report of the Clerk of Petitions the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King raised a point of order. He contends that said petition cannot be properly received by the House of Commons because the Peace River election has been protested and is still before the Supreme Court of Alberta, and that the parliament of Canada, by the Controverted Elections Act passed in 1873, which is now found in Ch. 7, R.S.C., 1906, has transferred to courts exclusive jurisdiction over matters relating to the election of its members.

A debate arising thereon, many rulings, precedents and authorities were cited on both sides of the House. The question is a very important one, and I have given its solution my most earnest consideration.

I have looked into the cases cited and I find that they do not all apply to this petition.

In the Queen's, N.B., case, the proceedings did not originate by a petition. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery was ordered on the 14th of April, 1887, to attend on the next day with the return of the election, poll-books and other documents. He attended in accordance thereto on the next day. A motion was made by Mr. Skinner on April 28th, 1887, that the clerk of the crown amend his return by erasing the name of Mr. Baird and substituting that of Mr. King as the duly elected member for the constituency; and on amendment by Mr. Thompson the return and papers were referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections.

The same procedure was followed in the Brockville and West Huron cases. A motion was passed on the 6th of July, 1899, ordering the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to attend at the table with all poll-books, voters' lists and other documents transmitted to him by the respective returning officers. He was in attendance on the next day and produced the papers. On motion of Mr.—now Sir—R. L. Borden, these papers were referred to the select standing committee on Privileges and Elections.

In the Nipissing case, Mr. Northrup moved on the 24th of April, 1901, in amendment to the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for Supply, that the conduct of the returning officer be referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections. This amendment was voted down at the same sitting on a division of 51 to 94.

In the Coderre case, no petition was presented. Mr. Gauthier rose on a question of privilege and moved on the 17th of March, 1913, that certain allegations against the Secretary of State be referred to the standing committee on Privileges and Elections. The motion was defeated on a division of 53 to 87.

The only two cases which originated in the House by way of petitions are those of Gaspé and Richelieu. In the former, which came up in 1874, the petitioner, Horatio Le Boutillier, asked that the return for the election be amended by substituting his name for that of Louis George Harper, the sitting member. Speaker Anglin did not allow the petition to be received.

In the Richelieu case, Speaker Blanchet rendered a similar decision, supplementing it with the following remarks:

> If the petition should be received it would then be competent for any member to move that it be referred to a committee; and if such a motion were agreed to, the various allegations in the petition would constitute the order of reference by which the committee would be governed in its proceedings. In this way, a door would be opened to the indiscriminate reception of petitions attacking generally the return of members, though not governed by any of those formalities necessary even in those times when the House possessed full jurisdiction over controverted elections. To grant the prayer of the petition, would be to violate the general principle which lies at the basis of all the legislation adopted by the English parliament since 1868, and by the Canadian parliament since 1873, that the court alone should adjudicate on matters of controverted elections.

Rule 80 has been cited by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) as giving the House sufficient authority to take up this petition but this rule is nugatory today as it was superseded by the Controverted Elections Act which has been on the statute book since 1874. It has nothing to do with the different laws which fully provide for the trial and punishment of corrupt practices at elections; it only reiterates the House's privilege to deal with offences of bribery and corruption after they have been proved before the competent courts.

That parliament, in Canada, as well as in Great Britain, has consented to transfer the exercise of some of its privileges to special courts constituted by law, there can be no doubt. There is very little difference between the English and the Canadian Controverted Elections law; and May, 13th edition, page 642, after dealing with the organization of the election tribunals, says:

> Petitions complaining of undue elections and returns are presented to these courts instead of the House of Commons, as formerly—the House has no cognizance of these proceedings until their termination; the judges are also to report whether any corrupt practices have been committed with the knowledge and consent of any candidate.

The act provides here as well as in Great Britain that when the election trial is over, the judges shall make a report in writing to the Speaker showing that any corrupt practice has or has not been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate; the names of the guilty parties; whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed; whether the inquiry has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition and whether further inquiry is desirable.

Nothing could more clearly show that the House has transferred to these courts the functions formerly performed by its own committees than the following comment of May at page 643:

> All such certificates and reports are communicated to the House by the Speaker, and are treated like the report of election committees under the former system. They are entered in the journals; and orders are made for carrying the determination of the judges into execution. A report that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed is equivalent to the like report from an election committee for futher enquiry into such corrupt practices.

I now come to the right of petition alluded to during the debate. Our rule 75 deals with the procedure to be followed as regards petitions. Subsection 8 provides that:

> Every petition so reported upon, not containing matter in breach of the privileges of this House and, which, according to the rules or practice, of the House, can be received shall then be deemed to be permitted to be read and received.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mark these words, "can be received." It is well to bear in mind the wording of this rule. Does it not clearly indicate that whilst the right of petitioning may be acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution, yet it is limited? The petition can be received if it does not contain matter in breach of the privileges of the House. To be received it must conform to its rules and practice.

In the course of the debate, great stress was laid on the immemorial right of every British subject to petition parliament. Redlich, volume 2, page 239, refers to that time honoured usage in the following words:

> The venerable institution of petition, the oldest of all parliamentary forms, the fertile seed of all the proceedings of the House of Commons, has but little life at the present day. It is, no doubt, the birthright of every British subject to address petitions to the House of Commons and the House of Lords as it was fifty years ago, and thousands of petitions are annually sent to the House of Commons. Thanks, however, to the ample development of courts of justice and administrative bodies, the value of petition as a protection against denials of right has disappeared.

May, page 608 observes that:

> Before the constitution of parliament had assumed its present form, and while its judicial and legislative functions were ill-defined, petitions were presented to the crown and to the great councils of the realm for the redress of those grievances which were beyond the jurisdiction of the common law.

In the present case, the judicial function is certainly well defined and nobody will contend that the grievance is beyond the court's jurisdiction.

This petition prays that the House of Commons of Canada may determine and declare that Mr. Kennedy was not duly elected and returned at the election held on the 29th of October, 1925, that his return was and is void, and that it may be declared that the petitioner was duly elected at the said election, and is entitled to be returned as the member elected to represent the electoral district of Peace River in the House of Commons of Canada. A prayer of this character is of far-reaching importance, and the reception of such a petition requires careful consideration and examination of precedents before it is entertained or received by the House.

If this petition merely asked the House to deal with complaints against an official of the House, such as a deputy returning officer, for violation of his duty under the law, such as fraud and manipulation of ballots and other corrupt practices, or if it asked for the punishment of such an officer, the right of parliament to receive such a petition and apply the remedy is undoubted. The House has always the power to inquire into the conduct of its own returning officers and to prevent them from wrong doing. (Bourinot, page 134). This has been unquestioned since 20th March, 1875, when both Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. Edward Blake agreed that the House had not abandoned its right to control, censure and, if need be, punish returning and deputy returning officers. This was also the view held by Sir Louis Davies, Hansard, 1899, volume II, page 5308.

The result of the precedents cited is summed up by our old standard authority, Bourinot, 4th Edition, pages 133-134, where he states:

> Among the conclusions reached from a review of the cases cited in the controversies one may be stated, namely, that the strong sense of parliamentary and public opinion is opposed to any return to the old system of parliament interefering in the trial of election questions, although it continues to retain all the powers not expressly, or by fair interference, entrusted to the courts. The provisions of the statutes on controverted elections and kindred matters do not supersede the jurisdiction of the House in questions affecting the seats of its own members not arising out of controverted elections. The House is, in fact, bound to take notice of any legal disability affecting its members and to issue writs for election to fill the places of members adjudged to be incapable of sitting without waiting for the return to be questioned by persons outside of parliament; that the House has always the power to enquire into the conduct of its own returning officers and to prevent them from wrong doing. Of course it will proceed cautiously in any case that might be more satisfactorily settled in the courts, though it is always regular to receive petitions setting forth grievances and praying for a remedy, provided they do not question the return of the member within the meaning of the Controverted Elections Act.

Before the passage of the Controverted Elections Act, the House by the Privileges and Elections committee tried all election petitions, the practice had been in force for many years, witnesses and parties filled the lobbies, and charges of unfairness and partisanship were constantly alleged. It was to get rid of all these difficulties and to set up an impartial tribunal that parliament passed the act and delegated all such matters to the courts.

Exclusive jurisdiction was given to the courts by section 91 of the act, which reads as follows:

> 91. All elections shall be subject to the provisions of this act, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance therewith.

The force of all these authorities and precedents is so impressive that I have come to the conclusion to rule that this petition cannot be received.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Respectfully but firmly, Mr. Speaker, I appeal from your ruling that future generations may realize that a considerable number of the members of this House still attach a real value to a petition to parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Speaker having ruled that the petition of James Arthur Collins, praying that he be declared entitled to be returned as the member elected to represent the electoral district of Peace River in the House of Commons, cannot be received, under rule 75, subsection 8, because parliament has delegated its powers in such matters to the courts, under section 91 of the Controverted Elections Act, Mr. R. B. Bennett, West Calgary, appeals from that ruling. Those in favour of the Speaker's ruling being sustained will please say aye; those against will please say nay.

Before putting the question I would call the attention of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) to rule 69:

> If anything shall come in question touching the return or election of any member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate.

An hon. MEMBER: He is not here.

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained, and the ruling was sustained upon the following division:

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

COMPENSATION TO RURAL POSTMASTERS

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil-Soulanges):

1. In view of the return to two cent postage on July 1 next, is it the intention of the government to revise the rates of compensation of rural postmasters?
2. If so, from what date?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1 and 2. It is realized that the adoption of the two cent letter rate on 1st July next will result in a substantial decrease in the revenue of rural post offices. As rural postmasters are paid on a commission basis, there would be a corresponding decrease in their salaries, unless their rates of compensation are increased.

As postmasters' salaries are based on the revenue of the previous year, two cent postage would not affect their salaries in any event until 1927. In the interval, the question of an upward revision of the rates of compensation of rural postmasters will receive sympathetic consideration by those who are charged with the duty of fixing the rates.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LUMBER IMPORTS 1922 TO 1925

Mr. LADNER:

1. How much lumber was imported into Canada from the United States and used for government works during the years 1922 to 1925, inclusive?
2. How much of such lumber imported from the United States was of Canadian origin?
3. What was the total value of lumber imported from the United States and used for government works from 1922 to 1925, inclusive?
4. What was the total value of Canadian woods used in government works in the same period?
5. What was the total value of other products imported from the United States from 1922 to 1925, inclusive, and used in the construction of or the operation of Canadian government works?

RAW SUGAR, ETC.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton):

1. What is the price of raw sugar per 100 pounds such as is imported into Canada from the West Indies and Australia respectively at the port of shipment?
2. What is the freight per pound on raw sugar imported into Canada from the West Indies and Australia, and what is the rate of duty per pound on the said raw sugar coming from these countries into Canada?
3. How many pounds of butter has been imported into Canada since January 1, 1926, from Australia, New Zealand and the United States, respectively?

LIVINGSTONE CHANNEL SIGNAL STATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make inquiry of the government, particularly of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin), to whom I have forwarded a copy of this inquiry, whether or not permission has been given by the government, through the Department of Marine and Fisheries, to an American marine reporting firm known as the J. W. Westcott & Company, marine reporters of Detroit, Michigan, to establish a marine reporting station at the head of the new Livingstone channel, lower Detroit river, two miles above Amherstburg, Ontario, in Canadian waters, and on a Canadian government-owned lighthouse? If not, has a permit or license been issued to the Lake Carriers Association to use the lighthouse? Has the department been advised that the interested parties are preparing to lay the cable to the lighthouse from the Canadian mainland for their exclusive use? Have any protests or representations from Canadian residents been made to the government in opposition to the proposed permission granted to the American marine reporting company; and, if so, what action has the government taken up until to-day?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I desire to thank my hon. friend for his courtesy in sending me a copy of his question. On March 12 last Mr. J. N. Arthurs, superintendent of lights for the Parry Sound district, submitted an application from the Westcott Ship Reporters and Vessel Agents of Detroit, for permission to establish a signal station on the pier of the Livingstone channel light station in the Detroit river. He represented that he knew of no reason why the application should not be granted. On March 30 he again directed attention to the application previously made. The matter having been considered, the department advised on April 1 last that the permission sought might be granted. Nothing further was heard about the matter until April 29, when a telegram was received from Mr. A. F. Healy, of Windsor, Ontario, advising that there were protests against the granting of the permission referred to. On May 1 the Westcott Ship Reporters and Vessel Agents were advised by telegram to stay operations in connection with the establishment of the proposed station. On the same date the Westcott Company advised the department by telegram that operations were stayed. Meantime the harbour master at Amherstburg has been requested to report the grounds upon which the objections to the establishing of a station are based.

That is the situation at the present time. No request has been made by any other company.

FISHERY AND FOREST AIR PATROLS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Might I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he has considered the matter of the abandonment of the air patrol of the British Columbia fisheries, which I brought to his attention on May 3, and if he has any announcement to make.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): I may say to my hon. friend that the matter has been considered, and that at present we are in communication with the Department of National Defence with a view to continuing the service.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. E. MAYBEE (Northumberland, Ont.): On March 22 an order for return was passed with reference to the dismissal of one John Hanna. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) why that has not been brought down.

Hon. C. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): I will see why the return has not been brought down.

EQUALIZATION OF FREIGHT RATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I observe the presence of an old friend, Mr. John Oliver, Premier of British Columbia, and as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways are in their seats, I would like to ask the government one or two questions. Has any application or representation been received by the government from Mr. John Oliver, Premier of British Columbia, relating to the reduction or equalization of freight rates by this parliament? If so, is the government considering action on the question of freight rates, by act of parliament or otherwise?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps my hon. friend will let me answer that question to-morrow. At the moment I cannot speak for all the members of the government, and I would like to make sure first whether representations have been received in any quarter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the Minister of Railways could answer the question now.

Mr. DUNNING: The answer of the Prime Minister is quite satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not believe the matter is one of urgent public importance, and I think an answer to-morrow will serve.

Mr. LADNER: We in British Columbia believe it to be a matter of great importance. May I ask the Prime Minister, in making the announcement to-morrow, to also refer to the question of the application for the return of the Peace River block and the Dominion railway belt.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Put the question on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think if my hon. friend would put his question on the order paper it could be answered more satisfactorily. I will try to give him a prompt reply if the question is placed on the order paper.

PROPOSED CHANGES IN THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): On several occasions I, or others on this side of the House, have asked the government through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whether any changes were proposed to be made as to the budget. At first we received negative replies, but on the last two occasions the replies were certainly not negative, whatever else they were. I am receiving reports of a character which I cannot ignore to the effect that very extensive changes are proposed. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he proposes during this debate—and if so at what early date—to advise the House of the changes thus proposed, or is he prepared to let the debate become purely academic?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): My observation, Mr. Speaker, is that the debate has been academic for some days, and I am very anxious that we should reach a division. The last time my right hon. friend asked this question he said he was anxious to make a speech but did not like to do so if there were to be any changes made, and I said he would be quite safe in making his speech. I have no other reply to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would like an answer to my question. I ask the Minister of Finance again, as plainly as I can put it, if he proposes budget changes, whether of importance or not, and if so, whether he proposes to let the House know about them whilst the debate is proceeding.

Mr. ROBB: I have no reply to give to my right hon. friend other than what I have already said. He knows that in committee representations are frequently made and considered. If my right hon. friend has any suggestions to make when we get into committee I will be very glad to listen to them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I must ask the government to answer yes or no. There is no reason why that question cannot be answered. Does the government propose, whether in committee or before, substantial changes in the budget presentation?

Mr. ROBB: My answer to that question is no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No substantial change?

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 5, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. A. D. CHAPLIN (Kent, Ont.): When the House adjourned yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the sugar beet industry of western Ontario. I would like now to refer to what the sugar beet industry has done for immigration. During the past sugar beet season 3,000 Hollanders and Belgians worked in the beet fields of the county of Kent, and when not employed in those fields, some of these men work in the tobacco fields and also do mixed farming, thus very materially assisting production. Four hundred Hollanders and Belgians are now located on their own farms. These men had to be assisted into Canada by the sugar beet company a few years ago, and arrived with no money at all. They are very thrifty and have their own farms, well cultivated and in splendid condition, and are making the very best of Canadian citizens.

With regard to the Petrolia plant, construction was discontinued after several hundred thousand dollars had been spent by the farmers, due to the action of the government in placing an excise tax on beet sugar in 1922, and in cancelling this tax in 1923, substituting for it a reduction in protection twice the amount of the tax. This gave the cane sugar refineries a little better protection than they had previously enjoyed, at the same time reducing the protection to beet growers by 50 cents per ton. I am not holding any brief for the sugar company, but they have been doing a good work in bringing immigrants to this country, and that industry has been responsible for placing these 400 Hollanders and Belgians on the land.

While on the question of protection I would like to make a reference to the woollen industry of Canada. As a result of the action of this government a great number of our woollen mills were closed practically over night, which leads us to wonder what business is safe. And what did the reduction in woollen duties mean? In the mill which was closed in Chatham it meant less than 24 cents a yard on suitings and overcoatings, or less than $1 on a completed overcoat. I believe the same thing would apply to other mills now closed, and for that one dollar no one received any benefit; suits and overcoats cost as much now as they formerly did, and thousands of men have been thrown out of employment. That may not seem quite correct; such a statement may require a little explanation. I would like to draw attention to the experience of the United States in connection with the woollen industry. Mr. Fordney, of the famous Fordney tariff—the man who put a 42 cent duty against our wheat entering the United States—saw that their woollen manufacturers were in danger as a result of the importation of foreign woollens. He said, "We have the highest standard of living in the world, and we are not going to have it lowered by allowing cheap labour products to come into this country." So Mr. Fordney raised the duty to 100 per cent, and the United States mills are busy to-day.

Now for the explanation I promised. I said that thousands of employees of woollen mills were thrown out of employment. I should have said that they are out of employment in Canada. Many of these men have moved to the United States where they have secured jobs in factories which are sufficiently protected and are running, so they have merely changed their place of employment. It may be argued that there are some woollen mills running in Canada. Some may be running in the hope that a Conservative government may soon be returned to power. Others are running, but it is a safe bet that they are running for cover, and not for profit.

I have heard about the Simcoe mill as one which is running, but I would like to tell this House that the manager of that mill recently passed away. The business of running a woollen mill in this country to-day is enough to kill the most stout-hearted manufacturer. During the late election campaign the Hon. G. N. Gordon, who ran into a Peck of trouble in the late election, asked one of the large woollen manufacturers not to put out any woollen election propaganda, saying "We will fix you all right." This promise was entirely unnecessary, for his government had already fixed the woollen industries, but, unfortunately, it was not "all right"—it was "all wrong." This same gentleman was slated as Minister of Immigration in the new cabinet. I was greatly, surprised one day to read the Prime Minister's speeches out in the prairie provinces pleading for Liberal supporters instead of Progressive members. He also stated he would like to have his Immigration minister from that part of Canada. I could not understand just what he meant, having already one Minister of Immigration, but it struck me all at once that it was not immigration he had in mind, but emigration. He wanted the Minister of Immigration at Halifax or Montreal to count the immigrants coming in, and a Minister of Emigration at Windsor or Niagara Falls to count them going out— and the Minister of Emigration, I believe, would be the busier of the two.

The protective policy which I am advocating for the woollen industry is the policy which will prevent people from leaving this country by providing employment for them in Canada, and thus rendering unnecessary the appointment of a Minister of Emigration.

Speaking of the problem of unemployment. I have been surprised, as a new member of this House, and also greatly struck by the character of the comment which comes from the supporters of the government. I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) advocating government assistance for the unemployed in and around Winnipeg. Now the unemployment must be quite noticeable when a member of this House pleads for aid. On the other hand, I heard the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) make the remarkable statement that times were prosperous, and that they were building a couple of factories in Sherbrooke to employ around four or five hundred hands. I would like to ask the hon. member what class of goods are to be manufactured in these factories, and also what protective tariff they will have on their goods. I believe they have a factory in Sherbrooke closed now because they can import goods from Germany cheaper than they can manufacture them. Would the hon. member for Sherbrooke be averse to a tariff that would open up that factory and shut out German goods, even if it was 35 per cent or more?

Mr. HOWARD: Will the hon. member please name any factory in Sherbrooke that is closed or that has closed down in the last five years?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Kent): The hon. member told me himself, in the Chateau Laurier, of one factory in Sherbrooke that had closed down, because the people were buying goods from Germany instead.

Mr. HOWARD: I did not make any such statement.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Kent): The hon. member for Sherbrooke, when speaking in this debate, gave the best and most concrete argument in favour of protection. His speech was notable for two reasons: first, the great volume of sound, which reminded one of the steamboat on the Mississippi with a seven horse-power engine and a ten horse-power whistle—every time the whistle blew the engine stopped. Second, he gave the best argument one could use for the Conservative national policy of protection. He stated that a factory in Sherbrooke making hose was selling its products at the same price as that at which they were being sold in the United States, although they had a tariff of 35 per cent. That clearly shows that they were not taking advantage of that tariff. But the hon. member did not say that the competition came from Canadian plants, and not from factories outside this country. That internal competition is exactly what is advocated by the Conservative policy.

It is an unfortunate fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have too much unemployment in this country. This is shown very clearly by the fact that in the last few years 500,000 of our people have been admitted to the United States and have paid the head tax, to say nothing of those who slipped in without paying that head tax, which would raise the number to probably 700,000. Now, Sir, supposing these 700,000 had refused to go to look for work in the United States. Would the hon. members still say that there was no unemployment in this country? They had jobs here once. Where have their jobs gone? On top of all this, we hear of the great "wave of prosperity" which is spreading over the country. This wave of prosperity seems to be based on the reports of our wonderful exports, and how they so greatly exceed our imports. But the man out of work with a family to support says in regard to these export statistics: They may be good food for the brain, but they are not much good for the stomach.

The Liberals cry aloud in this House and in the press when five or ten thousand of our people come back from the United States, but when the five hundred thousand of our people left this country, paid head tax and entered the United States, they wept not. It seems to me that the business of this government is the closing of factories. Dun and Bradstreet's will show that. They also seem to make it their business to buy goods from the United States rather than in Canada, as our import statistics will show. Further, I would like to draw the attention of this House to what the government is doing in regard to supplying members of this House with articles of everyday use. If hon. members will look at the penholders on their desks, or at the lead pencils furnished to the members of parliament and their rulers in their rooms, they will notice that these goods are all made in the United States.

I do not think there is one member who would condone buying our supplies for this House anywhere but in this country. We read in the press all over this Dominion, "Buy at home", "Buy goods made in Canada." Mr. Speaker, the running of this country by parliament is the biggest business in Canada, and we should set a good example to the rest of the people by buying nothing outside that is made in Canada. If it is that these articles can be bought cheaper in the United States, then we need a higher tariff. I will make this statement, that if there were any members or ministers in this House who made pen-holders, pencils or rulers, that order would never have gone to the United States. Now, Sir, the buyer in this department has some reason for going out of the country to buy these goods. It is either precedent or blockheadedness. If it is precedent, then for heaven's sake, Mr. Minister of pens and pencils, have it cut out. If it is blockheadedness, then all I can say is this: If this buyer thinks he might lose his head to make pens and pencils, he is in no danger whatever; his head is not wood, it is plain, unadulterated petrified bone.

But that is not all. Not long ago I was riding on the Canadian National railway with a friend of mine, and while in the dining car we asked for jams. We got jams made by Sprague, Warner and Company, Chicago. You have heard of taking coals to Newcastle, but that is a bedtime story to this. Sir, a man who would buy a pound of jam outside of this country when there are millions of pounds made here should be put in that big house at London, and in a padded cell for his own safety, and seven of the worst inmates could then be let out and that institution would be still to the good.

May I say in closing, Mr. Speaker, that what we are striving for is a tariff that will give adequate protection to our farmers, that will foster our industries—especially the automobile, the sugar-beet and the woollen industries—and promote the greatest measure of prosperity for the masses.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I trust the House will bear with me this afternoon in the brief remarks I purpose to make on the budget. First of all I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr Robb) upon the budget he brought down on April 15th. I think it can be fairly and honestly stated that it is a budget which is for the benefit and will tend to promote the material welfare of the masses of the people of this Dominion—and after all the great masses of the people really form the backbone of any country.

The budget contained, perhaps, the most welcome news this Dominion has received for several years. During the last seven or eight years following the war a commercial depression, not confined to Canada but world-wide in its character, was experienced. The recent deliverance of the Minister of Finance indicates, however, that so far as business conditions are concerned Canada is emerging from darkness into light. He was able to announce a large increase in the trade of the country and, what is of more importance, a decrease in the national debt to the extent of some $23,000,000. Even more vital in its character was the announcement of a drastic cut in taxation the benefit of which will be felt by all persons who are in receipt of moderate salaries or who possess moderate means. Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that the recent budget was one of the most cheerful budgets that has been delivered in this House for many years.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, or at least most of those on that side who have spoken in this debate, have grudgingly admitted that there is an improvement in the trade of Canada and that the financial position of the country has been strengthened in the last year or two, but they all maintain that this improvement is due to a kind Providence. The hon member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) referred to this matter yesterday afternoon, but prior to his speech I had prepared some notes on the same point and notwithstanding that it may involve some repetition I am going to inflict them on the House. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), following the delivery of the budget speech on April 15th, admitted that conditions were improving in Canada, but he said the credit was due to a kind Providence. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) spoke along the same line but went even further. In this connection let me say,—I do not offer the remark in any unkindly spirit, and I hope it is not presumptuous coming from a new member—that I have come to the conclusion that the latter hon. gentleman goes to a greater extreme than any other member opposite when he rises to address the House. For the benefit of the House I shall quote the remarks of the hon. member for Fort William on the occasion referred to. At page 2625 of Hansard of April 20, the hon. member is reported to have made the following statement:

> I admit that luck has been with this government; that Providence, by giving Canada these greater crops, has shown some favour to the present administration, but there is a Providence, they say, which looks after drunken men, and I presume the same Providence looks after governments who are drunken with the desire to hold power in spite of the wishes of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SANDERSON: Some hon. gentlemen across the way say, "hear, hear." I am glad to get that recognition from them. Let me say in reply to the hon. member for Fort William that we on this side believe in Providence, and that we think Providence works sometimes in a most marvellous and mysterious manner, not always as we wish or hope or pray, but in a manner that is for our ultimate good. I think, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps a kind Providence had something to do with defeating the government that went to the country in 1921; that Providence did then operate in a way that worked for the good of Canada. I think also that a kind Providence had something to do with seeing that the Conservatives did not come back to this House after the election in October last in sufficient strength to control the destinies of this country for a few years to come. Furthermore, Providence has had something to do with the votes which have been recorded in this House during the last four months; and it is not unlikely that Providence has kept the hon. member for Fort William from crossing to the treasury benches, because I do not think there is any hon. gentleman opposite who wants to reach those benches more quickly than my hon. friend. It is quite evident that although Providence sometimes works in a mysterious way those operations are for the good of the country.

I do not think I should have injected myself into this debate had it not been for the fact that certain hon. members opposite, especially those from the province of Ontario and in particular the representatives of ridings adjoining the county I have the honour to represent, have stated that they cannot support the budget, and that those who sent them here are not in favour of it. These hon. gentlemen have affirmed the belief that the budget is not for the good of Ontario, or, for that matter, for the good of the Dominion of Canada as a whole. Speaking for the constituency of South Perth I am satisfied that the majority of the people of that riding are not only in favour of the budget, but they think it will be advantageous to the province of Ontario and the whole Dominion also. Coming as I do from the province of Ontario, I am not only going to vote for the budget but I shall exert myself to the utmost in its defence.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), who represents a county adjoining the riding for which I have the honour to sit, in the speech he made a week or two ago gave utterance to some very extreme statements. I shall take the liberty of reading one of those statements, which will be found at page 2642 of Hansard of April 20. Coming as I do from the province of Ontario, I desire to put myself on record in answer to this statement made by the hon. member for North Oxford. He said:

> This budget as a whole is what might be termed a Saskatchewan budget. That statement deserves a little explanation. The general policies in Saskatchewan seem to be policies of annihilation and assassination rather than protection, and if those members from Saskatchewan who seem to favour those policies get any more power in the House than they have shown they have, there is going to be very serious trouble for this country. The reason why I attribute this to Saskatchewan is as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) said this afternoon, because no reference was made in the Speech from the Throne to this reduction in the tariff on automobiles.

I may be wrong, Mr. Speaker, and I speak subject to correction. I did not know that it was usual to incorporate in the Speech from the Throne the specific matters that were to be presented in the budget in regard to reductions or increases of the tariff on this article or that; I would imagine that to be a most peculiar procedure for any government to follow. The statement of the hon. member continues:

> I attribute this reduction more to Saskatchewan Liberals even than to our Progressive friends and I base this statement on part of a letter written by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) to his home paper about February 5, when he said—

I will skip two or three lines which have no bearing on the point I am making, and read from further on:

> I have noticed for the last two or three days that whenever there is any applause on the other side on account of the budget, the Liberal members applaud income tax reductions and the Saskatchewan members applaud reductions in the tariff on automobiles. That shows what the feeling of the House is on the matter.

As a member from Ontario I desire to say that I hold no brief for hon. members from Saskatchewan. I have noticed that they are well able to take care of themselves in this House when the occasion arises. Nor do I hold any brief for my good friends the Progressives, because they have shown that they are quite able to take care of themselves at all times; and this remark applies equally to my good friends from the province of Quebec. During the four months I have been attending the sittings of parliament I have never seen a single, solitary move by the members from Saskatchewan, the members of the Progressive group, or the almost solid bloc from the province of Quebec, which in any shape or form was not in the best interests of Canada as a whole. My answer to the hon. member for North Oxford is that I am not controlled by anybody from the province of Saskatchewan, but I have come to the conclusion, as a humble member from Ontario, that this is one of the best budgets that has ever been brought down in the Dominion of Canada, in that it is calculated to contribute to the prosperity of the whole country.

Hon. members on the other side of the House have spoken of the desirability of unity; they have emphasized the fact that we must have a united Canada. This statement was made particularly by the Conservative members from Ontario, including that solid bloc of Conservative members who come from the city of Toronto. I say that there is not a single member in this House who does not want a united Canada. We all want it. But, Mr. Speaker, we will get a united Canada sooner if there is a little more compromise and reason on the part of the members of the Conservative party from Ontario. The sooner they realize that Toronto is not the whole of Ontario; that Ontario is not the whole of the Dominion of Canada and that they cannot choke down the throats of the members from all the other provinces their policy of higher and higher protection, the sooner we will have a united Canada.

Coming to the budget, I will not deal at any length on the reductions in the income tax. It is obvious to anybody who has read over the schedule that there is a substantial reduction, which will benefit especially those who receive moderate incomes. I am not very much concerned about what the cut is, if any, on the income of anyone who is in receipt of $50,000, $75,000, $100,000, or $150,000 per year or upwards. But I am concerned about the man with the moderate income, and the Minister of Finance has provided for that class of people and granted for their benefit a substantial reduction. The two-cent postage appeals to everybody and I will not say anything in regard to it. The taking off of the stamp tax appeals to all and is a welcome change.

I come now to what is the most contentious matter in the budget, namely, the reduction in the duty on automobiles. Hon. members who have spoken from the opposite side of the House during this debate have taken this attitude: they do not directly criticize the reduction in the tariff on automobiles, but they hide themselves behind the argument that this is a matter that should have been referred to the Tariff Advisory Board. I am in favour of a tariff board, and I am only speaking for myself when I say I would like to see a little wider power granted to that board. In regard to referring this question of the reduction of duties to the tariff board, I think this government did the right thing when, off its own bat, it reduced the duty on automobiles. Hon. members on the other side have taunted this House with having no initiative, with hiding themselves behind commissions, with doing nothing but drift, with not having sufficient strength of character or will power to take any matter into their own hands and come to a decision upon it. When this government on its own initiative virtually decided to make this cut in the duty on automobiles they showed strength of character; they showed that they were prepared to stand or fall on that question. They showed that they had the courage of their convictions in reducing the tariff on automobiles without referring it to the tariff advisory board.

The reduction in the tariff on automobiles is not a new matter. It has been debated in this House, I understand, session after session; it has been discussed by the people, who have demanded that some reduction be made in the duty on automobiles and motor trucks imported into this country. Hon. members opposite have argued that the government had not sufficient knowledge of the automobile industry to be in a position to decide whether or not this cut should be made. While I am on the tariff I may remind the House that we have had in this country before commissions which have investigated the whole subject. In 1920, for instance, the government of that day appointed a commission to study tariff matters and that body, composed of three members of the cabinet, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Tolmie), and the hon. Senator Robertson, then Minister of Labour, travelled up and down the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This morning I was curious enough to look up the history of that commission, but I could find no trace of any order in council appointing it. I did discover, however, that the jaunt of these three hon. gentlemen who toured Canada on that occasion for the purpose of securing information on the tariff, and presumably of giving to parliament and the people the benefit of that information, cost the country the sum of $17,153.39. I am not going to go into the details of that expenditure; I would refer any hon. gentleman interested in the matter to the Auditor General's Report of 1920-21, page F 126. Perhaps it may be observed in passing that the government appealed to the country in December, 1921, about a year after this commission, or whatever you choose to call it, had travelled up and down the Dominion.

Now, surely these gentlemen gained some information then in regard to the automobile industry along with other industries in Canada. I know, of course, that this was five or six years ago and possibly the condition of the industry now is somewhat different from what it was at that time. But I think I may safely assume that the automobile industry was prospering back in 1920 and I venture to suggest that its prosperity has increased probably fourfold in the meantime. I have been unable to find any report submitted to parliament by that commission. Although I have looked the matter up I have not discovered that there was ever published any of the information they gathered as a result of that trip, but the House will be interested to know what was contained in the Speech from the Throne as submitted on February 14, 1921, in relation to the tariff question. That speech reads in part as follows:

My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry, and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every province. The hearings necessary for this purpose have now been completed, and the conclusions founded thereon will be submitted to you in due course. It is the opinion of my advisers that in such revision regard must be had to the necessities of revenue and as well that the principle of protection to Canadian labour and legitimate Canadian industries, including agriculture, which has prevailed for more than forty years in this country, must be consistently maintained; but that the Customs duties imposed to that end should be no higher than is essential to ensure good standards of living among our working population and to retain and make possible the normal expansion of the industries in which they find employment.

That apparently is the only information that was ever made public in connection with the investigation of that commission into the tariff. That was a commission of the Conservative government's own making. Three ministers of the crown went exhaustively into the subject in all its phases, and as I well remember, they visited the part of my province in which I live, interviewing everybody who might care to give evidence on any point appertaining to the tariff. They heard the views of farmers, manufacturers, bankers, artisans, labourers, mechanics; in fact, anyone at all who cared to volunteer information on the subject of the tariff was heard. It is reasonable therefore to suppose that these three gentlemen gathered, in the vast mass of information submitted to them, some knowledge of the automobile industry. In view of that probability, it is surprising to note what the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., who as I have said was a member of that tariff commission, or board of inquiry, or whatever you may care to call it, said in a speech he delivered in Kingston on April 30 last, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of May 1, 1926:

Doctor Tolmie referred to the cut in the tariff on automobiles made by the government. "Now, I do not propose to say whether the tariff on automobiles is too high or too low," Doctor Tolmie continued. "No one could pass an intelligent opinion on this without a very thorough investigation and hearing both sides, so that I do not know under what grounds the government was able to come to a conclusion, but the general impression in the House of Commons is that they were forced to it as a result of their being under the influence of groups and their effort to run the country with a minority. It will appear to every fairminded citizen that the proper course to have pursued was to submit this to the tariff board and then abide by the finding of that body."

The hon. member should take this House into his confidence and give us the benefit of the information he gained on that trip in 1920, even if it is five or six years old.

Other hon. gentlemen opposite also have expressed their views on the reduction in the duties on automobiles and motor trucks. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has taken up very many hours of the time of this House during the past four months discussing various industries in Canada. He is a speaker whom we all delight to hear, and he has a wonderful fund of information on practically every industry in Canada. I have heard him discuss the milling industry, the farming industry and, if I mistake not, the textile industry, in regard to which he has given us a good deal of information. But strange to say, when it comes to automobiles, concerning which almost any man in the street can tell you something, the hon. member prefers to have a tariff board report upon the industry. He wants more information than he has at present. He confesses that he is not very well posted on the automobile industry, although he presumes to be thoroughly conversant with almost every other industry discussed in this House.

The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) delivered in this House the other day a speech in which he sidestepped very gingerly the reduction in automobile duties. If I may say so, he made a very good speech in so far as the imposition of a duty on American magazines and periodicals was concerned, but he was not so well versed in the automobile business. Let me read to the House what he said in regard to the reduction of automobile duties:

We stand to-day, Mr. Speaker, in the position where a great industry in this country, an industry with ramifications through all our commerce, is threatened with serious impairment, and it is threatened without investigation, without taking expert advice, and absolutely contrary to the pledges of the government as contained in the Speech from the Throne.

I have here a newspaper published in the city of Toronto in which there is reproduced an editorial from the Orange Sentinel, a publication edited by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre. This article was published between last session and this. I want to read it for the benefit of the House. For fear some hon. member may ask me what paper I am quoting from, let me say that I find it in the good Tory Evening Telegram published in good Tory Toronto. This is the editorial:

Whatever else may be done with the customs tariff at the next session of parliament—

Mark you, that is this session.

—there should be a substantial reduction in the duty on motor cars. It is clear from the price quoted in the United States and Canada that the Canadian manufacturers are charging "all the traffic will stand." The duty of 35 per cent is more than protection, it is in part a government subsidy to the makers of automobiles. As long as the motor car was purely a luxury that only the rich could enjoy, there was not much reason for complaint; but the motor car has become a necessity in business and professional life, and those who are thus compelled to buy one should not be forced to pay excessive profits to the manufacturer. A certain type of car that sells in the United States at $1,875, costs $3,100 in Canada. That is altogether too wide a spread, and is not warranted by any factor in the trade. The American makers have large production, it is true, but they pay higher wages, and there is no reason why their raw materials are any cheaper. The makers of motor cars in Canada are soaking the public unduly, and it is the duty of the government to lower the tariff, and it that way inject a little competition of American firms, which will bring down the prices.

In this good Tory paper from Toronto, the Telegram, there is another article which refers to what the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) said with respect to the duty on automobiles, I think last session. This is how he expressed himself on that occasion, according to the Toronto Telegram:

As I have previously stated, I am not a high protectionist, and I think there are some industries in this country which possibly are too highly protected. One of these, I think, is the automobile industry. This industry is making rapid strides in Canada, and in the last year this country, a country of 9,000,000 people, exported half as many automobiles as did the United States with a population of 110,000,000 people.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) last session voted in favour of a resolution urging a reduction of the duty on automobiles. I do not know what he intends to do on this budget. The hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) also voted in favour of that resolution. When these hon. gentlemen declare that they do not know anything about this industry and desire full information, it seems rather remarkable that months and months ago they should have put themselves on record in favour of a reduction of the duty on automobiles.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the notice of the House some figures regarding the automobile industry of this country. As I stated a few moments ago, this is not a new industry. As a matter of fact the automobile is no longer a luxury, it has become an absolute necessity to ninety per cent of our people. The farmer must have an automobile and perhaps a motor truck. In business after business these vehicles are just as necessary as hydro power and steam power. I am a protectionist to a certain extent, and always have been, but when an article has become an absolute necessity and is enjoying a protection of 35 per cent, I think it is time the duty was cut for the benefit of our people, particularly when, as is admitted, the industry has passed the creeping and walking stages and is now at the running stage. I have before me statistics of the Canadian automobile industry for 1925, from which I quote the following:

New records were made in the automobile industry in Canada in 1925. In that year the production of motor cars numbered 161,970, as compared with 132,580 in 1924 and 147,202 in 1923, the best previous year in the industry; the value of output at the factories rose to $110,835,380 and exceeded that of any other year; capital employed amounted to $74,678,451,—

I would ask hon. members to note the next sentence:

—an increase of 23 per cent over 1924;—

That is, an increase of capital of 23 per cent over the previous year, 1924. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but I suspect that a large portion of that increase was not further money invested in the industry, but represented what is known as stock "melons" to the shareholders—that the companies were pyramiding their profits and divided them to the extent of giving their shareholders further stock. I have no absolute proof that that is the case, but I think it is highly probable. Certainly it happened in the case of the Ford Company of Canada.

—employees numbered 10,301 as against 9,277 in 1924; payments in salaries and wages totalled $17,249,270 as compared with a corresponding figure of $14,219,137 in the previous year; export shipments—

This is a very vital matter, Mr. Speaker.

—export shipments valued at $39,417,614 were the highest on record; imports at $35,240,298 were greater than in any previous year, and registrations of motor vehicles totalled 728,005 as against 652,121 in 1924, when the previous high record was established.

Following that statement is a summary of production in the automobile industry in Canada from 1904 to 1925, and it shows the growth of the industry during that period. I have no doubt these figures will be of interest to hon. members and I will therefore read them:

Summary of Production in the Automobile Industry in Canada 1904-1925

Year	Number of Automobiles
1904-1916	135,000
1917	93,810
1918	82,408
1919	87,835
1920	94,144
1921	66,246
1922	101,007
1923	147,202
1924	132,580
Total	1,102,202

That shows an increase of production yearly; there were some 25,000 more automobiles and trucks manufactured in Canada in 1925 than were manufactured during the twelve years from 1904 to 1916. It would therefore appear, Mr. Speaker, that this is an industry which is past the stage of pap feeding by a very high tariff; it must be at the stage where it can take care of itself to a certain extent, without being protected against competition by a high duty. The increase in exports of automobiles and motor trucks shows that these manufacturers do not altogether depend on Canada for a market, but that they have a very wide and substantial market elsewhere. I read the figures showing the exports, which amount to from 40 per cent to 42 per cent of the entire output of these Canadian factories. These automobiles and trucks are exported under very favourable terms, and I do not doubt the price paid shows a profit to the manufacturers.

To bring the purchase of an automobile right down to the individual, has there been a man who purchased an automobile during the last three or four years who, after the deal was made, did not conclude that he was paying almost more than the value of the automobile, and that he was paying an undue profit to the manufacturer of that car? If my information is correct, as I think it is, the manufacturers of automobiles in Canada do not give credit; theirs is an entirely cash business. I understand that if you order a car through your local dealer—it does not make any difference what kind of car it may be—he either goes to the factory for that car or has it shipped by rail, and he has to pay spot cash before he receives it. If he goes to the factory for five cars he has to pay for them before leaving the factory; if they are shipped by rail they are shipped with a draft attached to the bill of lading. Therefore the manufacturer runs no risk of bad debts; the poor unfortunate local agent has to carry that burden. He may not get cash from his customer; he may have to take notes running for a term of months; he runs that chance and takes the risk of loss on secondhand cars as well. So the automobile manufacturer is in a different position from the manufacturer of any other article; his is a cash business, and that is a big advantage. Anyone in business knows if a manufacturer has no bad debts on his books and does not have to give credit he is in a position to sell his article very much more cheaply than if he carried a big line of credit and had to wait for the money to come in.

I have perhaps tired the House with my remarks; I have taken longer than I intended, but I want to say a further word about my position on this question of a reduction in the tariff on automobiles. If I honestly believed that the cut in the tariff would wreak havoc, and throw thousands of men out of employment, forcing the automobile manufacturers to close their doors, I would hesitate in giving my support to it. But I see no reason why men should lose their jobs; I see no reason why the automobile manufacturers cannot carry on and still do a profitable business. It should not be necessary for them to cut the pay of their employees; they may threaten to do so; they have bluffed a good deal already in closing their doors, but I sincerely hope that such an event will not occur in reality. If that should be the case, it may be that politics will have entered into the question, which will be a very regrettable and sad thing for the country. I think, however, the government were perfectly justified in making the reduction, and I believe most of the people, irrespective of their political faith, will approve of it also.

I thank the House for their indulgence and for the patience with which they have followed my somewhat rambling remarks.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. L. BAKER (Toronto Northeast) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I, with your kind permission, address the House on the subject of this debate, it being the first occasion I have of speaking in this Assembly, I ask for your leniency and that of the House. But before broaching the subject matter, Sir, I wish to pay you my respects and offer you my congratulations on the high post you occupy as First Commoner of Canada. I also wish to congratulate the hon. members of this House on their selection of a man so dignified, courteous, capable and possessing such a sense of fairness, as Speaker of this House for a second term. I hope that you will live long as occupant of that position; but, that before long, the hon. gentlemen on this side will be sitting on the other side of the House, on your right, and those hon. gentlemen now on the other side will be here, on your left. I further wish, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents, to offer you and the hon. members of this House our congratulations.

It is a pleasure for me to endeavour for a few moments to speak the French language, out of regard for you, Sir, and those other French Canadian members in this House, and further, because as the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) expressed it, there are two official languages in this country. I endorse what the hon. member said: That French is the most beautiful language born on human lips. I should like to speak more at length in French, however I do not wish to do so to-day, because I am sorry to admit it, I have forgotten much of my French, not having had enough practice within the last thirty years and I naturally fear not to be well understood. However, I trust that, when I have been living here for a year, I shall be more successful and that some day I shall have the pleasure of delivering in the House, a speech in French. The French Canadian members in this House understand the two official languages of this country, but all the English speaking members do not, perhaps, understand the two languages; that is why, Sir, with your kind permission I shall now continue in English. But before I do so, I wish to express a wish: I think it is necessary to have in this city a French speaking club to study and converse in French. I propose that the name "Le Club Lemieux" be given to it, and I would like to have the honour of being a member of this club so as to endeavour to speak the French language perfectly, and this, for me, would require a long practice. I also endorse the views of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), when he says that it is an excellent thing to speak two or three languages.

In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, as I previously pointed out, that this is the first occasion on which I have had the honour of addressing this or any other parliament, I know you will extend to me the same generous, kind consideration that you have always shown to those who are making their first speech in this House. I trust that hon. members will bear patiently with me while I express my views on the question before the House, to do which, I understand, is my privilege, as well as my duty, as I see it, to my constituents.

I wish to refer to two occasions upon which remarks made by me were referred to in this House. The first occasion was when the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), acting as leader of the House—which duties he performed so well—said that one of the members from Toronto, addressing his constituents, "made the following remarks" to which he took exception. In order that the onus shall not be placed on any of the other Toronto members—I presume they have enough troubles of their own to bear—I think it will be well for me to state that I did make the remarks in question to my constituents before coming to the House. I said at that time that I considered it was inconsistent for the Progressives to vote, because, as I explained to my constituents, they dissented from both the other parties in the House; that the people of the districts which they represent also dissented from the two old parties, and therefore to be consistent they ought not to vote in the original division in the House which sought to determine who had the right to govern the country. I have nothing to withdraw regarding that statement, and although it seemed to annoy some people I thought it expressed my conviction as to what should be the correct course on the part of the Progressives. I still think that if they had followed that course they would have taken the right stand, and by abstaining from voting at that time the business of the House would be further advanced than it is to-day, and they themselves would not have made any less progress than they have to date. I do not feel called upon to withdraw the statement I made at that time, although it seemed to annoy a few hon. members of this House. I am still of the opinion that had the course which I outlined been followed, it would have been the best policy to adopt, having regard to the welfare of the country and the best interests, in the long run, of all parties here, including even the Progressive group.

The other occasion when exception was taken in the House to remarks made by me, was when a newspaper report was read here regarding a meeting of my constituents in Toronto Northeast which I addressed. I was speaking at the time of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Dunning), and the ground for the comments which the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) made depends upon which newspaper report he read. And yet there is nothing to find particular fault with in the one report any more than there is in the other. Nor could any particular objection be offered to anything I said on that occasion. I was expressing my views to my constituents with respect to matters in Ottawa. I did not do that with any feeling of ill will or of malice towards anybody, and the use of the word "cub" had no ill intent behind it as respects anyone. I am pleased to recall that on the occasion when the hon. member for Yorkton brought the matter up in the House, Mr. Speaker was good enough to say that there was not much harm in the word "cub." We know that the word "cub" is used continually by students in a university or college; and it is quite common on their part to make use of the word "freshmen" also with respect to newcomers. I have heard the word used in a much more friendly sense even than this. Of course there are idioms in everyone's language, and idioms are frequently employed in the course of conversation. I have often made use of the expression in speaking to my own grandson: "Come here my little cub, I want to talk to you." In such a case as that the expression would be meant as a term of endearment. Very frequently I have used the word in that sense, so that when I uttered it at the meeting in question there was no thought of malice towards anybody, and no harm was intended.

In bringing me to task the hon. member for Yorkton referred to me as a "denizen" from Toronto. The hon. gentleman, perhaps unintentionally, made an error there; I know he would not have erred intentionally. Now referring to Webster's dictionary, which I found in the library, I found the definition of "denizen" to be: "one admitted to residence with all or part of the rights of citizenship." So my hon. friend was absolutely wrong when he called me a "denizen," because I was born in this country, as were the two generations that preceded me. There was therefore a slight error on the hon. gentleman's part. I do not apply the name "denizen" to my hon. friend either; but it so happens that the word, as defined in Webster, does apply to a great many of the hon. gentlemen whom my hon. friend was quite unnecessarily defending.

The hon. gentleman used a quotation from Dryden with respect to me, no doubt composed about the year 1650. But there is another quotation from Dryden which reads this way: "As soon as denizenized they domineer." Well, I thought, after sizing the situation up, that in the days of Dryden they were talking along the same lines that I was endeavouring to follow, without any idea on my part that objection would be raised. Apparently for a long time it has been the tendency of the newcomer to want to domineer. Such a thing as that would not be very well received in the provinces of Quebec or Ontario.

I hope I have offered a full explanation of the incident in question. It was the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton that forced me to refer to the matter in detail so that there might be no misunderstanding.

Now I should like to refer briefly to my constituency, which I believe is the custom on the occasion of making a maiden speech. I have noticed that many hon. members have repeatedly proclaimed that they are here to represent the interests of their constituency first. May I say that my constituents did not send me here in that spirit? They fully understand that this is a federal parliament whose duty it is to administer the affairs of the whole Dominion. Their desire is that I should come here and assist, as much as possible, in the carrying out of policies applicable to the whole of Canada, not merely those which will benefit my constituency or any other particular riding. They understand that the only way in which an all-Canada policy can be brought about is on the basis of live and let live, of give and take.

In the last election the policies of the Liberal-Conservative and Liberal parties respectively were presented to my constituents, and the answer was twenty-one thousand votes—and if my opponent had not been such a fine man it would have been 25,000—for the policy of safeguarding the industries of Canada by means of adequate protection, in other words, the policy proclaimed by the Liberal-Conservative party. That is the wish of my constituency. They desire to see protection applied to industry, whether agricultural or manufacturing. The policy declared by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) in this House on June 2 last is the policy that I am here to uphold, and the policy that my constituents think is for the best welfare of Canada as a whole. The feeling of my constituency in general is that we should work together; let the centre use the coal and iron of the east and the coal and wheat of the west, and let the east and the west in turn use the products of Ontario and Quebec. Such a policy we believe is feasible; that is the only way we can bring about a united Canada and bring prosperity to the whole of the country.

The last speaker this afternoon (Mr. Sanderson) mentioned the great desire along the lines of unity in Canada. I do not think, if I may respectfully say so, that he started very well when he made an attack on Toronto and Toronto members, and to that I consider it my duty to take exception. I do not know that any hon. members from the city of Toronto made any attack on the hon. member or his constituency, nor do I think they have the desire to do so. Toronto in no way considers that its members have any more privileges than any other members in this House. They know they have not, and have never assumed to have, which is quite contrary to the statement made by my hon. friend. The members from Toronto as a rule adhere very closely to the basis of protection and the safeguarding of industry. That is largely the policy of the people of Toronto. But my hon. friend must not think that they are doing it with any ill intention to any other part of the country. They conscientiously believe that that is the one policy that will build up every constituency in Canada, and that is why they uphold that policy. If I may respectfully suggest it, the hon. member, in talking that way, while he made a great appeal for concord, is really talking discord. I am sure it will be agreed that the less discord we have in this House the better.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the hon. member permit an interruption? I am glad he has come to that frame of mind, and it is a pity he did not arrive at it before he delivered his speech in Toronto attacking the Liberal members from Saskatchewan.

Mr. BAKER: I am very sorry if I have annoyed the hon. member in any way. I did not intend to do so

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. member has not annoyed me at all.

Mr. BAKER: Referring to the budget, I think the government ought really to be very grateful to Providence that they were able to do so well for the year ending March 1926. I am quite positive that it was not because of their fiscal policy, a policy which drove 500,000 registered Canadians to the United States and likely 100,000 to 200,000 more who were unregistered. If we had not been blessed with bountiful crops it would be quite another story. Providence sometimes expects us to help ourselves by good judgment and good policy. Some people have said that this is a poor man's budget. I cannot quite see it that way. In fact I claim that if the fiscal policy of this country were correct we would not be in need of any poor man's budget; there would not be any poor man. Why should we have a fiscal policy which will produce the poor man, and then make a budget to help him? I do not think that is good business; it does not sound reasonable.

One hon. member called this budket a "common people's budget." I do not accept that word "common". I do not think it is up to date in this age at all. Some people say it is the people's budget. In my opinion it is nothing but a straight clean-cut political budget, designed for election purposes, regardless of the results to Canada. It is a political budget designed to catch votes for the government rather than to encourage investments in industry, to improve our internal trade conditions and increase prosperity throughout the country.

There are many arguments which I could present against this budget, but the points I am bringing forward in discussing it may show why I come to that conclusion. The estimates—which are only estimates—show a credit for the year ending March, 1926, of possibly $22,300,000. That is pretty close sailing; however, it is better than showing a deficit. We must remember, of course, that we paid very heavy taxes to get this amount of $22,300,000. We paid more than that amount in taxes, and we paid more than we should have paid, so that this showing is only made on the excess collection of taxes plus the assistance of prosperity. It is very gratifying to see the improved condition of the National railways. It is good to see that they are gradually coming to the point where the loss is less and less each year, and we hope they will soon be able to show a profit instead of a loss and be in a position to pay the interest they owe the government, meet the commitments involved in the guarantees, and so on. We are glad to see that Providence has helped us in the receipts from the railroad. It has subscribed a good deal, but I think the railways could be assisted to come to a paying basis much quicker, or at least as quickly, by an increase of population, which I suggest can only be brought about by an increase of work in this country for the workingmen. This can only be accomplished by having a full and adequate tariff to protect the industries in which these men may be employed, whether agricultural or manufacturing. We have an excess of exports over imports to the extent of $402,000,000. If we were to add to the imports the smuggled goods, of course that would make a considerable difference. This is only taking into consideration the visible, and if we were to take into consideration the invisible it would make an even different showing. And by the time you made the addition of invisible imports and exports you might find the $402,000,000 gradually dwindle down to a much lower point. For example, we pay in interest to foreign countries $350,000,000 annually. The lumber, pulp, mining products and so on that we export, amount to $369,000,000. That is produced largely by United States and English companies—more largely by United States companies—and all Canada gets out of it is the labour. The value of the goods less the labour goes to the United States; we do not reap the benefit of that. We have here again an increase in the imports of $131,000,000 over those of last year. I do not think that looks very promising, when we know at the same time that our population is leaving the country for want of employment. Then again a question we should consider in connection with these figures is how much of this $796,000,000 of imported goods we should have made in Canada. That should be considered from the point of view of good business—the excess of exports over imports. That to me is a very vital point. If we bought $400,000,000 less we would have $400,000,000 less to pay to foreigners, and that would give us much more to add to our pay rolls at home.

Regarding the export of $1,350,000,000 of our raw material, this should have been manufactured at home and exported in the finished article, or almost finished article, thereby giving employment and paying wages at home. These are the points that deserve deep study in connection with these figures. It looks very good on the surface to speak about our exports, but to get back to the facts, how much have we exported in the raw that we should not have so exported, and how much have we imported that we should not have imported in the finished article? A consideration of these points is essential if the country is to be put on a sound basis in the matter of internal trade. The success of a country does not necessarily depend upon excessive exports. We might export more and more of our raw materials until our resources were entirely depleted, and although from the standpoint of statistics we should be in a prosperous condition it is obvious that the contrary would be the case.

In the matter of income taxation, I am glad to see that married men have been exempted up to $3,000. I am also happy to note that unmarried men will have to pay a little more: I think they should and can afford to. One inconsistency in the budget is in my opinion the simultaneous reduction in duties and in income tax; I do not see how this is going to work out. Of course we shall not know until the end of the year, but it seems to me that, with a reduction in duties, more goods will be imported and consequently there will be less activity in home industry, so that there will be less to collect by way of income tax. I am afraid the government is taking a long chance of having an improvement of conditions in the coming year, but if Providence is not equally as good to us as it was last year in the west, then undoubtedly there will be a nice balance to the bad when the reckoning is made.

The automobile question has provoked considerable controversy, and while I do not intend to deal with it at any length, seeing that it has been very well discussed on both sides of the House, I do not think that anyone will dispute the fact that as a result of the reduction in duties the industry is being, and will be, disturbed. We are all agreed on that point, I think. I am in perfect agreement with the view expressed in the amendment of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) that, had this whole subject been referred to the Tariff Advisory Board which has been appointed, the present serious situation would have been averted. As it is the lack of confidence on the part of investors in industry, due directly to the action of the government, will greatly impair industry with a consequent loss to the Dominion.

I note that the preferential tariff is to apply only to such goods as are shipped directly through Canadian ports. That is as it should be and always should have been. And as regards the tariff in relation to sugar, I agree with the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Chaplin), who went rather fully into the matter, that the present proposal will work to the injury of Canadian beet growers. The hon. member stated his case quite clearly and I did not hear anyone contradict it. Here is another industry which the government is attacking without due investigation. Why should we give a preference to farmers in the West Indies in discrimination against our own Canadian agriculturists?

A good deal has been said about prosperity, several members opposite supporting the government having dealt at length on the point.

I do not know how the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) figures out that Canada is in so very prosperous a condition to-day. Suppose we have $400,000,000 of exports in excess of imports; does that necessarily imply that we are prosperous? What are the internal conditions of the country? That is the criterion. Are we yearning for people to come in to fill up our workshops to keep the wheels of industry turning? Are we advertising for thousands of men who are badly needed to meet the growing demands of industry for labour? Or, on the other hand, are our people leaving Canada to seek work elsewhere? In the answer to that question lies the evidence of prosperity or lack of it. Do not let us ask the Minister of Finance whether we are prosperous; let us go to the chartered accountants throughout the country who make up the annual statements of our business concerns, and to our bank managers. They can tell us just how prosperous we are in industry, merchandising, and so forth. Let us ask, too, the income tax department, according to whose returns we collected in 1921 $100,000,000 as compared with less than $50,000,000 in 1925. It is to such people that we must go to find out whether or not we are prosperous, and not to the speeches of men who look at these things from the political point of view. Let us get down to facts. If I am asked whether we have had prosperity in Canada in the past year I say, yes, in the west where Providence did the work. But in central Canada and the east, where the government did the damage by failing to safeguard industry by means of adequate protection, I answer, no. That is my opinion and I happen to know something about the matter, for I am in a position to learn the conditions throughout the country. I am in touch all the time with the pulse of our internal trade from Halifax to Vancouver. The exodus of our people surely is one evidence that we are not enjoying the prosperity which we are told we are having at present. If this country were as prosperous as hon. members make out, people would be coming into Canada from the United States. That is the natural course for migration. People naturally move from the older to the younger country; they do not go from the younger to the older. That is the unnatural route for people to take when they are seeking to better their conditions, and the fact that Canadians are going to the United States to look for work proves positively that things are not so prosperous in Canada.

This country is not following a rational course in the matter of tariff policies and budgets. Surely the right thing to do in connection with any business or undertaking is first to lay your plan and then to work it out. On that principle, should we not first decide whether we in Canada desire to be an agricultural community, pure and simple, or a nation devoted to a happy combination of agriculture and manufacturing? Should we not decide that question first, and then go ahead? If we settled that point we would be kind enough to stop United States manufacturers coming into Canada and spending large sums of money putting up plants which sooner or later, as a result of interference with the tariff, will not be required? On the other hand, if we decided that we needed both agriculture and industry, we could stop people coming here with the mistaken idea that we were a free trade country and that we did nothing but grow wheat for export. We could, too, by coming to a clearcut decision let our young people know in time whether it would be worth their while remaining in Canada or saving so many years of their lives by getting out of the country. Just think of the millions of dollars we are spending educating thousands of our young men simply to see them pouring over the line into the United States. We could stop that waste if we had a decisive policy as to what we intended doing. Surely we should have some such policy and pursue it instead of following, as we are doing now, a course that offers no encouragement to industry or business and that holds out no inducement to our workingmen to remain in Canada.

Some people ask the question whether Canada is adapted to manufacturing, and there are those who say that it is essentially an agricultural country. I say that Canada is suitable for manufacturing. Do hon. gentlemen realize that we can produce manufactured goods 300 days in the year, whereas agriculture can produce only for a short period in each year? Some hon. gentlemen say that our climate is a handicap; I think we talk too much against our climate.

Mr. WARD: I do not think the hon. member is familiar with agriculture or he would not make that statement, that agriculture is carried on for three or four months of the year.

Mr. BAKER: Let me substitute for "three or four months," if I said it the words, "a lesser portion of the year."

Mr. WARD: On a properly adjusted farm operations are conducted throughout the whole twelve months. A very small percentage of our farmers are engaged in wheat-growing only.

Mr. BAKER: Then it is too bad that such a small number should control the country; that is not majority rule. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we should talk less about the rigours of our climate; it is bad advertising. I think the House will agree with me that Canada's climate is all right.

With respect to our export trade, I do not think we should be too ready to boast about it. For example, England has a larger export trade per capita than United States, but she suffers from much more unemployment per capita.

Again as to the budget, Sir, I should like to have seen the Minister of Finance incorporate in it a tariff duty sufficiently high to exclude American journals. Those publications are tending to Americanize Canada, and the sooner such propaganda is checked the better it will be for this Dominion.

I should also like to have seen the budget contain an item increasing the duty against imported woollens so as to revive the Canadian woollen industry. Attempts have been made to controvert the fact that this industry has suffered severely from lack of adequate protection, but there can be no doubt that this is the cause of its being in such a seriously depressed condition to-day. Of the thirty million dollars' worth of woollens we imported last year, considerably more than half could be manufactured in this country if the industry were adequately protected, and this would give employment to a large number of men. It must always be borne in mind that "the man follows the job," and if you want lots of population you must provide lots of jobs. In the course of his speech last week the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) stated that last year we imported only thirty million dollars' worth of woollens as against forty-five million dollars' worth in 1921, and he appeared to derive considerable satisfaction from this apparent decrease. But we must remember that prices last year were away down compared with those which prevailed in 1921, and therefore the apparent decrease of importation may be good for political purposes but it is misleading. Besides, to really judge the volume of this business we should have regard to the yardage, not to the money value. The following figures will bear out my contention:

Yards Imported
Overcoatings
69,031	351,175
Tweeds
2,585,833	3,327,760
Worsteds and Serges
6,552,434	9,756,954

And so on down the list. This shows that while the figures presented by the minister apparently bore out his contention they did not represent the facts, and that the real condition of affairs can only be realized when the importations are stated in terms of yardage. We bought tremendously greater yardage in 1925 than in 1921. It is yardage that gives employment, and it is employment we want, for employment brings population.

Now, in framing a budget I think consideration should be first given to labour—in other words, to employment. A protective tariff, it must be remembered, is not simply to protect the manufacturer; this is purely incidental; the prime purpose of such a tariff is to protect the wages of the working people. In short, the safeguarding of our industries is primarily to protect the wage-earners of this country so they can work in Canada at high wages which will enable them to maintain the Canadian standard of living, not at such wages as are current in mid-Europe and Japan, where the standard of living is deplorably low. When discussing the budget the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) pleaded for a minimum wage regulated by the cost of living. Well, so it should be, and we hope that the minimum wage of Canadian workers will always be a good liberal wage. But I cannot see how it is possible for him to consistently plead, as he no doubt conscientiously does, for that laudable objective and at the same time vote against the only party in this House with a policy which will assure to the working people of Canada a minimum wage sufficient to meet the high cost of living. One thing we have to contend with in this House is inconsistency, and I address these remarks to the hon. gentleman in the most kindly spirit and in the hope that he will see his way clear to support the party that is supporting the people whom he is supposed to be representing. I hope he will represent them by taking this course, for there are no people in the world more worthy of proper representation than the labouring people of Canada. I hope he will accept my suggestion and support the amendment of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), and so make certain that labour will not be interfered with in the future by a government which fails to properly look after the interests of the working people. We have seen this government ignore the tariff board which it recently created and then take the bull by the horns and shake the automobile industry all to pieces, thus throwing our working men out of their jobs.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has also pleaded, and quite properly, for the relief of unemployment. Might I respectfully suggest to him that the greatest relief he could possibly give them would be by supporting the fiscal policy of the Conservative party which will ensure adequate protection to every Canadian workman.

As to old age pensions, Sir, I think it is a very deserving proposal, and I think every one in this House agrees with the principle; the only difference of opinion is in regard to the details of working it out. In applying this principle I think the one thing we should guard against is to so frame the legislation that it will not be possible for people to qualify for pensions who have not given their labour to Canada between the ages, say, of twenty and fifty. If they need it they should have good, reasonable old age pensions, but foreigners, after giving their labour to a foreign land, should not be able to come here and receive old age pensions at the expense of the Dominion of Canada. That is the old age pension system I think should be put in force.

Then we come to the question of population, and I think we all agree that we need an increase in population; I presume there is no argument on that point. I think it was mentioned by one hon. gentleman that we did not necessarily need increased population to be a good country, but I do not agree with that. We must have more people for our area, for the railroad plans we have laid out, for our expensive government and for our great national debt. We must increase our population and make that population prosperous by a proper fiscal policy. We know, of course, that with double our present population the per capita debt and expense of government would be so much decreased. We have now ten parliaments to govern eight million people; if they are all as good as this one, of course, they will be able to govern forty million people. Let us get the people, and it will then cost so much less per capita for government. Our railroads can handle twenty-five million people as well as they handle our present population, and the overhead would not increase, which would give our railroads a chance to show good profits.

With regard to our population I am satisfied that the only immigration policy for Canada is one which safeguards our industries by adequate protection. Then we will have an inflow so great that we will be able to put in a quota system and choose our population. We can take as many as we like from the United States—and let us take a large number from there; we can take a great number from Great Britain, and also from France, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, Norway and Sweden. In other words, let our new population come from Great Britain, the United States and the northern part of Europe. These people are willing to come to Canada, but they will not come and we do not wish them here if we have not employment for them. But there is a way to provide that employment, and only one way.

We have had some discussion in this House about treaties. I have many notes on this subject but I am not going into it in detail. We have a treaty with France, a treaty with Belgium, a treaty with Australia, a treaty with New Zealand and so on. So far as I can see —and I say it fearlessly, because it is only my own humble judgment—this government are very poor treaty makers. That is shown in so many ways, and although the farmer—but I will not say the farmer, rather the farmers and grain growers of this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BAKER: No, no, I do not mean that as a joke; I do not want to disqualify any hon. member. In this House we have both; I was contradicted on that point a moment ago, and I want to be as nearly correct as possible this time. They have rather belittled the fact that the Australian or New Zealand treaties may work against their interests; very well; this is another case where only time will tell, but I am well convinced of what the result will be. I am sure they will see the error of their ways very quickly and ask the House to reverse its former action. In other words, what we want is foresight and not hindsight; we should not make these treaties and then withdraw them. I think some hon. members to my left would be very glad to see these treaties withdrawn now. I believe it was the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) who said that since these treaties were in force it was only fair and decent to give them a trial for at least six months. But I noticed the hon. member said—and I was very pleased to hear it—that he did not see why this government wanted to go to Australia for a treaty because, as he said at page 1082 of Hansard, our imports from Australia amounted to only $762,113 in 1917, while our exports to that country amounted to $6,549,546. That trade was doing very well and might have been left alone, as the hon. member suggested; there was no real need of a treaty at all. Then I have a memorandum here in regard to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). He said that he voted against the Australian treaty in the last parliament because it increased the duty on raisins. I think that is a rather interesting reason.

My idea of treaties, Mr. Speaker, is that we in Canada need a treaty among ourselves; a treaty of the east with the centre and the west; of the west with the centre and the east, and of the centre with both east and west. We should expend our energy in that direction, if I may respectfully suggest it to this House. We want internal trade, a national policy for the protection of all industries; protection within Canada. There is lots of room for work; we can spend lots of time in making that kind of treaty. Why should we buy farm products from foreigners when Quebec produces such large quantities of the same farm products? If Ontario must import farm products I should say the fiscal policy of this country should be such as to enable Ontario to secure those farm products from Quebec, and not from some foreign country.

It is said that Canada is difficult to govern. I do not say that, but it has been said in this House more than once. Supposing that to be so, that should provide all the more interest; an easy job has no interest at all. If Canada is difficult to govern let us go at it hard and lose no time in getting down to business.

An hon. MEMBER: We are doing it.

Mr. BAKER: We are not getting anywhere and never will get anywhere under existing conditions here. The work of government may be difficult, but there is too much partisan politics in the game. We have five troubles in this country, with which we are all well acquainted; the fiscal policy, taxation, transportation, immigration and emigration. Our imports, taxes, salaries and incomes, no matter what their source, are all paid out of domestic production. That is where we get our money, so if we protect our production we protect the source of all our business and revenue. Hence we return to that principle which hon. members will notice I have been continually suggesting, because to my mind it is the only thing to save this country. That principle will be eventually adopted and inaugurated and will save this country, but let us save time; when you save time in a matter of such importance you save a tremendous amount of money, so let us get at it as quickly as possible; let us get right down to business, and do what we all know must be done. We must safeguard our industries by adequate protection.

On the surface, Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest difficulties we have in Canada is that conditions are unbalanced. I think if we take it gradually and look it over carefully, we will find that that is the trouble. But I do not say there should be any upset because we are unbalanced. In a business you will have departments overbalanced and unbalanced, but you will not upset that unbalanced department; by the success of other departments this one department will be allowed to find its level without loss. I mention that because I am going to make a remark in a moment about grain, and I do not want my friends the grain growers to be disturbed at what I have to say. I would not take anyone's business without reimbursing him. The country is unbalanced in this way; for the welfare of the Dominion we are producing too much wheat. If we grew less wheat for export and produced more vegetable and farm products in general and had more manufacturing, we would then be more evenly balanced and would have less trouble and less turmoil than we are having to-day. I think it quite evident that the wheat production of Canada is out of all proportion to the industries and general farming, and if you will notice, that is the root of the trouble in this House. If we would work along those lines to try to balance things up, stop growing more wheat for export until we catch up on the vegetable and general farming products and the manufacturing, we would get along better. For example, why should we import a hundred million dollars' worth of farm products which we could grow in this country, and for which we must send out wheat of the same value? If we did not do that we could consume more of our own wheat at home. I know that cannot all be done at once, but in the meantime the production and export of wheat might be kept at such a level, by a statutory process which can easily be worked out, that losses will not be occasioned in the meantime.

Mr. WARD: Is the hon. gentleman advocating a reduction in the production of wheat?

Mr. BAKER: I do not advocate that; I simply suggest the advisability of not further increasing our wheat production. Let it stand still until other forms of industry catch up. If we go ahead, and develop and overdevelop our wheat production, we will have to carry on our present expense in spreading out the railroads, whereas by stopping the increase we will do away with that. I think we will be balanced then; there will be a great deal more harmony in this House and through the Dominion, and more prosperity to all.

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am not thoroughly versed in farming; we cannot all have that pleasure and privilege, but I think it is generally admitted that these new lands now being broken in for the production of grain for export will not, in twenty years, produce so much per acre. If that is so are we not using up too much of the virgin soil of this country in the present generation for the purpose of exporting wheat to foreign countries, when that land may be required in fifty years or more for food for the coming generations? That should be also taken into consideration.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): May I ask the hon. member if he is now enunciating the policy of the Conservative party?

Mr. BAKER: I tried to enunciate the policy of my party before touching this question, but apparently I have not made myself clear. I would not like to take the time of the House in going over it again, but if my hon. friend would do me the honour of coming to my room to-morrow I would be very pleased to have a talk with him on the subject.

As I was saying, this question of the unbalanced production of wheat has to be taken into serious consideration. I hope I have the success of the wheat growing industry as much at heart as any Canadian, but if we should grow no more wheat than we are growing now, and in the meantime work out a policy whereby we could consume a greater amount of our Canadian wheat at home, I think we would be proceeding in the right direction. I have a number of quotations on United States wheat; everyone knows it is inferior in quality to Canadian wheat, but it is quoted sometimes as high as 15 cents a bushel more than the Winnipeg market.

The policy I am advocating for the balancing of trade in this country would give protection to the wheat grower as well as to everyone else; he would receive more money for his wheat, which would benefit everyone. Then again on this question of the over-production of wheat, we must remember Russia; supposing Russia should become sane? She is on the road to sanity now, and what about wheat when she gets back to normal? I read the other day of a shipment of 30,000 tractors from New York to Russia, which were paid for by cash. If the wheat fields of Russia are opened up I presume we cannot produce wheat as cheaply as it can be produced in that country. They are in close proximity to England, and England will buy where she can get the grain the cheapest; then where shall we find a market for our wheat? The United States will not take it; Russia will be supplying England, and what are we going to do with our hundreds of millions of bushels of surplus production? Why not see that possible trouble ahead and stop now this excess production? Let the grain grower see the true light and start to build up a home market in Canada, looking forward to that possible menace in the future. I call that good business. Do not wait until the trouble comes, and then say: Oh well, we used to send all our wheat to Europe but Russia has the market to-day. And we must remember that there is the Argentine also supplying wheat to the world's market. The standard of living in these competing countries is low compared with ours, and what are you going to do then? The one salvation for the western wheat grower, and he is coming to see it, is to build up a home market in this country, and that is the policy advocated by the Conservative party.

There are many viewpoints of protection, but I would like to give a quotation you have all heard before very often; to my mind it is so good that I do not think anyone can hear it too often or dwell upon it too much. It is a quotation from Abraham Lincoln, and it is good. He was more modest than we are; he did not presume to know very much about protection. He said:

> I do not know much about tariffs, but I do know this much: When we buy goods from a foreign country, we get the goods and the foreigner gets the money; but when we buy goods at home, we get both the goods and the money.

I think it would be a good thing to have that framed as a motto and sent all over the country to be hung on every man's wall. There are other people that have ideas on protection, for example the Prime Minister. He gave utterances to some of those ideas in this House on April 30th, 1925, as reported at page 2656 of revised Hansard. The Prime Minister said on that occasion that what the country needs is protection for the women. Well, to that extent I agree with him. But when he talks about his knowledge of protection for women he ought to discuss the question a little with some of us grandfathers in this House. We who have mothers, sisters, wives, and married daughters ought to know a little more about protection of women than the Prime Minister does. The right hon. gentleman says there should be protection for women. He is right but the protection the housewife wants is to know that her man is going to have a job and whether he is going to have his pay envelope every week. Those who have had to go out and look for a job, whether it be in mercantile pursuits, in farming, or anything else, in order to get a pay envelope for the wife and family, know, perhaps a little more about this subject than the Prime Minister who talked in this strain so glibly. Yes, the housewife wants to know, also whether her son when he becomes old enough to go out into the world and earn his living is going to get a job in Canada instead of having to go to the United States to look for employment. That is another sort of protection the housewife wants. The Prime Minister has not been running this government in a way that will produce that result, and it is just about time he did. There is only one way in which it can be done properly, and that is by establishing a suitable fiscal policy for this country. It is only those accustomed to grind at the wheels of commerce or to plow the soil and who find themselves out of a job, who appreciate the stern realities which confront them when there is a lack of that protection.

Now I wish to refer to some inconsistencies that we have witnessed here. In the first place let me take the government. Other hon. members on previous occasions have referred to their lack of sincerity and some fault has been found with the application to them of such a term. I do not wish to be called to account by the Speaker and therefore I will not speak of "insincerity," I will use the word "inconsistency". The latter term is almost equally as good as the other and I hope it is parliamentary. Now, the inconsistencies of this government are really very striking all the way through. I have not made a list of them, but they are really very numerous. And in this connection I may say that the stand taken by labour—or rather by its representatives in this House—although I have no doubt sincere, has been inconsistent. The very fact of the present government being still in existence after the famous Richmond Hill speech of the Prime Minister is the very height of inconsistency.

In this House we are apt sometimes to figure that we are familiar with the viewpoint of the farmers. In trying to get that viewpoint I think we should be careful to differentiate between farmers and grain growers. While we have many farmers and grain growers here, I think the spirit of the general farming community of Canada is not truly, consistently, and generally represented in this House. In my opinion it figures on the other side of the question to a rather overpowering degree. May I say also to my hon. friends from the province of Quebec—and I say it conscientiously and fearlessly but with great kindness—that they are not representing the spirit of that province. They are inconsistent when it comes to representing the spirit of the province of Quebec, because if there is any province in Canada which is protectionist in spirit all the way through it is that very province. What is at the bottom of all these inconsistencies? I am afraid it is politics. Personally I am sorry to see such a display of inconsistency. Many new members like myself coming to parliament for the first time were very unfortunate to arrive when parliament had reached the stage where a policy of bartering was entered into in order to enable the present government to hold power. Had we entered this House when conditions were normal our first session would not have impressed us so unfavourably. As it is, our impression of the elevation and dignity of parliamentary institutions has been somewhat lessened by what we have witnessed.

Referring to trade conditions, the farmer will come into his own when commerce is again properly balanced and proper steps are taken for the building up of a home market. I want to speak with some frankness as to the policy which should be pursued in the national interest, and I know my hon. friends from the west will accept my remarks in the proper spirit. In the first place is it not desirable, in the interests of unity and a real national spirit, that the newer provinces should display due consideration for what I may call the parent provinces? If we are to live together as one family and one household should not a certain consideration be manifested for the older members of the family who are supplying the most of the funds? In a properly managed household do not the older and more experienced members have the most to say? But here we have the younger members of the family coming in and trying to dictate the policy of the household. It seems to me that is rather premature on their part; I think a contrary policy should be followed without detriment to any particular province.

Before closing let me say that I do not approve of group government. I desire to put myself on record on that question and for this reason: The feeling in this country at the present time is that we should return to two party government, and so far as I know our Liberal friends would agree to that. If there is anything better than two party government, it would be government without party, but we have not yet reached that point of perfection. Group government, parliaments ruled by a minority as we see it in this House, is not a good thing for the country.

I do not need to speak of the effect of the tariff on industry or on the price of goods. It has been argued very often by hon. members that a tariff raises the price of goods. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) who sits on the other side of the House, has answered that question very satisfactorily and shown that a tariff does not necessarily advance the price of the goods. The hon. gentleman gave us instances of articles produced in this country, the prices of which were no more than the prices of similar articles in a country where they had 35 per cent protection against them.

I could refer to utterances of many other hon. members in this House, but I will not take the time. Let us throw aside the theories of Cobden and Cartwright; they do not apply to Canada to-day. Cobden's theories might have been all right a hundred years ago in England, but this is not England a hundred years ago, this is the Canada of to-day. Cartwright's theories were not accepted in this country in his day. Let us get down to business and consider the practical facts and conditions as they at present exist in Canada. I suggest that if hon. members would study men like W. R. Morson and other up-to-date authorities on the subject, they would receive greater assistance. I noticed that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) gave us the latest statistics on cattle. Indeed I do not know whether he succeeded in persuading the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) that the Hamiltonians were not as big beef eaters as they were pictured to be. The Hamilton people may have come from the Tower of London and perhaps they were good beef eaters. But the point he was making was, how many pounds of beef a day these people were consuming. The qustion was in regard to the exportation of beef. If we had in our country the people who were driven out of Canada by bad fiscal policy, the amount of beef that went to England from Canada last year would not need to be exported at all. In going over the figures the hon. member made special mention of the fact that in the statistics he was dealing with there were no importation of asses. He made rather a striking remark in regard to that. I do not know what his idea was in drawing attention to it, in particular but upon looking up the statistics of the breeding of live stock in Canada I find there is no record of any asses being bred in Canada; so honours are even.

Mr. BROWN: The statistics I gave were correct.

Mr. BAKER: Quite right, there were no asses imported and also none bred here. Referring to page 1925 of the same book I find that in Saskatchewan they had practically all the mules in Canada—9073 mules—but there are practically none in the other provinces. I am only dealing with agricultural statistics, and we are talking about quadrupeds now.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make special mention of the hon. members representing constituencies in the province of Quebec. I speak truly and to the best of my knowledge that twenty or thirty of the hon. members representing constituencies in the province of Quebec are not really representing the spirit of the people of Quebec, having reference to the politics of the two different parties in this House. I appeal to hon. gentlemen and I say that they do know that the spirit of the province of Quebec is protectionist all the way through. Having reference to the magnificent protectionist policy consistently pursued from beginning to end by their able provincial government, I appeal to hon. members from that province and I say to them, "You have the power to save the situation that now exists in Canada." I appeal to the members from Quebec to consider this matter seriously; on the question of their duty to their country and the loyalty they have always shown to their country, with the permission of the Speaker they might ask the privilege of crossing the floor of the House, on the ground that they want to divorce themselves from the party who do not believe in protection. I would like to see a real page made in history; I would like to see twenty members from Quebec cross the floor on the question of a trade policy which makes for the welfare of the Dominion of Canada. By so doing you guard your industries because under present conditions you never know when your industries are going to be hurt.

Let me say from my seat in the House one word to the people of Canada. I suggest that they should take more interest in the affairs of their country and vote for the adoption of a fiscal policy which means live and let live for all parts of Canada. I should like to ask the people of Canada to consider the recent election and the results of the returns sent in by returning officers, which show that tens of thousands of people in Canada did not vote at all. It is too bad; they should vote. It is almost a question whether we should not have compulsory voting as they have it in Australia. I appeal to the people to send only to this parliament, as indeed they generally do, men who with staunch hearts will follow a policy of Canada first and foremost, Canada as a link in that world chain of nations on which the sun never sets, so as to secure peace, happiness and prosperity to all the people of this world.

Mr. J. E. LETELLIER (Compton) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, called upon, at the opening of the first session of the fifteenth Parliament, to represent in this House, the riding of Compton, I heard noisy protests, from my very arrival, among the hon. members of His Majesty's opposition, and, above the din of these protests, it was easy to make out these words loudly uttered against the government: "It is a headless government, a moribund government; a government usurper of the people's rights." Fortunately, to-day, these high sounding phrases used by the hon. members of the opposition have subsided and one may surmise that a forced compunction obliges and will oblige, for a long time, our friends of the opposition to use towards the present government a more subdued tone and wiser language.

Who, among the hon. members of the opposition, would dare contend that the present government is without a leader? The hon. Prime Minister, on the one hand, with much consideration for the popular verdict—owing to the complexity of the vote—deemed it wise to ask His Excellency the Governor General of Canada to call parliament in order that it might solve the uncertain situation in which were placed the various parties in this House; on the other hand, very considerate of the code of honour and wishing to enter parliament by the expressed will of the people, he declined the offer of generous members who desired to vacate their seat in his behalf. He is now placed in authority, and I heartily congratulate him for having so wisely acted. His so sincere devotedness to public affairs, and his so profound respect for our free institutions, are a guarantee of a very sound administration.

"It is a moribund government," stated hon. gentlemen of the opposition. Could they express themselves thus when they saw the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) occupying the so difficult post of acting leader, with such dignity and rare tactfulness which even compelled their admiration.

Could they possibly maintain that the government was dying, when such hon. ministers as Robb, Boivin, Stewart, Cardin, Motherwell, Cannon, Macdonald and King, at the head of their important departments, fulfilled their task with such ability and zeal.

The people wished that the government which was so unjustly attacked should no longer put up with the abusive language of the opposition, and we witnessed one after the other the present office holders take their place in the departments of Railways and Labour, they will prove themselves worthy of the task entrusted to them—I have named the hon. Messrs Dunning and Elliott.

"A government usurper of the people's rights," had cried out hon. members of the opposition. Fascinated by the allurement of power, they checked up their numbers and came to the conclusion that their supporters were numerous enough to entitle them to be called upon to form a government. It is then that my hon. friends of the Progressive party generously cast their vote with the government so as to preserve to the country a wise, far-seeing and progressive administration. You alone, Mr. Speaker, escaped the criticisms to which the government had to submit, and the unanimous choice of the hon. members of this House in placing you again in the Speaker's chair, leads me to believe that the day is not far away, when legislation will make permanent the office you so gracefully hold. Together with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) I express the hope that you will become the first holder.

The budget that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) presented to us raises a unanimous chorus of praise. The unavoidable criticisms which it has also suggested will not prevent the people from being relieved of $25,000,000 of taxes, and appreciating the wisdom of the Liberal government who, heirs to the enormously difficult task bequeathed by the previous government, nevertheless were able to rouse the country from the state of depression into which it had fallen and lead it on to prosperity, where the vigour of the eminently constructive principles embodied in the Liberal party's policy will shine in all their splendor.

The budget shows us a real surplus and there is no need of further proof than that of the wiping out of taxes. Scrutinize the budget, glance at it with an evil eye, if you so wish, truth is always truth, and the hon. members of the opposition will have to humbly admit that the hon. Minister of Finance has had the glory of rousing great enthusiasm from the shores of the Atlantic to those of the Pacific. Objection may be taken that automobile manufacturers closed or wished to close their factories, owing to lack of protection. I shall retort: the present government is not the appointee of financial interests, but the elect of the people, and it intends to safeguard the rights of the people in preference to the interests of a few large business concerns.

This budget brings me joy, because it will allow the government to work out some measure in regard to the rural credit scheme.

I am very sorry to find that so worthy and able a man as the hon. leader of the opposition has discovered in this some manoeuvre favouring my party. I am also sorry to see that a measure announced by His Excellency the Governor General, in his Address from the Throne, a measure so necessary and so prolific in benefits to the farming class, has been the object of attack, to the extent of giving the impression that it was a bait to draw the hon. members of the Progressive party to cast their votes with the government. Yet this legislation was necessary, it was and is still urgent.

To promote farming is but to want the country's prosperity; to give generously and wisely to farmers is to accomplish a patriotic work and consequently one that is truly national. I now turn towards those who understand farming, I ask the hon. members of the Progressive party—they who know what amount of labour is required in operating a farm, until is reaped the golden wheat which produces bread, those who are accustomed to feel the burning rays of a July sun and to feel their hands hardening with the daily farm routine—I put the question to them as well as to the great army of noble toilers of the land of whom they are the worthy representatives here: has the Liberal government brought down this rural credit measure only to please you? Would we be a prey to selfish feelings such as are unknown to you? You approve of this measure because it favours the farmer, it matters little whether he lives in Ontario, Quebec or the Maritime provinces. Do the high winds of your vast, prolific and fertile prairies bring to eastern Canada selfishness or freedom? They bring freedom and you rejoice in the success of the eastern farmers, as they themselves rejoice when Providence bestows upon you an abundant crop. No, this rural credit is a measure resting on justice and equality, and I shall always find it strange that a measure destined to produce such excellent results can be the object of spiteful attacks. We have, for many years, claimed this rural credit system in the province of Quebec.

During a number of years, I had the honour of being the president of the Farmers' Association of the parish of Lake Megantic, and I had advocated this measure long ago. Last autumn, in Montreal, at the annual meeting of the members of the Catholic Farmers' Union of the Province of Quebec—in which more than 1,200 delegates took part—resolutions asking for this measure were adopted. Later on, when this question is under consideration, I shall submit these resolutions to the House.

Moreover, the hon. Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec, who was present at this meeting, spoke in favour of it and expressed the hope that some day the Dominion Government would come to an understanding with the various provincial governments to have such a measure adopted. He also expressed the hope that the banks and the co-operative societies, on agreement, might be of great help in the effective working of the rural credit system. We are aware that here and there private industries fail for lack of funds or lack of co-operation. After making a start with that so beneficial grant to the rural credit system, the government, I trust, will find it possible before long to advance funds, in order that associations may be formed in the most important localities, toward facilitating the canning of a number of products, and through this medium farming will find itself greatly benefited: the farmers, in the vicinity of these important localities but at a distance from large centres, will find an easy market for the sale of their garden products. I shall always lend my support to such a measure, because to my mind there lies the source of the welfare of the farming class. I wish to let my hon friends of the opposition know that if I support the measure in connection with the rural credit system, I do not do so with the aim implied in their criticisms, but for the welfare of the whole country. I further wish to add that it would be proper and wise to have a well organized propaganda, aiming at pointing out to the farmer the great usefulness of a system of book-keeping, and especially in connection with an act providing for a system of farm loans. Who, during the last electoral campaign, did not witness how one sought to have the people of this Dominion believe that the country was going to ruin, governed, so it was stated, by an administration who did not understand the true economic interests of the country. People who read certain newspapers saw the farmers leaving their lands to cross the border seeking elsewhere the bread which, it was said, had been taken away from them in this country. They saw large armies of workers with starvation staring them in the face and reflected in their clothes, seeking work and finding none. The manufacturer was pictured as standing on the threshold of his factory and turning away his whole staff because, he said, the government gave them no protection. Yes, I saw them and you all saw these posters carrying from the east to the west the whisper of death, discouraging those who remained in the country, stopping at the borders those who wished to return home. You saw them, and I also saw them, these headlines aiming at throwing terror and fear among the population, in order to induce them to defeat the government. What happened? A number of votes were thus secured, but they were unable to defeat the government to whom, a few months later, the opportunity was given, not to start a campaign of terror and pessimism, but to send out to the whole population this cheering message which was so greatly applauded: Hope! Prosperity is returning, notwithstanding what may be said. Your shoulders were bent owing to the heavy burdens carried and for which we were not responsible; to-day we relieve you of these burdens, we relieve you of $25,000,000 of taxes, in order that you may breathe more freely.

The people had been deprived of freedom, the Liberal government returns it to them. The country is entering on an era of prosperity, and it is to the everlasting glory of the Liberal government that they were able, notwithstanding innumerable difficulties to start it on its path towards its high destinies.

Mr. C. J. HAMILTON (Stormont): As brevity is the soul of wit and procrastination the thief of time I have decided to occupy very little of the time of this House in discussing the budget which is before us. This is the first occasion on which I have risen to speak in this House, and although I have passed the age allotted to men I have never been in a parliamentary assembly before coming here. In the early days of the session, while the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was acting as Prime Minister, he offered very encouraging words to the younger members of the House, the substance of which was that every man in this House was on an equal footing and should therefore take an interest in the affairs of parliament and of the country. With that encouragement I rise to-night to show why I stand on this side of the House in defence of the doctrine of protection.

There are few members in this House who can recall the origin of the protective tariff enunciated by the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. In 1873 the government of Sir John A. Macdonald was in power, and as older members will recollect, during the regime of that administration the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was undertaken. While the preliminaries of that great enterprise were in progress a certain telegram was dispatched through the country, and being intercepted and brought into the House it necessitated the resignation of the Macdonald ministry. The Hon. Alexander Mackenzie took office in November 1873, forming a cabinet of the most capable men in the country. He carried on until 1874 when he appealed to the electorate and succeeded in sweeping the country, coming back to the House with an enormous majority, Sir John Macdonald being in opposition with a very much reduced following. Strange to say, the conditions in the country financially, industrially and otherwise began to go from bad to worse, and Canada was in a depressed state. Practically all our industries were at a standstill and this situation continued until 1876 or 1877, when it became intensified. Delegation after delegation came to the House and were met with the answer that the governments of countries had no control over economic affairs, and that therefore the administration in power could offer no assistance. It was declared that governments, being mere flies on the wheel, could not help matters. In the meantime the condition throughout the country was in so deplorable a state, that to my personal knowledge Toronto and other cities in Ontario—I cannot speak for the other provinces—were crowded with soup kitchens, and men were going about begging for a ticket to get a piece of bread and a bowl of soup. This is not paper talk; it is personal knowledge, for I was a student in the University of Toronto at the time and I know whereof I speak. What I say can be corroborated by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), who was also a student with me. Delegations waited upon Sir John A. Macdonald and asked him whether he could do nothing to alleviate the distressing situation that prevailed. Sir John A. Macdonald inaugurated the National Policy and said:

> The welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy. We are often asked, What is a National Policy? Gentlemen on the opposite side brought in a measure in a previous year which they called a National Policy, but it was practically free trade, but fell a little short of entire perfection by the necessities of revenue. The free trade which has been argued in England, which has been argued here, and which has been argued in the United States would never make a nation. There are national considerations that rise far higher than the mere accumulation of wealth, than the mere question of trade advantage, there is prestige, national status, national dominion, and no great nation has ever risen whose policy was free trade.

On another occasion in 1876 he spoke as follows:

> We are informed in the Speech from the Throne that there is stagnation in trade. We are informed also that this has arisen not from any fault of our own but in consequence of the depression in trade that has taken place in the neighbouring country. If it be true, I say that if there ever is a time when it is lawful, or allowable, or wise, or expedient for a government to interfere, now is that time. Besides the general principle which I have been advocating, that our great manufacturing industries require support, the manufacturers of this country have been up against it. Some have been working half time, some three-quarter time and some have scarcely been keeping their doors open, hoping and believing that they would get assistance, and now at this last moment, just as they thought the time of relief was coming, just when their tether was strained to the utmost, when they were keeping on their work people not by spending their own money, but by their credit and by pledging their resources, in the hope and belief that they were going to get assistance from the government, no aid was given. The disappointment was dreadful and there was deep indignation, curses not loud but deep.

In 1878 the government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie went to the country, and Sir John A. Macdonald for the first time launched the National Policy as the war-cry of the Conservative party. He swept the country and came back with an enormous majority. Immediately confidence was restored, industries that had been lying idle for months resumed operations, and shortly after, owing to the confidence that was inspired throughout the country, he was able to organize a company for the building of that railroad which was eventually the cause of his downfall. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company carried that railroad from ocean to ocean, and it has opened up and civilized the great country from which hon. gentlemen to the left come, where millions of bushels of wheat are grown every year. When I was a boy we were taught that that country was good for nothing but the buffalo and the Indian.

The doctrine of protection has been preached ever since. After Sir John A. Macdonald's death his policy was continued by his successors until it reached the hands of the greatest of all native Canadians, the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He never touched that policy to the extent that he ever injured the industries of this country, and there was never any anxiety respecting its continuance until the tinkering with the tariff commenced four years ago. It will be remembered by hon. gentlemen that when interference with the tariff was first mooted some of the brightest men on the opposite side left the party—at any rate they left the House.

To-day this country cannot continue without being protected against the importations of the manufactured products of those countries which have erected tariff walls against our products. I do not believe in a tariff structure that will make millions of dollars for a few people, but I do believe in such a protective tariff as will give the working man, the man who has to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, adequate protection. He is the first man who should be considered. I believe also in such a tariff as will protect the farmer, and when I say the farmer I include the dairyman. For the last forty-eight years I have been associated with farmers, I am dealing with them every day, and I know the difficulties they have to encounter, especially the difficulties that the dairy farmers have to surmount, and these difficulties are becoming still more troublesome owing to the health laws that now govern dairying. When I heard an hon. gentleman to-night say that there should be protection for the women, I thought the farmers' wives needed protection most of all, because they are the hardest working women in this country. It is generally conceded, Mr. Speaker, that everything possible should be done for our agriculturists. If they are not prospering, then the country generally cannot prosper. We all know that the first fruits of the farm are what make a country prosperous. This is proven by the fact that every year our great financial institutions send their agents throughout the Dominion, particularly throughout the northwest, to ascertain what are the prospects for a bountiful harvest, and if those men come back with favourable reports the financial institutions regulate their investments accordingly.

I wonder if hon. members have any idea of what the dairy industry means to this country. I was amazed the other day when I read the report of an address recently delivered by Mr. J. A. Ruddick, Dominion Commissioner of Dairying and Cold Storage, before the Western Ontario Dairymen's Association. He is one of our most experienced men in dairying pursuits on this continent. Some time ago Mr. Ruddick spoke in rather an alarming way about Canada's dairy industry. From the proud position it had attained in the Canadian and British markets—a position which he himself was in no small measure responsible for—it was, he feared, being ousted by countries that had sat at the feet of Canadian dairymen. His criticisms of slovenly methods that had been unconsciously slid into were outspoken and unpleasant, but apparently they have achieved their purpose in some measure, for Mr. Ruddick now says:

I have as you all know, offered some rather severe criticism of conditions and methods in the industry during the last few years. There was a time when I felt rather discouraged and had some doubts as to how we were going to meet the new competition. If I put things rather strongly, it was because I wanted to awaken the dairymen of Canada to a sense of the seriousness of the situation. I don't know what effect anything I have said may have had, but I do know that there has been decided advancement during the last two years, and it gives me pleasure to say so. The conditions in the industry have by no means passed beyond the reach of criticism, but I believe in giving credit for what has been done as an encouragement to further effort.

The importance to Canada of its dairy industry is stressed by Mr. Ruddick in a rather interesting way. The estimated value of the total dairy production in 1925 is $300,000,000, nearly three times as great as it was fifteen years ago. Mr. Ruddick says:

The report on mineral production in 1924, gives the total value as $209,583,406. This includes everything that comes out of the earth—gold, silver and other precious metals, iron, copper, nickel, etc., coal, natural gas and oil, salt and gypsum, construction material like cement, stone, sand, lime and all clay products including brick. And yet the total value of all these materials is only a little more than two-thirds as much as the value of Canadian dairy production.

The mining man leaves a desolation behind him. The dairyman improves the land he occupies, and leaves it in better condition for repeating the production, and yet I daresay that the average "man in the street" if asked would tell you that the mining industry is of greater importance to this country than the dairy industry. Perhaps he judges by the larger amount of space it occupies in the public press, or by the larger number of high salaried men employed in developing it. I may be prejudiced, but it seems that the public lacks a sense of proportion in this matter. Mining is a highly speculative industry. Fortunes are lost as well as made by those engaged in it. Dairying offers no opportunity for acquiring great wealth, but it does open one of the surest and safest roads to a competency that is to be found in the whole realm of agriculture for the man who is willing to stick to it.

I had no idea that such conditions prevailed in this country. For that reason I am coupling the dairy interests with farming, and I think it becomes the duty of this government or of any other government to advance agriculture and the dairying industry by every possible means.

Following the introduction of the protective tariff, Canada went ahead by leaps and bounds. In 1870 Fort Garry was a place where there was nobody but Indians; to-day it has a population of 260,000. Not only that, but Edmonton, Calgary, Brandon, Portage la Prairie and many other cities in what was called the Northwest Territories have all made wonderful progress and have been brought into touch with the outer world by that greatest of all advertisers of the Dominion of Canada, the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Coming now to the budget, my profession is not that of Minister of Finance; I am a worker; I never have any money to finance with, but I have a head on me, and I know when it is raining. In the first place we had a solemn promise from the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) previous to the election that a tariff board would be appointed and that all matters in connection with the tariff would be submitted to that board before any changes were made. That was stated not only by the Prime Minister but I think by every one of his candidates; it certainly was promised in my riding. Then when parliament assembled we found that the Speech from the Throne also contained a promise that a tariff board would be formed and that no changes would take place in the tariff until they had been considered and reported upon to this House by that board. After a great deal of discussion, as we all remember, the Speech from the Throne was adopted by the House. When the Speech from the Throne was adopted, it became, in effect, an order to appoint that board and to carry out the promise made with regard to the tariff not only during the election, but again specifically in the Speech from the Throne itself. But that was not done. Without any warning this budget was brought down, proposing considerable changes in the tariff. I want to say right here that I have the greatest respect for the gentleman who occupies the post of Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). He comes from a constituency just across the river from mine, and there is no gentleman in that part of the country who is more highly thought of. At one time he was employed in the town in which I live, and it was only the other day that a very prominent man asked me about him and spoke of him in the very highest terms. I believe the hon. minister was actuated by what he thought was right when he brought this budget before the House.

We find that the budget reduces the postage rate. But how many postage stamps does the ordinary man in this country who is working for a living buy in a year? How much does this reduction help him? It does help the man who is able to pay for postage, but not very much the ordinary working man.

The receipt tax is another tax that the man who is able to pay ought to pay. The wiping off of this tax does not help very much the workingman or the ordinary man of moderate means. So I do not look upon these two reductions as much of a gift to the ordinary working people of this country.

As to the income tax, how many men in this country have been paying income tax on an income of $2,000 or under? Hardly any. So the reduction proposed, while it may help the man who had to pay income tax before, is of no benefit whatever to the man who did not have to pay income tax before. Here again, is a reduction that only helps the man who is able to pay the tax, and who should pay it. So that is not much of a gift to the ordinary people of this country.

I have listened with a great deal of interest and much pleasure to the members from the Maritime provinces who have spoken on behalf of that part of the country. I have heard them state their case. I can recall the confederation days and the difficult negotiations that were had before confederation was brought about. I remember reading the promise that was given to the eastern portions of this country when they joined confederation, and I believe it should be the aim of this House immediately to relieve the Maritime provinces and give them what they were promised at that time, and what they are justly entitled to under the bargain that was made when they entered confederation with us.

I would also be strongly in favour of backing up anything that would develop the coal fields of Alberta, thereby giving work to the men in Alberta and enabling the central provinces of Canada to get Alberta coal. We should be burning our own coal instead of having to go on our knees to our friends to the south and asking them to keep us warm throughout the winter. We have wonderful coal resources, and we should use them. We have also the necessary transportation facilities to bring the coal to central Canada, and it is only a question of getting the right kind of men together to settle these questions, when the people of this country will benefit by the development and use of our own coal.

As I promised at the beginning I am not going to occupy much time, because I have been told that I am a good deal like the minister who was accused of not preaching a long enough sermon. A delegation waited on him and told him that the congregation were not satisfied with his preaching, that they wanted him to preach longer. His reply was that he was born in Pennsylvania, that his father was an oil man, and that he had always heard his father say that any man who could not strike oil in half an hour was either boring in the wrong hole or else there was something wrong with his auger. So I am going to take the advice of the oil man of Pennsylvania. I have given what I think is a common sense view of the subject that is before us, and I am strongly in favour of the amendment of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) to submit every question respecting the tariff to the tariff board before any changes whatever are made.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, the budget is looked on every year as a barometer of the business of the country, but it is doubtful if in any country the business concerns watch for the budget with such feverish anxiety as it is awaited by the business concerns of Canada. This is due to the fact that in no country in the world does business rest on the politician so much as it does in this country. I think it may be said that the budget has this year been produced under the most favourable circumstances in the last ten years at least. There is less unemployment and hardship in the cities; there is less hardship on the back lots of our settlements throughout the northwest as well. There is one underlying cause for all this: Western Canada has had a good crop. A greater amount of new wealth has been produced this year from the land than in almost any other year since confederation. Consequently, there is increased railway earnings; the purchase of manufactures has increased, and also there is less unemployment. But agriculture is seen to have been the one thing capable of growth, and that without placing a burden on any other industry. Prices for agricultural products have kept up to a good level, and this has been mostly due to the fact that things are returning to normal in the populated centres of Europe to which we look, and shall look for many years to come, for our chief market for agricultural products.

Now the fact that a good crop is a factor in producing better times, and that the market for our crop is in other countries, compels consideration of at least two problems in our national life. The first of these which I shall mention is the permanence of agriculture since it has proved to be the basic industry, and secondly, transportation. The one is dependent on the other. Both are dependent on the removal of every handicap which prevents the functioning of both in a natural way. Both are dependent on the cost of production and the cost of living being set by natural means, and not, as now, by those classes and individuals whom we by laws of privilege have placed outside the pale of competition altogether. Agriculture under such a system becomes destitute and too weak to carry the burden placed upon it, being the basic industry, of competing in world markets and at the same time of carrying the burden of other industries. Our prices have always been set in an arbitrary, despotic way by those whom we have placed outside of competition. Such arbitrary, despotic prices have always been set, not on the value of the article at all —that is not taken into account—but simply by what the manufacturing and distributing combines agree to charge for their services. The only bound beyond which they cannot go is the price of the article abroad with the whole amount of the duty added. The price in the country of origin, it must be remembered, is the retail price. If the consumer or even a co-operative company of consumers attempts to import anything direct from a manufacturer the dumping clause is at once applied. The dumping clause takes into account the rule of the manufacturing and distributing combines of the Dominion in their classification of the citizens as to what price each class must pay on its imported goods. In other words, the consumer must pay retail prices, and the retailer must not go beyond his wholesaler. In many lines, too, the wholesaler must buy from the jobber or dealer, who stands between him and the manufacturer. If any of these go beyond what they are allowed there is a levy made under the dumping clause which is always equal to the profits of all in between. Each of these concerns is jealous of its rights under these combine exactions, and each allows no deviation from this rule. A co-operative company, no matter what article they handle or in what quantity it is handled, are allowed no higher standing than that of a consumer. Canada was the first country in the world to enact what is known as a dumping clause. The first thought was to protect only our infant industries, which had then been infants for some twenty-two years at least and which, according to our protectionist friends in this House, are just as helpless to-day as when the dumping clause was put into force.

There is still another feature of unfairness in the tariff, even if we concede that Canada should have a protectionist policy. That feature is that no trade discounts are allowed except to the trade, that is the distributors or the manufacturers. In some lines of goods this gives a protection to the manufacturer and the distributing combine over the consumer of from 90 to 190 per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: On what articles?

Mr. EVANS: The hon. gentleman asks what articles; in particular on hollow ware, kitchen utensils and so on—I think it is rather worse on that class of goods than on any other. So between trade discounts and dumping acts we have a fiscal system which, for unfairness, injustice and hardship on the consuming class has never been surpassed in any country of the world.

While I favour the budget in a general way and will give it my support, I cannot help voicing one or two objections. The Progressive party has always stood for direct taxation; in fact the farmers' organizations, which existed for twenty years before the Progressive party was brought into being, stood for direct taxation. I would prefer to have seen some of these tariff incongruities abolished as a means of lowering taxation and the cost of living, instead of making a cut this year in the income tax. It may be news to some of our protectionist friends that the Progressive party did not ask for this cut in the income tax.

Mr. FOSTER: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? You say the Progressive party has been in favour of direct taxation. Would you be in favour of a tax on all incomes of $500 and up?

Mr. EVANS: No, I would not. I think it can be said with some justice that the increase in the income tax exemptions is, perhaps, justified. I think a man must be allowed a living, and $500 would not give him that.

Mr. FOSTER: Then what method of direct taxation do you favour in order to permit the country to derive a revenue?

Mr. EVANS: There are a good many methods.

Mr. FOSTER: Well, state some.

Mr. EVANS: I certainly would have an income tax as a permanent thing, also death duties, a tax on land values, unearned increment, and so on, to be collected from the man best able to pay rather than from the poorer consumers. In some cases the poor people are the greatest consumers, in fact the bigger family a man has the more commodities he must purchase. I think such a man should not be called upon to pay the same rate of taxation as a man with an income of $10,000. I would sharply graduate the income tax as the incomes increase. I have said that between trade discounts, dumping acts, and other features of our protectionist system we have a fiscal policy that has never been surpassed for the injustice and hardship inflicted on the workers.

But let us look for a moment at the moral side of all this absurd legislation, and let me try to define protection from that standpoint. Any law that is economically unsound certainly becomes morally wrong. In the first place we are supposed to be a commonwealth, but our laws are a series of divisional statutes discriminating between the rights of citizens and giving to one class the power to exploit the other. I say it is not the province of any government to discriminate between the rights of its citizens or to recognize the exactions of any combine whether manufacturing or distributing. We should all be equal before the law. In Canada we are not. I repeat that our laws are a series of divisional enactments, and in that there is an evil. It is bound to breed rebellion in the one class, and in the other class a disregard for the rights of others. I think if anything has been forcibly demonstrated by the Customs investigation that has been proceeding during the present session, it is the fact that there is a disregard for the rights of others which has increased with the passage of time during the last forty years. I say it breeds rebellion in the one class and in the other class a disregard for the rights of others.

What is the tariff? It is a frame-up between the politicians and those who have an interest in putting an import penalty on certain classes of goods. This must involve corruption and misrepresentation of facts to the electorate. It can have no other result.

Mr. FOSTER: Where is the corruption?

Mr. EVANS: I will deal with that in a minute. I said the tariff was a frame-up, the one class guaranteeing the election of the other which in turn trades off its influence and power to produce the legislation desired. If such was not the case, protection as we have it to-day would not last one year. It is inconceivable that men elected as representatives of the people would trade off the rights of their fellows without some consideration. That is where the corruption comes in.

Mr. CAHAN: That is where the Progressive party comes in, too.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George says "that is where the Progressive party comes in".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: I challenge the hon. gentleman to prove that. In case I may seem to be presumptuous in my statement let me quote an authority. This is taken from a statement by Sir Richard Cartwright.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EVANS: Some hon. gentlemen to my right do not like to hear the name of Sir Richard Cartwright; I do not wonder at it. But listen to his statement. He said in a letter addressed to the London Economist:

> Prior to the general elections of 1882, 1887 and 1891, Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues called the protected manufacturers together, and demanded and obtained from them such sums as they deemed necessary for debauching the electorate, pledging themselves in return not to alter the tariff to the detriment of the said contributors, which compact was faithfully carried out and impudently avowed.

Sir Charles Tupper, speaking in the House of Commons on March 22, 1892, called Cartwright's attention to this serious charge. "Every word of it is true," answered Cartwright, "and you know it." I say again that no man engages in evil transactions involving risk to his name and honour, without some personal benefit. The tariff was the first means of organizing in this country a band of overlords who ruled the Dominion, who still hold the reins of power, and who are the cause of creating a class-conscious war to-day between themselves and the other classes. The Progressive party is composed of farmers. Labour would have a share in the movement too, but for the fact that that part of the working population are directly dependent on these overlords for their living. A tariff to-day is a means in the hands of the manufacturers and other combines, of finance and of distributing concerns, of intimidating their employees. These employees are continually under the threat that if their ballots are not marked as the employers desire the works will at once close down,—in fact the threat has been made that if the budget is not favourable many works will close down. Intimidation is a regular appanage of the system. The workers are helpless in their plight to-day, and the lords of industry and finance gloat over the condition they have created. If anyone disputes this let me read a paragraph from the Bankers' Magazine of August 26, 1920. That journal, commenting on the situation, expresses it thus:

> "Capital must protect itself in every possible manner through combination and legislation. Debt must be collected, bonds and mortgages must be foreclosed as rapidly as possible. When, through a process of law, the common people have lost their homes they will be more tractable, and more easily governed through the influence of the strong arm of the government, applied by a central power of wealth under the control of leading financiers. A people without homes will not quarrel with their leaders."

Mr. CAHAN: Is that an extract from a publication of the Bankers' Association?

Mr. EVANS: An extract from the Bankers' Magazine.

Mr. CAHAN: Of Canada?

Mr. EVANS: Of the United States, August 26, 1920.

Mr. CAHAN: Whose writing is it?

Mr. EVANS: Let me read another paragraph.

Mr. CAHAN: Please tell us who wrote it, so that we can judge of it.

Mr. EVANS: It is taken from the Bankers' Magazine.

Mr. FOSTER: Who is responsible for the article in the magazine? It must have an author.

Mr. EVANS: It is the Bankers' Magazine. It is the voice of the paper.

Mr. FOSTER: Do I understand my hon. friend to say it is an editorial in the Bankers' Magazine.

Mr. EVANS: I take it to be such.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not believe it.

Mr. EVANS Another paragraph from the same article reads:

> History repeats itself in regular cycles. This truth is well known among our principal men now engaged in forming an imperialism of capital to govern the world. By thus dividing the voters we can get them to expend their energies in fighting over questions of no importance to us except as teachers (I would say traitors) of the common herd. Thus, by discreet action we can secure for ourselves what has been generally planned and successfully accomplished.

Now the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) will again, as in the past, classify my speech as the ravings of one who is foreign born, and who suffers from Bright's disease to such an extent that his mental capacity is impaired.

Mr. CAHAN: No, I am suggesting that his fairness is impaired by reading from this book.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to tell the House that the time is near at hand when the safest and best way for governments and all legislative bodies will be to work towards a real co-operative commonwealth, and the state will be compelled to perform the functions before very long which are now performed by private capitalists and their trained subordinates. I say to-day that the conditions in England are not without their lesson for us here. Before blaming the workers in England, or even our own miners in Nova Scotia, let us consider the position of these people who, like ourselves, are human beings. These lords of industry have been successful in getting together great hordes of employees who have no more interest in the community or in the commodity they produce than the slave of the southern states of many years ago had in the cotton he cultivated and picked. To have peace in industry you must give the employee some responsibility. You must make him a partner in the business, and not, as now, see that he gets as little as his employer can get him to work for, so that every interest in life is taken away from him except his daily wage. We have reached this stage by certain steps during the last forty or fifty years—first, compulsory education, second, the franchise, and, following these, organization; and things are not going to go on in the way they have been going. Laws of privilege kill patriotism. A man must have an interest in the state; place some responsibility on him and there will be peace. The state is composed of individuals, not entirely of natural resources. The material must be used for the state. The working man is just as much the state as any director of finance or industry. Canada is not contained in St. James street, Montreal, or King street, Toronto, or even in the stock exchanges from coast to coast.

An hon. MEMBER: Nor on the prairies.

Mr. EVANS: Our first duty in this country is to recognize the rights of the farmers and workers, and I will say this: despite all that the budget contains this year, favourably as I look upon it in a way, it takes no account of the legalized lines of cleavage established between the different classes. There is hardly anything in it to lower the cost of living for the worker, or to induce a more equitable system of industry.

The facts lately brought out in the discussion pro and con respecting the tariff on automobiles clearly illustrate the length the lords of industry in our own country can go in misrepresentation and criminal intimidation. Indeed more, they drag in the mire of their own corruption the sacrificed lives of our sons who fell in the war. It seems that nothing is too sacred to be sacrificed in their greed. They encouraged the delegation of returned men to come to Ottawa on a mistaken mission, so that these same lords can still take their toll from the sweated labour of the soldier settler and his wife and children.

I will give a few figures regarding the automobile industry. In 1924 we produced $88,000,000 worth of cars and we exported approximately $31,000,000 worth, leaving for home use made in Canada $57,000,000 worth. The duty on that amount, which the manufacturer has added to the factory price, was $19,950,000—

Mr. FOSTER: How does the hon. member figure that?

Mr. EVANS: —or in some cases over 35 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER: On the retail price?

Mr. EVANS: On the retail price. These are figures from the Statistical Department. The total number of employees on wages and salaries in 1924 was 9,277 and the wages paid to 7,872 wage earners amounted to $10,938,202. That makes an average for each wage earner of $1,389. Salaried employees to the number of 1,405 were paid $3,280,935 or an average of $2,335. In this industry the number of salaried employees in comparison with wage earners is altogether out of proportion to that in any other industry, and this feature is an evidence of the prosperity which it is enjoying and the tremendous profits it is making. I would call the attention of the House to the meagre wage paid the workers. This is something that is absolutely out of keeping with the argument advanced for protection, that we must maintain a high tariff if we want to preserve a high standard of living for our people. The fact is that these benefactors of the nation have pinched their wage earners on the one hand and the consumers on the other, in the matter of prices. Indeed, 35 per cent is not all the protection they have enjoyed. I find that during the year 1924 the Ford runabout sold at the Ford factory for $410 and the duty added was 41 per cent, not 35. On the touring car they charged 42 per cent, while the others were 33 and 34 per cent. I am looking forward to some wonderful revelations in connection with the automotive industry when the Tariff Advisory Board has access to their books. And surely they cannot refuse to lay their books on the table, seeing that they have become wards of the nation. Is there any man in this House bold enough to say that legislation which takes out of the pockets of those who buy cars nearly $6,000,000 more than was paid in wages in the whole industry is legislation for the general good of Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is for the wage earners.

Mr. EVANS: Yes. Our tariff has enhanced the total price of cars made and used in Canada to the extent of $5,900,000 more than wages paid in the whole industry for the year. Our fiscal policy, I say, is a senseless, unreasonable one; it is altogether absurd. Let us follow this matter through to its logical conclusion. Since the automobile manufacturers do not pay the wages of their own workmen, who does? Our automobile manufacturers were paid by way of tariff exactions nearly $6,000,000 more than they paid out in wages in the whole industry.

Mr. FOSTER: How much of that represents excise duty and how much taxes paid to the government?

Mr. EVANS: The sum I have given represents the retail price of the cars, enhanced as a result of the tariff.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the American retail price.

Mr. EVANS: An hon. gentleman says, the American retail price. I will not dispute that but—

Mr. CAHAN: In the figures the hon. member has quoted, is he not including the number of employees engaged in the assembling of parts and not the 20,000 men who are employed in the making of component parts which enter into the manufacture of cars?

Mr. EVANS: In answer to the hon. gentleman's question I may tell him that in order to be correct I got my figures from the Statistical Bureau.

Mr. CAHAN: They are true as far as they go, but they do not go far enough.

Mr. EVANS: That does not alter the case anyway; the price has been enhanced by that amount. And who foots the bill? It may be said that everyone who buys a car and pays the duty does so, but under a tariff system such as ours, and with agriculture as the basic industry of the country, this contention is obviously wrong. If the farmer buys a Ford car he pays the duty in the price charged by the dealer. If the dealer sells a car to the doctor, the doctor pays the duty in the price charged, but when the doctor makes a professional visit to the farmer or the farmer's wife his fee will include a part of that duty which he has paid on the car.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What about the lawyer?

Mr. EVANS: I am coming to that. Now, agriculture is the one basic industry in this country, and it does not matter who performs the duty for the agriculturist, the fee for that service always includes a part of the tariff duty on the car he drives, the clothes he wears or anything else he uses.

Mr. CAHAN: And all that is paid by the farmer?

Mr. EVANS: Wait a minute. If the farmer even buys a sack of sugar from the grocer he not only pays the duty on that sack of sugar, but he pays a part of the duty on the sugar which the grocer himself uses. If the farmer uses his Ford car to drive to his nearest city to consult a lawyer, the cost of that trip is enhanced not only by the duty he has paid on his own Ford car, but the lawyer's fee will include a part of the duty which the lawyer has paid on the limousine which he uses for his own pleasure. My statement would not be complete if I left it there. If the doctor employs the lawyer, the cost of the service to the doctor is borne by the doctor himself only until his next visit to the farmer. When he makes that visit he shoulders it upon the farmer. Again, if the doctor and the lawyer perform a service for the manufacturer of agricultural machinery, that individual passes it on to the agriculturist in the price charged for the implement needed on the farm.

Now, I want to tell hon. gentlemen that a fiscal policy such as ours can survive only so long as there is a basic industry to prey upon, and in this case agriculture is the basic industry which has to shoulder the whole thing.

Mr. CAHAN: In what respect is it more basic than fishing or mining?

Mr. EVANS: It may be said that fishing is a basic industry, but from the national standpoint it is inconsiderable compared to agriculture. The worst part of the whole thing is that this tariff policy is destroying the basic industry itself, and that is why agriculture is feeling the pinch to-day. If our protectionist friends here think they can everlastingly go on increasing protection, they must satisfy themselves that there is some basic industry sufficiently prosperous to carry the load.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that agriculture, or wheat-growing, because that is the department of agriculture which he is speaking about—

Mr. EVANS: No.

Mr. BIRD: That is a mistake.

Mr. CAHAN: He said wheat-growing.

Mr. EVANS: No.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, take all the departments of agriculture that you like, does the hon. gentleman mean to say that agriculture in this country sustains our nine million people in their various endeavours?

Mr. EVANS: It does, with the exception of some minor industries. And some more wealth is created out of raw material being manufactured into the finished article. But when our protectionist friends have a fiscal policy which takes out of the pockets of the people even more than the wages paid in that industry, I submit there is no benefit to the nation.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the man who builds a house out of timber of the value of $5,000 does not contribute exactly as much to the wealth of the country as the farmer who contributes $5,000 worth of wheat?

Mr. BIRD: He is not protected.

Mr. EVANS: That man will contribute to the extent that the house afterwards is used to house some one engaged in an industry that brings in new wealth, and only such.

Mr. CAHAN: Is there an industry in this or any other country that does not in its operation bring in new wealth?

Mr. EVANS: I say there is. Most of the industries established in Canada have been a detriment to the progress of the country rather than a benefit.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not my question. Is there an industry which does not produce wealth? I should like to hear of such an industry if it does exist.

An hon. MEMBER: The liquor industry.

Mr. CAHAN: From recent returns that industry apparently produces more wealth than the basic industry of agriculture.

Mr. EVANS: If there is an industry in this country standing on its own feet, then that industry must contribute to its own upkeep; but the very idea of protection precludes any profit-making or any increase in new wealth; and industry in Canada to-day is based on this fact, that it cannot live without protection. Our protectionist friends say that it cannot. Then the value of the finished article must be worth less than the elements entering into its manufacture and the labour that has been put on it. Neither the member for St. Lawrence-St. George nor anyone else can gainsay that fact. If it did not need protection, then it would be worth something more than when in the raw state.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. EVANS: Half a minute, please. I repeat, once our protectionist friends say that any article cannot live on its own merit and be sold in the markets of the world, they must admit that with the raw material and the labour entering into the manufacture of that article it is worth less when finished than it was before.

Mr. CAHAN: The other evening I called attention to the fact—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. CAHAN: I am putting my question. The other evening I called attention to the fact that in one year the iron and steel industry in this country produced in finished commodities $460,000,000. I ask if that $460,000,000 worth of products so produced did not contribute dollar for dollar to the wealth of the country to the extent that $460,000,000 worth of wheat would contribute.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. EVANS: But in the same statement my hon. friend said that the steel industry could not live on its own feet.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not say that.

Mr. EVANS: That it could not stand on its own feet? His one argument was the necessity of protection. Then the steel industry is not a paying concern in Canada, and the farmers, the men engaged in the basic industry of this country, would be better off buying their implements in the markets of the world where they have to sell their own products.

Mr. CAHAN: What proportion of the farm products of Canada find a market abroad?

Mr. EVANS: About 72 or 73 per cent at present.

Mr. CAHAN: Not a bit of it; nearer 20 per cent.

Mr. EVANS: We have this year to find a market for nearly 400,000,000 bushels of wheat when the crop is all marketed.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, but not outside the country.

Mr. EVANS: Yes, that is what I mean. But I want to pass on. The argument is made by several protectionists that the tariff they need on automobiles is just sufficient to preserve the Canadian market for Canadian cars, it being necessary to offset cheaper construction in the United States owing to closer proximity to raw materials, mass production, and so on. Well, let me present this problem to my protectionist friends. In 1924 we exported over $31,000,000 worth of cars. Surely the United States manufacturers must compete quite as keenly in the markets abroad as they do at home.

Mr. MURPHY: Not necessarily; Canadian cars have the advantage of a preference in that market.

Mr. EVANS: Not at all. In 1924 we exported cars to seventy countries, many of them outside the British Empire.

Mr. CAHAN: In which of them did they not have a preference over American cars?

Mr. EVANS: Not in any of them.

Mr. CAHAN: In nearly every one of them where the cars went.

Mr. EVANS: The fact that we exported $31,000,000 worth of cars is another admission that the tariff is not needed, or else it is used to ensure a profit on the export trade as well as on the home trade. Perhaps some Conservative or protectionist advocate will yet explain how far our automobile manufacturers are using the tariff or import penalty to soak the home consumer so that a profit is assured over the whole of their factory output, whether sold at home or abroad. That is one question I want answered. I say again, if the export trade in Canadian autos is carried on at the Canadian taxpayer's expense, it is time the public was relieved of this burden. When their books are examined by the Tariff Advisory Board I hope some light will be thrown on this subject. Perhaps, though, the next tariff subvention advocate will explain it.

I want to repeat that one thing is certain; either the automobile manufacturer does not need protection in the Canadian market or he is using the tariff to exploit the home consumer, so that he may cut prices or meet competition abroad. A good deal of surprise has been expressed because this matter was not allowed to stand over until the Tariff Advisory Board was brought into action. Every bit of information needed on this question surely must have been open to every Conservative member, and particularly to the leaders of that party. A very able tariff commission went through this country at great expense in 1920. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was at the head of the commission, and he is reckoned in this House to be an authority on economics and finance. The trouble with this commission was that they were all protectionists, and although five years have passed no report has been forthcoming, for the reason that its findings would be detrimental to those interests of which that party professes to be the docile servitor. That commission, in other words, was afraid to make known its own findings, for party reasons. If such is not the case I would advise gentlemen such as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) to apply those findings to the present controversy. I hope the findings of the present Tariff Advisory Board will be open to the public.

I want for a few moments to deal with another feature of the game of legalized robbery, and I hope to show the utter craftiness and gross folly of a fiscal system such as we are tolerating in Canada. I find that the Canadian Milling and Grain Journal of Montreal has been publishing with unconcealed rejoicing editorials from other papers, particularly the Alberta Farmer and the Calgary Weekly Herald. Before going further let me say that the Alberta Farmer is not a farm paper at all, and was never endorsed by the farmers. The Canadian Milling and Grain Journal is not even content with an export duty on wheat; the ultimate aim is to prohibit the exportation of wheat entirely, so that after putting themselves entirely outside of competition in the home market they are going to prevent the exportation of wheat to the United States in order that they may have a freer hand in the markets where our flour is sold. The journal comments on the situation in this way:

> Looking beyond the smoke screen of politics and prejudice the situation admits of one clear cut solution. The whole of the Canadian grain crops should eventually be manufactured into the finished article in Canada, and exported to foreign markets as flour. This is the ideal, and so far from being impossible of attainment through the accident of geography, it is an ideal quite capable of achievement by the powers that be at Ottawa. The whole of the profits of manufecture would thus be retained in Canada. . . . our slogan should be, "Canadian mills for Canada's wheat".

If this means anything it must mean that the whole of the exportable surplus of Canada's wheat is to be kept in Canada for the benefit of the Canadian millers, and that parliament must be employed as the tool of the milling trade in the execution of this most outrageous form of wholesale robbery.

Let us look into this milling business for a little while. The other day the Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics for March came to hand, and I believe the figures therein published are correct. This bulletin gives the price of flour at Liverpool and Winnipeg and other grain and milling centres of the world for the month of February.

Mr. CAHAN: Are those prices wholesale or retail?

Mr. EVANS: Wholesale. Liverpool, top patents, 280 pounds, $11.87; Winnipeg, for 196 pounds, which is our barrel, $9. This works out, for the 98-pound sack, as we buy it, at Winnipeg, $4.50; Liverpool, $4.11⅝. In other words the price is 38⅜ cents less in Liverpool than in Winnipeg. The average price of wheat for the same period, the month of February, was, Liverpool, No. 1 northern Manitoba, $1.90; Winnipeg, $1.54¾. Flour, for the 98-pound sack, was 38⅜ cents cheaper in Liverpool than in Winnipeg, while wheat was 35¼ cents per bushel cheaper in Winnipeg than in Liverpool.

Mr. FOSTER: There is the cost of transportation.

Mr. EVANS: My hon. friend has the cart before the horse. No. 1 northern wheat will make forty pounds of flour to the bushel, but in order to be sure let us allow 150 pounds of wheat for the 98-pound sack of flour. Accordingly the cost of wheat for a sack of flour would be, Winnipeg, $2.32; Liverpool, $2.85, or a difference of 53 cents in favour of Winnipeg. Fifty-three cents on wheat and 38⅜ cents on flour makes a steal of 91⅜ cents on every sack of flour sold to the Canadian public. Allowing nine million barrels of flour each year for the population of Canada this country has paid $16,470,000 too much for its flour. We quibble over a little thing in the budget; who is concentrating our earnings now? Under the protective tariff our millers have enjoyed the Canadian home market for years.

Mr. CAHAN: I would suggest that the hon. member give us the difference expended in wages in milling in Canada and the wages similarly paid for milling in England.

Mr. EVANS: That is a very important question. I cannot answer it explicitly. The only thing I will say is this: The policy which my hon. friend advocates has so driven up the cost of living and the cost of production in this country that all our export stuff is out of line with world prices. There is $16,470,000 of a steal on the nation's flour in one year.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it fair to say that that is a steal without taking into consideration the higher wages paid in the milling industry in this country as compared with England?

Mr. EVANS: I think I answered that question very fairly. Here again is the fact that the products of the basic industry of this country are sold in competition with the cheap labour of the whole world. Canada ought to be one of the cheapest countries in the world to produce anything in, but the protectionist policy which my hon. friend advocates has driven the cost of production entirely out of line with world prices. and that is the answer to his question. If wages are too high for the millers to compete, is it fair to charge that basic industry again enough on the price of flour to cover a profit for the whole of the export as well as the home trade?

Mr. CAHAN: In the first place, does not the hon. member's argument assume that agriculture is a basic industry in some special sense? Secondly, is not the result of the policy which he suggests to compel everyone in this country to enter into the production of agricultural products and nothing else?

Mr. EVANS: The hon. gentleman says we would all be wheat growers.

Mr. CAHAN: There would be no room for anyone else.

Mr. EVANS: It is true that if the basic industry to-day was relieved of this extra burden of protection, our vacant spaces from one end of the Dominion to the other would be filled up with prosperous farmers. What would that mean? It would mean that our industries, every one of them, would be running to provide for that basic industry.

Mr. CAHAN: Or foreign industries.

Mr. EVANS: Because it must be assumed that as agriculture is the basic industry, all others are subsidiary to it. All others should be subservient to that basic industry to have a true economic system, and if the products of those other industries cannot be sold in the world's markets on their merits and their cost of production, then I say this country is better without them. It is a false economic law in any country or in any business carried on by even a private company, where every part does not stand on its own feet.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it a false economic law to produce in this country at a higher cost any article of consumption which may be produced in a foreign country at a lower cost?

Mr. EVANS: If any industry is found on examination to be essential and necessary to the welfare of the country, then the country should carry on that industry at any expense.

Mr. CAHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: But this is what I was going to say: The onus is on the hon. gentleman to show that that industry is really necessary to the welfare of the country.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the issue.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George followed out his policy consistently, he would put a high protective duty on anthracite coal.

Mr. FOSTER: Put it on anyway.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): You have been urging that for years, but I defy you to do it.

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, well, these autocrats of the west!

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It might suit the west very well, but not my hon. friend.

Mr. EVANS: I would be one of the first to advocate a national policy in everything if it would pay.

Mr. CAHAN: Pay whom?

Mr. EVANS: The people.

Mr. CAHAN: What people, the farmers?

Mr. EVANS: All the workers. The hon. gentleman cannot get out of his head the idea that all Canada is contained in St. James street, Montreal, or in Toronto.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot get this into my head, that it is entirely contained in Saskatchewan.

Mr. EVANS: I was going on to say a little more about the milling industry. That is not the only steal indulged in by the milling industry of the Dominion. In western Canada they have elevators constructed at the points where the wheat of the highest milling value is produced. They have mills at the largest centres also on the prairies, where they buy all the wheat they can get. In this way they skim the cream of the crop here and ship for export what they do not like for themselves, thereby lowering the price, because our price is based on the lowest type of each grade that goes out for export. They also, some of them, have terminal elevators where they mix what they send for export to the lowest possible point for which they can get a certificate, and our price is based on that; and they buy the cream of the crop back home at the price of the grade which they have thus debased. But what is true of wheat is true also of every other protected industry. It is true even of the other natural products that the farmer himself raises. The relative price of oats to oatmeal and rolled oats is a little worse than wheat to flour, or hides to harness and boots and shoes. All these things are out of proportion. The very product of the farm is used to farm the farmer with, and this cannot forever go on. We give all our manufacturers a price-fixing power without any contract being entered into as to the relative cost of the raw material or the amount of labour they should be responsible for. Surely the time has come when this nation will reconsider the asinine stupidity of giving any class a blanket right to exploit the lives of its people in the future as in the past.

Canada is a country where manufacturing can be carried on quite as advantageously as in any other country. I say this despite all the howls of ruin indulged in by the manufacturers and their representatives in this House. We have been inundated during the last two or three years with literature regarding the dying state of the cotton and woollen industries. Let us see how some of them stand to-day. Let us see how some of them have fared since 1921 when this government began "monkeying" with the tariff and when they created an "instability", as I think it is called. Montreal cottons is the first I have on my list. The lowest quotation of its stock in 1921 was 90, and in 1925 it went up to 116. Penman's common stock in 1921 was quoted at 91, and in 1925 that stock was quoted at 185. Does this look like ruin? The lowest quotation for Penman's preferred in 1921 was 78, but in 1925 it was quoted as high as 103.

Mr. CAHAN: You are giving the lowest in one case and the highest in the other, are you not?

Mr. EVANS: In 1925 the highest was 103 and the lowest 99.

Mr. CAHAN: That comes nearer to it.

Mr. EVANS: In 1921 the lowest quotation for Penman's preferred was 78. Now let me take Dominion Textiles. The lowest quotation for the common stock in 1923 was 61½. In 1925 the highest quotation was 95⅛. Now Dominion Textiles preferred: In 1921, the lowest quotation was 89¼ and the highest 105. In 1925, the highest was 119, and the lowest 111.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. gentleman think that indicates increasing prosperity on the part of the industry?

Mr. EVANS: Well, I do not know why people would be buying the stock at an increased price unless such was the case.

Mr. CAHAN: I could furnish an explanation quickly.

Mr. EVANS: It seems to me that the more ruinous legislation this government brings in, the better these industries thrive. Such are some of the facts as they stand to-day. I would not have spoken on the budget this year but for the fact that the wail of the industrial lords filled the House.

Mr. H. G. Wells lately said he was out to salvage civilization before the disintegration became irreparable. Our ears are deafened these days by the clamour of press, platform and parliament to quit our individual self-seeking, forget our vocational and class interests, stifle our sectionalism and devote ourselves to—what? To the welfare of the members of an acquisitive group arrogantly regarding themselves as the state, who, having control of all those agencies for the moulding of public opinion, try to make us believe that in doing so we are patriots when in truth both agriculturists and workers are made their slaves.

Mr. PRICE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? The mileage from Regina to Fort William over the Canadian railways is 776 miles, and the freight rate twenty cents per hundred pounds. The mileage from Glasgow, Montana, to Duluth is 783 miles, or seven miles farther, and the rate is thirty-five cents per hundred pounds over the American roads. Would the hon. gentleman suggest a further reduction in the Canadian rates?

Mr. EVANS: If the hon. gentleman wants an answer to that question I will say that the stand taken by the Progressive party ever since its inception is public ownership and operation of all public utilities, and that these public utilities should be operated at cost and without profit. There is no other country in the world with a railway system with which you can compare the railway system of Canada. Canada has a long haul for heavy commodities such as wheat, twice as long as that in most of the other great exporting countries. So it is unfair to compare the railway rates in Canada with the railway rates in any other country.

On motion of Mr. Donnelly the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11.33 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED

First report of the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce.—Mr. Malcolm.

CHANGES IN THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) stated there would be no substantial changes in the budget. I do not think I am far astray in drawing the inference that there will be some changes, about which there may be difference of view as to whether they are substantial or not. I will ask the minister now to say whether he intends to make the nature of those changes known to the House before the close of the budget debate.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if there are such minor changes as it is necessary to submit to the House, surely that is always the procedure. But if the changes are only in minor details, such as are made in committee after listening to the arguments which I imagine my right hon. friend and others may make, I ask him: Is it necessary to present those before the budget is voted on? Let me tell my right hon. friend again that during this debate I have received many compliments from his followers and others as to the popularity of the budget; others have said it is an election budget. I can assure my right hon. friend that any changes which may be made will in no manner take away from its popularity.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now that the minister has delivered himself of his speech, will he revert to the question I put to him: Whatever the changes are, describe them as he may choose, will they be announced before the budget debate is closed or will they not?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps my right hon. friend will renew that question on Monday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then there will be no announcement on Monday of changes? If I may assume that, I am quite prepared—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will try to keep in as good order as hon. gentlemen opposite. I am prepared to adopt the suggestion of the minister if he will guarantee that there will be no changes announced on Monday.

Mr. CAHILL: Guarantee nothing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister not say?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The right hon. gentleman is entitled to put that question when the orders of the day are called. I would ask the House to maintain decorum.

Mr. CANNON: One question, not six.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister asked me to wait until Monday to renew my question. I ask him in return, if when I do that he will say that he will not announce changes on Monday. If he is going to announce changes on Monday, I would look rather foolish putting my question again touching such changes.

Mr. ROBB: I will make no announcement of any changes on Monday until I have listened to my right hon. friend. At least I will go that far with him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend not answer me frankly? I asked him if he proposed to make any changes whether he would announce them before the budget debate is closed. This question he asked me to defer until Monday. Now I ask him again: Will he defer the announcement of those changes past Monday? Surely it is a fair question.

Mr. ROBB: What is the point?

Mr. MEIGHEN: My point is this, Mr. Speaker: I want to know in advance whether or not the minister is going to make any changes. I feel that the party which I represent has a right to know, and I will not know in advance if the minister makes changes on Monday with no previous intimation. I am asking him to make that intimation now; he refuses and asks me to wait until Monday. In order that I may be advised now, I again ask him to undertake that there will be no changes announced on Monday, otherwise I will not have any notice in advance.

Mr. ROBB: On the routine proceedings?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or on the orders of the day, at the opening of the budget debate, or at any time on Monday.

Mr. ROBB: I fear I must be dense, but I do not understand my right hon. friend. If he proposes to ask me again on Monday whether I am prepared to go further than I have gone to-day, he surely would not expect me to be able to answer to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister does not understand my point. The question I put to-day was whether the minister intended to alter the budget proposals before the close of the debate. He asks me to wait for an answer until Monday. I am asking him—because I think we have a right to know in advance—whether or not any changes are proposed. Consequently he must defer any changes until after Monday, or we will not know in advance. I am prepared to wait and renew my question on Monday, if he will tell me the changes will not be made then. If he can tell me on Monday that there will be changes made at a later time I will be satisfied.

Mr. ROBB: I will not make any change until I have given my right hon. friend a fair intimation of such proposed change.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One day's notice?

Mr. ROBB: I will not say that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister may give me a half minute's notice, on this understanding, and I think I am entitled to more than that. I am only asking for one day's notice.

Mr. ROBB: When does my hon. friend intend to speak?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will know better when I know what the budget is. I would like to speak on the budget as it is to be, and that is why I am asking this question, which I think is only fair.

Mr. ROBB: I can make my right hon. friend clear on that. In general what has my hon. friend in mind? Is it the tariff or the income tax?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mostly the tariff, but I want the minister's answer to cover everything.

Mr. ROBB: I told my hon. friend yesterday that there would be no substantial changes in the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not doing this to delay the House, Mr. Speaker, but it is a matter of extreme importance. Leading a party, as I do, I think I should not be put off with a mere evasion. The question is most simple and clear, and I want the Minister of Finance to tell me to-day whether there are to be any changes made before the debate closes or, if I must wait until Monday to renew my question, will he then undertake that the proposed changes will not be announced until Tuesday at least?

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I would like a little information in regard to this matter. I suppose all hon. members want to know if there is to be any change in the budget. I do not exactly understand this situation. The budget has been brought down; why is it necessary to interrogate the Minister of Finance every day as to whether or not there will be any changes? I want to know the reason; I want to know why there is special privilege. The House is entitled to all the information the right hon. leader of the opposition may receive.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am trying to get that information for the hon. member, if he will permit me. Perhaps the government would prefer that I ask the hon. member himself. Now I will repeat my question. The minister will not give me any notice whatever, on his answers so far; I ask him again if he will undertake that there will be no changes announced in the budget until we are given notice. I did not understand my hon. friend's answer, if he gave one.

Mr. ROBB: My recollection is that I answered that question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman repeat it? It was an evasion; it did not answer the question at all. Does he undertake that there will be no changes until we get into committee?

Mr. ROBB: I think I made it clear to my right hon. friend that we would follow parliamentary procedure. I told him that if changes were made before parliament generally, before we go into committee, they would be considered, but that on the general principle this budget will go through as it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the minister's opinion are there changes proposed which should be made before we go into committee?

Mr. ROBB: No, not at this moment.

DUMPING DUTY—AUSTRALIAN BUTTER AND FRUIT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (Norfolk-Elgin): I would like to inquire of the government with respect to certain statements appearing in the press to the effect that, owing to the heavy importation of Australian butter and fruit, and the fact that such imported products were being sold greatly below the market price, the government has imposed and started to collect a dumping duty of 6 cents per pound on butter, and also on certain fruits.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I observe, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) is not in his seat at the moment. I will direct his attention to the question asked by my hon. friend, and ask the minister to give an answer early next week.

EQUALIZATION OF FREIGHT RATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Yesterday I asked the Prime Minister if any application or representation had been received by the government from Mr. John Oliver, Premier of British Columbia, relating to the reduction or equalization of freight rates by this parliament. The right hon. gentleman then said that he would answer this question to-morrow, which would be to-day. I wonder if he would be good enough to give me the answer now.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think if my hon. friend would read a little further he would see that I said if he would put his question on the order paper I would try to give him an immediate answer. I will give him an answer when his question is placed on the order paper, but not until then, because I am not in a position to make a reply until I have studied the question.

Mr. LADNER: That reply related to the questions concerning the Peace River block and the Dominion railway belt. This is a different matter; there is widespread public comment in this connection in British Columbia, and I would like to know whether or not an application has been received by the government or by the Minister of Railways relative to the question of freight rates, and their reduction by parliament. Surely the Prime Minister can say if such an application has been received.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to withhold the information from my hon. friend. In any conversation I have had with Mr. Oliver since he has been in Ottawa, he has not mentioned the subject of freight rates. He may have spoken to some of my colleagues on the question, so I would not like to make an answer until all the members of the government have had an opportunity of saying whether or not they have been communicated with. In this connection I might say, Mr. Speaker, that many questions asked on the orders of the day should properly be placed on the order paper.

Mr. LADNER: But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. LADNER: I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Railways, to whom I addressed the same question yesterday. The Prime Minister then spoke on his behalf, but I would like to ask the Minister of Railways if he has the information and if so, to give it to the House.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): What is the question?

Mr. LADNER: The question is: Has any application been made or have any representations been received by the government or the Minister of Railways, or has there been any conversation relating to the question of reduction or equalization of freight rates by this parliament, on the application by Mr. John Oliver, Premier of British Columbia?

An hon. MEMBER: How long ago?

Mr. LADNER: Since his arrival here during the present session.

Mr. DUNNING: I can make exactly the same answer as did the Prime Minister. I have no recollection of any such matter being dealt with in conversation with Mr. Oliver. As to representations, I would like the question put on the order paper, and I can then ascertain if there are any written representations in the department relating to the matter.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, May 6, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. THOMAS DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks in favour of the present budget, I wish first of all to compliment the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) for his businesslike, concise and clear-cut statement of his budget proposals. I wish also to compliment him for the businesslike manner in which he presented the budget. We have been in session in this House now for something like four months, and though I am only young in the political sphere, having come into touch with politics only in the last six months, I think I am safe in saying that his is the only businesslike address we have heard in this House during the last four months; I mean by that, the businesslike statement we would expect to hear delivered to the shareholders of a large joint stock company or big corporation. I think the hon. Minister of Finance is to be complimented on that.

This budget has been called by different names. Some people have called it the people's budget; some have called it an economical budget; some have called it the poor man's budget; but I believe that it will be known in history as the Robb budget, as a compliment to the Minister of Finance who brought it down.

I wish also to compliment the Liberal party in having remained true to their principle of legislating for the majority of the people of Canada. The Liberal party has always recognized that farming is the one basic industry of this country, and from time to time it has passed legislation favouring that industry, believing always that when the farming industry prospers the whole country prospers. That is the reason, Mr. Speaker, why the country at the present time is prospering, and always has prospered under Liberal administration. It has been the good fortune of the Liberal party to present many satisfactory budgets to this parliament but I think I am safe in saying that this budget outstrips them all. It is, I believe, the best budget we have ever had before parliament in the last twenty-five years, and it is so considered by the ordinary man on the street. I believe the Liberal party should be congratulated because of the stand it has taken with regard to legislation at the present time. Conditions are better in this country, and the improvement is continuing; there is no doubt about that. For proof, all we need to do is to look at the press of the country, and read the editorials and the financial reports, which are all loud in their praise of the better conditions prevailing throughout Canada. In confirmation of that let me read a short extract from the annual report of the Canadian National Railway system for this year, where on page 8 I find this:

> The work of the industrial department has been carried on to the greatest extent possible, with the result that on the Central, Atlantic and Grand Trunk Western regions there were located on or near our lines over 250 plants representing investments to the extent of many millions of dollars, in addition to which very substantial extensions were made to plants already located on our lines.
> The industrial development taking place in the Chicoutimi and lake St. John district is remarkable. An enormous amount of electrical power is being developed for use by existing and new manufacturing concerns. The Duke-Price Company is expected to develop at Isle Maligne and Chute à Caron over 1,250,000 h.p. The works in contemplation by the Aluminum Company involve the building of a new town—Arvida—which it is expected will have a population of 25,000 people within a comparatively short time. The very large expenditures involved in this development and the expected permanent employment of a large body of workers should have a present and far-reaching future effect in the province of Quebec in regard to general business and more particularly the pulp and paper and mining industries.

Let me read another extract from the Monetary Times of April 23, 1926. This issue was sent to me that I might read an article condemning the income tax, but on looking it over, on page 5, I find this:

> The budget as a whole has, however, been favourably received and has been regarded as a bet on the part of the government that the present improvement of business is likely to continue or grow better. Business indications generally, it has been pretty widely conceded, suggest that the government has a good chance of winning its bet. Of course, the Conservatives give the credit for the improvement to Providence, and not to the cabinet; but they appear to have given up their thesis, heard too frequently in recent sessions, that hard times were knocking at the door, and that the country was in danger of business collapse. At all events, the change in the Conservative line of criticism is welcome, and is not likely to do that great party any harm. Preaching "blue ruin" has never been good politics in Canada, whether it was done by Conservatives or by Liberals.

These extracts, Mr. Speaker, show that times in this country are getting better, and the government, realizing that times are getting better, have been able to reduce taxation. Many speakers on the other side of the House have said that this is a good thing, that we are doing the right thing now, but that we should have reduced taxation a long time ago. Let me try and answer the man who says that by saying this: A man is not the ruler of his own destiny; he is influenced a great deal by his surroundings by heredity, by the influence of his predecessors. There is an old saw which says that if you want to train a boy right you must begin by training his grandmother. That is just the thing this government has had to contend with, and the grandmother it has had to contend with is the old women who controlled the finances of this country before 1921. The difficulties from which this country has been suffering for some time past have not been due to anything that has been done by the Liberal government; they are due to what was done by the people who ruled this country before 1921, and the conditions from which we have been suffering have been due not only to the things our predecessors did, but to the things they should have done but did not do, and which have left us in the condition we are in at the present time. It was they who made it impossible for us to reduce taxation previously.

It has been argued that the taxes should be still further reduced; I say yes. It has been said that the taxation should have been reduced sooner; I say yes to that also, but the failure to bring these good things to pass cannot be laid at the door of this government; it must be laid at the door of our predecessors who governed this country before 1921. In order to prove this, let me refer to our taxation before 1921.

Now, I want to compare our revenue from taxation with that of the United States for the period from 1914 to 1924 inclusive. Hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of comparing the conditions in Canada with the conditions in the United States, and I want to make a comparison as regards the revenue from taxation. The figures for Canada are taken from the Canada Year Book, page 743. The figures for the United States are taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have added the postal rates, which are not included in their figures, in order to have a fair basis of comparison with the Canadian figures. The figures shown by the comparison are as follows:

Total Per Capita Revenue From Taxation

	Canada	United States
1914	$21 21	$10 32
1915	16 93	9 78
1916	21 42	10 67
1917	28 45	13 94
1918	31 31	43 54
1919	36 91	48 10
1920	40 52	67 10
1921	49 43	56 35
1922	42 72	47 16
1923	43 45	48 26
1924	43 01	40 90

The United States entered the war in April, 1917, and immediately they shot up their taxation. Their fiscal year ends in June while our fiscal year ends in March. The per capita taxation in the United States for the year 1917 was $13.94. It had increased by $3.62 from 1914. This was only an amount sufficient to account for the decreasing purchasing power of the dollar, but in 1918, the first year after they had entered the war, the per capita revenue for taxation in the United States was $43.54. They adopted the plan of paying for the war as it went on; a sort of "pay as you enter" plan if you like, I do not want to be too severe but these things are a matter of national history, the facts are there. The Americans tried to pay for the cost of the war as the war went on, and while they had inflated prices. We did not adopt that plan. We waited until prices began to come down, and then we began to put on the necessary taxation to pay for the war. That was the trouble. So, in 1921 when this government came into power the war had not been paid for and yet the obligation must be met. This government started to meet it. Our revenue in 1914 was $21.21 per capita, and in 1916 it was $21.42. For the year ending March 31, 1918, it stood at $31.31, and when we take into account the depreciated purchasing power of the dollar, that was not very much—we had hardly advanced our revenue at all. In 1920 the American per capita revenue was $26.58 per capita more than ours was. Or, to put it in another way, the Americans collected a per capita revenue in the two years 1920 and 1921 of $123.45. Our per capita revenue for 1919, 1920 and 1921 was only $126.86. That is to say the Americans were collecting almost as much per capita revenue in two years as we were collecting in three. As I say, when the Americans entered the war they shot up their taxation. Now, if we take the years from 1918—the year following the entry of the Americans into the war—to 1923 and total up the amount of taxes the Americans collected during that period, and also total the amount of taxes the Canadian government collected for the same period, we find that the Americans collected per capita $66.17 more than we collected. Now take it on the basis of population. Our population in Canada in the year 1921 was 8,788,000. If we had paid the same rate as the Americans we would have had $581,691,960 more revenue and with the interest and compound interest added the amount would have been brought to something like $700,000,000. Deducting this sum from our present national debt, which is in the neighbourhood of $2,400,000,000, our national debt at the present time would have been only $1,750,000,000. With our national debt reduced to that figure the Finance Minister could have announced a reduction in taxation of another thirty or thirty-five million dollars. He could have done that easily, or have reduced the national debt by an equivalent amount. He could have taken his choice and done as he pleased.

These are not pleasant things to contemplate, but they must be faced. We did not follow the example of the Americans and pay for the war as it went along. Neither did we adopt the system which the English followed. We adopted rather the French system. That is to say we decided to wait until the war was over and then endeavour to pay for it. There are only one or two things which prevent Canada from being in the same condition that France is in to-day. Our country did not suffer from the war in the same way that France did. Furthermore, our national resiliency, our great natural resources, and the character of the people themselves, saved this country and put it back into a sound financial condition.

Now let us look again at what the United States has done. As I say, hon. gentlemen opposite are always comparing Canada with United States, therefore let us make another comparison. The United States faced the question of tax reduction and they dealt with it by means of heavy taxes. They collected more from their people than we did during the war to lighten the burden of taxation in the future and to meet interest charges. Had we adopted the same system in this country we could have achieved the same results. Everybody knows that during the war time many large corporations received enormous profits. I have just been looking at the report of one large industrial corporation and I find whereas their normal earnings were something like $600,000 or $700,000, that during the years 1917, 1918 and 1919—while the war was on or immediately following it—their income rose to something in the neighbourhood of $1,250,000. Moreover, personal incomes were high during the war. But though personal incomes were high at that time I want hon. members to understand we had no income tax in this country. We had no income tax in Canada until the year 1917 and we began to face it in 1918. We collected $78,000,000 in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, when deflation set in. On the other hand the Americans, our neighbours to the south, collected during the year 1917, $1,110,000,000 income tax. We are told that we ought to reduce our income tax and that we ought to have reduced it a year ago because the Americans reduced theirs, but we did not impose an income tax until four years after they did, so that we cannot be expected to reduce our income tax as quickly as they. There is another thing that should not be forgotten in regard to the American system. In that country they have what they call a federal inheritance tax. We have an inheritance tax in certain provinces of Canada, but we have not a federal inheritance tax, and a good deal of money is collected by the United States government from their federal inheritance tax. So that I think we have very little to complain of in this country on account of the condition of affairs. The situation briefly is this: first, because we failed to pay for a large share of the war while it was going on, due I say to the failure of hon. members opposite to face the situation as it then existed and to pay for the war as it was going on, this government has to deal with the condition that confronts it now, and what, therefore, has this government done? It has faced the problem of paying for the war. It has collected taxes, not as hon. gentlemen opposite say, to cover the extravagances of the administration, but to provide for the necessities of government. This had to be done, and the condition was caused by the war. We had to increase taxation to take care of the peak load and I think we should be thankful that we are able now to reduce taxation. We have got over the peak. The situation is better, but still there is a great problem to be faced. I have confidence in the ability of the government and of the Minister of Finance to face it and I have sufficient confidence in this House and the people of this country to realize that they will support the minister in bringing these happy events to pass. I refer to the further reduction of our national debt. I would like to see the national debt reduced still further, and such taxation continued as is necessary to put the country on a sound basis.

I have further evidence to prove that when hon. members opposite ruled the country prior to 1921 they did not try to pay for the war. I wish to place a few figures on the record. In the year 1919 our national debt stood at $1,574,531,035 and in 1922—that is two years—it stood at $2,422,135,802. These figures are taken from the Canada Year Book, page 752, and relate to the period when hon. gentlemen opposite were ruling the country. Of course hon. members will say it was due to the war. True it was on account of the war, but the Americans closed the war at the same time we did. They got through when we did, but did they increase their national debt during those two years? Let us see what they did between 1919 and 1922. I have the figures here. In 1919 the United States national debt stood at $24,479,302,376, but in 1922 it stood at $22,996,416,115; so that they reduced it by about $2,000,000,000. They reduced their debt, not very much, but they reduced it, while our debt was increasing. The year 1922 marked two things in Canadian history. For one thing, it marked the passing of my hon. friends to the left of the Speaker, and it marked another thing namely, the time when this country began to meet its obligations and to cut down its national debt. Look at the figures of the national debt since this government took office. I have taken the figures from the Canada Year Book. In 1924 our national debt stood at $2,417,783,275. In 1925 it was $2,417,437,685 not much of a reduction, but in the year 1926 it was $2,395,084,685, so that a reduction has been made. You will see that under Liberal administration, hampered as the government has been by their predecessors in office, hampered by the legislation and by the load placed upon them, they have started to reduce our national debt. It has not been reduced very much, but still there is a little reduction. They ran the country in a businesslike way, they reduced our national debt, and I would like to see taxation kept up for some years, so as to be able to reduce still further our national debt. In the year 1925 the national debt of the United States stood at $20,211,000,000. These figures are obtained from the Department of the Secretary of the Treasury. They take no account of what is owing to the United States from foreign countries. Debts of this character due the United States amount to about $10,000,000,000 and most of them have been funded. They may not be good debts.

While some of them may be no good, some of them are all right, and therefore we must conclude, taking these figures, that the national debt of the United States at the present time is a little over $10,000,000,000. Their position therefore is much better than ours. Their debt is decreasing rapidly, while ours is decreasing slowly. All hon. members should assist the Minister of Finance in every possible way to guard the treasury thus making possible the reduction of taxation, and of the national obligation, hastening the time when our country will be in a better and a sounder financial position. Some hon. gentlemen opposite are always alarmed lest their income tax should exceed the American income tax and yet they are the people who are afraid that our tariff is not going to be as high as the American tariff. I feel that we, as Canadians, should look after our own business and should not worry about what they are doing across the line. It is all right to study their affairs and methods, and to see if we can gather any lessons from them, but that is the only way in which we should be bothered with their affairs. Let us look after our own affairs.

This, as I have briefly outlined it, has been the financial position of the country since this government came into power in 1921. We were carrying a large burden of taxation owing to the war on which very little taxes had been paid. Our revenue was not meeting our expenditures. If a private individual were to conduct a business or any concern where his revenue was not meeting the expenditures, what would he begin to do? Why, as a normal business man he would begin immediately to cut down expenses, look for the leakages and try to make both ends meet. Now I wish to show that that is what this government did when it came into power in 1921. It began to cut down expenditure and to try to make both ends meet. The legislation which this government has put through has been good and economical. Although the expenditures are large, the revenue for the year 1924-25 being $346,834,479 and the expenditure just a few dollars less, expenditures which were due to the war and the war alone amounted to $167,281,587. If we deduct expenditures due to the war we find that the ordinary running expenditure of the country amounted to only $179,000,000 for 1924-25. If we go back to 1914, we shall find that the ordinary disbursements of the country amounted to $186,000,000 so that our expenditures for 1924-25 really show a decrease over those of 1914. What business has done any better than that?

It is difficult to find any business concern that we can compare this country with; the only company we can compare it with is the Canadian Pacific. The ordinary operating expenses of the Canadian Pacific for the year 1914 amounted to $87,000,000, but for the year 1925 they amounted to $143,000,000. Their expenses have gone up while ours have gone down. I am not asserting that this comparison is complete in every respect; certain things must be taken into account; but one thing we must concede is that this government has not been lavish in the use of its money; it has been an economical government.

The second thing this government deserves credit for is the way in which it has handled the Canadian National Railways. When this government came into power the Canadian National Railways were yearly showing a great deficit. This government consolidated the railways under its control into a national system under one management, that of Sir Henry Thornton, and it took the railway entirely out of politics. The wisdom of that course of action has been evident in the improved condition of the Canadian National Railways ever since.

During the election there was a great deal of criticism of Sir Henry Thornton; we were told that he had added an enormous burden to our fixed charges. It is true that heavy charges were added to the road in connection with fixing up our right-of-way and improving our rolling stock; but I believe that expenditure has been justified by the improved financial condition of the road. An operating deficit has been turned into an operating surplus. What has been the financial condition of the road from the time it was taken over? If we look at Hansard, page 885 for the year 1922, we shall find that the Canadian National with the Grand Trunk had a deficit of $16,000,000 for the year 1921. On the other hand the report that we have received for the year 1925 for the Canadian National Railways shows net earnings amounting to $32,264,414.79, or an improvement of more than $48,000,000 in five years. Surely that is a good record and a step in the right direction.

Let us also compare the ratio of income to operating costs or, in other words, let us see what is costs to make $100, because that is the only way in which one can tell how a business is progressing. In the year 1924, for every $100 the Canadian National Railways made, it cost $92.68, and for the year 1925 it cost only $86.83 so that conditions are improving. This ratio compares very favourably with those of many other leading railways of the United States when all the facts are taken into account, because we must remember that the Canadian National railway system is only a union of several lines. It is not one large railway built as a unit; it is several railways brought into union. I have not the figures available for all the different leading railways on this continent, but I know the ratio is more than 80 per cent. The ratio of the Canadian National Railways is very slightly over that of the Great Northern, Northern Pacific and the Pennsylvania railway system, and two years ago their ratio was just about the same as the Canadian National is now. The average ratio of ten of the leading railways of the United States is in excess of 84 per cent. I claim that part of this success is due to this government, and the government and the management of the Canadian National Railways under Sir Henry Thornton deserves the highest tribute for so greatly improving the financial condition of the road.

There are several other things for which this country owes this government a debt of gratitude. The government has reduced the tariff somewhat on the implements of production and several other things. Although the reduction is not as much as I would like, when other countries are going tariff mad, putting up their tariffs, it is encouraging to see our country following a sane and safe method by reducing the tariff on the implements of production. This government proposes to go a step further; it proposes to reduce the tariff on automobiles and light trucks. Hon. gentlemen opposite have moved an amendment in connection with this cut in the tariff on automobiles. I hardly like to call it an amendment; it does not suggest any real amendment to the budget at all. It does not come out clearly protesting against the reduction in the tariff on automobiles; all it says is that what the government is doing now it might do at a later date.

There is a good reason why hon. gentlemen opposite have taken this position. Last year some hon. gentlemen voted for a reduction in the tariff on automobiles. Where are they now? Why do they not rise in their place and speak in favour of the reduction this year? I think I know the reason. They feel that they can shelter behind this amendment; they feel that they can go back to their constituents and tell them: Oh, I was not voting against the reduction; I was voting only for a postponement of the reduction. Personally, all I would like to say about that is that I do not think the tariff on automobiles has been sufficiently reduced; I would like to see a still greater reduction.

Why should we have a tariff of 35 per cent on automobiles and light trucks which are just as essential to farmers and other workers as any other implement of production; when the heavier implements of production receive a protection of only 8 to 10 per cent and the lighter ones only as high as 20 per cent, or an average protection of only 12 per cent? Why should the automobile industry be protected to the extent of 35 per cent? It is altogether out of reason. Twenty per cent is even too much; it should be cut down to fifteen—and there is where we would like to see it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Cut it out altogether.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, cut it out altogether. The western people look on the tariff as a sort of tax, and they believe that if the whole Dominion was the same as western Canada, a farming community, Canadians would be better off without any tariff at all. But the people in the east say they need a tariff. To that the western people reply: Well, this tariff is simply a tax on us, but if you need a tariff in order to keep the Dominion together, we are willing to put up with a little of it, but we do not want to have it any higher than we can possibly help; for heaven's sake make it as low as possible because it is a tax on us.

Mr. MULLINS: What part of the west is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. DONNELLY: The whole of the west I have been over just as much of it as the hon. member has.

Mr. MULLINS: Saskatchewan or Manitoba?

Mr. DONNELLY: Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta, British Columbia.

Mr. MULLINS: Not Manitoba.

Mr. DONNELLY: I have been through it all. The western people do not believe that any tariff on agricultural products can help them at all. One hon. member of the opposition has tried to show us during this debate that we could enhance the price of wheat by putting a duty on it, while another hon. member from the same quarter of the House expressed the contrary view. Evidently our friends of the opposition are not agreed among themselves as to what a tariff will do. I find at page 2756 of Hansard that the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) said:

> This country would not import wheat anyway. I do not want to beg the question at all, and I will say that in my opinion we cannot enhance the price of wheat by a protective duty.

In other words, he says a duty on wheat will not help us. Now let me give the House what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) said in relation to this subject. At page 2722 of Hansard I find the following:

> I have gone through every branch of the farming industry in the United States from wheat to cotton, and in every case the tariff raised the price of the farm products of the United States.

Mr. McGIBBON: Quite true, too.

Mr. DONNELLY: We will just see. At page 2725 of Hansard he said:

> —and I want them to take notice because under a condition of free trade the price of wheat normally would be greater in Winnipeg than it would be in Minneapolis.

Mr. McGIBBON: I said it would be greater.

Mr. DONNELLY: Well, this is from Hansard. I thought I was quoting it correctly, but I may have made a mistake. Then the hon. member proceeded to compare the prices of wheat in Minneapolis and Winnipeg respectively for the crop year 1920-21, and from those prices he argued that the tariff imposed by the United States caused the price of wheat there to be greater than in Canada. Now, these are the facts of the case. The only time to make a true comparison is when we had free trade in this commodity between Canada and the United States, which was in the years I am now going to give the figures for. These figures in each case are for the crop year ending August 31, and show the average price:

Crop Year	Winnipeg	Minneapolis
1913-14	89.4	90.9
A little higher.
1914-15	132.3	133.4
A little higher there again.
1915-16	113.3	117.4
Quite a bit higher in Minneapolis that year.
1916-17	205.6	218.4

In every one of those years the average price under free trade was higher in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg. In fact western farmers have often wondered why it was so. Practically it has always been so.

Mr. McGIBBON: Wrong.

Mr. DONNELLY: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I have the figures here for the different years, and can give them if he so desires. How far back does he want them?

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not want them at all; I have them already.

Mr. DONNELLY: All right. Now let us turn to the other side of the question. I think these figures show conclusively that when we had free trade the price was always higher in Minneapolis. But instead of quoting the crop year 1920-21 to show what the duty would do with regard to the prices of wheat in Minneapolis and Winnipeg respectively, let us take the crop year 1924-25, when the United States government raised the duty on wheat to 42 cents a bushel—higher than it ever had been before. Let us see how the prices compared under those conditions. Here are the comparative prices in the two countries for the different months:

Month	Winnipeg	Minneapolis
August	143.5	141.3
Higher in Winnipeg, although the tariff duty on the American side was 42 cents a bushel.
September	142.2	138.6
It does not look as if the tariff was sending up the price in Minneapolis.
October	159.6	154.0
November	164.0	159.4
December	172.7	177.0
A little higher in Minneapolis.
January	196.2	198.7
February	196.4	195.4
March	176.3	178.7
April	155.9	160.1
May	182.4	173.2
June	171.3	168.6
July	162.0	165.2

Why, the price in Winnipeg has been higher most of the time than in Minneapolis. The average price was 168.5 in Winnipeg as against 167.5 in Minneapolis—and they had a duty against us at that time of 42 cents. And yet the hon. member tells us that if we put a tariff duty on our wheat it would shoot the price upwards.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can the hon. member give us the relative prices in Liverpool during that time?

Mr. DONNELLY: I have not those figures at the moment.

Mr. McGIBBON: He should have.

Mr. DONNELLY: My hon. friend made the comparison between Winnipeg and Minneapolis.

Mr. McGIBBON: I submit that my hon. friend's argument is fallacious unless he gives those figures.

Mr. DONNELLY: I shall be happy to furnish them to my hon. friend if he will come to my room.

Mr. McGIBBON: If the hon. gentleman quoted those figures he would find his argument would not hold.

Mr. DONNELLY: I think I have shown, Mr. Speaker, from these figures that the duty has nothing whatever to do with the price of wheat when we have an exportable surplus. It is simply a case of the working of the law of supply and demand, that is all. Wheat is a world commodity, and the price is governed by the world's market. The same is true of any article which meets world competition and of which we have an exportable surplus; we cannot enhance its price by placing a tariff duty on it.

I wish to take issue with the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) on a couple of other points. He tells us that he was out in the west for some time and he found Minneapolis and St. Paul were thriving and people were flocking into the surrounding country. He contrasted this condition of affairs with our western country, which was not increasing in population, and he expressed the view that if we would only put on a protective tariff our country would go ahead and our cities would be built up. In reply to those statements I would like to read an article taken from the Morning Chronicle of Halifax, under date of May 5:

Speaking in the House on April 23, 1926 (See unrevised Hansard, page 2863—column 2), Mr. G. B. Nicholson used these words:

"Why is it that while the two cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul have been adding a million to their population and furnishing a market for the people in the northern and northwestern states, the cities of Winnipeg, Brandon, Moose Jaw, Regina, Saskatoon, Prince Albert, Edmonton and Calgary have added less than 100,000"

He then goes on to attribute this marvellous increase in the United States to the policy of protection.

The last census of Canada was in 1921. The American census was taken in 1920. The American census figures give the population of these two cities as follows:—

	1910	1920	Increase
Minneapolis..	301,408	380,528	79,174
St. Paul..	214,744	234,698	19,954
Total..	516,152	615,280	99,128

These are the facts, verify them if you care to do so. The Twin Cities could not have increased their population because their combined population is only 615,280. The increase during the census period was less than 100,000.

Now for the next step. St. Paul and Minneapolis are much older cities than Winnipeg. Population adds population. Because births are a factor in increase of population a city of 300,000 adds more to its population in a year than a city of 100,000. Winnipeg's population in 1910 was 136,035 in 1920 it was 179,087 an increase of 43,052. The United States in 1910 had eight cities with population ranging from 125,000 to 150,000. That is they were then comparable in population with Winnipeg. Only three show a greater increase than Winnipeg—they are Richmond, Virginia, Birmingham, Alabama (in these the increase is only slightly greater than Winnipeg) and Omaha, Nebraska —the latter increased in the census period named 67,505 that was the greatest of any city of its class. Meanwhile the northwestern statee which according to Mr. Nicholson felt the life giving impulse of protection increased in population in the ten years 295,311. (This includes North Dakota, South Dakota and Montana). Our three prairie provinces increased 627,961. So much for that section of Mr. Nicholson's story.

This, I think, sufficiently answers the question of what protection has done for the cities of the northern and northwestern United States, as compared with our own western cities. Then the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) proceeded, at page 2756 of Hansard, to say that the western farmers must raise cattle, hogs, sheep, and other animals of this kind, predicting blue ruin if they continued the raising of wheat only as they have been doing. The hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Baker) said the same thing last night, and let me tell these gentlemen that this is an old cry in western Canada; we have heard it for the last twenty years. I have been living in western Canada for the past twenty-two years, and though we have raised enormous crops during that time, our supply of wheat has never been in excess of the needs of the world. We have always had a market for our wheat; sometimes it did not pay as much as we would have liked, but we have always found a market. The western farmer is disgusted with eastern bankers, railroad men, lumber men and business men of every kind who ride through western Canada on the back end of a Pullman, spending two or three weeks there, then return east to write an article telling him how to run his farm. He is sick of that idea. What would the eastern business man think if the western farmer came here and went to the bush, the mine or the bank and told him how to run his business?

An hon. MEMBER: Is not that what they are doing?

Mr. DONNELLY: Let me tell hon. gentlemen that I have been farming in western Canada for the past twenty years, and I would hesitate to go to any one section and tell the farmer there how to work his land. Different sections of the country require different treatment; some are good for raising wheat, others for oats and other products, while some districts are suited to the raising of cattle. One part of the country is not exactly the same as another.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask a question?

Mr. DONNELLY: Just a moment till I get through. I know the hon. member wants to ask something; I can see it in his eye. Just keep cool and swallow this. As I have already said, while I think I know farming fairly well, having farmed in three different sections of Saskatchewan, I would hesitate to tell any farmer how to work his land. I believe we are here to look after the financial interests of this country, and not to dictate how the mines or stores or farms should be worked. If we look after our financial interests and leave the farmer alone, giving him a square deal, he will look after himself.

We have been told that this government has done nothing to assist the farmers in the west, and that our better times have come about through the workings of Providence. I do not think that statement is true. I know the government have helped western Canada by legislation, and I wish to refer to just one thing in order to show what has been done in my own constituency. I point to the retention of the Crowsnest pass agreement, which has meant millions of dollars to the people in my constituency. We ship out of the constituency of Willow Bunch from twenty-five to thirty million bushels of wheat each year, and the retention of this Crowsnest pass agreement has meant a saving of from 5 cents to 6 cents per bushel, or an average of at least 5½ cents. Multiply that out; it is only a short example in arithmetic, and you will see that each year this has meant a saving in my constituency alone of from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000. And yet hon. gentlemen say this government have done nothing for the western farmers. Go to the people in my constituency and tell them that, and see what they say.

The improved condition of the country, especially in western Canada, is due, I claim, not only to Providence, but to some of the legislation to which I have referred which the government has put into effect during the past few years. But there is another factor which has helped to improve conditions. The farmers themselves of western Canada deserve some credit for the restoration of better times in Canada. I believe that the people of the Maritime provinces might do well to copy the example of the western farmers in this respect; it might help to better their condition. The farmers of western Canada faced their own problems when they were up against hard times. By co-operative marketing, and by adopting better methods of agriculture, they have reconstructed their financial condition and rehabilitated to an amazing extent the agricultural industry. While the Canadian manufacturer has stood hat in hand asking the government for a handout, the western farmer has been helping himself. The western farmer may truly say, I think, to the manufacturing industry: We have saved ourselves by our own efforts; perhaps we may be permitted to save our manufacturing enterprises by the example we have given them in self-help and co-operative efficiency.

Let me refer for a moment to this great system of co-operation which we have formed in western Canada, known as the wheat pool. I believe the wheat pool has placed western Canada in a better financial condition and on a better footing than it has ever been in. I do not mean to say that the wheat pool has enhanced the price of wheat, that it is a monopoly that pushes up the price of wheat, but I do say this, that the wheat pool has encouraged among farmers a spirit of thrift that never existed before. Before we had the wheat pool, the farmer sold his grain in the fall, and after he had obtained his money he paid off his debts, and spent what was left; he was not content until it was gone. For two or three months in the year that made business good, collections were good, and the ordinary small business man had to hire extra help in order to handle the increased business. But immediately after the new year, the farmer would come in and ask for credit again; he would have to borrow money to see him through until the next harvest. But since the wheat pool was established, things are different. The farmer receives an initial payment in the fall when he markets his grain, and goes out and pays his debts; he has then little or nothing left over, and he saves what he has. He receives another payment later on in the spring, another in the summer, and another just before harvest. The payments are distributed over the four seasons of the year, and the result is that the farmer never gets very much money at one time, but he always has a little and he has become more thrifty, and has got on to a cash basis. The banks are not lending the same amount of money in the west that they did before, and our business men have not to carry so many farmers on their books as they did before. Conditions in western Canada are very much better than they were, due practically to the wheat pool. I repeat, it has taught thrift. Our merchants and small business men do not have to hire extra help now in the fall of the year, because business is good all the year round, instead of being exceptionally good at one time of the year and slack for the rest. This system is popular among our business men, who are loud in their praise of the wheat pool.

We have heard no objections from the other side of the House to the return of penny postage, nor to the reduction in the so-called nuisance taxes. Both of these steps seem to be in the right direction, and will help the farmer and the labouring man. They both seem to be popular throughout the country. The country seems to be well pleased with the budget as it is. Let me read a couple of telegrams which I have received from the constituency which I have the honour to represent:

Never was more proud of being a Liberal and a supporter of the Mackenzie King government than I am at the present time when I see the reduction of tariff duties on autos and general reduction of taxes. Wish there was an election to-morrow so I could speak again in the interest of the government and yourself.

That is from one of the largest automobile handlers west of Winnipeg, not a member of parliament, but a business man. Here is another telegram—

Mr. GOTT: From the same man?

Mr. DONNELLY: No, but they all feel alike out there; they are all feeling good. It says:

The Agricultural Society—

This is not from one man only, but the views of a whole society:

—desires to express its appreciation of the reduction in tariff as provided for in the present budget, and to express the hope that the policy of downward revision of tariff will be continued, as it believes same to be in the best interests of western Canada.

Mr. GOTT: Are those telegrams dated 1926?

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes. Does the hon. member want to read them for himself?

The legislation which this government proposes with regard to the revaluation of soldiers' land I believe to be a step in the right direction. We are practically all agreed that the soldiers' land should be revalued. There are some districts in which the valuation appears to have been done in a just and equitable manner, and where the cry is not so strong for a revaluation. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent I have the privilege of knowing many of these men who were valuing the land for the soldiers, and they have done their work efficiently and well. Though there may be cases here and there calling for revaluation, there are not many when we take into consideration how the price of land and everything else was enhanced at that time, but there are other districts where there seems to be something wrong. When we learn from page 2688 of Hansard, in reply to a question that out of forty-eight parcels of land sold to soldier settlers only nine are being held by the soldiers now, thirty-nine having been thrown up, evidently there is something wrong. The land must have been valued too high, and the soldier has been done an injustice. These men who have been crying out to help the soldier have apparently done him an injustice in some districts. The forty-eight parcels of land referred to are in one district only, and there are other districts possibly where conditions are equally bad. It is a necessity that the land should be revalued in such cases. This question should be tackled, and the soldiers given a square deal. To revalue the land in such cases would be only doing what is right and fair. Cases such as are mentioned on page 2688 of Hansard should be investigated, and if we find that any wrong has been done, then even at this late date those who committed the wrong should be brought to justice and be punished.

In conclusion, let me say that we are going forward in this country; we are making progress. This country has a great capacity for progress; we have great natural resources to be developed. It needs work, however, and it needs vision. That vision, in the larger sense, I think the present government has shown. I by no means give servile service to any form of government, but let me ask this: Is it not true that the government has shown wisdom in respect to the tariff, the handling of the railway problem, the financing of this great country, the problem of the revaluation of soldiers' land, the aid for the extension of markets, the effort to broaden trade, and the help given during many years to agriculture—has it not in all these ways, and in many more, done well, and is it not entitled to the confidence of the members of this House and of the country at large?

Mr. GOTT: They are not.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow very closely the remarks of the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) but there are a few of his statements to which I will refer for a moment. The hon. gentleman said that we ought to look after our own affairs, and not the affairs of the country to the south. I ask my hon. friend how can we look after our own affairs better than by giving reasonable protection to our farmers and to our industries.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): How are you going to do it?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I will show you later. The hon. gentleman went a little further. He said that other countries are going mad in their support of a protective tariff. He said that it was nice to see Canada lowering its tariff and advised that we should "cut the tariff out entirely." Those were the hon. gentleman's very words. My hon. friend admits that no other country in the world will trade with us on a free trade basis, but he is willing to open our markets so that other countries may dump their surplus products on our shores. That would be fatal, because we cannot compete with the products of the cheap labour and the lower standards of living of those countries.

The hon. gentleman tells us that this budget is a wonderful budget, and he euphemistically refers to it as the Robb budget. I am sorry that I cannot extend my congratulations to the Finance Minister on this budget. I come from a district that has suffered at the hands of this gentleman very greatly. Many people in my riding have had their investments wiped out, as a result of tariff changes, and many of them have been obliged to go to foreign lands to obtain a job. And while this has occurred in my constituency in a small way, I know of some cities and towns which have lost thousands of inhabitants who have been forced to leave their homes and country for a similar reason. Many of the recommendations contained in this budget are similar to the recommendations which have found a place in every budget this hon. gentleman has presented to parliament since taking office. I will be able to show that the Finance Minister has been tinkering and tampering with the tariff ever since he took charge of this department, and the sooner the people of Canada get him out of office, as well as a number of men by whom he is influenced, the better it will be for this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): This government has shown evidence of folly, lack of foresight, lack of knowledge, lack of conception of the true Canadian outlook, and under the compulsion of a few members who have little at stake in this country, has been responsible for legislation that is not in the best interests of Canada.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) was the leader of a party in 1921 which had a majority of one in this House. He said when appealing to the country in 1925 that if he were not given a more substantial majority he would again appeal to the people. This year he came to this House with his ranks depleted, and can only carry on by bargaining and dealing with the Progressives. Two or three men can compel him and his government to do their bidding and bring in any kind of legislation that suits them. The Prime Minister in his manifesto, announcing his appeal to the country at Richmond Hill, said that before further tariff changes would be made an opportunity would be given industries affected thereby to be heard before an advisory board. His followers all over the country used that cry in the campaign. The Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne in January last made the following announcement:

> —that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A Tariff Advisory Board will accordingly be appointed forthwith. This board will be expected to make a careful study of the customs tariff, the revenue to be derived therefrom and the effect of the tariff and allied factors on industry and agriculture.

That is a plain statement from the Prime Minister. But why did he change his mind? What led him to ignore the promise he made? I wish that some of the enthusiastic followers of the Prime Minister and his government who sit opposite, or some of our Progressive friends, would give us some reasonable explanation for the change of mind on the part of the Prime Minister. If a public man, and especially the first minister of the country, can make promises in order to obtain office and then when in office can go back on pledges he made to the people and do the very opposite of what he promised, what confidence can the public put in him? The word of a man in business is supposed to be of value; the word of a man in public life should have even greater reliability. But promises are like piecrust to some of the members of this government who break their pledges with greater ease and facility as the days go by. This budget by its assault upon the accepted tariff of Canada will bring about more unsettled conditions and greater instability in business. The people of Canada will search in vain for anything in the Robb budget which will add one dollar to the wealth of this country, or help to provide a job for one member of the army of unemployed.

I represent an industry in which over $3,000,000 have been invested, in which hundreds of men have been employed, in which hundreds of others in the allied industries have made a living. The industry I refer to is the oil industry, located in several counties in western Ontario, and also in the province of New Brunswick and to some extent in the western provinces. This industry has been in existence in my district for over fifty years, and many of us have spent the best part of our lives in an effort to develop it. When the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was Premier of Canada he realized that the flush production of the oil districts of the United States was liable to wipe out the oil industry in Canada. He therefore placed a duty on the crude oil and its refined products coming into this country in order to protect and develop the Canadian industry. This resulted in the building of refineries in Petrolia, London and Hamilton. We have now many large refineries in other cities east and west.

Our industry flourished under this protection. We had about ten thousand producing oil wells in that part of Canada and eight refineries. This protection continued for many years, but about twenty years ago the Hon. Mr. Fielding removed the duty and gave the industry a bonus. This bounty was granted in view of the fact that the industry was not able to carry on without some form of protection, and to recompense the oil producers for the amount of money they were compelled to pay into the public treasury by way of duty on the products used in the development of the industry, because the minister knew that machinery of all kinds, used in the production of crude oil, had to be purchased from protected industries in Canada, or, in the event of their importation from the United States, were liable to duty. This condition existed until 1924 when the Hon. Mr. Fielding was led to believe that enormous quantities of crude oil were likely to be produced in our northwest. In order to protect the people of Canada, therefore, as he claimed, from an undue expenditure which they might be called upon to make in the future, he gave notice that the bounty on crude petroleum would be reduced to one-half in June, 1924, and in June, 1925, would be discontinued entirely. Nothing was offered in lieu of the bounty, which was removed without warning or investigation. This legislation opened up the oil industry to world competition, while producers had to buy all their supplies in a protected market. The producers of crude petroleum sent several deputations to wait on the Finance Minister.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Do I understand that the fact that they had to buy their raw material in a protected market raised the price to them?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The position is simply this: that every bit of tubing or casing, or machinery of any kind used in the production of oil, bears a tariff of from 27½ to 30 per cent, and in addition to that a sales tax of five per cent has to be added. If those products are brought in from the United States or elsewhere, that duty has to be paid into the public treasury of the country, while on the other hand the producer of crude oil has no protection from world competition. That is simply the position in which we are placed, and it is a most unfair one.

Mr. FORKE: The point my hon. friend wanted to make was that the duty raised the price of the material used in the oil well; that the duty actually raised the price of the machinery? Is that the position? The argument of my hon. friends to my right is that the duty does not raise the price, but my hon. friend from Lambton now states that it does.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The price of the refined oil?

Mr. FORKE: No, the price of the machinery.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I do not think anyone is going to argue that—

Mr. FORKE: Some hon. members do.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): —any more than this; that when an industry is protected—as in the case, for instance of the wagon industry in my town, which had a protection of 25 per cent some years ago, when the government lowered it to 17½ per cent, and finally this government lowered it to 10 per cent—the price of the product is generally lower. But in the case I refer to, the wagon industry, the price of wagons today is double the price it was when the duty was 25 per cent, and the factory is out of business. It is standing there idle in my own home town. We had two hundred employees in that factory, representing two hundred families. That condition destroys the argument of hon. members opposite who believe in free trade.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): You could open it up again if prices were high.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): If they had a reasonable protection I have no doubt the factory could be opened up. In the case of the oil industry you cannot expect to close down the wells and open them up again like a factory or any other business; when you close them down they practically go out of business.

Mr. BROWN: It all depends whose ox is gored.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Not necessarily. We do not want any ox gored in this country; we want to pull together. Our friends in the west have been fairly well treated by the people of Ontario and of Canada generally; they cannot deny that. But on the other hand we ask the men of the west, who, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Donnelly), are prepared to wipe out every industry in our country in order that they may live—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): —to pause and consider the rest of Canada. The hon. member said, "wipe out the tariff". What would you do?

Mr. EVANS: Can the hon. gentleman tell us what special treatment the west has had at the hands of this House?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have told the hon. member about that before. He knows full well that the railroads of this country are carrying wheat at from five to fifteen cents a bushel less than the railroads of the United States are carrying the same product.

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman say the railroads do not cary wheat from western Canada at a profit?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): No.

Mr. HOWDEN: Where do they make their money when the wheat is moving?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Their own statement shows that those divisions are losing money right along.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If you ask the railroads the cost of moving any commodities on their lines, they can produce figures to show that they lose money on any of them.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): They know and are not afraid to state that western divisions are losing money.

Since the present Finance Minister has been in charge of this department the strongest kind of representations have been placed before him, facts and figures without end, which prove that this industry has been placed in a position where it is impossible to carry on with a profit. While it is true that many of the producers of crude oil are still trying to carry on, they are simply producing oil at a loss. Hundreds of wells have been closed and abandoned, a number of properties have ceased operating, and were it not that the present producers believe that the day is near at hand when some kind of reasonable relief will come to this industry, many more of them would close.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If these enterprises cannot carry on without a bonus, I should like to know how the hon. member explains the tremendous development in oil properties in Canada to-day as compared with the time when the bonus was paid.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): That is an entirely speculative development confined to the northwest.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Not speculative.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Oh, yes. The oil industry is a speculative one.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does the hon. member know that one single oil well developed in Alberta last year has more than doubled the production of crude petroleum?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I am not finding fault with the development, but I say it is a purely speculative development to a large extent. One of the ministers was asked to give a list of the charters in that northwestern district, and he gave a reply that simply meant that they were without number. I refer to charters under which men could speculate in the development of that industry. Here we are with an industry that has been established, that has been carrying on or trying to carry on, that has not a bit of protection of any kind, and that is under the disadvantage I have stated in the matter of the purchase of its machinery and equipment. We have asked the Minister of Finance, if he wants to help us, to take the duty off these products, but he will not do it. What can you do in such a case?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask a question as a matter of information?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I do not wish to prolong this debate.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does my hon. friend contend that if the duty was taken off the machinery that goes into these wells it would help the industry?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): As far as that is concerned it simply means that we would be able to purchase these supplies in the open market. But I am quite satisfied that the Minister of Finance would say that if we take the duty off these products we will have to do the same in the case of other large industries such as the Page Hersey tubing concern, and so on, and where would you end?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The machinery that you use is not made in Canada.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The products are largely made in Canada and they are very largely used in that field. This is a basic industry of the country and one of the industries that this government is pledged in its platform to protect. Hon. members must remember that all tubing, casing, pumps, rods, valves, boilers, engines, motors and machinery of all kinds used in the production of crude oil, if manufactured in Canada, carry a duty of from 27½ to 30 per cent, and this duty with the added sales tax the producers of crude oil have to pay. On the other hand if they import their supplies from the United States they must pay into the treasury of this country from $30 to $35 on every $100 worth of goods they buy, while their industry is open to free competition with the flush productions of the world.

Let us compare the condition of the producer of crude oil in Canada with that of the producer of crude oil in the United States, with his flush production, who does not have to pay duty on his tubing or oil-well supplies or on machinery of any kind, and who has no sales tax to pay, while we with our smaller production from each well are compelled to pay into the treasury of this country such an amount of money as will materially help in paying a bounty. The Minister of Finance knows this. He has had statement after statement from large and small companies interested in this industry and those statements bear out what I have said, namely, that scarcely an oil property in that whole district is paying its way to-day.

When the budget was delivered in 1924 many drilling rigs were in operation, but since that time not one drilling rig that I know of has continued in operation in the territory. The drillers have been forced to leave the country and conditions in the oil industry are such that development is at a standstill. How can the Minister of Finance expect an industry to carry on that has to pay from $30 to $35 on every $100 worth of material it requires and that has no protection? It simply cannot be done. What industry could stand up under such conditions? What object has the Minister of Finance in singling out this industry or any industry for special attack? This is an important industry. Why wipe it out?

Our people have made representations to this government time and again, pleading with them to investigate the industry. This change was made without the slightest investigation and it is being continued although the minister is fully informed in regard to this industry. He promised at the last session of parliament to make an investigation, and Mr. Russell, of his own department, who as I understand is a tariff expert, came to our town for that purpose. He spent considerable time investigating the needs of the industry and the position it occupies, and in my presence and in the presence of other men in the town of Petrolia Mr. Russell stated that he had come to Petrolia to investigate the oil industry believing that he would be able to take the duty off practically everything we had to buy that went into the development and carrying on of the industry. We asked that the duty be removed on all products used in the production of crude petroleum, but this government for some reason have not given us any assistance.

When I asked at the beginning of this session for a copy of the report that Mr. Russell must have made to the Minister of Finance in connection with this industry, I was denied that report, and I am still denied it. Why should a government official at the country's expense go to the trouble of making an investigation and not be required to report to members of this House the result of that investigation? Surely the public are entitled to a copy of that report; it cannot be private or confidential. As regards the oil industry we have nothing to hide. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) held the same view in regard to the Hume report on this industry last year, but when it was produced there was in it nothing whatever of a private nature. I respectfully ask that the Minister of Finance lay on the table of this House a copy of Mr. Russell's report. The Minister of Finance knows that if he dared lay it on the table of this House it would condemn the action of the minister in the matter, and that is why he will not bring it down.

In 1924 Mr. George S. Hume of the Geological Survey branch made an investigation into the oil industry for that department. The report of that investigation has been placed upon Hansard, and it contains the soundest possible arguments in favour of some assistance being granted to this industry. It is not my intention to read much from that report; I will read only the last paragraph. These are the words of Mr. Hume:

> My conclusions from the investigations I have been able to make, lead me to believe a withdrawal of the bounty will cause almost wholly the abandonment of the Petrolia, Enniskillen township and Oil Springs fields.

He placed in his report the strongest possible arguments in favour of some form of relief being given to that industry, but nothing has been done.

Mr. BROWN: Is there in that report anything showing the character of the wells as regards productiveness?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Yes; if the hon. gentleman wishes to investigate, he will find in Hansard of last year—I am sorry I have not a copy of it with me—column after column of Mr. Hume's report, which was read into Hansard, taking separate and distinct instances that were most carefully examined. Their books and everything connected with them were examined and their statements appear in black and white in Hansard.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member did not get my point. Is there any report as to how Canadian wells compare from the standpoint of productiveness with other oil wells in the United States?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): There is a great variety of wells not only in our territory but in the United States. In that country there are wells producing two, three, four, five hundred barrels a well per day and more, while ours produce a very small quantity. But this is a basic industry of the country; if it is the intention of the government to wipe it out they have only to continue along the lines they are now following and it cannot possibly live.

How much longer is the Minister of Finance going to continue this treatment which he is meting out to the oil industry? How much longer are the people of Canada going to stand by and see industry after industry wiped out? The minister is the one man in Canada who should have backbone enough to take a stand on these questions; but he is wiping out this industry, and if he continues in the course he is following he will be instrumental in driving tens of thousands of our people out of this country to seek work in other lands because of the closing down of their plants at home. He must know of the tens of thousands who have had to leave their homes and country in order to find work. How many men with their families will have to leave before this budget is disposed of? The daily papers tell us already of men flocking to the emigration office preparing to obtain access to the United States. How much longer will the people of Canada have faith in a man who, while holding the most responsible position of any man in public life to-day, without investigation, without knowledge of the business that he interferes with, opens the door and drives that business to a foreign land? How much longer will the people of Canada stand for the mad lust for power on the part of this government?

"Back to the land" is the cry of a number of members of this government and the few who are dictating their policy. But I ask the minister or any other hon. gentleman opposite, how many men and women have gone back to the land since they started this cry. How many farmers, on the other hand, have been driven off their lands and compelled to make homes in the country to the south, and how many workmen in our factories have also been compelled to follow the same course. Let hon. members come into my part of the country and they will begin to realize what the policy of this government means not only to the industries there but to farming as well, because our farmers are being deprived of their home market. I sometimes wonder if the Minister of Finance realizes the extent of the injury he is doing to the industries of Canada.

Now, let me direct the attention of the House to another industry in my riding that has been practically wiped out. When this government came into office there were large machine shops manufacturing oil well supplies for oil and water wells in Petrolia. Many of their products were shipped abroad to foreign countries and their reputation was of an international character. This was about the only large industry of its kind in Canada.

It had been in existence for over fifty years. It had representatives in Australia, Borneo, India, East Africa, Persia, Russia and other countries. At the last session of parliament the government reduced the duty from 27½ per cent to 5 per cent on the products manufactured by them, and increased the duty on soft coal, the only kind which they were in the habit of using for all heating and welding purposes, from 14 cents per ton to 50 cents per ton. This means that the government wiped out every bit of protection that was worth while to this industry, and by increasing the duty on the coal they cut the industry both ways. How could any group of business men expect an industry of this nature to carry on under conditions such as I have described? No investigation was made as to the justice of this change; no effort was made to see the effect it would have on the industry; it was just wiped out. Not long ago this company was employing a large number of men with homes in my town and families to support, and many of those men had spent their lifetime in studying the business. To-day a few of them remain on short hours, with no prospect of bettered conditions so long as this government remains in power. I realize to the full what the present day conditions mean to these men, and what this government has done in the few short years it has been in office to destroy their industry. Mr. Speaker, this insane clamouring for free trade in Canada must cease or we must be prepared to sacrifice practically every established industry in this country.

Another industry in my riding is the woollen industry. Since this government took charge of the affairs of Canada fifty-five woollen mills have closed their doors. Thousands of people engaged in that industry have been thrown out of work and many of them have joined in the trek to the United States to find the work that has been denied them in Canada.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Does not my hon. friend think that fifty-five woollen mills are more than are necessary to supply our requirements?

Mr. McGIBBON: How were they able to keep going before?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Because of the war.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Does the hon. gentleman appreciate the fact that we do not begin to supply the woollen products used in this country? Before I get through with these remarks I hope he will realize the position in which even our farmers are placed in regard to this industry. Two woollen mills in my district have closed since this government took office. One had been in operation continuously for over fifty years. Canadian employers pay to their help twice as much as is paid in Europe for similar work. The low wages and depreciated currency in foreign countries, together with our inadequate tariff, will soon wipe out all our woollen mills. This is only another breach of Mr. Fielding's promise of tariff stability, and another violation of the pledge of the Prime Minister. When will the government cease selecting special industries for attack? More than two thousand industries have closed their doors since this government took office, and over 600,000 Canadians have had to leave to get work elsewhere. That is equivalent to the population of six cities of 100,000 each, or 600,000 people. And this home market is transferred to the United States. Judging by the hundreds who have taken out papers since this budget was brought down, another 100,000 of our boys are on the move to the highest protected country in the world. Our free trade friends clamour to get into the United States market to buy cheap goods. Do they realize that when they go to the United States to buy cheap goods, they go to the highest protected country in the world?

What has made goods cheap in the United States? Simply the protection which the United States government gives to the farmer and manufacturer.

Mr. McINTOSH: Would the hon. gentleman state what duty the United States charges on agricultural instruments?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have not the schedule before me, and, anyway, I do not see that that has anything to do with the woollen industry.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. gentleman said that the United States was the highest protected country in the world, especially for the farmers. Does the United States charge any duty on agricultural implements?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have not the schedule before me, so I cannot answer my hon. friend's question.

I have under my hand, Mr. Speaker, two important statements in regard to the textile industry. I have no desire to take up the time of the House reading them, and with your permission I will place them on Hansard. One is a comparison of woollen imports into the United States and into Canada, and the other shows the effect of low duty rates under the French treaty.

These are the statements referred to:

Size Of Textile Industry In Canada

The textile industry in Canada, including the woollen and knitting branch which comprises about one quarter of the whole, is greater than is generally known.

The textile industry directly employs 19 per cent of the total industrial workers, pays 15 per cent of the total industrial wages and salaries, produces 14 per cent of the total manufactured products made, and employs 9 per cent of the total industrial capital engaged in Canada.

The total value of the wheat crop in Canada in 1923 was less than the value of textile products manufactured in Canada; value total wheat crop, $316,934,700; textile products, same year, $334,439,196.

In 1922, the value of manufactured textiles made available for consumption in Canada, that is, the sum of production in Canada and the imports, less the exports, was $436,741,893. This is greater than the value of the products made available for consumption in Canada of any of the other seven groups into which the manufacturing industries are divided, in government statistics, except that of manufactured vegetable products.

In 1923, there were 1,817 textile establishments in Canada, representing an investment of $283,248,204, employing directly 92,669 workers, providing an annual payroll of $81,244,205, and producing goods valued at $334,439,196; the raw materials purchased by the industry amounted to $176,445,427, a large amount of which went to support the workers in other Canadian industries, such as soap making, starch making, paper box making, printing, wool growing, etc. In the fiscal year ended March, 1924, which approximates to the calendar year 1923, a total of $40,611,749 worth of raw textile fibres were imported into Canada and $129,183,911 worth of manufactured textiles.

Comparison Of Woollen Imports Into United States And Into Canada

The reason why Canada loses its population is illustrated by comparing the imports of woollen and knit goods into this country and into the United States.

United States figures are from the Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce and Canadian figures from Monthly Reports of Trade of Canada, and are for calendar years:

Imports	Into U.S.	Into Canada	Imports per Capita Into U.S.	Imports per Capita Into Canada

Effect Of Low Duty Rates Under French Treaty

The low duty rates granted by Canada to France under the French treaty were put into effect in September, 1923.

The total imports of woollen and knit goods into Canada from France in the twelve months ending September, 1923, which preceded the putting into effect of the lower duties, amounted to $1,439,748. For the twelve month periods ending September, 1924 and 1925, the imports from France amounted to $3,246,813 in 1924 and $3,156,234 in 1925, or an average of $3,151,523 each year following the reductions in duties.

Invoices from France are still valued at the exchange value of the depreciated franc for assessing the duty. In other words, the reduction in the Canadian duties doubled the competition from France, the duties being lowered although the competition was already unfairly assisted by the progressive economic degradation of that country.

For fiscal years ended March the importations of woollen and knit goods from France were:

1922	$ 699,838
1923	1,020,122
1925	3,284,976

It will also be remembered that Sir Henry Whitehead, president of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, boasted that the low rates granted by Canada to France were the lever by which his chamber of commerce, and the Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce, were able to move the Canadian government to reduce the duties on similar goods coming from Great Britain by 10 per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, closely associated with the woollen industry of Canada is the sheep-raising business. We have a lot of fine sheep in my riding, and many of the farmers are very proud of what they have accomplished in this regard. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) would pay less attention to wiping out the tariff and more attention to the development of the sheep industry as well as some of the other branches of industry that come under his jurisdiction, it might be better for his department and, incidentally, for the agricultural development of Canada.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What would my hon. friend suggest should be done?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I will make the suggestion before I close my remarks in regard to this item. That we can raise good sheep in Canada is shown by the fact that at the greatest show of live stock in the world, the Chicago International Stock Show, sheep bred in Canada swept the board of prizes last year, and every year they meet with similar success. This proves that Canadian sheep are right and that the wool is right. And yet we have only 2,600,000 sheep as compared with Great Britain with its small area, where there are 25,000,000 sheep. I wish the Minister of Agriculture to listen to this, for I am sure it will interest him. In the United States there are over 40,000,000 sheep, an increase in one year of 1,358,000, while in Canada the number of our sheep decreased by 400,000 since this government took office.

An hon. MEMBER: What was the reason?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): It is up to the Minister of Agriculture to say. In Australia there are 80,000,000 sheep while in Canada we have only 2,600,000.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mostly in western Canada.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I wish to call another matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. In Canada we raise only 15 per cent of the 70,000,000 pounds of wool that we use every year. Surely we can find some way whereby to increase our flocks and help fill that order for 70,000,000 pounds of wool per year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend surely knows that the wool we import is not of the same quality as that which we grow.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The minister knows very well that 15 per cent of the 70,000,000 pounds of wool is an amount so small that it is hardly worth considering. Three quarters of that total amount of wool could easily be produced in Canada. This government has reduced the duty on Australian mutton and lamb to one-half cent per pound, thus flooding our markets with these products. Canadian mutton and lamb are second to none in quality and flavour for table use, and there is no necessity to import them. Yet the Canadian duties were recently lowered from three cents to one-half cent per pound to encourage the sale in Canada of lamb and mutton grown by the farmers of Australia.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member tell the House how the importation of mutton last year compares with that of 1921 and 1922?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have not those statistics at hand.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They were in the same book referred to by my hon. friend for his other figures.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I am merely making statements which I am prepared to back up.

There is another industry in my riding in which the farmers are particularly interested, and that is the growing of sugar beets. I have already put on record my position in regard to this industry, which has received unfair treatment at the hands of this government, but I would like to add a few words to what I have already said. Without investigation or a word of warning this same Finance Minister reduced the duty on refined sugar one-half cent per pound. Owing to this reduction thousands of farmers whose livelihood depended on this industry were at once notified by the large sugar refineries of Wallaceburg and Chatham that the price they received would be reduced by 50 cents per ton. The hon. member for Kent, Ontario, (Mr. Chaplin) told the House only yesterday of the effect of this cut in his riding. He told how a few years ago, before this government tampered with the tariff, there were 40,000 acres of sugar beets under cultivation in his riding, from which the farmers received $4,000,000; $2,000,000 was paid for labour, making a total of $6,000,000 expended in his riding. Last year the acreage totalled 30,000, and he said this year it would probably amount to 20,000. My district is right alongside that of the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, and anything affecting his part of the western peninsula also affects my district. The loss to these farmers has been enormous, but on top of it all, as though the Finance Minister wanted to discourage further the Canadian beet producer and make it still more difficult for him to engage in the production of sugar beets at any profit, by the treaties with Australia and the West Indies he reduced the duty on raw sugar coming in from those countries one cent per pound. Australia sent in last year 26,000,000 pounds of raw sugar; the West Indies sent in last year 17,000,000 pounds of raw sugar, and they are now put in a position whereby they can pour in the raw sugar at an altogether lower cost, and undermine another great basic industry of our country.

Look for a moment at the position in which our sugar beet growers are placed and the competition they are up against. In the production of sugar beets practically the whole profit comes from the hard work of weeding, hoeing, planting and marketing the beets, which means months of work for everyone on the farm. If the sugar beet growers in Canada have to hire help, they are compelled to pay from $5 to $7 per day for men to do this kind of work. These men work with their backs bent close to the ground with a hoe, the handle of which is only a foot long; hour after hour and day after day they work in that position. Compare their wages with the wages paid in the West Indies or Australia for similar labour. The help provided in the West Indies comes from the second lowest class of civilization in the world; the workers receive less than $1 per day and live on the cheapest possible food; a handful of rice is a good meal. Their clothing consists of a pair of overalls with a string for suspenders, and if sufficiently optimistic the string is not needed. By the action of the government in thus lowering the duty on raw sugar coming into Canada from these countries, Canadian raw sugar has had a proportionate drop in price, so the government has been wholly responsible for the reduced price paid to Canadian beet growers.

If farmers in the west can produce sugar beets successfully as the minister claims they can—and I am delighted to hear that statement—why not protect them and their market? There is no reason why we should not produce in Canada practically all the raw sugar we need, but to-day we only produce 10 per cent of our own requirements. Why not compel other countries to pay for access to our market? Why oblige Canadian growers to take less for their product and to compete with cheap labour in West Indies and Australia? We protect the manufacturer against cheap labour; why not the beet grower?

Some weeks ago I asked for information in regard to the raw sugar coming from the West Indies, and the minister asked that it stand as an order for return. I sent away for the information and received a reply inside of three days, the accuracy of which I am prepared to vouch for. Field labourers in the West Indies are paid approximately $1 per day, which is probably the scale of wages paid in Australia as well. The freight rate on sugar from the British West Indies to St. John is 18 cents per hundred pounds net, and to Montreal 22 cents. The present c.i.f. price of British West Indies sugar is $3.25 to $3.30 at St. John, and 5 cents higher to Montreal; deduct 18 cents to 20 cents for the price at point of shipment. Under the present West Indies trade agreement now being discussed in this House the rate of duty on raw sugar from the British West Indies is to be 28.712 cents per hundred pounds, on a basis of 96 degrees polarization, as against a former rate of 45 cents. I would like hon. gentlemen to listen carefully to this next statement. This gives a preference in the duty on raw sugar produced in the British West Indies of 1 cent per pound. It is understood that the rate of duty on Australian raw sugar will be the same, although not specifically mentioned in the tariff. This will mean that the Canadian growers of sugar beets will receive $1 less per ton, and you can imagine how they will appreciate such a reduction.

Another very extensive industry in my riding is the dairy and cattle industry. The Finance minister, owing to the treaty arrangements entered into with Australia and New Zealand, has placed that industry in a most precarious position. Canada has imported over 5,000,000 pounds of butter this year from those countries, and the market of the Canadian farmer has been undermined. The Minister of Finance knows very well that if our farmers had been protected in this regard during the past few months hundreds of thousands of dollars which have gone to swell the profits of the cattle men and butter makers of Australia and New Zealand would have been in their pockets.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Where would the butter have come from?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): We can produce plenty of butter in Canada to supply our home consumption.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Not at a moment's notice.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Canada exported 25,000,000 pounds. Let me go a little further and I will show where this butter will come from. The minister knows full well that he has opened our doors to the products of these countries, and has thereby compelled our people to accept less for their products than they otherwise would have received had the home market been kept for them.

During my address on the Speech from the Throne the Minister of Agriculture said that the importation of butter this year would not exceed 1,000,000 pounds. We told him then that he was mistaken. What does he think now, when our imports have amounted to more than 5,000,000 pounds of butter in four months of this year? Has he any idea when these shipments will cease, or is he in the least concerned? No! Let me just call his attention to a statement made by one of the largest creameries in western Ontario dated April 12 of this year, which statement could no doubt be duplicated in almost any creamery in Canada:

> With the huge shipments of Australian and New Zealand butter pouring in, and with the butter exports of our northwest cut off from the United States by the new United States duty of 12 cents per pound, our market has crashed, as we have been expecting it to crash for the past month.
> As an example, we sold to one firm last week 100 boxes of prints at 45½ cents f.o.b. They called us up this morning and stated that they could only pay 42½ cents, and this afternoon they called again and advised us that they had been offered butter, as they stated, from the largest creamery in Toronto, at 41 cents delivered. We finally were compelled to sell them 80 boxes at 40½ cents.

I am enclosing you a couple of letters we received this morning that will show you how the Montreal and Toronto markets are.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Then they have not sold 100 boxes at all? The hon. member said they had sold them.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): How could they sell them? The price was going down and down all the time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Prices went up all January.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): How much higher would they have been if it had not been for the millions of pounds of Australian and New Zealand butter coming into this country?

Mr. FOURNIER: What is the production of butter in Canada?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I placed those figures on Hansard in the statement I made in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. The amount is 280,000,000 pounds, if I remember correctly. It is an ample supply to furnish the whole Canadian market during the whole year.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What is the duty on butter coming in from Australia at present?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): One cent a pound. But if you were to send Canadian butter to Australia you would have to pay a duty of 8 cents per pound, and if it was going to the United States you would have to pay a duty of 12 cents a pound, for they have raised their duty within the last few months from 8 to 12 cents a pound? Why? To protect their farmers.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Was not the duty raised here also on butter coming in from Australia?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Not at all. The hon. gentleman has in mind the dumping clause. It is true that when the government found these enormous supplies of Australian butter coming in, they thought they would put a stop to it by applying the dumping clause, but even the dumping clause did not keep it out, as the hon. gentleman knows. Does not the hon. gentleman believe that if the Canadian market had been protected at a reasonable rate, Australian and New Zealand butter would not have come into this country in such large quantities?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): We were very glad to get their butter because we had only ten days' supply on hand.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): That is the hon. gentleman's way of putting it. Similar statements are made about the food supplies in the Motherland, that they have only sufficient for eight days or so. But how can the hon. gentleman say that?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): England's supplies keep on coming in to that country.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): So does the butter keep on coming in here. I have a letter here from Alex. D. McGillis and Company, produce brokers, Montreal, who says in regard to butter:

This has been a disastrous week, with the disastrous decline entailing heavy losses on account of recent arrivals of Australian butter.

J. M. Ham, commission broker, Toronto, says:

Due to heavy arrivals of foreign butter, and liberal shipments of fresh made from western Canada on consignment, butter prices on all markets have simply collapsed this week. The decline started in Montreal on Monday, and each day, in fact several times during a day, prices have gone lower.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does the hon. member want to keep out the western Canada butter as well as the Australian butter?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Not at all. I am as proud as the hon. member is that western Canada is producing butter in such large quantities. I am president of a creamery company that was in the habit of shipping to the northwest and to British Columbia car after car of butter, from our district in years gone by. I am glad to know that you are able to produce butter in the west to supply this market, but for the good of the farming community in old Ontario I ask you to help us protect our home market in order that we can carry on and give the farmers of this province a fair return.

While the Australian and New Zealand butter was pouring into this country by millions of pounds Arnold's of Toronto, the large distributors of groceries in that city, carried this half-page advertisement in a Toronto newspaper dated April 8, 1926:

Butter six cents a pound lower than last week.
30,000 pounds Cottage Brand Creamery Butter.

That was a drop of six cents a pound in a few days. This butter had come in from Australia and New Zealand, where the farmers did not have to keep their cattle in the barn in winter and feed them hay and chop.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does not butter always drop at that time of the year?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Why should it drop in Canada? Our cows have to be housed and fed and cared for, but in Australia and New Zealand they do not need to house their catttle and feed them as we have to do ours. That is one reason why our farmers should be protected.

Mr. DONNELLY: What was the price of butter last year?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have answered a lot of questions, but I am not a walking encyclopaedia.

Now just a word on the automobile industry. This is another industry that has been vitally affected since the present Minister of Finance took office. Not only has the automobile industry suffered at his hands, but the Canadian Manufacturers' Association have stated that one thousand other industries that supply parts to the automobile factories have been vitally affected. Millions of dollars' worth of orders that have been placed in these factories have been cancelled. I know of one factory alone that has had over a million dollars' worth of orders cancelled since this budget came down. You must remember, too that some 3,600 agents and garage men have already made their purchase of new cars for the year 1926, and their stock of old cars is only just beginning to move. The estimate of loss to these men, from a reliable source, is over five million dollars. Sales of Canadian-made automobiles in 1925 amounted to $107,000,000; at least 25,000 employees were engaged in the business of manufacturing motors, and 100,000 people were dependent on the industry and its allied industries. The tariff was changed without any warning, without a public investigation as promised in the Speech from the Throne and on the public platform by many of the members on the opposite side of the House. I am not going to argue that the duty on automobiles and trucks was too high or too low, because speaking frankly, I do not know, and I have no means of knowing, nor have the members on the opposite side of the House who are making hearsay arguments in regard to this industry. I do, however, condemn the action of this government, which after having appointed a tariff board for the purpose of getting just such information regarding industries, should deliberately cut the tariff on these goods over 40 per cent without consulting the tariff board.

The motor manufacturers have presented a reasonable request to this government, that before any definite action be taken in connection with this budget their industry should be investigated by the tariff board now appointed. Surely this is a reasonable request and should not be ignored by the government. The statement I make in this regard is borne out by an "appeal" which is to be found in The Labor Leader, Toronto, dated April 23, 1926. The statement is surmounted by heavy headlines and is published in black type, indicating the importance with which it is regarded. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite do not think this paper is influenced by any but the best of motives. The statement reads as follows:

> Representing, as you do, the citizens of this great Dominion, "The Labour Leader" on behalf of the men who work in the Canadian automoobile factories and the various factories that make parts and accessories, numbering about twenty-five thousand, with about one hundred thousand women and children dependent upon them, earnestly request you to refer the clause in the budget that deals with the tariff on motor cars to the new tariff commission, so that these workers may have an opportunity of placing their views before them. Gentlemen, forget your political parties, and lend a hand to these hard-working toilers.

In closing let me say that one of the worst features of the action of the King government in its tinkering with the tariff is the fact that the existence of every industry is threatened and all business is made uncertain. Few manufacturing plants or large industries will spend money or invest capital in improvements or branching out. There is no certainty as to the future for them. The fact that a tariff commission was appointed led people to suppose there might be tariff changes. The people were more or less prepared for that. Eight days after a tariff commission was appointed the government, apparently ignoring the commission and without any investigation, made radical changes in the tariff regarding certain industries.

Mr. DONNELLY: Cut out the tariff.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): An hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan says "cut out the tariff". That is the same old story. It means the adoption of a policy which will destroy our industries and drive our people from this country.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? He has been very good-natured and very courteous and kind and I appreciate that very much. The question I desire to ask is this: How does he account for the enormous increase in production and in trade during the last four years if all the industries of the country have been ruined, as he and some of his friends have been arguing?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There has been no increase.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Yes, a tremendous increase.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The hon. gentleman who has just asked the question realizes to the full that the Minister of Finance in his budget speech distinctly gave credit to Providence for the wonderful development in this country during the past year—

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): All of it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): —and if the hon. gentleman follows up the suggestion of the Finance minister he will know why it was that the farming industry in particular was able to accomplish what it did.

Now, to revert to what I was saying when I was interrupted, the fact that a tariff board was to exist gave some promise of business stability. But if that board is to be ignored in regard to certain industries, why ask its decision as to any industry at all? Why have a tariff board at all, with all the added expense it entails, if it is not to investigate and report on all industries?

The Minister of Finance, when addressing the automobile delegation at the Keith theatre recently, said he would "stick to his guns" before he even heard what the deputation had to say. Will he be equally as drastic with the tariff commission?

In conclusion may I say that there never was a time when there was greater need of tariff stability in this country? Canada requires capital to develop her mines and woodlands, her water powers and her industries, and to give employment to her people. But what incentive has foreign capital, or for that matter any capital, to invest in Canada while we have a government that will not give a reasonable stability to business and does not inspire confidence in business people? The King government, through the negotiation of foreign treaties and the tariffs, has struck a blow at the industries of Canada and at her basic industry, agriculture, at a most unfortunate time. As long as the present government is in office, our industries, if they live at all, will exist in a state of insecurity. The fate of the various industries which I have mentioned is likely to be the fate of other industries under the King government, and so long as this government holds sway we cannot hope for improved industrial conditions in Canada.

Mr. FRED STORK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, during the present debate, which has lasted now for about four weeks, we have been treated to a discussion on almost every subject under the sun. The coal question has been debated, also matters pertaining to the production of wheat, oil, motor cars, and sugar-beets, as well as that hardy annual the Australian treaty. In the few remarks which I propose to offer I desire to prescribe for the House a diet of fish. Fish, they say, is a brain food, and as the constituency which I represent is one of the great fish-producing areas of this Dominion I shall devote some little attention to that great basic industry.

At the outset I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the splendid budget which he has presented. It is a most excellent budget, and I have received many letters, and some telegrams, from the people of my constituency expressing their approval of it. One of the outstanding features of the budget is its strength; it is a strong budget. We have been told by members of the House who are in a position to know, that this is the best budget that has been submitted in the last twenty-five years. The amendment offered to it is a relatively weak amendment.

Since last October we have heard a great deal from the Conservative party, and we have read much in the Conservative press, as to the hopeless and weak position of the King government. In the same quarters the present budget is referred to as an election budget. I think that is responsible for the uneasiness of hon. gentlemen opposite. The budget is a good election budget, it is one upon which we can win an election at any time we appeal to the country. We have been told in the Conservative press and by speakers on Conservative platforms that this government is a very weak one. I ask how it is possible for a weak government to win all its by-elections?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. STORK: I ask how it is possible for it to strengthen its position in the House of Commons—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It has not done so yet.

Mr. STORK: —and also to strengthen itself very materially in the country at large. If this is the weak, vaccilating government which our Conservative friends would have the people believe it is, how did it ever muster up sufficient strength and courage to apply the closure in this House? If it is such a weak government, how did it manage to negotiate treaties the operation of which is increasing our favourable trade balance and our standing in the financial world? We found when this government came into office in 1921 that there had been an adverse trade balance of $29,000,000. In 1922 we had a favourable trade balance of $6,000,000. In 1923, it rose to $142,000,000, in 1924 to $165,000,000, in 1925, $284,000,000, and as disclosed in the Robb budget the favourable trade balance amounts to $401,000,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, how can a claim be made that this is a weak government and the country is going to the dogs under Liberal administration, and at the same time how can the Conservative party lay such great claims to the strength of their own party and their position, when the best they can do is to submit to this House the weakest amendment that has ever been submitted to the House in the last thirty-five years? The reduction in taxation, the reduction in the postage, the splendid Canadian National statement and the treatment of automobile duties have all been dealt with at considerable length. The duty on automobiles has caused a great deal of discussion in this House. The Conservative party has always stood for a high tariff, but I feel that they must regard themselves as being in a most unfortunate position at this particular time. They have been telling the people of Canada that industry was going to rack and ruin, that if we tampered with the duty on automobiles that industry would close up. The hon. member who has just addressed the House (Mr. Armstrong, Lambton) has made the usual complaint about the effect of tariff reduction on the industries of this country. The party which insists on saving the country by keeping the tariff high and by jacking up the duties has told us that these automobile industries will be ruined. Having appointed themselves the guardians of the country, they must feel very badly let down when they find the man who makes more motor cars than all the rest of the automobile manufacturers together—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Where does he make them.

Mr. STORK: A lot of them in Windsor. This gentleman tells us he does not require the assistance of any tariff for his business. He says the industry does not require a tariff and he himself is in favour of free trade. That is going even one better than any of us. I have before me an item printed in the Toronto Globe of April 21, dated at Windsor, which reads:

> Henry Ford, Detroit automobile magnate, to-day dealt a hefty blow at high tariff to protect his Canadian industry, when he told The Globe during a brief interview at the Walkerville ferry dock that the plant in Ford City would run better under free trade.
> "I am a free trader," Mr. Ford said. "It was not necessary for you to ask me that," he continued. "Mr. Campbell said the Canadian factory would continue to operate, and it is my belief the factory would be better off under free trade, than protected by a high tariff. I am a free trader; that's all there is to say."
> Mr. Ford spent the best part of the day in conference with officials of the factory at Ford City. He inspected every department of the plant, halting at some parts of the huge factory to chat with the workmen.
> "You can rest assured these men will be kept at work," he told one of the department superintendents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the hon. member the same idea as to duties on boots and shoes, furniture and so on?

Mr. STORK: I will deal with that later on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much later?

Mr. STORK: Evidently Mr. Ford has decided to get along without the assistance of the high tariff saviours in this country. We find that a budget was presented to the House on Thursday, April 15, in which the announcement was made that duties on automobiles would be lowered. The Oshawa automobile factory closed on Friday, and we on this side of the House wonder whether or not the closing of the Oshawa factory was not advised by the famous board of strategy which has been operating in this House. I would imagine, judging from subsequent events, that the board of strategy had something to do with that. We saw a vast delegation parading through Ottawa carrying banners like an army, these banners describing every physical ill in the country, but there was one that I thought might very well have been carried in that parade, and that would be a banner stating that the Oshawa factory was closed on Friday for political reasons and would be opened on Monday for business reasons. We heard many prophecies in regard to what is going to happen to industries which were favoured by a reduction in tariff. In the last parliament a reduction of duties was made in regard to agricultural implements. I believe that reduction cost this government a seat in the city of Brantford. The election took place in the latter days of October. Strong statements were made in regard to the injury done to the manufacturer of agricultural implements, and yet I find that on January 28, a very few months after the election, the Massey-Harris Company held their annual meeting, and the report of the business year just closed was the best in the whole history of that company barring one particular year. We find that they had an increase of over $1,300,000 in net profits during the year ending November 30, 1925. The report reads:

> An increase of $1,300,000 in the net profits of the company during the year ending November 30, 1925, is recorded in the financial statement. Current liabilities during the year were reduced by $5,000,000.

Mr. MULLINS: Since the tariff has been taken off, how much cheaper can you buy a binder?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Forty-four dollars.

Mr. MULLINS: The price is higher now than before the change in the tariff.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You can buy a binder in the city of Regina for $44 less.

Mr. STORK: One great benefit accruing to the Dominion under the provisions of the present budget is the fact that, for all time to come it places in its grave the ghost of the whisper of death. A great deal of time has been spent ,and a great deal of newspaper ink has been used in trying to prove to the people of Canada that the whisper of death prevails in the whole of this great country. So far as the province of British Columbia is concerned there is no whisper of death west of the Rocky mountains. British Columbia does not swallow propaganda in regard to this country going to smash simply because the Tory party is not in power guiding the affairs of the great Dominion of Canada.

Even the hon. member for East Lambton, brought up again the claim of injury resulting from the Australian treaty. The Australian treaty has had a marvellous effect upon the prosperity of British Columbia. I wish to quote briefly from a newspaper which I think no one can accuse of being particularly favourable to the Liberal party in that province. I quote from the Vancouver Province of Tuesday, November 3, 1925, just a few days after the general election. I will not quote the whole extract. It goes on to outline what will happen in the way of development in British Columbia and it winds up with this statement:

> The King government, during its four years in office, has not had many opportunities of serving the country in a broad and constructive way, but the negotiation of the treaty with Australia is one good work which stands to its credit.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 95, to incorporate the Red Lake and Northwestern Railway Company—Mr. Heenan.

[Mr. Stork.]

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. STORK: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was proceeding to say that this government has been largely responsible for the prosperity which the province of British Columbia is now enjoying. I have in my hand a newspaper to which I am sure our friends opposite will take no exception; it is the Mail and Empire. It contains a half page advertisement headed "A young giant still expanding." Appearing in such a paper, I am sure the House will agree with me that it should have the effect of knocking off the funeral plumes from that defunct Canada which the Tory party has been so eager to convey to its political graveyard. After setting forth the prosperity in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it has this to say of British Columbia:

> British Columbia is in the throes of the greatest development in her history. The visitor of any of her cities or towns feels this the moment he steps off the train or steamboat. This great pulsating throb of new life is reflected in heavy investments in buildings and commercial enterprises arising out of her basic wealth in mines, forests, fisheries and the fruits of the soil.

That, I believe, is a fair statement of fact. British Columbia is enjoying a wonderful period of prosperity. The Toronto Globe of yesterday contains a short editorial headed, "How it helps the west," and I have no doubt the House will be interested to hear it. It reads:

> Additional vindication of the Canadian-Australian preferential treaty, if such were needed, is seen in the impetus which it is giving to the paper and pulp industry in British Columbia. Because of the Australian market two more newsprint mills are being established, doubling the production of the Pacific province.
> Lack of markets has hampered development of the immense resources of British Columbia. It is credited with having available more than 285,000,000 cords of pulpwood, consisting chiefly of spruce, western hemlock and balsam. As recently as 1910 not a ton of pulp or paper was manufactured in the province. To-day it ranks next to Ontario and Quebec, with a capital investment of some $41,000,000, giving employment to more than 2,500 persons. The two existing mills are turning out 200 tons of newsprint per day, and this will be doubled when the two new mills are operating. It is estimated that the value of this product will shortly reach $20,000,000 a year, much of it finding its way to Australia.

This is further evidence of the beneficial effect of the Australian treaty on British Columbia. In the county of Skeena, which I have the honour to represent, there is one of the finest pulp and paper plants to be found anywhere on the North American continent. It is located at Ocean Falls, and I am credibly informed that the proprietors intend still further to extend their buildings.

The Australian treaty also gives a market for the fish canned in British Columbia. I assert that this government has done more to promote the fishing industry of my province than any preceding government. The budget places sheet tin, which is used in the manufacture of cans, on the free list, thus giving further benefit to one of our basic industries. The county of Skeena is an extensive area and contains vast natural wealth, fishing being one of its basic industries. In this connection I wish to place on Hansard some statistics which I have received to-day from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and from which it will be apparent that my constituency produces a great deal of the fish taken in the province. This is the statement respecting halibut:

Statement showing the quantity of halibut landed in the province of British Columbia and also District No. 2 during the past five years 1921-1925 inclusive.

Total landings for the whole province

	Cwt.
1922	293,184
1923	334,667
1924	331,382
1925	309,598

Landings for District No. 2

	Cwt.
1921	252,558
1922	252,753
1923	299,092
1924	293,728
1925	287,415

This gives us some idea, Mr. Speaker, of the important part played by the county of Skeena in the halibut fishing industry of British Columbia. I would now like to read the figures, compiled in the same way, having to do with the salmon fishing industry.

Statement showing the quantity of salmon landed in the province of British Columbia and also District No. 2 during the past five years 1921-1925 inclusive.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that this government has done a great deal for the development of the fishing industry of British Columbia. In 1922 a commission was appointed to investigate the whole of the fishing industry, both halibut and salmon, and every phase of the question was investigated. It was felt that the industry was so important, that so many interests were involved and so many men required consideration, that in place of bringing them all to Ottawa a commission should tour the province and in that way consider every angle of the situation. That commission was very successful; sittings were held in every part of British Columbia, 191 witnesses were examined and a report brought in which was adopted by the government of the day. As a result, the tax on canneries was reduced from $500 to $20; the tax on purse seines was reduced from $300 to $20; the tax on drag seines was reduced from $50 to $20, and the tax of one-half cent per fish caught in seines was abolished. This one item alone meant a tremendous increase in revenue to those engaged in the fishing industry. The license fee was reduced from $5 to $1; the duty on gas engines used for fishing boats was reduced; nets, twine and gear were placed on the free list; the use of gas boats was authorized—

Mr. SHORT: Might I ask a question? Have not nets and fishing gear always been on the free list?

Mr. STORK: I think not.

Mr. SHORT: I think so. You will find that fishing gear of all kinds has been on the free list for many years.

Mr. STORK: I think I am correct. At any rate, the use of gas boats was authorized for the first time on the Naas and Skeena rivers. Prior to to that the old method had been employed, while gas boats had been permitted on the Fraser river and in other parts of British Columbia. In the north they were still compelled to do their work by those methods which had obtained on the sea of Galilee some two thousand years ago. The fishermen of that country are now permitted to pursue their calling in safety by use of the modern gas boat. A policy was also adopted by the government placing the fishing industry solely in the hands of whites and native Indians. In 1923 there was a reduction of 40 per cent in fishing licenses granted to others than whites and native Indians; in the year following there was a further reduction of 15 per cent along that line, and now the total elimination of others than whites and native Indians is definitely in sight.

In the matter of old age pensions I know of no class of citizens which will hail the advent of such a bill with greater delight than will those fishermen who go down to the sea in ships and eke out a hard livelihood. They grow old quickly in the fishing game, esepecially on the stormy, rock-bound coast of the north Pacific, and those men will welcome the announcement that an old age pension system is to be brought into force.

In 1911, Mr. Speaker, we had an election in this country, held in connection with a reciprocity arrangement. The real issues of that election were lost sight of, and the slogan of our friends opposite became, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." Our American friends to the south naturally heard the people of Canada repeating that slogan, and said, "That is fair enough; we will have no truck or trade with the Canadians," and as a result we now have the Fordney tariff. We have heard a good deal recently about this "brick for brick" policy, but it seems to me to be a question of a brickbat for a brickbat, and the first brickbat thrown hit the fishermen on the Skeena river right in the eye. The high tariff has no supporters in the county of Skeena. I have just placed on Hansard a table showing the tremendous amount of halibut taken from the north Pacific, and the people who are catching halibut are free traders; the high tariff makes no hit with them. They are shipping this vast amount of halibut largely to the American market; it goes out over the Canadian National railways in refrigerators cars and contributes largely to the revenues of the Canadian National, since each refrigerator car earns about $1,000 in the transportation of fish.

But we are under a very grievous disadvantage in connection with this market. Halibut is sold in the open market by auction, and our Canadian fishermen receive two cents per pound less than do the American fishermen who market their catch in that port. All the fish are supposed to be destined for the American market; the buyer, anticipating that he will have to pay the two cent duty, deducts that amount from the price paid the fisherman. Thus this duty of two cents per pound has been for some time a burning question with those people. Negotiations have been carried on and are still in progress, and we urgently and earnestly hope that they will result in the abolition of this duty.

As a result of the improvement in the fishing industry we find two new canneries being built in the northern part of the county of Skeena, and there is also a newly established biological station, put into operation by the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the study of fish life and the general advantage of the trade. At that station they are discovering new varieties and new species of fish. I have lived for a long time in the north country. I have been in the province of British Columbia for some thirty-seven years, and there are varieties of fish there of which I have never heard before. Only last fall, over on the north shore of Queen Charlotte islands, I found a brand new industry. At a little town called Tow Hill there has been established a new clam canning factory. When we speak of clams we all have in our mind's eye the old style of shell which litters the ocean beach, but this particular clam which they are developing at Tow Hill is a brand new variety, and I would imagine it to be the aristocrat of the clam tribe. It is enclosed in a case which looks very much like a spectacle case that a man might use, made of tortoise shell. The shells are as thin as paper, beautiful in finish and colour, about 7 inches long and 1¾ inches wide, with the ends rounded. They make a very beautiful looking shell. These clams are of such a quality that there is an unlimited market for them. It is something entirely new. This is just one instance of what can be procured by scientific research, by investment and by the far-sightedness of the people who live in that country.

I discovered while I was at Tow Hill that they have there one of the finest natural beaches, I should think, on the known globe to-day. It has been my good fortune to have visited the beaches in California, the sands at Blackpool and Ostend, and I say without hesitation that on the north shore of Queen Charlotte islands is a sand beach as hard as a cement floor, fifty miles in extent—the greatest natural speedway that one could find anywhere. Fifty, yes, one hundred, automobiles could race along this speedway for fifty miles, and I am sure that when Sir Henry Thornton gets his eye on this locality, with his desire to attract world tourists and build up the Canadian National railway, when he brings to bear his activity on that section of the country, we shall have an improved steamboat service from Prince Rupert to Alaska via the Queen Charlotte islands. This beach I speak of is one of the greatest natural advantages, I think, which the whole of the north country possesses. If Burns or Byron had visited such a spot, it would be interesting to see what they would have produced in the way of description of what I regard as one of the greatest wonders of the North American continent.

Seventeen years ago, in the town of Prince Rupert, Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, who was then the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and also of its subsidiary the Grand Trunk Pacific, made a speech in which he said he regretted the fact that he was an old man with not many more years to live, but that even at his age he hoped to see before he died the fulfilment of the project of the Grand Trunk Pacific. He said he hoped to see going out of the port of Prince Rupert the trade and traffic of the western prairies, and coming back through that port the wealth of the Orient. This grand old man has long since passed to his rest. The defeat of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1911, the death of Charles M. Hays, the change of government in 1911, the stress of war, the further fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific had its throat cut by Mackenzie and Mann,—due to all these things the development of that great country has been temporarily arrested. There was a period of stagnation between 1911 and 1921, but, Sir, under the present Prime Minister, and under the genius of Sir Henry Thornton, this country is now beginning to be developed, and with the tremendous improvement in the situation of the Canadian National Railways, as stated in the budget, and with the improvement of the Grand Trunk Pacific, we can look forward to the future as being bright and promising.

Before I resume my seat I wish to deal for one moment with a matter which received a great deal of adverse criticism and unfavourable advertisement during the last election campaign. From every Tory newspaper in the Dominion of Canada and from every Tory platform throughout this country there was hurled at the Prince Rupert elevator the charge that it was one of the crimes of the Mackenzie King government. Even in the recent by-election in Middlesex, if I am correctly informed, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) took further occasion to refer to this matter. Our Conservative friends, who have had so much to say in denunciation of this proposition, ought to remember that within three months of the day they came into office in 1911 their first act in this despised town of Prince Rupert was to expropriate from their own friends 100 feet of frontage on Third avenue, at a price, set by their own board of arbitrators, of $95,000. Then out of the native rock they chiselled a basement at an additional cost of $25,000. We have a very wet climate in that part of the country, and this post office site was so located that it acted as a drain pool for the surrounding land, with the result that this basement filled up with water. Then our loyal friends who think so much of Prince Rupert installed an electric pump, operated by one of their own friends. This pump would work night and day pumping out the water, and those of us in the north country who were doing what we could to keep up our courage during the dark days of the war had our courage renewed and our spirits revived by listening night and day to the patriotic heart throbs of the Tory pump working in the government cellar. When they criticize this Prince Rupert elevator they ought to say that they themselves in 1911 gave the people of that north country reason to hope that they had located in a place that would be advantageous. Let me say that this elevator at Prince Rupert has been completed now only a matter of seven or eight weeks. The sawdust and the shavings have scarcely been removed, but still things are moving. The elevator there will be used. The dream of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the speech of Sir Charles Rivers Wilson, and the hope of Charles M. Hays will yet be realized. The elevator at Prince Rupert will hold grain that will be exported shortly to the Orient, and in return there will come back to the Canadian National railways for transportation to the east the silk of Japan and of China, and other oriental wealth. The prophecy of the grand old man who has gone to his rest is coming true. It is coming true rapidly, and it is heartening to pioneers of that northern country who have staked their all, and who are living in the hope of seeing the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and of witnessing the prosperity that is bound to come in time to the whole of the northern part of the province of British Columbia.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I believe that any tariff introduced into this House should be based on the principle of protection. In my opinion a proper application of the principle of protection will solve all the economic ills of every province in the Dominion from Vancouver to Halifax. I believe in protection as a principle, not as a privilege. I do not believe in protection for the sake of the manufacturers or for the sake of the bankers. If a protective policy is intended simply for the benefit of the manufacturers and the bankers the sooner it goes the better. I believe in protection for all the people to build up a united Canada. The proper application of the principle of protection will do what it has done in the United States; it will solve the economic needs of the country, safeguard our industries, protect agriculture, the greatest industry we have, and will make our people happier and more contented. In acting along that line we shall be taking a leaf out of the book of the United States. They started as an agricultural country in 1840, just as did Canada earlier in its history. In the United States they found it was necessary to have manufactures, and they began to supply their whole wants. They began to produce everything they needed for their own comfort, with the result that to-day the United States is the highest protected and the most prosperous country in the world, and a country that came out of the war, probably, in better shape than any other nation.

I observe that the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), speaking in this House yesterday, said that the province of Ontario is not the whole of Canada. Of course Ontario is not the whole of Canada. I do not know that anyone ever suggested that it was except the hon. member for South Perth. No; Ontario is not the whole of Canada, but it is a part of Canada, and it is becoming also a good sized part of the United States in view of the daily exodus of our sons from this country. Over 100,000 men who fought the battles of this country for civilization in France and Flanders have had to leave Canada and have gone to the United States to seek a job. New Ontario has been economically annexed to the United States. Why do I say that? Because New Ontario has been a happy hunting ground for American millionaires for years past. Mr. Drury, the former Premier of Ontario, gave to Mr. Backus, a Milwaukee millionaire, an enormous timber area, an empire in itself. In addition to that, mines in New Ontario, containing such mineral wealth as copper, zinc, nickel, and so on, have been given away and are largely owned by American millionaires. Our water powers have also been parted with to a large extent —and the country which loses the control of its water powers loses the key to its industrial life. Sir, the hon. member for South Perth and the few gentlemen from the Farmers' party allied with him will not be here very long if they do not unite in the support of a policy which will be of advantage to the province of Ontario. It is pretty nearly time that the old province of Ontario had a ginger group in this House that would rally to its support whenever it was necessary. As I have pointed out on a previous occasion, Ontario contributed forty-four and a half per cent of the total sum needed for the support of the country, made up as follows:

Cash contribution..	$155,936,028
Subsidy..	2,642,611
Net contribution..	153,293,416
Population..	2,933,662
Contribution per head of population.. ..	$52 21

Hon. gentlemen will see that I am right when I say that Ontario is contributing forty-four and a half per cent of the total amount needed to run the country. What are we in Ontario getting in return? Nothing but the privilege of paying taxes. That is all we are getting. If any adjustment of freight rates is made it is carried out at the expense of Ontario. Look at the important industrial interests which are congregated in the city of Toronto and the surrounding districts. Not only are there great manufacturing industries in operation, but market gardening and mixed farming is actively carried on in the outskirts of the city. But these industries have no protection. I repeat it is pretty nearly time that we had a ginger group from Ontario in this House to look after the interests of the province.

It is time that some regard was shown for the interests of the province of Ontario. We do not want anything out of the way, but we do not want to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for other parts of Canada. For nearly three months the province had not a single cabinet minister in the government. It is true that we have to-day a young cabinet representative in the person of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott). I do not know what administrative duties he has to perform to-day because the powers of the Labour department by the decision regarding the Industrial Disputes Act have largely been taken away. If this portfolio is all the province of Ontario is getting to-day in the way of cabinet representation it is not getting very much. However, we do not expect very much as long as the present government remains in office. It is pretty nearly time the various groups in this House united in order to give Ontario a show. Charity begins at home, and it is about time we had less talk from the hon. member for South Perth as to Ontario.

For the purposes of comparison, let me show what the province of Saskatchewan contributes towards the revenue. I give the figures as I have already given them in the case of the province of Ontario:

Cash contribution..	$4,753,158
Subsidy..	1,901,061
Net contribution..	2,852,097
Population..	757,510
Contribution per head of population.. ..	$3 76

Or one-eighth of one per cent of the total amount required to carry on the government of this country. What cabinet representation has the province of Saskatchewan got? It has the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). I do not know what there is for the Minister of Railways to do at present time. In former days when appeals on railway matters were carried to the Privy Council of Canada there was something for the Minister of Railways to do. But his powers have been taken from him and handed over either to the railway commission or to Sir Henry Thornton. Sir Henry Thornton does not recognize any Minister of Railways. He is all by himself a branch of the legislature himself. He said the other day down at Boston that there were only three classes of people in the world. Americans, Canadians and foreigners—not knowing that the people of Canada are British subjects to the core and that this country is part and parcel of the British Empire.

West of the Great Lakes the government has a Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) from British Columbia. We have the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) from Prince Albert, and we have the young Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) from Melville. The leader of the Progressives out west is the deputy Prime Minister of Canada, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), and we have two hon. members from Winnipeg who help the government to make up its mind. And I think it is pretty nearly time Ontario was given a chance. Let us be fair to the province of Ontario and give it an opportunity to develop. No province in Canada to-day suffers the economic ills with which Ontario is afflicted, with its closed industries, the instability of the tariff and the uncertainty of business conditions, combined with a large exodus to the United States.

The hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Baker), who spoke last night, emphasized the necessity of studying the French language. The people of Ontario are fond of their neighbours in the province of Quebec. Anyone in Ontario who wants to study the French language is welcome to do so because that language is taught in our high schools and in our universities. The people of Toronto have a liking for their fellow Canadians in the province of Quebec; sixty-six thousand young men from Toronto showed on the battlefields of France the admiration they had for that country and learned French in the classes of 1914-1918. These young men gave an exhibition of patriotism and of regard for France, that will live for all time. There is no city in Canada where France is more highly respected than in the city of Toronto—the glorious French nation towards whom the eyes of the whole civilized world were turned in the war: their awful sufferings and trials will live in history as an example of the most sublime patriotism.

I desire to say a few words about protection as a principle. Until the world makes further progress in the recovery from the war, we must doubtless expect to see the smouldering embers of the old conflagration breaking out here and there, disturbing the economic and industrial equilibrium; and in such a disturbance we must learn to distingush brush fires from conflagrations. One need not be an economic expert to do this well enough for most practical purposes. A simple rule-of-thumb test which anyone may apply is to measure the different nations in the light of the following points which constitute in order of importance five principal stages of economic reconstruction.

1. Stable government
2. Determination of debt.
3. Balancing of budget.
4. Stabilization of currency.
5. Reorganization of industry.

Considering the budget presented by the Minister of Finance, we find five cardinal principles aforesaid all violated. The first is stable government. Have we such a government to-day? I do not think so. They do not know their own mind for one minute. Last year they brought in two or three budgets. We have no stable government at present. Then the next point is the determination of the debt of Canada. Can anybody know what our debt is? They claim a surplus, and they give us a lot of figures. The minister points out $40,000,000 of a frozen asset of moneys loaned the National system which pay no interest. This is merely done by a system of bookkeeping items. When we add that sum to the amount on the other side it gives us $110,000,000. Then the third is the balancing of budget. Of course that does not mean anything; you can prove anything by figures. Then fourth, is the stabilization of currency. They have not accomplished anything in that line. The fifth item is the reorganization of industry. They have accomplished nothing in this regard. There is no way of reversing the order of these steps or of skipping a step. Progress in each stage depends absolutely upon a complete fulfilment of the requirements of the stage preceding. By the application of this yardstick one may be aided in distinguishing between those disturbances which strike at the foundations of the economic structure and those which represent merely some house cleaning in the upper stories. As I say they failed on all points.

Then I say that a safeguarding of industries act should be applied as a principle to our raw material instead of our exporting them to the United States, to have them manufactured there into the finished product and shipped back to this country for sale. As I said before, unemployment in this country is due to the fact that we have failed to develop our own natural resources and to conserve our own raw material. We are exporting in the raw and crude state to the United States various materials that we could manufacture at home. Take for example the case of asbestos; we are sending out $6,000,000 worth of raw asbestos taken from the bowels of the earth in Quebec, and that material when manufactured in the United States yields a return of some $75,000,000. We are exporting mica, nickel, pulpwood, power and coal. If we manufactured or utilized these articles in this country, it would provide work for tens of thousands of men. Canada supplied 85 per cent of the mica of the world, and 95 per cent to the United States. In 1924 Canada sold 112,000 tons of mica to the United States in the mill fibre state, only one degree removed from the crude. For that we received $5,546,000. When that was manufactured in the United States, it realized $70,000,000 worth of the finer products of asbestos, and another $10,000,000 worth of rough asbestos. Had we developed our own mica, $80,000,000 would have been distributed among Canadians.

Canada controls the world's supply of nickel. We need fear no competition in this particular article. We should develop nickel in our own country and help provide employment here. Canada's great nickel deposits give the United States all its supply and the world 85 per cent of its supply. Canada is limping along on a low tariff while the United States grows prosperous on a high tariff, three times as high as ours. The United States controls seventy-five per cent of the silk business of the world and seventy-five per cent of the rubber manufacturing, and yet not an ounce of rubber or silk raw materials is produced in that country. A proper protective tariff would induce growth and expansion here as nothing else in the world could.

No one knows better than the grain growers in the west what need there is for some change in our system. Their grain is being taken across the line to Buffalo where there are now twenty-eight elevators, and it is being milled there, mixed with American wheat and exported overseas, while the identity of Canada's fine hard wheat is destroyed. All the employment that is furnished by those twenty-eight elevators in Buffalo would give work to 15,000 men at Port Colborne and other lake Ontario points, if a duty and embargo were placed up to 45 per cent on wheat, having it milled in Canada and exported entirely through Canadian channels. I am glad that we are getting some converts in this regard, one hon. member to my left having advocated this policy.

We are certainly not developing our natural resources in this country as we should, for if we manufactured our mica and utilized our power and our coal in this country we could provide work for tens of thousands of men. Last year Canada sold 4,350,000 cords of pulpwood to the United States, receiving $13,000,000 for it, while this raw pulpwood was converted in the United States into a value of $67,000,000. We sent one-third as cordwood, one-third as pulp, and one-third as paper. We are also sending $100,000,000 every year to the mine owners in Pennsylvania. We could use $56,000,000 of that sum to provide work and wages in the Maritime provinces, in Alberta and in central Canada. And do not forget that Canada on the other side of the account buys back the manufactured products of these raw mineral materials which are manufactured in other countries. Do not forget that copper, as a raw material, is being exported in bulk and is being manufactured in the United States into articles worth millions of dollars. For example, I know a large firm in Toronto which last Christmas purchased 30,000 radio machines made in New York, Boston and Providence, and the best parts of these sets were manufactured from Canadian copper. Last year Great Britain purchased about 145,000 tons of copper, and Germany took three times that amount.

The Liberal government have done everything by fits and starts; they have not accomplished anything with the tariff. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) did not approach the subject from the standpoint of the Liberal platform of 1893, because not one of the planks of that platform has been carried out. Hon. Alexander Mackenzie said:

> There is no policy more consistent with what we call the dark ages of the world than that of protection as a principle.

I would apply protection as a principle all over the country. He says further:

> There is no principle more consistent with the advance of human freedom, no principle more in accordance with the great prosperity which prevails in our time, than that of absolute freedom of commerce.

Here is a quotation from a speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the Liberal convention in Winnipeg. He said:

> If the National Policy had any basis at all it was that the bread of the people should be taxed. It was an inhuman policy that would make bread and fuel dearer. It is always easy to increase the tariff because by so doing you increase the private fortunes of certain individuals.
> We stand for freedom. I denounce the policy of protection as bondage—yes bondage; and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which American slavery was bondage; not in the same degree, perhaps, but in the same manner. In the same manner the people of Canada, the inhabitants of the city of Winnipeg especially, are toiling for a master who takes away not every cent of profit but a very large percentage, a very large portion of your earnings for which you sweat and toil.

I will not quote any further regarding that particular convention, but on the tariff issue the Liberals of this country have never had a settled policy since Sir Wilfrid Laurier was their leader in 1897. The principles of Liberalism of which we hear so much from the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King) produced this state of affairs. It has been a disturbance in the economic life of the nation. The principles of Liberalism, so often on the lips of Mackenzie King, were faithfully applied by him to the tariff question and produced a bluff designed solely to fool a sufficient number of the electors to get into office. There was never any real concern in the mind of Mr. King, as there was never any in the mind of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of a stable tariff for Canada. The Progressive movement in western Canada has been betrayed by its leaders, who are Liberals first. The sincere Progressives backed the movement in protest against Sir Wilfrid Laurier's failure to carry out his promises of free trade. But the leaders who came to the front in the Progressive party were men with feet of clay. They fell quite readily into the traps set by the Liberals. Instead of punishing the Liberal party, which furnished the sole reason for starting the Progressive movement, the Progressives have proved themselves a prop and a stay to give the Liberal party a longer lease on life. The only difference between the two is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

I believe the National Policy should further be applied to the patent law of this country. If you look over the Dominion patent office records you will find that a vast number of patents are held by Americans; they come over here Monday, leave on Tuesday with a patent, and go home to the United States and manufacture under the patent. That applies to patents for engines and motor cars. I wish to draw the attention of the House to a great grievance in this connection, to an evil that is wrought in any country against its labour and which is every day working in Canada. Our patent laws are absurd. They are pro-American and anti-Canadian; that is all they are. They are very injurious to the labour interests of Canada and have the effect of sending our workmen to the United States. The patent law is framed in a way to give the benefit to all those outside of Canada while our labourers in Canada are suffering. In the majority of the patents granted in the Dominion patent protection is given to persons outside of this country, and the products to which they relate are made or manufactured and shipped in to Canada, giving no labour in the making or manufacturing of the same to the workers of this country—just a case of dump, dump, dump under the protection of the so-called patent law. That is a nice kind of patent law for a national policy country like Canada. Books, periodicals, magazines and a host of other printed matter printed in other countries and having copyright protection in this country are shipped here involving no more labour in Canada than transportation and distribution. A number of automobile manufacturers with patents are only assembling the cars here, giving the labour of making the parts to workmen in other countries.

Machinery of all descriptions, household articles, wearing apparel and other articles too numerous to mention are patented here and made elsewhere. In regard to chemical processes for the refining of minerals, the raw material is shipped from Canada to the United States to be refined and the finished product is shipped back to this country. Why can that refining not be done in Canada? There is direct and indirect labour involved in the manufacture of all these articles and other countries are reaping the full benefit of having the labour done by their workmen. I understand that ninety per cent of the patents, trade marks and copyrights that are granted in Canada are granted to persons outside of Canada who manufacture these articles and ship them to this country. This is not a square deal to either our labour or our industries, and as long as this state of thing continues we shall have a large number of our workmen out of employment involving in labour and business a loss of thousands of millions of dollars annually to the Dominion.

These patent laws should provide that if any person applies for patent protection on any article and receives a patent, he must manufacture the article and all the parts leading up to the finished article in Canada, and if the manufacture of the article in Canada is not commenced within six months from the date of the issue of the patent, it shall become void. This will give the person a reasonable time within which to manufacture the article. I firmly believe that if these patent laws were framed as I have pointed out they would be the means of giving proper and greater protection to our labour and industries, they would encourage new industries to establish here, and in time they would make Canada a much more prosperous nation than she otherwise would be. Those are my views on the question of patents and protection as a principle applied to patents.

I am of opinion that it is just as fair and honourable and we have just the same right for national reasons to use the weapon of the tariff to save, defend and protect our country from the dumping of foreign goods as to call out the militia in our hour of peril to defend our land against the attacks and invasion of an armed foreign foe. The war taught Canada a lesson. If we can carry into peace the lessons learned in war all will be well. A national policy is as essential in peace as in war, and the basis of that policy is protection for the people, diversified and suited to the needs of every province as the local circumstances, customs and economic requirements of each province demands; in other words, a national policy brought up to date, a living national policy that will live and move and have its being for the upbuilding of a united Canada. Such a principle of protection alone can make in all the provinces for a united Canada for the Canadians. Such a policy would stop the exodus and bring our boys back from the United States. It would eliminate the deficits on our National railways; it would enable us to promote migration within the empire, solve the unemployment problem, take care of our raw materials and conserve and preserve the magnificent heritage this country has.

I believe in such a tariff, a maximum tariff, not a minimum one, as will prevent Canada from being as it is now the home and happy hunting ground of United States millionaires who are grabbing up our timber, mineral and water power wealth, such a tariff as will stop the exodus, prevent the foolish export of our raw materials and cause them to be manufactured in Canada thus creating employment and keeping our people in this country.

As protection has been attacked so much during the course of this debate, I wish to say a word or two about it. Such attacks are enough to make a Canadian disown his country. Will this never stop? Is it not possible to create an industry of any kind in Canada? Apparently it is not on account of the uncertainty of the tariff. We are fast becoming the five, ten and fifteen cent country of the world the way things are going on at the present time.

During this debate one of the speakers referred to the Mother Country and free trade. I would like to read this article which appeared in one of the British papers which shows how a "little child shall lead them":

London, England, Jan. 21.—A small boy, recently admitted to a local hospital, was weak and near death from hunger. He was one of a family of twelve and his father's wages amounted to about $20 a week.

When the nurse gave the boy a cup of warm milk he asked appealingly, "How far down can I drink?"

The crowds that cheered for Gladstone,
The mobs that roared for Bright
In tariff-hating Manchester,
Home of the Cobdenite—
They never saw the guerdon won
Nor glimpsed the accolade—
A little child has led them
To the triumph of free trade.
He never studied theories
Nor read the master's rule;
He never heard in high debate
The great Manchester school;
The harder school in which he learned
Had whips that racked and flayed
Where hunger taught the meaning
And the glory of free trade.
'Neath their high domes, in lofty halls
Where well-fed thousands sat,
To cheer the self-sufficient fools
Prating of this and that,
They set no limit to the tongue
No boundary to mood—
And now the London urchin
Must set limits to his food!
My lords and gentlemen whose pride
The great Gladstone hath fed,
Ye high and mighty doctrinaires,
By Cobden always led,
Doff all your gorgeous uniforms,
Your tinsel and parade;
Learn ye from this lone youngster's plight
The glory of free trade.

Has free trade solved the unemployment situation in the Old Country, where more than a million men are receiving the dole? Has it made unemployment insurance unnecessary? Has it prevented England from becoming the dumping ground of continental Europe for cheap, shoddy German goods? Has it made the poor laws unnecessary? No. England is fast coming round to protection. Even Lloyd George's land bill of the other day is a protectionist bill all along the line.

Coming from an industrial district in which there is much unemployment, I deem it my duty to-day to bring before the House the question of additional protection for the industries of the country, and to urge that what Canada needs at the present time is a proper Safeguarding of Industries Act. The subject of protection is many-sided and should be brought up to date to meet the changed conditions that have taken place since the inception of this great fiscal public boon in 1878. I support it, not for its own sake, but because it is essential for Canada's sake. No one needs to apologize for what protection has done for Canada. I support it for principle's sake, and on the grounds of patriotism.

Canada must choose between protection and free trade, and the difference between them is as wide as the poles. Protection is not and should not be thought of solely as a manufacturers' or bankers' question, or that it exists for the sole benefit of manufacturers. Protection is a great economic question of principle and of patriotism, and of life and death to Canadians. The big interests, who seek to grab all the benefits of protection for themselves, are its worst friends, and do the great movement little good. It should not be a manufacturers' question; or a banking question; or a grain growers' question; or a combine question; or a monopoly question at all. Protection should be brought up to date to meet changed conditions, and extended. Protection will make for a better Canada, and a happier and more contented people, with work plentiful; it will make Canada a country fit for heroes who have fought for Canada to live and die in, instead of being driven to join the exodus.

I am tired of those who, for their own selfish ends, sometimes seek to apologize for protection as a question of expediency. If protection is solely a question of a manufacturer's or banker's profits, it is sure to die. As an honest protectionist, the great question of protection is one which I support, not for the manufacturers' or bankers' sake, but for Canada's sake. It is with me a question of both patriotism and principle, for the building up of a united Canada; and the principle should be extended and maintained so as to extend, conserve, build up, develop, and preserve all the provinces of Canada from coast to coast. I propose later to show how protection, adequate protection, should be developed and built up by additions and conservation, to further develop each of the provinces according to its needs, resources and economic development, and the pyschology of protection as applied to Canada.

Some forty-seven years have now passed since the dead hero of protection in this country, Sir John Alexander Macdonald, first placed on the statute books of this country the old National Policy, and Canada can say of Sir John Macdonald as Rudyard Kipling said of the great John Bunyan: "The wisdom that he taught us is proven prophecy." We heard something in this debate about reciprocity. It was part of the Liberal platform once; it was part of the platform of the Progressives and the Canadian Council of Agriculture. All I can say in reference to that is that free trade and reciprocity with the United States would make a Lazarus out of a country that Sir Wilfrid Laurier professed to have made a nation. That proposal would exhibit the Canada of Queenston Heights, or St. Julien, of Vimy Ridge, or Passchendaele, of Amiens and many other fields of glory, as a beggar for the poor favour of reciprocity and free trade. Canada cannot prosper on the growth and export of wheat alone. This was shown in the case of the United States. Protection was the path of glory to prosperity for the United States. Those are my views on that particular question.

As I said last year in discussing this subject, free trade kills industry, destroys the young rival, then puts up prices. There is no doubt whatever that the United States imports are a deadly menace to Canada. This was proved beyond any dispute in 1925. High tariffs have saved the United States, the whole prosperity of that country having been built up on that policy. Perhaps I may be allowed to quote briefly from what I said on this subject last year:

> These are the facts from the fiscal history of that country. England's imports never menaced in 1844 the native industries of the United States the way American imports are menacing the native industries in Canada in 1925.
> The free trade assumption is always false that manufactures are eternally and especially in want of protection, while agriculture and commerce need none. The assumption is false in any sense; our commerce and navigation cannot live without protection, never did live. It is the interest of the whole country which demands that that portion of its industry which is most exposed to ruinous foreign rivalry should be cherished and sustained. The wheat grower, the grazier, is protected now by ocean and land, by the fact that no foreign article can be introduced to rival his except at a cost for transportation of some thirty to one hundred per cent on its value; while our manufactures can be inundated by foreign competition at a cost of some two to ten per cent. It is the grain grower, the cattle raiser, who is protected by a duty on foreign manufactures quite as much as the spinner or shoemaker. He who talks of manufactures and nothing else being protected, might just as sensibly complain that we fortify Halifax and Quebec, but not London or Ottawa.

The United States draws the life blood of Canada in 1925 the way Britain was in economic history charged with drawing the life blood of Portugal in 1844, industrially. Our low tariff is a boon and aid to the United States. Canada suffers at the hands of the United States, the latter taking advantage of our low tariff, Canada is the happy hunting ground of the American millionaire, who is getting the title deeds of our timber, forests, pulpwood and mines.

There never was a time in the industrial history of Canada when the business men of the country and the producing power stood more in need of sympathetic consideration at the hands of the financial administration of the government than to-day. The crushing burdens and taxes on industry to-day constitute a loss and handicap for business men at a period when every nerve is being strained to develop stability and ensure expansion of production on economical lines.

Last year the minister introduced dumping legislation which would have helped business materially, but he yielded to the importunities of the free traders in the House and finally withdrew it. It is heartrending to go into our departmental stores and see all the cheap German and American goods displayed to the exclusion of our own Canadian products. The fact of the matter is that this country is simply a dumping ground for the excess production of foreign manufacturers. The dumping provision was a good enough Liberal doctrine for Laurier and for Fielding, who recognzed how essential it was in order to protect our manufacturers from altogether unfair competition. German goods are produced under such conditions as make it possible for the manufacturers of that country to undersell the Canadian. Labour is cheaper there, hours of work are longer and there is a depreciation in currency that discriminates against the Canadian manufacturer. Is there any wonder, therefore, that industry is languishing in Canada and that factories are being closed up? It is altogether beyond my comprehension why there should be no dumping regulations in Canada just as there are in every other country on the face of the globe.

We are said to have a Labour party in this country but the fact of the matter is that the gentlemen composing that party do not represent labour at all. Mr. Gompers was one of the most astute labour leaders this continent has ever seen. He believed in labour working within the two old parties and was a strong protectionist, not only in principle but in practice, and you could not find a single labour union in the United States to-day that would vote for any resolution which had for its object a reduction of the tariff of that country whether as it affects manufactured products or agriculture. The result is that in the United States to-day labour is a real and effective force and gets a real show. The Labour party in the United States is not a political party. I do not believe in the principles of the hon. gentlemen of the Labour party. Here we have two gentlemen who say they represent labour, yet they vote for reductions in the tariff and for instability and for free trade, instead of voting for labour they vote Grit first, last and all the time. Sir Oliver Mowat was a distinguished Liberal and a friend to labour. His successors, Sir William Meredith and Sir James Whitney, were also strong supporters of Labour. The hydro-electric movement, which has meant so much to labour in Ontario, was introduced by the Conservative party. The country always sends for the Conservative party when it is in trouble. I would not call these hon. gentlemen from Winnipeg viceroys, but perhaps they could properly be termed deputy prime ministers, and I would like to see them quote one labour union in the United States to pass a resolution condemning a high tariff. The late Mr. Gompers was always a protectionist, and not one single state legislature has ever asked for the modification of existing duties. The tendency is to go higher all the time.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the question of industrial research. No department of the government is more important to the development of this country than is an up-to-date department of scientific research. Canada has to-day some of the finest scientists in the world; an outstanding man in the world of medicine is Dr. Banting, the discoverer of the cure for diabetes. The export of raw material is a mere nothing, in my opinion, to the export of brains. Go to any American university, any faculty of medicine, and you will find it largely composed of Canadians. I believe we should have a student policy in this country for the summer; instead of our students seeking work as cooks and waiters we should provide them with employment in the different departments of government, in industrial and scientific research and in that way hold that student class in Canada. This exportation of brains, our most valuable manufactured product, is going on all the time. The class in electrical engineering at the university of Toronto last year went almost entirely to the United States.

As Premier Baldwin of England says, "shock absorbers" are necessary in industry. Premier Baldwin said that while science might not save industry in England, it could act as a shock absorber to carry the country through. I have been looking over the record of scientific research in Canada, England, the United States and in other countries, and it is extraordinary to find how industrial research can help everyone. I am sorry to see the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), leaving the chamber; I am afraid he may think I am saying too much about scientific research, which is carried out in his department, but I hope there will be an increased vote to cover this item in the estimates. I was speaking of shock absorbers; let us take the radio. It almost ousted the phonograph, but the makers of the latter instrument were forced to make a better product, and it kept its place. Gas illumination was almost ruined by electric light, and the gas mantle saved it. Nickel companies were satisfied to produce for warfare purposes only, but now they are turning to many useful domestic lines. Coal fuel is in a bad way; this industry had no shock absorbers because it was of the opinion that it had a perpetual monopoly, when along came petroleum and gasoline. Great Britain, United States, Germany and Canada are countries where the coal business is in a bad way. The by-products of coal can and should be utilized, and will give larger profits than the raw product itself; I predict that in twenty years every coal mine in the country will make liquid fuel at the mine. According to the Montreal papers the Canadian Pacific Railway have placed orders for more coal burning locomotives, but the oil burning car has come to stay. A new type of gasoline which is now being put on the market will revolutionize the type of motors used in automobiles. The vast future of nitrogen will cause a great upheaval in agriculture. Every industry is being revolutionized by new scientific discoveries. If business is not associated with scientific men, business will go to the wall. The National Research Council is doing good work, and can keep industry informed of what is going on. It can show the time to draw in on one business and expand on another, and any banker should know how that information will affect industry.

Now, let me read one paragraph from the report of the Grain Inquiry Commission:

> At the present time, the duty on Canadian wheat—entering the United States—is 42 cents per bushel. On wheat flour, semolina, crushed or cracked wheat, and similar wheat products, the duty is $1.04 per hundred pounds. These duties are practically prohibitive, in their effect. They prevent Canadian wheat or wheat products having access to the American domestic market. On the other hand, under the provisions governing milling in bond and drawbacks, it is quite possible for the American millers to obtain Canadian wheat virtually free of duty to grind for export. Considerable quantities of Canadian wheat are ground in American mills and exported abroad under these conditions. This American flour ground in American mills, but the product of Canadian wheat, enters into competition with the output of the Canadian flour mills. The benefits of manufacture are lost to Canada, while at the same time, the general benefits of reciprocal free trade in the wheat and wheat flour do not exist. It was suggested to us that in view of these conditions, an export duty should be levied at the same rate as in the American tariff, upon Canadian wheat and wheat products entering the United States. The American tariff having already closed effectively the domestic market to the Canadian farmers, the result of such a levy would be to eliminate the export of American flour ground from Canadian wheat, and to transfer this market to the Canadian millers. While, as a general thing, export duties are to be deprecated, the exceptional situation that arises in this instance might warrant such an impost.

I believe there should be such an embargo. It would put the milling industry in this country on its feet. Buffalo has twenty-eight mills bootlegging our Canadian wheat, turning it into flour, and shipping it across the water as the Canadian product. I have looked over the situation in Buffalo, Baltimore and New York and seen this bootlegging going on. Canada is losing this export trade, and if we imposed an embargo it would put the grain and the milling industry in this country on its feet. Canadian grain would then go through Canadian channels and through Canadian ports and be milled here, and it would be doing the fair thing by the farmer of the west.

I want to say a word on the automobile question. I believe in protection for the automobile industry as a principle—not as a privilege, but as a principle. I would turn the automobile industry in this country into a native key industry, and have every unit that enters into the automobile manufactured in this country. I refer you to the Patent office where dozens of Canadian patents for engines are owned by Americans. I would apply the proper policy of protection to the Patent office of this country. I believe in the gospel of protection to make the automobile industry a key and native industry in this country, and not a place to assemble cars; so that we would make in Canada everything that goes into the car from A to Z, from Genesis to Revelations, so that Canada would cease to be an assembling plant for American parts on which the bulk of the labour is done in the United States.

Then after the car is ready to be shipped out of the factory to the retail store, what principle of protection would I apply? I would have somebody attached to the Department of Finance or the Inland Revenue department who would ascertain what that make of car cost to produce in Canada, and what it cost to produce in the United States. Then eliminating the difference in cost of production, owing to differences in labour costs and local conditions, I would say: Here is ten, fifteen, or eighteen per cent profit for the manufacturer, and the balance goes to the Inland Revenue office to help run the country. That is the principle of protection I would apply as a principle, not as a privilege to the manufacturer. That policy would develop industries in this country that would turn out every kind of motor car, motor truck and motor bus, and bring down prices to the consumer for every car and motor truck purchased.

I regretted very much to see the deputation that came here from Oshawa the other day treated in the manner it was by the government. The government told them that they would not be intimidated by numbers. But there is such a thing as the liberty of the subject in this country, which is sometimes treated too lightly. We have the British constitution in this country, and it has been the right of British subjects to deputize right from the days of King John and Magna Charta down to the present day.

I am not an enthusiast on the subject of deputations. There is one place where men and women who want to keep Canada Canadian, can deputize to advantage, and that is the polling booth. The men and women of Oshawa will not fail in their duty in this respect. The returned soldiers and civilian workers and their wives imagined that their presence in Ottawa would produce results. Their presence in Ottawa did produce results. The great result the deputation produced was exhibited in the reply of the right hon. Prime Minister. The principles of Liberalism were laid down in the platform at Winnipeg by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but if any of those planks have been carried out, I have not heard of it. Hon. J. Israel Tarte said that platforms were made to get in on, not to stand on, but, Mr. Speaker, I respect Liberal principles. I believe the pioneer Liberal men of this country were good Liberals, reformers and radicals. I believe they did a great deal for Canada in the days of the Family Compact. On the grounds on which these buildings stand I saw to-day the statues erected to the memory of two of Canada's greatest men, Baldwin and Lafontaine, standing side by side in a peaceful way, as the men to whose memory they are erected stood in the legislature to discuss problems of importance to Upper and Lower Canada with a view to getting some good results for the country.

The deputation from the motor car workers had this great effect that it caused the right hon. gentleman who received them as Prime Minister to repudiate one of the greatest traditions of historic Liberalism. The right hon. gentleman has not a sliver from any plank in that Liberal platform of 1893 to show as proof of his loyalty to the traditions of Liberalism, which abounded in that platform. The right hon. gentleman's association with politics has contributed much to Liberalism going back on the principles of its platform. There is a Liberalism that goes back beyond the Liberal platform of 1893, the Liberalism that rejoiced in that great Liberal tradition of a party that always insisted on the right of petition and the right to send a deputation into the very presence of enthroned tyranny.

I am not in love with the nature of Liberalism as we have it in Canada. As I said before, the word Liberalism no more implies love of liberality in the souls of present day Liberals than the word Progressive implies progess in the souls of Progressives. I am in love with, and never cease to love, the nature of the Liberalism that inspired the freeholders of Buckinghamshire to mount their horses and ride to London to defend John Hampden against the tyranny of Charles Stuart. Macauley has taught us to love the nature of the Liberalism that brought miners from Cornwall on a deputation to defend Trelawney against the tyranny of James II.

The right hon. viceroy of King Robert Forke denied civilian workers and returned soldiers from Oshawa and their wives the opportunity to exercise the great Liberal right of deputation. The right hon. gentleman proceeded to go back on the Liberal principles of his illustrious grandfather, because history tells us that in the dark hour of William Lyon Mackenzie's fortune, a deputation of 1,100 voters in York county insisted on the right to meet the government in Toronto and protest against the injustice inflicted on the grandfather of the present Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman does not believe in deputations. Why? The freeholders who rode from Buckinghamshire to aid John Hampden, the miners who marched from Cornwall to the help of Bishop Trelawney, never had to fear a more legalized tyranny than the tyranny that spoke in the words of the Liberal leader who tried to rebuke British subjects for seeking help in their hour of need. Some of the voters who rode to Toronto to join the deputation to protest against what they called the destruction of their liberties at the hands of the Family Compact had their homes a few miles from Oshawa. It was from Oshawa that the great deputation came to protest against the destruction of their jobs at the hands of the modern family compact of today, that is to say the farmers' compact. The so-called tyranny that rebuked the deputation sent to Toronto on behalf of the right hon. gentleman's grandfather was dubbed with the name "Toryism." The actual tyranny that dared to rebuke a deputation that came to Ottawa in defence of jobs that keep Canadians in their own country wears the so called name of "Liberalism." The right hon. gentleman, not content with his denial that speaks in the great Liberal tradition of deputations, went back on his grandfather's principles when he suggested to the Oshawa deputation that he was not to be intimidated by numbers. That is what the Family Compact informed the York county deputation when they insisted that William Lyon Mackenzie be given the seat to which the deputation and its supporters had elected him. The right hon. gentleman said and suggested that he did not care for numbers. But he does care for numbers when a vote is on, and the numbers that he cares for are the telephone numbers of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), and the honourable array of "comrades" from Winnipeg. It is an outrage that returned soldiers and civilian workers—Canadian men and women—should be rebuked for coming to Ottawa by right hon. gentlemen whose policy is driving the best men in Canada to the United States, because that policy has taken away their chance of a job in the land that they defended at the hazard of their lives.

We have heard something about vested rights in this country. Does the great British doctrine of vested rights exist on the statute books of this country only for the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the trust and combines, the railway corporations and the United States millionaires who come into Canada and grab our resources? These interests have vested rights; on the other hand, labour has absolutely no vested rights in this country. The small savings of these workingmen in Oshawa, their modest furniture and their homes; are not all these things vested rights? Is Canada going to become like British Honduras, where under the constitution labour has no vested rights or privileges whatever? The answer to that question, so far as the present government is concerned, is in the affirmative as was evidenced the other day when an important deputation came down here to interview the Minister of Finance in regard to the reduction in the duties on automobiles. When the government intends to expropriate property belonging to any corporation or company in this country it must serve six months' notice, but here the sole means of livelihood of all these workingmen in Oshawa are ruthlessly taken away without any notice or compensation or investigation, and vested rights are denied to Labour. And parliament now decides that Canadian citizens may not petition it! Fortunately, however, there is one recourse left to labour, and that is the ballot box. Our workingmen can still force the hands of a government that will not give them a fair show, as this government will find out some day.

I want to be absolutely fair. I believe in protection and vested rights not only for the capitalist but for labour as well. I believe in equal rights to all and special privileges to none, but I certainly do object to a one-sided protection that leaves the ordinary workingman at the mercy of capitalists abroad who may throw him out into the street whenever it suits their convenience to do so.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey received a deputation from the women of Oshawa who came and pleaded so that they might save their husbands' jobs. The men for whom they interceded are labouring men. They have the same vested rights as the capitalist, the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and the railway corporations that are flourishing like the green bay tree. But their vested rights can be taken away from them. They can be deprived of their homes, and their goods and chattels pitched into the streets. The hon. member for Southeast Grey told these women—I am not in a position to quote the hon. member's exact words, but in effect this is what she said—"go home and try it for a year; see how your husbands get along without jobs; come back later and tell us about it." The hon. member for Southeast Grey holds a seat in parliament thanks to the Conservative men and women who went to the polls on election day and forgot partyism in their votes on behalf of a professed independent who never forgets partyism for five minutes in her vote. He who wrote about man's inhumanity to man should have had a successor with that Oshawa deputation, and he might have found a new theme for tears in the truth disclosed in woman's answer to woman. The answer that the hon. member for Southeast Grey offered to those women from Oshawa was a hardhearted performance, disclosing a sad lack of knowledge and a sadder lack of sympathy with the problems of women who are anxious about their husbands' jobs and with good reason. The trouble is that the anxiety of these men and women, like the anxiety of the Conservative men and women in Southeast Grey, was too long delayed. The Conservative men and women of Southeast Grey are not free traders. They are not anxious to make Ontario a land of empty pay envelopes, and to send the sons and daughters of Ontario to seek homes in Michigan and pay envelopes in Detroit. The hon. member for Southeast Grey seems anxious to produce that position, but the Conservatives who sent her to Ottawa do not share that anxiety. The Conservative men and women of Southeast Grey were fooled when they voted for the free trade fanaticism, the Liberal-first bigotry of the hon. member for the constituency. They imagined that they were voting for a new kind of Independent, instead of voting for the same kind of Grit.

The men and women of Oshawa might not have had to come here on a deputation if they had not given their support to the Toronto Star in its campaign for the destruction of Canadian towns and Canadian tariff. Oshawa depends for life on the motor industry. Oshawa has supported the Toronto Star, and in every election the Star and Hon. W. E. Raney have vied with the de facto prime minister of this country, the successor to the Hon. T. A. Crerar, and his "assistant prime minister" from Winnipeg, in their policy of preaching a doctrine of hatred for the factory under the Union Jack and of love for the country under the stars and stripes. That is the sad feature of this whole attempt to bring about the wreck and ruin of the very foundations of Canada's industrial life.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey suggested that the motor industry would get along all right. All the motor industry needed was three years' trial of this tariff; all the women from Oshawa needed was jobs for their husbands. This tariff degrades Canada and puts Canada out of the running for the prizes for industrial growth. It is a sad thing that a parliament at Ottawa should isolate Canada, not only from the possibilities of growth but from the chances of continued existence in one of the world's great industries, present and future, the motor industry. There is not an hon. member in this House who would put a dollar in the extension of an old industry or in the establishment of a new industry in a country that supports the doctrines of the Toronto Star and the Hon. W. E. Raneys, Hon. T. A. Crerars, and all branches of their following in this House. These doctrines teach the people to believe, and have too largely succeeded in making the people believe, that a factory in Canada is a source of plunder to the consumers of Canada, and that a factory in the United States is a source of deliverance to the people of Canada; that the manufacturer who employs aliens in an alien land is a benefactor of Canada, and that the manufacturer who employs British subjects in a British land is the oppressor of Canada.

This tariff iniquity puts the United States in the most favoured nation position as against Canada. The Canadian who wants to start an industry can go to the United States and manufacture for two markets. If the Canadian stays in Canada the Canadian will not even be given a fair chance for one market. The people of Oshawa and the people of Toronto have supported such features as hatred of Canadian industry and love of American industry as the Toronto Star, Hon. W. E. Raney and their followers or dupes in this House. Oshawa may be greatly comforted by the Toronto Star's interview in which Henry Ford says he likes to see the faces of the Canadian workmen. The Toronto Star, and the bosses of this government here at Ottawa compel Canadian workmen to leave this country. The enemies of Canada never saw the backs of the returned soldiers who are being driven out of Canada by this tariff. This government are permitting their own fellow countrymen to be driven from the land they love to the land in which they are forced to seek a living. I have just this to say to the people of Oshawa who have been reading the Star and the people of Toronto who have been reading the Star and thereby helping the Star to wreck Oshawa: If the Toronto Star were published in Detroit and the United States had a government as bad as Canada's government, that government might introduce a policy to close factories in Michigan and open factories in Ontario. If a paper published in Detroit, as the Toronto Star is published in Toronto, dared to quote a Canadian manufacturer, as the Toronto Star quotes a Yankee manufacturer, in support of a policy that drove American citizens from Detroit to seek a living in Toronto, as the Toronto Star's policy is driving British subjects to seek a living in Detroit, what would happen? The Toronto Star would cease publication, either because support was withdrawn by the merchants whose custom was being driven from Toronto, or because there would not be enough policemen in Detroit to protect the Star's place of publication against the women who sought a reckoning with the sheet that had served as champion of a policy that took the jobs away from their husbands and drove them into a foreign land.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that in the face of the economic ills of this country to-day, a condition attributable to the ill-advised policies of the Liberal party, the government has failed to bring down in the budget such a tariff as would cure those ills and safeguard the industries of Canada, including the great agricultural industry.

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West): Since the beginning of the present debate, Mr. Speaker, I have listened to many speeches, and I find that we are now in the very same situation as that in which we have found ourselves for several days. One member will advance the views of his own party, and another will answer and represent the views of the party to which he belongs. The speech just delivered by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) does not differ from other speeches we have heard, except to the extent that he was possibly more prolific, and if I should attempt to follow him in all the details of his address it would probably take me as long as it took him, namely about two hours and a half. The hon. member dealt with many subjects, going from doctors to coal mines, from coal mines to lawyers and other professional men, and so on, in such a way that it would be impossible for me to answer him in a short time. I hope, however, in the course of my remarks to express in a general way my own views in the matter and generally to answer what he said during the course of his speech.

My remarks will be very brief, and they would be much shorter were it not for the fact that I have a few quotations to make in respect to the general situation, and especially with reference to railway conditions affecting the city of Quebec, coupled with Maritime rights; for to my mind these two are one and the same.

I am not in the habit of paying useless compliments to anyone, and I do not intend to do so on the present occasion. However, we have to face the proposals as presented by the government in the budget and either accept or reject them.

Mr. BENNETT: Without changes?

Mr. PARENT: They might come with time. After considering the whole situation and studying it to the best of my ability, I have come to the conclusion that it is a good budget. It reflects prosperity; it indicates that we have a good honest administration, and on the whole I think it should be accepted. I propose to vote for it on this ground, with a few reservations which I am going to make as I proceed.

To sum up the situation, I think as a fair criterion of the manner in which the budget has been received by the people generally, we may judge by the way it has been accepted by the press of the country. Of course it would not be correct to judge by the utterances of partisan newspapers on either side; we must look to the statements in the newspapers which are not in any way partisan, and from such an expression of views we may be able to form an opinion that is worth something. I have in mind an article published recently by such a high authority as the Bank of Montreal, on April 22, under the caption, "Business Summary." It is a brief résumé of information received by that bank from its branches throughout Canada and from its offices abroad; therefore I think it is fair that I should quote it. The article reads:

> The important event of the month as affecting trade and commerce was the presentation of his annual budget by the Minister of Finance. It cannot yet be definitely determined with preciseness the results of the changes made in tariff and taxation. The hon. Mr. Robb estimates from his proposals a reduction of $25,000,000 annually in taxation; the pre-war postage rate of 2 cents having been restored; a slight enlargement of the list of articles exempt from sales tax made; the stamp tax on receipts abolished and income taxes in many instances cut down in rate as well as simplified in character of levy. The income tax rate upon corporations and joint stock companies is reduced from 10 per cent to 9 per cent and all surtaxes done away with. In respect of customs duties, the important change is the reduction of rates upon motor vehicles. In the case of passenger cars valued at retail at not more than $1,200, the reduction is from 35 per cent to 20 per cent under the general tariff, and in the case of all other motor vehicles from 35 per cent to 27½ per cent, with corresponding reductions in the case of cars entitled to entry under the preferential tariff. Another interesting announcement is that after January 1, 1927, goods to be entitled to entry under the preferential tariff must be imported direct from a British country into a sea or river port of Canada, the purpose of this enactment being to build up Canadian ports.
> The Finance minister was able to present a favourable balance sheet in respect of Dominion finances and to point to an unusually large expansion of foreign commerce during the recently ended fiscal year. There was a surplus of revenue over expenditure of nearly $34,000,000 in the year's operations, a reduction of net debt of $22,353,000, and a marked increase in the operating profits of the Canadian National Railways, these having amounted to $30,443,000 in the calendar year of 1925 or about $13,000,000 more than in the preceding year.

The foreign trade of Canada continues to mount both in volume and value. In the year ended March 31, this commerce reached the very considerable sum of $2,258,500,000, of which $1,330,000,000 was made up of exports and $927,000,000 of imports, the favourable balance thus being $402,695,000. So large a credit in the external trade of the year has been a potential factor in restoring Canadian currency to par.

Domestic business has not presented any novel factors during the current month, but the condition remains more satisfactory than in recent years and the spirit of confidence in the future appears to grow. Commodity prices are fairly steady and would appear to have been pegged about 60 per cent over a pre-war average, with inevitable fluctuation in price of one or other commodity. Railway car loadings and railway earnings are in excess of last year. Business mortality in the first quarter of 1926 was substantially less than in the corresponding quarter of the previous year, the number of failures declining from 669 to 593, with aggregate liabilities down from $10,683,000 to $7,566,000.

The estimated quantity of Canadian wheat remaining in Canada at April 1st was 161,376,000 bushels or 40,000,000 bushels greater than on the corresponding date in 1925, which fact gives promise of an active shipping season, and continued expansion of export trade. Building operations the Dominion over are much in excess of last year. It is too early in the season to forecast agricultural production but the acreage to be sown in the three western provinces this year will be practically the same as last. Live stock has wintered well and expectation is that the steady growth in the cattle export trade since the removal of the British embargo will not be interrupted. Cold weather has somewhat delayed farming operations in the eastern provinces. Immigration gives indication of reaching a larger volume than for a considerable time past. Taken as a whole, it can be said that the bright spots in the business situation greatly predominate.

The article is fair to all, and covers every one of the provinces. Speaking of Quebec, it uses these words:

Quebec—Winter logging operations, which have been generally on a reduced scale, are finished and logs are ready for the drive. The lumber market remains quiet, Pacific coast stocks dominating the situation. The price and demand for pulpwood continues to hold up well and it is anticipated that the increased production in newsprint this year will easily be absorbed. There has not been any appreciable change in the price of staple commodities, apart from butter and eggs, which show seasonal declines, and potato prices, which are unusually strong. Trade, both wholesale and retail, has been adversely affected by the lateness of spring. The manufacturing situation indicates improvement. Orders generally are in excess of last year and a number of plants formerly only partially operating are now running on full time. Collections are moderately satisfactory.

What about Ontario?

Ontario.—Wholesale houses are enjoying a slightly improved volume of trade compared with last year. Retail sales of seasonable Easter goods, however, were retarded by inclement weather. Collections are being satisfactorily met. Work on the land will commence a fortnight later than a year ago. There is an abundance of moisture, fall wheat has wintered well, and conditions from the agricultural viewpoint are propitious. Farmers' dispersal sales are marked by good attendance and good prices, and milch cows are in special demand. Industry as a whole is more active. Pulp and paper companies continue to produce at capacity. Agricultural implement manufacturers are busy, and finished steel companies are well employed. Recent reductions in the tariff on motor cars make it necessary for manufacturers to submit the changes embodied in the budget to an intensive study before they are able to gauge the full effects. With the advent of open weather, activity in the northern mining camps is increasing.

This article gives a fairly comprehensive view of the situation. It contains similar paragraphs in regard to the prairie provinces, the Maritime provinces and British Columbia, showing that conditions to-day under the present government are very good.

Mr. FAFARD: What is the date of the report?

Mr. PARENT: April 22, 1926, published by the Bank of Montreal.

That paper was published in Montreal. I tried to find one published in another province, in a city—Toronto—which is probably the business rival of Montreal. This is what the Monetary Times has to say under date April 23, one day after the publication of the article which I have just quoted:

1926 Budget Is Popular. Is It Wise?

That the tax changes proposed by the Dominion government are popular is quite evident. Whether they are sound depends upon future developments.

The country demanded a reduction in taxes, and it has got it. Every one has felt the pinch of Dominion government taxation, and the immediate effect of the changes is a saving to nearly every one. The government could scarcely have taken a more popular course. The income tax is of direct interest to a large proportion of the thinking citizens of Canada, and the reductions mean a great saving to the middle classes on the support of which any party in this country depends. The repeal of the stamp tax on receipts, the return to penny postage and the reductions in the sales tax are also of widespread interest.

While there promises to be some debate about the income tax, the one important snag in the programme seems to be the reductions in automobile duties. The other tariff changes are by no means negligible, but apparently only one vital spot in industry has been touched. We are being told that the industry cannot subsist with only 20 per cent protection It is difficult to believe that in an industry of such proportions, where even in Canada benefits of large scale operations can be realized, it is not possible to do business here with this margin. But some of the statements issued by manufacturers are quite definite, and while sales should be enlarged through the reductions in prices there is no doubt but that the volume of production in Canada will be lower. It is evident that automobile duties are a crucial point in the government's policy, and it will have to see its proposals through or forever hold its peace on tariff reduction.

The serious aspect is that of national revenue. Tax reduction at the present time does not augur well for tax reduction in the future. It is only through a steady surplus of revenue over expenditure that we can reduce debt, strengthen our national balance sheet and reduce taxes with safety later on. With revenue keeping up, expenditure cut down, and the National railways doing better, the government had just got into a comfortable position. But the contest between the parties is so keen at the present time that the government has evidently felt the necessity of immediately capitalizing its savings. The 1926 budget is one which will probably be of great political import, it certainly is going to be a weighty factor in our national finances.

I cannot be accused of having quoted any papers with partisan views. I have quoted two of the most serious publications that have dealt with the situation.

Coming to the details mentioned in these articles, I have no doubt that the people of Canada will be satisfied with the news that a reduction of taxation to the extent of $25,000,000 will be spread over the country generally. The reduction in the postal rate, bringing us back to the days of Sir William Mulock, brings pleasant memories to the Liberals who were in the House at that time. The reduction then made was so well accepted that I have no doubt the present reduction will be popular and well received throughout the Dominion. The stamp tax on receipts was an annoying tax for everyone, from the humblest to the highest, and its abolition will no doubt be appreciated by the community at large.

The changes in the income tax law should perhaps be the subject of some more lengthy remarks. I fully realize that the men who have been working on this particular question have given it a good deal of attention and study. At the same time, even the best men that Canada can produce may not have at first seen all the trouble that such a tax involves, and I intend to put before the government for further study these few considerations. Let us take the case of a close corporation where a man has been spending ten or fifteen years of his life in establishing an industry. He may have been working under a company name, although the owner of the whole business. What is the result under the tax as proposed in the budget? That man will be taxed first nine per cent on the income of the company; that is a reduction of one per cent from what it was previously. On his own income or dividend from the operation of the company he will be taxed a second time. Perhaps he and two or three of his companions who have invested money in that company will be in receipt of dividends therefrom; and in that case they will be taxed a further sum on that amount. I do not think the government had in view the taxing of a person twice under those conditions, as the present budget proposes. That is a point to which I wanted to draw the attention of the government, because it touches more people than one might think at first sight. I can understand that the law might apply with good results to many companies listed on the stock exchange where a man can buy and sell without caring whether he gets a dividend or not, but I hardly think it is fair for a man who has invested his money in a company which he built up himself should be taxed twice when others are taxed only once.

Mr. GOTT: In view of those statements does the hon. gentleman propose to support the budget?

Mr. PARENT: The hon. member can wait until I vote and then he will find out. Take the case of a mining company: every time you take anything out of the mine the capital is reduced. Under the law as it stands an allowance is made for depreciation by reason of the fact that in operating the mine you draw upon your capital. If you happen to be part owner of the mine the company first pays the income tax, and as shareholder or part owner you must also pay, so that whereas you are given consideration for depreciation only once you must pay the tax twice. I am putting these facts before the House simply to point out to the government that it is always rather dangerous to make changes in tariff matters. If we can maintain a certain stability I think it will be better for all concerned. I have no doubt that the government is keeping this in mind and that in the creation of the tariff board it means to protect industry in Canada to a reasonable extent, without enabling fictitious industries to exist at the expense of the consuming public.

The budget refers to the fact that the Canadian National Railways are this year submitting a satisfactory report which discloses some $30,000,000 to the good after operating expenses have been taken into account. I do not intend to discuss the railway situation in detail but I want to refer to the pledges given by previous governments to the city from which I come in regard to the Transcontinental railway and its terminal. May I in passing offer my hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) upon the motion which he submitted to the House the other day? That motion was in the interests of the Dominion as a whole and particularly of the ports of Quebec, Halifax and St. John. In my opinion the surplus money in the hands of the Canadian National Railways could, if properly spent, provide Quebec with a suitable terminal. I dislike very much going back to the election of 1904 and discussing the campaign that was fought then. The whole issue was the construction of the Transcontinental railway. Two companies were trying to secure the right to build a line from the Atlantic to the Pacific, one company being known as the Transcona and the other the Transcontinental. The Transcontinental was the one whose terms Sir Wilfrid Laurier accepted, and the whole question was thoroughly discussed in the session of 1903, when all the facts were clearly laid before the Canadian people. It was stated over and over again in 1903 that the main purpose of constructing that line was to transport the grain of the western provinces through Canadian territory to the Canadian ports of Quebec, Halifax and St. John. No considerable opposition was offered at the time, but of course in a matter of this kind, as in any similar matter, the moment some people saw that there was a possibility of their own interests being affected, politics was introduced, with the result that criticism was indulged in throughout the country. This criticism went on for a few years while the construction work was in progress, until the election of 1908, when the issue was again the wisdom or unwisdom of constructing the Transcontinental railway. In that election the people of Canada declared it to be their will that this railway should be built for the purpose, as had always been understood, of transporting the grain of the west through Canadian territory to the ports I have mentioned. Then came the election of 1911 when unfortunately there was a change of government. There were those who could not see eye to eye with Sir Wilfrid Laurier and who condemned the undertaking. They uesd every possible means at their disposal to prevent the construction of that line, and if there is one city in Canada which more than any other resented the stand which was then taken by the opponents of this railway it was the city which I have the honour to represent, the city of Quebec. Anyone who looks down from the Chateau Frontenac to-day upon the present station, which was put up in place of one that should have cost in the neighbourhood of $800,000, cannot help feeling that this unsightly structure is nothing if not an insult to a government which had the courage to carry through so stupendous an undertaking as the Transcontinental railway. Quebec was induced, on the strength of promises solemnly given that city, to tear down a building valued at some $250,000 and to hand over to the Dominion of Canada a site worth $2,000,000 for the purpose of erecting thereon a station which was to cost, as I have said, about $800,000. What did the city get as a matter of fact? A building that is not worth $20,000 and which moreover is so ugly that in my opinion the Canadian National Railways would be doing the people of Quebec, and for that matter of the Dominion, a real service by tearing it down.

Mr. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend mean the depot?

Mr. PARENT: I am not referring to the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the House will bear with me a short while, I desire to put on record some of the details of this matter. I have here the deed entered into between the city of Quebec and the Transcontinental railway, and I may observe that a memorandum in respect to this matter was submitted by the city of Quebec to the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) when he was prime minister. Here is an extract from the preamble to the contract of 1910:

> Considering that for the useful and effective operation of the said (Transcontinental) railway, the commission intends to build one or several branches of the said railway from the great bridge now building on the river St. Lawrence to connect with the harbour and in the city of Quebec, to receive or expedite by waterways the general traffic of the said railroad or other railroads, and that for the said purpose railway tracks will have to be laid along the river St. Lawrence, in the said Champlain ward, in order to utilize the wharves, docks, buildings, elevators and other accessories, already built or to be built later.
> Considering that for the purposes above mentioned, the commission is going to build in the said Champlain ward, a station, sheds, warehouses for merchandise, workshops, and other buildings, and to acquire for that purpose lands and rights of way, necessary for the road and for the construction of said buildings.

Here now follows a summary of the engagements undertaken by the government:

> 1. The commission undertakes to spend a sum of at least two millions of dollars (apart from the cost of the land to be purchased or expropriated for the railway) to build on the said land or in the vicinity thereof a station, sheds, warehouses, workshops, et cetera. Said workshops to be the most considerable of the Transcontinental railway in the province of Quebec;

Everyone understands, Mr. Speaker, that certain of these works had to be delayed on account of the war period, and the people of the city of Quebec realized quite well that during that period immense works of importance could not be proceeded with. But now, if the railways can find money elsewhere to do work similar to this, I think it would be in their interests to carry out those pledges already given.

It has been stated that the province of Quebec as a whole was very much against the nationalization of railways. Part of this statement is true and part of it has no foundation of truth whatever. As a matter of fact it has always been an open question in the province of Quebec as elsewhere, but certain persons who were against the nationalization of railways seem to have arrived at other conclusions, and I am glad to be able to read an article from L'Action Sociale Catholique of May 3 of this year:

(Translation): According to the last Dominion budget as well as to the monthly reports of the Canadian National Railway Board, our State railways are in a better financial situation. We are led to hope that before long the while elephant will no more be a drag on the country's Treasury.

No one will, for a moment, doubt that the greatest share in this success belongs to Sir Henry Thornton. He placed at the disposal of our National Railways his great ability, a training very seldom encountered, a great knowledge of railway matters, an unquestionable good will.

And his efforts have been crowned by success. Those who selected him had a very happy thought. There is no doubt about it.

If Sir Henry Thornton has really endeavoured to obtain the co-operation of the Canadian people, as he would be expected to do so as to attain success, we must say that this co-operation was not denied to him.

The French Canadian people were opposed to State ownership of railways known, to-day, by the name of Canadian National Railways, as they would be opposed to-morrow to any scheme of State ownership which would include the Canadian Pacific Railway. They have no faith in the efficiency of such a system, they are rather convinced of its dangers. Experience, pointing out, to the little success, generally of State ownership undertakings, sides with them.

They were therefore opposed to State ownership. This State ownership for reasons of irretrievable errors or otherwise was decided upon anyway. It has been for the last few years an accomplished fact.

We possess certain qualifications not understood by a great number of Canadians of different origin. Among them there is one which urges us on to begin a contest long before the others because we never lose sight of the principles upon which everything rests. Others who think themselves more practical, do not bother much about these principles; facts control their actions. And as facts always proceed from applied principles, often, if they make a move, it is only long after us.

In any case, State ownership having been agreed upon, there either remained for us to make the best of it or let the country go into bankruptcy. We unhesitatingly put our shoulder to the wheel, and this the more willingly because of the great ability of the man appointed as head of the National Railways.

The French Canadians gave to the Board of National Railways their full support, they put their trust in its President. Their efforts were of some account in the improvement obtained; no doubt should exist in that connection in the minds of the members of the National Railway Board.

We therefore have reason to expect that our co-operation will be appreciated in a still more practical way, and that if they are willing to accept our "lending a hand" at the bottom of the ladder, we shall expect also, when the opportunity presents itself to co-operate in the higher spheres.

The Canadian National railways, in 1924, had a staff of 101 officers. Out of that number, there are but two French Canadians. Moreover, if the latter hold positions of some importance, we have yet no one to represent us on the Board of Directors. Our numerical importance, the unhesitating co-operation we lend in the improvement of our National railways, is deserving of better treatment.

It is not a question of removals or of asking for dismissals of officials. The higher officials of the National Railways are placed there, no doubt, owing to their personal merits and the eminent services they render. Moreover, we do not stoop to such means.

We simply ask that when the next vacancy occurs—we have no idea when—in the Board of the C.N.R., it be filled by a representative of the French Canadian element. As no indications exist that such a thing may happen to-day or to-morrow, we have no name to suggest. If it is the intention to act fairly towards us to-morrow, it is easy to start paving the way immediately.

This is the request we address to Sir Henry Thornton. Perhaps, the thing has already been done, we have no knowledge of it. If not, it is more than time to think of it.

We would feel wounded if we were to be kept out forever from the higher spheres of the C.N.R. Board of directors.

We have a right to be there and we are able to fill the position.

With the exception of a few corrections this article represents my views very well, but the article is not well informed when it states that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways has no French Canadian representative. For the information of this newspaper I may say that I believe both Mr. Decary and Colonel Talbot, of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, are French Canadians. But the remarks of this article might be amplified, and I think in fairness to my compatriots I may fairly say without fear of contradiction that, since the French Canadians represent about one quarter of the total population of Canada, the number of representatives in various offices and positions on the Canadian National Railways does not represent a fair proportion. I suggest to the government that in considering future appointments, qualified French Canadians—and we have many such—be considered. I might go further, Mr. Speaker, and apply the same remarks to the civil service. I was looking over the telephone book of the House of Commons the other day, comprising all the departments; I take it for granted that those who have telephones for their own use are those who have acquired the highest positions. Take the whole telephone book; look it over from beginning to end and see how many French names are contained therein; then compare that proportion with the population of Canada. I do not say this to raise any question of prejudice: that never entered my mind, and I hope never will.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that on the whole I am quite satisfied with the proposals as presented by the government to-day, and I shall have no hesitation at all in supporting the budget. It is indeed a fact that certain industries may suffer for the present. The automobile industry may suffer temporarily, but if we consider the situation in a broad-minded way; if we realize that these industries have been over-capitalized —though it is possible that the younger men who are in charge of the industry to-day may find it harder to make that capital valuable than those who started the industry—when we take into consideration the fact that Canada is rapidly increasing in prosperity and that we are receiving immigrants in largely increasing numbers, we believe, and we think we are right in our contention, that in a short time these younger men in charge to-day, with their courage and their optimism, will find that their industries are doing better perhaps than they have ever done before. In a word, to sum up, circumstances are such that the budget means co-operation of the west with the east, Ontario being the connecting link to sell its manufactured products from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. M. J. MALONEY (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I am glad indeed of this opportunity to say a word of very hearty congratulation to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) for the excellent manner in which he presented his budget speech of some three weeks ago. Delivered with all the urbanity which is so characteristic of the hon. minister, his speech was marked by brevity and clarity to an extent that made it indeed a treat to hear. To listen to such a clear and concise presentation was indeed a treat to me, and one which I shall long remember. Those of us who have not been in this House before, but who have followed, from without, public doings and parliamentary procedure, will remember well the budget speeches of former days which occupied, not less than an hour, as did the present one, but often two, three, four or even five hours. The present distinguished Minister of Finance has set an example to the members of this House, an example which in the interest of time and the despatch of public business should be scrupulously followed. I have always felt that apart from the leaders of the parties, the ministers, and those directly interested in some particular matter of importance, the speeches of individual members should be curtailed, for the result would be a contraction of the altogether too prolonged sessions of this House of Commons.

On motion of Mr. Maloney the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Motherwell the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

Monday, May 10, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

DEATH OF QUEEN ALEXANDRA

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following message from the secretary of His Excellency the Governor General:

Ottawa, 6th May, 1926.

Sir,—I am desired by His Excellency the Governor General to inform you that the address of the Senate and House of Commons expressing their profound regret and deep sorrow at the death of Her Majesty the Queen Mother was duly laid at the foot of the throne. His Majesty the King was profoundly gratified at its terms and commanded that his most sincere thanks should be communicated to the members of the Senate and House of Commons for the sympathy expressed with him and with the royal family in their sad loss.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

A. F. SLADEN,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons, Ottawa.

MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE

Mr. FRED STORK (Skeena) moved that the first report of the select standing committee on Marine and Fisheries be concurred in.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. member please explain? What are we concurring in?

Mr. STORK: The printing of the evidence.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Does this cover the printing of the evidence?

Mr. STEVENS: That is what the chairman says.

Mr. ROBB: I would like to draw attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that during the last session some hon. members advised doing away with Hansard in committee of the Whole House, as a method of economy. It would now appear that we are gradually enlarging Hansard, and are not only having it in the House, but in the committees as well.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that under the rules of the House all such motions are supposed to go to the committee on Printing, there to be dealt with. I have noticed this session that in perhaps five or six instances the rule has been suspended and printing has been authorized, but I think if the minister would allow the motion to go to the Printing committee that would solve his difficulty.

Mr. STORK: Let the motion stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ASCENSION DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With the consent of the House I should like to move the following resolution, of which unfortunately I have not given notice:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, May 12, it stand adjourned until Friday, May 14.

I may say that it has been the custom in previous years for the House to adjourn over Ascension Day.

Motion agreed to.

THE DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 97, to amend The Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This amendment is for the purpose of eliminating from the forest reserves of northern Saskatchewan some lands that have been found fit for agriculture. When the bill was put through it included more land of a good agricultural character than was anticipated, and it is now desired to withdraw that land. The amendment also provides for the addition of some land to one or two of the forest reserves in Manitoba.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DUMPING DUTY—AUSTRALIAN BUTTER AND FRUIT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (Norfolk-Elgin): I notice the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) in his seat, and I would like to renew the question which I asked on Friday last. It is reported in the press that owing to the heavy importations of butter and certain fruits from Australia the government have found it necessary to make use of the Dumping Act and enforce a duty of 6 cents per pound against these products. Is that report correct?

Hon. G. H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs): This matter was brought to my attention only this morning, and inquiries are being made at present by officials of the department. I will have a definite answer for my hon. friend to-morrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister would go a bit further and find out whether or not any order has been made. According to some papers not only has an order been made, but it is to apply to past transactions, going back to the first of the year.

Mr. BOIVIN: No order has been made by the department, but no order by the department is necessary for the application of the dumping clause. The local collector has the right to apply the dumping clause without any order from the department.

CHANGES IN THE BUDGET

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, last week upon two or three occasions I was asked if there were any changes to be made in the budget when we got into committee. The number of questions asked induced me to look up previous budgets presented, and by the way, I may say to my hon. and genial friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) that I read over carefully his budget of 1920, and I can assure him now that the changes which I shall propose will not exceed those that he made in his first budget of 1920.

So far as the budget proposals regarding automobile duties are concerned, which seem to interest hon. gentlemen particularly, the tariff of 27½ per cent and 20 per cent remains; there will be no changes. There may be in committee the addition of some words to clarify the situation for administrative purposes, but I can assure my hon. friends again that there will be no change in the principle.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Now that my hon. friend is on that question, would he kindly tell us whether there will be changes in the sales tax having regard to automobiles, or changes in the luxury tax so-called, which is in effect an additional tax, or changes as to rebates, or any changes in the duties on the parts used.

Mr. ROBB: As I said before, there will be no general changes as to parts. There will be some changes made in the language defining the parts, to make the position of the parts men absolutely safe. As regards the sales tax there will be no change whatever. I have been urged from time to time to make changes in the excise tax, and it has been represented to me that such changes would result in the machines being sold at a lower price to the Canadian public, but I have not yet been convinced that that is in the public interest.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As to the question of departmental regulation, does that cover questions of valuation?

Mr. ROBB: Oh, no.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether there will be any change made in the customs regulation with regard to the admission of American magazines?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech of my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken), and I am bound to say that I said to some one near me at the time that the hon. gentleman had made out a good case from his point of view, but I am not prepared to say that there will be any changes in that regard.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

Bill No. 20, respecting the Pacific Coast Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Clark.

GRAND ORANGE LODGE OF BRITISH AMERICA

The House in committee on Bill No. 92, respecting the Grand Orange Lodge of British America—Mr. Hocken—Mr. Duff in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Section 1, paragraph (e) repealed.

The CHAIRMAN: I might point out that subsection 2 on page 2 should be a separate clause instead of a subsection.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend is not really anxious to press this bill at the moment, but would allow it to stand until the chairman of the committee is present, I would be obliged to him. Unfortunately, the chairman is not present, but if there is any urgency about this bill, I will not press my request. If the hon. gentleman could let the bill stand until the chairman of the committee is in his seat, I would try and accommodate him in getting it through as soon as possible.

Mr. HOCKEN: I see no objection to that, Mr. Chairman. The bill is very simple. It went through the committee without any objection from any source. It is simply expanding the powers of the order respecting insurance, the powers the order has now having been granted thirty-six years ago. Since then insurance has broadened very considerably. As a matter of fact, this is simply bringing the insurance branch of the order up to date. I am quite satisfied, however, to wait until the chairman of the committee is present.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

Mr. CAMPBELL:

1. Is it the intention of the Civil Service Commission to take any action in connection with the grievance of those civil servants who were in 2B of the second division at the time the Classification Act of 1918 was applied, and who by the application of this act were prevented from reaching the maximum of their class, $2,100 per annum?

2. What action, if any, has the Civil Service Commission taken in respect to the report forwarded some time ago in connection with this grievance, by the Civil Service Association?

3. Is it the intention of the commission to make such recommendations in the upper revision of salaries that would tend to remove this grievance, to at least some extent?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. The question has been given consideration.

3. No. The request of the Civil Service Association was, in the opinion of the Civil Service Commissioners, fully taken care of by the Civil Service Act, 1918, as amended, and by subsequent reclassification. Under the Civil Service Act, 1918, as amended, positions were to be classified according to the duties and responsibilities exercised by the employee, but the grading of the employee prior to the reclassification was retained by the employee if the compensation of the class in which he was placed by reclassification was lower than his previous grading. In the opinion of the commissioners the Civil Service Act of 1918, as amended, did not contemplate any extension of the rights of an employee beyond the grade in which he was placed prior to reclassification.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—SALES OF LAND BY COL. MURRAY AND H. H. MOSS

Mr. BROWN:

1. What quarter sections or other parcels of land in Manitoba were sold to the Soldier Settlement Board by Colonel F. J. Murray?

2. When was each of such quarter sections or other parcels of land acquired by the vendor and when in each case was it sold to the board?

3. At what price did Colonel Murray acquire each of the said quarter sections or other parcels of land and what in each case was the price paid by the board?

4. What are the names of the solicitors who acted for the vendor in each of these sales to the board?

5. Did Colonel F. J. Murray ever draw a military pension? If so, is he still drawing it?

6. What quarter sections or other parcels of land in Manitoba were sold to the Soldier Settlement Board by Mr. H. H. Moss?

7. When was each of such quarter sections or other parcels of land acquired by the vendor and when in each case was it sold to the board?

8. At what price did Mr. H. H. Moss acquire each of the said quarter sections or other parcels of land and what in each case was the price paid by the board?

9. What are the names of the solicitors who acted for the vendor in each of these sales?

E. F. BEAUDRY

Mr. PERRAS:

1. Was E. F. Beaudry employed at the Printing Bureau in 1920?

2. If so, for how many years previous to 1920?

3. What was his occupation?

4. Was he a public servant?

5. Did he receive the bonus?

6. Is he still employed at the bureau? If not, when was he retired?

7. Does he receive a pension? If not why?

8. How are employees at the bureau retired since 1920?

Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Yes.

2. Thirty years, 4 months and 12 days previous to 1920. Appointed August 19, 1889.

3. Editor of Printing Copy.

4. Answered by Nos. 1 and 3.

5. Yes—1918-19, $250; 1919-20, $324; 1920-21, $199.50 to date of retirement.

6. (a) No. (b) November 16, 1920.

7. (a) No.

(b) Mr. Beaudry was, during the reorganization of the Government Printing Bureau carried out by the Civil Service Commision, retired on November 16, 1920, by Order in Council No. P.C. 2738, November 12, 1920, and under the provisions of Order in Council No. P.C. 2146, October 22, 1919, he was granted 2 months' salary and bonus in lieu of notice and an annual retiring allowance of $324.53 for a period of 5 years and 2 months beginning January 16, 1921. The allowance was based on his average salary and bonus of the last three years of service, and the duration of allowance was based on two months for each year of service. Mr. Beaudry's allowance expired on March 15, 1926.

8. Subsequently to 1920 and until October 31, 1924, all employees were under the provisions of the Public Service Retirement Act. On July 19, 1924, permanent civil servants in receipt of a stated annual salary passed under the provisions of the superannuation Act, Chap. 69, 14-15 George V or continued under the provisions of Chap. 17, R.S. 1906—An Act respecting the Superannuation and Retirement of persons employed in the Civil Service of Canada. There is no provision by law with respect to the retirement of employees other than civil servants.

APPOINTMENTS TO CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. HOCKEN:

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

GOVERNMENT MOTOR CARS AND TRUCKS—PURCHASES

Mr. DAVIS:

1. How many motor cars or trucks have been purchased by the government, throughout the Dominion of Canada, during the months of January, February, March, and up to April 16, of the year 1926?

2. From whom were they purchased, and what departments used said cars?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Stand as an order for return.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I point out to my right hon. friend that the government can scarcely have been purchasing motor cars on such a lavish scale for only four months of the present year that a long return is required to contain the particulars.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will notice the question, it asks for particulars of cars purchased by all the departments. This of necessity means communicating with the different departments first, and that may take a little time. The government would prefer to answer the question by bringing down a return.

IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. DOUCET:

1. What has been the total imports from the United States, in the last twelve years?

2. What has been the total imports of coal registered, both bituminous and anthracite, from the United States, in the last three years?

3. What has been the total imports of iron from the United States, in the last three years?

4. What has been the total imports, during the same period, of other manufactured products from the United States, which could have been manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ROBB: Return tabled forthwith.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INDIAN AGENT AT CARDSTON

On the order:

Mr. DAVIS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the department and any persons whomsoever, with regard to the suspension of Indian Agent Faunt of the Blood Indian reserve at Cardston. Also a copy of the report sent to the department by Inspector Christensen of Regina in this connection.

Hon. Mr. STEWART: The conduct of the Indian Agent on the Blood Indian reserve is now being investigated. I would much prefer that my hon. friend would allow his motion to stand rather than that I should bring down the papers at the present moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

FREIGHT RATES TO AND FROM PACIFIC COAST

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, applications or memorandums and official documents of all kinds, having reference to reduction, equalization or otherwise dealing with the freight rates to and from the Pacific coast and passing between the government of British Columbia or the Hon. John Oliver, Premier of British Columbia, or any person acting on behalf of the said government on the one hand and the Prime Minister, the Minister of Railways or any member of the government or any officer of the government since April 1, 1925, together with a copy of all orders in council passed since the said date, and having reference to the said subject.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, May 7, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. M. J. MALONEY (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, just previous to the adjournment of the House on Friday night I had offered to the Minister of Finance my very sincere congratulations on the manner in which he had delivered the budget speech some three weeks previously. It was with a great deal of pleasure that I was able to do this. I must confess to him to-day, however, that it is with equal sorrow I find myself not able to follow him into the promised land to which the singularly wonderful budget delivered by him holds out the prospect of leading us. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman himself is really none too sanguine in his expectations despite his rosy anticipations. The Finance Minister talked to us in terms of millions. He referred to the imports and exports, to the balance of trade, to the reduced taxation which he claimed has been brought about, and to the improvement in the railway situation and the figures he used were up in the millions. I cannot help thinking that while these figures sound good they are of little interest to the ordinary citizen of this Dominion. In this country the great percentage of our population is really struggling to make a living and is not interested in the millions spoken of by the Minister of Finance. That hon. gentleman would have us believe that prosperity is right upon us, and that Canada is prospering to-day as she never did before. Yet deep down in his own heart, and deep down in the hearts of all those hon. gentlemen who uphold him in his argument, they must admit that at every street or crossroads corner in city, town, hamlet or country place the same old lament is heard, "Times are hard, and money is hard to get." That is the condition which exists throughout Canada at the present time. I have sat in this House ever since January 7th last, and every day there has been a sitting I have heard a cry of despair go up from some hon. member or from the representative of a particular section in this Dominion. Yet it is said we have prosperity in Canada.

Conditions in the west have been spoken of. We all agree that there are some conditions there which can and ought to be remedied. We all agree that the people of the west are not as prosperous as the Minister of Finance would lead us to believe. What did we find within the last year and a half? That actually, because of the gloomy outlook, some outstanding men in the west were talking of secession, of separating from the eastern part of Canada. Why should that be, if conditions are so prosperous as they say? But Mr. Speaker, if we go into the west we find millions and millions of acres of soil possessing sufficient fertility to produce vegetation of all kinds in abundance and a sturdy race of men and hardy women, who are not indolent, but who are toiling to build up that great country and to provide a heritage for those who will follow them. Why should these men talk secession, if they are prosperous?

Let us look into conditions in the Maritime provinces. You know Mr. Speaker, that member after member from that section of the House has been on his feet day after day telling us of the needs, the wants and the wrongs of those eastern provinces. We do not have to take the word even of these hon. gentlemen. We all recollect what occurred in the House not more than a year ago. We all remember that a certain industrial condition existed down there which cost the lives of human beings. You will remember that in connection with the industrial unrest in Nova Scotia human lives were sacrificed. Human blood was shed. Why? Because they were prosperous? Not at all. It was because of industrial conditions which existed then and which exist to-day and which will continue to exist as long as we live under the same system of government as we have in this House at the present time. What did the government of Canada of that day do to remedy conditions in Nova Scotia? Did they do one single, solitary thing to help relieve the suffering miners and their families? Did they do anything to bring about better conditions in that section? They did nothing at all. Well, yes, they did one thing. They sent soldiers down there from Toronto and Kingston to shoot down if necessary any man who would raise a hand in defence of his starving wife or children.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friend is not going to repeat the statement that has been frequently made in this House, when he knows that this government did not send them down.

Mr. MALONEY: Who sent them down?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They went at the request of the government of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MALONEY: With whose permission? Was it not with the permission of this government?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It makes no difference.

Mr. MALONEY: Did the Minister of National Defence not send them down?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is unnecessary to make that statement, because we have had this matter before the House time and again. Hon. members on the other side have been told frequently this government had nothing to do with the sending of troops. They simply acted under the statute of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): At whose instigation?

Mr. MALONEY: Did these soldiers not require to have the consent of the Minister of National Defence before they left their barracks in Toronto?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No they did not. If the hon. member will look up the statute he will find my statement is correct.

Mr. MALONEY: Are they allowed to roam scot-free throughout the country wherever they wish to go?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, they are to go upon call. If the hon. member looks up the act he will understand it better.

Mr. MALONEY: And who will send them when the call is received?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the hon. member will refer to the statute he will find all the provisions embodied in it.

Mr. MALONEY: To whom is this call sent?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The parliament of Canada passed this act.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A good many years ago.

Mr. DOUCET: It was amended in 1924.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It was amended so that troops could be sent only on a call issued at the instance of the attorney general of the province, and payment of the expenses was to be made by the province. It was so amended as to make it impossible for the federal government to send troops, except upon the requisition of the provincial government.

Mr. MALONEY: The soldiers were sent down. There must have been some authority centered right here in Ottawa to allow them to go down, and they had orders when they got there to shoot down if necessary, any man who would dare raise his hand in defence of his wife and family. Why should such a condition exist in Nova Scotia—Nova Scotia the garden of eastern Canada, a province with resources second to none? Why should we have conditions of actual starvation in that province, if Canada is in a prosperous condition to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it would not be proper to permit the statement of my hon. friend to go unchallenged. He has said that orders were issued to shoot down the men if necessary. Can my hon. friend produce a copy of any such order?

Mr. MALONEY: Why should the soldiers go there, if they did not have that authority?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member said they had authority to shoot the men. He cannot produce that order.

Mr. MALONEY: When a soldier is placed on duty, what is the first order given?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the hon gentleman produce any order to shoot down the men? I say he cannot, and I challenge him to produce it.

Mr. MALONEY: When you send a soldier out on duty his orders are to shoot down men if necessary. I have touched upon conditions in the west. I have referred to the condition in the Maritime provinces. I will ask hon. members for a moment to come back to the central provinces and see what evidence of prosperity we find? You can go into town after town from one end of Ontario, or of Quebec, to the other, and you will find factory after factory with the doors securely locked. You will find man after man looking for work. Then go out into the country districts and you will find many farmers, at one time prosperous, who have abandoned their farms. You will see farm after farm abandoned. You will find farmer after farmer struggling to make a meagre existence, and yet they tell us we have prosperity in Canada.

In order to increase this wonderful prosperity the Minister of Finance has brought down his budget. Let us see what species of cure-all this budget is. It is not my intention to go into it at great length, but I will deal with the main item. We are told it is a poor man's budget—for the benefit of the poor man. We shall see. The first item of that budget, which perhaps is the most serious of all, is the one providing for a cut in the automobile tax. At one fell swoop the Minister of Finance cut the head off the most thriving industry in Canada, one of the best industries for the future of the country, and yet he tells us it is in the interest of the poor man. We all know the poor man does not own an automobile, and those of us who are foolish enough to own one, even though we are poor, know that the amount saved by virtue of the reduction in the duty will mean very very little indeed. Why Mr. Ford in his price list just published claims a reduction of from $10 to $45 in the various models which he turns out. We know the average life of one of these cars with ordinary care is perhaps ten years. In other words we save from $1 to $5 a year on our car. Again that saving of from $1 to $5 a year you have the fact that the government, by virtue of this legislation, has jeopardized the position of 30,000 of our citizens, who are to-day engaged in the occupation of manufacturing and distributing automobiles. In addition to this 30,000 you have their dependents, numbering more than 125,000, whose living is jeopardized by this cut. Furthermore you strangle the industry, prevent its future development, but, greater than all, you weaken the confidence of investors in the fiscal future of the great Dominion of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, we want cheaper automobiles. We all believe that to-day automobiles are selling at a price altogether too high, but is there no way in which a reduction of price might be brought about, without strangling the industry, and injuring our fiscal future? The thought occurred to me that if instead of cutting off or lowering the duty, as has been done, or will be done if the budget is passed, we raised the duty on all automobiles coming into Canada to such a height that the Canadian market would be preserved for the Canadian manufacturer, it would mean for them a larger market. Then after this tariff board has been fully authorized to do business, we might let them go down, examine the books and audit the accounts of the various automobile manufacturers and if necessary, set a reasonable price at which cars might be sold in Canada. If not, we could limit the profits which might be derived from the manufacture and sale of these cars. In that way automobiles might be sold much cheaper than under the present legislation while at the same time this industry would be encouraged and our fiscal interests preserved.

We are told that the income tax is another item in the budget affecting the poor man. We know that prior to this budget being thought of, a married man with an income of $2,000 was exempt from this taxation. We do not consider that a man with a salary of $2,000 a year is a poor man; as a matter of face compared with many people in this country he is a rich man. In the year 1923 the farm labourers of the Dominion from coast to coast drew an average annual wage of $372 with board, or $611 without board, and employees in industrial establishments drew an average yearly salary of $937. In all, almost 800,000 Canadians were drawing an average salary of $800 a year. Will they call this a poor man's budget? What has the government done for the labourer by bringing down this budget change with regard to income tax? It has shifted the burden of our national debt from the shoulders of those who are most able to bear it to the people who are drawing salaries of less than $1,000 a year, and yet we are told that this is a poor man's budget.

The reduction in the postal rate from three cents to two cents was indeed a surprise. Nobody ever thought of it; there was no great desire on the part of the people of Canada for a reduction in postage. What does this reduction mean? It means a loss in revenue to the Post Office Department of $5,000,000 a year. It is to the credit of the Postmaster General and the splendid officers who are to-day working under him that the work they have been doing is so excellent that their department is able to stand a reduction if this kind. If this reduction means a decrease in revenue of $5,000,000 for that department, what does it mean to the poor men of this country? The ordinary individual who is not doing business writes possibly fifty, sixty or seventy letters a year. The farmer, for example, may write fifty or seventy-five letters a year and he will therefore save fifty or seventy-five cents through this reduction; but what the farmer is more particularly anxious about to-day is not to save this fifty or seventy-five cents, but to have an improved mail service throughout the Dominion?

I say to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) who is supposed to be the leader of the farmers from the Atlantic to the Pacific: You are anxious for the comfort and welfare of those whom you are supposed to lead; if you are really desirous of making life on the farm more congenial for the boys and girls there, I would ask you to have the government remodel this item of legislation because you have the power to do that. Let them raise the postal rate again from two cents to three cents, and in doing so, save $5,000,000 to the revenue of this country. Then have the government spend that sum of $5,000,000 in extending the rural mail service through sections in your constituency, my constituency and every other rural riding from end to end of Canada.

The greatest boon to rural life in this country within the last half century has been the introduction of the rural mail. It is with great pride that I offer to you, Sir, as perhaps the father of that legislation, my most sincere congratulations, and I believe every citizen of Canada who enjoys the benefit of the rural mail delivery will back me up in that statement. If the Minister of Finance is still determined to put two-cent postage into effect in this country I would ask him to consider the advisability of allowing us to use these two-cent postage stamps where to-day we have to employ a separate stamp, an inland revenue stamp. If this could be done it would materially simplify matters with business men and in addition it would help to make up in some small degree the loss of revenue which will ensue to the various postmasters throughout the Dominion by virtue of the change in the postal rate. I would be in the interest of the department and I believe it would bring in more money in the end.

I would like to refer for a moment to the question of old age pensions. It has been said that an offer, a gesture has been made. What has been the effect of that gesture? I listened a few days ago to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) referring to the hardy fishermen of the frozen northwestern boundary of his constituency. What a wonderful thing this pension would be for these men in their old age and their dependents? The government have made that gesture; they have raised the hopes of the aged from end to end of Canada; but when this bill becomes law, if it ever does, those hopes will be dashed to the ground because this legislation cannot become operative without the consent of the provinces. They place so much money in the hands of the provinces and ask them to shoulder the balance and administer the law. Why should they place on the shoulders of the provinces this additional burden when already they are bowed down underneath loads of debt. I say to those self-constituted labour leaders of the city of Winnipeg: If you believe that the labouring classes are behind you in your desire for a system of old age pensions—and I believe they are—prevail upon the government to bring in a real old age pension law, a pension to which they will contribute in its entirety irrespective and independent of all the provinces. If you will do that you will have behind you the support of seventy-five per cent of the membership of this House. While I do not like the legislation which has been introduced, while I do not believe it will ever come into effect in Ontario, or Quebec, or some of the other provinces, yet because of the fact that I am in favour of a system of old age pensions, I will support this legislation. We have heard a great deal in connection with the improvement in the railway situation in Canada. I could take you, Sir, into the county of Renfrew and show you how it is that the distinguished gentleman who presides over the destinies of the Canadian National railway system is able to produce a statement as good as the government claims it to be. In that particular district of the county of Renfrew, a thickly populated district from which during the last few years have gone into the coffers of this government and the provincial government thousands and thousands of dollars of lumbering operations and other general business carried on in that section, I could show you two points a distance of fifty miles apart where it takes four days to make the round trip on the Canadian National railway. This has been brought about by the cutting down of the service—and no doubt this is typical of many other sections—to such a point that it is absolutely useless; we would be better without such a service at all if we could have these tracks taken up and a good automobile road built throughout that district. If he has been following that plan throughout the country it is little wonder that expenses have come down, but when travelling from city to city in eastern Canada one does not see any evidence of anything of this kind. What one finds is one train trying to be better than another, and there is a multiplication of trains from day to day.

My hon. friends to my left have been promised many things by this government, and no doubt they have been assured that everything from their standpoint will be ideal in the days to come. I would ask my hon. friend from Brandon to take to heart the words of that old French poet:

> Kings' promises are airy dreams
> And scarcely last between the day's extremes.

The great trouble in Canada to-day is lack of stable government and the want of confidence on the part of the people in this administration. If there is one thing more than another that we require in this country it is a government in office such as the people can trust. But the government of the day, through its Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), has broken faith with the Canadian people. The right hon. gentleman broke faith with them in relation to his Richmond Hill speech, and again he has failed to keep the pledge he gave them in the Speech from the Throne. I say therefore that it is his duty to resign.

Mr. FORKE: Oh, oh.

Mr. MALONEY: My hon. friend from Brandon laughs. Well, Nero fiddled once, and see what happened. Conditions in Canada to-day are altogether too serious for a man occupying the position of my hon. friend to sit by complacently and laugh. I repeat, everyone in Canada has lost confidence in this government, and the government have lost confidence in themselves. Obviously, therefore, it is their duty to resign and allow a new government to be formed. If they got out, a government would be formed under my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), who would pick his cabinet not altogether from the west nor altogether from Quebec. He would not depend solely upon one province; he would go to British Columbia, to Alberta, to Saskatchewan, to Manitoba, to Ontario, to Quebec, and to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and from every corner of the Dominion he would select a man to head a department of government. When such a government had been formed, if I were in a position to do so. I would appeal to the great west to place its confidence in my leader and in a policy which we all know is in the interests of the whole Dominion, a policy which was good enough for the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier and for Edward Blake and equally acceptable to the Liberal leaders of the past. I would ask the people of the west to give their support to that policy, designed to promote the welfare of all Canadians. I would go into the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick also and lay that policy before the people as one that would make for improved industrial conditions and increase the happiness of the citizens of the Maritimes. I would go to Ontario and preach to the manufacturers a stable policy to which they could look with confidence in the future, and I would appeal on the same grounds to Quebec, good old loyal Quebec, the Gibraltar of the British Empire in North America, the Quebec that saved Canada once before. With such an appeal, I am sure they would save Canada again, because we need the support of Quebec for a sound policy under the right hon. leader of the opposition if Canada is to make any progress.

With a government of that kind in office what would result? We all know that in this country to-day and in Great Britain and the United States there are vast sums of money, millions upon millions of dollars, awaiting a favourable opportunity for investment, so that with a stable government in office in Canada, a government in whom the people reposed full confidence, investments would pour into Canada and the doors of factories now securely locked would swing open once more, the wheels of industry would begin again to revolve, and there would be work on every hand. Our boys and girls who to-day are earning their living in foreign countries would be brought back, because no matter how prosperous they may be in the United States or elsewhere, no matter how well they may be getting along, they are always yearning for home, and with conditions improved in Canada they would return by hundreds of thousands. No one can exaggerate the tremendous impetus such a return of Canadian citizens would give to industrial development here. After that we would proceed with a sound system of immigration. Immigration to-day is costing Canada a great many millions, and what are we receiving in return? Would it not be wiser for the government to spend some of that money right at home to help those boys and girls who are obliged to leave our Canadian farms to stay here and engage in agriculture with some degree of success? Would it not be well to give them that encouragement rather than to send so much money over to the other side to bring in a class of immigration which cannot make for the greatest success of the Dominion? After our boys and girls had been brought back, then as time went on, and if we found increasing numbers necessary, I would suggest that we send our envoys to the various countries of Europe, to Ireland, England, Scotland and Wales for the purpose of securing the best type of immigrants for this country. I would send over men who originally had come from those countries, and who, having grown up with Canada, knew her needs as well as her shortcomings. They would be able to explain to their people at home just what they might expect from life in Canada and if those men were given the authority to handpick suitable immigrants for the Dominion I am sure the result would be very much to the advantage of this country. I would do the same in regard to Germany, Poland, Holland and Belgium. To-day in Holland there are many men who are anxious to come to Canada if only they can receive adequate encouragement. No better farmer lives anywhere than the Hollander, and if we had a million Hollanders such as we have in this country to-day, or a million Germans more of the type that is with us now, or a million more Poles, Canada would be in a position to go ahead.

I will not delay the House any longer, Mr. Speaker. I am glad of this opportunity to offer these remarks to the representatives of the people, and as it is my sincere desire as a loyal Canadian to see Canada advance, I am prepared always to give my cordial support to any legislation which may be introduced, no matter by whom, so long as I deem it in the best interests of the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): As the budget debate is drawing to a close, Mr. Speaker, my contribution will occupy only about fifteen minutes of the time of the House. I hope I will be pardoned if I do not follow the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Maloney) very closely in my argument, but I must take exception to two of his statements. He said that the people of the west are talking secession, threatening to break away from the Dominion. I do not believe the sentiment in the west points in that direction at all. The hon. member has also said that this government has lost the confidence of everyone in Canada. I certainly take exception to that statement; I believe this government enjoys the confidence of the people to a greater extent than has any government during the past decade, and that its position will be strengthened by this budget, which I believe has met with the approval of the majority of our people. They are pleased that there is $55,000,000 whimh may be applied to the special railway and capital expenditure, and the reduction of the capital debt, and they will also be pleased with the abolition of the receipt tax and the return to penny postage. It has been suggested that the three cent postage should be retained and our rural post offices extended, because the return to penny postage will mean a loss in revenue. I would remind the House that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier reduced the postage from three cents to two cents the revenue actually increased, and we hope that again will be the case. It has been pointed out that this reduction will help the retail and business people, something which is surely desirable. I believe it will also help the working people, because I have noticed that they look anxiously for the postman or mail carrier. They like to hear from their distant relatives, and in many humble homes correspondence has not been kept up because of the cost of postage.

Some hon. member opposite suggested that our automobile duties might be retained at their former level, and the excise and sales taxes abolished. That would have been a fine thing for the automobile manufacturers; they could have continued to make a profit of 82½ per cent per annum and the country would have lost that revenue. Many hon. gentlemen opposite have not committed themselves regarding this duty, and I am under the impression that the delegation which came here from Oshawa went away believing that this reduction would not have been made at present had a Conservative government been in power. If we believe that this reduction is right—as I think most members of this House do so believe—we might just as well face the storm when it comes and carry out the policy of which our judgment approves.

Regarding the income tax, I believe that many working and salaried people will be relieved through the raising of the exemption to $3,000. Is it not fair that the man who works for his income should pay a little less than the man who has capital from which he derives income in the way of interest? We must remember that the surtax and supertax have been removed, which will release a good deal of money for business investment, bringing our average income tax more into line with that of the United States. A prominent Canadian said some time ago that what Canada needed was a fiscal policy, relief from burdensome taxation and immigration. I believe that the reduction of $25,000,000 in these troublesome and burdensome taxes will make Canada a more attractive place to live in and will be a great step towards the realization of these three aims.

A good deal has been said since I came into this House as to the desirability of establishing industries. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) pointed out that St. Paul and Minneapolis had increased their population, providing a market for the farmers, to a much greater extent than had Regina, Swift Current, Moose Jaw and Prince Albert. Another hon. member argued that we should first build up the cities, and the rural communities would develop later. We tried that in the west, and if you go to any of the Canadian cities mentioned you will find a number of deserted, shut down and neglected factories. Medicine Hat is perhaps better endowed by nature as a manufacturing centre than any of these cities, but a number of industries have started and failed there. It was not a question of protection; it was not because of lack of capital; they failed because there was no market to absorb their product. These industries will be built up and will prosper some time, but not until the general development of the country provides a market for their products. You cannot build a tower without a foundation, and you cannot build an industrial city without a market.

Having in mind conditions as they actually exist, I believe we should trade with other countries in order to get a market for the products of our farms and factories. As a person uses six bushels of wheat a year, it would take about seventy million people to consume our surplus wheat production, and as a person uses sixty pounds of beef a year, it would be necessary to have thirty additional cities the size of Hamilton, Ontario, to consume the cattle exported last year.

It has been asked in this House why Canada should have a low tariff when every other country in the world has a high tariff. I do not believe all the people in the world are in favour of a high tariff. I have here a resolution which was passed unanimously by the Congress of International Chambers of Commerce at Brussels last year. At this congress were represented thirty-five nations, by their leading bankers and commercial magnates. The resolution is as follows:

> The chamber has directed attention to interferences with the return of normal trade conditions and employment caused by artificial barriers, obstructive to intercourse between the nations, such as extreme tariffs, unreasonable customs regulations and restriction on transportation. All of these have the effect of increasing the delivered cost of goods and preventing the widest possible distribution and use of the world's products, which are the basis of better living standards and progress. The chamber appeals to the business men of all countries to study these questions, and to exert their influence for the removal, as promptly as possible, of all unnatural and uneconomic restrictions of this kind.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that agriculture is an industry which must be carried on with a very small margin of profit, and in the past the farmers have had to pay too much for the things they have had to buy. It has been stated in this House that prices may be low even though the tariff is high, but experience teaches us that the opposite is usually the case. There is not sufficient competition to assure us that the prices will be right if the tariff is very high, and although the last speaker referred to the possibility of fixing prices, no one has suggested any practical way by which the prices of the dozens of varieties, of the hundreds of articles used in this country could be fixed. It would therefore seem that the tariff is the best method of keeping prices low and preventing exploitation. A few articles may occasionally be sold at a low price if the tariff is high, but all articles must always be sold at the right price if the tariff is low because outside competition will force them to be sold at that price. Therefore, the first casualty resulting from putting on a high tariff would be the exhausting of the purchasing power of the people of the country and the stifling of the basic industries, and the second casualty would be the destruction of the market which the manufacturer had enjoyed for his goods.

I have listened with a pretty open mind to the discussion which has taken place in this House, and I have heard it argued repeatedly that we are exporting raw materials and bringing back the finished products. I have looked up the records for 1914, 1922 and 1925, and this is what I find: Take our dealings with the Argentine republic, for instance. We exported manufactured goods as follows to the Argentine republic:

Exports to Argentine Republic

1922		1925
$ 293,900	Rubber goods	$1,234,048
1,104,156	Agricultural implements	4,125,943
470,291	Sewing machines	1,110,315
558,389	Automobiles and parts	2,242,906

Our total exports to the Argentine for 1922 amounted to $3,233,423, and for 1925 to $10,322,373, an increase in the three years of about $7,000,000. There were also other manufactured articles such as razors, iron pipe and tubing, nails, copper and structural steel that we exported.

Now let us test it in another way. Take Italy, for example. We export a lot of flour to Italy. In 1925 we exported $514,660 of flour to Italy, or more than our total exports of all commodities to Italy in the year 1914, when hon. gentlemen opposite were shaping the destinies of this country. Our exports of fish, canned and dried, to Italy in 1925, amounted to $1,568,419, or three times the amount of our total exports of all commodities to Italy in 1914. Now I submit that if we found a market in Italy for fish to that extent, our fishermen were that much better off, because their purchasing power was increased, and as far as the manufacturer was concerned, it was better for him that we shipped this fish to Italy because thus the Canadian market for manufactured goods was enlarged, and the manufacturer found a larger market for the sale of his products.

We might follow this record of our increased trade through the entire list of countries with which we do business, and we will find exactly the same condition existing. Everywhere we are extending our markets for manufactured goods. The increase in the export of a few manufactured goods between the years 1922 and 1925 is shown as follows:

Manufactured Goods Exported

1922		1925
$4,061,809	Rubber goods	$11,458,456
5,345,308	Agricultural implements	11,342,712

If you take sewing machines, vehicles, including automobiles, razors, pig iron, and machinery other than agricultural implements—in all these cases you will find that our export of manufactured goods is rapidly and progressively increasing. This is good business for us because it helps to increase the purchasing power of the people of this country, just as the lowering of the tariff, which makes prices lower, helps to increase the purchasing power of the people.

During the election campaign last October our Conservative friends said that the Liberal policy was all wrong. They said that we were sending our raw products to the United States to be manufactured, and importing manufactured goods from that country. Since I have come to Ottawa I have taken the trouble to look up the United States Statistical Abstract and I find that the United States are shipping out a great deal of stuff in the raw or unmanufactured state, as follows:

Raw materials..	$1,445,000,000	$1,876,000,000
Partly manufactured.. ..	1,035,000,000	1,223,000,000
Manufactured..	1,210,000,000	1,670,000,000

You will note from these figures that the United States is sending out quite a bit of stuff in the form of raw material. You will note also that she made a marked increase in the export of raw materials in 1925. Why do they do this? Every country in the world exports raw material, and they do it because it pays them to do it. Britain exports coal, and buys cotton; Canada exports wheat, and buys crude oil; the United States exports cotton, and buys wood and oil. Nations, protected or otherwise, no matter what their tariffs are, must trade with one another. Let us see what Canada is doing in this regard. The following table shows our exports to the United States for the years 1922 and 1925, in round figures:

	1922	1925
Raw materials..	$108,000,000	$140,000,000
Partly manufactured	72,000,000	115,000,000
Manufactured	111,000,000	160,000,000

You will notice that in the three years our exports to the United States increased by $125,000,000, and of this $32,000,000 was accounted for by raw materials, and $93,000,000 by the increase made in the export of manufactured, or partly manufactured, goods.

Some hon. gentleman opposite have said that they can see very few signs of prosperity in Canada. One hon. gentleman a short time ago mentioned the fact that prices of Canadian stocks and securities had risen very greatly since 1921, and some hon. gentleman opposite pointed out that that did not necessarily mean prosperity, that it might mean capital was very timid and that people wished to invest in these seasoned securities. I think there is very little to justify that view. In the Financial Times of May 7, 1926, I find this:

> The gross earnings of 65 Canadian companies reveal an increase of $25,000,000 over those for 1924.
> From a shareholder's point of view, the extent of the improvement is more exactly reflected by the improvement in average earnings on the common stocks of the companies under review. A gain of over 2½ per cent on the average outstanding common capitalization is shown with earnings equivalent to an average of 11.5 per cent as compared with earnings equivalent to 8.9 per cent during the year 1924.

Surely if the stock of these companies is advancing so rapidly in price, and if they are able to show earnings of 11.5 per cent in 1925 as compared with 8.9 per cent in 1924, these large industrial concerns are doing fairly well and do not need the help which hon. gentlemen opposite would have us believe.

I believe that the budget will meet with the approval of the Canadian people because it is helping those who have the best right to that help, and I believe that it will not interfere with the prosperity of the large industrial concerns. I think that the policy behind this budget is one which is bringing about a fair share of prosperity, is bringing about national well-being, and above all, what we all most earnestly desire, national unity. I believe it would be fatal for the people of Canada to execute a right-about face in the tariff policy at the present time and embark upon a policy which is more likely to act as a wedge and separate the various parts of this Dominion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I desire in the first place, to assure my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that I regretted exceedingly not being able to be here to listen to his very interesting budget and to have a first hand opportunity of saying something about it. In the second place, I wish to thank the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) for the very excellent presentation he made and the criticism which he gave of the budget, a criticism which has never yet been answered. I gaze upon the Finance Minister with absolute amazement to-day. I am simply astonished that my hon. friend could be so right and at the same time so wholly wrong in such a short document. The minister is exceedingly right in some things he has done. He is exceedingly right, for example, when he gets rid of his receipt tax. His supporters too are exceedingly right when they refer to the taxes that have been got rid of as "nuisance taxes," taxes for which this government are responsible to the extent of one hundred per cent. In things like that the Finance Minister is absolutely right, but in many instances he is hopelessly wrong. I do not blame him, I do not think anyone ought to hold him up to censure, because at one time he had four portfolios to look after. I think the number he is administering now is three, and he has just had a chance at the budget when opportunity was given him, a chance snatched between runs from one department to the other. Then my hon. friend has other arduous duties to perform in keeping things straight around the Privy Council.

Just let us see how hopelessly wrong one can be sometimes. Let us take the income tax, for example. When my hon. friend introduced his budget he told us that all his proposals were in a downward direction. Times have been so good and the present government's administration has been so prudent, of course, that there is no suggestion of an advance in any direction. Every single step was toward a reduction. Then my hon. friend went on to say that he was making these reductions with a desire to make available new money for development. With this object in view he stated he proposed reductions all along the line. I pause at this stage to make this observation. If I had for one moment thought that the minister knew anything about these proposals I would have said that he was deliberatly deceiving the House and the country. But I do not make that charge. The department have drawn up these resolutions, they have prepared the new schedule. I do not know whether my hon. friend found time to read over his proposals or not, but I do know that he, like the rest of us, now knows that very large increases have been made in income taxes. There is no secret about it at all. We all know that a very large part of development, not only of this but of every country, is carried on through the activities of companies and corporations. Nevertheless my hon. friend doubles—well, you cannot say doubles exactly because all these things depend upon the incidence of the rate of taxation having regard to the assessment of an individual—but he practically doubles the taxes on the dividends of these companies. The Liberal policy here —I think it runs pretty fairly true to Liberal policies generally—is this: We want to secure new money for development, and in our endeavour to secure new money for that purpose we propose to tax the capital so used at a higher rate than is imposed upon any other capital. We want to increase business, we want to increase development in the country, and so we are going to give those interested in development the opportunity of just paying double the taxes which they would pay if they did not do anything to develop this Canada of ours. That is how this budget works out.

I ask my hon. friend this question: What is the capital in Canada that does the most useful work? If my hon. friend answered fairly he would say "The capital which is supplying employment, the capital which is developing the country, the capital which is making the factory chimneys to smoke and the whole countryside to function." And my hon. friend would also say "There are two classes of capital. There is that class of capital which works for the country, and there is the capital that takes no chance whatever, the capital that exists in tax-free securities, the capital that is to be found in first-class mortgages, the capital that is to be found in bonds, the capital that is to be found in real estate and which depends entirely on the unearned increment from that real estate." There you have a different class of capital. No one who is either serious or honest will deny that the capital which is desired, the capital which is of use to the country, is the capital which is engaged in the country's development and industrial work. The minister is applying a double rate of taxation to useful capital but it is absolutely impossible to comprehend how, when applying the double rate of taxation, the minister can make the claim that it is being done for the purpose of aiding development. The thing is absolutely inexplicable unless the explanation is this: That one method of taxation may be temporarily popular and the other unpopular, and that all ordinary financial rules applicable to such a situation are to be swept to one side for the purpose of temporary political advantage. I am afraid the departmental officials did not fully instruct the Minister of Finance as to what they were doing.

My hon. friend claims there is a reduction in taxation of $25,000,000. Is there? We have not had any particulars at all as to how that reduction is made up. I am not going to ask my hon. friend for them now, I do not suppose he has the data with him. He takes what the department has given him and, as I said before, he is running three departments; he has not had time to inform himself as to the details. But just let us see how this matter works out. Last year the companies were taxed to the amount of $31,091,274. That was the sum of money received from them, out of a total tax of $56,248,042. That means that we took out of these companies, whose dividends are now to be taxed twice, more than 55 per cent of all the money raised under our income taxation. We are told that there are no increases in this budget or in this taxation, while as a matter of fact we know that there are many cases where the rate of taxation is doubled as a result of these proposals. Setting aside the individual instances, let us consider the situation having regard to the statement made that the country is getting the benefit of the $25,000,000 reduction. We took over $31,000,000 from these companies under a tax of 10 plus 5 per cent. That would make practically 10½ per cent and would mean that the earnings on which those taxes were levied approximated $300,000,000. Now I admit at once that all that money does not become subject to a double tax. It is only the amount of the company's earnings paid out in dividends that becomes subject to the double tax. All company earnings are now taxed under the budget 9 per cent instead of 10.5 per cent under the old law. Everything is taxed, but it is only the dividends that are subject to the double tax. It might be thought to have been entirely wrong. I am not now justifying it. It is true that I enforced it. It is true that I administered an act which is exactly the same, but it may well be asked, I admit, what is the fairness of taxing companies on their total annual earnings, when a large amount of those total earnings have to be put back into the business for the purpose of carrying it on, and when the directors think that only a certain moiety, say 80 or 90 per cent, can safely be paid out in the form of dividends? I am not raising that point at all. That system continues. That is common, if it be an error, to my hon. friend, to myself and to our predecessors. But allowing for the difference between the $300,000,000 of earnings and actual dividends, I think my hon. friend will agree that $250,000,000 would be a fair amount to look upon as the dividend paying power of the companies and corporations in this country. I do not know whether my hon. friend has the information. If his department had not the information at the time they brought down this resolution and placed it in his hands, I should think they would have it now, so that they would know what they were doing, but I submit $250,000,000 would not be so very far out. Taking $250,000,000 as the dividend paying power of the companies in Canada, what are we assessing? I am aware at once, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians unfortunately do not own all those dividends or all that stock. In the year 1921 a return was brought down by the statistical department which showed that the amount of American holdings in the stock and bonds of our companies was considerably under a third. In 1920 a similar calculation was made by an American authority—my recollection is that the author was Mr. Fels —where it was shown that Canadians owned, of their own investments, stocks and bonds in companies, over 64 per cent, the American holding being under a third, the balance being taken up by the British holdings and the holdings of other nationals. I am aware that in the last few years it has become a practice—well it is not a matter of declared government policy but it is a matter of the continued and continuous and everlasting handing over just a little bit more and a little bit more, a bit of Canada here and a bit of Canada there, this factory here and that market there to the United States. That is the practice of this government, and the fact is that it has been the practice of this country, irrespective of any government, to a far greater extent than it had any right to be, but this government most markedly have never yet properly appreciated the necessity of a policy looking to the development of Canada for Canada, and by Canadians for Canadians. They have never yet got down to it, the trend has been much more marked and it is going on more and more all the time.

I am not prepared to say that the third of American holdings that I referred to is not now a half; it may be, but I hope it is not. I have not the recent figures but surely again it is not out of the way to assume that Canadians to-day hold 50 per cent of the stock and bonds in their own companies, and if that statement be correct, just see where the Minister of Finance finds himself placed in connection with his so called reductions. The reason why I am differentiating between Canadian and other holdings is that, as I understand it, it is only the Canadian investor who is subject to the double tax. If I am wrong the minister will correct me. Very well, I am cutting the dividends down then to $125,000,000 as against $250,000,000, and we have then under these proposals increased assessable wealth amounting to $125,000,000, to be assessed double for the first time by a government that actually claims its proposals are all reductions. The return to the government will depend entirely upon where the moiety and the average of the dividends will be assessable. If it is to be found in very large incomes, the increase in revenue will be enormous. If it be found on the other hand in the lower income the increase will not be as great.

My hon. friend will tell me at once if I am wrong in the figures which I take. This is only an estimate, a guess; it is impossible for anybody who is not in the office to do anything more than guess. But suppose we find this result that, out of the increase, this extra $125,000,000 of assessable wealth falls on the average within the class of incomes which, after all exemptions and allowances for children, are taxable at $7,000, and we find that the average of the whole is to be represented by incomes of $7,000—in that case—and I do not think I am putting it at a very high figure—the rate would be seven per cent under my hon. friend's proposals. He will check me if I am wrong and I have not properly understood him although I think I have. The new revenue collectable would then amount under this budget that is supposed to be doing nothing but cutting taxation, to an extra tax collected from the people of $8,750,000.

Let us take another figure. If it be found that the average assessment in respect of that tax falls within incomes of the $10,000 class, the rate would be ten per cent and the extra taxation collectable from the people of the country would be $12,500,000. I do not know what information my hon. friend has as to where that average is to be found; but I know that if the average is where I suggest that will be the result, and I know that irrespective of where it may be there is a very large increase in this item of income taxation directed by this government against an interest, a public necessity, namely, that of development which at the same time they are saying that these proposals are taken in ease of. I think my hon. friend will pardon me when I say that I look upon him with all amazement as being so absolutely right when he is referring to his nuisance taxes and the like, so absolutely wrong when he is referring to the effect of his proposals and the larger aspects of this case.

One question which I think deserves more than passing notice is raised by this budget: Have the people of this country, have those doing business in this country, the right to take the word of the government, the word of the Prime Minister as meaning anything? Of all the different ways in which pledges may be given by governments I would have thought that a Speech from the Throne would be one of the most positive, but I am not now referring only to that. We have the statements made by the leader of the government at Richmond Hill; we have the Kingston speech also made during the election campaign and many others. I am not referring to one thing by itself; but if there be anything which one would think ought to be observed it is the considered statement of the government, not made in the height of a political campaign, but contained in the Speech from the Throne. I bring this up not only because I think it is an absolutely vital matter, but because in bringing it up I desire at the same time to answer again statements which have been made by the leader of this government and other ill-advised supporters of it in connection with what occurred in 1921.

In 1921 there was a Speech from the Throne in which the statement was made that the tariff would be revised. The tariff was not revised, not because of any intervening action taken by the government, not because of any intervening question of political expediency which might affect the government, but simply and solely, as was stated at the time, because the United States government were considering whether they would make permanent or not tariff items which we rightly or wrongly thought to be very disadvantageous to this country and we were told from Washington that if we took that action which any self-respecting Canadian government would take on the assumption that those were to be permanent taxes, we might afford a further excuse for making these taxes permanent. I am going to refer to the reasons which were then given. I do this because whenever this government have no defence—and it is very often they have no defence; it is only an accident when they have one—their whole plea is that somebody else did it—the tu quoque argument.

A pledge was given by this government that there would be no interference in tariffs except on the report of the tariff commission. If that was not to be considered as a pledge, what was the reason for appointing the tariff commission? Was the only justification for the appointment of the tariff commission to give political friends salaries with empty offices and thus pile up expenses on the people? Or was the idea, as that pledge would indicate, that the tariff board was to function, and that no changes should be made before an investigation had taken place? This is not the only breach of faith on the part of the government which we have had to point out. This is not the only instance in which a promise has been given only to be broken. We have pointed out the same thing before, and always the answer is a shrug of the shoulders and "Oh, yes." And that is all. In 1921 there was a budget speech, from which I shall read. The tariff was going to be amended and it was not.

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." This is his whole case. This miserable attempt has been made throughout the country ever since to make a case for disregard of promises out of the fact that the tariff was not altered at that time. Now I am going to ask the minister if he can fairly take exception to one single word that I shall now read. He cannot and I know he will not. I am reading now from the budget speech of 1921, dealing with this very question of the tariff.

> The tariff deals with international business and the proper interests of the country can only be considered in the light of international business and the tariff laws of other countries.

Does my hon. friend object to that? Can anyone object to it? If so, we ought to find quarters for them in some other place.

An hon. MEMBER: The Senate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, it will not be the Senate; we can find cheaper quarters for people of that sort.

> It is idle to attempt to disguise the fact that any proper Canadian tariff must have consideration to the settled tariff conditions obtaining in the United States.

Does any hon. gentleman want to object to that? I think not.

> Of our total trade of the past year 57 per cent was with the United States. Of total imports of $1,240,125,056, those from our neighbour to the south were $856,593,470 or 69 per cent of the whole. As already pointed out, temporary tariff legislation of the United States would place a barrier against our exports to that country amounting to no less than $168,000,000. Such or similar action made permanent, of necessity, would require a careful and thorough revision of the Canadian tariff for the purpose of ensuring the proper continuance of Canadian business—of ensuring employment and Canadian stability—a matter of gravest moment to all classes of our citizens, of moment to the farmer as well as to the industrial worker, of moment to the farmer because of the home market—

Of course my hon. friends will not agree with that.

> —always of importance and value to him, would become in view of the action of the United States and of the difficulties of financing overseas sales, more important than ever. . . . Under the circumstances, having special regard to the fact that there ought not to be a general revision of the Canadian tariff now and another after the close of the United States congress, no action will now be taken.

There is the reason no change was made at that time. And what did Mr. Fielding have to say on the question? At page 3154 of Hansard of 1921, he says:

> I notice that the Minister of Finance made a very brief reference to the condition of the American tariff, though I must do him the justice to say that he treated it with more gravity than some people do. There are people throughout Canada who flippantly say that they do not care what the American tariff is.

Mr. Fielding did care, and so did I. And for that reason the government of that day was determined that in face of that temporary legislation which congress was considering making permanent, as unfortunately has happened since, nothing would be done by this country which could for one minute afford the slightest excuse to any action that might be taken by the United States to our detriment. That is why no change was made in the tariff. It was not a question of the exigencies of Canadian politics nor was it a matter of making a concession for votes which otherwise we should not get. There was no suggestion of having to make appeals here and overtures there, for the fact of the matter is that we rather lost support. But what we did we believed to be the right thing and that is why we did it.

5 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: Did not Mr. Fielding conclude his observations on that day by moving an amendment?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is perfectly right; certainly he did. Throughout his speech he took the view that irrespective of the general conditions at that time it would be a good thing to get the Union government out of office, and he moved accordingly. How much real sincerity there was in the amendment my hon. friend will find if he consults the budget of 1922. Therein he will see exactly what Mr. Fielding thought at that time.

The shocking thing about the automobile reduction is that it seems to indicate on the part of the government a state of mind which evidently is above all ordinary considerations of honour or honesty. The government can say what it likes and promise what it likes and can change its mind just as it pleases. Furthermore, the tariff reduction in the case of automobiles exhibits the government's absolute disregard of consequences. I want the minister to correct me if I am wrong, but I have noticed in the public press advertisements showing that the tariff duty which the industry enjoyed before was not a net duty. Last session I took occasion to point out to hon. gentlemen, with much deference, that none of them knew anything about the tariff, for not one of them could tell me what the net protection was under any item contained in the schedule. We have had some light since. We have had Mr. Deachman's articles, which apparently constitute the only expert opinion the minister has received apart from certain references he has made to what the Chief Conservative whip and some others have said. But Mr. Deachman never pointed out what the net tariff was, and I notice the statement in the press that the net protection which the automobile dealers received before was 17 per cent. Did the minister inquire into that assertion and find it wrong? The net protection was 17 per cent as against an apparent protection of 35 per cent. Does my hon. friend quarrel with that? And what is the net protection which the minister is now giving with 20 per cent? Now, so far as the budget is concerned the net protection was never considered by the minister; I do not think I am unfair when I submit that it was never taken into account by the government. The item looked big and the manufacturers appeared prosperous, and there are a certain number of people who always like to throw a brick at anyone who they fancy is prosperous. The minister, I repeat, did not know what the net protection was, or at any rate he did not take it into account. If I am wrong he will contradict me. He does not contradict me, so that the government apparently has brought down these changes without knowing what the net protection was which the automobile industry was receiving, and without knowing what it was doing. They are learning now; they are getting the information, which should have been first obtained. It is quite possible, of course, for the government to do with the automobile industry as they did with the farm implements business. It is quite possible for them to cut down the tariff on the one hand but by concessions, free materials, sales tax and the like not only to make up the cut, but even to exceed it. I do not know that the government intend doing that, but I want to point out that there has been a great change in industry since the war. I have in mind at the moment two factories operated in the same interest which, before the war, made carriage wheels. When the war started, in response to the demand for munitions these plants were converted into the making of shells. The war being over they were then converted into factories making automobile hubs and axles. They had to borrow money, something in the neighbourhood of $450,000 if I remember rightly, in order to make that change. That firm is going to be wiped out as things now stand. Why should it be wiped out? Let us get some reasons. It paid $50,000 a month to Canadian workmen.

Mr. MANION: Did it pay dividends?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Besides paying that amount it paid taxes to this government and to the municipalities, and for seven years paid no dividend whatever; last year a dividend of 5 per cent was declared. The minister did not know what he was doing; that is the real truth of the matter. He never deliberately set to work to injure such plants doing business, not in the manufacture of automobiles but in the making of parts. They were trying to develop this country; trying to give work to Canadians, trying to do just what the minister says he is trying to do in this budget, in reducing income taxes—make it more easy to get money for the development of Canada. But what he is doing is making sure that some of the money already obtained for our development will not be worth very much when he is finished with it. It is a serious thing if the people have not a right to accept the word of their government.

I know that great claims are being made by this government on the ground of the return of prosperity; I think my hon. friend calls this the "prosperity" budget. If he had really been seized of conditions and of what he was doing I think he would have called this the "gold brick" budget, instead.

Let us see where the prosperity is, and if we can find it. With those who have studied conditions I think it is common ground that following the war, deflation set in, reaching its culmination in 1921. During that time we went down and down, not only in Canada but practically throughout the whole world. The great United States had then not a few but hundreds of thousands, even millions of people out of employment; everyone felt it. That is surely common ground with both my hon. friend and myself. Does he deny it? I do not think he would. He certainly should not, and with his knowledge of the subject I am quite confident that he will not. Neither will he deny that that deflation was inescapable; it was forced on the country and was not the result of any governmental measure. We struck the bottom in 1921 and, in common with the rest of the world, began to pick up in 1922. There was progress everywhere; not very much in Canada, but a little.

In 1922 we had the first budget of the King government, in which were made irritating little changes here and there, although the budget did not really amount to anything one way or the other. The only bad thing was that it indicated a trend of policy dangerous to the country, dangerous to industry and to capital; it was an unsettling budget. There were no serious cuts; we used to call it the 2½ per cent budget, but the underlying ideas and the statements made in the House were unsettling, as a result of which people thought it was not safe to go on and expand business. My hon. friend will also agree that that is not altogether a Conservative thought; that others than Conservatives knew that fact. The Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, in his budget speech of 1923, stated:

> Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff.

He recognized then that business stability, which he desired, could not be obtained without tariff stability, and he further stated:

> Speaking broadly, it is possible to give the country a reasonable assurance of stability of tariff. Such assurances are very desirable, for no business man would care to enter upon enterprises which may be brought into peril by frequent tariff changes.

Such statements are, of course, merely obvious truisms. Everyone knows them; everyone with any knowledge of business or financial affairs is fully aware of them. The country did not need to be told by the right hon. gentleman, but people were glad to get that assurance; the country quickly responded to this statement of policy, and conditions in 1923 improved.

Our return to normal conditions, Mr. Speaker, has always been held up from time to time; that has been the trouble. We had a proper policy laid down by Mr. Fielding in 1923 "tariff stability" and we had immediate action, with business starting to pick up again at once, with a greater volume of production. The trouble is that we are always being halted and thrown back through this government forgetting all about pledges and statements. Under this government pledges were only made to be broken. We had a period of tranquillity and stabilization in 1923, but my hon. friend brought down his famous "death knell of protection" budget in 1924, and oh, what a year that was! Any member of the House who has followed things at all knows that 1924 was a very bad year. Conditions were better in 1923, but in 1924 the famous "death knell of protection" budget was introduced. Now this year the Minister of Finance says:

> Nowhere are the results—

When pointing to the country's growing trade:

> Nowhere are the results of this growing trade more accurately reflected than in the increased earnings of Canadian railways and in the annual statements of Canadian financial institutions and Canadian industrial corporations.

The minister is absolutely right in his reference to railway traffic. Railway traffic is an excellent barometer. The best barometer we have to-day, so far as this House is concerned, is found in the reports of our own ralway which have been considered by committees of this House, and with which the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) is very familiar. He will be able to tell my hon. friend that he is entirely wrong from his knowledge of what the country did. He will be able to take the minister's barometer, the minister's yardstick, and say to the minister: Yes, there was nothing wrong done in 1925 as regards the tariff—some of the few still sane members of the Liberal party on fiscal questions saw to that—there was nothing wrong done as regards the tariff in 1925, and the country starts to pick up. We gained, certainly we gained in 1925, just as we gained in 1923, just as we go off in 1922, just as we come on after the pledge of the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding that there would be no more of this nonsense. We go down again in 1924 just so soon as notice is served on Canadian industry to get out, that the first step has been taken. Then we have the reassuring budget of last year the effect of which was to increase the customs duties by approximately $1,000,000. Then when you get the country responding and going ahead again, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance this year tries to see if he cannot put another kink in that progress.

I said the hon. member for North Waterloo could show how wrong the minister is in thinking that the Canadian National figures showed great progress. Let us see. This government always says that it has nothing to do with the management of the Canadian National Railways, and of course it has not, except sometimes when certain matters are up, perhaps a by-election here or a by-election there, and then they seem to get a little bit of assistance, which we do not think is quite right. But speaking generally they have nothing to do with the railway.

Mr. ROBB: Just what does my hon. friend mean when he says we get a little assistance when a by-election is on?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let my hon. friend just ask the minister next to him, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), and if his memory is good—sometimes it is bad—he will be able to tell him as to the political disclosures of certain reductions in rates in Nova Scotia which came very conveniently for a certain election.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend's memory is bad; I pass on.

There are two propositions here, Mr. Speaker. The first proposition is that the government has absolutely nothing to do with the railway net figures. The government can claim credit if, as a result of government fiscal policies, new industries are set going and there is increased production. It can claim credit for the gross revenue of the company, though most of the credit is the fields', I admit. If the traffic goes up markedly, the government can say: Look at this traffic; it shows the country is going ahead very well under our regime. The Canadian National figures show a drop in 1924 as against 1923 of 4,749,721 revenue tons. The yardstick of the railway's activities in freight, namely, the ton miles of revenue freight, fell off 1,613,998,426 revenue ton miles, and as a matter of fact there was a reduction in gross railway revenue that year of $17,547,305.

In 1925 the attack on Canadian industry ceased for the time being. With practically no tariff changes, the country starts to function better, and just here let me point out one peculiar thing which I commend to the study of the hon. member on the other side who has particular knowledge of the railway situation. This country really starts to get on its feet and get going when the government cannot function. If there is any moral to be drawn from last year it is that this government is of no help, but a danger to the country when it can function, but when it cannot function; when it is in dry dock waiting for repairs; when S.O.S. calls go out to the west and the embattled farmers are not here yet, and when the Governor General will not sign orders in council for them, the country starts to go ahead and do well. The moral is there; the facts also are there. Well, business improved in 1925. Does my hon. friend think business ought or ought not to improve having regard to the distance that Canada has travelled from the universal cataclysm of the war? Does he not think so? Does he not think our curve should be up? Does he not know it? If he thinks so, just let us see what he is doing when he refers to these railway figures. It is perfectly true that the railway figures my hon. friend has in mind show a net income of $32,264,414 in 1925 as against an income of $20,430,694 in 1923, but the hon. gentleman when he saw those figures forgot that the government had not anything to do with them, and that the whole betterment—did the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) say, Hear, hear?

Sir EUGENE FISET: No. You are stretching your imagination.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the hon. gentleman just yawned. He is a good yawner.

Sir EUGENE FISET: It is not surprising either.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I admit that some gentlemen would like to forget that the whole of that betterment is the result of economies in the administration of the railways and notwithstanding smaller revenues. The whole claim my hon. friend makes to improvement is to be found in those figures, and they are the only railway figures that will give him any comfort. I say there was less traffic, yes, less gross revenue and less traffic; for the Canadian National Railway statement shows that in 1925 the revenue was $244,971,202, while for 1923 it was $253,000,000 odd. What had this government been doing to the country in the meantime? Well, they had been playing with their tariff reductions. Instead of there having been progress from 1923 onwards there has been retrogression. Let us take my hon. friend's own yardstick, the business activities of the railways, and let us see what they disclose. They show a decrease in gross revenue of $8,164,285. It may be said that some of the orders made as to rates are responsible to some extent for that reduction. But that would not be true in the case of tonnage. In 1925, the great year of prosperity, according to my hon. friend, there was, as compared with 1923, a drop in revenue tonnage of 2,249,081 tons. There was also a drop of 519,614,436 ton miles of revenue freight in that year of alleged wonderful prosperity. And the figures of our railway are confirmed by the government's own figures. The Dominion statistician has issued a report on railways, including of course the National railway, and that shows a total freight of 103,751,559 tons in 1923 as against 96,239,379 tons in 1925, a decrease in Canada's activities in 1925 as against 1923 of 7,518,180 tons. Perhaps I am wrong in using the expression "Canada's activities"—

Mr. EULER: Could not some of that reduction be attributed to the fact that the railways encountered motor truck competition?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Ah! The motor truck is always with us. I did not notice that the minister said very much about that when he was dealing with the railways.

Mr. EULER: It is a fact though.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have to consider also the through traffic, but there is not much difference there; at any rate the difference seems to be fairly proportionate. I have not worked out the calculation myself, but looking at it roughly I do not think the difference would amount to a great deal. I have just taken the figures which the statistical department gave me as to the gross tonnage, and the hon. gentleman will agree with me that there is an astonishing falling off.

My hon. friend has been drawing certain conclusions from certain trade statistics. As to that he is right; the trade statistics standing by themselves are good. But taking his own figures as to the activities of our railways, and these trade figures, can they both be right? It is true that we are exporting much more than we formerly did, but do these figures alone indicate national prosperity? No, Canadian labour has not enjoyed its proper share of trade. The prosperity of the country, outside of certain lines, is unfortunately more fictitious than real. I put these questions to the Minister of Finance: Does he think that a country can really be said to be prosperous that has a diminishing home market? Does he not really think that it is a great thing to have Canadian labour employed and to have a large national payroll? I think he does. I think he would agree with me that no country can be said to be really prosperous whose home market is diminishing. The minister's own figures prove the truth of what I say. Taking his own yardstick as the gauge of prosperity, namely the business done by the railways, we find that we had less production in 1925 than we had in 1923. Can there be any doubt about that? The minister's budget speech, yardstick, shows it so there can be not much doubt about it. Our exports for the calendar year 1925—and I take the calendar year because our railways follow the calendar year—were $254,569,672 greater than they were for 1923, and at the same time our imports for 1925 were less by $12,763,167 than they were for 1923. Smaller production, Mr. Speaker, with increased exports and lessened imports, indicate no general prosperity. Will my hon. friend claim that it does? Can anyone claim honestly that it does? Let me state it again. This is what the minister has proved: There have been increased exports and lessened imports. But smaller production, with increased exports and lessened imports, does not indicate general prosperity. What does it indicate? It indicates lessened domestic activities, a shrinking home market, a shrinking national pay roll—what else can it indicate? We might just as well be honest with ourselves—what else can it indicate? Here is the home production that much less. Here is that enormous increase in exports, and lessened imports. What does it amount to except that the great buying power of the country, which is always the wages of the masses, is not here to make its home purchases as it did in 1923?

Again, is this condition not another indication of what the exodus of our workers really means? I admit at once that certain price modifications will be found. In 1923 our wheat prices were not as good as they were in 1925. Therefore we got more dollars for tonnage exported in 1925 than in 1923. But that is only a modification; it does not furnish a complete answer. While we have had an increase in the case of wheat there have been declines in the case of other commodities. For example, we have had a drop in the price of paper—a very important article of commerce, as my hon. friend will admit. Does my hon. friend really think that exports, at the expense of a loss in the home market, make Canada prosperous? Does he not really know, as has been pointed out by an American authority, that Canada is borrowing? I am not now speaking of government borrowing. We never borrowed very much in New York, but eight months ago the direct government obligations of Canada, although three times as great as they were when this government took office, were small compared with the great borrowings which as a country we have made in New York. My recollection is that in 1915 or 1916, when the calculation was made, American investments in Canada amounted to $420,000,000. I saw a statement, I think by the general manager of the Royal Bank—and it seems to be fortified by American authority—that the American investments in Canada to-day amount to approximately $2,500,000,000. Does my hon. friend not know that with the necessity for finding interest on that immense amount of money we must have larger exports? Here unfortunately we are not paying merely by these exports, increased as they are; but by the continued transfer of the natural resources of Canada to our friends to the south. Again, that a country cannot hold its own population is no indication of prosperity.

I am not going into figures which have been given before in regard to immigration. I will take the government's own figures relating to present conditions. The last I have been able to get are for January and February of this year. In January the number of immigrants entering Canada was 2,324, and in February, 4,396, a total of 6,720. As against the total immigration into Canada for the same two months in this wonderful year of prosperity, we find that the figures given by the Department of Labour of the United States show an emigration from Canada into the United States for January of 7,155 and for February 6,086, a total of 13,241 or 6,521 more than our total immigration for the two months—nearly double the number of people we have been able to get into this country, with all the millions we have been spending. My hon. friend will know very quickly when we have prosperity in this country: we will have it when we have work for the people who are here, thus obviating the necessity of their leaving. And you will have immigration to Canada when there is a job for the man who comes in. There will be immigration when money is really available for the development of the country, something which my hon. friend wishes, but which he takes such painful care in this budget to prevent.

I am now going to deal with the claim with regard to prudent administration. It is a lovely mouthful of words. I always like to take my hon. friend's own figures. He has been very good this year, in the preparation of his budget, in classifying the expenditures under different heads. He sets forth three different classes of payments which this country has to make—the principal expenditure attributable to the war, other fixed and public debt charges, and general expenditure. He then gives us the costs under those different headings which he conceives to be proper, and I am going to follow them as closely as I can.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

I will first refer to the principal expenditure attributable to the war. I have taken my hon. friend's list and made out a similar list for 1921-22, dividing the expenditures as he has divided them. I have tried to make it so that it will be fair as a matter of comparison. For example, under the heading of National Defence is now grouped not only the militia activities but also the naval and air activities. I have put them all together, therefore, for 1921-22. In 1921-22 we collected our income tax through the Finance department; we now collect it through the Customs department, therefore I have transferred the item of the cost of collecting taxes from Finance in 1922 and put them under Customs, so that this item can be comparable. In connection with the first heading we have a reduction in cost. These war expenses in 1921-22 amounted to $179,264,098, and for the year just closed, $163,997,000, a saving of $15,249,098. I wonder whether anyone who thought for a moment would not expect that? We have not had an intervening war. As we move from the war those costs go down. Take for example the drop between $9,000,000 and $10,000,000 under the head of soldiers' civil re-establishment. Does anyone claim credit on the part of the government for that saving? There simply was not another war. The number of men still to be taught by way of vocational training and otherwise is disappearing. There was no economy there; it was simply a case of less ground to cover. As a matter of fact, on fair grounds no credit whatever is to be taken by any government for the saving of that $15,249,089.

The next item is, other fixed and public debt charges. In 1922 those amounted to $27,034,553; for the past year they amounted to $31,458,000, an increase of some $4,400,000. Well that is an increase of this government, but it would be absolutely unfair to charge this government with the increase in discount and expenses of loans—just as unfair as it would be to charge the old government with the large item of premium, discount and exchange of $3,302,674 which was peculiar to 1922. Both are matters over which the administration as such had no control whatever. This administration has no control over the item which they have had to insert of $3,530,000 as against $82,636 in 1922 in connection with discount and expenses of loans. The accident is that the loans fell due and my hon. friend had to look after them. In 1922 the accident was that I had to produce a great deal of money for loans falling due in New York. My hon. friend nods his head in assent. I am giving the government in this the benefit of $200,000 because their item is $200,000 more than mine was.

Unless we throw both these items out I have an absolute right to take credit for making the country a great deal of money in connection with the item of exchange, because over and above every single penny paid out for premium, discount and exchange during those years of bad exchanges, we made $9,848,643. But I am saying nothing about that; it goes; it was an accident; it is something that does not enter into the details of ordinary administration. I would do with that just as I would do with the other item which is against my hon. friend, namely, get rid of it. They ought both to be thrown out. The result there is that instead of an increase of $4,423,447, the real increase is only $976,083 I am not blaming my hon. friend at all in regard to it; he has added that in connection with not war pensions, but the pensions and superannuation of servants of the House. I am not saying anything about this addition of $976,083, but it is an addition.

I come now to general expenditures. For general expenditure the amount actually paid in 1921-22 was $159,421,140 as against $147,435,000 in 1925-26. If we deduct from that item of $3,292,674 that my hon. friend agrees should come out, just as I have taken off from his item of $3,447,364,—we have an actual decrease of $8,693,466. That means that this government had the right to say on these figures: We have run the business of the country for $8,693,466 less than in 1921-22. That falls very far short of the claims that have been made; but just let us look into what the figures of 1921-22 contain. I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me that it is not fair to charge the administration of 1922 with railway deficits which in his administration are transferred to the railways. No man with any ordinary sense of fairness would suggest that. Yet we were charged in 1922 with railway deficits amounting to $6,326,800 for running expenses and $1,364,254 for capital.

We used to help the provinces under the Agricultural Instruction Act. My hon. friend wipes that out. The government say that while they admit agricultural instruction to be a good thing, it is immoral to help the provinces with money raised by Dominion taxation. I might point out in passing how briefly this government can stay with anything, because only this very year we have this proposition that so long as the provinces want money wrung from the Dominion taxpayer, not for the laudable purpose of agricultural instruction but for the equally laudable purpose of old age pensions, it is quite moral and proper to give it to them. So it is. As the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) suggests, one means votes in this House and the other does not.

Under the Highways Act payments to the provinces are reduced by $1,399,008. There is no administration there, under the terms of the act the payments are reduced. I wonder if the government think we should also compare this item of $5,592,703, the final payment for the government's shipbuilding programme which was stopped in 1922. Are they entitled to any great credit because they have not gone on with another? Nevertheless, for the purpose of comparison that is what they must urge, although it is ridiculous to attempt such a comparison. All these items together make a total of $15,769,335. We have the reduction of $8,693,466 shown by including all these items which are not the subject of comparison under the wildest guess, because the work is all stopped or transferred to the provinces or the railways. The government cannot throw the money away for these purposes even if they want to do so; there is no demand on them for it. In order to find the correct result, therefore, we must deduct from those non-comparable items of $15,769,335 the alleged saving. What do we find? In this past year when things are supposed to be more nearly normal, when difficulties are supposed to be composed, we find that the government have actually spent in comparable services $7,075,869 more than was spent by the government in 1922.

In getting at that result I am not taking the figures down to the last five cent piece or anything like that; I am taking them by and large. For example in 1922 we had all the cost of the Grand Trunk arbitration which amounted to something like half a million. I am not taking that off, although there was nothing last year to compare with it. I recognize that from time to time you have these different items; you have something one year and something else another year. It is therefore not fair to strike them off, but it is absolutely unfair to seek to compare accounts with other accounts which contain items and liabilities entirely transferred on to other shoulders, items transferred to the provinces and items transferred to the railways.

So that this "prudent administration" just comes down to this, that in respect of comparable items and expenditure within their control the government have managed to spend in the last year of grace $7,075,869 more than the former government, whom they accuse of such frightful extravagance, spent in the year 1921-22. I will now hand to Hansard the table containing the comparative figures to which I have referred:

Mr. ROBB: And notwithstanding all that my hon. friend has said, we have reduced taxation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will deal with that for a minute. The government has boasted of having got such immense revenues, and certainly it has levied taxes which no other government has ever done. It can devise nuisance taxes in a way unknown to any other government and it can multiply and duplicate those taxes in a manner peculiar to itself. Before talking of reduction of taxation the minister should compare the basis of taxation in 1922 with that of to-day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When six o'clock was called I was about to discuss really the only remaining subject I desire to touch on, because I intend reserving my criticisms on the details of tariff and income tax to the appropriate place in committee. I am quite sure that we will have amendments, particularly in connection with the income taxes, some of the present resolutions are simply unworkable, and I think the only matter now left for me is the references made to the reduction in debt by the Minister of Finance.

We have an improved situation in Canada which, so far as our finances are concerned, is pretty well covered by the decrease in the demands of the railways upon our treasury. The minister in his budget this year points out that during the year 1924-25 assistance to the railways amounted to $74,000,000, and that this assistance was made up of $10,000,000 in cash advances and $64,000,000 in guaranteed bonds. This year we have a very much smaller sum, and so far as our governmental finances are concerned the situation is changed much for the better as a result of this lessened demand.

This budget is particularly interesting, because the Minister of Finance draws a distinction between guarantees given for refunding purposes and other guarantees. He refers to the fact that the assistance to the railways last year amounted to $74,000,000 exclusive of an issue of bonds for refunding purposes. That issue of bonds was guaranteed by the government in the same way as the $64,000,000 was guaranteed. We have this year, for the first time from this government, an admission of the fact that there is some difference in liability when the endorsements are for the purpose of refunding and when they are not. Assistance to the railways is cut down in this case to the amount of the guarantee plus the cash, when that guarantee is not used for refunding purposes, so for the first time we now have admitted the difference between guarantees for refunding purposes and new obligations. What is that difference? Everyone knows the only difference is that in connection with refunding purposes the guarantee does not add to total obligations while in the case of the guarantee being given for new purposes, to pay up deficits and so on, the country's obligations are increased by the extent of that guarantee. There is no other difference or distinction.

Just let us see what the position is when we guarantee bonds for new liabilities. In the case of our railways, everyone admits that they stand on our books at a far greater sum of money than they are worth. This is admitted in the budget and is referred to by the minister. Of course we are liable for it; we own the railways, and run them through our agents, the board; we issue obligations in the name of our agents, endorsing them ourselves. Is it not idle to pretend that there is the slightest difference to the liability of the country whether we are there as endorsers or as makers of those bonds, when we all know that we already have far more in the enterprise than we can ever get out of it? We have never had any real defence given by the government of what has gone on in the past. Hon. gentlemen who were not in the former House will be surprised to learn that the government have been treating these obligations as if they were mere nothing, as if the thing was paid for when it was signed—thank God, that thing is over and done with. That has been their attitude. This year, of course, they are seeing the difference, and they are pointing out the distinction, and that distinction can only be what I say, but to the extent of $118,000,000 odd this government have so dealt with the question—that is, they have issued these obligations and paid not the slightest attention to them in looking after their capital accounts.

But they have a defence, at least, only that kind of defence which this government as a rule has, and even then it is not founded upon proper facts. That defence is: Well, you did it. Mr. Speaker, in the first instance, the defence is not true. In the second instance, if true, it can be absolutely no justification for continued deceit, for that is all it is, and much more so now that we have to-day from the Finance minister the distinction drawn between guarantees given for refunding purposes and other guarantees.

I say we did not do it. On the other hand, as far back as 1919-20 we recognized the fact that the railways stood on our books for far more than they were worth, and we treated $284,000,000 odd in that one year as inactive, something which could not be relied upon, something which certainly was bringing in no income, and we increased our net debt accordingly. Some hon. gentlemen who were not in the former House may not be quite familiar with this. We arrive at our net debt by deducting from our gross debt our assets, and when we ourselves knew that we had not the assets there, we thought we might just as well be honest to the country and to outsiders and say so, and so we did. We took off that sum, which had the effect of adding to our national debt in that one year $284,000,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What year was that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In 1920, and that has been referred to by supporters of the government. I will not say that any members of the government were quite so foolish as to do it, but the increase in the debt that year has been referred to as an evidence of improper Conservative administration when the whole fact of the matter is that it was simply a belated statement of truth. That is what we did.

Now I am going to put on Hansard the figures taken from the books of the Finance department and from the public accounts showing exactly how this debt question has been treated. In the first instance, the statement shows the net national debt at the end of each fiscal year ending March 31st; these are the figures of the Minister of Finance and of his department. Then under the heading of "Aid to Railways" is shown the cash loans granted. The next column gives the aid given by guarantee of bonds, and the next shows the total redemption of debt both from cash loans and guaranteed issue proceeds. The table is as follows:

—	Net National Debt, fiscal year ended March 31st	Aid to Railways		Total redemption of debt both from cash loans and guaranteed issue proceeds
		By cash loans*	By guarantee of bonds
	$	$	$	$
1920	2,248,868,623	45,780,690	17,109,027	For redemption purposes.
1921	2,340,878,983	109,662,655	50,000,000	56,382,626
1922	2,422,135,801	97,950,645	61,000,000	48,871,443
1923	2,453,776,868	77,863,936	nil	25,275,902
1924	2,417,783,274	23,710,616	72,500,000	11,469,369
1925	2,417,437,685	9,934,452	81,000,000	24,007,533

*Treated as inactive assets and not deducted from Gross Debt.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, the answer to the charge that the surplus of guarantees over debt retirements could not be deducted from the gross debt always was: Well, you did it. No such charge can be made for 1920 when we voluntarily added $284,000,000 to the debt, nor in 1921 when debt retirements were actually $6,382,626 more than the guarantees.

Then the year 1922 comes along, and in that year the endorsements amounted to $61,000,000; the retirements amounted to only $48,871,443. Now of that year this administration was responsible only for the final quarter. I think, as a matter of fact, the railway payments had been made in the first part of the year; I do not think railway guarantees were given during the latter part of the year. I may be wrong in that, but it makes no difference. Right or wrong, there was only one government responsible for the final marshalling of the figures, and that was this government. These figures are marshalled in March, of 1922; the Conservative administration went out of power in December, of 1921. But the whole defence is that we did it. Well, as a matter of fact, we had absolutely nothing to do with the marshalling of these figures. Payments are made from time to time in the Finance department, the same as in any other department, from cash on hand as the necessity arises, but the marshalling is always done, as it ought to be done, in the department itself, when the accounts for the year are being made up. So the result of it is for those three years, that we have a surplus, the last year, of guarantees over debts paid of $12,000,000 odd, and taking the full three years into consideration we have a surplus of $5,745,931 of guarantees over the debts paid off.

In the year 1923 we have a large sum of money coming in from England, something not earned by this government at all, something earned by the transactions of the former government with the Mother Country. That money is paid in cash. The government has the cash and they pay the whole of the commitments thrown upon them in cash, namely $77,863,936. The next year, 1924, simply because this government has not the cash, we start in with heavy guaranteees, and guarantees were given amounting to $72,500,000, as against retirements of $11,469,369; and in 1925, $81,000,000 as against retirements of $24,007,533.

Everyone agrees, first, that the property is not worth anything like what we have against it; secondly, that all the cash payments through all these years have been treated as money put away, treated as money bringing in nothing, treated as a dead asset, and they have not been deducted from the gross debt. Hon. gentlemen will also see that the real controversy turns entirely upon these two years, 1924 and 1925, where we have a net addition of guarantees over and above debts—and therefore of liabilities 100 per cent—of $118,000,000.

In the first instance, Mr. Speaker, let us just consider the absurdity of this position. When the money is your own money that you can afford to put into the property it is gone. It is no good, it is something to be written off. When you have no money and you borrow and get the cash, as was the case in some of the previous years, again the money that you borrow and put in yourself is gone. It is not deducted from the gross debt. On the other hand by some peculiar kind of—well it is not reasoning, it is misleading the public—

An hon. MEMBER: Juggling.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes, "juggling" is a better word. Where you do not get money out of your own pocket, or on your own bond, but simply endorse the bonds of your agent who cannot pay you—namely the board—in that case the investment is perfectly good, and there is no responsibility. The thing is so perfectly ridiculous that my hon. friends were very well advised in the past when they admitted that there was no defence of the practice except the defence of "you did it." Now, I will simply put on Hansard the figures. The addition which ought to have been made to the net debt of the country for these years is $118,023,098. That is made up in this way: In 1924 the bonds guaranteed amounted to $72,500,000 odd, less redemptions of $11,469,369, leaving of increased responsibility $61,030,631. In 1925 the bonds guaranteed amounted to $81,000,000, less redemptions of $24,007,533 odd, leaving $56,992,467 added to the country's liability. Total $118,023,098.

I am not going to say anything about the little differences we have had in connection with fixing our national debt. We have had a revaluation of securities in the past, for example in connection with the debts contracted by Roumania and Greece, and the course followed by the directors of the late lamented Home Bank, which added pretty well to the showing for the financial year in which the particular arrangement was adopted. Now we had a change of ownership in connection with an elevator at Vancouver, built, if I am correct, by the Conservative administration. A debt reduction follows in the case of this elevator because it has been transferred to the commissioners at Vancouver and they are paying interest. In that case technically I think they are right because any investment which is paying interest ought, I think, to be deducted.

With these aids the Minister of Finance now calculates our net debt as $2,395,084,685. But if we are to be fair to ourselves and to the country we have got to add the $118,023,098, the increase of the country's railway guarantees over obligations retired, which makes the net debt not $2,395,084,685, as the minister states but $2,513,107,783, or $90,971,982 more than when the present government took office. Whatever defence may be hunted up by the government I hope it is not going to be the same defence as in the past, namely, "you did it." I have given the actual figures, and they cannot be controverted by the minister. Why, I am fairer to the minister than he is to himself. Take for example his statement as to guarantees. Last year over and above retirements he says it was $64,000,000. In my calculation I did not bring it as high as that, I only made it approximately $56,000,000.

Mr. DIONNE: Who is right?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. gentleman who asked the question stand up so that I may see who he is?

Mr. DIONNE: I simply asked the question who is right in regard to these figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think the figures of the minister may be correct, but in fairness to him I think I should reduce the amount as I am reducing it.

Mr. DIONNE: Will the hon. gentleman answer the question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend will keep quiet for a few minutes.

I should like to see the government act with a little fairness in regard to this question in the future. We have not had the truth in the past, but we ought to have it in the future so that there should be no dispute about the matter. The figures of the department have been given. If they are wrong let us get them right. Do not let us argue any more about things as to which there should be absolutely no room for debate at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown what the figures for the national debt really are. I have also demonstrated what the results have been of the so-called "prudent administration." I have endeavoured to show you of what the so-called tremendous prosperity consists, and now close, reserving further comment until the complete government proposals will be disclosed in committee.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, a short time will suffice for me to say what I have to say with regard to the budget.

First of all, let me call the attention of the House to one or two items in the estimated expenditure which I think are of vital interest. The Minister of Finance has given the expenditures attributable to the war as $163,997,000 or 47.83 per cent. Subsequently he shows that these are not all the expenditures, and he enumerates a number of other items which I take it would bring the total up to over 50 per cent. It ought to be clearly understood by the people that of the total annual expenditures which we make here, fully one-half goes toward the payment of the interest charges of the last war. We are told that we need some war memorials. I would suggest that in this huge amount we have a very imposing war memorial, and one that is likely to prove very enduring indeed. Notwithstanding that huge amount, I observe that later on the amount proposed this year for what is called "national defence" is higher than the entire amount proposed to be spent on civil government. I know some hon. members in this House are inclined to take some of us to task because we take the opportunity from time to time of calling the attention of the government and of the country to the necessity of reduction in our war expenditures and the futility of war expenditures. Sometimes the papers take a fling at us and say we are making our annual speech on the war proposition, but I cannot accept this budget without emphasizing these figures given to us very clearly by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that show that we spend half our entire income upon war expenditures connected with the past war. As long as that situation continues it seems to me we are fully justified in discussing any measures that would tend to prevent any future occurrence of this kind.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What part of that expenditure would the hon. member eliminate, or what part could be eliminated?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Of the war expenditure?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will come to that a little later. It is there now as a charge, but I suggest here merely that we should be very careful not to do anything that might increase the charge in the days to come.

There are other fixed and public debt charges amounting to 9.17 per cent of the total expenditure on government services. That means that fully 60 per cent of the entire expenditure of this country is what is termed fixed charges, so that at the best we in this House have control over less than 40 per cent of the expenditures. Again, of that 40 per cent a very considerable proportion of that amount is in the form of certain statutory expenditures; so that after all the amount that we directly control in this House is comparatively small.

I do not intend to enumerate the items which were given us by the Minister of Finance, but I might note two or three by way of illustration. For example, for the health of the people of this country we spend .19 per cent of our total expenditure. For scientific institutions we spent .29 per cent. For labour, a department in which I am of course interested, I note we spend .36 per cent. These most important departments of our public life are of such insignificance in the eyes of the parliament of this country that adding these three items we spend less than one per cent in carrying on what some of us regard as very important matters. We have, however, the opportunity of making some savings, it seems to me, even within the limits which I have indicated. We all recognize that in the co-ordination of the civil service we might effect very considerable saving. I should like to read a sentence or two from the Ottawa Citizen of January 26, 1926, which indicate the possible extent of such saving. On the editorial page there are certain facts and considerations as follows:

1. That the National Civil Service Reform League of the United States estimates a loss of $750,000,000 per annum in all government services or 25 per cent of the whole.

2. That in Canada there is an approximate comparative loss of $60,000,000 through loose, inefficient, and non-competitive government business.

3. That in 1918 the total personnel in the federal civil service was taken out of patronage and placed under open competition, or merit. To-day 33⅓ per cent of these positions have been returned to the patronage system as political plunder.

I think that any one who wishes well for the future of Canada will come to the conclusion that we must not return any further along the road of patronage. I do not intend to discuss to-night the weaknesses that have been exhibited in our civil service. We are all aware of these from the recent investigation, but at the same time, as a country we cannot afford to return to the patronage system. We should restore to an independent commission those positions which have been taken back under government patronage. The same might be said in regard to the great purchasing agencies where undoubtedly a large amount that is now expended, might be saved. Such a procedure would also greatly improve the general morale of the public.

Turning for a few minutes to the revenue side of our account, I note that from the income tax we received only 14.73 per cent of our total ordinary revenue. We have had a great deal of discussion in the last three weeks in this House in regard to the reduction in the income tax. It would seem to me that we have not so fully borne in mind that, after all, the income tax forms a very very small proportion of the total taxation of the people of this country, being less than 15 per cent. There are those who have objected to the income tax on the ground that we need more money for our investments. I am inclined to think that those who make such statements have not given sufficient attention to the underlying economic conditions. Our banks say they have money standing idle at the present time. I should like to suggest that instead of more money for investments we need greater buying power on behalf of the great masses of the people of this country. I would commend the Minister of Finance for reducing the taxes on the low incomes, and I would commend him for distinguishing between the incomes derived from earnings and the incomes derived from investments, but I am sorry to see any lessening of the tax on the higher incomes. On the other hand, I should like to see these very greatly increased, because as it is we are giving larger and larger amounts for investments, perpetuating and accentuating one of the evils from which the people are suffering the world over.

Certain hon. gentlemen have been ridiculing the analysis of the economic situation which was made a few years ago before the Banking and Commerce committee. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and the Minister of Finance himself have laughed at the analysis which was made there. There are many thoughtful students of economics to-day who are voicing some of those opinions in ever louder tones. I should like some hon. gentlemen if they have time to read this article which I note in the April number of the Atlantic Monthly, because it contains in summary form an argument which has been recently set forth in a very important book on Profits, by Foster and Catchings. I want to read just a paragraph or two that will give the idea of the argument. For example the article states:

> The engineering societies, under the direction of Herbert Hoover, have shown that we are already equipped to double our volume of production.

That is, instead of wanting to invest more fixed capital in railways, factories and other machinery of production, we have already at the present time capacity on this continent more than to double our present production. Why then do we want more investment? The trouble fundamentally is, as the article goes on to show:

> What the people must have if prosperity is to last is the money with which to pay for goods rather than more and more devices for enabling them to acquire goods for which they do not pay.

We are told and we have been told in this House that the labouring people are receiving higher and yet higher wages. The authors of this article go on to say:

> The recent researches of Paul H. Douglas, soon to be published, show that the gain in real wages in the United States from 1890 to 1919 did not average one-half of one per cent a year. For a generation or two we have fallen far short of making the gains in human welfare which should have resulted from our scientific progress.
> Progress towards greater total production and resultant higher standards of living is retarded because consumer buying does not keep pace with production.

In rather a humorous way the authors of this article, which is entitled "The Dilemma of Thrift," put the situation which faces us at the present time.

> What a mess we get into! We work hard to pile our shelves high with what we most desire, and then we have to stop working because we are unable to take these things off the shelves and enjoy them. Though we produce much less than we could easily produce, we do not distribute to advantage even what we succeed in producing. We condemn extravagant buying at the very time when industry slows down because people are not buying enough. Then, while business wanes because it lacks consumers, we put taxes on consumption; and, precisely when business is in greatest need of people with incomes to spend, we reduce those incomes by reducing wages and dividends. We celebrate "buyers' week" and "thrift week" at one and the same time. By investing our savings, instead of spending them, we deny ourself to-day in order to produce more in the future, although we are already equipped to produce more than we know how to use. While many at home are in want, we strive more and more to send more of our wealth abroad; but we are loath to import much in return. Nations, at least, seem convinced that it is more blessed to give than to receive. A topsy turvy world! Alice in Wonderland found nothing more paradoxical.

I would like to turn back to our accounts for a moment. I said that we received only 14.3 per cent from our income tax, but we expect to receive from our excise taxes, namely sales tax, stamp tax and so on, 25.35 per cent, and from our customs import duties 33.80 per cent. It is not the income taxes that weigh the heaviest or that weigh at all upon the ordinary citizen. The great majority of our wage-earners and the lower salaried men in this country do not pay income tax at all. The tax that weighs on the ordinary citizen is the indirect tax such as the sales tax and the import tax and on this customs import duty alone we pay 33.80 per cent. The greater part of our taxation comes in this indirect way.

In our income taxation we have been very careful to exempt those who have children; the more children you have, the less heavy the income tax weighs. But in the case of indirect taxation the more children you have, the heavier the tax, because of course we have heavier expenditure for food, clothing, housing and all along the line. So that in these indirect taxes which form the great bulk of the taxation which is placed upon the people of this country, there is not only no exemption for those who have the heaviest burdens to carry, but an added tax on those who are already overburdened. That is about the situation as we find it with regard to our estimated expenditure.

I have spoken of the way in which we may conserve something of the comparatively small amount of our revenues over which we have control. Just to illustrate some questions which arise outside of this parliament building but which receive scant attention inside, I should like to quote a paragraph from an address recently delivered by Dr. C. D. Howe, Dean of the Faculty of Forestry of Toronto University, to the Canadian Club According to the Ottawa Citizen, he said:

> In the last seventy-five years nearly a million square miles of forests have been destroyed by fire in Canada. Even to-day three million acres are burned each year, equivalent to a strip of land a mile wide from Halifax to Vancouver. Does it matter who is Prime Minister as long as we continue to lay waste our forest wealth at the rate of three million acres a year?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

This is my point: We spend a great deal of time talking about a few dollars rise or fall in income tax, about a few cents rise or fall in certain customs duties, while in the meantime great economic questions find hardly any place in the discussions which go on in this House. I think Mr. Howe is quite right in the question which he asks:

> Does it matter who is Prime Minister as long as we continue to lay waste our forest wealth at the rate of three million acres a year?

I will not take the time of the House to go into the way in which we have been dissipating many of our other natural resources. There came into my hand only a few weeks ago a paper delivered last March by Mr. C. M. Campbell before the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, on our Canadian natural resources. Some of us have been rather prone to emphasize the fact that we have almost unbounded natural resources in this country, but these scientists are now beginning to tell us that we have been altogether to optimistic with regard to these matters and that already our soils are being depleted, our forests are rapidly diminishing and even our mines are not nearly so extensive as we have imagined them to be. These things, it seems to me, should give us pause, and instead of spending three or four weeks in discussing what, after all, are almost entirely political matters, we as representatives of the people ought to spend a great deal more of our time in considering the conservation and the proper utilization of these great natural resources.

I wish hon. gentlemen could read a little book, The Tragedy of Waste, by Stuart Chase, with regard to the wastes that are occurring on this continent through lack of co-ordination in the management of our industrial affairs. I remember several years ago reading an interesting little book by King C. Gillette. a practical business man who was accustomed to sizing up industries from the standpoint of the efficiency engineer. He looked over the industrial field and asked whether we were at all efficient? He said, among other things:

> The engineers estimate that the loss to industries, through lack of efficiency is as follows: Mens' clothing industry, 63.78 per cent; building industry, 53 per cent; printing industry, 57.61 per cent; boot and shoe industry, 40.93 per cent; metal industry, 28.66 per cent; textile industry, 49.20 per cent.

This, he points out must average something like 50 per cent, a loss which he thinks is chargeable to lack of co-ordination. In the author's opinion, an individual under the system of co-ordination which he is advocating could produce enough in five years to maintain him for a lifetime of seventy years, no matter how extravagant he might be. This comes, not from some university professor or from some academic dreamer, but from a practical business man who, after looking over the arrangements of our industrial system as it operates to-day, suggests that there are great gaps to be filled in and duplications to be cut out, and that co-ordination is absolutely necessary if we are to produce and distribute economically and avoid the waste which is now taking place. I suggest that if our industry is 50 per cent inefficient we should pay a little more attention to recommendations of that kind and less attention to protecting our industrial concerns from outside competition. Let me say again, as I have said before that in my judgment neither protection nor free trade will solve our present problems; we must get behind all that and recognize clearly that solutions which perhaps might have been satisfactory some years ago are no longer feasible inasmuch as new factors have entered the industrial field in recent years.

There is one other matter to which I desire to call the attention of the House in connection with our financial statement. I have spoken of the estimated expenditure and the estimated revenue and made a few comments in each case. There is also the balance sheet, if I may so describe it, which the minister has submitted to parliament. On March 31, 1925, our net public debt stood at $2,417,437,685.59, and the minister estimates that there will be a decrease in the debt this year to the extent of $22,353,000 odd. That sounds a large amount, and as some hon. members of the opposition have pointed out it is only apparent in view of the fact that the Canadian National Railways have not been taken into account. Personally I hope the time is not far distant when, in preparing the balance sheet, our government will include the Canadian National Railways among the public works of the country. But after all, it must be remembered, this apparently large decrease of $22,000,000 which is anticipated is less than one per cent of the debt, so that if the Canadian National Railways are taken into consideration it is evident that we are not even paying the interest on our debt, let alone reducing the debt. That is the great point for us to emphasize. Most of us are unable to think in terms of millions or billions, but there are few who are incapable of thinking in percentages, and that is why I am trying to emphasize the percentages. We are therefore reducing the debt nominally by less than one per cent. And while this is an improvement on previous years it is still a very small reduction and does not touch the main problem at all.

As I have pointed out before, it is somewhat difficult for those of us who 9 p.m. belong to the minor parties to know how to vote on the budget, for the simple reason that only one amendment is permissible. We have therefore to vote for or against the amendment, and then for or against the main motion, for under normal circumstances we have no means of stating what we think should be the fiscal policy of the country. It may be, in fact it is true, that we in the labour movement are so small numerically that it could make no immediate difference to the House or to the country what we might propose as a fiscal policy. Nevertheless we are here to submit our policy to parliament, and as I cannot move an amendment to the budget I want to put on Hansard again, as I did two years ago when I had an opportunity of proposing an amendment to the budget, the views of those whom we labour members represent in this House.

With regard to taxation we believe (a) in the abolition of fiscal legislation that fosters and sustains class privilege; (b) in the removal of taxes from the necessities of life; (c) in the taxation of land values; and (d) after the exemption of small incomes, in a steeply graded income and inheritance taxation. And the eleventh plank of our platform provides for a capital levy for the extinction of the war debt.

I want to call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to the last two proposals. I cannot see why we in this country ought not as a federal government to impose an inheritance tax.

Mr. EULER: Would the hon. member add that tax to the inheritance tax already imposed by the provinces?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. Some of the provinces have an income tax which their citizens have to pay in addition to the federal income tax and I see no reason why we should not have a federal inheritance tax. In this connection I would observe that as between administrative bodies taxation is after all merely a matter of adjustment, and it is one that could be worked out between the Dominion and the provinces. I am inclined to think that in some respects the federal government have pre-empted too great a proportion of the taxation of the country. However, I am not discussing that question at the moment; rather, I am considering the principles underlying the proposal for an inheritance tax. I believe that we are absolutely right in suggesting that after a certain exemption, sufficiently large to enable a man's estate to provide for his immediate dependents, the rest of that estate ought to be very heavily taxed. Personally I would go a great deal further: I would say that it ought to be expropriated.

An hon. MEMBER: What would be the limit?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would not make any sugestion offhand; I am merely stating a general principle. But I would allow an exemption sufficiently large to enable the estate to take care of the man's immediate dependents, to give them a start in life, and after that I should think the state might very well take over the remainder. After all, when you come to financial wealth you must remember that you are dealing with something that is different from the real wealth of the country. In the case of real wealth the more I have the better it is for me and it is none the worse for you, but in the case of financial wealth, dollars and pounds, the more I have the worse it is for the community, because after all the dollar is simply an order on the services of the rest of the community. If we allow large numbers of these orders to be passed on from generation to generation it means that the rest of the community, that the unborn children of the rest of the community, are saddled with debt and have to pay services for which those who inherit these orders have rendered no real value. These are considerations to which we should give attention.

I would go further than this. With regard to the war debt, as has been suggested in a good many countries, we should go beyond taxing the income and tax the principle. In previous years I have called the attention of the House to what I think should be very clearly recognized by all Canadians. During the war we paid very little of the war expenditure; we simply borrowed and borrowed and put off until after the war the settling of accounts. The result was that a large number of people were enabled to profiteer during the war. Since the war we have issued a large number of tax-free bonds, and a large number of people indirectly profited by the war after it was over. And what is the result? The greater part of Canada's debt is not owed to people outside of this country; if it were it might then be regarded as an international debt which we were under obligation to pay. But the greater part of that debt is owed to people within the bounds of Canada, which simply means that we are drawing in these large revenues from different sections of the country, from the mass of the Canadian people, and turning them over to another group of Canadians, who I fancy do not constitute a very large group. Over a hundred million dollars a year is being drawn from the mass of Canadians to pay those comparatively few who own our war debt, and over half this amount is in tax free bonds. It often seems to me that we in this House are not occupying a very enviable or exalted position, when our job seems to be that of a great collector, drawing from every man from Halifax to Vancouver what little sums he can afford; securing these not from him directly but indirectly through the things he buys; collecting all these little driblets from the different sections in order that, when we have collected them, they may be turned over to the few people who really control the situation. I do not know whether the bankers' proposition which is now put forward by the International Bankers would be a very great departure from the present scheme of things. They propose to collect the debts directly instead of through the different governments. I am not sure whether or not that would be feasible. After all the end is the same, whether debts are collected through the governments or directly; it means that a certain group of Canadians are paying tribute to another group of Canadians, and in regard to the returned men I would say that they are paying with the rest of the citizens, and paying heavily, in these forms of taxation, especially in the indirect taxation which forms so large a part of what we are able to collect.

I had not intended to say very much with regard to this budget as it affects labour. I think we may say that on the whole it is a fairly satisfactory middle class budget. So far as it may stimulate general prosperity, and lessen unemployment it may be beneficial to the workers. But on the whole it does not relieve to any great extent the burden which the workers are now carrying.

Since a good many gentlemen have brought up the matter during this debate, I would frankly admit that a good many of the labour men in eastern Canada are protectionists, and that they vote Conservative. That is their right, but I would also suggest that a very large number of these same people are not at all in favour of political action on the part of labour. Some of us in this country are trying to develop along the British lines, rather than along American lines. One of the Toronto members referred in eulogistic terms to Mr. Samuel Gompers, and thought we should follow his lead and not draw labour into the political sphere at all. I would like to say that some of us who have had British training do not propose to take the lead in political matters from Mr. Samuel Gompers or those who have accepted his policy. We are following, and propose to follow much more closely, the example of the British Labour party.

An appeal was made the other day in front of this building by a large delegation from one of the industrial centres of the western part of this province, and we were told that theirs was the voice of labour. I mingled with that throng and talked with a good many of the men. I was very much interested in discovering that they were very carefully marshalled by their employers. I was rather surprised to learn that they had even brought the company's police along, in order to keep order among themselves. I would also like to call attention to the fact that within those factories represented in that delegation there is no labour organization, so those people who are not yet strong enough to organize in their own behalf were the people brought down here by their employers to present their case. I do not at all question that they believed theirs was almost a holy crusade; I know that was their belief, but I would like to say that these men had given very little attention to the underlying factors in their problems.

Labour after all is only one factor in the cost of production, and wages bear very little relation to the service rendered by labour. Before sitting down I should like to repeat some figures given in a previous debate by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). He pointed out that protection amounted to 35 per cent, but that the wages and salaries amounted to only 16½ per cent; that is, the protection afforded was more than double the wages and salaries. He went on to say:

> For 1924 the total salaries and wages paid by the automobile industry was $14,219,137 and the value of their production $88,000,000. Wages and salaries were therefore 16.1 per cent of the value of the production. The protection enjoyed is 35 per cent, and the increase in price over the United States price is also 35 per cent. In other words, the increased price which our automobile manufacturers exact from the Canadian people because of the tariff is twice the total salaries and wages paid by the industry.

Supplementing those remarks I would give these figures. The Ford Company book for 1925 shows salaries and wages of $10,138,927; the Financial Post of February 12, 1926, shows the net profits of that company for 1925 as $6,131,352. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that these figures amply bear out the statement I made a few moments ago, that labour is only one—and in this case a minor—factor in the cost of production, and further that the wages paid seem to bear very little relation to the service rendered.

The budget from our standpoint is by no means what we would like to have it. As far as the people whom we specially represent are concerned, it does not relieve their burdens a very great deal, and yet I believe that there are certain important reductions which will be beneficial to the country as a whole, and therefore, as we cannot propose our own policy in an amendment, we intend to vote for the budget.

May I add a few general considerations. I believe that to-day we of the Labour group are representing not merely so many hundreds or so many thousands of a particular class, but are representing a new principle in the political life of this country, and that is the principle that we should elevate human rights above property rights. In the past, the polices of the older parties have on the whole been so dominated by what we commonly call the big interests that the ordinary men and the ordinary women across this country have had comparatively little chance. I do not wish to precipitate any general discussion, but I should like to make a reference to the Old Country where things are taking place to-day that are profoundly influencing the thought of the people not only all over Great Britain but in Canada as well. I have no desire whatever to-night to discuss the merits of the great industrial strike that is taking place in Britain, but I would like to take advantage of the attention that is being focussed on that great strike and which is forcing us to think, to consider for a moment some general conditions that exist in this country as well as in Great Britain. One of our local papers, the Ottawa Journal, in its issue of May 7th, said in an editorial headed "Let Canada Keep out of It," dealing with this industrial strike:

> Labour and Farmer organizations in Canada might well refrain from interfering with the strike in Great Britain. The strike is a purely British matter, and a very vital one.
> A good rule to follow in such cases is to try to let the people in their own country work out their own destiny in their own way.

I want to congratulate the Ottawa Journal on taking that stand. I think it is very interesting to find that the Journal has put it in that way. I hesitated a great deal to mention this matter until I saw that some Conservative organizations had begun to communicate with Mr. Baldwin in connection with his policies, and I find that certain of our own journals would like to dictate to our citizens as to what action they should privately take on a matter of this kind. It is all very well to let the people in the Old Country settle their own matters in their own way. I tried to say that in a discussion on imperial relations the other day and I found that there were hon. gentlemen who told me that that was going to disrupt the empire, that we as a Dominion ought to be interested in all that concerned the welfare of the empire. Let the British government settle the industrial dispute by all means, but I would like to ask very frankly: how about the case when some opium dealers want to force the opium trade upon China? How about the case when some diamond capitalists want to force certain policies in South Africa? How about the case when certain cotton growers want to retain certain very important privileges in Egypt? How about the case when certain big oil companies want to get concessions in the Near East? How about the case a few years ago when certain concessionaires wanted to get control in Siberia, when we interfered to the extent of an expenditure of several million dollars? I say that if we propose to apply this rule with regard to one part of the policy of the British Empire, it is well that we should remember that we should apply it with regard to all the policies of the empire. An editorial the next day stated:

> It is, we think, a profound error to regard the present general strike as an ordinary industrial conflict. It is something much more serious.

Agreed, but what is it? Briefly, the coal industry as at present organized cannot provide at the same time profits for its owners and a living wage for the miners. I think that is conceded in almost every editorial that we have had given to us. The owners, on the one side, refuse to reorganize and, on the other hand, they refuse to relinquish their profits. The miners, on their side, refuse to lower their standards of living and demand reorganization of the industry. I refer to this matter simply because the situation in the Old Country puts before us in a dramatic form the struggle that we have the world over and the fundamental cleavage that divides us here in this country when we come to a consideration of our financial affairs.

An hon. gentleman asked me a few moments ago—he is no longer in his seat—how would we deal with the debt? It is taken for granted that the debt is something that is inviolable, even though it has to be paid to Canadians. It is regarded as something we must not touch, that interest upon it is the first charge. It is that position, Mr. Speaker, that I want to take this opportunity to challenge. We say that the rights and the needs of the ordinary people of this country is a first charge on industry, and if there is a conflict between these two, we say that the needs of the men and the women and the children must come first, and I would like to see that general principle translated into our budget statements in the years to come.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Do I understand that the hon. member would favour repudiating the payment of interest on the public debt?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said this—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was here a few moments ago—that the greater part of our public debt was owed to the people in Canada, and I said that at present the payment of the debt and the interest upon it meant that we had to tax the people with families, many of the poor people in this country, to extract from them, by every conceivable device that can be invented by the Minister of Finance, this money to turn it over to a few, many of whom are comparatively wealthy. Would you say that no matter what happens that debt is a prior claim to the needs of those people?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): When the money was needed it was very essential that it should come from some source so that the war could be carried on, and I suppose the people who put their money into victory bonds at that time did so in good faith, I would say that the country should stand behind its obligations to these people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the war had to be carried on; there was a lot of men needed to carry on that war, and what did the government do? They went into the homes of people all over the country, took out individuals and told them to go to the front, and I urge that if it is right to conscript men, it is right to conscript money. The men were conscripted; the wealth was not conscripted.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I agree with the hon. member there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Wealth should have been conscripted, and do you mean to tell me that we have no right to so adjust our taxation that it will bear heavily on those whose wealth should have been conscripted and was not.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): It should have been conscripted at that time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do you mean to tell me that we ought to refuse to adjust our taxation so as to bear heavily upon those who have wealth? I would like to think that the hon. gentleman is a good Liberal. If he were, I think he would be behind me in that. On the whole, the majority, whether on the Liberal or on the Conservative side, are somewhat inclined to regard wealth as sacrosanct, and if there is not enough to go around the interest charges have to be paid whether men and women suffer or not. I am simply going so far as to say that we should provide for the men, and women and children first. Afterwards if there is enough to go round we should attend to the other obligations.

Mr. WARD: Is it not a fact that when the matter was being discussed in parliament Sir Robert Borden made the statement, and gave his word to the labour people and others in Canada, that if conscription of men were forced in Canada wealth would also be conscripted?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not prepared to say whether that statement was made or not. I know there was a very general impression that it would not be the common people that would be loaded down with the war debt after the war was over. There was a general impression, too, that after the war we were going to have a large measure of reconstruction so that the mass of the people would be placed on a different footing.

Let me give this other quotation from the article to which I have referred, because it seems to me to indicate so well the point of view of a large number of people all over the country. Referring again to the situation in Great Britain it says:

> Two governments are functioning in London at the present time. One of these governments which is now acting on the defensive is the politically representative ministry of Premier Stanley Baldwin, and the other is the industrially representative general council of the Trades Union Congress.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the writer should have gone further. He has omitted the most important government of all, the third government. The third government is the financially representative government of the landowners and the bankers which throughout the years has largely dominated the political government of Great Britain. That dominance is challenged. I am not suggesting that the method of making the challenge is a good method, I am not at the moment passing any opinion with regard to that. But I will say that throughout the history of England, and especially in recent years, the financial control has been so great that there has come a shifting of power gradually from the old feudal land owners to those who have control of the financial system of the country. And they have, to no small extent, controlled the policies of parliament and control them to-day; and to-day the labour people—through political action during the last few years, and now through industrial action, whether this is advisedly undertaken or not—are challenging that dominance and are saying in regard to the mines over there that if profits can be paid only by lowering the standards of the people of England, such a condition must not continue; the standards of the people must be maintained even though it means a reorganization of the whole mining industry of the country. That is what lies behind the struggle over there, and that is what we have to consider here in this country.

When we are faced with a budget of this kind and are told that we control less than forty per cent of our expenditures, that the greater part of the taxes we raise are raised by indirect taxation which bears heavily upon the mass of the people, we encounter this very selfsame problem here in this country. Although labour and the farmers are undoubtedly not yet politically strong in Canada, we come challenging the dominance of the financial masters of this country. Members of the older parties have come here from year to year, from decade to decade, and have advocated the policies very largely of the manufacturers, of the big transportation interests, and of the big financial interests. And when anyone dares to question the ideals and policies of these great interests he is ridiculed, and is told that he is talking wildly, or that he is talking all sorts of academic stuff. I want to say that although it may not suit the ideas of certain gentlemen in this House, there is a rising tide of public opinion much along the lines that I have been trying to indicate to-night; and I am quite sure that in the days to come we will find more and more the mass of the people asking questions with reference to the reorganization, or, as it was called in immediate post-war days, the "reconstruction", of our industrial and financial system. If we are to go on year by year with a comparatively small group enjoying the prosperity so glowingly referred to in the Governor General's speech, while a large number of the people are quite unconscious that prosperity has yet arrived, are we not undermining those institutions of parliament which we have said should be supreme? After all in a democratic country parliament has a right to govern only so far as parliament represents the ideals of the masses of the people of that country.

Mr. W. E. TUMMON (South Hastings): Mr. Speaker, not having taken part in any of the debates so far, perhaps I might be permitted to make a few observations at this time. In so doing I do not purpose to detain the House at length.

May I briefly summarize recent events in regard to this government? In his Richmond Hill address of September 7th last year, the Prime Minister complained very bitterly that having only a majority of one, he was unable to successfully carry on, and seemingly intimated that unless he obtained a substantial majority he would resign. The country defeated the Prime Minister and eight of his cabinet ministers, and reduced his following in this House to 101. It also decreased the parliamentary representation of the Progressive party from 65 to 24. On the other hand the Conservative party was returned with 116 supporters, an increase of 69. But the government did not resign. The Prime Minister then said he would call parliament and allow the people's representatives to decide who should carry on. A statement to that effect was issued by the Prime Minister and appeared in the press on November 5 last. Parliament was called on January 7 but not for the purpose indicated. It was called to permit the government, through the Speech from the Throne, to present a programme to this House whereby they hoped to obtain here what the country refused them on October 29th. In the Speech from the Throne the government declared among other things:

> —that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A Tariff Advisory Board will accordingly be appointed forthwith.

That was part of the programme upon which this government obtained the necessary votes to permit them to carry on and remain upon the treasury benches. It was thus a surprise to many when the Minister of Finance, in presenting his budget, announced the tariff reduction on automobiles, and only eight days after the Tariff Advisory Board had been appointed. Thus to my mind the situation, is that the government, in order to obtain a majority in the vote on the Speech from the Throne, declared one thing; then, having obtained that majority, proceeded to do another. On the other hand, it has been said that my hon. friends to my left are responsible for the tariff reduction on automobiles. It seems to me that they then, would be in the position of giving their support to the government on one policy, and, having sustained them in power, are demanding another policy. As to who might be responsible I am not concerned. But the result is to have the very opposite effect to that sentence in the Speech from the Throne, which says:

> That in the interests of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes.

Thus instead of tending towards the elimination of uncertainty the course of the government has and is increasing the element of uncertainty that was already prevailing, As to whether or not the automobile industry was enjoying too much protection I am not prepared to say. I do not feel that I am competent to judge. So far as I can see it would perhaps make little difference to manufacturers of automobiles whether they manufactured in Canada or in the United States. I believe the Canadian plants are most all, if not all, branches of American firms. But it would make a great deal of difference to the Dominion of Canada if we should lose that industry, and it does mean much to the thousands of workmen and their families who are dependent upon that industry for a living, many of whom no doubt felt that they were engaged in a legitimate business and that their jobs were secured; and they probably purchased homes and assumed other obligations which to them were comparatively as great as the obligations that the company which employed them assumed in the carrying on of their business. While I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there may be certain difficulties, yet with all due respect to the time honoured custom of keeping the contents of the budget a secret, not revealing them until their presentation to parliament, and then announcing drastic changes such as the one I have referred to, to take effect immediately, with a resulting tendency to demoralize and disrupt legitimate business and create uncertainty and distrust in the mind of the workman as to his ability to retain his job or to find employment, it seems to me it is wrong and damaging. There were many in Canada who looked forward expectantly to the appointment of a tariff board which they hoped would overcome this difficulty, but their hopes have been shattered when even the government seemingly would not trust its own child. My complaint against this government is that although such a board was created prior to the introduction of the budget, the government ignored its own creation and failed at the first opportunity to fulfil its promise in the Speech from the Throne, that——this board will be expected to make a careful study of the customs tariff, the revenue to be derived therefrom and the effect of the tariff and allied factors on industry and agriculture.

In regard to the income tax I have only one observation to make, and it refers to the proposed increased exemption. I notice that in discussing this tax two or three different expressions have been used. First, it has been said that the increased exemption will be $3,000 for married men; again it has been stated that the exemption will apply to the heads of families, and again that it will apply to householders. Upon reflection it will be seen that each of these phrases means something different. "Married man" may mean just simply what it says—married, perhaps not living with his wife, without a family, house, or anything else, and he would get the benefit of the expression. "Householder" means the owner and holder of a house, but the head of a family would mean the possessor of a home who was maintaining therein a wife or housekeeper, and children of his own or children whom he may be keeping as a matter of charity. As the head of a family he would comply with all the requirements, and I consider the increased exemption should apply to that class. I have now in my mind more than one example, but will just mention one to illustrate the point. A widower had a son who met with an accident and died, the son leaving a wife and three children. The daughter-in-law is the housekeeper for the father-in-law, and the latter is keeping and providing for the daughter-in-law and grandchildren as if they were his own. The father-in-law should therefore be entitled to the exemption. I think the exemption should apply to the head of a family maintaining a home, a wife or housekeeper and any children solely maintained therein by him.

Coming as I do from a district which was a pioneer in the dairy industry in Canada, a district which can not only lay claim to being a pioneer but also to being one of the leading dairy districts of Canada, where every farmer is practically a dairy farmer, it naturally follows that we are intensely interested in anything that relates to that industry. I propose to refer briefly to the Australian and New Zealand treatics. I have listened while the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), and I think the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) quoted the price of butter on the Montreal market during the winter months, for the purpose of showing that notwithstanding these treaties, and the fact that butter was coming into Canada at the time in large quantities, the price of butter in Canada remained at a high figure. I noticed that the ministers confined their quotations largely, if not wholly, to the one market. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that at a time when the home consumption equals or exceeds the home production, no one market or place is a true gauge of the general price of butter in all other places. I have seen in the winter months in my constituency which is fairly compact, comprising a territory perhaps thirty miles long by an average of fifteen or sixteen miles wide, five or six different prices varying from two to sometimes ten cents per pound according to conditions that exist in each small centre and according to supply and demand. I also saw a shipment of foreign butter come into one of those small centres during the past winter, and as a result the price of butter fat to the producer immediately dropped because in every case the foreign product was offered at a less price than that of the home product.

For many years both the federal and provincial departments of Agriculture have been urging increased production upon the dairy farmer. I can well remember a number of years ago the hon. member who sits upon the government side of this House for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) touring our county as a lecturer of the old Farmers' Institute. One of the favourite subjects of those gentlemen in those days was increased production of the dairy cow. Anyone who is at all familiar with the handling of dairy cattle knows that some of the ways in which this can be accomplished is by doing away with the culls, by better care, better feeding and better housing but one of the most effective ways is by increasing the lactation period.

In those days—and I refer to eighteen or twenty years ago—dairying was confined almost wholly to the production of cheese. Cheese factories started operations about May 1 and ceased operations about October 31. The farmer's wife after the closing of the cheese factory was able to dispose, at the local market or at the country store, of a couple of churnings of butter; she would then pack sufficient to keep the family supplied during the winter months, and the cows were allowed to cease milking about December 1.

Going back we find that in 1900 Ontario produced only 7,559,542 pounds of creamery butter. Eighteen years ago there were less than half a dozen creameries between the city of Toronto and the Ottawa river; there was at that time little encouragement for the farmer to increase the lactation period of his animals because he could not profitably dispose of his product. I can remember when the first can of sweet milk was shipped from the Belleville district, 120 miles east of Toronto, into the city of Toronto. It was shipped about November 1, after the closing of the cheese factory in the fall, and the man who shipped it was looking around for a market whereby he could milk his cattle for a longer period. Other farmers took up the idea; for years thousands of cans of milk went from that district to Toronto, and herds which had previously ceased milking about December 1 were milked on as a rule until the middle or the end of February.

Eventually creameries began to be established in convenient centres and these supplied the very market the farmer required in order to lengthen the milking period of his herd. To-day in that same territory from Toronto to the Ottawa river where eighteen years ago there were only five or six creameries, there are operating to-day seventy-five or eighty creameries, and the production of creamery butter in Ontario for 1925 according to the Dairy and Cold Storage branch was more than 60,000,000 pounds, while Canada as a whole produced in that year 180,663,783 pounds of creamery butter of which she exported 26,646,435 pounds. That does not take into consideration dairy butter and we are told by the Dairy and Cold Storage branch that the manufacture of dairy butter in Canada last year was approximately 100,000,000,- pounds. That makes a total of about 280,- 000,000 pounds of butter of which we exported only 26,646,435 pounds, or in other words, for every pound of butter that we exported last year we consumed in Canada eleven pounds. Where are those who will tell us that the home market does not amount to much?

We are told by officials of the Dairy and Cold Storage branch of the Department of Agriculture:

> There is lots of room for a continued increase in Canadian production of dairy products. The world in the past few years has had an increasing demand for butter and cheese. This is quite marked in Great Britain where as yet our butter sales are only a drop in the bucket. Canadian butter is quoted on the market there for but a few months in the year and our prospects for increased prices would be better could an all-year supply be provided.

It is plain that in a country such as Canada an all-year supply can be provided only by winter dairying. Winter dairying has been steadily increasing as I have endeavoured to show, but it means production under the most difficult and costly conditions and it needs all the encouragement which this or any other government can give it. Yet in face of these things this government enters into treaties with Australia and New Zealand which permit producers of butter and other dairy products, of the Antipodes producing under the most favourable circumstances, to compete in the Canadian market at the very door of the Canadian producers, producing under the most difficult conditions. This has been and is creating in the mind of the dairy farmer the same feeling of uncertainty and instability about his business that this government has succeeded in creating in the commercial and industrial life of this country. It seems to me that if there is anything we in Canada need more than another it is a sound, settled, fiscal policy that will eliminate the uncertainty that seems to exist everywhere and restore stability and confidence at large, a policy that will proclaim not only to Canadians but to people of other nations that Canada will supply as far as possible the wants of Canadians.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, may I join with others in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the splendid budget he has presented to the House? I believe it has been received by the majority of the people of this country as one of the best budgets that have been presented for a great number of years. It is, I believe, what is commonly called throughout Canada a budget of the common people. It indicates a reduction in taxation which I am sure is very favourably received throughout the Dominion.

The removal of the receipt tax is, I believe, also appreciated, while the removal of the sales tax on many articles is a move in the right direction. Then, on Dominion Day we return to the two-cent postage; and last, but not least, there is the lowering in the income tax. I believe the reduction in the income tax will be of great advantage to great masses of the people. I know that in my own constituency, which is a rural one, this reduction is greatly appreciated, especially among the farmers. As you are no doubt aware, Mr. Speaker, the farmer in western Canada has a great many obstacles to fight, such as drought, hail, rust and frost. Over these things he has no control, so that some years he practically has no returns; and of course when his returns are low he escapes the income tax. On the other hand, when in years of large crops, such as the past year, he reaps a large harvest and receives good prices he naturally has to pay an income tax. I have always contended that, so far as western Canada was concerned, the income tax was one of the greatest grievances of our farmers. And it is of western Canada that I speak. I have always held that in deciding upon the income tax as it affects the farmer of the west an average should be struck over a period of years. I have heard it thrown across the floor of the House to the Saskatchewan group that while we have the largest per capita wealth of any province of the Dominion we do not pay the highest per capita taxation. This is easily explained: we have no very rich men in Saskatchewan, our wealth being more evenly distributed.

There are better times ahead of us in spite of the blue ruin talk we hear from the other side, and I believe that the western farmer is beginning to get on his feet again. I had the privilege while travelling in western Canada during the recess of talking to one of the inspectors of a large banking concern in that part of the country, and he told me that whereas at the corresponding period last year it required four men to write the agricultural credits from the city of Regina, at the time he was speaking one man could easily do this work. Of course the chief reason is the fact that we have had a large crop and, coupled therewith, good prices. But while this is true, while we have had a splendid crop and good prices, I fancy that the explanation lies in this, that the farmers themselves have at last begun to have some say in the marketing of their produce.

Referring to the marketing situation in western Canada, I should like for a few moments briefly to outline the operation of the wheat pool. I believe that with the operation of the wheat pool and the orderly marketing not only of our wheat, but also of all other grains we shall get all there is in it. We have been accused of establishing the wheat pool with a view to forcing up the prices of wheat, but that is entirely wrong; the pool was organized to control the flow of wheat to the market. In the old days the bulk of our grain was in the hands of speculators, three months after it has been threshed, whereas under the pool we are selling wheat all the time. In this way the market is kept steady, but under the present system the payments are extended over a period of time; we have one initial, and three interim payments, each one coming when the farmer most needs the money. You may ask any banker or mortage or machine company, and they will all tell you the same story, that under this system of marketing the farmer is meeting his obligations better all the time.

Since coming to this House I have heard a good deal of talk about protecting the farmer. Now we western farmers believe that it is utterly impossible to protect us as wheat growers. We have to the south of us a country which it is agreed is one of the most highly protected nations in the world, and what do we find? I have here a review of an article entitled The Plight of the Farmer. It is taken from The Nation, New York, the author being Mr. Smith W. Brookhart, one of the United States senators for Iowa. Senator Brookhart is of the farmers' bloc and is one of the ablest American Progressives. That is what he has to say:

"In the last five years," he begins by saying, "more than a million farmers have become bankrupt, and the value of farm property has decreased by twenty or twenty-five billions of dollars." Senator Brookhart is speaking of farmers and farm property in the United States. There are many reasons to accept his statement as accurate. Bank failures in the farm states, statistics of rural depopulation and the insistence of farmer politicians on measures of "relief" for agriculture are all evidence that the past few years have seen a decline in the prosperity of American farming.

In the last five years in Canada thousands of farmers have regained financial soundness and the value of farm property has increased by millions.

Senator Brookhart cites some facts which explain this difference. The causes of the farmer's plight, he writes, "lie for the most part in discrimination against agriculture in the laws that have been enacted for the benefit and protection of business." There is, he says, an enormous discrimination against farmers in transportation. They must pay freight to get their products to market. When they buy the things they need, freight is included in the price. The same situation obtains in Canada, but rates on farm products are very much lower here than in the United States.

Another discrimination noted by Senator Brookhart is in tariff legislation. The great manufacturing industries, protected against all competition, fix the price of their product. The price of farm products, on the other hand, is fixed by what can be got for the exportable surplus. The farmer sells in an open market and buys in a closed one. Once again, the position is the same in Canada but the handicap against farmers in the Dominion is not nearly so great.

Senator Brookhart proceeds to suggest a remedy for the farmer's economic distress. His proposals are less interesting to Canadians than the prospect that the plight of agriculture in the United States may drive many American farmers north into this country.

They can buy land much cheaper here than south of the line. With the same amount of work it will produce just as many bushels per acre as land in Minnesota or Kansas. Perhaps it will produce more and the quality of the grain will be superior.

It costs less per acre or per bushel to sow and reap a crop in Canada than in the United States.

I want you to pay particular attention to this:

It costs less to ship grain here. Freight rates are lower now in the Dominion and with the completion of the Hudson Bay railway farmers in the prairie provinces will have open to them the best of all routes from the heart of America to Europe.

All that stands in the way of a land movement northward on this continent is the natural disinclination of settled farmers to migrate.

That is the plight of the highly protected American farmer, and yet hon. members opposite would like to protect the wheat grower of western Canada. I wonder if they ever think of the time during the war when they were on the treasury benches, and the protection they gave to the farmers at that time. I wonder if it was to protect the farmer that they set the price of wheat when it started to go up in 1917, and whether it was to protect the farmer after the war, when prices started to tumble, that they ceased to control the market. These are questions which quite naturally arise in the minds of practical farmers.

That brings me to another phase of agriculture which I would like to bring to the attention of the House, and that is the cattle industry. I must congratulate the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) for the persistency with which he has kept this question before the House. I do not think any line of agriculture has suffered more since the war than has the cattle industry. We all remember that in 1917 and 1918 we were being advised to go into the cattle business; credit was easy, and the bankers were advising the farmers to borrow money and buy cattle. Many of us did so; cows were bought at from $100 to $150 per head in 1917, and by 1920 the price had fallen to $35 per head; thousands of farmers were ruined. These are plain facts, as every farmer in this House knows, and it is for these men I desire to plead. What we need most is markets, and this is where I do not quite agree with the hon. member for Marquette. I have here an article taken from the Farm and Ranch Review of December 10, 1925. As I remember the words of the hon. member for Marquette, on the two or three occasions when we dealt with the cattle industry, he was somewhat opposed to the development of the market in the United States, and on that point I wish to take issue with him.

Mr. MULLINS: May I ask a question?

Mr. VALLANCE: You certainly may.

Mr. MULLINS: On no occasion in the House did I oppose the opening of the American market for large cattle, but I did oppose the shipping to the United States of immature cattle, and still do so.

Mr. VALLANCE: No one in this House knows the extent of the Old Country market better than I do. I lived there until I was twenty-one years of age, and I know the type of cattle the Old Country feeder wants. There are many years in western Canada when we have thousands of cattle which would not pay for shipment to even Winnipeg, and it is almost impossible to find a market in the Old Country for such cattle. I think it was Shakespeare who said:

> There is a tide in the affairs of men,
> Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.

I believe our tide has now arrived, and it is up to this government and the people of this country to do whatever can be done to remove this injustice and allow our cattle to enter the United States market. The article says:

> The psychological moment has arrived when we can appeal to Washington with arguments of commercial self-interest. An enormous corn crop has been harvested in the middle west this year. Carter Field, in the New York Herald-Tribune, sizes up the situation as follows:
> "With a three-billion-bushel corn crop being dumped on a market which had been expecting to absorb a two-and-a-half-billion-bushel crop, and with the price of corn on the farm as a result reduced to fifty cents a bushel, President Coolidge has sent two experts to the middle west to see what can be done to save the situation."

Later the article goes on to say:

> "The chief trouble is that the corn raisers of this country have piled up a crop estimated at 3,000,000,000 bushels, as against a crop last year of slightly less than 2,500,000,000 bushels. This 20 per cent increase of production naturally would have a tremendously depressing effect on the price, even if there were no other complications.
> "Added to this, it is pointed out, is the fact that the number of feeders is much smaller than expected and consequently there is not the normal supply of cattle and hogs which can be fattened on corn..
> "The third factor in depressing the price is the fact that the farmers never have fully recovered from the hard times which followed the war. As a result they are not able financially to hold their corn until the natural demand for it increases, but feel obliged to dump it on the market regardless of what they get for it.
> "So corn, which they claim cost seventy-five cents a bushel to produce, is being sold on the farms at fifty cents a bushel."
> We are told here that one of the difficulties facing the middle west feeder in disposing of his present unprofitable corn crop is that he has not available the normal volume of feeder cattle to enable him to turn his cheap corn into beef. On this point, the Kansas City Star says:
> "More than 80 per cent of the corn raised on the farm is marketed on the hoof. The farmer who has plenty of animals on his place feeds his corn to his cattle and hogs. So the price doesn't so much matter. He sells his corn, not as corn, but as beef and pork. So long as he gets a fair price for his finished product, he doesn't worry over the cheapness of the raw material that goes to making that product. It is when a farmer has to buy high-priced corn to feed low-priced animals that he is in trouble."

Canada is irrevocably wedded to a live cattle export trade, and deprived of the United States market we cannot succeed. This is the unvarnished truth. I can readily see, Mr. Speaker, why the hon. member for Marquette would not be in favour of shipping these live cattle to the United States. He and I differ somewhat, I as a breeder and he as a feeder. Towards the end of July and August, if one of those dry summers which quite frequently comes to the west, is prevalent, pasture gets scarce and we naturally have to get rid of a certain percentage of our cattle. It is then that such men as the hon. member for Marquette step up on the Winnipeg market and buy these cattle for what they care to pay. If I were at home I believe I could show a cheque for $1 from a commission house in Winnipeg, for a cattle beast; they will not even pay the freight. Not only do they get cattle at their own prices on the Winnipeg market, but they hold them until we start to ship out our wheat, and with the wheat, we ship the feed with which they fatten these cattle. We even have to pay the freight. We have in that western country one of the greatest cattle raising areas under the sun. The grass that grows there can bring cattle into the very best feeder condition. All we need is more and wider markets, and I believe the market to the south of us is the best market we can have for this class of cattle. I leave this subject, Mr. Speaker, for the consideration of the House, and I hope that when the resolution of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) comes up asking for a special committee to examine into the whole cattle industry in this country, these conditions I have pointed out will not be overlooked.

They talk about protecting the farmer. I would like to cite a few figures showing just what real protection the American farmer gets with his 42 cents tariff on wheat. In the crop year of 1924-25 there was a tariff of 42 cents on Canadian wheat going into the United States. Yet from August of 1924 until July of 1925 we had a higher average price in Canada. The average price at Winnipeg during that period was 1,685, and at Minneapolis for the same period, 1,675. Yet they tell us they would protect the farmer by a tariff! These figures prove that any commodity of which you have an exportable surplus cannot be protected, and you must take the price on the world's market.

I notice that quite a number of hon. members opposite from eastern Canada have been advising us westerners to quit growing wheat; for instance, the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) and the hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Baker). Mr. Speaker, I have been growing wheat in Saskatchewan for the last twenty years, and like the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) who sits behind me, I have never grown it when I could not sell it. I have here figures showing the amount that has been exported each year since 1914, and they show what that western country can do:

Year	Average Price No. 1 Northern at Fort William (Calendar year)	Exports Fiscal Years Bushels
1914..	1.001	120,426,579
1915..	1.282	71,913,385
1916..	1.381	157,745,469
1917..	2.202	189,643,846
1918..	2.223	150,392,037
1919..	2.371	41,808,897
1920..	2.511	77,978,037
1921..	1.649	129,215,157
1922..	1.235	136,489,238
1923..	1.084	215,074,566
1924..	1.274	256,870,237
1925..	1.643	191,764,537
1926..	1.459*	249,583,470

*Average for 3 months.

Mr. WARD: Those figures are for Saskatchewan alone?

Mr. VALLANCE: I secured them from the Bureau of Statistics the other day and along with these they gave me the average price of No. 1 Northern at Fort William. In 1926 the average price for the three months was 1.459. In 1925-26 we marketed one of the largest crops we ever had, and we received a price equal to that received during some of the war years and a great deal higher price than in the years previous to the war. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that one of the most important factors, if not the most important, in bringing this about is the wheat pool.

I do not know whether it would be wise for me to deal with one or two things regarding the tariff, but I might say that when the tariff commission toured the country in 1920 the manufacturers' association presented a petition to the commission which contained these words:

> The test of the efficiency of fiscal system is the country's all-round development. The best way to tell whether or not Canada has prospered under the policy of adequate protection is to study the statistics and see how the country has developed since 1878.

Let us do that; it may be possible to show that this country does better while it is being ruined by low tariffs than when it is being pampered by high prices. Let me give a few figures regarding the total trade of Canada, as follows:

Total Trade of Canada

	Exports and Imports	Increase
1878..	$ 119,791,879
1896..	221,675,704	$101,883,825
1911..	742,724,813	521,049,109
1914..	1,074,631,222	331,906,409
1922..	1,501,731,341	427,100,119
1925..	1,887,356,445	385,625,104

Hon. members will note that the trade of Canada goes forward under the firm business administration of the present government.

They will also note that under the National Policy, full blown and virgin as it was from 1878 to 1896, Canada almost stood still.

The protectionist judges progress by the increase in exports, that is his test. He wants to restrict imports. As I heard it put the other day, the protectionist is like an individual who is seasick—everything going out and nothing coming in. Let us apply that test. Here are the figures of our exports taken from the trade report of Canada for the year 1925:

Exports Canada

1878..	$ 79,154,678
1896..	116,314,543
1911..	290,000,210
1922..	753,927,009
1925..	1,081,361,643

The biggest three year gain in exports in all the history of Canada was made in the last few years. In fact, it may be questioned if ever in the history of the world so great a gain was made by the same number of people in the same time. Part of this change is due to prices. Liberals are not inclined to take unfair advantage in a matter of this kind. However, we can show the position more clearly by comparing Canada's position with that of other countries. I have here a comparison of the trade of the nineteen principal countries of the world, which with the permission of the House, I will put on Hansard:

That brings me, Mr. Speaker, to a very interesting point. We hear a great deal nowadays about Canada exporting her raw materials. One would imagine that we were the only country in the world that exported raw materials. But let us look at the United States for a moment. The report of the United States Department of Trade and Commerce for 1924 gives the following details of exports by that country:

Raw materials..	$1,302,452,932
Foodstuffs in crude state..	203,348,604
Foodstuffs partly manufactured.. ..	561,801,130
Goods partly manufactured..	595,636,779
Manufactured goods..	1,554,472,575

The United States exports tremendous quantities of raw cotton, but I have never heard the imposition of an export duty on raw cotton suggested. Still, the imposition of an export duty on wheat has been frequently urged on this side of the line.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in regard to the duty on automobiles. I expressed my views on this subject on a former occasion when a resolution advocating a reduction in the duty was being considered. But I received a letter the other day, and I thought that if I had the privilege of speaking during the present debate I would bring it to the attention of the House. There are still in western Canada a great many outlying districts remote from railway communication, and the letter in question ilustrates the difficulties from which the settlers in such districts suffer. The letter is as follows:

DEAR SIR:

The Big Gully Development Association present compliments, and beg your interest in the urging of the building of a branch railway line between the north Saskatchewan river and the Big Gully creek.

Many of us have spent almost twenty years in opening up this district and establishing homes, and are still upwards of thirty miles from a railway, which means that practically one-third of our working time is spent on the winter trails.

When we settled in this place it was with the distinct understanding that a line would be built long before this.

At the time that the average citizen is closing up his business for the day, we start out on the twenty-five mile return trip through the darkness and western cold, which has to be experienced to be understood. This travelling over the everlasting trails is not profitable to us, nor to the country, neither does it become more pleasant with the passing years.

We respectively request your influence with the powers that be to see that this heavy and unfair burden is lifted in the near future.

It is of people such as the writer of the foregoing letter that I am thinking in connection with the duty on automobiles. I doubt whether many of them have reached the state of affluence that would permit them to buy an automobile, but if it is at all within their power it would prove an immense boon to them. They would be able to transport their wheat by motor truck instead of hauling it long distances by team. It has been figured that we can farm at a distance of twenty-five miles from the railway if we can have the use of a motor truck. The average one-ton truck will travel at the rate of twenty miles an hour but even if it did not cover more than fifteen miles, it would be a great convenience to people who live at such a distance from the shipping point as I have indicated. There are in Saskatchewan many districts such as the writer of the letter indicates. It is of people so circumstanced that the average Saskatchewan member thinks when the duty on automobiles comes up for consideration rather than of persons engaged in the industry, more especially when we consider the enormous profits the industry has yielded to the manufacturers.

I do not wish to occupy any more of the time of the House, but in closing I desire to say this: In spite of all the blue ruin talk from hon. gentlemen opposite the facts disclose that Canada has prospered under the present government. With a budget of the kind brought down on April 15 last, coupled with the legislative programme submitted for our approval, there is not much danger but that Canada will continue to forge ahead and enjoy even better times in the future.

Mr. THOMAS HAY (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy very much of the time of the House to-night, but I feel it incumbent upon me to make a few remarks upon the budget, and also to deal briefly with some of the problems which are confronting the country at the present time.

At the outset may I be allowed to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in which he spoke of the delegation which waited on the government some two weeks ago with regard to the cut in the duty on automobiles. The hon. gentleman stated that the members of that delegation did not represent organized labour, in fact, to use his own words, that the large delegation had been marshalled by the employers in the towns from which the representatives came. I believe the large delegation in question represents labour more truly than does the hon. gentleman himself. They represented the 25,000 people engaged in the automobile industries in Canada, and the 100,000 women and children dependent upon those industries. In corroboration of that statement I will read from the Labour Leader, Canada's national labour weekly, published in Toronto, and dated April 23rd, 1926, an appeal to the members of the House of Commons to the following effect:

An appeal to the members of the House of Commons of Canada.

Representing, as you do, the citizens of this great Dominion, the Labour Leader on behalf of the men who work in the Canadian automobile factories and the various factories that make parts and accessories, numbering about twenty-five thousand, with about one hundred thousand women and children dependent upon them, earnestly request you to refer the clause in the budget that deals with the tariff on motor cars to the new tariff commission, so that these workers may have an opportunity of placing their views before them. Gentlemen, forget your political parties, and lend a hand to these hardworking toilers.

There is another article along the same line in the Labour Leader but I will not take up time by reading it at present. Yet in the face of articles of that kind, coming from the official organ of the Labour party in Canada, the hon. gentleman in question has the temerity to stand up here and say those people did not represent organized labour.

I desire to refer to some remarks made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) when he was speaking on the budget a few days ago. The hon. member tried to intimidate some of the hon. members from Manitoba on the matter of their vote on the budget. He said that we would be watched closely and that he and his colleagues would make it a point to inform the electors of our respective constituencies as to how we voted on the present budget. In reply to the hon. member I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, he can go out into the highways and byways in my constituency and tell the people all he knows in connection with this matter. He can tell them how I voted and what my attitude towards the tariff is. I fancy the hon. member will be kept fairly busy in his own constituency in explaining some things. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) a short time ago gave an interview to a Star reporter in Toronto, and I desire to place the report of that interview on Hansard, because I want the people of my constituency at any rate and the people of western Canada to know where that hon. member stands. The interview reads:

"After all," said Mr. Forke, "Progressives are simply Liberals in action. I believe Mr. King is a Liberal. When I say that, I mean a real Liberal."

And then it goes on to say further:

Mr. Forke denies the stories about wielding the big stick over Mr. King. "There's nothing in it" he said. "I think we're learning by bitter experience that the Progressives can't be as independent as we should like to be.

He practically renounced his independence

Mr. FORKE: Might I inform my hon. friend that I publicly denied that statement in the press, and the press have never seen fit to make any reply to my repudiation of it?

Mr. HAY: The report proceeds:

He further stated—

I do not know whether he will deny this or not.

—that he did not expect to see any of the members back from Manitoba after the next general election.

Mr. FORKE: I have repeated that statement often.

Mr. HAY: The hon. member is reported to have made the statement that the Progressives cannot be as independent as they would like to be, and I know that the statement is going out to the country. If he did make such a statement it will do much to defeat him and his followers in the next election campaign. He denies that he said that they could not be as independent as they would like to be. The hon. member denies that I suppose.

Mr. FORKE: I have publicly denied that statement printed by the Toronto Telegram.

Mr. HAY: I refer to an interview in the Toronto Star.

Mr. FORKE: I never gave that interview. I do not know anything about the Toronto Star statement, because I never met the Toronto Star man at all.

Mr. HAY: That is taken from the Toronto Star. I do not know whether that is the paper to which you refer.

Mr. FORKE: I think the statement in the Toronto Telegram was reprinted in the Star.

Mr. HAY: I cannot vouch for the truth of it, but if there is any truth in it I think it would come as a rude shock to his supporters in Brandon, because I know that the hon. member has in season and out of season declared in western Canada that he would retain his independence, and that his party would also retain their independence in the House.

Before proceeding further, I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Manitoba Free Press on April 3, 1926, entitled "Manitoba M P.'s and Protection." The article says in part:

In the last election six Conservatives were returned from Manitoba, and having regard to the traditional views of that province on the tariff, it was thought that with the exception of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen they would act as a brake on the wheel of the Conservative protectionist chariot.

Then it goes on to say:

> Careful reading of Hansard will show that all of the Manitoba Conservatives have defined their positions with the exception of Thomas Hay of Springfield, and T. G. Murphy of Neepawa, who have bravely declined so far all opportunities to speak, and who are indeed the only bushel covered lights remaining in the opposition so far.

In reply to that article I have only this to say, that so far as the principle of protection is concerned I believe in it. I am a protectionist and believe that protection is the only policy that will make Canada a prosperous country. Whilst almost every other country in the civilized world to-day is raising her tariff and protecting the industries and the home market, some Canadians are the only ones to-day who are preaching free trade in the face of what is happening in the world, and I cannot understand how the doctrine of free trade can be preached when all other countries are preaching and practising protection. The Free Press need have no doubts as to where I stand so far as protection is concerned. I believe in a protective policy and I preached that policy from every platform in my constituency during the last campaign. I believe in a policy of protection that will, first of all, protect our Canadian industries, that will protect our Canadian workingman, that will protect their jobs and protect our natural resources; a policy of protection that will protect the Canadian farmer as well and protect and build up his home market.

I wish to refer to a speech made by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. That hon. member declared himself to be a free trader. Mr. Michael Clark was accounted as the apostle of free trade in this country for some years; his mantle must have fallen upon the shoulders of the hon. member for Rosetown. That hon. member is a reformer, and I believe a reformer of the destructive type, as I will try to show in the course of my remarks. Some hon. members on my extreme left laugh, but I think after I get through they will conclude that I am absolutely correct in what I say. That remark applies to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I think these hon. members can all be included in the one class.

The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans), speaking on the tariff during the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, said that he believed in free trade. He said further at that time, speaking of our industrial institutions, that they were built up on hothouse methods and that they must be destroyed, put out of the way. Consequently, I say that the hon. member is of the destructive type, the Carrie Nation type, if I may use the expression. Carrie Nation flourished in the United States a few years ago as a reformer, a reformer too of the destructive type. She used to sally forth with her little axe and destroy everything that came in her way. As regards the hon. member for Rosetown and the others whom I have mentioned, while their little tomahawks are not much in evidence at the present time, I feel that if their policies were put into effect they would be more destructive than Carrie Nation's little axe.

I should like to refer to a speech made by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) who I am glad is in his seat. It was the hon. member's maiden speech in this House, and while it was well and forcibly delivered I for one cannot agree, and I am sure very few members on this side of the House will agree, with the conclusions arrived at by that hon. gentleman. Speaking of the tariff he said that if it so happened that during the night all the industries from one end of Canada to the other were wiped out of existence, while the country would receive a very rude shock it would eventually recover from that shock and the people engaged in those industries would eventually drift to the land and become producers. That has not been the experience of the Canadian people during the last four years.

Mr. HOWDEN: That is hardly a correct statement. I said that those who had been engaged in industrial operations would probably find their way to the land or to other places.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds)): To the United States principally.

Mr. HOWDEN: Yes.

Mr. HAY: To the land. I say that that has not been the experience of the Canadian people during the last four years, because we find that those who have been engaged in our industries, when those industries have been closed or forced out of existence by the policy of the government opposite, have drifted over the border into the United States. The hon. gentleman went on to say that this would not affect the farmers. I do not want the hon. gentleman to misunderstand me; this is what he said in effect, if not in so many words. He said that the farmers would continue raising their crops and selling them in the markets of the world. That might apply with some force to the producer of wheat or other grain because, on account of the splendid quality of the wheat that we raise in Canada, it has always been possible up to the present to find a market for it in the markets of the world. But the day is coming when it will perhaps not be possible to market all our wheat abroad because other countries are fast increasing their production and coming into the market as our competitors. Consequently we must realize that our home market is of some value.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman not know that there is always a market for the best article on the market?

Mr. HAY: I say that the hon. gentleman's remarks might apply to producers of wheat and other grain, but he must bear in mind the fact that many hundreds and thousands of people in the Dominion of Canada are to-day engaged in other lines of agriculture such as market gardening, dairying, poultry raising and so on.

Mr. HOWDEN: Would the hon. gentleman not say that our dairy products find their way to the markets of the world?

Mr. HAY: Very little. I believe the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) with regard to butter was that out of 275,000,000 pounds produced by Canadian producers only 25,000,000 pounds found a market abroad.

Mr. HOWDEN: What happened to the rest?

Mr. HAY: I will refer to that later during my address. As I say, while the hon. member's statement might apply to those who are engaged in raising wheat, the other people to whom I referred a moment ago—gardeners, truck farmers, dairy producers and poultry raisers—must depend daily on the home market. They place their goods on that market daily and if we do anything to injure or destroy that market, we shall put that class of people practically out of business. Our hon. friends opposite lose sight of the value of the home market; they forget that there is a value in the home market.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman think Canada as a whole would suffer very greatly if those people were put out of business?

Mr. HAY: I would indeed. I want to make another prediction and say to the hon. member for St. Boniface that during the recess of parliament following prorogation he will not go back to the rural district of St. Boniface and make that same speech. If he does, I want to be there to hear it and see the reception he gets.

Mr. HOWDEN: The hon. member will certainly get an invitation.

Mr. HAY: I desire to quote from a letter which I received from a gentleman who lives just adjoining the constituency of the hon. member for St. Boniface. He is an old-timer, a descendant of one of the original settlers. He is a man of wide experience who, I think, is well known to the hon. member. This is what he has to say regarding this matter:

> If an opportunity affords you in the House our gardeners need protection from especially the early stuff being dumped from the United States so that when our products are ready the price is down to nothing.

Then he says further:

> It was one of our members who won a prize at the Royal show, Toronto, last fall with his collection of vegetables.

That is a pretty good recommendation for ths gardeners of Manitoba.

The Progressive party, in advocating certain policies which they have been advocating ever since they first came into this House as a group, such as the policy of free trade and the cutting off of the duty on all agricultural implements, or implements of production, as they generally term it, are in my opinion rather narrow in their outlook. They are somewhat restricted in their vision in advocating such a policy. I suppose they are sincere in their beliefs, and they seem to think that if the policy they propose were put into effect they would be able to buy binders, mowers, ploughs and other agricultural implements cheaper than they can get them to-day. They remind me of the story I used to read as a schoolboy, of the dog which while crossing the brook with a bone in his mouth snatched at the reflection in the water, mistaking it for another and better bone than the one he had. He lost the one he had and found that there was no other. Hon. gentlemen put me in mind of that fable: they are quite ready to grasp at the shadow, taking a chance on losing the substance. They are willing, indeed, to sacrifice other industries in order to advance the interests of their own, failing to see the fallacy that underlies such a policy. That is not a national policy; it is not a policy that should commend itself to the people of the country. In my opinion it is a policy which the Canadian people when they have an opportunity will reject.

With regard to the budget and the speech of the Minister of Finance in introducing it, I have no doubt that when placing his annual statement before parliament he really felt that he was offering something that would be satisfactory to the people at large. It seems to me, however, that after it has been analysed and carefully looked into the budget as a whole will not appeal to the people. They will not be quite so enthusiastic about it as the minister and the government evidently assume. It is not such a budget as will appeal to the common people, the labourers of Canada; it will to a greater extent affect the people of means. It may take from such people something more in the way of income tax, and I have no objection to that, because in my opinion no man with an income of $5,000 or $10,000 should be reluctant to pay a fair share of taxation. But so far as the poor man is concerned, the budget offers no great relief. The present proposals will not tend to any great extent to relieve the poor people of Canada of the burdens which they are bearing to-day, so that when the government refers to it as the poor man's budget they are misapplying that term. We must however give the Minister of Finance credit for candour in presenting his statement. I admire the rugged honesty he showed in informing the House at the outset that the reason he was able to submit to the people what he considered a satisfactory budget—and he made no bones about it—was because bountiful nature had blessed us with a good crop during the past year. He is quite right in that. It is not by reason of any policy of the government that we are enjoying some measure of prosperity to-day; it is simply because bountiful nature has been kind to us.

When the minister speaks of the prosperity which prevails just now, I want to refer him to an item of news which appeared in the Ottawa Journal some time ago. No doubt he will discount it, seeing the source from which I take it. However, the article in question refers to a statement made by a labour delegate at a meeting held in the city of Ottawa on February 20, I be-

11 p.m. lieve—the date does not appear —to the effect that there were in Ottawa at that time over 6,000 men out of employment and that their families were practically facing starvation. Now, I would ask the Minister of Finance whether there is any use in any government or any set of men telling the country that we are prosperous while such a condition of affairs exists.

[Mr. Hay.]

Could the Minister of Finance possibly convince any one of those 6,000 men that conditions to-day are prosperous? Could he make any one of the hundred thousand men who are out of employment throughout Canada at the present time believe that general prosperity prevails? I say, while he may be sincere he is beside the mark in stating that this Dominion as a whole is prosperous. I appreciate the fact that a measure of prosperity does exist in certain districts, and particularly among the market gardeners and farmers, the men who, my hon. friend from St. Boniface says, would not be hurt if they were deprived of the home market. It is useless to talk about prosperity under present conditions. I certainly do believe that we are on the eve of a great era of progress if only we can secure a sound policy under stable government. There is nothing that could stop us unless it were an unstable policy such as the policy now in force, which is undermining public confidence in our institutions and in representative government. Here we have supposed representatives of the people promising at one time to stabilize conditions, and at another, without any warning, introducing such changes as will throw thousands of men out of employment.

I want to refer for a moment or two to some remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) during the debate that occurred on the Australian treaty, as well as during the discussion of other treaties consummated by this government. During the consideration of the Australian treaty protests came in, I think I am safe in saying, from every province in the Dominion, against the unfair competition to which our people would be submitted in consequence of that and other treaties entered into by this government. One or two of those protests I wish to read to the Minister of Agriculture for his information, because at the time, in my opinion, he treated them very lightly. I have a quotation here from Three Rivers, Quebec, dated February 26, 1926, in connection with which I would like to make some remarks. It says:

> A plea for adequate protection for Canadian butter against foreign competition was made this evening by Frank Byrne, of Charlesbourg, first vice-president of the General Breeders' Association of Quebec, at the closing meeting of its thirty-fourth convention.
> "If we could produce 15,000,000 pounds of butter more annually," said Mr. Byrne, "we could sell them, but a difficulty arises in the way of success. Other countries threaten to sell their butter here. We ought to hit foreign butter as hard as foreign countries hit our butter. Duties as high as those established by foreign countries ought to be imposed here, and I hope that the government will see to it."

That is one of the protests which came to the Minister of Agriculture during the discussion of these treaties. With reference to this particular article I would like to say that these people who met in convention in Three Rivers must have represented the Conservative party very largely, because it will be noticed that in the resolution passed by that convention the brick for brick policy denounced by hon. members opposite is advocated. That is the tariff which the Conservative party has been advocating, so far as it relates to the products of the Canadian farmer, and that is the tariff which those people believe in. When our friends opposite from Quebec try to show by figures that the vote on October 29 last throughout Canada was in some respects favourable to the Liberal party, I want to tell them that the vote in Quebec must have been largely for the policy indicated by this article, the policy advocated by the Conservative party in Canada. We can take no other meaning from the article I have just read.

We had other protests from the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and particularly from British Columbia. In Manitoba also a resolution was passed somewhat similar to the one passed in Quebec, reading as follows:

> That the National Dairy Council appoint a committee to wait on the federal government to urge adjustment of the Australian treaty.

When these protests were coming from all quarters and from almost every province in the Dominion, the Minister of Agriculture insulted the dairying interests by his attitude at that time with respect to their protests; his language was an insult to the dairying interests of Manitoba. When these protests were coming in the minister said that if the dairying interests of Canada would devote more time to improving the quality of their butter rather than to making protests against trade treaties between Canada and Australia, they would do more good. Our butter has a reputation on the markets of the world for quality, Mr. Speaker, and when the hon. minister makes that statement he is unfair to the dairying interests of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend is not quite fair. Surely I did not put it in just that way. Has my hon. friend the statement?

Mr. HAY: The minister went further, and belittled the dairying interests of this country.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh no; my hon. friend goes too far.

Mr. HAY: He even went so far as to insult the good old Canadian dairy cow as well. He said that the unit of production was the dairy cow, and that if we wished to compete successfully with other countries we must improve the productivity of the dairy cow. In my opinion—and I know something of farming and of cows—the good old Canadian dairy cow has been doing her duty by the people of Canada for many years, but I fail to see that the Minister of Agriculture is doing his duty by the Canadian dairy cow.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the hon. gentleman know the production of milk per cow in Canada?

Mr. HAY: I say the minister is not doing his duty by the Canadian dairy cow, because he is placing her up against an unfair competition from outside sources; he is placing her up against competition that she cannot successfully meet. At a time of the year when our dairy cattle are being housed, with dry feed, it is impossible to meet the competition of the Australian or New Zealand dairy cow which, at that season of the year, is out on the green pasture; when her flow of milk is greater than the flow of milk from the Canadian cow at that season. When the minister speaks of improving the quality of Canadian butter, I want to refer him to a letter received from the External Trade branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, dated February 10, 1926. In response to a request for information from this department in connection with the Manitoba dairying interests I received this reply, which is headed, "Dairying in Manitoba." I will only read part of the letter, as I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the House:

> Three hundred and fifteen carloads of creamery butter was shipped out of the province of Manitoba last year, or a total of 126,000 fifty-six pound boxes, totalling 7,056,000 pounds valued at $2,416,680. The most of this butter was shipped direct to the British market during the summer months of heavy production, and when the butter was fresh and in the best condition. Manitoba butter has given excellent satisfaction on the British market.

That was from Manitoba alone, a province only in its infancy as regards dairying. Then the letter goes on to state that most of this butter was shipped direct to the British market, during the summer months of heavy production, and that it had given excellent satisfaction there.

It will be seen from that letter that our Canadian creamery butter, particularly, has a very high reputation for quality in the markets of the world, and consequently I think it ill becomes the Minister of Agriculture to belittle the quality of that butter.

I should like to give a quotation as to the effect of the Australian trade treaty on the butter situation in Canada. I am sorry that my friends of the Progressive party have deserted the chamber. I was going to say to them that if the statements attributed to the hon. member for Brandon in the interview which he denies were true, they could no longer be called Progressives. I think the term applied to them, and which they resented very much some years ago, could truthfully be applied to them at this time if the statements credited to the hon. member for Brandon were correct; and that term was that the Progressives were but a dilapidated annex of the Liberal party.

I will now give the quotation from the Scoop Shovel, in its issue of April, 1296. This publication is the official organ of the Manitoba Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited and of the Manitoba Pool, and is published in Winnipeg. It says:

> Prices of dairy products for the past few months have been very remunerative to the producers, but we are reaching a stage where we must be prepared to accept lower prices on account of importations of Australian and New Zealand butters, largely due to the more favourable conditions brought about by the action of the government in entering into the Australian treaty which lowered the duty against the entry of Australian butter. Had this butter not been brought in we could have expected a steady market for at least the month of April or until the season of heavy production, when the production of Canadian butter exceeds the consumption.

Coming from such a source, this view should have some weight with the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that some kind of family compact exists between the Liberal party and the Progressives. In that connection I should like to remind my Progressive friends that the Minister of Agriculture, speaking in the town of Selkirk, Manitoba, made the statement that the greatest block on the wheels of progress in this country to-day was the Progressive party. I do not know whether he will deny that or not, but I believe his statement is absolutely correct. While there is evidently some agreement existing between these two groups, some kind of unholy alliance, there is evidently no love lost between them, for I notice that at a Liberal convention at Edmonton in the province of Alberta, held the other day, which was attended by Liberal representatives from all over the province, a gentleman was chosen as the provincial Liberal leader by the name of Shaw. I have not the honour of knowing him, but no doubt he stands high in the councils of the Liberal party. I believe that he at one time deserted the Liberal party to which he originally belonged, joined the Progressives, and now after a time has gone back to his first love. Mr. Speaker, his very first act after being chosen leader of the Liberal party in Alberta was to make an attack upon the Progressives of the province of Alberta and upon the Progressives of the Dominion generally. I want to place these words on Hansard because I may have occasion to refer to them if I ever go before the electors again. The newspaper report says:

> At the afternoon session, Joseph T. Shaw, newly elected leader, launched an attack upon the Farmer government of Alberta, terming it one of inaction.

That describes the attitude of the Progressives, not only in Alberta, but in the Dominion as a whole.

I do not wish to take up very much more time, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion, there is no reason to my mind why Canada should be to-day not merely one of the most prosperous countries of the world, but actually the most prosperous country in the world. With its immense areas of fertile agricultural lands, with its great areas of timber, with its wealth of fisheries, with its vast undeveloped natural resources, with its great possibilities for the production of cheap hydro-electric power, there is no reason why Canada should not be the most prosperous country on the face of the globe. But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that confidence in this country has been undermined by policies which have been unstable and unsound, and until we put into effect sound and stable policies we cannot expect to have that general prosperity which every Canadian would like to see in this country. Our great natural resources, when properly developed, should make this country the richest in the world. It is estimated that some 19,000,000 horse power of hydro-electric energy can be developed in the Dominion, and I am proud to say that some five or six million of that amount can be developed in the province of Manitoba alone. With a proper policy, this source of energy will make not only Manitoba prosperous, but the Dominion as a whole. It only requires sound and proper policies to develop our great natural resources and make this country the greatest and most prosperous in the world. There is no reason why we should not attain that happy position. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for your kindly attention.

On motion of Mr. Heenan the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Motherwell the House adjourned at 11.22 p.m.

Tuesday, May 11, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT PRESENTED

First report of the select standing committee on Standing Orders.—Mr. Morin (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville).

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) moved:

That the House do concur in the adoption of the first report of the select standing committee on Standing Orders presented this day.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) moved:

That the petition of the Commercial Mutual Fire Insurance Company of St. Hyacinthe, province of Quebec, presented this day, praying for an act to exercise throughout Canada the business of insurance against fire and lightning, and the report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, be referred to the select standing committee on Standing Orders, pursuant to the provisions of rule 88.

Motion agreed to.

PETITION OF JAMES McCUTCHEON COLEMAN

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendation contained in the first report of the select standing committee on Standing Orders, the petition of James McCutcheon Coleman, presented on May 5th, praying for an act to extend the time for the payment of fees on certain patents owned by him, be now read and received.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, May 10, 1926.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. F. A. Anglin, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday the 12th instant, at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. F. SLADEN,
Governor General's Secretary.

To the Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons, Ottawa.

DUMPING DUTY—AUSTRALIAN BUTTER AND FRUIT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. G. H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs): I would like to answer a question asked yesterday in this House by the hon. member for Norfolk-Elgin (Mr. Stansell) concerning a dumping duty on butter and canned fruit from Australia.

From the information before me, the Pattersen scheme came into effect in Australia on January 1, 1926. Under this scheme a tax of 1½d. per pound is levied on all butter produced, and out of the fund so created, an export bonus of 3d. per pound is paid on butter exported.

The net effect is that the home consumption value becomes 3d. per pound greater than the export London parity, and all butter exported after that date under this scheme becomes subject to dumping duty equal to 3d., or 6 cents, per pound, provided, of course, that this amount does not exceed 15 per cent of the home consumption value.

Respecting canned fruit, there is an undefined export bonus in effect. combined with a drawback or export allowance on sugar entering into the manufacture of the canned fruit. This has not yet been exactly estimated, but instructions have been issued to all of our collectors and appraisers that information has been received at the department in respect to a graduated export bonus granted in Australia on the export of peaches and apricots which it appears would subject the importations thereof to special or dumping duty, and that entries are to be accepted subject to amendment only and the invoices are to be forwarded to the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend could tell us the date when the dumping duty of six cents became effective?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am under the impression that all invoices for butter shipped after the 1st of January were received subject to amendment, and the dumping duty of six cents has been imposed since that date.

Mr. FRED DAVIS (East Calgary): Are we to understand that in the case of all butter released on the basis of the payment of a duty of one cent a pound the dumping duty of six cents will be enforced?

Mr. BOIVIN: It depends on the date of the shipment.

Mr. DAVIS: Take the case of shipments made since January 1st.

Mr. BOIVIN: It will apply to all butter which left Australia after the 1st of January and for which entries were made subject to amendment.

STRIKE IN GREAT BRITAIN PROTECTION OF CANADIAN WHEAT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I desire to ask the government these questions:

1. What steps are being taken by the government to safeguard Canadian wheat in view of the general British strike now continuing?
2. As a matter of emergency has arisen will the government provide some measure of protection to our wheat by either financing it or affording some sort of guarantee as to prices?
3. Has the government communicated with the banks, or the Canadian Bankers' Association, to come to the help of the grain dealers if the strike continues indefinitely, so that the farmers who grow wheat will not suffer?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend had better put his question on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question goes on the order paper.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 10, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, as a new member I had not intended to take part in this debate, but inasmuch as several statements have been made that are calculated to mislead the public, especially in connection with Ontario affairs, I deem it my duty to say a few words in connection with the same.

But before going on to discuss Canadian affairs I ask that I be permitted to say a few words in connection with the trouble threatening the Old Country at the present time. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that I express the views of every member on both sides of this House when I say that I hope the clouds now hovering over Great Britain will soon be dispelled, and that a better understanding between the parties to this great conflict will soon be arrived at. In this regard I notice evidences of an inclination on the part of some people in Canada to attribute ulterior motives to both sides. There are a great many persons in Canada who have blood relations and dear friends in the old land who feel impelled to express their views on the question. I think upon reflection, however, we will all agree that heated argument upon this side of the Atlantic, especially at the present stage of affairs, will do very little good. I am sure it is the desire of everyone to abstain from any action which might be productive of harm and to do nothing which would delay the early conclusion of a settlement honourable to both sides. I have great faith in the ability of the British people to overcome difficulties no matter how grave they may be, and I sincerely hope that no words will be expressed on this side of the ocean other than words of encouragement and helpfulness in the expectation that both sides of the controversy may soon get together and settle the dispute in a way that will be mutually fair and honourable.

The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney) yesterday delivered what I may call a nice little speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, it was a nice little political speech, and I desire to congratulate the hon. member upon it. It was too bad, however, that the hon. gentleman had to bring in the labour trouble in Nova Scotia in order to make political capital. In his effort to do that the hon. gentleman misinterpreted the whole situation as it existed there. I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman that there was no need to order troops into Nova Scotia on the occasion referred to. But seeing that troops were ordered there, the hon. gentleman should have truthfully stated how that came about. I think the hon. gentleman stated yesterday that this government had ordered the troops to be sent to Nova Scotia, and had instructed them to shoot. The hon. gentleman followed this up by stating that the soldiers did shoot and that bloodshed had followed. My information is that there was no shooting on the occasion in question and consequently no bloodshed. The Prime Minister and the Minister of the Interior both undertook to explain to the hon. gentleman who was responsible for the ordering out of the troops. May I now supplement what they said. The law specifically places the responsibility of ordering out troops on the shoulders of the attorney general of each province. The act which deals with the matter is the Militia Act which was amended in 1924. Section 81 of that act reads as follows:

> In any case where a riot or disturbance occurs, or is anticipated as likely to occur, the attorney general or the acting attorney general of the province in which is situated the place where such riot or disturbance occurs or is anticipated as likely to occur on his own motion or upon receiving notification from a judge of a superior or county or district court, having jurisdiction in such place, that the services of the active militia are required in aid of the civil power may by requisition in writing addressed to the district officer commanding the military district in which such place is situated, require the active militia or such portion thereof as the district officer commanding considers necessary, to be called out on active service in aid of the civil power.

The next section, section 82, points out that if the district officer commanding a military district is not present, or is unable to act from sickness or any other cause, the officer for the time being commanding shall call out the active militia. There is no discretion in the matter, the officer commanding is obligated to call out the militia when he receives a requisition from the attorney general.

Mr. QUINN: Did not the Liberal government of Nova Scotia send a requisition to the Liberal government at Ottawa asking for troops to be sent to Cape Breton?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. QUINN: I think I am in order. Am I not in order, Mr. Speaker?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): The hon. member can only put a question with the consent of the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. QUINN: I am asking the hon. member a question. Did the attorney general of the Liberal government of Nova Scotia not send a request to the federal government of Canada for troops, on which request the troops were sent into Sydney, N.S., and as a consequence blood was shed?

Mr. HEENAN: I thought the hon. member was listening to me and trying to follow me.

Mr. QUINN: Yes, very attentively.

Mr. HEENAN: If he had been listening I would not have to repeat myself. However, it is a fair question. If the attorney general did send such a request, he did not know his business under the act.

Mr. QUINN: That is an admission.

Mr. HEENAN: All he had to do was to make a requisition for troops from the district officer commanding, not the federal government, and if the Liberal government in Nova Scotia did requisition the Liberal government of Canada to send troops and the federal government sent them, I would be one of the first to condemn the government for doing so.

An hon. MEMBER: Then condemn them.

Mr. QUINN: That is what I said.

Mr. HEENAN: But they did not do it, and the records do not show that they did it. The attorney general—the Liberal attorney general of Nova Scotia, if you will—requisitioned troops from the district commanding officer, and he said—

Mr. QUINN: The hon. member cannot hide behind the act.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Since the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) knows so much about it, let me tell him that the troops went to Nova Scotia on the request of the district officer commanding, without any request from Ottawa at all, without our knowing they were there until they arrived.

Mr. ARTHURS: How was it possible that the local troops in district No. 2, Toronto, should be transferred to Nova Scotia without the intervention of Ottawa?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Look up the act of 1924 and you will find that is the way in which it was done.

Mr. HEENAN: I desire to draw attention to the fact that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) is not making this speech, and that I have no objection whatever to hon. gentlemen opposite asking me any questions they like.

Mr. QUINN: I ask the hon. member whether troops can be sent to any part of Canada without the authorization of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, according to law, I do not agree with the law; the law ought to be changed. I am going to appeal to the Minister of National Defence to introduce an amendment to provide that no troops can be sent anywhere except on the responsibility of the government. I will go further and say that if the calling out of the troops had anything to do with, or contributed in any way to the defeat of, the Liberal government of Nova Scotia, I consider they got their deserts. But the hon. member went further. He said the troops were ordered out, that they were ordered to shoot and that they did shoot and kill. I cannot find any record of any place where there was any shooting done or anyone killed; so that evidently the troops refused to comply with instructions. I think when the hon. member made his speech he got his wires crossed. I believe he was actually thinking of the strike of 1919 in Winnipeg, because I know that the troops were ordered there; the troops went in and they were ordered to shoot; they did shoot and did kill, and the Conservative government of the day, or the Union government which was the same thing, were responsible.

Mr. HEAPS: We were told that the troops went in there without a request from the provincial government.

Mr. HEENAN: I understand they were sent in without any request.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. gentleman know that in 1919 the troops went into the city of Winnipeg without the consent of the provincial government? I know that this government was a party to sending the troops in there.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not this government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the hon. gentleman make that statement of his own knowledge? I will tell him that there were no troops used in the Winnipeg strike. There were forty-nine mounted policemen there and no troops at all.

Mr. HEENAN: If the hon. member makes that statement of his own knowledge why did his party object to the papers in that connection to be laid before the House?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am putting the hon. member right, troops were not sent in.

Mr. HEENAN: I do not know if they were troops or not, they were red coats and and they shot and killed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Forty-nine nounted policemen.

Mr. HEENAN: And the people who were killed or injured would not care very much whether you called them troops or policemen. I was in Winnipeg at the time.

Mr. QUINN: May I be permitted to ask a question?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): Not without the consent of the hon. member who is now speaking, but I would ask the House to discontinue discussion along this line.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. QUINN: Have I permission to ask a question?

Mr. HEENAN: Go ahead.

Mr. QUINN: Is the hon. member aware that two years ago in the coal riots in Cape Breton people were killed?

Mr. HEENAN: Oh, if the hon. member wants to become reminiscent, I remember some time ago when I was a little boy in Ireland there was a riot.

Mr. QUINN: I am talking about Canada. Let Ireland go. I am just as Irish as the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. HEENAN: Pardon me; I did not mean that to be a smart answer to the hon. member (Mr. Quinn); I was answering the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney), who spoke yesterday about what happened a year ago in Nova Scotia. During the Winnipeg strike I was there; our men kept out of the strike. Therefore, I know something about it, and I know there was no more need for troops in the Winnipeg strike in 1919 than there was for troops in Nova Scotia last year. I am simply trying to get the facts before the people. All that was necessary in the Winnipeg trouble was that the Minister of Labour, who was on the job, should have used a little horse sense, and there would have been no blood shed. But instead of that, they chose to have the troops sent in. It was premeditated. It does not make very much difference, because I think if hon. members on the other side would allow the files to be brought down they would find it was all premeditated. that when the boys were being discharged or demobilized on their landing, special men who would do their bidding, were picked out to be sent to Winnipeg, and they were very careful that those who, they thought, would not do their bidding were not sent. I say the government is entirely responsible for that.

I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his financial statement, and I do this very sincerely, because I consider that $22,000,000 of a surplus is something that any government might be proud of. I notice that hon. members in their speeches find different excuses why this government should not receive credit for having a surplus. I have often thought it is too bad that public men, men who aspire to be statesmen, should become so partisan in their views that they cannot even give credit where credit is due.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) the other day in an effort to throw cold water on the surplus, actually compared the financial affairs of the Dominion with that of Ontario. He said that while the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) was satisfactory at least to some extent, they could not give any credit to the government; that the credit was all due to Providence for giving a bountiful crop. On the other hand and almost in the next breath he lauded the financial condition of Ontario, and while admitting that that province had also a great crop and that Providence had been kind to Ontario, he gave the credit to the financial experts of the Conservative government of Ontario. This is what the hon. member said when he was speaking of economy:

> If there is one thing which the people of this country demand at the present time, it is that the expenditure of the national government be cut down. I know of no cry throughout the province of Ontario more persistent than that government economy be exercised to the very last degree. We hear that cry in our provincial legislature, and we are pleased to note that the government of Ontario has put the finances of the province on such a footing that within a reasonable time that province will regain its former financial stability.

I was a member of the Ontario legislature for six years, resigning my seat to run in the last election. My position has not yet been filled; the government of to-day apparently consider that the north country is just as well off without a representative as with one. I would at least have thought they would try to get a Conservative to represent that district because even a Conservative is a little better than no representative. Having an interest in the financial condition of that province I secured a copy of the public accounts and this is what I find. At the end of 1922, which was the last full year of the Drury regime, the total debt of the province amounted to $240,506,176. At the end of 1925, after three years' administration of the economical Conservative government, the total debt amounted to $324,922,473, or an increase of $84,416,297.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): How much of that is included in the Hydro-Electric development?

Mr. HEENAN: This is ordinary expenditures only. The argument that the government of Ontario is putting up in order to hoodwink the people is that a certain amount of this money has been expended on the Hydro-Electric which is a revenue producer. After Drury got through, the Conservative government of Ontario during the past three years added practically $67,000,000 to the debt of that province. This does not include one cent of Hydro-Electric or any other revenue producing investment. I wonder if that is the manner in which the hon. member for South Wellington would like this government to run the finances of this country.

Mr. KAISER: How much of that represents obligations incurred by Drury?

Mr. HEENAN: During the last three years when the Tory government of Ontario were in power, $67,000,000 was added to the public debt on their own account and they are responsible for it. I am not trying to shield Drury or his government for whatever they did.

An hon. MEMBER: Or Peter Smith.

Mr. HEENAN: There are a good many Peter Smiths only they have not been caught. The hon. member for South Wellington says that the cry for economy prevails all through the province of Ontario. Let us see how this economical Conservative government answered that cry for economy. In 1922 the Drury government spent $37,000,000; in 1925, in answer to this cry for economy, the Ferguson government spent $51,000,000. I ask again, if that is the way in which the hon. member for South Wellington would like this government to economize, that is by continuing to increase expenditure notwithstanding the fact that the public debt is increasing. The Ferguson government collected $6,000,000 more from the people last year than they did in 1924 and $12,500,000 more than they did in 1923 and yet they show a deficit of $5,000,000. Is that the way in which the hon. member for South Wellington would like this government to carry on the finances of this country? As a comparison with the Drury regime because I notice the provincial treasurer all through his speech made a comparison with the last horrible year, as the Conservatives call it, of the Drury regime, I should like to point out that if last year the Tory government of Ontario had received only the same amount of money as the Drury government did in 1923 and spent the same amount as they did in 1925, they would have shown a deficit of $17,500,000 last year instead of $5,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As my hon. friend is discussing provincial and not federal politics, what was the actual deficit in the last year of the so-called Drury regime?

Mr. HEENAN: I am glad my hon. friend asked me that question because I might have forgotten it. As regards discussing provincial politics I am answering one of my hon. friend's friends who tried to tell this country that the finances of Ontario are in good shape and that this government should copy that province. Hon. members will recall that the provincial election took place in June, 1923, and the government changed hands in July. The Drury government spent a good deal of money that year, but hon. members will have to admit that the Tory government not only kept the books, but fixed them so that they made it the most horrible year it was possible to make it. They paid every cent they could find to pay and they urged everybody to put in their bills, saying: The going is good; come on in. On the other hand it was generally known that they encouraged people who owed money to the government to withhold their payments until the end of the fiscal year when the books were closed. It was therefore by cooking it in this way that the Conservative government of Ontario was able to show that the Drury government had practically a deficit of $15,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Nineteen and a half millions, my dear friend.

Mr. HEENAN: I should not be surprised if you were to say 90 million. After manipulating the finances of the province in this way the Conservative government of the province then compared their record with that of the Drury government, but I would again point out that if they had received only the same amount in 1925 as the Drury government received in 1923 and spent the same amount as they did, they would have a deficit of $17,500,000 in the past year.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is not as bad as nineteen and a half million.

Mr. HEENAN: But the whole story is not told merely by showing the deficit. The Conservative government of the province has persistently asserted that what it was able to accomplish it accomplished without creating new taxes. It has successfully fooled the people. The press comes out with headlines like these:

No new taxes. Old deficit cut. Surplus of two million dollars.

The press can publish these headlines for the simple reason that the government of the province gives out intimations to this effect long before the legislature gets the public accounts. Evidently there is method in their madness, for they have misled the press.

The Ferguson government did double the dues on timber last year and that is a new tax, and they put on a new tax on gasoline and beer from which they received $1,174,000. They might have got more out of the beer had it been good beer, but the fact is that the people of Ontario have been just as greatly disappointed in their 4.4 as they have been in the Ferguson government. The Ferguson government also benefited by an increase in motor permits to the extent of $850,000, and in succession duties they received an additional $1,600,000. A number of rich people having died, the government collected the taxes from their estates; and I hardly think that the hon. member for South Wellington had that in his mind when he said that Providence had been good to the Ferguson government. The Minister of Finance is not in his place, and so I will address this appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King): Do not let the government accept the views of financial experts from Ontario as a basis for them to go upon.

I do not think that we ought to dispose of the question of Ontario's finances without considering the way in which some of the money has been spent. I suppose it is general knowledge that in Ontario we have what is known as the northern development fund. It is usually supplemented to the extent of $5,000,000. The legislature votes the money in a lump sum, placing it in charge of the Minister of Lands and Forests, so that the government or the minister has a blank cheque for $5,000,000, which is supposed to be used for the development of fifteen districts in northern Ontario in respect of roads, bridges and so forth. These districts are each supposed to get a square deal in this matter. But do they? I want to tell the House that during the past three years this development fund has been used mainly for the purpose of corrupting the electorate of northern Ontario, and I make that statement after giving the matter due consideration. I say it knowing the responsibility of a public man in making a statement of the kind. The fund has been used mainly for the purpose of corrupting the electorate of northern Ontario and when such corruption has failed it has been used in order to intimidate, to discriminate against, and even to persecute settlers in the north country.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member know that the last grant went through at the last session of the local legislature with practically no objection from either the leader of the Progressives or the leader of the Liberals?

Mr. HEENAN: Of course; it does every time. But that does not say that it has been used by Progressives or Liberals. I am telling you how the money was used, and I do not think that the people of the province should allow it to be spent in this way whether by unanimous consent or not. It should be voted to the different constituencies and not placed in the hands of any minister, Liberal, Conservative, Farmer or Labour. Now, I made a charge on the floor of the Ontario legislature last year that public servants, men paid out of the coffers of Ontario, were going through the north country persecuting and intimidating the settlers in that district.

Mr. NICHOLSON: As a northern Ontario man I protest against these statements made in a federal budget speech and referring to a state of affairs in regard to which no explanation can be given.

Mr. HEENAN: Instead of protesting—

Mr. NICHOLSON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member presumably is discussing the federal budget, and instead of doing so he is criticizing provincial finances entirely. He is making charges with regard to public men in the province of Ontario in a forum in which those public men can have no opportunity of answering.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see the point of order.

Mr. HEENAN: I can see further than you can, Mr. Speaker. The point of order should be this: that instead of a man from northern Ontario protesting against these facts being made public, he should protest against the damnable practices of the Tory administration in northern Ontario.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw that expression.

Mr. HEENAN: All right; we can substitute anything just as bad.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: What do you want me to do—say my prayers?

Mr. SPEAKER: The withdrawal must be complete.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, I will say, the rotten practices engaged in in northern Ontario. Now, I am appealing to the Ontario members of this House and I can assure them that the statements I make I can prove; I am not here simply blathering. I made these statements on the floor of the legislature when the Prime Minister of the province, instead of doing as my hon. friend has done, stood up on the floor and said that if there was such a horrible thing going on in the province he would have an investigation and strike off the heads of any civil servants who might be guilty.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My hon. friend could not prove his case.

Mr. HEENAN: My hon. friend says that I could not prove my case. I have eighteen affidavits, twelve of them signed by men who never voted anything but Tory in their lives and who never will. All of these affidavits bear out what I have said and no investigation has ever been held. Yet my hon. friend says I never proved my case.

Mr. ROWE: Would the hon. member permit a question? He has stated that there was corruption in northern Ontario, and that he spoke of this corruption in the provincial house. Would he now tell us the words he used in dealing with this question, and when he spoke of it?

Mr. HEENAN: I said then that I wanted to draw to the attention of the people of the province of Ontario the practices being carried on in northern Ontario. There were civil servants in that part of the country, engineers, warehouse keepers, bookkeepers and timekeepers going through the country and especially the riding I represented, gloating over the hardships of the settlers due to the fact that they had suffered two partial crop failures. These men were telling those settlers that they would get no assistance and no roads built until they saw fit to vote for a Conservative candidate and put him in office. That was my statement, and the Premier said that if he could find anyone who had done that sort of thing, and if I would give him the names of the men responsible, he would strike them off the payroll. But the investigation has never yet been held.

Mr. SPEAKER: Though much latitude is given in a budget speech, as in a speech on the Address, hon. members should however confine their remarks to the questions before the House. The hon. gentleman is now dealing with provincial politics, and I would ask him to speak on the budget.

Mr. HEENAN: While I am willing to abide by Your Honour's wishes in the matter, I might say that as a new member I sat here looking for a lead. I have noticed that different members on both sides of the House have been permitted to ramble all over the country, speaking of provincial as well as Dominion affairs, strikes, lock-outs, murders and everything else. I will abide by that ruling, but in fairness I ask you, Mr. Speaker, not to rule that way in view of the fact that two

hon. members opposite, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) made statements in regard to provincial affairs which were misleading to the public. Surely, having a knowledge of these things, I have a right to answer those statements. I wait now, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: An answer to a statement previously made is permissible, but every speech should be confined to the question at issue. We are now considering the budget, the tariff, the financial policy of the government, and hon. members on both sides of the House must direct their remarks as much as possible to those questions.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, I was nearly through anyway. I do not think, however, that Your Honour caught the gist of my argument. I feel that if you had done so you would not have ruled in that way, because I am now going to show that this $5,000,000—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: What is the matter with my hon. friends; if they are out of order why do they not get a prescription? I was going to show, Mr. Speaker, that money out of this $5,000,000 fund was used not only in provincial affairs but also during the last federal election, in works and wages, in order to defeat this government. In view of that fact, would Your Honour still rule that I should keep away from this question?

Mr. SPEAKER: So long as I do not call the hon. gentleman to order he may continue.

Mr. HEENAN: As I have already said, I made the statement on the floor of the House and since that time it has been supported by good Conservatives. During the last federal election the provincial Minister of Lands and Forests went through that country promising roads, bridges and everything else, to such an extent that a Conservative candidate actually protested against it. Some hon. members opposite may think I am prejudiced.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no; absolutely not.

Mr. HEENAN: Thank you; once in a while we get our hon. friends to tell the truth. No one, I think, will question the standing in the Conservative party of Mr. John J. Carrick. He was the federal Conservative member for Port Arthur; he sat in the Ontario House representing Port Arthur, and ran in the last federal election as an independent Conservative. After appealing to the Premier of Ontario and to everyone else in authority in connection with these promises made by the Minister of Lands and Forests he was forced to wire the following mesage to the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario:

> The honour of the crown is being besmirched by the Port Arthur Conservative machine. An announcement of the Nipigon pulp limit tenders is being withheld from the public to be used here for the advantage of the machine candidate. No party owns our government resources, they belong to all alike, Liberal and Conservative, and should not be used for the advantage of any party. The Conservative machine advertises that Hon. James Lyons, Minister of Lands and Forests, will address a meeting in the Colonial theatre here Friday and will have a message "re the sale of pulpwood to our mills." The announcement of any government tenders have always been made through the press. Why should Mr. Lyons come here to make the announcement on the public platform except to influence votes for the Conservative machine candidate? Mr. Lyons spoke at Hornpayne and Sioux Lookout and promised them road grants, bounty on iron ore, and to survey agricultural lands, to influence votes in this constituency. The provincial Conservative machine are intimidating their employees in this constituency and coercing their support to the machine candidate with a threat of dismissal. On behalf of the self-respecting citizens of this constituency I respectfully enter a protest to you as our Lieutenant Governor of the province of Ontario.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Carrick was defeated in the last election, was he not?

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Carrick was defeated in the country, but polled a majority of 500 in the city of Port Arthur, where he was known.

Mr. MANION: He ran as an independent candidate, not as a Conservative.

Mr. HEENAN: An independent Conservative.

An hon. MEMBER: There are no independent Conservatives.

Mr. HEENAN: I thought they were all independent, because I heard the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) say the other night that hon. members opposite were not whipped into line.

Mr. Carrick also published a daily paper, and in that paper he states that a lady—I do not want to mention her name here—took an affidavit that she was intimidated; she was told that if she did not work for the machine, it would be difficult for her and her husband to make a living in that part of the country. I noticed that when we were discussing the Peace River election in this House the other day my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) several times referred to the Saskatchewan machine. I want to tell him and this House that I have never seen anything in my life anywhere that could compete with the machine we have in Ontario, but it is a Tory machine.

I do not like my hon. friend from Fort William giving credit to the western provinces for having all the good things, when we have in this province of Ontario a machine that the western provinces cannot possibly beat, and I think from a patriotic standpoint the hon. member ought to give his province credit for that.

Mr. MANION: The machine never came into my riding.

Mr. HEENAN: I admit that. I believe the hon. member is too decent a fellow to even allow the Minister of Lands and Forests, though he be a Conservative, to come into his riding.

Mr. GOTT: He came into mine, and I was proud of it.

Mr. HEENAN: Maybe you got some of this, did you?

Mr. GOTT: Nothing like that.

Mr. HEENAN: I think it is only fair for me to say there is no man for whom I have more respect, or for whom the people who know him have more respect, than the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Langworthy), and everybody in that part of the country entirely relieves him of any responsibility in connection with this matter. Though it is only fair for me to say that, just the same I have never heard the hon. member for Fort William or the hon. member for Port Arthur get up in any public place and protest against these practices.

Mr. MANION: There is nothing to protest against. The hon. member is pointing out some very wicked things which happen to suit his speech, but so far as I am concerned, I was up there in the election and I saw nothing whatever of these tactics. Ministers have made speeches in Port Arthur, and that, of course, was quite within their rights. But I know nothing of any tactics of this kind that were followed out there.

Mr. HEENAN: We have a Conservative paper in Kenora called the Miner and News, in which it is stated that Mr. Lyons spoke in that town and promised them all kinds of things, but evidently the people did not believe him because that town gave your humble servant a majority of nearly four hundred. This is a Conservative paper; there is no doubt about that, because its editor has received the nomination for the Conservative party in the next provincial election. I do not want to take up time reading from this paper unless any hon. member requests it, but it shows that Mr. Lyons promised all kinds of things—roads, bridges and highways galore—to be built next year. There was a case of the provincial Minister of Lands and Forests taking part in a federal election and trying to bribe the settlers of that country with this kind of thing, and the point I want to make is, that no minister, whether he be Liberal or Conservative, should have a five million dollar fund under his hand to do with as he sees fit. The money should be voted by parliament for the specific purposes or roads for which it is to be used.

Mr. ROWE: Did the hon. member object in the provincial House to that $5,000,000 being spent in northern Ontario? Were not the people of Northern Ontario just as much disappointed over many other promises they had received before, in regard, for instance to the Backus deal and the building of many pulp mills in that part of the country?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, and I shall discuss that in a few moments; I am glad the hon. gentleman has reminded me of it. During the Drury regime, if you will look at the expenditures that were made all through that north country, you will find that there were constituencies in which Conservatives got as much, and sometimes more than the constituencies which had members supporting the Drury government. There was no need to object to that, because no discrimination was shown. Last year $3,000,000 was spent out of this $5,000,000 fund, and I defy any lawyer or accountant in this country to go through the public accounts and point to any specific work to which a specific amount could be applied. The best one can do is to take the report of the Minister of Lands and Forests, which shows that some 277 or 300 jobs were done, and you will find from the public accounts that the $3,000 000 was paid to over 3,000 people and firms scattered all over northern Ontario, an area four times larger than old Ontario itself. I think the seriousness of this matter is not realized and that is why I say, and say in all sincerity, that this money should be voted by the legislature for the specific jobs for which it is intended, and ministers of the crown should not be able to promise to do any other work with that money except as voted by the legislature.

I have made some charges in regard to the civil service being used for political purposes. I made this charge on the floor of the legislature last year. The actions of the same civil servants in this last election actually constitute a scandal in the history of the country for political manoeuvring. These men went around the country tearing down bills from telegraph poles in the country districts where our meetings were advertised, and when the Conservative speakers would come around, these same men used government cars and went out in the country and brought in road gangs to ensure good meetings. These were men who were paid out of the public moneys of this country, and I want the hon. member for East Algoma to stand up now and say whether he protested against that kind of thing. I am sure he would protest against it if he knew it was going on.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was all over northern Ontario and I saw no such thing going on.

Mr. HEENAN: There are none so blind as those who will not see.

Mr. GOTT: Did the hon. member assist W. E. Raney in formulating the charges against the Hon. Mr. Lyons?

Mr. HEENAN: I may answer that too.

Mr. GOTT: I will call your bluff. Were you connected with Mr. Raney?

Mr. HEENAN: Whoever formulated the questions was all right, and the questions were all right, but they made a poor job at investigating the matter. Nevertheless, whoever formulated the questions did so in such a manner that the Minister of Lands and Forests saw fit to resign rather than answer them.

Mr. ROWE: Did the hon. member—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is not a debate; it is becoming a cross-examination.

Mr. HEENAN: In order to prove my case, let me say that one of the reasons I resigned my seat in the provincial legislature was in order to run in the federal election last year and protest against these practices that were going on, to protest against using public money to bring settlers into new Ontario from the Old Country, and sending them out into New Ontario when they got here and telling them to hew a farm out of the bush, and then have the hired thugs of the provincial government go amongst them and tell them that they would not get a square deal until they voted a Conservative in for that particular riding. That was one of the issues in the district that I had the honour to represent. Notwithstanding the fact that the machine went up there, and that these hired thugs went all over the district, the people of that provincial riding gave me a majority of nearly eight hundred. This confirms the statement I am making on the floor of this House. Now, there are none so blind as those who will not see. It was well known to every Conservative in that part of the province that an issue would be made of these doings when the proper time came. As a matter of fact when I ran in the election I did so as a protest against such methods, and I hope opposition members in this House from the province of Ontario will take notice of the verdict which the people rendered on the occasion referred to, and that all such practices will be strictly tabooed by them in the future. When I accepted the nomination for the riding we knew that one of the gang, or one of the advisers of the provincial government, intended to secure the nomination for the Conservative party. It was in order to keep that man out of public life—a man who would so far forget himself as to lend himself to the designs of a gang that would advise any government, whether Liberal or Conservative, to persecute the settlers in the northern country—that I offered myself as a candidate, and I succeeded in defeating him. There is one more member of the gang now before the public for the next provincial election, but I am quite content to leave him in the hands of the people of the district.

A comparison has been made between the way in which the finances of Ontario are administered by the provincial government and the method adopted by the federal administration. The hon. member for South Wellington, for example, made such a comparison. I ask that hon. gentleman to state whether he would follow the financial methods of the present Ontario government if he were on the federal benches, or whether he would use the public money in the way in which I have stated it has been used by the Ontario government? I think I have a right to ask that question, and that it is a perfectly fair one in view of the statements which some hon. gentlemen opposite have made.

The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), during his speech on the evening of Friday last, gave utterance to the following statement:

> New Ontario has been economically annexed to the United States. Why do I say that? Because New Ontario has been a happy hunting ground for American millionaires for years past. Mr. Drury, the former Premier of Ontario, gave to Mr. Backus, a Milwaukee millionaire, an enormous timber area, an empire in itself.

I had been under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservatives advocated a policy of establishing industries to manufacture raw materials of Canada in this country. I had thought that hon. gentlemen opposite advocated the adoption of a tariff as would compel Americans to establish industries in this country, rather than permit the exportation of Canadian raw material to the country to the south to be manufactured and to give employment to American workment there. It is very difficult to follow the varying arguments of successive Conservative speakers. On the one hand they say "Let us have such a tariff that American capitalists will be forced to establish factories in Canada and give employment to Canadian workmen." On the other hand, when American millionaires are induced to locate in Canada, they set up the cry that we are being annexed to the United States. Really it is very difficult to follow such arguments or to find any harmony between them. However, I am getting used to inconsistencies of this kind on the part of Conservatives. It is true that the Drury government did sell a timber limit to Mr. Backus in 1921. One would think that the Conservatives—of course I have special reference to those in Ontario—were loath to do business with Mr. Backus either through fear or some other cause. But what are the facts? We find that they did do business with Mr. Backus only they went about it in a different way from that adopted by the Drury government. The latter government disposed of a timber limit openly, to Mr. Backus; the whole transaction was open and aboveboard. But how did the present Conservative government act in their dealings with Mr. Backus? At the last session of the legislature before the last federal election the Minister of Lands and Forests announced, amid a loud beating of drums, that no doubt the people of Ontario would be glad to know that the government had cancelled some water powers granted to Mr. Backus by Mr. Drury. The announcement was followed by such a rattling of desks on the part of the Conservatives that that furniture was in imminent danger of destruction. But strange to say, after the election was over, the same minister returned the same water powers to Mr. Backus. The people of the district were not aware that such a thing had been done. Even the mayor of Fort Frances, although the town was particularly interested in the agreement with Mr. Backus, was not aware of it. Worse than all, the Premier of the province made the humiliating confession that he did not even know that negotiations had been going on for the return of these water powers and was entirely in the dark as to the transaction. This was about two weeks before the then Minister of Lands and Forests resigned. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, from Ontario, this question: When they do business with Mr. Backus, or any other millionaire, is it better to act in an open and straightforward fashion or to work in a stealthy, secret manner? If my hon. friends will refer to the Toronto Telegram of March 15, they will see where the Premier of Ontario made the humiliating confession, that he did not know that the transaction referred to had taken place. I am not discussing whether it was advisable to enter into the arrangement or not. Personally I think that a man who spends thirty, or forty or fifty million dollars in establishing paper mills in Kenora, as Mr. Backus did, who gives employment to about two thousand men, and who pays about $40,000 in taxes for a period of ten years, ought to be encouraged. But when we do business with him we should do it openly so that the public shall have full and complete knowledge of what is going on. No public matter should be handled according to the backdoor methods practised by the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. It is not generally known that the Hearst government, in which Mr. Ferguson was Minister of Lands and Forests, sold Mr. Backus a timber limit in 1914.

Mr. GOTT: I rise to a point of order. About twenty-five minutes ago Your Honour ruled the hon. member was out of order in discussing provincial issues. Since that time he has made charges that have not the least foundation and cannot be substantiated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled that provincial politics should not be discussed during the debate on the budget, but I followed the hon. member and I do not think he has contravened the rules. The charges he has made are in connection with the last Dominion election, and these charges can be made on the budget debate as well as on the debate on the Address. I do not see that he is out of order, but one must connect such charges with Dominion affairs. Let me repeat that hon. members should confine their remarks to the questions at issue. Rambling remarks in reference to provincial politics are not permitted during the debate on the budget. I therefore hope the hon. gentleman will confine his remarks to the points at issue.

Mr. HEENAN: I commenced by complimenting the Minister of Finance on his budget, and I proceeded to answer the hon. member for South Wellington when he advised the Minister of Finance to copy the financial policy of the province of Ontario,

He made certain statements, and I think it is only fair that they should be answered. I do not think that one party should get what they wish on Hansard and that the other party should be ruled out of order and prevented from answering. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest made a speech on Friday night in which he made certain charges; another hon. member asked some questions in connection with his remarks, and I am trying to answer those questions. Surely, if a member is permitted to ask a question I should be allowed to answer it, and I can assure hon. members that before I get through I will connect this matter with Dominion affairs. I am just wondering whether my appeal to the House will be of any value, because an hon. member for one of the Ontario constituencies has stated that I have been making statements and charges that are without foundation. I have already told him that I have affidavits and documents to substantiate every charge I have made. It is the old saying, there are none so blind as those who will see. It is not generally known that the Ontario government sold Mr. Backus 2,000 square miles in 1914, and made a contract which permitted him to build a mill or not to build it just as he wished, and according to the agreement the mill was to be built on this 2,000 square miles or in the vicinity of it. They led the people of Kenora to believe that the industry was to be established in that town. That is the whole trouble in connection with the matter the hon. member for Toronto Northwest spoke about on Friday night. An agreement was made, and I was present at all the proceedings. We made an agreement by which the water powers of the province of Ontario were disposed of, and the powers in the vicinity of Kenora were safeguarded. Not a pound of pulpwood was to be exported to the American side, and no power can be exported; everything is to be manufactured in Ontario. I want my friends on the other side of the House to advise the Ontario government to please copy, because they have not been doing it.

I feel sure that every hon. member will be glad to see the progress that our railroads are making in this country. I refer to Dominion, not to provincial roads. When we find that there is an increase of practically nine and a half million dollars in last year's revenue, with a decrease in working expenses of five and a half million dollars, making a betterment of approximately fifteen million dollars, I think there is room for gratification in connection with our railroad operation, indicating as it does wise management and loyal co-operation on the part of the workmen. It shows efficiency in every degree. As an indication of the efficiency with which our railways have been operated, the employees moved nine and a half million dollars more of revenue bearing freight with a less consumption of coal to the extent of one and three-quarter million dollars, which again shows great efficiency in the operation of our road.

In looking over the yearly reports, Mr. Speaker, I was glad to see that the presidents of both roads give great credit to the employees. I observe that Sir Henry Thornton, in one paragraph of his report, stated that they are now considering the consolidation of the different pensions schemes throughout the system. There are different pensions schemes on the different branches of the Canadian National Railways, and I am satisfied that when these are consolidated we will have a pension system second to none in existence. I think hon. members will agree with me that the workmen on the Canadian National Railways who are showing such loyalty are entitled to this pension. I do not intend to go through the report, because I feel satisfied that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) will deal with it in detail. I want to point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway report, while not presented with so much detail, shows they made $853,000 last year over and above the preceding year, but they cut down $2,074,000 in expenses, or, in other words, they laid off a great many of their employees altogether. They put a good many of them on short time, and in other ways helped to keep down the expense, so that they were able to show a surplus of $2,927,000 over the preceding year. That shows again loyalty and efficiency on the part of the men engaged in the transportation of the commerce of this country. The men who are employed on the railroad and are so loyal to their employers should not be subjected to this unwarranted, misleading propaganda that is being distributed through the country. I have before me Railway Bulletin No. 5, of the Railway Users Association of Canada. They endeavour to show that the government of this country had more to do with the increase in freight rates than any other factor. But I am wondering when the government really had anything to do with the increase. The bulletin goes on to state that there are 20,000 more people employed on the Canadian National Railways than there ought to be, it does not mention the fact that 3,000 fewer men were employed on that railroad last year than the year before. They point out that the wages of railwaymen employed on the Canadian National are higher than the wages of those employed on the Canadian Pacific. The wages of railroad men throughout this country are standardized; there is a standard schedule of wages; but notwithstanding that fact this propaganda sheet points out these differences in wages between employees on the Canadian National and employees on the Canadian Pacific:

	Canadian National per hour	Canadian Pacific per hour
Freight engineers..	$1.05	$0.97

The whole thing from beginning to end is misleading and it should be refuted; the men who are employed on our railways should not be subjected to this kind of propaganda. While I am on the question of our railways and discussing the efficiency of the men and the pension plan, I want to point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway also have a pension plan which is very much appreciated by the employees from which the company receives a great deal of benefit as other organizations are doing who have pension plans by laying off their old men when they reach the age of sixty-five years and replacing them by younger men. They consider this is a benefit, an investment.

In connection with the Canadian Pacific pension plan, there is one regrettable feature which I feel it is my duty to mention at this time, namely, that the regulations pertaining to it provide that if an employee breaks his continuity of service he becomes deprived of his pension. We have an example at the present time of how this rule is applied. No doubt hon. members will remember that in 1908 the machinists and carmen went on strike. This strike was legal in every respect; the laws of the country and the laws pertaining to the constitution of those engaged in the strike were observed. And now eighteen years afterwards we find that many of these men, having contributed to the upbuilding and prosperity of the company, are reaching the age of sixty-five years and are being taken from their work and deprived of their pensions.

I am not going to argue at this time that the public is contributing to this fund through freight, passenger and other rates, or that the government should take a hand in the matter. I feel that all that is necessary at present is to draw the attention of the head officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway to this matter in the hope that they will give it their due consideration. I think I know the company well enough to believe that when we appeal to a big-hearted man like Mr. E. W. Beatty and his associate officials, they will rise to the occasion and be too big to hold spite at the end of eighteen years and discriminate against their old employees. I sincerely hope before we meet next session this grievance will be eliminated.

I had intended to touch on a few other matters, but I will leave them for another occasion. I am sorry if in any way I have transgressed the rules of the House. I had not thought I was doing so, because, as I said before, I was answering questions that had been raised by members of the opposition. I felt it was my duty to do this and any statements that I have made I am prepared to prove.

As regards the cut in the tariff on automobiles, as a new member and not an expert in tariff matters, I have listened attentively to the arguments advanced by older or more experienced members. I have observed from time to time that members on the other side of the House have deplored the fact that the tariff on automobiles has been cut; not one of them that I have heard has yet stated that the duty ought not to be cut.

The amendment to the motion would, I think, make a man vote for the budget rather than against it because it is a compliment to the government. Any member who votes for the amendment surely votes confidence in the board that has been constituted. That is the way in which I view the amendment so that the government may take what consolation they like out of that. If I were in the Ontario legislature I would be permitted to say that the amendment was a "4.4" amendment; there was no body to it, and therefore if anything were necessary to enable me to reach a decision as to how to vote, it would be the amendment.

It is very difficult for a man who is listening to arguments in an endeavour to arrive at a conclusion, to determine how best to vote when he finds that on the resolution of last year in favour of cutting the tariff on automobiles, six Conservatives voted to reduce the tariff and some of them were re-elected as protectionists. Again, I am informed that the hon. member who represented Oshawa on the Liberal side last year put up a very hard fight in this House against any cut in the tariff on automobiles, and yet he was defeated by his own people in the last election. It is therefore very difficult to tell just what the people want. It is apparent that the people of Oshawa were not very much concerned about that matter during the election or they would hardly have defeated the man who championed their cause on the floor of this House.

So that, inasmuch as the opposition only want to have the matter referred to a board in which they have no confidence, while on the other hand the government make the positive declaration that they have expert opinion that this cut will not affect the industry, I have come to the conclusion that there is nothing for me but to vote with the government.

Mr. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I think, Mr. Speaker, that in describing the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Heenan) in the way you did, you will probably meet with the approval of the House. Certainly it was an address that might properly be termed rambling, for his remarks had reference to matters that do not appertain to this House in the slightest degree. This hon. gentleman who has just spoken was a supporter of the Drury government and if there was any one man in Ontario who contributed to the defeat of that government, it was the hon. member himself. He tells us that he was mixed up with the Backus deal, that he was in on that transaction. That is generally understood in our province; it is known that he was very much in on that transaction. And that was one of the reasons why the Drury government went down to defeat. This hon. gentleman supported a government one of whose ministers, the provincial treasurer, ran the province into the hole and himself into gaol. This is the kind of man that comes here and in this parliament defends the Drury government. The proper place for him to have made his defence was in the legislature which he left. Why did he leave that legislature? Why was he not man enough to make his charges there instead of coming here for the express purpose of discussing the subject? He talks about blanket money being voted. I can tell the hon. member that he will have an opportunity to make all the protests he wants against blanket propositions when the estimates are before this House for consideration. If he wants to put as much ginger into opposition against blanket votes as he shows to-day he will have his opportunity here; he does not have to go to Ontario to do it. The hon. member tells us that he stood up in meetings with Mr. Drury, but this deal was called the Raney-Backus deal. Mr. Drury was not mixed up in it for he would not go in with the bunch of people who were in on it. The hon. member tells us that he was well in on the deal, and as I say that was pretty well understood. He also tells us that he does not know very much about the automobile business, having to take his information from older members. Well, here is a labour man coming into the House and in face of a deputation of thousands of people, all workers who are seeking their rights, he has not one solitary word to say in their behalf. That is the kind of labour man who represents or pretends to represent labour in this House.

The hon. member has referred, as other hon. gentlemen have frequently referred in the course of this debate, to Providence having helped the government. For this budget we have evidently two benefactors to thank—one the government, and the other Providence. A charming gentleman, an old member of the House, said the other day that he thanked Providence for being on the side of the government. Well, I am willing to give Providence all the credit, and I go further and thank Providence that things are not worse. This is not the first time that we have heard of this government invoking Providence. If I remember rightly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in a speech in one of the constituencies near Toronto, probably North Bay, called upon Providence to help him out of a difficult situation. According to a newspaper report:

> Mr. King pressed the point that under the constitution the Senate could not be reformed except from the outside. "I cannot ask the Governor General to let me appoint senators," he said jocularly; "I can only pray fervently to Providence to take away some of the old ones."

So that Providence has been invoked to remove senators from this sphere in order to allow Liberals to be appointed in their stead. Just imagine invoking Providence to have Mr. Duncan Marshall made a senator! It only remains for the government to supplicate Heaven to remove another senator to make room for "the Honourable" W. T. R. Preston. The newspaper report of this particular speech of the Prime Minister tells us that he made the remark "jocularly". I have heard of ministers making remarks ironically, but I am at a loss to see any occasion for jocularity in a prime minister's attitude to Providence. I have seen the right hon. gentleman here for quite a number of years, and I must say that I have never seen him in a jocular mood while on his feet. It may be that he is more jocular when he gets down on his knees.

The last time I had the honour to address this House at any length I was invited by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) to read from the farmers' platform what they had to say therein on the plunder on boots and shoes. I did not then have the time to go into the question, and besides I made it clear that there were other members quite as well qualified as I was to deal with the subject, indeed, better qualified inasmuch as they had a greater knowledge of the business. I have not heard anyone opposite say one word in defence of this industry from the standpoint of the tariff. Do they realize that probably the next industry to be attacked is the boot and shoe industry? Do they realize that boots and shoes are a necessity in this country, being in demand by everyone, and that if we are to have a general tariff reduction there is no line of goods more likely to suffer than boots and shoes?

An hon. MEMBER: Furniture.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Furniture, did someone say? That might not suit the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm). I understand that the hon. member is likely to be invited into the cabinet.

Mr. MALCOLM: Thank you.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Well, there will be one protectionist in the cabinet, but he may be a furniture protectionist. The article in the farmers' platform which I desire to read is headed, "Plunder on Boots and Shoes." The hon. member for Rosetown wanted me to put before the House what the farmers had to say in this regard; he wanted me to show what was their attitude to the boot and shoe tariff. The article is a follows:

> Let us consider somewhat more specifically just what the protective tariff costs the people of Canada and how it affects wages. The census bureau gives the following data on the Canadian boot and shoe industry for the census year 1910:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Value of home-made product.. .. .. | $33,967,248 |
> | Number of employees.. .. .. | 17,227 |
> | Salaries and wages paid.. .. .. | $7,698,333 |
> During the year ending March 31, 1911, Canada imported $2,045,835 worth of boots and shoes, the duty upon which was $585,996.71.
> In that year the Dominion imported six times the value of boots and shoes from the United States that it did from Britain, and paid duty thereon amounting to $522,809.70, equal to 30 per cent.
> The value of the domestic product for that year is given as $33,967,248, of which $60,935 was exported.
> Now if our contention is sound that the manufacturers add the full amount of their protection to the selling price of the commodity when disposed of in the home market, the people of Canada paid for that year by way of taxes the following sums:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Customs duties.. .. .. | $ 585.996 71 |
> | To the manufacturers.. .. .. | 10,177,893 90 |
> | | $10,763,890 61 |
> | Wages and salaries paid.. .. .. | 7.698.333 00 |
> | | $3,065,557 61 |
> That is to say the Canadian people paid by way of taxes directly and indirectly more than $3,000,000 in excess of the total wages and salaries received by employees in the boot and shoe industry during the same period.
> If we were to consider the interest of the country and of the wage-earning classes alone it would have paid the people to have scrapped every boot and shoe factory in the land, handed over the workers their full wages and to have paid a direct subsidy to the government of more than $3,000,000, and the nation would have gained enormously thereby, especially if the artisan had been put at some truly productive work.

That in short, is an example of the principle laid down in this book. I did not hear any great applause when I read that article; many times before when this has been read my hon. friends to the left have applauded loudly. I would not expect to get so much applause from hon. friends opposite in that little Saskatchewan corner, but they believe in the very same principle.

Mr. MACDONALD (Glengarry): Why not?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): That is exactly what I say; why not? I ask my hon. friends from Quebec to take notice of the fact that it is no interest of theirs that seventeen thousand people should lose their employment; I have not noticed any applause from those gentlemen respecting this proposition of the farmer's party.

There is one thing they omitted to answer in that article. In the last clause, as you will notice, they say, "and the nation would have gained enormously, especially if the artisan had been put at some truly productive work." Would my hon. friend who just interrupted tell me what productive work he would give these seventeen thousand artisans, after having closed these factories? What will become of them if that policy is carried out? They will go, as thousands of others have gone, to the United States; they will leave this country if they cannot get work.

As I said before, that illustrates the principle, and now I will read for the benefit of the House how that principle was demonstrated in connection with the boot and shoe proposition:

> As already explained, under a system of protection the consumer is compelled to pay a tax upon all imported goods that come under the tariff schedule. Upon all goods of domestic origin, produced under a protective system, the consumer must likewise pay a tax—although in this case the revenue finds its way to the bank account of private individuals alone.

I might expect my hon. friends to say that that is all right, but I want to illustrate this principle by taking another line of commodities, because it will be noticed that this booklet says, "any commodity that comes under the tariff schedule." I will give as an example the class of goods produced by the farmers, and we will see how it works out. It is said that one way of proving or disproving a case is to prove it absurd, and I will leave it to the House to judge whether or not this proves to be an absurdity. The total value of agricultural products in Canada according to the year book of 1924, which is the latest one from which I could get complete

5 p.m. figures, amounted to $1,708,000,000. The total export of farm products for that year was valued at $503,391,402, so after deducting the exports from the total production you get the home consumption. Consequently the amount consumed within Canada totalled about $1,205,000,000. Following the same method of calculation, during the year we imported from the United States a total of $65,546,476; from the United Kingdom $64,324,300, and from other countries as well, making a total importation of $149,201,231 of agricultural products similar to those raised in Canada. The duty collected on these importations amounted, roughly, to $29,000,000 or 20 per cent. If it is correctly contended that a similar tax was collected on all the commodities produced within Canada, 20 per cent must have been collected on the total of $1,205,000,000. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, or any other hon. member where that money went; who got the money? Twenty per cent of that amount would total $240,000,000; who got away with that swag? On a basis of 600,000 farmers in Canada this would mean that each farmer got $400 of extra money. He still had the money from the goods he had exported; he had the money from the produce sold in Canada, but in addition to that he had another $400. No one knows where that money went to except my hon. friends to my left who produced this wonderful argument, and my hon. friends in the Saskatchewan corner who would back it up if they could.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does that $149,000,000 which the hon. member calls farm products include the $19,000,000 of whiskey that year?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I will answer that by asking the hon. gentleman to turn to our trade returns of 1924, where at page 1420 the figures from which I have quoted appear with this footnote supplied by our own officers:

> In this classification the expression "Canadian Farm Products" refers, in the case of exports, to commodities actually produced, in their original state, on Canadian farms.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): You were speaking of imports.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): As to imports it says:

> In the case of imports, it covers all commodities of which the basic raw materials are such as Canadian farms produce.

[Mr. J. D. Chaplin.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Exactly, but would the hon. member answer the question whether that $149,000,000 does include the $19,000,000 approximately of alcoholic liquors that came in that year?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not think it does, but whether it does or does not has no relation at all to the argument I am making—not one particle. If the hon. gentleman wants to take out the $19,000,000, he is perfectly free to do so, and I will figure out for him how it works out.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted, according to this calculation—and it is based upon the principle laid down in this platform—each farmer in this country not only got the money for the products he exported and for the products he sold in this country, but in addition he filched out of the pockets of the people by way of plunder—that is the word they use—another $240,000,000 that did not belong to him, and which came out of the poor consumer of this country. That is the kind of argument these gentlemen put up. And this book, Mr. Speaker, is well edited. It is called the Farmers' Platform. It was drafted by the Canadian Council of Agriculture, and has been adopted by the United Farmers of Alberta, the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association and the United Farmers of Ontario. I do not hear anybody getting up and cheering about the argument this book puts forward.

Now let us take another example. Let us take apples, for instance, just to show in a small way how it works out. In 1924 we imported 195,000 barrels of apples, and the duty collected was $176,000. Our total average crop—I have not seen this year's returns, but I have looked over the figures for a number of years—runs to about five or six million barrels, but taking the lower figure, 5,000,000 barrels, we exported last year 1,600,000 barrels, which would leave for home consumption 3,400,000 barrels. Now the same contention is there. According to this book, on every barrel of these apples sold for home consumption the producer put 90 cents more in his pocket. I wish to heaven, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen could convince our farmers in Ontario that they had received that money; I wish they could bring it to pass. But don't you see, Mr. Speaker, the thing is absurd? But it is not a bit nor a whit more absurd than the argument on the boot and shoe proposition that is made all over the country, and which we hear in this House particularly from the new members for Saskatchewan. The gentlemen to my left do not give us that argument any more; they know better now; they have learned their lesson.

I want to refer now to some of the remarks of the Finance minister, and first of all to his statement about the increased business of the country. The minister laid some stress upon the fact that the balance of trade was very much in our favour. First of all, let me say that I do not disagree with that statement, but I do submit this, that if it is a good thing generally to have a balance of trade in our favour, then it is a good thing to have a favourable balance of trade with our largest customer. That is a sound proposition. What do we find in respect to our trade with the United States? Our exports last year increased $57,000,000, and our imports increased $100,000,000; in other words, in one year the balance of trade against us increased by $43,000,000. In 1926, to the end of March, they sold us $609,000,000 worth of goods, and we exported to them $474,000,000 worth. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if it is a good thing, if it is logical and right, to have the balance of trade in your favour, then you had better have it in your favour as regards the people who are doing everything they can to hammer your heads off.

Animals	$1,300,000
Asbestos	1,800,000
Beverages, ale, beer and whiskey	6,300,000
Chemical products	1,400,000
Fertilizers, raw products, cyanamide and ammonium sulphate	900,000

As regards asbestos, we ship them our raw material; and coming to chemical products, we ship them fertilizer. We have a big plant at Niagara Falls, and we ship them the raw fertilizer and buy back the finished product. This government within the last year or so has put out of business ten fertilizer plants in this country. This one plant remains in business at Niagara Falls, using an immense quantity of power, and the fertilizer in the shape of ammonium sulphate and cyanamide is going over to the United States to be further manufactured.

Our exports of grain products increased by $3,400,000, and of grain, $4,000,000. Our exports of wheat increased, in bushels, from 5,400,000 to 9,200,000. Our exports of oats decreased by 4,000,000 bushels. Why? They did not take our oats to mix with their old wheat to make it better. We actually allow these people to take the best wheat from us, to mix with their own stuff and grade it up, and then compete with us in foreign markets. Our other increased exports were:

Hay	$1,000,000
Meats	1,600,000
Metals, aluminum, brass, copper	3,700,000
Iron, pigs, ingots, etc.	2,500,000
Farm implements	1,200,000
Nickel	2,200,000
Fresh milk and cream	1,800,000
Paper	6,700,000
Seeds	7,000,000
Vegetables	5,100,000
Wood, unmanufactured	6,000,000
Wood, manufactured, including pulp	5,000,000
Raw wool	500,000

No doubt the increase in potatoes was larger on account of the scarcity of potatoes recently. Now take the imports and let us note the difference. They are manufactured articles principally. We are sending them our raw materials and our young men also. Those materials are manufactured in United States and we take back the finished products. First of all there is binder twine. We have heard a lot about the amount of binder twine that is imported. Well, the importation has increased from twenty-four million pounds to thirty-nine million pounds or, taking the value, from $2,900,000 to $5,400,000. The import of chemical products has increased from $16,366,000 to $18,750,000. They consist principally of drugs and fertilizers. The fertilizers come back in manufactured form. Then there are paints and varnishes, finished articles. Cocoa and chocolate increased half a million; grain products increased a million; meats increased $700,000; metals increased from $146,000,000 to $196,000,000. An increase of nearly $50,000,000, and every bit of the manufacture represented by this increase could be carried on in this country. Rolling mill products increased $5,000,000; vehicles, including autos, increased from $25,000,000 to $39,000,000; oils and petroleum increased $5,000,000; silk—mostly manufactured goods—increased by $3,000,000; stone products increased by 8,000 000. Our increased trade with the United States has been principally in raw materials, commodities that they are getting short of. On the other hand we are taking from them, in constantly increasing quantities, goods that could be made to advantage in this country. I repeat, we are sending away our raw materials to be manufactured in the United States, and along with them the best of our manhood. Take some articles that we could sell, and that we should sell, to a very large consuming community. Take cheese for example. They sell us actually four times as much cheese as we sell them. On the face of it is not that most ridiculous?

Here we are, a much larger agricultural population in proportion to what they are, and they sell us four times as much cheese as we sell them.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And they have ten times our population.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Just figure it out for a minute on the basis of population. Taking their population as 120,000,000, as a result of the quantity of butter we sell to the United States each person there gets one-quarter of an ounce once a year. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is not enough to make a smell in the pan. In the matter of lard, conditions are worse. Now let us take eggs. If the people of the city of Detroit alone—I will ask my hon. friends opposite to figure this out and omit the children or babes in arms in the calculation—bought one egg once a year they would consume all the eggs we sell them in the course of twelve months. Just imagine it! If in that one city of Detroit each person had an egg once in the year they would consume more eggs than we sell the United States for the entire twelve months. And yet we open our doors to people who use us in this way. We are crazy, that is all. They treat us as mud under their feet, and we stand for it. But it is possible to bring them to time. If the government had the nerve they could fetch these people to time.

My hon. friend the "furniture minister" is not here at the moment, but I come to the article of furniture. The United States sells us $1,000,000 worth of furniture and all we sell them in the way of furniture is $22,000 worth. That is the amount we sold them last year. Why, that million dollars would keep quite a few people employed in this country. Nobody would recognize that fact any quicker than the gentleman about whom I spoke a few minutes ago.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Before my hon. friend leaves that branch of the subject will he permit me to ask him a question? What happened from 1911 to 1921 when eggs were coming into this country at the rate of almost 14,000,000 dozen a year? Was my hon. friend asleep at the switch?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): My hon. friend says they came in here?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Surely.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Somebody possibly may have been asleep at the switch, but I am prepared, and have so stated, to advocate the imposition of a duty so that no eggs whatever will come into this country. I will not make it easier for Australian eggs or Chinese eggs or any old eggs to come into Canada either.

[Mr. J. D. Chaplin.]

Some hon. members have told us in the last few days that the United States are getting tired of the tariff, that they are going to make a change in that respect, that they are going to set matters right, that the people over there are getting sore on the tariff game. We were told that six or seven years ago. If my hon. friends opposite would get some of the old speeches and read them over they will find that the same prediction was made at that time. Do my hon. friends know what happens over there? Each time the product of another country finds its way into the United States they raise the duty a little more. What has happened quite recently? The duty on butter put up, the duty on wheat put up, and do you know what will happen next? Have hon. gentlemen observed what occurred the other day? and it is the first premonition of what is going to happen to milk and cream. We have a nice market there at present; we send them eight or ten million dollars' worth. But the other day the report was published all over the country on the authority of the Health Commissioners of New York city that the quality of the milk and cream coming into the United States from Ontario was awful—in fact this gentleman described it as "bootleg" cream, whatever that meant. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture could tell us what bootleg cream is. I do not know what it is myself; perhaps some farmer has been transporting it in his boot. At all events these people are looking for an excuse to exclude our cream. That is all they are doing, and that is just what is going to happen. We were told too by a man who knew that cows were decreasing in the United States. "Why," he said, "the number of cows is going down all the time and the United States are bound to have imports of dairy products soon." But what is happening? I have on my desk the official statistics for the year ending 31st December last. What do we find? The United States imported $10,000,000 of milk and cream practically all from us. Of butter they imported $2,600,000; that is all the butter they imported. They exported butter to the value of $2,400,000. But mark this; in addition to this exportation of butter they exported 151,000,000 pounds of condensed and powdered milk and cream, to the value of $17,000,000. That country was able to export last year 151,000,000 pounds of powdered cream, importing only $2,100,000 worth; they exported almost the same quantity of butter, yet they tell us they are going out of the dairy business. If they go out of the business they will have to go into it faster than they are doing in Alberta if they ever hope to catch up.

Another matter of interest to the people of the country is the income tax. I am not opposed to the minister proposing to collect income taxes from people who are striving to evade taxation by forming joint stock companies, privately held joint stock companies, for the purpose of holding the funds and thus evading taxation. I am absolutely in favour of that proposition of the minister and have no hesitation in saying so. But, Mr. Speaker, under the present proposal there will be injustice. I have in my mind the case of a public utility in my own district which operates electric light, electric power and street railway, which established small concerns in different towns under special charter, and then amalgamated them all under one charter in accordance with the law. Under this law it would seem that these different companies are to be taxed, each one on its profits, and then later the parent company will be taxed also. I do not agree at all with the principle of taxing profits twice, but in this case the profits are not only being taxed twice, but three times, and perhaps in some cases four times. I do not know whether the minister intends to make any change in that regard, but I certainly recommend that he look a little closer into it. I know of many cases of small factories that are held by companies which are entirely within families, and it appears to me that in cases of that kind it is absurd to tax the profits in the concern twice. It is ridiculous to tax the profits of the company and then tax the company again in dividends. It simply cannot be done. It would mean that you would put a premium on people evading the tax, and they can evade it. In those cases it would not be hard for the people themselves who are running the concerns which are privately held to take every dollar by way of salary, and the government would not get a dollar of company income tax at all. Why should you put any of your citizens in that position? It is not fair or right that taxes should be collected from the same money twice. This government has by its actions driven artisans out of this country, and now it proposes to follow that up by driving out the money too. As soon as you begin to tax the dollar beyond what you should, you are going to lose the dollar; just make up your mind to that.

As a matter of record, and not for anything more than the record, I find that during last year 3,061 farmers paid income tax, and paid in amounts $162,000 out of $56,000,000. Under the new tax levy many thousands of workers escape taxation, but widows and others, dependent upon their income from investments and savings, are taxed heavier than they were before. I think that is wrong and that those resolutions might very properly be amended.

What did the minister say when he spoke of these tax reductions? He said he was pleased to say that he was going to make tax reductions all along the line. Here is what he is reported as saying in Hansard:

> With a desire to make available new money for development our proposals provide reductions all along the line.

Is that statement correct? Is it in accordance with the facts? Is the reduction all along the line? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is a decided increase on a great deal of the line, a very decided increase, and that in no case is there any decrease all along the line. As I said before, the taxing of the same profit twice is unfair, and I feel certain that in the end it will not be in the interest of the country or of the treasury itself. I warn the minister that when the dollar is taxed excessively it will get away from us.

I wish to give some examples of the actual working out of some of these proposals, just to show what the result will be. For instance, a married man without dependent children with a salary of $5,000 and a dividend income of $5,000 more, in 1924 paid in taxes $241.50; and now he pays $290. That is no decrease along the line. The married man whose income comes from dividends in Canadian corporations, which have already paid an income tax, and whose wife has a separate income, on a $10,000 salary in 1924, paid $115.50 income tax. This year under this law he would pay $425, an increase from $115 to $425. On a $20,000 income his tax will be increased from $745 to $1,815, and on a $30,000 income the increase will be from $1,900 to $3,900—not very much decrease along the line there.

Take another schedule: a married man with an income of $10,000 derived from Canadian stocks will pay $299 50 more than he paid last year, but an unmarried man with the same income derived from foreign stocks will pay $246.50 less than he paid last year. An unmarried man with an income of $10,000 derived from dividends in Canadian companies paid last year $115.50; to-day he will pay $415. An unmarried man whose whole income is from dividends of foreign companies on an income of $10,000 last year paid $630 whereas this year he pays only $415. A married man without dependent children whose income is $14,000, of which $7,000 is salary and $7,000 is dividends, paid $556.50 in 1924, whereas to-day he will pay $670.

A salaried man with an income of $14.000 last year paid $1,144.50, whereas this year he gets off with an income tax of $670. I do not see many of my friends the ministers here, but this fits their case; they have looked after themselves quite reasonably and I do not blame them at all. It seems to me that the ministers will naturally vote for this. I do not say that they will not get us all to vote for it. Why should they not say: Come along boys, and help us?

For the information of the House I have a schedule worked out from which I want to give half a dozen cases, and I ask permission of the House to place it upon Hansard so that the minister may have an opportunity of seeing it because I cannot imagine that he ever had the proposition worked out for himself. The schedule is as follows:

CANADIAN COMPANY DIVIDENDS

Dividends of Canadian companies paying income tax are free from normal income tax at the present time; but under the proposed amendments to the Act this benefit will not be available to stockholders in the future. Changes to the act as set forth in the budget speech have the effect of greatly increasing the amount of income tax payable by the stockholder in respect of such dividends for incomes up to approximately $50,000. For incomes in excess of $50,000 the amount of income tax to be levied in respect of dividends grows less on the increases in income than the amount payable at the present time.

The table set forth below shows the percentage taken by the income tax—both at present and as proposed—of increases in income, where such increases are derived from dividends of Canadian companies. There is also shown in the right-hand column the increase or decrease of the amended tax over that at present in force.

For the purpose of more accurately comparing the effect of the old and new scale of taxes, it has been assumed in the above chart that the income under consideration is that of a married man without dependents.

I want to point out some glaring cases. For instances a man who to-day is paying income tax under the clause in regard to incomes from dividend, on a $5,000 income pays 186 per cent more than he paid before. On a $10,000 income the percentage is decreased somewhat; he pays 90 per cent more than he did before. On a $40,000 income the percentage is decreased still further; he pays only 20 per cent more than he paid before. On a $50,000 income he does not pay any more than he paid before. In other words this proposition is made for the rich man, not for the taxpayer of moderate means. When you come to incomes of more than $50,000 the situation is reversed. This is not a decrease all along the line; it is worse than that. It is an increase part of the line and a decrease on the very end of the line on incomes that can well afford to pay the tax. When you come to incomes of $60,000 there is a decrease of 5 per cent; when you reach incomes of $70,000 there is a decrease of 13 per cent, and when you reach incomes of $90,000, the decrease is 25 per cent, whereas on the smaller incomes the amount of the tax is increased.

I want to say a word or two now about the Canadian National Railways. Nobody is better pleased than myself, no party is better pleased than we are, in being able to learn from the minister that the fortunes of the National Railways have shown an improvement. I trust the improvement will continue. On looking over the financial statement of the Canadian National Railways I find very little information as to expenditures on capital or branch lines and even less information as to the question of hotels. It seems to me that the shareholders of this corporation have the right to receive information on these particular items. I have lately seen it frequently stated in the press that it is in the mind of someone to enlarge the Chateau Laurier. Surely the minister does not propose any such thing as this; surely we have enough capital expenditure now. If the minister could demonstrate that these hotels had made money, the matter would be different, but I understand that every one of them has been showing losses for years. In that case why on earth we should embark on more expenditures for hotels is beyond my comprehension.

I wish to refer to one phase of this financial statement of the National Railways, because it is quite interesting to me and no doubt it will be interesting to some hon. members who have been telling us with so much elation that the profits of the road have been due to the increase in the haulage of grain, and that when you have a good crop year you have a good profit year. That is the argument they used to refute the statement that came from the railway companies directly that they were losing money on the haulage of grain. I find on looking over the tonnage revenue published in the Financial statement of the National Railways, page 33, that of material such as wheat, oats, corn, barley, flour and all these things that apply to the farm 144,000 tons less were hauled in 1925 than in 1924. If anybody can show me how you can produce an increase in profits by hauling less stuff I will give him the palm unless it be that when you are losing money on hauling material, the less you haul the better off you are. That is just what has happened in this case. For the year there is an earned profit of $32,000,000 over and above the overhead of the railway and not one cent of that was earned on the grain. That is evident on the face of the report, and if anybody were to deny it I would feel like applying to have his head read.

Where does the profit come from? The second lot of products that were hauled were products of animals and the quantity was reduced by 12,000 tons, so that no profit can be figured from that. The products of the mines show an increase in haulage of 671,000 tons. The products of the forest came up with another addition of 360,000 tons, while in the products of manufactures and miscellaneous commodities there was an increase of 1,626,000 tons. And these three articles provided the $15,000,000 profit, less of course what was made by savings. Undoubtedly the statement shows, and shows quite clearly, that savings were made in expenses. The report indicates emphatically—it is as plain as the nose on a man's face—that not one cent of that profit came from the things which hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party suggest. Not a dollar of the new money came from that source at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL: How does the hon. member account for the fact that in the months in which the largest tonnage of grain is handled the net revenues are higher than in other periods of the year?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not think the hon. gentleman is quite correct when he says that the net revenue goes up. I admit that the gross revenue may, but inasmuch as it takes some time to get in the returns I do not think he can substantiate that statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The fact of the matter is that in this particular business no one can say where the profits come from. One would have to know when the other commodities were moved. It may be that these other commodities were carried at about the same time, and that would make some difference. But my hon. friend, who is pretty astute, knows, I am sure, that, as this statement will prove beyond the shadow of a doubt, not one cent of those additional earnings came from these products.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If the hon. member will take the trouble to look into the weekly earnings he will find that from October the net earnings begin to increase, and they come down again when the grain moving season is over.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Did that happen this year?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If it happened this year then there was not as much grain moved as there was last year. In this business as in any other you have to spread your expenses over the year. This applies in railroading just as it does in manufacturing, and probably more so. Certain expenses in connection with the purchase of this, that and the other necessity must be spread over the year, and the account is not made up until the latter end of the year. That is what might happen in this particular case.

I want to impress upon the House the fact that while the Canadian National Railways have had a year of improved business they have still some distance to go before they are out of the woods, so to speak. According to the statement of the Canadian National Railways the deficit increased by $41,000,000. Now, we can congratulate ourselves upon the assumption that the road has pretty nearly paid its way, but you have to remember that the government is not getting one cent of interest for the large amount of money which it has invested in the railways. Indeed, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Roob) says, that investment may have to be written down. Be that as it may, the fact is that we did not earn enough to pay even the whole of the interest that was due the outside bondholders; we were eight or ten million dollars short in that direction. There is, therefore, no use in our shaking hands with ourselves before we have passed the other stile. We have a long way yet to go, and there is no reason why we should talk about reducing rates. I want to stay the minister's hand from reducing rates to some of our friends for fear they may postpone the day when the railways will get upon a parity basis. The government of Canada have had to step into the breach and pay eight or ten million dollars to meet the interest upon bonds that were held by outsiders, and it has taken no money on account of its own investment in the road. True enough, the situation is improved, and I am glad of it. But the Canadian people do not want to lose sight of the main fact of the case, and the actual situation is as I have stated.

Last year the Minister of Finance, when he had to perform the duty of announcing a decrease in revenue of something like $50,000,000, made a virtue of necessity and took credit for having reduced taxation to that extent. He said, "we have been fifteen or twenty millions short in our sales tax collections and fifteen or twenty millions short in the customs tax. Consequently we have relieved you of so much taxation." I assume that, having treated that decline in revenue of $50,000,000 odd as so much of a reduction in taxation, the minister this year, with an increase in revenue of some $30,000,000, will put the shoe on the other foot and admit an increase of taxes on the people to that extent. That, I think, is a reasonable proposition: surely the argument cuts both ways. I notice that last year when it came to customs taxation my hon. friends to the left were quite pleased to see the amount reduced. I want to ask them how they feel now that customs taxation has increased from $108,000,000 to $127,000,000. Is the difference a matter of taxation this year, or is it an increase in revenue? Last year when there was a reduction the minister declared that he had relieved the people to that extent: now that he has increased his collections what does he say? The Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), smiles. Probably he will tell us what the Minister of Finance thinks.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You are doing very well.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If that is the only answer the minister can give we will compare the figures over a number of years. In customs taxation the government collected in 1925-1926 the year just closed, $127,000,000. The year before they collected $108,000,000; and for the successive years prior to that they collected $121,000,000, $118,000,000 and $105,000,000. These were the amounts they got in customs taxation. They are pretty regular, showing neither any great reduction nor any considerable amelioration from the standpoint of the people. Let us take the sales tax: I find, under the head of Special War Tax Revenue and Sales Tax, that in 1920 the government collected $15,500,000. In 1921 there was collected $78,000,000; in 1922, $73,000,000; in 1923, $106,000,000, and in 1924, $120,000,000, in, round figures. In 1925 it fell to $85,000,000, and we were told the taxation was being reduced. This year it has risen again to $95,000,000, making this the second or third largest year during the whole period. This is the largest item next to customs revenue, and yet we are told that taxation is being reduced.

It was this government who increased the sales tax, and it is not now proposed to lessen that burden at all. The people are told that they will not be allowed to lick the stamps for the receipt tax; that the postage has been reduced, and some other little things done, which are not noticeable at all. The big taxes remain, however, and the big expenditures also remain. The trouble with this government is that they do not know enough to economize. The hon. member who preceded me delivered a long lecture on economy; it was too bad the minister did not hear it because the hon. member who is just from the provincial House told us all about taxation, and how economical the provincial government was. This government is spending too much money; taxes are too high; we are not going to be able to compete with our great neighbour to the south unless taxation is reduced. This reduction announced by the minister is no reduction at all, but is simply an adjustment of taxes. Taxes are imposed upon those least able to bear them, and taxes are removed from those who can pay. That is what has been done with the income tax.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. 19, to incorporate the Agents Insurance Company.—Mr. Malcolm.

GRAND ORANGE LODGE OF BRITISH AMERICA

The House in committee on Bill No. 92, respecting the Grand Orange Lodge of British America—Mr. Hocken—Mr. Duff in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Section 1 paragraph (e) repealed.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is desired, Mr. Chairman, to put clause 2 of section 2 as clause 2 of section 3.

The CHAIRMAN: All right.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 9—Commencement of act.

Mr. HOCKEN: I have a slight amendment to make to this section. I move that section 9 be amended by leaving out in lines 41 and 42 the words "to be held some time in the year 1926" and substituting therefor the words "at their next meeeting following the passing of this act." The reason for that is that this bill may not pass until after the date of the meeting of 1926.

Amendment agreed to.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing the question of taxes and expenditure. Now I want to refer for a moment or two to the public debt. The public debt for the period from 1920 to 1926 inclusive stood each year as follows, in round figures:

1920	$2,248,000,000
1921	2,340,000,000
1922	2,422,000,000
1923	2,453,000,000
1924	2,417,000,000
1925	2,417,000,000
1926	2,395,000,000

It will be noticed that even with the credits of the present year the debt stands at $55,000,000 more than it did in 1921. There is this further fact which I consider of prime importance: In an ordinary business when a debt is paid that was incurred in or returned from a former year, we usually credit that to suspense account; we do not treat it as a part of that particular year's business. It would be misleading and wrong to say that that was the profit on that particular year's business. My contention is that any money of that sort that came in during the last fiscal year should by right be passed at once to the public debt account and should have gone for the reduction of the public debt. Had the sum we received from Great Britain on various accounts also been credited to the public debt, there would have been a greater reduction of that debt by eighty or ninety million than there is to-day. But the present government placed those receipts into the regular account just as they did in the case of other regular governmental receipts. They treated it as an item of that character and did not apply it as they should have done to the reduction of the public debt.

We have heard nothing from the Minister of Finance in respect to the Roumanian and Grecian loans. We have not been told whether these countries have paid their obligations to Canada. Last year the government took the credit for the payment before it was known whether Roumania or Greece were going to pay or not. They have not told us anything this year as to whether these countries have kept up their payments or not; we know nothing about it.

Now I come to a consideration of the tariff resolutions announced from the budget. The first item has to do with some of the treaties that have been entered into. We had to change our tariff in conformity with some of the treaties that were made a short time ago. The first item on the schedule is meats. In other words the members in this House who are free traders, who will not stand for any kind of protection, are quite satisfied to raise the duty on meats for the benefit of another country. Why was the duty on meats raised in this case? For the benefit of Canada? Oh, no, for the benefit of Australia! Some hon. gentlemen are free traders but they can stand being protectionists for Australia. I would ask these hon. gentlemen if they will not be protectionists for the sake of their own country? Protection is good enough when it applies to some other country, but it is of no use in the interests of Canada. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), need not laugh. Hon. gentlemen opposite go to the West Indies and make a treaty, and then they come back and submit to this House increased duties on lines of goods that are intended for the protection of people of these islands and not for the protection of the people of Canada. For example there is cocoa, coffee, ginger, nutmegs and arrowroot. If the ministry would pay a little more attention to their own people rather than to the people of other countries they would accomplish more good.

In the tariff resolutions there is a long schedule with respect to sugar. This government have changed the sugar schedule three times for the protection of the coloured people in the West Indies and to the detriment of the people of this Dominion, particularly to the disadvantage of three or four counties in the province of Ontario. This government do not believe in protection for the farmers of the counties of Kent, Lambton and Essex, but they do believe in that policy when it comes to helping coloured labour in the West Indies. That is the kind of protection that hon. gentlemen from Saskatchewan and other provinces of the west are voting for.

[Mr. J. D. Chaplin.]

There is an item in the schedule dealing with the duty on table salt. The Minister of Finance offered no explanation when he announced the item, but here it is. The article is not pure salt. It contains some mixture permitting it to enter on a basis of five per cent, ten per cent and fifteen per cent respectively. It may be all right, but it does not seem to me that it is going to be of any particular benefit to the salt industry of this country. I find also such things as bananas and fruits of all kinds, fruits that are not produced in this country at all, but as to which we are quite satisfied to tax ourselves in the interests of the people of some other country. That may be good business for those people but it does not appear to be very good business for us. I would rather put taxes upon something that would protect the Canadian people instead of the people of some other country.

Passing from the sugar schedule, the next item is "angostura bitters". I think some comment has been made upon this item already. This is where the cocktail comes into use. In the interests of those gentlemen who want to use angostura bitters the duty is reduced from $10 to $5. Can it be argued that such a reduction as that is for the benefit of the workingmen and the farmers of this country?

We come now to the serious item, which has caused a good deal of talk throughout the country, namely, the automobile schedule. Before discussing that schedule I should like, for the information of the House, to disclose what takes place in the department. We have a Finance department which makes the laws respecting duties, and then we have a Customs department which is the executive and carries out the laws that are laid down by the Finance department. When the duties were placed upon automobiles they were fixed at 35 per cent. At the time those duties were imposed no provision whatever was made in respect of the parts. Parts were not mentioned at all, and consequently the Customs department had to make a regulation covering what were parts of automobiles. In their judgment, and with the knowledge they had, they decided that the parts of an automobile consisted of the following; the wheels, the chassis, the top and the body. That constituted an automobile, and those were all the parts of an automobile. Of course the inconsistency of any such ruling will be quite apparent to anybody when I tell you that the parts of a wheel would not be considered as parts of an automobile. For instance, while a wheel is a part of the car, the hub of a wheel would not be part of a car. That is the style of business that is being carried on in the Customs department. I am not blaming this government or any one at all, but I simply say those are matters which grew up in the department. The people in the department are not acquainted with the business they are handling.

The other day, in order to obtain some information from the department, I visited the place to ascertain the conditions there. I asked one of the chief clerks what the duty on an automobile hub was, and what do you suppose he told me? He looked through the list and found "hub blocks", and he said "the duty on that would be the same as on "hub blocks". Those who have been here for a number of years know very well that the hub block was a block made for the old style of carriage. It was an elm block with a hole through it, and this officer was going to fix the duty on automobile hubs the same as the duty on a hub block used twenty years ago! That is an illustration of the knowledge some people have of the business. When I tell the House that in an automobile there are 160 or 200 parts which have to be made or brought in—at any rate they have to be provided—for the manufacture of a car, you can see how far you can get with a department which decides in its own judgment that there are only four parts to an automobile. You can see the inconsistency and the foolishness of trying to work a Finance department and have the Customs department interpret what is in the minister's mind. I am not criticizing the minister for that at all. My remarks are not based upon that suggestion. I hope that possibly some good may come from my remarks and that it may be so arranged that men in the Finance department will know what they are doing, and what they want, or that the other people will find out what they want and do it. But that is certainly not the case in this instance.

Now we come to this situation. We find the minister has put in the tariff schedule a clause that now covers, as far as I can make out, parts of automobiles, but parts of automobiles evidently are not going to be the same parts as they were before. They must change that. What is going to be done is hard to say. One thing is sure, namely, that this clause and this automobile business cannot be properly, definitely and reasonably discussed before we see what changes are going to be made. There must be some changes. I warn the minister that under the present proposed tariff this business runs a chance of being ruined, I do not care what anybody says. Unless some changes are made the business is gone. The parts man cannot stay in business unless the automobile man remains in business. It is impossible, because if a car comes in and certain parts are to be made here, it does not make any difference how cheaply they can be manufactured here, they will never get on that car. The same thing applies to tires. If automobiles complete are allowed to come in at low rates of duty, the tire man may be willing to make his tires as cheaply as possible, yet there is no chance on earth of his getting the business; consequently you run the risk of putting the parts man out of business unless you conserve the automobile business. If, on the other hand, you decide that the automobile people can function by bringing in the car mostly manufactured, or over half manufactured, you still put your parts men on the block and their investment in this country is gone.

The hon. minister said the other day, "I discussed this matter with automobile people." He did not say that in the House, but he made that statement; I do not suppose it was particularly private. But as far as I know he never discussed the matter with the parts people and they never had a chance to discuss it with him before they came down. Here is an industry about which the minister had not the proper information. He could not get it from the Customs department, because they did not know anything about it and do not yet. He gets information from one or two sources, and I will warrant you that the information the minister got since he made the changes is a lot more than he got previously; he knows more about the difficulties now than he ever knew before. It would have been a good deal better if he had got the information a little ahead of time.

But somebody says that the people knew these changes were going to be made. The truth of the matter is that the automobile people relied on the statement of the Prime Minister, made in the cities which he visited; they relied upon his statement that there would be no changes in the tariff and that he was appointing a tariff commission. The people expected to make their representations to the proper place, and the tariff board was the place for them to go. I am not saying whether the tariff is too high or too low; I do not care, but I say that no government has any right to strike at the heart of any industry without making a proper and careful analysis of the whole situation. That in my opinion has not been done. The argument is used that Mr. Henry Ford says that automobiles are too dear. He wants free trade in automobiles. Well it is a strange thing, Mr. Speaker, that after a man has lived to be three score years or more, and has built up a giant business in a country which has had a protective tariff quite as high as our own, he should come to us and say, "You ought to have free trade." That may be a good thing for Mr. Henry Ford, but I do not know that it is such a good thing for us or that Henry Ford should be the judge as to what is good for Canada.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Did Henry Ford not say that it would be a good thing for the automobile industry at Windsor or at Ford city?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If Mr. Ford said what the minister says he said in respect to the automobile industry at Windsor, I think I would be quite entitled to ask Mr. Ford why, if he believes in free trade, he did not years ago ask the United States government for free trade in that country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not the point. Did he not say that it would be a good thing for the business at Windsor and that he could manufacture? It is a very hard pill to swallow, is it not?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not know whether the Minister of the Interior is making the speech or not. He is evidently trying to make my speech for me. Nobody objects more than he does when somebody else interrupts him during his speech.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at all. I have not objected yet.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If Mr. Ford can make a statement in respect of Canada I certainly have just as much right to make a statement in respect of him and the United States. Let us assume that he is right and he knows his business. Let us assume that it is a good thing for Canada. I would like to ask him if it would not be a good thing for the United States. Has he ever made application to have the tariff reduced in that country? It is a fine thing for a man, after he has made hundreds of millions of dollars, to say: Certainly, boys, I am ready to do an export business all over the world and the rest of you can have free trade now. He did not say that when English automobiles were ready to be shipped into the United States some years ago. He reminds me very much of the late Andrew Carnegie, who was a steel manufacturer in the United States and whose plant formed the nucleus of the big giant, the United States Steel Corporation. Being a Scotchman, he was quite content to stay in the United States, to take the benefit of the tariff for twenty-five or thirty years in order to build up this giant business, and when he sold out to the United States Steel Corporation he suddenly became what he was originally, a Scotch free trader.

As regards automobiles and Henry Ford, if a man who is in the business desires to have free trade I would be very much inclined to give it to him. I do not see any reason why we should not; but is there any reason why the government should go to work and kill other industries? The Ford business is one by itself; it is a peculiar business. This man has built up a business on probably a different principle from that of anyone else. He started out to build one car; he stuck to that one car through thick and thin for at least fifteen years. He never changed the model; he never had any tools to make; he continued to manufacture the same thing Each year instead of putting some new contraption on his car in order to induce people to buy it, he reduced the price by fifty or a hundred dollars and he got the sales. Nobody else could do that. There was only one Ford car; it had no competitors in that particular line within a hundred to two hundred dollars of the price.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is he not an example of a man who has managed his business economically and well? Did he not do the same with the railway he purchased? He had no protection on the railway.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): He is not the only one who has managed a business successfully. Henry Ford is in a class by himself. He makes his own steel; he has his own lumber yards, his own limits, his own mines. He buys everything at cost right down to hard tacks. That is his business and no one has any complaint to make of that. He took a railway that was bankrupt, and because of the quantity of freight he had to handle himself he could divert freight over his road and thus make it pay. Is the fact that he was able to do that any reason why you should put your own railroad out of business?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not at all. I am just drawing attention to the fact that Henry Ford never asked the United States for protection so far as I know, and that he ran a railway.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I never said that Mr. Ford asked for protection, but Mr. Ford lived for twenty or twenty-five years under protection and took advantage of it. He says now that his company took advantage of protection in Canada and I ask the minister the question: Did he not do so in the United States too?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly he did, and every one of my hon. friends opposite would do the same.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I did not state and I never heard that Mr. Ford asked the United States government to take the duty off automobiles.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The question I asked my hon. friend was: Can he state that Henry Ford ever asked for protection?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I never spoke to Henry Ford about the question and I cannot answer it. I would like to ask the minister a question: Is he in favour of free trade on cars?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not free trade on cars.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Then he is worse than Henry Ford.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is asking me a question and I shall be glad to answer it. My hon. friend has been arguing for half an hour that no consideration was given to this question; that we plunged madly into it. We did nothing of the sort. The same statement was made about the tariff on farm implements.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not mind being asked a question, but I object to the hon. gentleman making a speech.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): With all due respect to the hon. gentleman, he asked the question and I answered it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member asked a question, but I think he is now asking for protection for himself.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I do not mind being asked the question, but I do not want the hon. gentleman to answer it too.

I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not in the chamber because I want to refer to one more item on the schedule. Hon. members will remember that some years ago I stated in this House that I approached the late Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, with the request that he place a duty on the dyeing of silk. There was no duty in 1921 upon the article that it was proposed to put on the market and the manufacturer who was desirous of coming here to do the dyeing asked for 10 per cent protection. The minister said: Of course we are not a protectionist government and I will not make any promises, but if it looks reasonable to us I will consider the matter. In the 1922 budget the minister was good enough to place a duty of 10 per cent upon the silk dyeing industry and in my locality about $100,000 were spent by a small firm in establishing a silk dyeing industry. It so happened that the minister, along with the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who afterwards became Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), went over to France and made a treaty with that country. By means of that treaty about one-half of the duty was cut off.

I want to refer to another act of perfidy, or, Mr. Speaker, if you consider that too strong a word, let me say another breach of faith on the part of this government. A couple of years ago, I believe in 1924, an English concern came to Canada and approached this government with a view to having a duty imposed on artificial silk, which product they were prepared to make. This company, I may say, is the largest English concern in the silk industry and one of the foremost companies of the kind in the world. They came here and interviewed the minister, submitting certain proposals as to what they would do. They offered to erect a plant at a cost of between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 and to utilize our wood product in the making of artificial silk. We do not know what took place but at any rate the government met them, and following that interview a duty was imposed on this article At the same time a drawback was provided for the purpose of allowing people interested in the importation of this commodity to bring in their supplies in the meantime until the factory should be started. Mr. Fielding in 1923 at page 2648 of Hansard volume 3 is reported as follows:

> A new industry is promised us for the manufacture of artificial silk. It is represented to us that this industry will employ a large amount of labour and we have every reason to believe that if we can make encouraging terms a great industry will be established. We propose to make a classification in which it will be treated largely as silk, and we have every reason to hope this will lead to a very important industry being established.

The Englishmen, it appears, were not quite satisfied with the lengths to which the minister had gone, and after some further negotiations the resolutions were changed in committee to meet their views, with the result that they got the terms they desired. The drawbacks were also arranged. The company afterwards wrote to the minister and told him that they were going to be somewhat late in getting their mill going. They wanted to make sure first that their product was a success, and so they asked the minister to continue the drawback arrangement until such time as their plant might be put into operation. The minister did so. There was passed an order in council, which I have under my hand, extending the time to December 31, 1925. A few weeks ago the government were informed that these people were now ready to produce in Canada. They had experimented long enough with the Canadian raw material to ascertain that the article they could produce here was first class. As a matter of fact it was better than they had anticipated, for they found that our wood excelled their expectations. Now, very much to their surprise, the minister brings down a budget containing an entirely new arrangement in favour of another firm who are about to begin operations in the province of Quebec. The effect of this departure of the government's is that the duty which this English firm has had on its product for three months and fifteen days is now practically removed. Three-quarters of the duty has been taken away, and these people would be stranded if it were not for their strong financial position. That is what I term an act of perfidy. It is a breach of faith on the part of this government which will do us no good in any market of the world when what has taken place becomes known. I have no brief for these people, nor have I any information other than I have been able to pick up. I may observe, however, that they came to my city because it was the centre of a small growing industry, engaged in the manufacture of silk. This is the treatment that they have received at the hands of this government. They have invested in the town of Cornwall over $2,000,000 and they employ about 500 people to-day. It is going to be two years before the firm in Quebec are ready to produce and in the meantime the product of the other people is allowed to come in practically free. In other words, 75 per cent of their finished article will come into the country under a drawback. That is the kind of treatment which this government metes out to people who come here to do business.

I think I have taken up enough of the time of the House, Mr. Speaker, and I beg to thank hon. members for the careful attention with which they have followed my observations.

Mr. A. J. MACDONALD (Glengarry): My purpose in participating in the present debate, Mr. Speaker, is to direct your attention to the fact that notwithstanding the wonderful progress of the province of Ontario along industrial lines its outstanding and predominant industry is still agriculture. Fortunately all parties concede that agriculture is our basic industry and that when this industry prospers all others prosper. In view of this fundamental fact it is reasonable to expect that the elected representatives from the province would be very much concerned with the present position of this industry, and that its requirements would evoke the sympathetic interest of hon. gentlemen opposite. I submit that it is fair to say that during the progress of this debate whatever sympathies hon. gentlemen opposite have shown have been on the whole with the protected interests.

Having been closely associated with the farming industry of my native county of Glengarry for the last thirty-five years, and having an intimate knowledge of the constant struggle on the part of the vast majority of them to make ends meet, even in that fertile county, I have endeavoured to evolve a reasonable explanation for this condition of mind on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. Perhaps a casual analysis of the report of the Chief Electoral Officer in respect of the last general election will provide it. Looking at this report one finds that sixty-eight Conservatives were elected out of a total of eighty-two candidates. They were elected by 57 per cent of the votes polled, and 38 per cent of the total possible vote, and of these sixty-eight members, four are classified as farmers, one as a retired farmer, three as farmers and breeders of pure bred stock and one as contractor and farmer.

With all due deference to the superior training and the intellectual attainments of the many gentlemen of the learned profession in that group I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this very training precludes them from a sympathetic understanding of the problems confronting the farmers of this country and that those among them who should be sympathetic have permitted their sympathies to be dulled by their environment. How many of the elected representatives from Ontario have a clear understanding of the income and expenditure of the average farmer? Yes, how many gentlemen connected with the press of this Canada of ours have an adequate conception of the income and expenditure of our average Canadian farmer? In the final analysis the press may be held accountable for the wealth of misunderstanding prevailing in the industrial and urban centres of our fair country in this respect. In this connection I wish to direct your attention to an article in Toronto Saturday Night which was reprinted by the Ottawa Journal of the fifth instant and which reads:

Taxes, Tariffs, Industry

When the Canadian Council of Agriculture met the cabinet the other day the members expressed themselves strongly against the reduction in the income tax. These philanthropists believe in taxation. Of course they do—for everybody but themselves. Their worry is not that they pay income taxes, but the reduction in the income tax may by hook or crook make it necessary to levy other taxes and these may get to them in time.

As for the application of the income tax, be it high or low, they have no reason to worry. Last year according to recent figures there were exactly 3,061 farmers in Canada paying income taxes, and the sum total they paid was $162,000. This chicken feed was contributed by 530 Ontario agriculturists, to the amount of $19,351. In Quebec 42 paid $3,775, which was just about half the sum that British Columbia farmers paid. In the Canadian west farmers appear to have a reasonable view in respect to their responsibilities. In Saskatchewan 1,492 farmers paid $70,956. In Alberta 663 farmers paid $49,894, though Manitoba fell down with only 171 farmers paying $6,303, but this was nearly twice what Quebec paid.

As fifty per cent of the people in Canada either live on farms or draw incomes from them the question of income taxes so far as they are concerned is rather a joke, particularly in view of the fact that upward of half of the country's wealth is derived from the farm.

Of course if the 168,000 employees who in 1925 produced $13,973,000 as their contribution toward the income tax collected, could live off their salaries in the same manner as the farmer lives off his acres, with no one to check them up, our interest in the income tax would not be of a character to keep us awake nights.

And this brings up another question. If the government proceeds to rip the vitals out of industry who is to pay the taxes? Where is the government to find that six or seven hundred million dollars necessary to meet the yearly liabilities? Land taxes look to be in sight.

In 1924 Ontario and Quebec paid $44,000,000 out of the total of $56,000,000 paid in income and war taxes, while out of $4,700,000 paid as business profits tax Ontario and Quebec contributed $3,500,000. If industry is to be sacrificed to make a holiday for the Progressive party and such part of the Liberal party as believe in such things, the time will come when a complete revision of taxation methods will be necessary to meet new conditions.

The tenor of this article suggests that inasmuch as upwards of fifty per cent of the country's wealth is derived from the farm, and fifty per cent of the people in Canada either live on the farm or draw income therefrom, the farmers are dodging the payment of income tax because there is no one to check them up. May I suggest that rather than this smug assumption on the part of the would-be saviours of this country that the men and women engaged in our basic industry are dishonest, the fact that only 3,061 farmers paid the small sum of $162,000 in income tax out of a total of $56,000,000 in the year 1924 should be a compelling reason why every man interested in the economic situation and future welfare of our country should pause and ask himself where we are drifting.

For the information of the House and those people in this country not familiar with this problem I invite you to consider seriously with me, as the importance of the subject fully warrants, the financial statement of one of our young farmers engaged in dairying and mixed farming, covering his business operations for the years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925. It is my firm conviction that even a superficial examination of these statements will lead to a better appreciation and understanding of many of the problems confronting us at present, and understanding it may force us, even against views honestly held, to consider our whole fiscal policy before it is too late.

This young man owns a 100-acre farm with 50 acres under cultivation, 20 acres of pasture and 30 acres of bush. The value of the farm and stock is $9,000, against which he has a mortgage for $5,000, which is not an unusual condition among the farmers of Ontario. The following are the financial statements for 1922, 1923 and 1924:

Revenue—
42,160 pounds of milk from 8 cows at $1.24 per cwt.		$523 08
Cows and cattle sold and used		108 00

		718 66
		$1,136 99
Annual instalment		435 90
		$701 09

Just here I might remark that his 1925 statement shows an increase in revenue, and so everyone who had anything to do with the farming communities was also able to show an increase. If the farmers prosper we all prosper; every other industry in Canada will prosper as well. The 1925 statement is as follows:

9 p.m.

Revenue— 1925
41,231 pounds of milk from 10 cows, at $1.75	$723 23
Cattle sold	151 50
Hogs	447 75
Eggs and poultry	373 86
Wood sold	361 75

[Mr. A. J. Macdonald.]

I leave it to you, Mr. Speaker, if at any time in those four years the farmer whose statement I have quoted was able to qualify for the payment of income tax. I make this statement with a full knowledge of what I am saying, that the farmers of Ontario have been up against it hard, and at no time has the average farmer qualified for the payment of income tax; consequently he should not be classified as dishonest, as indeed he is not.

I think the hon. members of this House will consider that the position of the average farmer is not an enviable one. True, he and his good wife have no reason to worry over lack of work. They are assured of that for the full 365 days of the year, from sunrise to sunset, but they have serious reason to worry over the monetary returns for their labour and their opportunity to make adequate provision for their families and their own old age. I also think, Mr. Speaker, that these statements will help us materially in understanding why our people leave the farms, and why more farmers do not pay income tax. In plain words, the business has not paid.

Then, appreciating the situation of this our basic and predominant industry, I submit that it is our bounden duty to consider ways and means of remedying the situation. Our Conservative friends hold quite strongly and vigorously that they have discovered the one and only remedy, labelled Protection—higher tariffs—and they set forth as a clinching argument in its behalf the wonderful progress of our American neighbours to the south. It is our duty to take into consideration every proposition that may lead to a solution of our problems, and if the adoption of the protective principle urged by our friends opposite, and applied so stringently by the government of the United States, would solve our farm problem, then I would be quite prepared to support it. However, we have no assurance that the application of this policy has accomplished this very much desired end. On the contrary, the actual results have been quite the opposite. In this connection permit me to read from a despatch which appeared in the Montreal Standard of May 1, 1926. The article is headed Big Shrinkage in United States Farm Area Noted, and it goes on to say:

> Only pig-headed optimism will try to blink the fact that the shrinkage of farming areas in the U.S. has considerable significance for Canada.
> A Big Shrinkage
> Never before has there been a shrinkage of farming area in the U.S. as a whole. Eastern states have witnessed declines in agriculture, but these have always up to 1920 been counterbalanced by increases in the western states. Therefore, the decrease in the American farming area from 955,800,000 acres in 1920 to 924,800,000 in 1925 is a phenomenon of first importance. To grasp what a decrease of 31,000,000 acres in farming lands means is not easy. It means the abandonment of a farm area more than equal to the province of New Brunswick, with all its lakes, rivers, forests and waste lands. It means the abandonment of farm lands covering an area considerably greater than the empire of land the Canadian government granted to the C.P.R.

Staggers Imagination

The movement of population these figures indicates staggers imagination. In 1925 alone, the movement of people from farms to cities and towns in the U.S. was 2,035,000, according to the Washington agricultural authorities. It is as though twice the population of the three maritime provinces, or about 85 per cent of the population of Quebec, had picked up stakes and departed for somewhere else. On the other hand, there was in 1925 a movement from the cities and towns to farms of 1,135,000 people. The net movement away from the farms in one year was, however, 910,000 persons nearly the population of the Maritimes.

And that under high protection.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite apparent that the policy of protection as urged by our Conservative friends has not worked a solution of the problem for the American farmer, nor will it do so for the farmers of this country engaged in dairying and mixed farming, whose products are on an exportable basis, and whose returns are fixed by world conditions. We cannot increase that farmer's annual income by a tariff on the main articles he produces; consequently must look to the other side of the account and endeavour to reduce the load he is now carrying. Our fiscal policy has permitted organized industry to rip the vitals out of our basic industry, composed as it is of thousands of disorganized units, and in view of this condition I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), that it is pretty nearly time that the old province of Ontario had a ginger group in this House that understood and was sympathetic with the interests of agriculture and would rally to its support whenever it was necessary. I think the industrial interests may depend in the future, as in the past, on the urban centres providing them with doughty champions even at the expense of the major portion of their electors, namely, labour.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as the representative of the historic county of Glengarry, a county that has contributed much to the development of this Canada of ours, a county that has contributed much to the service of the state and can claim with just pride that her sons were ever to the front whenever the bugle sounded, a county that has to-day, proportionately, as many returned men on the farm as any other centre in the Dominion, a county whose sons are anxious to remain on the land and preserve the traditions and heritage handed down to them, I wish to assure the government that the present budget meets with the hearty approval of our people, and leads them to hope that a reasonable check upon the unreasonable exploitation of the masses of the people by the big interests is in sight.

Mr. J. R. O'NEILL (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, following the lengthy and analytical discussions to which we have listened for the last three weeks on this subject, I do not deem it necessary to enter into any great forensic effort to demonstrate the economic inconsistencies of this government as evidenced by the budget submitted by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). I wish, however, first of all, to offer him in all sincerity my sincere congratulations for the manner in which he submitted the budget, for his clear, concise presentation of the financial status of the Dominion, and if he will permit me, I wish also to join with others in the expression of my high personal regard and esteem for him, not only because of my personal observations, but founded also on the remarks and opinions which I have heard expressed outside of this House in regard to the hon. minister. Let me add, perhaps unnecessarily, that in this regard the Minister of Finance will rise very much higher in my esteem if he will but implement the suggestions I am about to make.

As to the budget in general, on close scrutiny I am sure every honest Canadian will come to the conclusion that this fair Dominion is forced to emulate the pelican, in her piety wounding her very heart to nourish her petulant brood. A shrewd appreciation of mob psychology is demonstrated by taking the small surplus of revenue over current expenditure as an excuse to effect small economies in the interests of the average man, in preference to choosing a fearless course which would reduce the nation's debt and eventually lead to Canada's fiscal independence and national dignity.

Coming as I do from a great mining country, I think it is only proper to say a few words on the issues raised by the budget speech presented on April 15th by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and at the very outset I wish to express my regrets not only for what it did contain, but for several items of great national importance which it did not contain. Let me deal first with the latter.

I hope I do not find myself in any isolated position with regard to what I have in mind, but being accustomed to say exactly what I mean, I propose to consider in detail the omissions as affecting particularly the mining industry.

Now, with particular application to the mining industry in our own country, wherein does the budget fail? First and foremost, no consideration is given to labour, the most essential element in the success of mining or any other industry. I refer especially to the homes and living conditions of the miners and those who live in mining towns.

A discovery being made, development and construction proceeds apace, a town or city springs into existence, and the inhabitants are forced to install water works and sewage systems, build roads, schools, churches, and public buildings. In one stroke they must accomplish what entails years of slow and patient growth in a farming or any other industrial community. This being done, and the mine put on a producing basis, the federal and provincial authorities step in and reap the benefit without a word of thanks or a gesture of gratitude.

Take for example, the case of a city in the province of Ontario, a city owing its birth and existence to the discovery and operation of a mine, the city of Timmins with a population of some seventeen thousand people. Under the Mining Tax Act of Ontario, that city is not allowed to levy any tax on the profits of the mine within its precincts, nor upon the mill or other mine buildings. The Ontario Mining Tax is not really a profits tax but is an arbitrary method of giving the provincial government a revenue from profitable operations in lieu of a royalty, while assuring would be investors that stability indispensable to a successful commercial enterprise. The act is based on the report of the Royal Ontario Nickel Commission of 1917, which report takes into consideration the taxing systems of every mining country in the world. Let me quote clause 5 which contains the gist of the act:

> 5. (1) Every mine in Ontario, the annual profits of which exceed $10,000, shall be liable for and the owner, manager, holder, tenant, lessee, occupier, and operator of the same shall pay an annual tax as follows:
> (a) Three per centum on the excess of annual profits of such mine above $10,000 and up to $1,000,000.
> (b) Five per centum on the excess above $1,000,000 and up to $5,000,000; six per centum on the excess above $5,000,000 and up to $10,000,000; seven per centum on the excess above $10,000,000 and up to $15,000,000, and on the annual profits above $15,000,000 a percentage or percentages increasing in like progression.

Of this amount, the provincial government allows fifty per cent up to a maximum of $35,000 to go to the local municipality. Over and above this, the federal government lifts about twice the total and contributes nothing to the municipality.

Allow me to refer to the profit and loss statement for the Hollinger Mine for the year 1925:

Taxes, province of Ontario..	$152,296 62
Municipal taxes (except residences owned in city)..	35,000 00
Dominion of Canada 1925 taxes..	388,000 00
Dominion of Canada 1924 taxes (adjustment)..	57,597 34

Not only does the federal government corral more than double the amount levied by the province but the levy is made without allowing the mine to deduct from profits the amount paid either the province or the municipality.

A further incongruity lies in the fact that with regard to the federal income taxes, no allowance is permitted for money spent by mining companies on outside ventures. As everyone knows the development of new mines is extremely hazardous in a financial sense, the proportion of payable mines to the total number of properties on which work is done, being very small. If mining organizations are going to survive they must get new mines, but as the law stands for every dollar spent by a mining company in outside prospecting, exploration, development, and equipment, a tax is paid, and even under the new tax regulations the cost to the companies is $1.04½. It seems only reasonable to ask that in view of the large, very large element of risk in the development of new properties, mining companies should be allowed to spend annually a certain percentage of their capital in outside ventures and that this money if so spent, should be exempt.

With regard to the reduction in the rate from ten and one half per cent to nine per cent, I consider it is merely a matter of shifting the burden with a net loss to the actual shareholder. As pointed out by the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent):

> If you happen to be part owner of a mine, the company first pays the income tax, and as shareholder or part owner you must also pay, so that whereas you are given consideration for depreciation only once you must pay the tax twice.

On hearing that statement I was inclined to agree with the hon. member, but on further investigation I find it is not true. There is a fifty per cent allowance on net profits for depletion of the mine, also an allowance of fifty per cent on mine dividends in the case of gold and silver and twenty-five per cent in the case of copper. No allowance is made in the case of nickel. This is an incongruity which should be rectified.

Reverting to the case of the municipality, I consider it is only fair, equitable, and just that the Dominion, spending a very small item on geology or any activity contributing to the success of provincial mining ventures—I mean comparatively speaking—should acknowledge indebtedness to the working man and help reduce his tax burden. He pays income and property tax to the municipality as well as income to the Dominion as well. To my mind, it is nothing short of robbery on the part of the federal authorities. The case is totally different from every other community. The city in question, and every mining city as a matter of fact, is situated away off on the frontier; the inhabitants are all workmen raising families, and the school question is more acute than that of housing. Why, in Timmins last year more than the provincial allowance of $35,000 was given out in charity to the workless! Yet the federal money grabber can walk off with approximately one-half million dollars without the slightest qualms of conscience. The same applies in the good old township of Tisdale, in Teck, and down through the silver region.

Recognizing the fact, Sir, that Canada's mineral industry has reached such tremendous proportions, I believe, and I am sure all hon. gentlemen in this House will agree with me, that the time is ripe for the immediate calling of a conference of representatives from the Dominion, the provinces, and the various mining associations for the purpose of framing uniform and non-duplicating tax laws and uniform mining laws in general throughout the Dominion of Canada. I have heard mining men of experience and prominence say that the federal mining laws are beyond all doubt the worst in the world, both as to acquiring and as to holding mining property. There are some irritating differences between the laws of Ontario and those in vogue in Quebec, and these could easily be ironed out before the industry becomes further established. I might add that I have heard mining men from Africa, Australia, and the United States state that Ontario mining laws worked out to greater advantage than any with which they had experience.

It might not be inadvisable here to refer to the present status of Canada's mining industry. The situation is well outlined in a report by S. J. Cooke, chief of the Mining, Metallurgical & Chemical branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics at Ottawa in the course of an address at the opening session of the annual meeting of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy in Montreal, March 3rd, 1926. Reviewing the developments of the year, Mr. Cook pointed out that the production of minerals reached a value of $224,846,237, an advance of $15,262,831 over the total for 1924, and well towards the record valuation of $227,859,665 attained in 1920, when new production records were established. Among the metals the remarkable advances in the production of gold, lead and zinc were the most outstanding. Improvements in outputs marked the totals for nickel, copper, cobalt and silver. Sales of asbestos increased during the year by more than $2,000,000 to a total value of $8.995,854. Improvement in the production of other non-metallic minerals was noted in the figures for fluorspar, graphite, gypsum, natural gas, petroleum, quartz natural sodium sulphate and carbonate, salt, talc, and soapstone. Production figures for coal, feldspar, pyrites and mica were below those reported in 1924. Except in coal, losses were negligible. Coal showed a loss in tonnage amounting to 508,796 tons and as coal at the mines sold at slightly lower prices during the year the value of the output showed an even greater loss proportionally than the tonnage.

Metal mining in Ontario showed wonderful prosperity in 1925. Gold, silver, nickel, and copper were produced in abundance and in addition to these leading minerals there was a production of almost every other economic mineral with the exception of coal. British Columbia's output of lead, zinc, copper, gold and silver added greatly to Canada's mineral wealth. Quebec's asbestos fields continued to supply by far the greater part of the world's tonnage of this useful commodity; lead, zinc, gold and silver were also reported. Developments in the Rouyn field in Quebec were watched with interest by the mining world during the year. Much progress was made. Alberta, Nova Scotia and British Columbia produced large tonnages of coal in addition to other minerals. Manitoba's mines yielded gold and silver, but more important perhaps than the actual yield of metals was the fact that Manitoba's mineral area was made the subject of a more intense study during 1925, than in other years so that the prospects of production from this source were very considerably improved. New Brunswick's coal and building materials added to the total for Canada. Interest in the oil-well developments in Alberta was very keen throughout the year; it is probable that very encouraging developments will occur in the mineral industry in this province in the early future.

Upwards of 64,000 persons find employment in Canada's mining industry. Ontario, British Columbia and Nova Scotia mines alone furnish employment to more than 45,000 persons. Nearly 20,000 are employed in Canada's metal mining and non-ferrous metallurgical works. About 34,000 people are employed in non-metal mining and approximately 11,000 in the production of structural materials and clay products. To these salaries and wages totalling approximately $83,000,000 are paid annually. The importance of the purchasing power represented by the employees of Canada's mining industry is sometimes not fully appreciated. Fuel and electricity constitute an expense item reaching a total of almost $20,000,000 a year; much of the progress that has been possible in the mining industry in recent years has been due to the extensive development of hydro-electric power facilities.

Investment in Canadian mines amounts to approximately $632,444,000; of which $281,828,000 is invested in metal mining and metallurgical works treating Canadian ores; $259,361,000 represents the investment in non-metal mines and $91,255,000 the cost of properties and plants producing structural materials and clay products.

Mining, now third in rank among Canada's primary industries contributes extensively to the wealth and prosperity of the Dominion. Large tonnages of freight move from and to the mines; many subsidiary industries depend upon the mining industry for their prosperity. Canada's progress in the production of mineral wealth has been notable particularly in recent years; the developments in established fields have won the confidence of the investing public; the discovery of new mineral areas has provided attractive opportunities for those of a more speculative nature; the growth and evident stability of the mineral industry stamp it as one of the great and increasing factors in Canada's industrial and commercial life.

At this point, Sir, I would refer to certain special items in the matter of the mining industry regarding the tariff and sales tax. Here is where I may find myself a bit isolated, although I am sure it is the policy of the protectionist party not to advance the interests of one class at the expense of another, and should be, of course, the policy of the government.

With regard to tariff and sales tax, the intention and the desire of the government apparently is to remove or lessen the duties on essential machinery for production in natural resources. The government has been very considerate to us, but there are a number of items where there is discrimination, due in part to the fact that the tariff takes no consideration of advances in mining and metallurgical practice, and also due in part to a lack of knowledge with regard to the machinery used by the industry. Following I might mention several items in which this appears to be the case.

[Mr. O'Neill.]

There is a considerable consumption of dehydrated borax by the mines, particularly in refining of gold bullion. Ordinary borax comes in duty free, although it is used in the manufacture of a large number of articles which themselves are protected by a duty. The only difference between borax and dehydrated borax is that in the latter some of the water is driven off, but although it is still borax, when imported in that form it pays a duty of 17½ per cent.

Mine hoists are not specifically mentioned in the tariff and because of this fact they come in under article 453 and pay a duty of 27½ per cent plus 5 per cent sales tax. Compressors and wire ropes also pay a high rate of duty and sales tax. If either hoists or compressors are used in the lumbering industry or ropes used in connection with block and tackle, they come in under reduced rate of duty and are exempt from sales tax. This appears to be discrimination against the mining industry in favor of lumbering and as they are both basic industries, there seems little excuse for it.

Rock drills come in under reduced rate of duty and together with drill steel are exempt from sales tax. Drill sharpeners however and steel tempering furnaces pay a high rate of duty and also pay the sales tax. As the two latter are used in the manufacture of the drilling bits, it would only seem reasonable that they should be at least exempt from sales tax.

Tariff item 460 provides that, "sundry articles of metal as follows, when for use exclusively in mining or metallurgical operations" shall come in duty free. It appears that the limiting of this to articles of metal is unfair, in some cases. I might point out that steel cyanide tanks come in duty and sales tax free, while wooden tanks, for the same purpose, pay a duty of 25 per cent plus 5 per cent sales tax. You know filters all have filter cloths; American filters have redwood sectors and filter cloths. A complete filter, including the canvas and Redwood sectors, come in duty free, but spare Redwood sectors pay 25 per cent duty plus 5 per cent sales tax and extra cloths or bags pay 35 per cent duty plus 5 per cent sales tax.

I might also mention that crushers, ball mills, tube mills, and so on, come in under reduced rate of duty and are exempt from sales tax. Cyanide machinery comes in duty free and is exempt from sales tax. Between these two, however, are the classifiers, and the Department of Customs and Excise considers that classifiers do not properly belong either to the cyanide machinery or to the crushing machinery, although they are of course essential to both. Because of this classifiers have to pay 27½ per cent plus 5 per cent sales tax.

I might also mention that mine cars, and so on, are exempt from sales tax, but the rails on which they run are not. The small mine locomotives, for underground use, which are practically the same as cars, pay a duty of 35 per cent plus 5 per cent sales tax, although they are not manufactured in this country. They perform the same function for the mines as tractors do for the farmers and tractors or locomotives in lumbering operations. Farmers can bring in tractors duty free; lumbermen can bring in tractors and locomotives at 20 per cent, exempt from sales tax. Any person can buy a tractor under a duty of 27½ per cent plus sales tax, but the mine locomotive pays a duty of 35 per cent plus 5 per cent sales tax.

It seems to me that the timber used in mining operations should also be exempt from sales tax, because it is really a by-product of farming; also in view of the fact that a certain amount of clearing is done around the mine and the timber is sold. As hon. members know, it does not enter into the final product and timber once put underground has no salvage value. As used in the stopes it is essential to the operation of rock drill and steel, both of which are exempt from sales tax, and as used in the shaft it is essential to the operation of mine cages, cars and skips, which are also exempt from sales tax.

I am also inclined to think it is rather unfair to differentiate to the extent that is done between machinery for the cyanide process and machinery for concentrators, where the same machinery is used in both cases. When used in the cyanide plant it enters duty free and is free from sales tax, while the same machinery used in concentrating ores is not exempt and pays a high rate of duty. Flotation oils, et cetera, are exempt from sales tax when used in the production of a product which itself is not exempt, but when used in connection with gold or silver ores they have to pay a sales tax. These are only some of the items to which I should like to refer.

There is also the question of salt used in the refining of nickel. This is not the ordinary type of salt as manufactured in Canada, but is a rock salt which has to be imported from the United States. Rock salt used by the fishermen comes in duty free, but the nickel companies have to pay a duty of five cents per 100 pounds. The government has more or less laid down the principle of a rebate of duties on articles consumed by companies manufacturing for export. It seems to me that this should apply in the case of rock salt, because 97 to 98 per cent of the material produced in our nickel refineries is for export, and of course, as hon. members are undoubtedly aware, nickel sent into the United States has to pay a duty of three cents a pound. The salt as used in the nickel refinery is used for giving a chloridizing roast. It does not enter into the final product, being consumed in the process of manufacture. The free importation of this can affect no Canadian producer; but if the government cannot see their way clear to place this salt on the free list, I think it is only reasonable to ask for a rebate of the duty on account of the salt being consumed in the process of manufacturing a product for export. These subjects might come under the consideration of the newly-formed tariff commission; they would form excellent material on which the commission might cut their eye-teeth.

That covers some specific items to which I wish to refer, consideration of which would prove an encouragement to the mining industry, but I do not suggest for a moment that I have covered the whole field. I should like to come now to a short consideration of the iron and steel industry. Failure to adjust the specific duties on the basic forms of iron and steel so as to bring their ad valorem effect up to the general level of duties on other materials marks one of the most outstanding disappointments in the budget.

As regards the province of Ontario, this great basic industry is dependent on imported ores in spite of the fact that several companies have demonstrated what can be done by the beneficiation of low grade Canadian ores. The O'Connor holdings at Temagami, the Ko-Ko range further to the west, and the Onaman iron range, are all attractive possibilities. At Moose mountain, some thirty-five miles west of Sudbury, more than 100,000,000 tons of magnetite have been proved up by the owners. In the Atikokan district some 25,000,000 tons of magnetite have been blocked out. The deposits of non-Bessemer ore in the Michipicoten district are extensive, and millions of tons of red hematite have been taken from the Helen mine. From the Magpie mine siderite is obtained and roasted before shipment to the blast furnaces at Sault Ste. Marie.

In central Canada our source of supply is the high grade deposit of the Mesaba range in the state of Minnesota. This is being rapidly depleted and the chief reason why it is being shipped out in a wholesale manner is because of the local taxing system. This is a case where the municipality have abused their taxing power and it pays investing capital to exhaust the supply rather than to pay tax on the ore even in place. It is for the purpose of avoiding a similar occurrence that Ontario restricts the municipal taxing powers, and in order to profit by the experience generally I say that we should have a conference between the provincial and federal authorities to arrange uniform mining taxation throughout the Dominion of Canada.

I should like to quote this statement from the editorial page of the Iron Age of April 9, 1926:

> The time is not far distant when the furnace men will not be able to obtain their ores at the low prices which prevail at present. The cream of the lake deposit is being shipped at a rapid rate, and it will not be long before the leaner ores will have to be treated to meet the demand. The supply of rich ores will not last many more years.

Commenting on the situation an editorial in the Canadian Mining Journal under date of April 9, 1926, goes on to say:

> To Canadians the iron ore situation is a matter of more importance than is generally recognized. We are producing no iron ore and have no mines ready to produce. We have an extensive iron and steel industry employing a large number of men and contributing largely to the welfare of the Dominion; but we are still depending on supplies of iron ore from other countries. The definite warnings that have been recently coming from the lake Superior iron producing states should not be ignored in Canada. For the present year there is not likely to be any difficulty in securing supplies from the United States at low prices; but the time is coming when we may have to pay dearly for our inactivity in developing iron ore resources of our own.
> The iron ore supply for our large iron and steel industry in Nova Scotia is fortunately assured. The operators there own very large iron ore deposits in Newfoundland and are at least drawing their supplies from within the empire if not from Canada itself. The Newfoundland iron mines together with the Nova Scotia coal mines give the industry there a firm footing which has permitted it to grow even though competition with imported iron and steel has made the business less profitable than it should be. The needed impetus to the Nova Scotia enterprise could be given by increased protection.
> Some action on this matter is necessary for the welfare of the iron and steel making industries in all parts of Canada; but we are here considering a problem which is more particularly of interest in the central and western provinces.
> In central Canada there is no satisfactory supply of either coal or iron ore.

[Mr. O'Neill.]

That is more or less an assumption.

> Here the outstanding advantage is proximity to the consumer of iron and steel and this, coupled with the business ability of the men in control of the operations, has made it possible for the iron industry to become firmly established at some centres without a domestic supply of iron ore or coal. The latter defect has been remedied as far as possible by making the coke from imported coal instead of importing the coke. For the present there is no other source of fuel. We have however other possible sources of iron ore and we should not be satisfied with the progress we are making towards utilizing them.

Hon. members will remember that the Iron Ore committee appointed by the Ontario government investigated the situation and recently presented their report recommending that the government offer a bounty of one cent per unit of iron on each long ton of merchantable iron ore marketed from Ontario mines, the "unit" being one per cent of iron in each ton of iron ore. Thus if the iron ore asayed 40 per cent iron the bounty would be forty cents per ton. This bounty is granted for a period of ten years from the date at which it became effective. In order to make this proposition a success the Dominion government was expected to assist the industry correspondingly, but so far federal aid has been confined to pious wishes.

Surely this great industry, whose status is looked upon as the barometer of the times in every thriving country, is as worthy of a subsidy as the deserted farms of this country are. The cost to Canada would not surpass the amount involved in the subvention referred to in the bill to aid colonization recently submitted to this House. It would mean infinitely more to the nation and to our railway systems.

A subject of cognate interest is that of coal. In respect to the coal situation, the budget of 1926 marks a further disappointment to the interests of Canada by reason of the government's failure to correct the mistake made last year when the duty on bituminous coal was lowered three cents instead of being raised, and their failure to make anthracite screenings dutiable at the same rate as soft coal with which it competes.

I desire now to refer to the discoveries of coal in northern Ontario. In view of the recent development in that part of the country along the Mattagami river north of the Transcontinental railway, I would call the attention of the government and of every hon. member to the possibility of solving our fuel problem in central Canada through these discoveries in northern Ontario. The possibilities of the field deserve a thorough investigation, and I would urge upon the government the advisability of immediately co-operating with the provincial department in this respect. In the past some writers and geologists have scouted the idea of its being possible to find coal in this particular area, but the nature of the latest discoveries and the opinions of several prominent mining men make it evident that the country has a splendid future in this matter. On this point let me quote the Canadian Mining Journal of May 7, 1926. At page 483 the following appears:

> Not only do the clays and associated beds of lignite occur on the banks of the Mattagami but they are also to be found on the banks of the Missinaibi, forty miles west, so that a very wide area comes within the range of investigation.

This is the important feature:

> The clays in this section of northern Ontario were described by Joseph Keele, formerly of the Dominion Department of Mines, as belonging to the lower cretaceous series. The coal of Alberta and Saskatchewan occurs in this series. Formerly it was supposed that the lignites which are found in the same localities as the Mattagami clays were of inter-glacial origin. Now it is commonly believed they are of pre-glacial origin.

Unquestionably these coal-bearing cretaceous formations may be found to be of great national economic value when intensive exploration is carried on, but the task is too great for individual effort and every encouragement should be given immediately by both federal and provincial authorities. It has always been recognized by those interested in the coal industry in the north country that the construction of the Georgian Bay canal was indispensable to its success. One question which is now before the people of that part of the country is the construction of the Georgian bay-Ottawa river canal and the improvement of the French river to facilitate the transportation of coal and supplies by water to North Bay. This would mean a great deal to northern mining and industrial interests and this section of the system is a pressing necessity of the hour. May I at this point quote the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier as he is reported in Hansard, February 23, 1914 at page 1036:

> I am so confident of the future of the country that I have no hesitation in saying that none of the resources which nature has given us in the way of transportation can be neglected, that every possible advantage of that kind should be improved. Nature has provided us with two outlets from the west, one by the St. Lawrence and the other by the Ottawa river. Both of them are needed to carry on the enormous development which must take place in the west.

My excuse for venturing to mention this subject on the present occasion is the fact that it has always been closely allied with the development of our great deposits of iron ore in the north country. I know that as the matter stands we are dealing with something that seems to trench upon the sphere of the provincial authorities, and doubtless at no distant date the whole problem must engage the earnest attention of this House. I believe the carrying out of this gigantic enterprise by private capital under federal charter depends upon determining whether or not the surplus waters in navigable streams belong to the province in which the streams flow, and I trust that the government will tell us without delay what policy they intend to pursue in relation to this important principle.

Passing from a consideration of iron ore I desire to say a word or two on the copper situation. In view of the wonderful development that is taking place in northern Quebec I should like to put on Hansard certain extracts from the London Times Trade and Engineering Supplement which will be of particular significance. I am rather inclined to believe that it is the intention of the Copper Export Association of the United States to do to the rest of the world what they imagine Great Britain did in connection with rubber. Let me quote from the paper I have just mentioned, of April 24, 1926, the following:

> The perfecting of methods of ore treatment with a view to conserving the all too limited world supplies of metals and minerals is not merely an empire problem but one which concerns mankind as a whole. Our civilization is so dependent on the use of certain metals that too much thought cannot be devoted to the prevention of waste, both in extraction and utilization. The struggle for materials of this kind will be a fruitful source of international disputes within a century or two.

That covers pretty well my views in regard to the free trade proposals of hon. gentlemen touching machinery and one thing and another. I quote further:

> With the principal exceptions of copper and lead, the British Empire is particularly well provided with deposits of the industrially important metals, both precious and base. The deficiency in copper may be merely temporary; since recent discoveries in northern Rhodesia promise a large output from that region within the next decade.

The discoveries in northern Quebec in copper are unequalled by any that have heretofore been made in the civilized world. In this connection I should like to quote from the Wall Street Journal of May 5, 1926, an article under the heading:

> Copper Trade Outlook Increasingly Bright
> New Export Association Representing 90 per cent of World Production, Formed to Do Away With Unjust Competition.
> (Special From Boston News Bureau)

This association, so far as we can ascertain, is composed not only of the copper producers of the United States but of producers in South America, Europe, South Africa and various other countries excepting Japan which at present is standing aloof. The article says:

To prophesy better things for copper companies in general during the past two years has required an extraordinary degree of optimism. Copper shares have steadily fallen in public favour and only a few companies have made any dividend money. The rank and file have either lost money or did not make enough to compensate for the exhaustion of the ore assets. But really the outlook is far from hopeless. A new Copper Export Association, stronger and bigger than its predecessors, has been formed, and 90 per cent of the world's production is represented therein. This is the first time the so-called big producers have been able to sit around a table and agree to stop cutting each other's throats.

In only one year since 1920 have our refineries produced more copper than was shipped to foreign shores and to American manufacturers. That was in 1923, when refined output amounted 2,327,770,000 pounds against shipments of 2,314,786,000 pounds. In 1925, American refineries produced 2,704,618,000 pounds of copper a record for any war or peace period. And shipments exceeded this outpouring by about 127,000,000 pounds, bringing stocks down to 146,161,000 pounds of refined metal, the smallest since the war, and comparing with 641,474,000 pounds at the end of 1920. In 1920, in face of a huge surplus, the average price of electrolytic copper was 17.50 cents a pound. Last year it was 14¼ cents, with surplus down almost to vanishing point.

With the permission of the House I should like to put on Hansard the following table showing this statistical improvement with price trend in pounds:

——	Refined product	Shipments	End period	Average price
1st quarter 1926	692,620,000	688,372,000	150,412,000	14·00 cts.
1925	2,704,618,000	2,831,448,000	146,161,000	14·12 "
1924	2,600,664,000	2,639,568,000	272,868,000	13·02 "
1923	2,327,770,000	2,314,786,000	311,770,000	14·42 "
1922	1,577,658,000	1,814,810,000	298,786,000	13·56 "
1921	1,074,394,000	1,179,932,000	535,936,000	12·65 "
1920	1,670,759,000	1,731,406,000	641,474,000	17·50 "

This is more or less repetition, but I trust there will be no objection. The conclusion is that the consumption is still running ahead of the tremendous production, but because of cut-throat competition among copper producers their thousands of shareholders have been left profitless. On top of this I should like to quote from the editorial page of the New York Times of May 8, 1926, as follows:

Almost simultaneously the British Colonial Office announced a policy intended to raise the price of rubber, and the Copper Export Association was formed to raise the price of copper. While the objectives are similar the methods are different. Addressing the National Foreign Trade Council, Dr. Klein of the Department of Commerce said that "international commercial relations are endangered by price-fixing and other political intrusions in raw material exports, the costs of which are to be borne primarily by foreign consumers." Our copper export association is not at all political. It is a combination which our laws allow in foreign trade but forbid at home. Authorized under the Webb-Pomerene law, it aims to represent 90 per cent of the world production. To the extent that it takes the surplus off the domestic markets it is better able to raise home prices. Others may complain as well as Americans, but it is a common grievance. The copper combine does not ask foreign consumers to bear any part of our tax levies, and professes merely a desire to stabilize the price and keep it from falling below cost of production. Our constitution forbids an export tax. The British rubber export restriction raises prices of exports. This is a restriction of trade of which there is no example in our large exports of raw materials. Some of our laws lay us open to reproach for political intrusion in international commerce, but in the matter of raw materials we are more sinned against than sinning.

[Mr. O'Neill.]

This Copper Export Trading Company will be very comprehensive, including not only all the important producers and smelters of North and South America but those of Europe Africa and Australia as well. This brings us back to a consideration of our copper wealth. We do not seem to realize what has taken place in the northern part of Quebec. When you consider the holdings of South America, Spain, various parts of the United States and Australia, and realize that when they produce to their utmost, no matter how low copper goes, due to the wealth of our mines in northern Quebec we can continue to produce after they have been shut down. I would like to quote just one official statement regarding the Horne mine in the Noranda district:

A horizontal drill hole, No. 329, driven from the third level north of No. 1 shaft has cut eighteen feet of ore averaging $8 in gold and 27 per cent copper. The average gross value of this ore at 13-cent copper is $78.20 per ton.

If we are about to face a copper monopoly through the formation of an American export association I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is advisable for our Department of Trade and Commerce to realize the holdings we have in the northern part of Quebec, and get in touch with the men who have that monopoly. We should be protected within the empire and the department should see that a condition similar to that experienced in connection with rubber in the United States may not obtain in Canada with regard to copper.

I notice no mention in the budget of good roads. The section of the country from which I come would welcome very heartily any subvention or help in the form of good roads. I submit that the time has arrived when the great division between east and west should be bridged by an international highway, which should be constructed with federal assistance.

There are other considerations to which I should like to refer, and one in particular on which I touch with a certain amount of reluctance. But I take my cue from the principle enunciated in this House by the Prime Minister in the course of a recent address, when he stated that the formation of public opinion is often more important than definite legislation. In this connection I wish to make a few observations on one of the greatest problems of the day, the question of prohibition. I quote again from the New York Times of May 8, 1926. This article is written in the lighter vein, and while I am not inclined to touch on that angle, at the same time I appreciate the argument. The article is as follows:

Rustic John Barleycorn

According to the Year Book of the Department of Agriculture, bad times on the farm are to be ascribed partly to prohibition. Representative Black of New York, speaking by that book, proceeded on his own authority to place the annual loss in a single crop, the barley that no longer goes into beer, at $100,000,000. The loss in the matter of hops is "incalculable." Confronted by three farm relief bills which a floundering committee on agriculture has dumped together on a still more distracted House—bills which nobody wants, but which all Representatives confronted by farming constituencies feel obliged to take seriously—Representative Black says blandly, "Let good old beer do it"! The farmer would have prohibition. Sustained through the winter by frosty hard cider from the cellarage, soothed by elderberry wine and cherry bounce—

Not to mention our 27 per cent Niagara wine—

—he exercises his moral nature with indignation against the city man's crock of suds. And now, tardily, the effect of his crusading spirit is brought home to him. The barley crop alone once yielded him ten times as much in farm relief as the Aswell bill offers. And so, as Mr. Black urges, in the eyes of constructive statesmanship farm relief goes hand in hand with relief of urban gullets.

Here, surely, is new light on John Barleycorn. Through the ages he has been pictured as a rakish city chap, the affable familiar spirit that wets the workman's whistle and whets the politician's eloquence; that gives the last indispensable flavour to the clubman's midnight rarebit, and even flourishes in the midst of fine ladies where picnic luncheons are served. Now at last John Barleycorn emerges in his true character. He is a bearded grain. Last as first he belongs among the worthies of the farm. Spendthrift and rake? He is sown in sobriety and reaped in thrift. If for a time he is an erring and a prodigal son, he says with another repentant and home-coming rustic:

"Like him that wanders I return again;
Just to the time, not with the time exchanged,
So that myself bring water to my stain."

Banish John Barleycorn? Banish Whiskered Jack and banish all the world!

Such is the article. I wish to refer now, Sir, to prohibition particularly as it is in vogue in Ontario and in the great republic to our south. It may be looked upon as a malignant cancer destroying the very vitals of our civilization. Prohibition has defeated the very object it was designed to effect; it was supposed to elevate the moral tone of the nation, but in reality the opposite result has been accomplished. Beyond all doubt there is more liquor, of an injurious and damaging brand, consumed clandestinely to-day than was ever thought of in the days before the introduction of the present system, and unfortunately the evil effect is in evidence among a class in the community who formerly regarded an imbiber as a social pariah. In the psychological working out of prohibition it is considered a clever achievement to spier a drink under present conditions. Between the millstones of natural or inherited tendency on the one hand and the added thrilling inducements incident to prohibition, the younger generation is exposed to a moral degeneration, and is forming habits which will play havoc with society at a time when they must shoulder the responsibilities and duties of to-morrow.

Why delude ourselves on this great moral issue? Illustration is unnecessary, but to confirm our own personal observations let me refer to a conversation I overheard the other day between two travelling men, men of experience. When reference was made to the revolting effects of prohibition, one man remarked, "I have just placed an order for 275,000 pocket flasks at — " naming the town, "and in the immediate vicinity." On inquiry he was prepared to admit that the sale of these flasks was mostly to the younger set, which is an astounding fact. But the statement of the other man was even more so. He said, "I am a boiler inspector, and in making my rounds, I inspect the boilers in high schools and collegiates. On all sides the story is the same. The janitors complain of the youth of to-day in most shocking terms. They say their first duty in the morning is to go about the buildings to collect the six and eight ounce empties and the unmentionables strewn about on all sides."

Surely, Sir, the problem should be grappled with openly and courageously, and it is to be sincerely hoped that the country's morals will receive the same careful consideration as the material issues. Furthermore, the present system is debasing our medical profession and engendering a general disregard for law and authority. All head and no heart makes for sterile politics; compromise is essential. As has been well said:

> With something in them of the beast, and something of the god, mortal men can know little of unmixed emotions.

I trust that at our next provincial election our authorities will be brave enough to grapple with the situation regardless of considerations for their political future one way or the other.

There is one other suggestion I should like to make to the Minister of Finance. I have not an exhaustive knowledge and cannot say whether the scheme would be workable, but the suggestion has reached me from the north country that the metal cobalt might be used as a five-cent coinage by way of advertising a very picturesque and useful by-product for the purpose of familiarizing the public with this metal.

As to the reduction of postage, the postage was raised 50 per cent, and is now lowered only 33⅓ per cent. I might ask, what has become of the other 16⅔ per cent? In this connection I should like to refer to the underpaid staff of the Post Office department, particularly the baggagemen carrying the mail. I think too much credit should not be taken by the government for taxation reductions when these men are receiving such comparatively low pay.

It was not my intention to deal in prophetic censure of the present administration, Sir, but I must state on behalf of the great race that comes from the land where politics is the breath of life that it is a matter of supreme regret that perhaps for the first time in the history of this great Dominion no son of Erin adorns the treasury benches of Canada directly at the present time. This is felt keenly by every Irishman, especially in the province of Ontario, and the absence is interpreted as indicating that the Liberal party has lost the breed of noble blood. We all pay due respect to certain "dephlogisti-gated" Irishmen in the cabinet at the present, but at the same time we should like to see a real son of Erin adorning the treasury benches of this House. That there is not one is but another link in the catena of evidence which makes it possible to prophesy a grand victory for the old Tory party.

For the reasons I have given, Sir, I do not see how I can support the budget. I would recall again a quotation of the Great Chief "Le Grand Mort," who in his speech on the Address in 1911, stated:

> We are living under constitutional government, an elementary principle of which is that the men who form the administration must have a common policy.

Drawing the logical conclusion from that statement, I submit that I cannot support this hybrid offspring of an unnatural alliance. Before I sit down, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as this is the first occasion on which I have had the opportunity of offering a few remarks since your selection for the position which you adorn with so much dignity, may I offer you my congratulations on your elevation to your high office?

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): I feel, Mr. Speaker that it is my first duty to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Timiskaming-North (Mr. O'Neill) for the enjoyable piece of oratory we have just listened to. His address shall indeed prove a source of inspiration to future generations, as it is replete with such literary gems as they might wish to scatter through their speeches, and it will also convey to them valuable lessons in mathematics, specially in connection with the ground rules.

Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the subject matter of this debate, I must first, not only in my own behalf, but also in the name of the French-speaking members of this House, express my sincere admiration for the commendable stand taken by the hon. member for Toronto-Northeast (Mr. Baker) who, when addressing the House on the budget, on the 6th May last, spoke in French. It was all the more gratifying to us to hear that French voice from Toronto as we know that it is inspired by a feeling of sincerity and sympathy, and that it conveys to us the lofty ideals of union, peace and harmony that obtain between the two great races living side by side in this Dominion of ours. I take great pleasure in congratulating him specially for having, as so many others have done previously, urged the use of the two official languages in this country. In view of the fact that no better opportunity could arise under the circumstances, I wish to make a plea, in behalf of my own race, for the vested rights of the French language, not only in parliament, but in the country as a whole, and I would suggest that, when the government do restore the two cent rate of postage, provision be made also for the issue of a bilingual stamp.

The budget, as brought down by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whether it deals with the improvement of the economic conditions in the country, the readjustment of our financial standing, or any other matter of great national import, affords quite a diversified field of endeavour to any member wishing to take part in this debate. The population of Canada, I am sure, hailed with a feeling of hope and confidence those reductions which this government has been pleased to bring about in the income tax, the postage rate, and generally in the public expenditures of this country. The striking decrease in our national debt, the general reductions in the taxes which will be a relief to the overburdened taxpayers, the material progress shown in the management of our railways are, in my humble opinion, indicative of the ability and wisdom of those who are entrusted with the administration of public affairs, and also bear witness to their sense of duty and loyalty.

Hardly four years ago when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and his hon. colleagues were forced by the popular will to relinquish power, the Liberal government had to carry on through the most trying conditions it had ever experienced. Unemployment was rampant all over the country. Those who now discuss most bitterly this important problem of our national life were at that time occupying the treasury benches, while the right hon. leader of the opposition was Prime Minister. It was incumbent on those hon. gentlemen enlightened by a sincere and true patriotism, to make up for such inroads on the public funds for which a prodigal and antinational administration were responsible.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): On the 15th of April last the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), in the first of a series of speeches in criticism of the budget, attributed the ever-increasing prosperity of Canada to the magnificent effort of her people and to the liberality of Providence. With all due deference to the hon. member, I beg to state that under the administration of the right hon. leader of the opposition, and of his predecessor, we have been time and again blessed with the gifts of a bountiful Providence and with abundant crops, but the governments then in power did not know how to make the best, in the interest of the Canadian people, of the great opportunities offered by an incomparable nature and the liberality of a generous Providence. Throughout the country, in our immense western plains as in our rich and fertile eastern regions, when the products of the soil were reaching a promising maturity, when the first and best interests of Canada and her fondest hopes commanded our leaders to act with extreme prudence and to the best advantage of our country, yet too young to be sacrificed on the altar of an exaggerated and blind loyalty, by striking agriculture at its very heart they wrenched from the Canadian farmer his vitality, his strength and the vigorous arms necessary to gather the crop. What has been the result of that guilty enthusiasm? An overwhelming debt, taxation, the instigation of strikes and often misery and agony. So, on December 6, 1921, from one end of the country to the other, there was but one voice to condemn the costly policies of our predecessors. Then the Liberal government entered upon its work of economic restoration, of readjustment of our finances with the generous and sane support of the mandatories of the people. This is why, in a magnificent effort of energy and loyalty our leaders go on legislating for the common weal, with a sentiment of doing their duty and of acting in the public interest.

Allow me, now, Mr. Speaker, to express my views in regard to our tariff policy. I see that the government has cut down the duty on automobiles entering the country, leaving however to our national industry a protection of 20 to 27½ per cent. Especially in the course of the last decade the automobile industry has given our commerce a tremendous impetus and it is to be counted among the great factors of progress. Even agriculture finds it most advantageous. A touring car had been considered for a long time as a luxury reserved exclusively to people of means. With a true humanitarian outlook our leaders realized that those who toil, work and suffer during long hours of a protracted labour have a right to a share of the rest, of the well-earned relaxation, and of the happiness enjoyed by the rich and the powerful. I believe that will, more than anything else be to their credit.

In a country like ours, with such diversified interests, with aspirations often incompatible, the tariff must not sacrifice the interests of one class towards benefiting another, nor injure the rights of anyone. That is why the Liberal government is an enemy to all monopolies and condemns those who impose upon the people. Besides, what did we see under the system of high protection favoured by our predecessors? Our imports were very much in excess of our exports and the balance of trade was turning more and more against us from day to day. My hon. friend the former minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), who is now laughing, is well aware of the fact. Speaking on behalf of the government the minister of Finance recently announced to the delight of all the Canadian people that our domestic and foreign trade was making considerable strides, giving Canada a favourable balance of trade of over four hundred million dollars. Are we not entitled to take some pride in our country when it so readily comes out victorious of the nearly insurmountable difficulties which beset it through the inefficiency of a prodigal and incompetent administration? That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am loath to accept the views of certain large interests and contributors to the electoral funds of hon. gentlemen opposite, who apparently are very much put out by the cutting down of the tariff duties on automobiles. On the contrary, the price of the cars being much lower and within the reach of almost everybody, there will be, as a consequence, an increased demand. Therefore, instead of hampering that industry the government are expanding it and giving it a new impulse. I shall go further and, according to the principle that I laid down a moment ago, that the automobile had become a prime necessity, I do not hesitate to say that it would be unfair, in order to give one industry an exaggerated protection, to deprive the farming and other Canadian industries of the valuable opportunity to progress and to reach their goal. But should the buying of a car affect the welfare of the poorer class by making them the victim of an exaggerated luxury, I should at once disapprove of the expenditure that the fondness for the automobile involves.

Did hon. members opposite, absorbed as they are in the earnestness of their policy of protection, ever think for one moment of the interests and the unquestionable rights of the consumer? Do they forget that an increase of the tariff means more taxation for the people? Do they forget that the Canadian producer is continually requesting the government to find new markets for his products and that the one truly national tariff policy is that which is beneficial to all and hurts nobody. That is what this government had in mind when it established new business connections with European countries. After all, is it not the way of founding the public administration on the principles of sound political economy? Therefore I am glad to pay this compliment to the present members of our government that owing to their sane and enlightened administration Canada is recovering from the crisis that followed the war better than any other country in the world.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

The present budget evidences a state of welfare akin to prosperity and none are more jealous of it than our opponents. Let me tell them very sincerely that pertinacity, economy, wisdom and efficiency, in conjunction with the so valuable and so varied natural resources of this country, can solve all difficulties, even to paying off the enormous indebtedness that they forced upon us.

I also notice with pleasure quite a substantial reduction in the postal rates. That reduction relieves all classes of the community: manufacturers, business men, farmers, professional and labour men and will give a new impulse to every line of commercial activity.

The repeal of the receipt tax will be received by the people with a good deal of satisfaction, for apart from the inconvenience inseparable from all taxation, that was the cause of numerous misunderstandings and much trouble.

Realizing that the small wage earners and those who have not the advantage of being wealthy are entitled to as much aid and fair play as possible, this government thought proper to make some alterations in the income tax act. It is a striking contrast as between the present administration who are not sparing of care for those who need it the most, and the former Tory government whose protection seemed to be applied only to people favored with a fat purse. In support of this statement I need but point out the income tax exemptions granted by the conservative government to Victory bond subscribers.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding these few remarks, let me take up in this House a statement made recently by the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) at Montreal, being the repetition of the ever recurring wail of an opposition thankering for power. "Where is the government," said he before the so-called Liberal-Conservative association of that city. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that the government is anywhere but in the majority of the representatives of the people and only partisans lured by the desire of power can deny it. Does the hon. member forget that the people of this country have eloquently ratified the decision taken by our leaders to summon parliament and to rule with the majority of its members? Does he forget that the government have won victory after victory in all the by-elections since held and have splendidly increased the majorities received by their supporters in the general election of October 29 last? When hon. members wrongly assert that there is no legislation before the House, I wonder whether they are not suffering from the same delusion that blinded them at the opening of the session. But in spite of the erroneous statements spread about by their opponents, the Liberal administration are pursuing their work of economic reconstruction, always progressing in the path of prosperity and carrying out very well the task with which they were entrusted by the people of this country.

Mr. RAYMOND MORAND (East Essex) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed, at the outset of my remarks, to offer my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) for the splendid address he has just delivered. His speech was carefully worded. I realize that, in order to support a Liberal budget, a careful preparation is essential to any one coming from the old Conservative province of Quebec.

Mr. PERRAS (Translation): Where did the hon. member gather such a notion?

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him on what grounds he makes this statement that the province of Quebec is Conservative?

Mr. MORAND (Translation): Judging from their ways as a whole.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Except their way of voting.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Would my hon. friend tell us what are the ways he has in mind.

Mr. MORAND (Translation): I except their way of voting.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to take up very much of the time of the House with the comments I wish to offer on the budget.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Speak French.

Mr. MORAND (Translation): I would be delighted indeed to deliver my address in French but it having been drafted in the English language, I shall use the latter.

The present budget has been hailed as the poor man's budget. It has frequently been characterized as such by hon. gentlemen opposite. But my idea of a poor man is not he who lacks by $20 or $50 the amount necessary to purchase an automobile, or he who, with a family, is going to escape paying income tax although he earns from $2,000 upwards. That is not the type of poor man I have been accustomed to meeting. I have spent my lifetime in the practice of medicine among the workingmen of an industrial city, and I can assure the House that when we speak of poor men the class I mentioned a moment ago do not come within that category. However, there has been a reduction in the income tax, a welcome reduction, a reduction that everyone I am quite sure is pleased to see. But that reduction would have been still more welcome had it been a reduction in the true sense of the word, and not a transfer from one class of taxpayers to the other. The reduction would also have been more welcome had it been due to the exercise of real economy on the part of the government. Had the government, through their mouth-piece, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) declared that they had so reduced the expenditures of the country that they were prepared to lower taxation, that would have been a reduction in the real sense of the term. But the government merely proclaimed that they had collected more taxes than were needed, and were therefore in a position to reduce taxation.

What are the facts when it comes to the practise of economy by the government? May I illustrate, by reading from a page of the Auditor General's report, how the government practises the economy which, properly carried out, would enable the taxation to be reduced? The figures I am about to quote may be of special interest to some of my compatriots in the province of Quebec who very often accuse the Conservative party of being too imperialistic, and of being willing to go to any extreme in carrying out imperial ideas. The quotation I am going to make from the report of the Auditor General has to do with the purchase of the Union Club property in London, England, the headquarters of the Canadian High Commissioner, and the items with which it deals are as follows:

Purchase price of Union Club property, £225,000 (£100 paid in 1923-24); stamp duty on assignment, £2,250; land registration fee, £225..	$1,008,950 08
Ground rent: adjustment to July 10, rent and tax, $5,570.93, rent, 6 m. to January 10, 1925, $4,866.67..	10,437 60
Valuation of leasehold, Knight, Frank & Rutley..	511 00
Alterations and additions to building, Trollope & Colls, Limited, on account contract..	233,600 00
Architect, Septimus Warwick: on account services re contract, $24,333.33; services re furnishings, $2,409..	26,742 33
Clerk of works, F. J. Pitts, services, 40 weeks..	1,946 67
Furnishings purchased in England: Spink & Co., 2 bookcases, $1,887.16. 5 chandeliers, $1,788.50, 2 chairs, $171.67; Vigo Art Galleries, Agra carpet, $1,102.18; Waring & Gillow, 12 pr. curtains, $2,044, 4 chairs, $584, settee, $279.84; small accounts satinwood table, $803, walnut table, $187.80, 2 chairs, $184.93, pair corner cabinets, $180.07, 19 fenders, $155.73, sundry, $255.75..	9,624 63

Furniture purchased in Canada on account: F. E. Coombe Co., $1,500; Krug Furn. Co., $800; Andrew Malcolm Co., $2,200; Mitchell & McGill, $1,300; Office Specialty Mfg Co., $4,000..	9,800 00
General expenses: insurance, $197.20; temporary quarters for caretaker, $146; electricity and gas, $110.96; water rates, to June, 1924, $300.83; small items, $54.58..	809 57
Total..	$1,302,421 88

The other day the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) read parts of an editorial in the Border Cities Star, which he said lauded the present budget, and he contended that it showed that the budget must be proper because this paper was published in the automobile centre. He is an old politician; he read that part which served his purpose and left out the rest of it. In order that it may be complete I will read the rest of it. It says:

From the policy point of view, the reduction of automobile tariffs is most drastic. This reduction hits all makes. On cars up to $1,200 in value, the duty is cut to 20 per cent. Over that, the duty is cut to 27½ per cent. There is a drawback of 25 per cent., which, auto manufacturers claims, will not help the industry to any great extent.

Aside from political interests, the auto tariff reduction is a strange reversal of the policy announced in the Speech from the Throne. That announcement was that a tariff board would be formed to which tariff matters would be referred for advice regarding changes. The tariff board has been named, and is ready to function. Yet without the slightest reference to it, and in face of the strongest protests from automobile manufacturers themselves, the tariff has been almost halved.

The action may have a serious effect on the work of the tariff board. People will gain the idea that formation of the tariff advisory body is merely a gesture, that it is designed to function where convenient and to be ignored where otherwise. For the sake of appearances, it for nothing else, it would have been good business to delay action for a year until the needs of the industry were investigated. But Mr. King was between the devil and the deep blue sea, apparently. No tariff reduction, no support from the Progressives, and consequently no government. That was about the situation. It has been met by the simple method of yielding to political expediency.

The Minister of Finance in presenting the budget said there was a sentiment in the country which demanded a reduction in the automobile duties. I wonder where he gets the idea that that sentiment exists. A year ago there was a vote in this House on an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), the present member for that constituency, which was defeated in this House. This year the same amendment was presented, and by a very nice move from the Liberal ranks a vote was prevented from being taken. Yet the minister seems to have sensed the feeling of the country that it was time for a reduction. I maintain that the people were not interested whether there was a tariff or no tariff placed on automobiles. They were interested in getting the automobiles at a lower price, and it was the duty of this government to see that the price of automobiles was reduced, always with the idea in view of maintaining and continuing that industry in Canada. In speaking to the motion of the hon. member for Macleod, all that I and the other members on this side asked was that this matter be referred to the tariff board to study its many ramifications and to make the necessary adjustments to lower the price of the automobiles and to maintain our industry. I venture to say right now that the Minister of Finance wishes he had taken that course; because had he done so he would have a great deal less trouble on his hands than he has at the present time.

The most unfortunate part of the action taken in this respect—taken, I may say, after the most definite statement in the Speech from the Throne that nothing of the kind would be done without proper investigation, and after all the speeches made in the campaign previous to the election—places our industries in a position where they will be fearful of future commitments, and causes our capitalists to be afraid to make investments to develop Canada American capital has been coming over here; in the city of Windsor and in the border cities American capital is being invested constantly We look forward to the investment of much more, but with the constant tinkering and cutting of the tariff without warning year after year we cannot expect them to come to our country and make investments. Fortunately our city is growing and will continue to grow. It will grow on the overflow of people coming to Detroit that the policy of the Liberal party sends from other parts of Canada.

We see some strange anomalies in the policy of this government when it attempts to deal with the tariff. When the duty was reduced upon certain articles which France shipped or sent to Canada, we asked for something from France in return. We negotiated a treaty. The matter was discussed on the floor of the House and the treaty was passed; we got something in return. We did the same thing with our sister colony of Australia. When we reduced the duty on articles coming from Australia we got something in return for it. We reduced the duty on sugar coming from the West Indies, and we got something in return for that. But when we reduce the duty on things coming from the United States we give it to them as a pure gift, and get nothing for it. If the Finance minister were sure of his ground; if he were convinced that this industry could stand a cut in the tariff, he might have negotiated with the United States and got something in return. He might have prevented the United States from raising their duty on butter a short time ago. He might have opened a market through the high tariff wall of the United States for some of the farmers' goods that we could ship over there. But no; year after year we in Canada, in our magnanimous kindness, give all these things to the United States and say to them, "We do not want anything in return." What is the power, what is the impatience that insists on our opening our markets to the United States and asking nothing in return? Is there a well organized determination to prevent Canada from developing industrially? Is it the idea that we shall make Canada nothing but a farming country? Are we not to have industry in this country for those who do not desire to use the farm as a means of livelihood? Will it be necessary for our people to leave Canada to find employment somewhere else than in farming?

The duty on automobiles was 35 per cent. What will be next year's cut if this government remains in power? What other industries will be injured? I am going to read a list of the industries which have protection equal to that of the automobile, and I would like the government to give us an idea which of these industries will be hit next. They are as follows:

Article	Tariff Per cent
Boots and shoes	30
Clothing—ladies'	35
Clothing—mens'	25
Locomotives	35
Cotton cloth	25 to 32½
Hosiery and knit goods	35
Tools	30
Shipbuilding	25
Furniture	30 to 35
Pianos and organs (free parts)	30
Silk goods	37½
Gloves and mitts	35

Most of these articles are manufactured not in Ontario but in Quebec, and I would suggest to my compatriots from that province, now that they have lost control of their party, now that their party has passed into the hands of the western group, they can expect little mercy from them. The rest of those things which are manufactured in Quebec will quite likely be the next ones to fall by the wayside.

A few minutes ago there was a good deal of discussion in regard to statements made by Mr. Ford as to the value of free trade and I wish to make just one or two remarks concerning this. First of all, on September 5, 1915, Henry Ford stated in the Detroit Journal that he would build a tractor plant in Canada which would employ 10,000 men; that he had bought 50 acres of land for that purpose and that he was ready to build the plant. The duty was eventually removed from tractors; Mr. Ford still has the 50 acres of land; but the tractors are made in the United States, shipped into Canada, and we have not the 10,000 employees. The same thing would have happened had we no duty on Ford cars. We would have no plant in Ford city in Canada; the cars would be shipped from the parent plant in Detroit.

The original duty on cars was 20 per cent, and in the earlier years of the Ford plant at Ford, when Mr. Ford was a director, through pressure brought to bear upon the then Liberal government by the Hon. R. F. Sutherland, the duty was raised from 20 per cent to 35 per cent. That was at the demand of the directors of the Ford plant, before Mr. Ford had become so wealthy and so full of high ideals and while he was still thinking of the practical things of life.

I do not propose to take up any more of the time of the House; I have spoken already too often for a new member. I hope sincerely that the Minister of Finance will reconsider his budget resolutions; that he will take seriously into consideration those men and women who are depending upon that industry for their livelihood, those men who have bought homes and started to pay for them, those men who have decided upon certain cities as their places of residence; that he will so arrange this matter that we shall continue to have the industry and to keep these towns prosperous, and that we shall forget many of the free trade speeches made by a certain wing of the party, speeches which if carried to their logical conclusion will turn this country into nothing but pastoral land.

On motion of Mr. Maclean (York) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Wednesday, May 12, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West) presented the third report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

He said: I move that in accordance with the recommendations contained in the third report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills the fee and charges paid on Bill No. 11, to incorporate the President of the Lethbridge Stake be refunded less the cost of printing and translation.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES—CHANGES IN MEMBERSHIP

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the name of Miss Macphail be substituted for that of Mr. Fansher on the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, and that the name of Mr. Fansher be substituted for that of Miss Macphail on the select standing committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved that the name of Mr. Cantley be substituted for that of Mr. Nicholson on the special committee appointed to consider the present sources of supply in anthracite and bituminous coal, and other matters in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENDITURE ON IMMIGRATION

Mr. DOUCET:

1. How much money was spent on immigration: (a) from the British Isles; (b) from the United States; (c) from the continent of Europe during each fiscal year from 1920-21 to 1925-26?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

	(a) Great Britain	(b) United States	(c) Continent of Europe
1920-21	$423,562.92	$456,870.41

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD—STATUS OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. LADNER:

1. Are employees of the Soldier Settlement Board classed as temporary employees?

2. Are temporary employees of even five years and more standing deprived of the annual increases which permanent employees receive?

3. Are temporary employees ineligible under the Superannuation Act?

4. In view of the work presently handled by the Soldier Settlement Board and the work which will likely be placed on said board in the revaluation of soldier lands, is it the intention of the government to reduce the staffs of said board?

5. Is the government aware that practically all members of the staff of the said board at Vancouver are returned soldiers and married men, have had six years' service or more and are still temporary employees?

6. Is it the intention of the government to place the said employees in the permanent civil service, especially in view of Privy Council orders 2958 and 3560, giving authority for same?

7. In view of the probable amendments to the Civil Service Act, 1918, is it the intention of the government to place the employees of the Soldier Settlement Board on the same footing as those who have been appointed under the said Act?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. There are twelve permanent employees. The balance of the staff numbering 482 is by order in council exempt from the provisions of the Civil Service Act and in so far as it is thus exempt it is regarded as temporary staff.

2. Only permanent employees appointed under the Civil Service Act and classified by the Civil Service Commission are eligible for statutory annual increases.

3. Yes.

4. No.

5. Yes.

6. Under consideration.

7. Under consideration.

MR. J. C. BLANCHET

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Was Mr. J. C. Blanchet postmaster of Chartierville, Compton county?

2. If so, when was he so appointed, on whose recommendation, and, what is the salary paid said post office?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (for Mr. Lapointe):

1. Yes.

2. 1st May, 1905, on recomendation of the member for the constituency. Present salary and allownaces, $310.89.

TAR SAND AREA OF ALBERTA—DRILLING OPERATIONS

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton):

1. Did the government do any drilling in the tar sand area of Alberta during the last year, and if so, where was the well located, and what was the depth reached, and what was the object in drilling the well?

2. Is it the intention of the government to carry on operations on said well during the present year, and if so, when are these operations to start?

3. Are the drilling rig and tools used in this work owned by the government, and if not, by whom are they owned?

4. What is the amount of money expended on this work up to date, and under whose instructions is the work carried on?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. Yes. Two test holes were drilled on river lot 13, McMurray settlement, township 89, range 9, west of 4th meridian, to a depth of 83 feet and 237 feet respectively, in order to obtain samples of the underlying strata containing unoxidized bitumens and oils.

2. No, but it is planned to take samples from other localities in the same district.

3. The drilling rig used last year was loaned, without charge, by the Northern Alberta Exploration Company. The tools used were the property of the government.

4. Direct charges for wages, board, and transportation amounted to $2,418. These operations were carried out under instructions of the Director of the Mines branch issued under departmental authority.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

INDIAN AGENT AT CARDSTON

Mr. DAVIS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the department and any persons whomsoever, with regard to the suspension of Indian Agent Faunt of the Blood Indian reserve at Cardston. Also a copy of the report sent to the department by Inspector Christensen of Regina in this connection.

Hon. Mr. STEWART: As this matter is now under investigation I would not be prepared to bring down all the papers. I can furnish all the correspondence except such letters as may prove to be a reflection on the integrity of the agent. I do not care to do that at the moment. I will ask my hon. friend either to allow me to bring down such papers as will not affect the investigation that is going on, or permit the motion to stand until the investigation is completed which I hope it will be in a short time.

Mr. DAVIS: I do not object to letting the matter stand provided the correspondence in connection with the matter will be brought down within a reasonable period of time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion stands.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

IMMIGRANTS AFFLICTED WITH LEPROSY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): I am informed, and a rumour is current to the effect, that all persons afflicted with leprosy who seek admission to Canada as immigrants are to be concentrated at Grosse Ile, near the city of Quebec. I should like to know from the government whether there is any truth in the report.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Health): I may say that certain negotiations have taken place between officials of the federal Department of Health and the provinces, but no decision has been arrived at.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: May I ask whether these negotiations have to do with the importation of lepers?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend expect an answer to that question?

IMPORTATION OF PLANTS AND BULBS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I intimated to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that I should like to ask him a question to-day. Perhaps I might preface the question by saying that my attention has been called to the matter by a gentleman to the delay in importing bulbs and plants, and my question is, whether some arrangement can be made whereby those who live in western parts of Canada, and who are importing bulbs or plants from the United States, may not be delayed so long in getting them through the customs. They have to write to the department at Ottawa; then a questionnaire is sent to them; they have to send that back, and in due course of time the order comes to enable them to get the plants or flowers out of the customs, and by that time the life of these plants is somewhat impaired and their usefulness is gone. I think that sort of bureaucracy might be avoided by giving some local official the power to permit these plants or flowers to be passed through the customs, without having the insect specialist at Ottawa pass upon the question of their admission to Canada. These plants are perhaps some two thousand miles away from Ottawa. If the minister can remedy that state of affairs, he will confer a gerat favour upon the public.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I received notice of this question a moment or two ago. A memorandum has been placed in my hands by one of my entomological officials. I might inform my hon. friend that the gentleman who made the complaint neglected to apply for a permit to import these plants, and that just as soon as we heard of the case we telegraphed for a permit to be issued, which enabled him to get them out of the customs. I think an arrangement has recently been made that a request may be sent to Ottawa by telegram, and the reply can be sent by telegram. If we can discover some quicker way of doing it than the present method we will be glad to adopt it. I think every civilized country has regulations of this nature in regard to the importation of flowers and bulbs, because of the prevalence of disease in the plants which disease might be transmitted through this medium, and we have to employ men to facilitate this work. It might be delegated to some one in the locality, but that method is always associated with supervision in order to see that it is properly done. The matter has become important. There are embargoes on plants coming into Canada and also on plants going out of Canada to other countries. Not only is it necessary that they should get a permit to import, but they must get a permit from the exporting country, which shows the importance which all countries attach to the necessity of taking precautions to prevent diseases coming in. This is done as expeditiously as possible, and if there had been an application for a permit in the case referred to there would have been no delay.

Mr. BENNETT: In regard to the merits of the legislation there can be no question, but in the administration of the act I think it is desirable that, in dealing with local conditions two thousand miles or more from Ottawa, officials should be appointed in the district. The difficulty lies in the fact that there is not simply one case but there are several. If notice were given to the public that no bulbs or plants would be allowed in the country without a permit and also a certificate from the country of export, it would facilitate matters. There are several cases of this kind. The brother of the man to whom I referred sent him a root from Minneapolis and it was lying in the customs five or six days before permission was obtained for its release.

STRIKE IN GREAT BRITAIN—P. M. DRAPER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the Prime Minister inform me whether P. M. Draper, who is collecting funds for the strikers in Great Britain, is in the employ of the government, and if so whether he is collecting funds with the knowledge and approval of the government?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have not any officifa knowledge of the matter to which my hon friend refers. I cannot say whether any Mr Draper is or is not collecting funds. I have seen some press reports to the effect that the Dominion Trades and Labour Congress, of which Mr. P. M. Draper is the secretary, was doing something of the kind. All I can say is that the Trades and Labour Congress are managing their own affairs, and the government is not interfering with them in any particular. The Mr. Draper, who is, I understand, secretary of the Trades and Labour Congress, is an employee of the government, and has been so for a great number of years; his position is the same to-day as it has always been in that regard.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has the minister no control over the employees of this government?

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): A great many hon. members belonging to the Conservative party have claimed to represent labour. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would use his good offices to try and induce these members to go out and assist Mr. Draper to collect funds for the strikers.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): In view of the question which has been raised and the report in the press that the general strike in Great Britain has been settled, I wish to ask whether one Tom Moore, who is president of the Trades and Labour Congress, is in any way connected with the government service or any government commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is aware that Mr. Moore is one of the directors of the National Railways which is indirectly a government organization. I am not aware of his holding any other position in what could be described as the government service.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I should like to call the Prime Minister's attention to a report in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday, in which the Attorney General of Australia is reported to have said that the strike in Great Britain was not merely a question of wages and hours of work for the miners, but that the whole position was transformed by the threat of a general strike, that the carrying out of the strike was a challenge to the government and that the British government had intimated that it was a challenge to constitutional government. Could the Prime Minster tell me whether these people serving on commissions and in the service of this government have a license to act as they see fit in a matter of this kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In reference to the strike situation in Great Britain, matters will best be helped along by allowing the government and the members of parliament in Great Britain to deal with them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I, for one, do not propose to aggravate the situation by being drawn into any contentious argument on the subject.

TARIFF ADVISORY BOARD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): A statement appeared in the Montreal Star of yesterday to the effect that Mr. L. D. Currie, speaking as a representative of the government in Sydney a few days ago, made the statement that a sitting of the Tariff Advisory Board would be held there shortly and it would almost certainly be followed by the granting of adequate protection to the steel industry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is the first intimation I have had that this gentleman was a representative of this government. The representatives of this government are in this House, and I am not aware of any others authorized to speak on behalf of the government.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not many from Nova Scotia.

Mr. CAMPBELL: He is reported in the despatch as speaking as a representative of the King government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend need not take too seriously any despatches from the source to which he has just referred. I am not aware of any authority for the statement alleged.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps the minister could tell us whether the gentleman who has been referred to as a government representative is prospective candidate for the constituency and was the defeated candidate in the last election.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is the same gentleman who was a candidate in the last election, I think he would make an excellent candidate in the next one.

[Mr. D. M. Sutherland.]

DUMPING DUTY—AUSTRALIAN BUTTER AND FRUIT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRED DAVIS (East Calgary): In the absence of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) I would like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to this message received from the west:

> Customs are demanding payment of the dumping clause duty on all butter received from Australia since January 1, 1926. This will mean a loss of about $70,000 to the trade, and is unfair, as all butter received from Australia up to May 5, was released from customs on the basis of one per cent per pound duty, and sold to the trade on this basis. Try and have this order changed.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I believe the Minister of Customs dealt with this matter yesterday. I do not recollect the reply made, but my hon. friend will find it on Hansard.

Mr. DAVIS: The reply made was that the dumping duty on butter would apply only to butter shipped from Australia after the 1st of January, but according to this telegram the duty has been collected on butter that arrived in Canada after the 1st of January.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Customs is a pretty busy man these days, but I will draw his attention to the remarks of my hon. friend.

RESTRICTED T.B. AREA IN FRASER VALLEY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question in regard to the creation of a restricted tuberculosis area in the Fraser valley. Many of the smaller dairymen have suffered considerably, a number of them losing from twenty-five to seventy-five per cent of their herds, and they are complaining bitterly of not receiving compensation which would enable them to replace a number of the animals lost. When may they expect to receive this compensation? This restricted area has been completed and after something over two months many of these men have not yet received compensation.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): These compensation accounts are usually paid within thirty or thirty-five days depending on the expedition with which the reports are sent in. When the accounts go through the usual office routine they are paid immediately. I think payment would take place within about thirty days from the time the inspection was completed.

Mr. BARBER: Many of these animals were tested when the veterinary surgeons first began to test the herds in this district. A number of these men in my district have not yet received compensation although the testing began two months ago.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The officers are scarcely through with their work yet; they may be through about the middle of the month. The accounts would have to go through the usual routine.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 11, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Mr. Mackenzie King) presumably much improved, and probably he will he here to speak for himself before the vote is taken. I would also like to pay a compliment to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) upon the manner of his presentation of the budget. I do not quite know where he got it, but he has the parliamentary manner and he has the further gift that he does not say too much. Indeed, perhaps he does not say quite enough. He is not a broadcaster. He is a pill maker, but he does not sugar-coat his medicines. He has handled his case very well. Outside of that I have no other compliments to pay him. I must vote for the amendment and not for the motion that we go into committee of Ways and Means, and I do so for a very simple reason. I have always been a protectionist; I believe in the principle of protection for this country. My father was always of the same way of thinking, and while that may not be a very good reason, it is applicable to present conditions.

The question raised by the budget is whether protection is to be continued in this country or not. At the very time that this motion comes up, the United States, the greatest and richest country in the world today—it is indeed the banker of the world—is celebrating the great success which it has attained due to the adoption of the principle of protection sixty odd years ago. Some sixty years ago Abraham Lincoln delivered his Gettysburg speech. He said that fourscore years before they had created a new nation on this continent; that they had achieved their independence and had accomplished over fourscore years of development as a nation. They were there assembled at Gettysburg to say that they had succeeded in abolishing slavery in the United States and that they had brought about the result that all men in the United States were free.

The United States then began that great period of its development which has continued until the present. Under the principle of protection which Abraham Lincoln began to preach and which Horace Greely advocated as a newspaper man, that country has grown and grown until, as I have said, it is the greatest country in the world. It has attained that position through protection and nothing but protection. Our country borders on the United States, and as they have become a great nation we should study how they became great. For sixty or seventy years after the Civil war the people of the United States devoted their main attention to industrial development and they have achieved results in that regard which surprise the rest of the world. They have introduced a new feature in industrial progress, that is, they have intensive development; under protection they produce more manufactured goods and sell them for less money than any other country in the world. In addition to this they have gradually done two things: they have increased the output of the individual and they have increased the pay of the man who works. To-day not only is the United States the greatest producing country in the world, but it has the most highly intensified organization of its industries and it pays its men in those industries the highest wages in the world. For that reason the United States more than any other country is not only great in population but is attracting settlers from other parts of the world. So many people want to come to the United States because of its industrial development, great production and high wages, that they have had to establish a quota in order to keep people out; they allow only a certain number of immigrants to enter each year. In spite of all that the United States has grown, as I have said.

On the other hand we in Canada, although we have before us that example of the result of the encouragement and development of industry, take a somewhat different view, and I want to explain why this change has taken place. When parliament met three or four months ago the government found themselves in a quandary. They could not depend upon their survival from day to day, and then we began to hear rumours of private conversations and interviews between them and the Progressives, followed by news of negotiations and later on of commitments on the part of the government. As a result of those commitments, whatever they were, the government found themselves under the necessity of violating what the amendment declares to have been a pledge given to the people of the country that there would be no changes in the tariff before the manufacturers and the employees affected were given an opportunity of stating their case. It is because of that violation, or alleged violation, of the promise made by the government, that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has submitted his amendment regretting the conduct of the government in this respect, and inasmuch as I believe that the government have broken faith with the people I am going to vote for that amendment.

With so vast a country adjoining us we cannot do anything else than adopt such policies as our neighbours put into force, and the more we see of the consequences of their policies, the more we appreciate the necessity for following suit. It seems to me that the government at this stage should let the public know definitely whether it is their intention to foster native industries with a view to retaining our own workmen and providing employment for our Canadian people, or whether, on the other hand, the intention is to abandon that policy and to give up our own markets. The government have suddenly introduced this change in the tariff, particularly in respect of automobiles, and they have done so at the instigation of the Progressives. Now, I do not think that the Progressives did anything wrong; they had a right to barter, as all parties have. We must recognize the fact that we have three, or rather four, parties in the House of Commons to-day, and we cannot condemn any of those parties for negotiating among themselves, holding conventions, and making commitments. Nor can anyone quarrel with the fact that we have three or four parties; they are with us and that is all there is to it. Indeed, we are entitled to have them. But what we do say is that if the government came to the conclusion that they were obliged to put this policy into effect they should have so informed parliament. They should have said that a change of programme was necessary and that they desired to be given a chance to put the measure through. But they interfered with the tariff without any notification to parliament. My one charge, therefore, is that the government did not honour the pledge they gave parliament and the country, a pledge given not only in their campaign speeches but also in the Speech from the Throne.

In my constituency there are two factories which will be affected by this tariff change, one at Danforth and the other at Leaside. I am in touch with the employees of these factories and they have protested against the action of the government in not allowing them to explain matters. They sent delegates to present their case, but the government have insisted upon the reduction. The result is that the manufacturers are now in a state of uncertainty, while the employees are very much afraid of losing their jobs. It is true that Mr. Ford has said that he will carry on his factory at Danforth. I believe he will, and I believe the Durant factory at Leaside will carry on. Certainly I hope that all those who are engaged in the industry, not only at Windsor and at Oshawa but elsewhere, will do their best to keep going. I trust they will carry on and will succeed under the altered conditions. What has hurt the industry somewhat is the suspicion which has prevailed in the country that undue profits were being made, but however this may be I hope the government will make such concessions as will enable the industry to carry on.

Another important question before the House at the moment is the enormous burden of taxation which the Canadian people have at present to carry. The people are asking themselves, "How much longer can we stand this awful taxation which we are now obliged to pay?" I am going to suggest on this occasion, as I have suggested before, a means of relieving the country of this burden. The solution for the problem is to be found, I think, in a proper railway policy. We have been altogether overrailroaded for many years now, having had two great transcontinental systems, the Canadian National Railways, owned by the people, and the Canadian Pacific, the property of a private corporation. No matter what may have been the legislation by which this condition came about, the plain fact is that it exists, and it is costing the country over $300,000,000 a year to maintain this wholly unnecessary duplication of service. Can we not do something to simplify the railway situation in Canada, to eliminate this costly overlapping, and, at the same time, to give to the people an efficient and less expensive service? Well, I have suggested the remedy before, and I am going to suggest it again. The first thing for us to do is to ascertain whether we cannot consolidate the two railways. I am sure that the consolidation of the Canadian Pacific with the Canadian National Railways would result in an enormous saving to the country, while it would make for a more satisfactory service. To-day we have not only duplicate trains but duplicate head offices and management, and duplicate headquarters staffs, most of this due to the struggle for business between these rival concerns. We have also a duplicate express system and a duplicate telegraph service involving the upkeep of cables and one thing and another, all of which is costing the country a vast sum of money. The demand of the country to-day is that this unjustifiable duplication shall cease.

It may be said that the two systems are necessary. Indeed, I understand that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) since coming into office has intimated that in his opinion the Canadian Pacific Railway should continue to operate independently and supply opposition. I think he is entirely wrong. There should be a consolidation of the two roads and the Canadian Pacific Railway should be merged into the Canadian National system. If that were done I believe that one headquarters staff in Montreal, reduced 50 per cent, could administer the two railways much better than they are now being managed by two independent staffs. It is absurd that we should allow this mad race to go on between two rival railway systems operating over the same territory on their main lines, while not more than one-tenth of the accommodation they have to offer can be taken advantage of. Most of all, if we had consolidation we would have a rerouting; that would mean new and improved services for the branch lines and the main lines, and no one can imagine how great an improvement there would be in that respect. We would have a much better system. We could take the best bridges, the best grades, the best approaches to the cities and towns, and work them into the reorganization, and in that way not only would we get a much better service on the main and branch lines, but the economies we would effect would amount to over $300,000,000 a year. But still this waste goes on. Every day you see this rivalry between the two head offices in Montreal, and in addition, each maintains a big propaganda organization; each has men out every day canvassing for business, at enormous cost, and the public have to pay the piper. Now that has got to change, and I believe the disposition of the country to-day is to effect a change, to improve the service, and to save a lot of money.

Not only would there be an improvement through rerouting. Traffic in Canada to-day is carried not only by rail but by water and on the highways, and some day soon you will have to deal with carriage by the airways. As a consequence, you cannot deal with transportation effectively unless you combine all these various services in one system of transportation instead of two, and that one consolidated system should be charged with the maintenance of traffic by rail, the maintenance of traffic by water, and the maintenance of traffic by the highways. I do not believe the two great railway systems can maintain themselves if they have to fight the very severe competition by water, which is growing every day. Some day, when we build the Welland canal to its proper depth—or we may build an Ottawa canal to a ship depth—we shall be having seaports on lake Ontario, lake Erie, lake Huron, lake Superior and Georgian bay. That will enormously increase the competition the railways now have to meet, and unless we get them into this consolidation, they will not be able to meet it.

While the Canadian National Railways own, as I think they do, 70 per cent of the railway strategy of this country, the Canadian Pacific Railway has an equally valuable thing in that it has its own steamships, its own lake and river vessels, and its established lines by sea. If we are to get the best transportation service; if we are to give our friends in the west reduced freight rates; if we are to develop the Maritime provinces by bringing their coal to Ontario, we shall have to depend more and more on transportation by water. In that respect no move would be wiser than to make arrangements with the Canadian Pacific and consolidate the whole thing, bringing in their steamship lines, so that we will have combined in the one system railway transportation, water transportation, highway transportation, and airway transportation. The Canadian Pacific has its steamships and the government railway has the merchant marine. Let us make one big consolidation of all these resources for the betterment of service, and the economies that can be effected thereby.

One of the things that is worrying the people of Canada to-day is the heavy taxation with which we are burdened. The railway competition is getting more desperate every day. It is costing us $300,000,000 a year, and I believe more—because I have gone into the matter rather closely—through the unnecessary duplication, with two systems, with their two head offices and all the overhead charges, with these unnecessary express companies and these unnecessary telegraph companies. All these services can be consolidated and the expenses cut down. The call to-day wherever you go is for lower freight rates, and we cannot get them; but if we had this consolidation the freight rates could be reduced.

Just to give you an idea of what is menacing the railroads now, do you know how much the motor bus and the motor truck are cutting into the revenues of our railways to-day? The motor bus and the motor truck are getting all the local business; they are taking more and more revenue away from the railways every day, and water transportation will go on taking more and more traffic away from the railways, so that soon there will not be enough business, even if the country does grow—and it is going to grow—to make the railways a paying concern.

Moreover, if you make this consolidation a lot of the trackage now existing will be unused. You will not take up any trackage that is necessary for the movement of freight, but there are lots of lines that could be taken up without interfering with the service, and these unnecessary tracks, ties, ballast, and other equipment, could be used later on for giving railway facilities to the newer parts of the country that are being opened up. We hope to bring settlers into this country, and we hope to give them railroads. The consolidation I speak of would enable us to provide the necessary equipment for giving railway facilities to these parts of the country that are being settled, and in that way it would help build up the country. In the meantime we are wasting this money; we are not reducing rates; we are not giving the people the service we ought to give them, and I see nothing but bankruptcy ahead of the two great railway systems unless this consolidation is effected. The traffic returns brought down to the House recently show that there has been a considerable falling off in traffic.

What could we do with the $300,000,000 a year that would be saved by this consolidation? I will tell you first of all what we could do. We have not yet determined what the railway debt of Canada is. Actually it is over $2,000,000,000, nd it has been propesed that we ought to fix the railway debt of this country at say $1,000,000,000. If we did this, and if we made this saving of $300,000,000 through the consolidation of the railways, we could pay three per cent on $1,000,000,000 on which we pay nothing now, but which is part of the debt of Canada. We could also afford to pay six per cent on Canadian Pacific stock to take them into the deal. In addition, there would be dislocated by this consolidation of services over 30,000 men, and we could afford to pay the 30,000 men $1,000 a year each until such time as they could secure other employment in this country or the railways called for their services later on. In addition, we could pay 6 per cent on say $300,000,000 of Canadian Pacific stock, and then we would not have used the first $100,000,000 of what we are now wasting. We could do many other things in the same direction; we could improve the service, stop this leak, reduce freight rates and put our railways in a better position. Although I was a party to the taking over of the old Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern railways, I now agree with the suggestion that we should have let those roads go into bankruptcy. But we did not do so; we have them on our hands now and are maintaining them at this enormous cost of $300,000,000 a year. We could save at least two-thirds of that amount, which might be used to assist settlers in the newer parts of the country, and in many other ways.

Those are the real facts of the case. The House does not seem to be interested, but the people of Canada and particularly those in the west are very much concerned. They are appealing to parliament to find some way out of this situation. I go to Toronto twice a week, and I see the rival trains on that service; some of them are filled up, some with a very few people. That competition goes on in the transcontinental runs, on branch lines, and all over the country; it is getting worse all the time and disaster is ahead if it is not stopped. That is all I have to say about the railway situation. We could save a large amount of money; we could reduce taxation and at the same time improve the freight rate situation. I have always been a believer in public ownership; I believe in public ownership of the railways; I believe in the success of the National railways under public ownership; all the Canadian people believe in that also, and the province of Quebec is a strong supporter of that principle.

Mr. LANCTOT: Excepting myself.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Then my hon. friend does not belong to the province of Quebec.

Mr. LANCTOT: I would like to see the Canadian Pacific Railway take over the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I would not like to see that, because all the people of Canada own the Canadian National Railways, while only 19 per cent of the Canadian Pacific Railway is owned in Canada; all the rest is owned in London and in the United States.

Mr. LANCTOT: I don't care.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I know that, but I do, and the people of Canada care.

Mr. LANCTOT: It is too costly.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It is too costly, but my proposition is to stop this unnecessary expense.

Mr. LANCTOT: The Canadian Pacific Railway should have it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I do not agree with that; the people of Canada will not stand for it, particularly the 4 p.m. people of the west. But they are looking for some arangement which will stop this enormous extravagance. The Canadian Pacific Railway ought to be glad to enter into such an arrangement, because they cannot stand the competition of the Canadian National. It is too much for them, because the Canadian National has 70 per cent of the strategy, which they got in the early days when the old Great Western, the Canadian Northern and the other early railways were built. The greatest piece of strategy they got was through Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he built the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. They have all the strategy through western Canada; competition is growing; the Canadian Pacific Railway is feeling the effects of it, and notwithstanding Mr. Beatty's statements to the contrary I believe he would like to enter into an arrangement which would make this great saving to the nation and would be better for the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Not only is public ownership growing, but I want to tell the House something else which may be of interest. Five years ago the province of Ontario under Mr. Drury, then head of the farmer government, established a savings bank. It could not be called a bank, but was officially named the Province of Ontario Savings Branch. Eventually he got it going, under an agreement with one able young man, a good organizer, to whom he gave this pledge. He told this young man that if he established this Savings branch he would not be interfered with. He gave him a free hand, and this new departure is the greatest instance of public ownership in Canada to-day with the exception of the National railways. The people have their own bank, and it is a great success. The banking interests of Montreal did not like it and tried their best to destroy it when the Drury government went out of office. They appealed to the Ferguson government, which at last decided to reduce the rate of interest from 4 per cent to 3 per cent. But notwithstanding that reduction the deposits in that Savings branch total $25,000,000; it is the best bank in Ontario to-day and enjoys the confidence of the people.

Mr. MARCIL: Do they discount notes?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): No, but they deposit in other banks and I think get four per cent interest.

Mr. MARCIL: Someone has to discount notes, or business cannot be carried on.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The province of Ontario could come to this House and ask for full banking powers under the Bank Act, but in the meantime the province has this amount of money on deposit which they can either use or deposit in other banks. This is the greatest experiment in national banking being carried on in America to-day. Other provinces have followed the lead of Ontario, I believe, but without the same measure of success. I have not seen a word in the papers of what took place in Toronto the other day. The provincial treasurer, Colonel Price, has come to see what a great asset this bank is; he has taken new premises for it at the corner of Adelaide and Bay streets, and it is the busiest bank in Toronto to-day. All the poor people of Toronto go there with their savings; the bank is open earlier in the morning and closes later in the afternoon than do the others; they are out to do business and to serve the public. The result is that, notwithstanding the opposition of the greater banks and the efforts made to squelch it, this new venture in banking is the surprising thing in Canada to-day. It is a great success; it will continue to grow, and I believe it will in the near future receive all the powers of a chartered bank.

Ontario has not only this bank; it has public ownership of its hydro-electric development and of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, which was the first to open up the mining country of northern Ontario. All the mining development which has taken place in Ontario has been the result of the policy of Sir James Whitney in building this railway. If Quebec has anybody to thank for the discovery of its great mineral wealth in the Rouyn district, it is the enterprise of the province of Ontario in opening up that north country by the construction of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. That railway will doubtless play a prominent part in the development of the mines of northern Quebec. To that railway is due the fact that there has been great mining development in northern Ontario, and we may see similar development in northern Quebec. The province of Manitoba is now looking to the National railway to provide a railway service to its mining districts. All these developments have come or are coming as a result of public ownership.

In this connection may I point out that a new bank has been instituted in Toronto. You hear nothing about it, the papers will not even note the fact that it has come into existence, but I want hon. members who are opposed to public ownership—and especially the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lanctot) who questioned me a moment or two ago—to go to Toronto and see the new bank, and they will come back prepared to recommend the opening of branches of that bank in their own province. It marks the advent of the greatest banking system that has yet been established in Canada, and the noteworthy fact about it is that it is publicly owned. Yet certain hon. gentlemen opposite seem to entertain the opinion that the public cannot succeed in any enterprise which it owns. Surely that idea ought to have been dispelled by the success which the publicly owned system of National railways in this country has encountered. I cannot but believe that my hon. friend opposite can see the trend of the movement. Certainly Mr. Beatty and the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway do. They seem to be getting apprehensive of the competition which the Canadian National Railway gives, and they are getting ready to favour amalgamation.

I want to tell my hon. friends opposite another thing. The United States to-day do not own a railway, they do not even own a bank share.

Mr. LANCTOT: What policy did they pursue during the war?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): With all deference to my hon. friend I have the floor at present, and he can speak afterwards if he desires. I know something of what has taken place in United States. That country is really administering the railways there to-day. Through the Interstate Commerce Commission a reduction in the number of railways has been ordered. Regional organizations are favoured, and the actual number of railways is being reduced to seven or eight. I make the prediction that within five or seven years United States will have complete control of all their railways; they are administering them now, but within the time indicated they will probably take them over and control them.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Then as to banking. While United States do not own a bank share they have made the greatest step in public ownership in regard to banking. They control the whole banking system of the United States through the national reserve bank system. To-day the rate of rediscounting in United States is fixed absolutely through officers of the United States government, and as a consequence the government is in control. As a result of what I call government ownership, the United States is the cheapest country in the world to-day for rediscounting, and the best railway service is getting to be that of the United States. It will not be ten years, it will not be five years, before you will see absolute control of the railroads of the United States by the state, so rapid is the growth of public sentiment there in favour of public ownership.

There are these further facts with regard to public ownership. I read an item in the newspapers yesterday which noted the fact that the British government, since the present strike began over there, have got control of the radio system by which they were able to broadcast news. The people are rejoicing over that in England, as well as over the fact that the state has absolute ownership and direction of the cables, telegraph, telephones, and kindred services. England to-day is talking more of public ownership than it ever did before; and as an outcome of the present strike the Old Country will probably take over the mines. It will not take over all the mines; it will take over the good ones and close down the poor ones. As a consequence of that we shall see better production, and the miners will get better wages and better treatment. I think that public ownership will also do something for the coal industry of Nova Scotia; it will probably result in giving that industry a better chance to market its coal in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Italy is becoming rejuvenated largely as the result of public ownership, and the sentiment is growing all over Europe. The sentiment is growing in this country too, and yet some hon. gentlemen are opposed to public ownership. Montreal is very much against it, and if they persist in that attitude it may be in the public interest to move the headquarters of the Canadian National Railways, perhaps to Ottawa, perhaps to Winnipeg—I will not say to Toronto. But that will happen if disbelief in public ownership continues to be the attitude of Montreal? If they keep on declaring that they do not believe in public ownership and do not want it, they will have to abide by the consequences. But Montreal to-day—notwithstanding what we read in the press; notwithstanding what Lord Atholstan says; notwithstanding the immense capitalization that has been created in connection with power development in the province of Quebec—is watching events in the province of Ontario. For public ownership in Ontario has been a great success. The movement is spreading everywhere and is becoming the new doctrine of the day. Wherever you go you will hear of public ownership and what it is accomplishing. You are hearing more and more the idea that the only way to cure many of the economic evils of the day is to resort to public ownership.

I have already referred to what has been accomplished in the United States through the national system of rediscounting. We shall have to follow their example in this country. The Canadian bankers will not like it, but there are lots of opportunities for them; there are lots of avenues through which they can make more money. But in return for that they will have to give more service. In other words the new underlying idea is the intensive service obtained, and this is largely brought about by public ownership. We see the results of that upon the industrial system of the United States in the way of better organization. That is the cure they have adopted over there, and that is the cure which should be followed in this country. I advocate it in connection with the railway system of this country, and particularly by the adoption of consolidation. It will help the Canadian Pacific railway and its shareholders and will prove of great service generally. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) said that he was in favour of retaining the Canadian National Railways, and that he was in favour of the consolidation of the grain buying concerns of the west; he thought they should get together. The greatest thing in the improvement in farming to-day is the success of the western Progressives in forming a wheat pool for the sale of their grain; they are surprising the world by this movement. Through pooling and co-operation they have increased the price which they receive for the grain. I am a friend of the manufacturers, but I will tell them that the next move the farmers will make will be to pool their buying, so that when they wish to purchase agricultural implements they will say, "We will buy our implements from any company who will come to Canada and manufacture them here." That will be the position, especially in the west, where the younger people will have an opportunity to get a training in manufacturing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If agricultural implements were manufactured in Winnipeg, what would happen to Toronto and Brantford?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Toronto would be able to take care of itself. We probably would get cheaper goods, on the same principle that the farmers get more for their grain by co-operation.

Mr. ROGERS: Where is the proof that the farmers are getting more?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): They say so themselves, and we know the price is much better.

Mr. ROGERS: Does the hon. gentleman know that?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I know a great deal about it. Perhaps my hon. friend knows, and if so he might tell us. I will leave it to the farmers to say whether or not co-operation is a success. The English papers are stating that the astonishing thing in the world to-day is the success of the pooling of the grain of the west, resulting in the getting of better prices therefor. That is a great change, but it shows how our ideas are progressing and how new ideas are coming to be adopted. If we do not take advantage of these things we miss our opportunities.

I should like to see the Canadian National Railways give better freight rates. Our farmers in the west are organizing and co-operating—and the farmers in the United States are organizing in much the same manner, except that they have approached congress in a different way. They are not satisfied with the prices they are getting for their grain, but the main thing is that they are organizing. The farmers desire to see more local banks established in the west with local capital, so that they will have a better banking service, without of course injuring the present service. This must be done by organization and legislation. Rather than adhere to the insane idea of having two great systems of railways in competition with each other, a consolidation should be effected so that the Canadian National Railway would be able not only to meet all its commitments, but also to make a reduction of freight rates.

I propose to vote for the amendment because the government have failed to give the people what they pledged themselves to give, namely, an opportunity to the men who work in the factories and those who own the factories to be heard before any decision should be arrived at in regard to the tariff.

They did not give them that opportunity. I come from a constituency in which two of these factories are located, and although there may be a reason for the change, the people in my constituency think that there should have been a hearing before the tariff board before any conclusion was arrived at. Later on in the session I will direct the attention of the House further to some questions connected with the budget, and I have no doubt that there will be ample opportunity to discuss them.

Mr. THEODORE GERVAIS (Berthier-Maskinongé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I do not propose nor could I hope to introduce many new arguments before this House. We have witnessed, since the opening of Parliament, a constant interchange of conflicting opinions. Not only days but months have been taken up in denouncing on the one hand, a political system, and in vindicating it, on the other, without much care for or much consideration being given to the actual facts. I have heard and listened with much interest to the different speeches pronounced by the succeeding orators, from the representatives of the Maritime provinces to those of the western provinces, and hon. gentlemen opposite have been almost unanimous in condemning the present government and in opposing the proposal of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) moving that the House should go into committee of ways and means to consider certain resolutions.

Every hon. member opposite, whether from Prince Edward Island, through the Maritime provinces, Quebec, or Ontario, but especially those from this latter province, taking part in this debate, has stood up strongly in defence of the old protectionist principle. Their story of grievances did not say much about Quebec. In their view, the Maritime provinces have serious grievances against the government. Those hon. gentlemen have even evolved out of these grievances a kind of policy entitled "The Maritime Rights"; and, of course, the sole remedy to such a situation lies, according to the hon. gentlemen, in a protective tariff. Our friends from Ontario told us practically the same thing. Protection was the predominant idea in every speech delivered in this House by the hon. members. Though they dealt with every conceivable matter, their fundamental and constant theme reverted invariably to the lack of protection and the lowering of duties by this government. Long was the wail, especially from the Ontario members. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that Quebec is not a free trade province but that contrary to the Martimes and Ontario she has no reason to complain of this government.

Matters of interest on the hustings and questions relevant to this House, that we have to decide, are different. It seems to me that in this House, hon. members should look carefuly into public matters, scrutinize and criticize earnestly, in order to be in a position to co-operate, as they should, with the government in the best interest of the country. How different are those recriminations from the praises sometimes heard! I was pleased to hear some hon. members opposite refer to the hand of Providence. Forced to look into the budget speech, these gentlemen could not but admit that the financial statement, the year's financial review, as submitted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his budget speech, was most gratifying, and so they credited Providence for so much Allow me to repeat that old saying of the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier: "If Providence is on our side, what reason have the Conservative party and, presently, the hon. members opposite, to be against us?" If Providence favours the Liberals, why does that apostle of co-operation, the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) not give his support to the government. That would bring him in line with Providence.

About ten years ago, when I entered this House, I heard for the first time the budget speech being delivered. Sir Thomas White was then Minister of Finance, and I remember the impression of anxiety that budget left on my mind. How different is the situation to-day! What improvement in our finances, in the general business conditions! If our friends opposite would only refer to the public records of that time, look over the statistics, they would realize what improvement has taken place, especially since the advent of the Liberal government.

Allow me to outline briefly the financial situation of that day. When the Liberal party went out of office in 1911, the country's debt was insignificant. The public debt amounted to $335,000,000, and so what we had to pay in interest was not very much. When we came back, we the Liberals, in 1921, the debt had reached two billions and some four or five hundred millions of dollars; and the interest due alone, for the first year, exceeded the total sum of expenditure under the Liberal administration of 1911, and amounted to $142,000,000. I know there were many justifiable disbursements resulting from the war, and I do not want to enter upon that ground already gone over; but on how many improvident ventures they engaged during that period. Carried, I should say, on the wave of war extravagances, the Conservative, Unionist and after war governments plunged themselves into most reprehensible expenditures. For instance, and speaking from memory, the merchant marine, a sorry remembrance, the building of those merchant ships at a cost of $72,000,000 to $73,000,000. And if the Liberals have some responsibility to share for the unfortunate railway situation the Unionist government had to face, they certainly have none as to the building of that merchant marine when the country was burdened to the utmost. That waste of $73,000,000 of the public money at a time when Canada was so much in need of funds was probably forced upon the government of the day by some private interests. And what have been the results? The deficits in the administration of the merchant marine have been added to those of the Canadian National Railways.

At the same time, the government was supplying money for the labour housing plan which has had more or less satisfactory results; they were helping enterprises of all kinds; they were subsidizing the construction of roads in the different provinces. Quebec had given the example for the building of good roads; the other provinces were somewhat envious of it, and probably under the pressure of particular interests of those provinces, enormous sums of money were granted for the public roads. Quebec has taken advantage of it like the other provinces and I am happy to say that so far as the public services are concerned the province where I come from has been one of the pioneers of the whole Dominion.

Having heard the recriminations of the Maritime provinces and of Ontario, let me tell you a few words about the province of Quebec. I heard yesterday the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) give us a summary of the financial situation of the province of Ontario and show us the amount of its expenses and the regular and annual increase of the public debt which would amount to $275,000,000 or $280,000,000. In the province of Quebec, in spite of the large subsidies that we give for the encouragement of the public services, public instruction and colonization, the debt does not exceed $60,000,000. We do not deny to hon. gentlemen opposite the right to complain of their province especially those of Ontario, but after all, we Liberal members of Quebec, are satisfied and happy to come from that province, and we have nothing to beg to-day from the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, all the public statistics have been searched, analysed, explained in some fashion or other by hon. gentlemen opposite, so as to be in a position to ask for more and more protection for the industries. We must not lose our senses over this tariff issue. Every tariff question is a business question and we must examine it in the light of reason and actual facts and judge it on its merits. The tariff is a tax. It may be a necessary one; it can be very useful if it is handled with care, but I am opposed to protection, especially when it is applied to every commodity as a matter of course. Protection, according to our friends across the floor, would be a universal panacea. It would seem that every ill can be cured by protection. Industries would grow and develop under protection. The farmer would also see much better days. Moreover, they have requested more protection even for eggs; hens would lay more if that policy were applied on a larger scale. Protection would be a cure for every ill. I believe that they have gone too far and that this tariff question should be considered more judicially in the light of the plainest economic data, provided that we set aside the spirit of partisanship and that we discuss it in a broadminded way, because the people take less interest in the questions which are discussed in the House of Commons of Canada, owing to the fact that we give too much time to academic discussions. In 1922 and 1923, the government reduced the duty on agricultural implements. I have listened to all the grievances and the pessimism of our friends on the other side about the future of the industry of agricultural implements. There had been much said on that subject that one day that I happened to be in my county when an employee of one of the greatest manufacturers of agricultural implements was putting up a binder, I asked the local agent what was the price of the binder that year, and if there was not a difference in price as compared with that of the previous year. Looking at his price-list, he answered that there was a difference of $12 and, without me questioning the mechanic, he added, being so much imbued with the idea of protection: "The tariff is not to be blamed for that." But I think that it has very much affected the cost of the agricultural implements, in the same way that the cut in the tariff will presently greatly influence the price of motor cars.

You cannot realize, Mr. Speaker, what arguments were used during the last election, by the candidates of hon. gentlemen opposite. I heard one of them shifting his ground, resorting to a chain of fallacies to show what would be the effect of a tariff similar to the American duty on hay, eggs, butter, cheese, potatoes, in one word on anything. With all sorts of false arguments he tried to show that if the Canadian tariff were $4 a ton that would mean some 50 cents a ton to the producer of hay. I never understood his reasoning and I will not undertake to repeat it; he did not understand it himself; neither did the voters who heard him. I represent a riding which produces large quantities of hay; and even if the government were to put a tariff of $10 a ton on hay it would have no effect in the counties that I represent. Even with no Canadian tariff at all on hay, things would be the same; whether the tariff be one cent a ton or $10 a ton, no American hay will ever be imported into Berthier-Maskinonge in competition with the local product. The tariff has nothing to do with it. Of course in certain localities, certain exceptional conditions may happen when, the price of hay being high, the people near the American border, might import a quantity of hay; but all they will have to pay is a duty of $2 per ton. Do you know what it costs to move a ton of hay from my counties to Halifax? It costs $7.50. The cost is the same when the hay is shipped to St. John, N.B., Portland, Boston and New York. It is evident that in these districts if the harvest be poor the people are right to import American hay when they are near the border instead of ordering it from Berthier-Maskinonge and paying freight charges of $7.50 a ton.

The transportation problem goes to the root of all our trade difficulties and of nearly every question we discuss in this House. I have just said that the counties I represent produce a great quantity of hay. This year we exported, in spite of the tariff barrier of $4 a ton, not to the Western States but to the Southern States, the Carolinas, Maryland, Virginia, through the firm of Bunting, who bought their hay from us, the county of Berthier, I say, shipped to that market, within three months, over 2,500 cars of hay, and that was only one quarter of the crop. And do you know what that hay cost when it was unloaded? It cost $15 freight and $4 duty before any allowance was made for its own value. When the government puts a tax of $4 a ton on hay the tax is paid by the American consumer. I said a moment ago that the transportation problem is at the bottom of all our trade relations in this country. It is at the bottom of the trade in hay of which I am speaking just now. There is much room for improvement there. I requested the railway board to explain the situation fully; here is what we find: For carrying hay from Berthier county to Maryland and the Carolinas the Canadian Pacific charges 77 cents per cwt; and 36 cents per cwt for shipment to Boston. When the Canadian Pacific moves hay for a hundred miles, say, to the boundary, the charge is 13 cents per cwt if the hay is consigned to Boston, and 25 cents a cwt when it is consigned to the southern states; the balance of the freight charges are collected by the American railways. Please note that the Canadian Pacific charges 25 cents per cwt when the hay is shipped to the southern states and 13 cents per cwt. when it is shipped to the Boston and New York markets. You will say that that is discrimination, that the rates are not properly balanced. I appealed to the railway board; and it appears that this state of things is unavoidable. I did not succeed in having the matter remedied; and we still had some 2,000 cars of hay to ship.

During the election campaign and in this House I have heard hon. members claim on more than one occasion that the tariff on eggs was not high enough. They complained about the Australian duty. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that during the campaign these gentlemen made a good many complaints, not about the treaties that the Canadian government had negotiated with France, Belgium, Italy and other countries, but about the treaty with Australia, the effects of which were entirely unkown to them at the time. Australian eggs were to be dumped into Canada and the description was so striking—I can still see the magnificent, sweeping gestures of my opponents—that we could almost see those eggs overrunning the continent, coming here in serried ranks and ousting our own eggs from the Canadian market. The problem is a peculiar one: except in British Columbia, perhaps, we do not produce sufficient eggs for home consumption. During the summer we export eggs; but in the winter months our production falls below our needs.

Because of the law of supply and demand and the consumption being pretty regular, the price of eggs rises when winter comes along, and when the price is high enough, buyers turn to American eggs. That is because we cannot produce eggs during the winter. It is a thing the Canadian farmer has not yet learned. The various branches of agriculture are so numerous that he has not yet turned his attention to the production of eggs in winter. I may say, and I do say it because I am sure of what I state, that egg production is the most paying industry; it brings much more than hay raising or even the dairy industry. There is no industry bringing such high returns and the only question is to establish it among our Canadian farmers. Speaking of agriculture I might use Lafontaine's words at the beginning of one of his fables; "The farmer's patient tare and toil are oftener wanting than the soil" and I say: "The farmer's patient tare and toil are oftener wanting than the hen."

When the hon. members of the opposition show us a vivid and interesting picture in support of the idea of erecting a tariff barrier the question suggests itself: "Why not erect a tariff wall, why not raise the tariff?" We have the dumping clause to protect us against goods being dumped in our markets and, on the other hand, we must have some protection against the greediness of the producer, so that the consumer is not left to his tender mercy. If we have too high a barrier it is quite evident that it will not cause our hens to lay, because the price is even now remunerative but the price of eggs would become exorbitant. We must put a check to low prices as well as to high prices. It is the duty of competent authorities to check the scale of prices and a high tariff leaves the consumer entirely in the hands of the producer. That is why we should not adopt the high tariff asked for by our friends of the opposition.

I often heard the question of coal discussed in this House and I believe a commission was appointed to investigate that subject. Allow me to tell you that I will be pleased to see the government take the matter in hand and if it is necessary, grant bonuses to the railroads so that they may carry coal from the Maritime provinces and Alberta into central Canada. Our country must be independent of the United States; we must not depend on our neighbours for our coal supply, either for factory or home purposes and it is with great pleasure that I will see the government grant subsidies to the railways, whenever necessary, so as to supply our factories and our homes with Canadian coal. There is another thing that I would like to see accomplished by the government. I would be happy to see the government take all possible means to oppose the diversion of traffic taking place from the west towards the United States. I know that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) who spoke a few moments ago would like the building of deep water harbours on lake Erie, lake Huron and lake Ontario. He favours co-operation provided the traffic goes through the province he represents. I would be pleased to see the government employ all possible means to stop that diversion, so that the traffic may be directed to Canadian ports without going through the United States and I ask on this question the co-operation of my hon. friend from South York and of all the members from the province of Ontario. Every year we complain that a large part of the traffic is sent through the United States. We have made great sacrifices to equip our ports, build our railroads and, perhaps because private interests are at the bottom of this, we let our traffic take the way of the United States.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I would welcome on this question the co-operation of the member from South York and of all the members from Ontario, but before he spoke about co-operation the hon. member took good care in the beginning of his speech, to declare that he holds protection as a principle and that even his father before him, held protection as a principle. So that he will co-operate provided he finds it to his advantage. There is but one co-operation which he does not care for. He praised the province of Ontario, he even praised the Drury administration for creating a system of rural credits, but there is a co-operation which he does not like and that is the co-operation of Progressives and Liberals in this House.

At the very outset of his speech and as a term of comparison, the hon .member for South York made a review of facts, comparing Canada with the United States and he said: "The United States have progressed under a policy of protection." Think of comparing Canada with the United States! Are there two countries absolutely alike in the world? Are the geographical, topographical and climatic conditions the same in Canada as in the United States? It seems to me that one is hardly justified in comparing Canada with the United States in order to build up a case in defence of his faith in protection. And the hon. member's deductions from that comparison are absolutely wrong.

If the party of the hon. member for South York had submitted the budget which the Liberal party presented this year, I think I would have heard my hon. friend along with every member of the opposition, say: "See what our party did, see what Canada is now, see how we found it in 1921 and its present condition".

We have restored our finances after four or five years, we have been able to reduce the burden of taxation by over $50,000,000 and when I glance at our trade, I find that Canada holds the fourth or the fifth rank among all the countries of the world. Canada comes after Great Britain, France, Germany and the United States, but it is ahead of Italy, whose population is 40,000,000, ahead of Russia, Poland, Spain, India, Japan, one of the most interesting countries. In view of those facts, the hon. member no doubt would say: I want the economic system which the Liberal party gave us.

I think that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in spite of his long experience and his independent actions is prejudiced by the idea of protection and does not view the situation properly. I believe he was somewhat influenced—if he can be influenced—by the complaints of his friends from the Maritime provinces, Ontario and other parts of the country and he did not realize what the situation actually was.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to tell you how pleased I was to hear the budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). For there is in this budget something over which any Canadian, any public man may well rejoice. We have corrected the blunders committed during the inefficient Tory administration. Canada has taken the right direction and with the kind co-operation of the Progressive party, our country is following again the path of progress. We understood what Providence expected from us, but we understood also that we must help ourselves. I trust that in the best interest of this country, and for its future welfare, this government will continue to administer its affairs and that much later on, when the present generation will be gone, the opponents shall be heard talking of this period as they are talking now of the prosperous time of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and warmly acclaiming the administration of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, that of the Liberal party.

Mr. T. G. MURPHY (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, in common with other members of the House I awaited with some degree of eagerness the presentation of the budget by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). The annual budget of Canada has always held more interest for the people than any other matter dealt with by parliament, and of late years that interest has been accentuated in a marked degree by the enormous additions to our national debt and our ever-increasing burden of taxation. While I am unable to congratulate the minister for the reasons advanced by his supporters I feel that I can congratulate him upon his presentation of a difficult subject.

On this subject I desire to make certain observations which I will endeavour to make as concise as possible. As an outcome of the year's business the minister estimates a decrease of debt of $22,353,000. This is very gratifying, but how has the result been attained? On account of economy practised by the government? I am afraid not, as the following comparison will show.

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1925, the total expenditure as shown by the Public Accounts was $340,619,936.48, while for the year 1926 it is $356,590,000, or an increase of $15,970,063.52. I am afraid we cannot give any credit to this government for economy in expenditure. Let us on the other hand compare the revenues for the two years 1925 and 1926. For the year 1925 the total revenue was $352,232,552.97 and for the year 1926, $378,943,000, or an increase of revenue for 1926 of $26,710,447.03. An examination of these figures clearly shows that the reason the government has been able to produce a surplus is because the revenue has increased and not because the government has been economizing.

I have shown that the government expended in round figures $15,970,000 more in 1926 than in 1925, while for the coming year, 1927, the estimated expenditure, including $30,000,000 to be advanced to the railways, is $381,871,351, or an estimated increase for 1927 of $25,281,351 over 1926. How any man can say that this government has done anything by reason of its policies to reduce the national debt passes my comprehension, when expenditures are increasing every year and the only reason we have any reduction in debt is because this government has taken more money out of the people of Canada. I have heard it argued in this House that the government has reduced taxation.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An Act for the relief of Elizabeth Gertrude Orr.
An Act for the relief of Melville James Andrews.

An Act for the relief of Harry Reginald Oddy.
An Act for the relief of Mildred Roxie Horner.
An Act for the relief of Frances Muriel Burnet.
An Act for the relief of Ada Toms.
An Act for the relief of Vera Sanderson.
An Act for the relief of Noel Leslie Deuxbury.
An Act for the relief of Lillian May O'Reilly.
An Act for the relief of Jean Victoria Dillane.
An Act for the relief of Ethel Alberta Barker.
An Act for the relief of Annie Hazel McCausland.
An Act for the relief of Sterling LeRoy Spicer.
An Act for the relief of Amy Bell Corney.
An Act for the relief of David Frank Crosier.
An Act for the relief of Ethel Gildea Nye Brown.
An Act for the relief of Edward Thomas Faragher.
An Act for the relief of Bertha Viola Lidkea.
An Act for the relief of Mike Ayoub (otherwise known as Michael Ayoub).
An Act for the relief of Alice Marion McGinley.
An Act for the relief of Harold Edgar Perinchief.
An Act for the relief of Hendel Tuerner Lubrinetsky.
An Act for the relief of Paul Hugh Turnbull.
An Act for the relief of Helen Elby Pollington.
An Act for the relief of Alexander Stewart.
An Act for the relief of William Melville Moore.
An Act for the relief of John Samuel Milligan.
An Act for the relief of Marion Richardson.
An Act for the relief of Isadore Boadner.
An Act for the relief of William Albert Thomas.
An Act for the relief of Gertrude Isabel Clerk.
An Act for the relief of Helen Seymour O'Connor.
An Act for the relief of Yetta Selma Trachsell.
An Act for the relief of Alexander Dewar.
An Act for the relief of Florence Burrell.
An Act for the relief of Edith Marion Byam.
An Act for the relief of Charles Davidson.
An Act for the relief of Doris Selina Irvin.

An Act to change the name of the Dominion Express Company to "Canadian Pacific Express Company."
An Act for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1927.

THE BUDGET

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. MURPHY: I have often heard it argued in this House that the government had reduced taxation, but until this budget was brought down there was not the slightest evidence of any attempt on their part to do anything of the kind. Rather was there an increase of taxation by such means as raising the sales tax from 3 to 5 per cent, imposing a tax on receipts, and increasing the stamp taxes on cheques, drafts and other bills of exchange. During the year 1922 this government collected from the people of Canada in taxes the sum of $320,320,945, and during the year 1926, just ended, they collected $324,860,000. During the period from 1922 to 1925, while the taxes were being increased, the government received from other sources large amounts that should have been used to reduce both our national debt and the taxation which we are paying. In 1922 the government received from the Imperial government, as Canada's share of payments made by Germany for the cost of the army of occupation, the sum of $6,314,500, and in the same year the Imperial government reduced its indebtedness to Canada by $18,694,730. In the year 1923 the government received from the Imperial government, in settlement of exchange rates on payments from July 1920 to August 1921, the sum of $8,193,333, and in the same year the Imperial government reduced its indebtedness by $56,226,198. In 1924 this government received from the Imperial government, in settlement of exchange re the Minister of Shipping, $632,500, and in the same year the Imperial government reduced its indebtedness to Canada by $66,469,227. I am not familiar enough with the system of bookkeeping in vogue with this government to know whether these amounts which were received from the Imperial government were taken into consideration in connection with the national debt; I do not know how they were handled. I do know, however, that the government received in cash from profits in exchange and from other sources, the sum of $15,140,333, and during the period 1922-24 the Imperial government reduced its indebtedness to this country to the extent of $141,390,156. Taking only the rate of interest paid on that amount, at 5 per cent, it would come to $7,069,507 which, together with the amount received from profits on exchange of $15,000,000 odd, would make a total of $22,209,841. I say, therefore, that this government during those years from 1922 to 1926 should have been able to reduce the national debt of Canada as well as taxation.

They have reduced the debt this year and there are two reasons for that reduction. The first is that they have received an increase in revenue from taxation. In 1925 they received from taxation the sum of $293,914,518 and in the year 1926 they received $324,860,000, or an increase of $30,945,482. By reason of this increased amount of taxation taken from the people of Canada we have a reduction in the debt of $22,353,000, while the balance practically goes to make up the cash loss on the Canadian National Railways. The second reason for the reduction in debt is the increase in earnings of the Canadian National Railways for which we cannot give the government any credit. The increased debt due to the public by the Canadian National Railways in 1923-24 was $90,814,027 while this year, if I read the budget speech correctly, there will be no increase in debt due to the public. As a result of our expanding revenues attributable to the great increase in taxation collected and to the improved showing of the National Railways, reductions in taxation could no longer be delayed. Certain reductions have therefore been effected in the different fields of taxation. As regards these reductions, which the government's supporters hail with such delight, I would point out that with the exception of the reduction in postage the direct taxation which the government proposes to reduce was either inaugurated by them, as in the case of the receipt tax, or increased as in the case of the sales tax.

With regard to the income tax it has been quite generally recognized that a revision of the rates and simpler methods of computing the tax have been long overdue. I believe however that the income tax is the most equitable of all our direct taxes, inasmuch as it is based on the principle of ability to pay. Care must be exercised, however, to see that the amount levied is not too burdensome and that there shall not be paid into the treasury of the country in the way of taxation money which should be available for development purposes. From my personal point of view I think that the exemptions, both in the case of single and in the case of married men without dependents, are too high. I can see no good reason why a single person with an income of $1,500 or a married person without dependents and with an income of $3,000 should not contribute to the revenues of the country. When a person pays money directly into the treasury in the form of taxation he begins at once to take an intelligent interest in the affairs of the nation and to inquire into the manner in which his money is being spent. The rate of taxation on the smaller incomes should be low, but I submit that people who are in receipt of such incomes are far better able to contribute to the revenues than are thousands of others who do contribute heavily by means of the sales tax although they are in receipt of incomes far less than those I have mentioned.

I want to give a comparison now of the receipts from sales tax and from income tax. In 1922 the amount received from sales tax was $61,518,751, and in that year the sales tax was increased from three per cent to four and a half per cent. In the year 1923 the government collected $91,262,255 and during that year the sales tax was increased from four and a half per cent to six per cent, so that in 1924, in view of that increase the government collected from the people of the country $100,990,078. During that year, owing to certain representations which were made to the government, the sales tax was reduced from six to five per cent, so that while in the year 1925 we received $66,707,370, in 1926 we received $71,900,000. Let us take the same years, and see what we received from the income tax:

Income Tax Receipts

1922	$78,684,355
1923	59,711,538
1924	54,204,028
1925	56,248,043
1926	55,530,000

The government has received both from Liberal and Progressive members of this House, as well as from certain sections of the country, much favourable comment because they have reduced the scale of income tax and have thereby done so much for the common people of Canada. The exemption in the case of single persons has been raised from $1,000 to $1,500, and for married persons without dependents from $2,000 to $3,000, but I would like to point out that the majority of the common people of this country have incomes much less than those amounts, and the reduction in the income tax means nothing to them, while a reduction in the scale of the sales tax would mean a great deal to the common people of this country—and when I speak of the common people I mean those in receipt of small incomes. The sales tax is a tax which bears heavily on people in receipt of small incomes in this country. The man with a family of four or five children has in many cases an income of much less than $2,000, and in endeavouring to clothe and feed and educate his family he is asked by this government to contribute heavily to the revenues of the country on practically everything he buys. I would like to point out to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) that if he is so much concerned for the welfare of the common people of this country, those who are in receipt of small incomes, he missed a glorious opportunity to use his great influence with the government to have the sales tax either reduced in rate or entirely abolished. The minister, no doubt, is loath to reduce the sales tax because it is too good a revenue producer. It makes a good headline in a newspaper to say that the income tax has been reduced. The income tax is a direct tax, and the man who has been paying it immediately recognizes the fact that his tax is coming down. The sales tax, on the other hand, is an indirect tax, and the minister did not reduce that tax, I believe, because the reduction would not be so noticeable. But it is of all our taxes one of the most unjust, and in my opinion, it should be either reduced or entirely removed.

While the reduction in our postage rate on letters makes a popular headline, the savings to the average householder by this reduction would amount to not more than 50 cents a year, because the tax still remains on letters and postcards posted at and intended for delivery through the same office. Those who will benefit most from this reduction are the large financial and mercantile establishments, such as the mail order houses. While this tax is being reduced, I would like to point out to the government that many sections of the country are badly in need of rural mail services. I have had letters, since coming down here, from my own constituency asking for one of these rural mail delivery services to be inaugurated, and I have endeavoured to do something along that line, but so far without any result. I believe it is the policy of the department at the present time not to inaugurate any more of these services on account of the deficit in the Post Office Department. While I trust this reduction in taxation will mean increased revenues to the Post Office Department, I would point out that during the year 1925 there was a big deficit in that department. On consulting the public accounts I find that in that year the expenditure for all services was $31,721,542.75 and the total revenue $28,793,816.86, or a deficit of $2,927,725.89 in the Post Office Department for the year ending March 31, 1925. I have not been able to secure figures for 1926, but apparently the showing is much better. I did obtain the figure for the nine months of the present fiscal year, and I find that the expenditure for these nine months was $23,052,000 and the revenue $23,000,000, or a deficit of $52,000 for the nine months. We shall not know for some little time the total result of the Post Office Department for the year but I sincerely hope for the peace of mind of the minister we shall not have such a deficit as we had in 1925.

The receipt tax, which the minister has discontinued, was never enforceable. It was a tax which was evaded, I believe, more than any other of our nuisance taxes, and I think the minister has done well to abolish it.

With the exception of one or two items, the changes in the customs tariff, while mostly downward, do not affect Canadian industry as the reductions apply to products which are mostly not produced in Canada. But there was a reduction made in the duties on imported automobiles, and I would like to ask why this industry was singled out from among all our industries. The Minister of Finance gave as the reason that there was a pronounced sentiment in Canada that this industry was receiving too much protection. I believe the Minister of Finance is a business man, and I would ask him if he decides business matters in his own business in that way, basing his judgments on sentiment, or if he does not rather sit down and get all the facts and figures in connection with the case before him, and then form his judgment on those economic facts. Would he not, first of all, conduct an investigation into the proposed reduction in the price of any article in which he was dealing? In fact, is not that exactly what the Prime Minister promised would be done, both in his election addresses and in the Speech from the Throne brought down in this House in January last? I would like to refer to a speech which the Prime Minister made at Kingston during the last campaign, reported in the London Advertiser of October 20, where the Prime Minister is quoted as saying:

> We realize that our industries here have to have safeguarding with respect to competition from other parts of the world, competition from the country to the south, competition from conditions as they are in Europe, and we think that is all the more reason why, in these days of depreciated currencies, and the like, we should have the benefit of expert advice and information on all these great questions of the tariff.

I would like to ask hon. members from Saskatchewan, who believe more or less in the free trade principle, if they agree with the Prime Minister when he stated in that speech that all industries had to have safeguarding. I would also like to hear from our new Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) who was looked upon as the knight clad in glittering armour who was to come out of the west, unsheath his shining sword and do away with this iniquitous tariff.

Further on in the same speech the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

> We do not want to work injury to any industry. We want to help as far as possible all industries. We hope to make such readjustments of the tariff as will develop the industrial life of our country from one end of the country to the other.

He went on to elaborate in that speech how the tariff board he proposed to inaugurate would operate. In the Speech from the Throne we had it again promised that there would be no tinkering with the tariff, that there would be no reductions or increases in the tariff until after investigation had been made by the tariff board. This is the promise contained in the Speech:

> They believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto.

In view of these explicit promises made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign and contained in the Speech from the Throne, and in view of the fact that the tariff board was appointed eight days prior to the presentation of the budget, were not all industries in this country justified in believing that no changes would be made in the customs tariff until after full investigation? No governmental supporter has yet sought to justify the action of the government in breaking its pledged word; we have had many speeches by Liberal and Progressive members, yet not one speaker has attempted to justify the stand taken by the government. Not even the chief apologists for the administration—and I refer to the Progressive members to my left—have sought to do so, and previously during this session whenever the government was in difficulty we could always rely upon them to give their aid immediately.

A delegation came to Ottawa from the city of Oshawa. shortly after the budget had been brought down, asking that the duties on automobiles be not reduced but restored tc the old scale. The Prime Minister told the delegation that parliament would decide on the matter. That sounds very plausible, but while we are asked by the government to decide this matter, they have not submitted any facts or figures, without which we cannot reach an intelligent conclusion. Since parliament is to adjudicate on this matter the government should lay on the table all the data they have, including the reports and expert advice the Prime Minister stated they had received. That has not been done, for the simple reason that this government wished to make a spectacular move which would gain for them a cheap popularity.

The arguments advanced by those supporting the reduction in automobile duties is that the prices charged by the makers of Canadian cars have been too high, notably in the case of the Ford car. The duty on this class of car has been reduced from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, with a corresponding reduction in price of from $15 to $45. If a reduction in price were the only consideration, the result could have been more easily attained and a much greater reduction made by simply removing the sales and excise taxes. Then an investigation could have been held by the tariff board to determine whether or not the manufacturers were using the protection accorded them to exploit the people. However, if those desiring cheaper cars do not agree with that argument and think the tariff has everything to do with the price, I would ask them to be logical. Hon. members to my left and from Saskatchewan argue that they want cars, notably the humble Ford, at the very lowest price possible. They have argued at great length that the 35 per cent duty has been simply added to the price of the car. If that is the case—which it is not, but which we will assume for the purposes of argument—if the price is the only consideration, the duty should be removed altogether, and not merely reduced. If these champions of the government, the Progressive group and the members from Saskatchewan, adhered to their expressed principles they would have forced this government to entirely remove the duty on cars. They had it in their power; this government could not have refused and continued in office, and we all know how tenaciously they cling to office. During the last ten years I have heard from many public platforms and read in many papers and pamphlets the attitude of the Progressive party on the tariff. According to their expressed beliefs the tariff policy of the country has been and is absolutely wrong and indefensible, and when opportunity offered they intended to exterminate it, root and branch. The opportunity arrived during this session; the Progressive party had it in their power to challenge the protective tariff; had they so desired they could have made the automobile duties the issue, and insisted upon their removal. The government would have had to capitulate or appeal to the people, then the issue would have been clearly joined and the people would have had an opportunity to pronounce their verdict as to whether this country should have a free trade or a protective policy. I was more than astonished when I heard the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) enunciate the new policy of the Progressive party, which I find at page 2618 of Hansard for this year:

> We have stated our position in relation to the tariff and perhaps I may state it again, although not definitely. I am not going to say just how low I want the tariff, but I want a tariff low enough at all times to permit of outside competition. Such a tariff is the only safeguard which the consumers will ever have: there must be outside competition with home industries. And that is about as definite as I will be at the present moment on the tariff. Is there anything selfish in that? It is a legitimate policy and one which we are prepared to stand by. We have nailed our colours to the mast so far as the tariff is concerned and I can see nothing blameworthy in the position we take.

That policy, Mr. Speaker, is but the palest imitation of the free trade argument thundered forth from many Progressive platforms. That does not go even so far as a tariff for revenue only. The hon. member states that they have nailed their colours to the mast; I would like to say that they have changed their colours, and instead of the red flag of a fiscal revolution they have hoisted the white flag of abject surrender. Then the hon. member for Brandon in April of this year addressed the Canadian Club of Toronto, and in the Toronto Star of April 12 is reported as having said during the course of an interview:

> The present Liberal government at Ottawa, in the opinion of the Progressive leader, will last this session without any difficulty. "It may last its full term," he said. "I suppose it depends on my crowd."
> "After all," said Mr. Forke, "Progressives are simply Liberals in action. I believe Mr. King is a Liberal. When I say that, I mean a real Liberal."

And further on:

> Mr. Forke denied the stories about wielding the big stick over Mr. King. "There's nothing in it," he said. "I think we're learning by bitter experience that Progressives can't be as independent as we should like to be.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to ask whether the hon. member is reading from the Toronto Star.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes.

Mr. FORKE: I want to say emphatically that I did not speak to a Star correspondent while in the city of Toronto.

Mr. MURPHY: I do not think the hon. member will deny that he made a speech before the Canadian Club of Toronto; it is just possible that the Star reporter was present and it is also possible that the hon. member was interviewed by the reporter without being aware of the fact.

Mr. FORKE: No, I am not so dense as that.

Mr. MURPHY: I have not heard the hon. member deny that those are his statements. He has said that he was not interviewed by a Star reporter, but he has not denied the sentiments expressed in this report. In any case, judging from the actions of the hon. gentleman in this House, we know that this clearly expresses his attitude. Further, the newspaper report credited Mr. Forke with the statement that the Progressives were learning by bitter experience that they could not be as independent as they would like to be. I can readily understand those sentiments, because during the campaign of 1925 there was no Liberal candidate in the riding of Brandon which the hon. gentleman represents. A man was nominated to carry the Liberal colours in Brandon, a man who had been Premier of Manitoba and who should have been accorded the right to carry the Liberal standard in that constituency; but for some reason or other he was taken away from there and ran in South Winnipeg. I can readily understand, therefore, the tender feeling with which the hon. member for Brandon would regard the continuation of the King administration. It surely cannot be that the members of the Progressive party are afraid to place the issue squarely before the Canadian people, that they have not the courage of their convictions, but prefer to barter with a weak government for a reduction of the tariff because of the unique position they occupy in this House. Surely they are not afraid to let the people of Canada decide the issue. If they do fear a decision by that tribunal then their attitude is a most selfish and sectional one and constitutes the gravest violation of the principles of true democracy as it substitutes minority rule for rule by the majority.

We have wasted hours and days of valuable time in useless argument regarding the duty on automobiles. This discussion might as well have taken place on the duty on boots and shoes, on the duty on clothing, or on hundreds of other articles in our tariff schedule. To me it seems the very height of absurdity for this House to waste its time and its energy in arguing whether the rate of duty should be thirty-five per cent, twenty-seven and a half per cent, or any other rate, until the principle of our fiscal policy has been definitely adopted. There can be no compromise between the doctrines of protection and free trade; either the one or the other must be chosen as the fiscal policy for Canada; and while we have, and have had since 1878, a protective fiscal policy it is being improperly applied to-day owing to the uncertain course of this administration, with its attendant evils of instability and lack of confidence. Is it not about time that the members of the major groups in this House, who believe in protection, should cease their futile arguments over tariff rates, leaving such questions to be worked out on a scientific basis by the tariff board. The days that have been wasted over these details should have been devoted to an intelligent study of our pressing national problems such as transportation, emigration and immigration, the conservation of our natural resources, and the manufacture of our raw products into finished articles in Canada. I wish to make my position clear on this matter, and beg to state that, while I am a believer in a national protective policy for Canada, I hold no brief for the automobile or any other manufacturing industry, and when it is shown after proper investigation by an impartial tribunal such as the tariff board that unfair advantage is taken of the tariff by a manufacturer to make undue profits or to charge excessive prices for commodities, I will lend my efforts to remove or reduce that tariff; or if better means can be devised to take from that particular industry its ill-gotten gains, I will support such a policy.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), when speaking a few days ago, made a few kind remarks in regard to certain members including myself. At page 2948 of Hansard he is reported to have made the following statement:

> I want to point out, especially for the benefit of the hon. member for Marquette, the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Murphy), and the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hay), that in my election campaign I was opposed by a Conservative. He announced his policy and said that if he got into parliament he would stand for the reduction of the duty on autos. He declared, "That is our policy, that is what we will do."

I do not know what the Conservative candidate said during the election campaign in Lisgar, as to that I am prepared of course to accept the statement of the hon. member, but I can clearly state what I told the electors in my own constituency, and that was that I stood clearly for the protective policy as enunciated by my leader. Further on the same hon. gentleman is reported as saying:

> On the question of the reduction of the duty on automobiles, I think I am safe in asserting that it will meet with the approval of the people of Manitoba, and I would just like to say for the benefit of my hon. friends that as I took good care that the people were not deceived at the last election, so we will take good care if we have to deal with the matter again to see that the situation is correctly presented to the people and that hon. members will not be able to escape on a technicality.

It is indeed refreshing to find a man who is so honest that he feels it incumbent upon him to tell the people of Manitoba just what the hon. members for Marquette, Springfield and Neepawa did when they were down at Ottawa. It is too bad that the hon. gentleman did not live in the time of Diogenes, or in biblical times. He might then well have exclaimed with the Pharisee: "O'Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men are."

Further on in the same speech the hon. gentleman said:

> But since the welfare of the country demands that the budget be supported, I naturally hope they will have regard to the national welfare and support the budget, as I intend to.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have great regard for the national welfare. I have such regard for it that I believe that consideration for the national honour comes first, and that the pledge of the Prime Minister to the people of this country should be kept. Furthermore I have this to say: I hope that when the hon. member for Lisgar goes back and explains to the people in Manitoba how he and other Progressive members from that province voted on the budget, he will explain to them why he supported the budget after having committed himself to the policy announced in the Speech from the Throne that all matters in relation to the duty on automobiles, or any other article, should be referred to the Tariff Advisory Board. I also hope that the hon. gentleman will explain that he was as careful in this House to be as independent of the Liberal party as of the Conservative party. A policy of independence was the policy enunciated by the Progressives in Manitoba during the last campaign. They were to be as independent of the Liberal party as they were of the Conservative party; they intended to have no truck or trade with either. They insisted that all legislation should be settled on the floor of the House, and that there should be no party caucus behind closed doors. I believe the Progressive members do not meet in caucus but in what they call "conference".

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): In committee.

Mr. MURPHY: I hope the hon. gentleman when he makes the promised explanation will enlighten his constituents with respect to all these other matters at the same time.

Since I came to this House I have heard a great deal about the prosperity which is alleged to prevail in this country. Certain figures have been quoted by hon. gentlemen opposite to substantiate that view, and they have always quoted figures showing the increase in the deposits in the savings banks, in the amount of life insurance, and so on. But never yet have I heard any Progressive member, or any farmer member, take the position that prosperity exists in the great industry of agriculture. We know such has not been the case in the west during the last four or five years. No, the reverse of that is true, in fact the farmers there were getting rather desperate with regard to the conditions which prevailed. And what was the remedy they were advised to adopt? It was that they should change their methods and adopt diversified farming. A great many farmers have done that. They increased, for example, their stock of dairy cattle, and commenced to produce cream and butter. But having done that, what treatment did they receive from the Dominion government? They were allowed to suffer from the most unfair rate in the tariff schedules. We have heard members of the Progressive party argue in this House that the farmers of the United States who were instrumental in having the Fordney-McCumber tariff put into effect now want the American duties lowered. May I ask whether any representations have been made by the United States farmers to secure a lowering of the forty-two cent rate of duty on wheat? Have they petitioned the United States government to lower the duty on cattle so that Canadian live stock could enter the large markets of the United States at Chicago and other large centres? No, they have not done anything of the kind. The farmers of the United States are so anxious to have the duties reduced that only a few weeks ago they procured an increase in the tariff on butter from eight to twelve cents per pound.

Not only were the farmers of the west subject to such unfair tariff schedules as were then in existence, but this government saw fit to make a trade agreement with Australia, and it has been argued that this competition is not detrimental to the Canadian producer. I always like to get my information first hand. I wrote to one of the creameries in my constituency, and I received the reply on April 16, in which the manager stated that the price of butter in that district, owing to the Australian competition, had been reduced four cents a pound during the last ten days.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What date was that?

Mr. MURPHY: I received the letter on April 16 last.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The price of butter always drops at that date.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I guess the cows go on the grass.

Mr. MURPHY: I would call the attention of the government to the following resolution which was passed on February 13, by the dairymen of Manitoba. I do not know whether the price of butter always drops at that time of the year or not—possibly the Minister of Agriculture can tell us.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is going up at that time.

Mr. MURPHY: Apparently they thought it had some effect then. The resolution reads:

Resolved that this association request the National Dairy Council of Canada to appoint at the 1926 annual meeting of the council a committee to wait upon the federal government at as early a date as possible to urge adjustment of the Australian trade treaty in so far as it affects dairy products.

And about the same time, on February 9, the Free Press in an editorial stated:

It is undeniable however that the Canadian farmers pay for this enlargement of markets for Canadian goods in Australia by having to face competition in our winter season of dairy and meat products in Australia.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The price is going up.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Friday, May 14, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

SEALRIGHT COMPANY PATENT

Sir HENRY DRAYTON moved:

That, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the first report of the select standing committee on Standing Orders, May 11, the petition of the Sealright Company Incorporated, presented May 4, praying for an act to extend the time for payment of fees on a certain patent owned by the said company be now read and received.

He said: I may say that the motion was made covering some of the patents but for some reason or other this one was overlooked.

Motion agreed to.

ROUYN RAILWAY BILL

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I should like to ask, now that we have all the papers, I think, in connection with the Rouyn Railway Bill, with the exception of the agreement with the province of Quebec, that agreement having been completed and appropriate legislation passed, if the government will forthwith table the agreement with the legislation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) is not in his seat just now, but I will direct his attention to the question of my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), brought down the information, I think he was Acting Minister of Railways. It would be easy for him to supplement the information by bringing down the agreement.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR MAKING APPLICATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask the government if any action is contemplated to extend beyond July 19, 1926, the time for making application to come under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act of 1924. My reason for asking this question is that quite a large number of employees of the government, for instance in the Taxation branch, have not as yet been brought under the Civil Service Act as permanent employees, and therefore have had no opportunity or right to apply to come under this Superannuation Act. Perhaps I cannot expect an answer to-day, but I should be glad if the government would consider the matter and intimate in a day or two whether the act can be extended for another year in order to afford an opportunity for the adjustment of some of these outstanding difficulties, and particularly to permit some of these employees, some of whom in the Taxation branch have been in the service for nearly ten years and who are not yet classified as civil servants, to apply to come under the Superannuation Act.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): As my hon. friend knows, the legislation creating the Taxation branch was introduced by a previous government and it was they who left the employees of that branch outside of the regular civil service. I make that observation in passing. I suppose that is why they have not come in as permanent civil servants.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon. friend just found that out to-day?

Mr. ROBB: No; I am just making that observation. As regards the question whether the act should be extended for another year, some applications have come in from different sources. It is pointed out by the actuaries that all this means an addition to the expense of carrying out the legislation and the matter requires a good deal of study. I will submit my hon. friend's question to the actuaries and I shall be in a better position to answer him in a few days.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski): I should like to support the contention of the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only questions can be put on the orders of the day.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I should like to know what is going to be done.

Mr. STEVENS: I was going to offer a slight correction if the minister will permit me, namely, that some of the employees to whom I refer were appointed when the income tax legislation was first introduced which would be before the passing of the Civil Service Act. I merely offer that in correction of part of my hon. friend's statement.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What applies to employees of the Taxation branch applies also to a certain number of employees of the Department of Marine and Fisheries who are in the outside service, and who have not yet been classified by the Civil Service Commission. They have not yet had an opportunity of electing to come under the present Superannuation Act. I shall be obliged if the government will give due consideration to the observations of my hon. friend.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to draw the attention of the government to this telegram which I have just received from the Railway Mail Clerk's Association of Vancouver:

Strong objections voiced meeting railway mail clerks re action Post Office Department re adjusting runs this division necessitating removal forty-nine men and families. Please use influence to have department reconsider their action which means domestic and financial losses.

I would ask that this telegram be drawn to the attention of the Postmaster General and that the matter be reconsidered as it affects a large number of families.

IMPORTATIONS OF WOOL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce to this Canadian Press despatch from Truro, Nova Scotia under date of May 11:

Stanfield's mills here, employing hundreds of people in the manufacture of underwear and other wool products, shut down to-night as result of the strike in Great Britain, which cut off the supply of raw material. Wool supplies for this mill were secured in England and the cessation of export due to the strike was given as the cause of the shut down.

Since protection seems to be desired by a large number of members in this House, has the minister considered the advisability of protecting the Canadian farmer against the importation of British wool?

PROPOSED NEW LINE TO PACIFIC

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. DeWITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): In the absence of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), may I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to this article appearing in the Canadian Gazette of London, and upon which I desire to found a question:

Proposed New Line to Pacific Coast

The Winnipeg correspondent of the Daily Mail states: "The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is planning a new line to the Pacific coast from Winnipeg. The proposal is that the Canadian Pacific branch line which is now being built in a north-westerly direction from the present rail end at Cutknife, Saskatchewan, is to be extended to tap the Edmonton-Dunvegan line at a point north of Edmonton, Alberta.

"This line, at present leased by the Canadian Pacific from the Alberta Government, is to be included in the Canadian Pacific system. The present E.D. and B.C. line is to be extended southerly to tap the Canadian National at Prince George, B.C. The Canadian Pacific is then to purchase the former G.T.P. line from Prince George to Prince Rupert, B.C., now part of the Canadian National system, thus completing the new Pacific coast outlet for the Canadian Pacific.

Have representations been made by the Canadian Pacific looking for the acquisition of that line?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I regret I am not in a position to say, but I will ask my colleague the Minister of Railways to give my hon. friend a reply when he is here on Monday.

CONNAUGHT PLACE—ENLARGEMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): When does the Minister of Public Works expect to be able to explain to the House the plans of the government in regard to the block of land which it is reported the government have expropriated in this city?

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Public Works): I imagine there will be an opportunity of going into the matter when we are dealing with the estimates which I hope will come up shortly.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 12, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. T. G. MURPHY (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose on Wednesday I was endeavouring to show that the Australian and New Zealand trade agreements are subjecting producers of dairy products to unnecessary and unfair competition. I had shown by information that I had received from a local creamery in my constituency that the price of butter had been reduced four cents a pound this spring owing to the competition of Australian butter. I obtained from the Bureau of Statistics the importations of butter into Canada for the period from October 1, 1924 to March 31, 1925 and from October 1, 1925 to March 31, 1926. I took those periods because the trade treaty with Australia came into effect on October 1, 1925. The following are the importations of butter for those periods:

	October 1, 1924, to March 31, 1925		October 1, 1925, to March 31, 1926
	Pounds	Value	Pounds	Value
From Australia—
Butter..	Nill	Nill	2,485,502	$910,814
From New Zealand—
Butter..	2,688	$833	2,342,966	$928,345

When we compare these respective periods, therefore, we find that whereas we have imported from Australia and New Zealand butter to the total value of $1,839,159 during the time the treaty has been in effect, our imports amounted on the other hand only to the sum of $833 when there was no treaty. During the month of March of this year I happened to see in a window of one of the retail produce concerns in the city of Ottawa a display of Australian butter. I went in and made certain inquiries and learned that at that time this particular concern was selling between 300 and 400 pounds of dairy butter per week, and not only had they at that time no local butter in stock but for the three weeks prior to that they had not sold one pound of the Canadian product. And that store was only one of a chain of some fourteen shops owned by that concern. At the same time the three prairie provinces were exporting dairy butter as western Canada has overtaken production and is on an export basis twelve months in the year. I do not see why any government should subject the producers of butter in western Canada to such competition. They have to export their butter over thousands of miles of railway and then across the Atlantic to the markets of Great Britain while the people of Ontario cities are purchasing butter produced in Australia.

I want to deal for a few minutes now with the situation as it has developed in the province of Manitoba. Until now Manitoba has been almost entirely an agricultural province, but we shall not always remain a purely farming community. As a matter of fact the change is taking place to-day. Three-fifths of the land area of Manitoba is unsuitable for agricultural development. Up to the present we have depended entirely upon the growing of grain, but to-day the people of the province are beginning to realize the importance of development along other lines. There is now being built in Manitoba at Fort Alexander a pulp mill which, when completed, will have an output of 100 tons of pulp per day. During the last session of the legislature railway bonds to the extent of $3,500,000 were guaranteed by the provincial government for the building of a railway from Mile 8 on the Hudson Bay line to the Flin Flon mine, the guarantee to become effective only when the Flin Flon people expend thirteen or fourteen million dollars on development work in that area. The legislature has also guaranteed bonds for a railway from Winnipeg into the Rice lake mining area. The people of the province are coming more and more to appreciate the importance of general development along various industrial lines. The province, as I have said before, will not always depend solely upon one industry, the growing of grain. To become prosperous we must not only diversify our farming but we must branch out into other industrial activities. We have in Manitoba a water power capable of very considerable development. Indeed, competent engineers have expressed the opinion that there is as much potential hydro electric power available on the Nelson river, flowing into Hudson bay, as has been developed on the Niagara, and we have in Winnipeg the cheapest hydro-electric power to be found on the American continent.

With the resources latent in the province of Manitoba, including pulpwood and minerals, and with the electrical power available there is no reason why our province should not become one of the greatest manufacturing centres of this Dominion. We can manufacture in Winnipeg and in Manitoba generally, we should manufacture the agricultural implements needed in the province and other parts of the west and we have also the facilities for manufacturing our own boots and shoes, our own clothing and other necessities. It is because the people of the province have wakened to the necessity for general industrial development that, in my opinion, there are in this House seven Conservative members from Manitoba whereas in the last parliament there were none. The development of the province along one line is not in the best interests of the people of Manitoba any more than it would be in the interests of the Dominion as a whole if the activities of the people were centred in one industry. A few years ago we bent our efforts to the development of one industry, namely, the growing of grain and as a result of that one-sided development the people of the province suffered whenever there happened to be a poor crop. The greatest handicap under which we have suffered in the past, and from which as a matter of fact we are suffering to-day, has been that restricted policy which has been the means of driving hundreds and thousands of our young men away from the province. Many of the sons of our farmers in Manitoba, on reaching the age of discretion, decided that they did not want to become farmers. Some of them entered the learned professions and some of them took advantage of the technical school in Winnipeg to fit themselves for an engineering career. With what result? When they had received their education and had graduated they found that there was no opportunity for them to apply their talents in their own country. From my own town of Neepawa many young men, after obtaining scholarships in our educational institutions, have drifted away. I do not know of one of those young men who took the engineering course in Manitoba who is to-day in employment in Canada. They have all migrated to the United States. I am sure the same is true of other parts of the province.

Not only do we need the establishment and development of new industries in Manitoba, but we require also, for the greatest success, the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I do not intend to deal at any length with this subject nor, to dwell upon the circumstances whereby this road has been left in its incomplete state, having been built within ninety miles or so of its terminus. Every government, leader and parliament since 1881 have committed themselves to the building of this road. In 1881 charters were granted by the government of Sir John A Macdonald to two companies for the undertaking and in 1884 the same government made a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile in Manitoba and 12,800 acres per mile in what was then the Northwest Territories, to insure the building of the Hudson Bay railway. As a result of that policy the road was built up to the present site of the town of the Pas.

I was interested in reading in the Ottawa Journal of May 11 of the present year, an editorial on the Hudson Bay railway. I shall not read the whole of the article, but I shall quote certain facts which the writer thought he had deduced from a debate which had taken place in the Senate this year:

Fact No. One: That lands sold in the west under the legislation of 1908 had no relation whatever to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Fact No. Two: That these lands would have been sold had the Hudson Bay railway never been mentioned.

Fact No. Three: That none of the lands sold was in the Hudson bay area.

Fact No. Four: That, consequently, the whole of the $21,000,000 thus far spent upon the Hudson Bay railway has come out of ordinary national revenue, i.e. the taxpayer of the country.

At this point I should like to pay a compliment to the two daily papers published in the city of Ottawa. I have read them very carefully ever since my arrival in the capital in January, and I really think they are two very high class journals, but on the subject of the Hudson Bay railway the Ottawa Journal seems to suffer from a kind of mental hydrophobia. About the year 1896 or 1897, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, a firm of railway contractors, undertook to build a railway from Gladstone, Manitoba, to Dauphin. At the same time they purchased from Mr. Sutherland who had obtained a charter in 1881 for the building of the Hudson bay road, a controlling interest in the South Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company. When the line was built as far as Winnipegosis, Mackenzie & Mann continued westerly into the province of Saskatchewan rather than on to Hudson bay. In 1905, upon the creation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the demand became insistent for the completion of the Hudson Bay road. And the Hon. Frank Oliver, the then Minister of the Interior, on behalf of the government entered into an agreement with Mackenzie & Mann under the terms of which they relinquished the Hudson Bay charter and undertook to build a line from a point on the Dauphin and Prince Albert line to the Saskatchewan river, the government undertaking to sell sufficient homestead and preemption lands to provide for the completion of the road to the bay. As a result of that policy Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann built from a point on the Dauphin and Prince Albert line to the site of the present town of The Pas.

I have said that the government of the day entered into a contract with Mackenzie & Mann in 1905 by which the firm relinquished their charter. In 1908 the federal government caused an amendment to the Dominion Lands Act to be passed. On that occasion Hon. Frank Oliver said he found incongruities in the act which made the administration difficult. He also stated, as one reason why he wanted these amendments made to the act, that it was not the policy of the Laurier government to make grants of land towards the building of railways. In that connection I would refer to the debates of 1908, as reported in volume 6 of Hansard. At page 11130 of that volume I find Mr. Oliver reported as saying:

Therefore, it is a plain proposition. There is, as it were, a mortgage standing against the lands of the northwest in respect to aid to a railway to Hudson bay. The necessity of such an outlet is greater than ever before and is more impressed on the minds of the people than ever before. Therefore in wiping out the mortgage upon the lands on behalf of a railway to Hudson bay, if we undertook to do as we propose in this act, it is necessary that we should place something in its stead, and that is the proposition that I desire to lay before the House.

Then further on the the same page:

That is to say, in regard to certain sections to allow the homesteader to buy an adjoining quarter section at a fixed price under settlement conditions. We believed that by the revival of this privilege we would create a new source of revenue to the Dominion treasury that would be adequate to meet the responsibilities which would have to be assumed by the construction of a railway to the bay.

And again, on page 11135, he is reported as saying:

There was no suggestion of restriction of the area to which the bill of last year applied.

Mr. Oliver had introduced amendments the year before but they had not been adopted; they were dropped.

My fear was that a question might have been raised as to whether the provision was adequate or not. What I had in view was to place before parliament a proposition that should put beyond question the fact that we had adequately provided assistance from an entirely new source of revenue to enable the Hudson Bay railway to be built.

And again on page 11138:

The point we have in view in regard to this pre-emption matter is that there shall be a railway built to Hudson bay. If we can get a railway built to Hudson bay without any pre-emption provision at all then I am not insisting upon the pre-emption provision. But I am insisting upon the pre-emption provision as a means of ensuring the early building of a railway to Hudson bay.

And again at page 11150, in answer to a question, Mr. Oliver said:

We do not propose that the building of the railway shall await the sale of 5,000,000 acres of this land, but we want to be able to say to the people of the country that if we find it necessary to pledge the credit of the country to an extent to raise sufficient money to aid in the building of the Hudson Bay railway, here is a new source of revenue that will relieve them of the burden of the responsibility they thus undertake.

I think, Mr. Speaker, from the evidence I have submitted, that the statements of the Ottawa Journal in the editorial in question are not facts but fiction. Now, from the year 1908 onward successive governments have recognized that the moneys derived from the sale of these lands were to be expended for the completion of the Hudson Bay road. The people of the west purchased lands on that definite understanding, and to-day there is a contractual obligation resting on the federal government to keep faith with these purchasers.

[Mr. Murphy.]

In answer to certain questions which I put on the order paper earlier in the session I obtained information to the following effect. Under the provisions of the act of 1908, as amended, there were 14,085,880 acres sold, of a value of approximately $42,257,640. Of that amount $19,837,288 have been collected, and there is still owing the sum of $7,300,000, leaving a total to the credit of the fund of $27,137,288. Of that amount $14,944,870 was expended up to February 28 of the present year, so that there is still a sum of $12,192,418 to the credit of the fund. I have said that the total amount collected was $19,837,288. Of this amount the sum of $14,944,870 has been spent, leaving a cash credit of $4,892,418. From the very first there has been determined opposition in certain quarters to the completion of the road and now that the completion is likely to be carried out, the opponents of the project are trying to reopen the question of the relative merits of Churchill and Nelson as a terminal. The port of Nelson was chosen as the terminal by two successive governments, after full investigation and report by competent engineers. Over $6,000,000 has been spent on the development of Port Nelson up to the present, and knowing these facts supporters of the road realize that a red herring is being drawn across the trail. But Mr. Speaker, we refuse to be drawn aside; we think there have been enough investigations during the last forty years, and that the time for action has now arrived.

The Conservative members from the west are frequently slightingly spoken of in this House as representing minorities. For the three prairie provinces, which may be taken as an economic unit, I would like to submit that the Conservative members do not represent minorities. I find that in these provinces during the last election there were cast for Conservative candidates 171,263 votes; for the Liberals 161,114 and for the Progressives 159,042. To elect each of the ten Conservatives from the prairie provinces it took 17,126 votes; for each Liberal 8,056, and for each Progressive 7,229. If the Conservatives were represented in this House according to the number of votes cast we would have at least twenty members instead of the ten we now have. I speak of this, Mr. Speaker, for the simple reason that the Progressives arrogate unto themselves the right to voice in this House the sentiments of the west, and I claim that the twenty-two Progressives, who represent only 116,114 votes do not express the feelings of the people of the prairie provinces any more than do the ten Conservatives, representing 171,263 votes.

The Progressive movement is not as strong and flourishing as it was a few short years ago. There is published in the west a paper called the Grain Growers' Guide, sometimes known as the Progressives' Bible. During some preceding years the subscription price has been $2 a year, $1 of which went to pay for the paper, the other dollar being the membership fee in the farmers' local. But so badly have the Progressives fallen off—

Mr. FORKE: I do not wish to let that statement pass, Mr. Speaker; the hon. member must know that he is not stating the fact. I have taken the Grain Growers' Guide for a good many years—

Mr. MURPHY: Is the hon. gentleman asking a question?

Mr. FORKE: Did I understand my hon. friend to say that $1 paid for membership in the United Farmers, and $1 went to the paper?

Mr. MURPHY: That is my information.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member is mistaken.

Mr. MURPHY: I think I am absolutely correct. That may not apply to a certain year which the hon. member has in mind, but I am sure that the facts have been as I have stated for at least some years. I have in my hand a notice from the Grain Growers' Guide, which says:

> Great bargain! Guide subscription rate is now $1 for three years.

The Progressive party have fallen on such hard times in the west that they have had to make bargain rates for the organ which is supposed to represent Progressive opinion.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make my position clear regarding the fiscal policy of the Conservative party. As I understand it the aim of the Conservative fiscal policy is to manufacture Canadian raw products in Canada; to stimulate the development of Canadian resources by the Canadian people; to develop industries of the right nature; a policy which will provide employment for Canadian workmen and provide traffic for our railways; a policy which will keep Canadians in Canada and attract other people to our shores; a policy which will accomplish all these results without exploitation of the people and which will restore confidence by placing our tariff on an adequate, scientific, and above all a stable basis. If Canada is always to remain a country of magnificent distances with a sparse population fringing its borders; a nation of producers of primary products, then the policy which aims at free trade is the right one. But I believe Canada has a greater destiny before her, and that the proper way to make our country as far as possible a self-sufficient nation is by means of a national protective policy.

Mr. J. A. VERVILLE (Lotbinière) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty to take part in the debate which has been going on in this House for several days concerning what we have agreed to call the budget.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in joining my congratulations to those, most flattering and most sincere, which you have already received since the beginning of the session, on the great honour which has come to you and of which we are all proud.

You will find it quite natural for a beginner to crave your indulgence should my inexperience cause me to commit some faux pas, which will undoubtedly happen despite my best efforts to prevent it. Not having the advantage of sufficient fluency in the English tongue to permit of my speaking here the language of the very great majority of the members of this parliament, I do not feel called upon, however, to make excuses, since both languages are official and since I am convinced moreover, being true to my race, of the rights and the beauties of the tongue I speak. Allow me, in passing, to congratulate most sincerely the hon. member for North-east Toronto (Mr. Baker) on the splendid example he gave his fellow countrymen, and mine, the other day, when he spoke French in this House.

I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, of discussing in detail the Speech from the Throne, nor, especially, the very able and very sincere budget speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on April 15th. I merely wish to offer a few comments on certain questions which may interest the voters of my riding as also the voters of the district where I have the pleasure and the advantage of residing. Following the example set by several speakers since the opening of the session I take pleasure in acquainting you a little with the feelings and the needs of my constituents.

I shall not hide from you, Mr. Speaker, that the voters of the county of Lotbinière, which I have the honour to represent in this House, are very well pleased with the economic situation this government has placed them in. I represent a farming district where industries are few and far between. In certain parishes of course one will find small industrial establishments due to the initiative and energy of enterprising individuals; these establishments deserve to survive, and deserve all the encouragement the federal government can give them. But those who are at the head of them are workers who do not rely solely on legislation and tariff increases to succeed in business; but who rely chiefly on their own initiative and on the industry of their workmen.

As regards the farmers, who make up the large majority in the constituency I represent, they have felt, and still feel, the terrible crisis which followed the war. They are the ones who need protection, but that kind of protection which, while favouring them, will work no harm to the other classes of the community. To my mind the best protection the present administration could offer the agricultural class would be to afford them easier access to the markets of the world for the sale of their produce. Our farmers do not fear competition; they would rather have access to the markets than keep their produce at home so as to avoid competition.

When the election was being fought last fall I had the advantage,—if it might be called an advantage,—of being present at a large Conservative rally; and it amused me to hear distinguished speakers, with magnificent voice and gesture, their arms spread as though on a cross, their eyes lifted skywards, tell us that things looked very dark in the homes of our farmers, that even bread was getting scarce and that those who wished to avoid death by starvation had no choice but to nail boards over the windows of their homes and to leave Canada for the States. And the Liberal party was held responsible for all this. The result of the election shows that our good farmers are intelligent enough to judge their situation for themselves and that they laugh at calamity howlers just like the citizens of the province of Quebec laughed at Mr. Patenaude. At all events the situation of the farmers in my county, and I have reason to believe that the same thing is true elsewhere, has improved considerably within the last few years. And I claim that this is due in great measure to the wise administration of the present government during the last five years. One is inclined to wonder if Providence is not on the side of the Liberal party for whenever that party takes over the administration of public affairs conditions improve and the country prospers; while the facts prove that exactly the opposite happens each time the Conservative party is at the helm. I am loath to acquire a reputation as an overzealous partisan for speaking thus frankly; but I have always said what I thought and I do not wish to lose this habit in the House. Besides, the facts are there to prove the truth of what I say; and if we discard the red or blue cloths which blindfold us we must admit that these things are true. At any rate the voters I have had the pleasure of meeting since the beginning of the session are pleased with the present government and congratulate the Liberal party for having stayed in power and thus ensured the prosperity of the country. Since the Finance Minister brought down his budget the people have been rejoicing; my constituents, like everybody else, have expressed their deep satisfaction at all the good financial tidings contained in the budget speech.

The government is surely deserving of our most hearty congratulations for their excellent work and the marvels accomplished. After five years of administration, having found public affairs in a terrible mess, confronted with the complete disorganization which followed the war, and despite the acute crisis which has been felt for several years, the government is able to announce to the country a not inconsiderable surplus and moreover its determination to lift some $25,000,000 of taxes off the shoulders of the Canadian taxpayer. I fully appreciate that there is no putting an end to politics; nevertheless one must recognize facts and call things by their right names. For my part, and I believe I speak for the great majority of my constituents, the present government deserves our congratulations for all the excellent measures they have brought to our attention and I consider it a duty to offer them mine.

Since the opening of the session it has been essential that we should discuss each day and every day Maritime rights, western rights, and the rights of other provinces. You will bear witness, Mr. Speaker, that we have not tired the House with the question of the rights of the province of Quebec. I would not wish to revive the old problem of provincial rights; and if I mention the matter it is merely because I wish to explain my own attitude; I believe in giving to each province, as to the representatives of every county, the greatest possible measure of justice, with absolute impartiality, but with firmness. I understand that certain needs are felt in each riding; and I shall tell you nothing new when I say that Lotbinière county has needs of its own. There is one problem in particular which interests my county and the neighbouring counties on the south shore.

Since 1922 my predecessor in this House has striven to have a proper roadway afforded to vehicular traffic on the Quebec bridge.

A detailed report on this question must have been forwarded to the hon. Minister of Railways.

Let me draw your attention to the following fact: Resolutions asking for the construction of a road for vehicles on the Quebec bridge were adopted by the county councils of Lotbinière and Lévis and the municipal councils of almost every parish of my riding and addressed to the Department of Railways and Canals. Owing to the enormous and ever-increasing traffic of visitors in that part of the province, in summer, and to the very important traffic of the people of my riding and of the two adjacent counties and the city of Quebec, the construction of that road for vehicles on the Quebec bridge is now a necessity. The present government would indeed earn the gratitude of the voters of Lotbinière were they to start work on this improvement without delay. A minute ago, I said that this improvement is now a necessity and I will add that an inquiry that was conducted has proven the idea to be a practical one. The engineers of the National railways are of the opinion, I am told, that there is in the centre of the bridge plenty of room for the construction of such a road and that the approaches and the floor of the bridge could be so arranged as in no way to interfere with the railways. As you know, in recent years, commissions have been flourishing and if I had my way, I would follow the suggestion that was made before and I would appoint a commission that we could call "the Quebec bridge highway commission," which would be authorized to undertake the work for the project I am putting before the House now. It will be said, I suppose, by certain parties, that at a time when the government are trying to balance the budget, it would not be fair to undertake such a work that may necessitate a large expenditure. I may answer that the country is well able to spend to-day half a million dollars which is the amount required for this work. I will say more: I believe that the Federal government could easily come to an understanding with the provincial government and the Quebec city council and share with those two bodies the cost of the enterprise.

I respectfully submit those facts to the government and hope that they will give them their best attention. There cannot be any politics or patronage in connection with the building of this road, its construction is in the public interest and is a public utility; everybody would profit by the road and be glad to have it.

Before I take my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Séguin) for the good move he made last week when he insisted on the use of bilingual postage stamps. I wholly agree with him and I am glad to see that there are yet in this House well advised people who wish to preserve for the province of Quebec and its inhabitants of French descent their full rights. Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that we will always remember in all the measures that come before the House, as in the different departments of the government, that in the province of Quebec French Canadian citizens have rights equal to those of the citizens of the Maritime provinces, or of the prairie provinces or any other provinces as well and that those Quebec citizens are always respectful of the rights of others in the different parts of the country, but do not want others to abuse their generosity; they want others to remember that in this country the French Canadians are the pioneers unwilling to trespass on the rights of others and at the same time intent on safeguarding their own rights.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the budget debate it is appropriate that addresses should be as short and as pointed as circumstances will permit. I therefore propose to take a very brief portion of the time of the House this afternoon in dealing with some of the matters that are presented by the budget. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Verville) will pardon me if I do not deal directly with his address. I shall have to await the translation of it, but I assure him that I shall do him the honour to read it when the translation is available. It did not sound to me like the speech of a free trader, and I am going to assume that, like many of the other representatives of his province, he is a protectionist, and perhaps therefore we have very much in common and there would not be very much to criticize in his speech.

There have been, Mr. Speaker, several descriptions of this budget. It has been described as a popular budget. No doubt it was intended to be such, but popularity is as a rule of short life, particularly in matters political, and this budget is not, I think, as popular as it was on the day on which it was delivered. It has also been called the people's budget. I remember in connection with one budget—I think it was the first one delivered by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb)—one hon. member of this House described it as a juggler's budget. That was because of the fact that the figures were rather difficult to understand, rather difficult to analyze, and perhaps did not really disclose clearly the actual state of affairs. I think it was an appropriate description of that particular budget. I would describe this budget as one of insincerity and inconsistency. I say insincere, because of the manner in which the tax reductions in this budget are mentioned and dealt with. A great deal of credit is claimed for a reduction of taxation, and we are always pleased to note anything of that character, but Mr. Speaker, I think it would only have been fair and proper for the Finance Minister to point out that several of these taxes that have been reduced by this government were first put on by this government, and others that have been reduced were increased by this government.

Then in connection with the income tax reduction, which is, as I have said, very welcome, it comes only about two years too late. On this side of the House we have been pressing for it for the last two or three years, in pointing out the disparity between the taxation in Canada and the taxation in the United States, much to the disadvantage of Canada, in respect of its capital and of its industry.

The sales tax was, as hon. members know, increased by this government from 3 to 6 per cent, and subsequently reduced to 5 per cent. The stamp tax on cheques was very materially increased by this government, and remains as it was. An entirely new tax was put upon receipts. That has now been taken off, and is being claimed as an achievement.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when all this is taken into consideration, no real or substantial credit is due to this government in connection with the reduction of taxation which was, in the first instance, imposed or increased by this government.

I say this budget is inconsistent because it violates the clear, definite, positive pledges given by this government prior to the last election, and subsequent to it in the Speech from the Throne, in which it was stated definitely that tariff changes would be the subject of investigation by an expert commission before any reductions were made. The reduction in income tax gives rise to some speculation or comment as to the attitude of our Progressive friends. In the last parliament they were strongly in favour of this tax and loud in their protestations against any reduction in it. We have not heard in this debate one word of criticism from that section of the House in connection with the reduction in the income tax, and we wonder why this is the case. We wonder if a trade has been made, and if they have withheld criticism from the reduction in the income tax because of the concessions they are getting in respect of the reduction in taxation on automobiles. It is a matter for speculation, a matter for fair inference. Possibly before the debate is closed we may have some explanation of it.

While there is a reduction of taxation in this budget, there is no considerable relief for business nor any real stimulus to industry. What is vitally needed is a sweeping reduction of sales taxes and of super taxes on income in order that capital may be set free for the expansion of industrial enterprises and for projects of national development. As necessary is a revision of the tariff that will check destructive American competition with Canadian farm and factory products, give greater security to certain industries affected by the British preference, and guard against the inflow of goods made by cheaper labour in some of the countries of Europe.

The truth is that the greater burdens laid upon capital and industry in Canada as compared with the United States almost equal any protectionist duties levied in the interest of home industries, while the goods and products of Canada are shut out of the neighbouring country by a tariff which shows no mercy for Canadian farmers or manufacturers. It is even doubtful if the heavy Canadian surtaxes bring in as much revenue as would be realized under lower schedules. Taxes designed to punish the rich always bear more heavily upon the poor, and nothing is so fatal as scarcity of capital in an undeveloped country and particularly in a country lying, as we do alongside a rich and powerful neighbour with industries equipped and capital organized to challenge the commercial ascendancy of all other nations.

The new income-tax rates fixed by the budget give a measure of needed relief to smaller income-tax payers, but the schedules lack the essential element of equity; and when the best is said for what Mr. Robb has done, his budget is not so much a "people's budget" as a politicians' budget, designed to make votes for the government rather than to give fair play to capital, infuse energy into business, increase prosperity, and accelerate national progress.

The tariff policy of this country has been a subject of discussion for many years, and we had thought that it was fairly well established that a reasonable measure of protection was the policy of all parties until this government came into power. Certainly this is a matter which should be settled and established at the earliest possible moment. We hear voices in this parliament in favour of free trade and we are looking to the time when this issue will come before the people, clean and clear-cut, when it will not be entangled with any side issue, and when it does come, Mr. Speaker, we, on this side of the House have no doubt what the result will be. As I have said, we hear several voices, more in this House than in the last parliament, in favour of free trade and one may hope the matter may be forced to an issue at an early date. As to the policy of the leader of this party and those who support him in this House, there is absolutely no question whatever. We stand for a fair, reasonable and proper measure of protection for agriculture, for industry and for labour, and the fact that we stood for this in the last parliament, went to the country with fifty-one followers, and came back with one hundred and sixteen is in itself sure proof that that policy met with the approval of a large portion of the electors. We have often been told of conditions in what is said to be free trade England, and it is interesting for us to note just exactly what is taking place there. I have here an extract which I think is worth reading, taken from the Saturday Evening Post of April 17, 1926. This is a very excellent American periodical and its editorial column is strong and clean. I think this article may be looked upon as a fair pronouncement and a fair indication of an independent opinion with regard to what is taking place in England. The article is entitled "Protection in Great Britain" and reads:

> The gradual trend to a protective tariff in Great Britain is in some respects the most notable of the postwar developments in economic policy. Protection has come into Great Britain through the back door of safeguarding the industries, but it has made entrance just the same. Each industry must prove its case, but apparently the appeal is made to a sympathetic bench. The debates in parliament and the controversies in the public press are illuminating and sometimes astounding. The protestant language employed by free traders is sometimes unrestrained to the point of insult. When so highly developed a British industry as cutlery seeks and obtains a high protective tariff, it is time to sit up and take notice, for something unusual is going on.
> Taking cutlery as an illustration, the British goods are not only losing out in foreign markets but the foreign goods are invading the home market. Confessedly less durable than the British goods, the invading foreign goods look as good and sell for less. Is this high price of British goods due to low productivity or overorganized labour? Is it the result of antiquated equipment and methods? Is it the consequence of poor enterprise? These are all suggested as explanations, and indignantly repudiated by the classes concerned. Is it the result of underpaid labour in the countries from which the cheap competing goods come? Is it the result of depreciated currencies in competing countries? Is the Dawes plan responsible? Or debt payments? These are all offered in explanation. Finally, quite a large group hold the gold standard responsible at once for the loss of foreign markets and for the invasion of the home market by cheap foreign goods. And, of course, the successfully competing countries, ourselves included, flatter themselves that they have achieved a technical superiority over the British.
> It is too early in the process to determine the truth. Time would make the facts clear if the course of events were to continue undisturbed. But political action will intervene. The Liberal party has been the party of free trade. The Liberal party is breaking up. The two-party system will persist in Great Britain, but the two parties will be the Conservative and the Labour parties. The left wing of the Liberal party will go over to Labour, the right wing will join the Conservatives. A few outstanding figures among the Liberals will stand aloof, faithful to their creed and protestant without avail. Both the Conservative and the Labour parties lean toward protection, but for different reasons.

Mr. SPENCER: What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am quoting from the Saturday Evening Post, April 17, 1926. The article continues:

> With the dissolution of the Liberal party, free trade will pass into history. The doctrine of protection will take on an imperial complexion. There will be empire preferences, with higher duties against the outside world. It will be a strange sight to see the British Empire, whose foreign investments and positive balance of international trade rest on free trade, undertake to deal as of old in her capacity of banker and shipper for other trading countries while setting up tariff duties at the briny borders of the United Kingdom. In the view of the traditional Liberal, it will be protection for senile, not for infant industries. In the view of the protectionists, it is an inevitable adaptation to a fundamentally changed world condition.

In that article there is food for thought on the part of those who favour protection and those who favour free trade. Whatever our views may be on this question I think we are all agreed that as far as possible we should have stability of tariff; that business should not be frequently disturbed by radical changes, by increases or reductions in the tariff. That I think is a fair statement and one that will find general assent.

I have before me a statement made by the ex-Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding on this point. When he was delivering his budget speech in 1923 in this House, he said:

> There is a thought which does not receive as much consideration as I think sometimes it should be given in public discussion, and that is the desirability of something like tariff stability. Business men do not like to be always threatened with changes in the tariff.... The tariff as it will be when the changes proposed to-day come into effect will be a moderate tariff and probably as low as the country can afford to have under present conditions. Of course we cannot expect that it will be satisfactory to everybody. It will not meet the desires of those who would rigidly apply the principles of free trade. It will not meet the wishes of the advocates of high protection.

The leader of the opposition at this point interjected:

> It comes pretty close to it.

Mr. Fielding continued:

I think the country should be content to accept the tariff as it will now stand as one as fair and reasonable as can be prepared under all the circumstances, and business men should be able to carry on the various enterprises without the fear of being soon disturbed by further changes.

The very next session there was unfortunately for industry in this country a cut in several items of the tariff. I refer to the tariff on agricultural implements and the result to the allied industries has been very harmful. It is true that the larger industries—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To what class and to what body of people has the reduction been harmful?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): To the smaller factories that supply the parts to manufacturers of agricultural implements. I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that there has been a continued exodus of the workers of Canada to the United States. Many that I know personally have gone as a result of some of the factories not being able to continue to operate and to give them employment.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend knows that it was in the year 1923-24 that 200,000 people left Canada supposedly for the United States. Since the changes in the tariff in 1924, the figures for 1925 show the exodus as being fifty per cent less, indicating that the tariff changes had nothing to do with the exodus.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I wonder how long my hon. friend thinks Canada can stand an exodus at the rate at which it went on for a few years.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It has been going on for many years.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The exhaustion point would be reached in time. The rate of the exodus is bound to decrease.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The exodus was taking place before the changes in the tariff in 1924.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And has continued since the changes in the tariff.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): At a reduced rate.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I say the exodus cannot continue in such large numbers every year. Between five and six hundred thousand people have gone and more are going as a result of the recent changes and the threatened changes in the tariff. I am sure my hon. friend will agree with the argument I am endeavouring to make that we should have reasonable tariff stability in this country. I do not like to quote at too great length, but for the benefit of the Minister of Public Works I will read this article that appeared in the Toronto Globe on Saturday, May 1, of this year, dealing with the question of tariff stability:

With his usual pointedness President Beatty of the Canadian Pacific Railway told the members of the Canadian Daily Newspapers' Association on Thursday night that what this country needed more than anything else was stability of tariff. It is a statement with which all business men will agree, regardless of their preference for high or low protection. As Mr. Beatty says, it is common sense, not politics.

Business has become so intricate, the elements entering into it so finely adjusted, that it is highly sensitive, and may be greatly affected by slight changes in tariff. It is essential in a well-managed business that department costs bear a fixed relation to one another and to the complete product, while high-speed efficiency requires a minimum of lost motion in every avenue of expense and of waste material in every commodity used. It is plain that under these conditions it takes some time to establish basic costs upon which the machinery, both physical and human, will run with uninterrupted smoothness, and that uncertainty of obtaining and maintaining these conditions makes the life of a business rather precarious.

The tariff is not the only factor which may cause disturbance, but so long as an industry knows what contribution the tariff makes to raw material costs it is so much to the good in the matter of stability. It can commit itself to purchases on that basis, for a long time in advance if desirable. So President Beatty remarked that if he met a high-tariff man and a low-tariff man he would be disposed to say to them: "Gentlemen, fix it up bewteen yourselves, but fix it and make it reasonably stable." He added the significant comment that important British and American companies in many lines of manufacture were waiting to invest money in this country, and would not come in until they knew what our tariff was to be for a reasonable length of time.

Periodical tariff "tinkering" has a disrupting effect on business. When changes are needed they should be made only after careful, scientific study, with due regard to the fiscal requirements of the country, but as infrequently as possible.

That is the point I was endeavouring to make and I would like the Minister of Public Works to consider it and the statements made in this paper which is friendly to his government.

That brings me to the question of the tariff on automobiles and the tariff reduction proposed by this budget. This subject of the reduction in the duty on automobiles has engaged the attention of this House on previous occasions and has been fully discussed. I would refer to Hansard of the session of 1925 when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) dealt with this matter, because his observations on that occasion are a little different from what he said in connection with the present budget. As reported on page 1185 of Hansard of 1925 the Minister of Finance said, speaking of the amount of capital coming from the United States for investment in this industry:

> If his statement to-night is correct it would seem that there has been some United States capital invested in the business since then. But without going into that feature, I would remind the hon. gentleman that no matter where the capital comes from, the industry gives employment to Canadian labour. There are 78 plants engaged in the manufacture of automobiles and their accessories in Canada, employing Canadian labour, and subject to Canadian taxation, a considerable amount in taxes finding its way into the Canadian treasury.
> My hon. friend quoted some prices to show the difference in value between an automobile in the United States and one of similar pattern and style in Canada. I know of course that there is some discrimination, but we account for part of it ourselves. The hon. member will bear in mind that we place a sales tax on the automobile of 5 per cent, and we also impose a luxury tax of 5 per cent on automobiles costing up to $1,200, and 10 per cent on those over $1,200. I mention this figure to remind my hon. friend that the difference in the duty, even admitting his figures, does not account for the difference in the respective prices. I agree with the hon. gentleman that in many parts of Canada the automobile has become a necessity. But it is not always a necessity for there are many people owning and operating motor cars who in my opinion would be better off without them. . . . . As my hon. friend has truly said, we have in Canada a considerable number of cars. I do not remember the figures he gave but the record I have is 513,821. From the owners of these cars the provinces collect in taxes the sum of $9,290,900.82. . . . . The fact of the matter is that the automobile has cost the different provinces of Canada millions of dollars to improve their roadways besides huge sums annually to maintain them. I submit to the hon. gentleman that the automobile is a fair source from which to collect revenue.

That was in the session of 1925. At that time the Minister of Finance did not seem to be of the opinion that the duty should be reduced.

Mr. BOUCHARD: If my hon. friend's party were returned to power would he recommend an increase in automobile duties?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If my party is returned to power, as I think it will be before very long, it will live up to the pledges it has given to the people. What we complain of is that this government has not honoured its pledges. It went to the Canadian people and said that, so far as the tariff was concerned, no changes would be made before there had been a careful and thorough investigation. That is exactly what should have taken place in connection with the industry I am now discussing, and that is the policy which my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) laid down in a resolution presented to this House in June last. It is the policy that will be carried out on our coming into power.

Now, I was dealing with the tariff reductions on automobiles. If it is desirable to reduce the prices of automobiles—and I quite agree with the contention that as far as possible they should be reduced—the government had at its disposal a very sure and safe way of effecting such a reduction without injury to the industry. They could have removed the excise tax of five per cent on cars up to $1,200 and the sales tax on cars up to the same price. That would have meant a reduction in the case of a car costing $1,200 of $120 and it would have been a very much greater reduction than will be secured through reducing the duties as now proposed. In the case of a car costing $2,000 there would be at once a difference in price of $200 if these two taxes were eliminated. Having made such a provision to secure reduced prices the government could then have conducted an investigation into the main industry and all its allied activities to ascertain just how much protection they were receiving. Had they done so they would only have been following the course which they themselves outlined in their campaign speeches and in the Speech from the Throne.

This is the most severe and drastic cut in the history of the tariff as we have had it in Canada, and the effect will be far-reaching. Indeed, it is difficult to predict how serious the consequences will be, for there are so many allied industries dependent upon the manufacture of automobiles in connection with the supplying of parts and materials, and from the standpoint of capital invested. The amount of capital invested is very large indeed. The automobile and allied industries embrace hundreds of manufacturers engaged in the development of raw materials in all stages up to the finished product, and over $100,000,000 of capital is invested. There are also vast numbers of workers involved. The budget in its direct and drastic tariff reduction has therefore created a state of tariff uncertainty which threatens to have far-reaching effects on the country's industrial development. Whatever may be the fate of industries which have been established in Canada behind the tariff protection which has now been removed, and some or all of which industries may be closed as a result of imports from the United States, there can be little doubt that the establishment of further American plants in Canada, and the expansion of the industries already operating here, have been discouraged in a very definite way. The ramifications of the automobile industry can only be grasped when the extent of the purchases of manufacturers in the shape of supplies and materials is taken into consideration. It is estimated that parts sold to motor manufacturers during the past year amounted to some $50,000,000. So that we have, as I have said, a very severe and drastic cut in the tariff, made without investigation or proper consideration, and in violation of the pledges given by this government.

A very large deputation having waited upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and members of the cabinet in connection with this proposed reduction, the Prime Minister said that his government would be influenced not so much by numbers as by arguments. Apparently the voice of 3,000 people speaking as one had little weight with him, whereas the voice of a few members within this House seems to have had a great deal of influence. There is no doubt whatever that this reduction in the tariff, in the face of the pledge given by the government that there would be an investigation and in the face of the statement contained in the Speech from the Throne to the same effect, is a matter of political expediency, pure and simple, and has nothing whatever to commend it from any other source.

I wish to place on Hansard a resolution passed by the council of the town of Gananoque. There is no automobile factory in that town but there are several factories that supply parts required in the industry, and this resolution will reveal how far-reaching will be the effects of the proposed reduction. The resolution was passed on April 20, 1926, and was forwarded to me in a letter addressed by the town clerk, Mr. J. H. Sampson. Mr. Sampson writes:

> I am directed by the municipal council of the town of Gananoque to forward you the following resolution passed at their meeting last night:
> That this council of the town of Gananoque views with regret and great alarm the prospect of serious injury to the automotive industry of Canada as a result of the federal government reducing the tariff of import duties on automobiles, and that, in view of the fact that the prosperity of the industries of this town depend so much upon the prosperity of the automobile industry of Canada, and that the prosperity of the town in general is so dependent upon the work which its factories offer, we feel justified in presenting this motion of formal protest at the action which the government has seen fit to take. To us it seems, beyond the possibility of doubt, that the industrial life of Gananoque is seriously threatened by the budget now before the federal House, and we do therefore present this protest, believing it will receive the consideration which it deserves, we do so further move that a copy be sent to the Prime Minister Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, as well as copies to the Hon. J. A. Robb and to our representative in the House of Commons, Mr. Hugh Alexander Stewart, K.C.

As I have said that shows how far-reaching the effect of a reduction in the tariff is. This deputation, it seems to me, furnished an unanswerable argument in connection with the proposed reduction. They referred to the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne dealing with tariff changes, and asked that there should be a thorough investigation before this reduction was put into effect. That is the position of these manufacturers, that is the position of these employees. I do not not know myself whether the duty is too high or too low, whether the proposed reduction is reasonable or unreasonable; all that I am contending for is that there should have been that thorough, complete, exhaustive, impartial investigation which the serious consequences of an action of this kind would warrant. It seems to me the action of the government in this matter is a breach of faith. Not only that, but it is a breach of contract, it is a breach of duty to Canadian industry and Canadian labour. The highest tribute that we can pay to an individual is to say of him that his word is his bond; and the highest tribute that could be paid to a government would be to say that it was honest, sincere and fearless in the discharge of its duties and fulfilment of its pledges. That tribute surely cannot be paid to this government by even its most ardent supporters. Rather must it be said that the making by them of a pledge is almost a sure indication that that pledge will be broken. We have had promises of tariff stability, but instead of tariff stability we have had tariff tinkering. We have had it to such an extent that the supporters of the government were compelled to rise in this House and register a protest. We have had it to such an extent that industry has become unsettled, it has lost confidence, there has been no expansion, and our people have been forced to go to the United States.

We had a pledge from this government, through its Prime Minister at Richmond Hill, that in view of the difficulties experienced in the last parliament, it would not attempt to carry on unless it was more strongly supported in the next; and although the result of that election was to defeat the Prime Minister and all of his ministers from Ontario, and to seriously reduce his following in the House, we find the government attempting to carry on in violation of the solemn pledge it gave to the people on that occasion. We had a pledge given to the House in the Speech from the Throne, a pledge which was very clear, definite and positive with repect to action in connection with the tariff. The House is very familiar with the government's pledge, but it will bear repeating. It reads as follows:

> They believe that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncrtainty with rspect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries, and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith. This board will be expected to make a careful study of the customs tariff, the revenue to be derived therefrom and the effect of the tariff and allied factors on industry and agriculture.

If that did not constitute a solemn pledge to parliament and to the Canadian people I can conceive of nothing that would constitute a pledge, and yet the ink on that pledge is scarcely dry before this government proceeds to violate it by an unwarranted, an unreasonable, a drastic cut in the tariff to the great detriment of the automobile industry.

There are some respects in which I complain of this budget from another standpoint. The tariff should be raised in certain directions, and it should first be raised in the case of farm products. That has been very definitely and clearly set out as the policy of this party and of our leader. I am sure that what has happened in the last few months has amply justified that policy, and warranted us in our criticisms of the Australian treaty. We find that there came into Canada during the first three months of the present year the following imports of butter from the countries named:

	Australia	New Zealand	United States
	Lbs.	Lbs.	Lbs.
January, 1926.. ..	473,200	570,185	1,347
February, 1926.. ..	842,520	1,073,232	4,178
March, 1926	1,169,504	648,589	40,240
Total..	2,485,224	2,292,006	45,765

These imports had the effect of displacing an equivalent amount of Canadian butter in the Canadian market. Australian and New Zealand butter is being sold in the city of Ottawa, and in the other cities and towns of Ontario, in competition with our own Canadian butter. We prevent the manufacture and importation of oleomargarine, but what is the use of doing that if we are going to allow Canadian butter to be displaced by butter imported from Australia or New Zealand? This is a serious matter for the Canadian dairy industry. The Minister of Agriculture may contend that we were short of butter at this time, but the fact is that we were exporting some butter during those months. I have the figures from the Bureau of Statistics, which show that in January of 1926 we exported 182,891 pounds of butter; in February 72,480 pounds, and in March 119,542 pounds, or a total export of 374,913 pounds of butter in those three months. So it will be clearly seen that our own product is being driven off the market by Australian and New Zealand butter, which comes into Canada under the ridiculously low tariff of one cent per pound. As a result our agricultural interests are suffering, and we contend that in comparison with the duties imposed against us by the United States, our tariff should be raised. We import farm products from the United States to the value of over $100,000,000 each year, products which our farmers can and do produce, and which they are forced to sell in foreign markets.

There is another duty which I think should be imposed, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to deal with the matter because it was so thoroughly covered by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken). I refer to the duty on magazines coming into Canada. The hon. member made out a case which, in my opinion, is unanswerable. This importation has been going on to the detriment of Canadian publishers and other Canadian interests for a great many years. I wish in this connection to refer to an article appearing in the Toronto Saturday Night which sets forth my contention in this respect perhaps better than I could state it myself:

> There comes into Canada annually twenty-five million copies of American magazines. Many of them have a larger circulation in Canada than have our own journals. In the newspaper field United States journals are also eating their way in to an amazing extent. For instance, one "tabloid" newspapers, printed in New York, has a circulation of some 50,000 copies weekly in Montreal, and probably half that number in Toronto; while such newspapers as the New York Times probably sell to the extent of a million copies annually in this country.
> Slowly but surely Canadian publications are being crowded to the wall, and each day the position becomes worse. United States periodicals are practically given away to the readers in Canada, the national advertisers, with headquarters in the United States footing the bills. Presumably they get their money back by the sale of American goods to Canadians.
> A certain United States weekly publication now making a drive for more circulation in this country is selling for $2 per annum, of which amount $1.80 goes to the canvasser. The white paper in this journal could not be bought in the open market for less than ten cents per copy, to say nothing of the many dollars expended in one way and another before the finished product reaches the reader. And our postmen are becoming round shouldered carrying them around.
> We are merely being used as a dumping ground for surplus United States production, but unfortunately the dumping clause in our Customs Act does not cover the poor Canadian publisher. He is the one manufacturer of all manufacturers who has to stand the gaff.
> Of course there is but one end to such business, and that is the ultimate extinction of Canadian literature. In latter years Canadian printers, pressmen, and writers, have formed an unending procession moving toward the United States border. They are all going where they have a better chance, or from sheer necessity having lost their jobs.

And so on. The value of the Canadian press upon Canadian opinion can scarcely be over-estimated, and if we are to maintain a proper national spirit in this country we must see to it that we have a Canadian press expressing Canadian ideals, and one which is not continually holding before our people the ideals of our neighbours to the south. Great as those ideals may be from their standpoint they are not our ideals. Further, it is undoubtedly true that our merchants are losing a tremendous volume of business every year because of the attractive advertising presented to the Canadian public in the immense number of American magazines sold from week to week. I can think of nothing more in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole than the imposition of a good stiff duty against these magazines.

Mr. FORKE: I would like to point out to the hon. member that he was advertising the Saturday Evening Post not very long ago.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am not condemning the Saturday Evening Post.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member was advertising it in the House of Commons.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And I am not a bit ashamed of doing so; I was advertising the editorial comment. That does not appear to please my free trade friend, but I think it is perfectly sound, notwithstanding.

Mr. FORKE: I did not read it.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Perhaps it would not have hurt the hon. member to have done so. I am not advocating the exclusion of this magazine, but I do say it is unfair for the Saturday Evening Post or any other magazine to come into Canada below cost.

Mr. FORKE: It is the worst offender, regarding advertising, of all the periodicals we get.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If it is the worst offender it will be the hardest hit if my suggestion is adopted. While many of its editorial articles are attractive and sound, the advertising is to the detriment of the Canadian people and Canadian merchants, and I sincerely hope the government will consider the imposition of a duty such as I have suggested on the advertising matter appearing in these publications.

I believe that concludes what I have to say regarding the budget, and I wish now to deal with the amendment presented by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). One very remarkable thing I have noticed in this debate is the studious way in which hon. members opposite have evaded or avoided this amendment, which reads as follows:

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

In the late general election campaign assurances were repeatedly given by the Prime Minister and other ministers of the crown that before further tariff changes were made an opportunity would be given industries affected thereby to be heard before an advisory board.

That such assurances were officially incorporated by the government in the Speech from the Throne of the present session in the following words:

"Changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith."

That such tariff advisory board was accordingly appointed.

And this House regrets that in the case of drastic changes announced in the budget such assurances have not been fulfilled.

This amendment simply emphasizes the pledges given by this government to deal with this tariff in a particular way, and points out that the government have failed to fulfil that pledge and have violated the provisions of the Speech from the Throne which they themselves prepared. I think that amendment is unanswerable, and perhaps that is the reason none of the speakers on the other side of the House have dealt with it. I do not see how any hon. member can vote against that amendment. It is an indictment that has not been and cannot be answered. The pledge is there; the pledge comes from the government itself. The violation of it is there, and comes from the government itself, and I cannot possibly see how any hon. member who desires to emphasize the necessity of candour and sincerity in public life can vote against this amendment.

I shall vote against this budget, Mr. Speaker, because it is a breach of faith; it is a breach of contract, and it is a breach of duty. By its adoption the confidence of the people in Canada, in industry, and in capital, will be further disturbed, because it will discourage the investment of capital and the establishment of industry in Canada, and will encourage the exodus of our people to the United States.

I shall vote for the amendment because it emphasizes the necessity of a sane, sound and safe method of dealing with agriculture, industry, and labour, in respect to tariff matters, because it condemns treachery, political expediency, and bad faith, and affirms the importance of honesty and integrity on the part of public men and of governments.

Mr. W. J. LOVIE (Macdonald): The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Stewart) made a remark a few minutes ago, which I jotted down, to the effect that there has been no expansion in Canada. I am not going to answer that statement along the line of trying to defend any particular government of any particular party, but I shall answer it by quoting from an article that appears in the May number of Canadian Chemistry and Metallurgy. This article was written by an expert and concerns the pulp and paper industry in Canada. I shall quote only such portions as will serve to answer the remark made by my hon. friend who has just sat down. It says:

When one comes to survey the happenings in the pulp and paper industry during the last twelve months it is almost impossible to overcome a feeling of bewilderment at the number and magnitude of the projects which have been completed, which are under construction, or which have been planned and are about to be started. In practically all parts of Canada we hear of new mills being constructed and of established mills expanding, with the results that the industry is developing at an almost fantastic rate, which was absolutely undreamed of a couple of years ago, and which has no parallel in the paper making history of any other country in the world.

Of course, the great bulk of the paper produced is newsprint; and the expansion of this branch of the industry will best be visualized by quoting a few figures recently published by the Newsprint Service Bureau. During 1925 ten machines with a rated daily capacity of 890 tons were started up in Canada and Newfoundland (of which four machines with a capacity of 375 tons were in Newfoundland), while eighteen machines with a total rated capacity of 1,715 tons per day are scheduled to start up in 1926, only one of them being in Newfoundland. And the end is not yet in sight, for already work is well under way in connection with machines to be installed during 1927 and 1928.

It should be remembered, however, that the actual production of these machines may be, and probably will be, greater than the rated capacity. Competition has resulted in quite an appreciable reduction in the price of newsprint during the last two or three years, and the mills have been forced to increase operating efficiency so as to lower cost of production. Great strides have been made in this direction, and the good work which was begun a couple of years ago has been kept up and even improved upon, with very striking results. The Belgo mill at Shawinigan Falls, for instance, has a rated capacity of 390 tons, but has turned out up to 425 tons in 24 hours. In 1919 it was considered a good day's work at the Abitibi mill at Iroquois Falls, Ontario, when they turned out 240 tons a day; but recently the same machines produced 295 tons. This mill has since been enlarged to a rated capacity of 500 tons; the record production for a single day is very close to 550 tons, and the average daily production is in the neighbourhood of 525 tons.

When the members of the Progressive party toured the Maritime provinces just a year ago, we saw at the town of Edmundston on the St. John river a pulp mill being built on the Canadian side, and just across the river, on the American side, a paper mill was being built, and we came to the conclusion that the two were owned by Americans, and that the idea was that the pulp mill on the Canadian side was being built to beat the embargo, and that the pulp would be run across the line and be manufactured into paper on the American side. The article goes on to say:

An interesting development has been what virtually amounts to the construction of a Canadian fine paper mill in the United States. The Fraser Companies had a large sulphite mill at Edmundston, New Brunswick. There was a ready market for their pulp in the United States; but if it were converted into paper in Canada it could not compete with American papers in the United States owing to the high customs duty imposed by the American tariff. As their pulp mill is on the international boundary, the company overcame the difficulty by building the paper mill at Madawaska, Maine, just across the river from their Edmundston mill. Not the least interesting feature of this combination is the big double pipe line through which the sulphite stock is pumped in slush form from the pulp mill on the Canadian side to the paper mill on the American side. The first machine of this two-machine mill was started up last November.

So Canadians are not only manufacturing their own paper supplies, but are invading the United States' market as well.

One other portion of this article I should like to read because it concerns the Australian treaty, a treaty which the Progressive members of this House voted against a year ago because they thought it would be of no benefit to Canada, but which has proved of benefit to Canada along lines not dreamed of one year ago. The article says:

But though newsprint throws other branches of the industry considerably in the shade, it must not be taken for granted that nothing is being done along other lines. The Australian trade treaty has already been of greater benefit to the Canadian paper industry than had been anticipated. It is now expected that Canada may obtain nearly half the Australian newsprint market, while the demand for Canadian book and writing papers is also good. Provincial Paper Company is developing its business in this promising market to good effect, and as a result has decided to go ahead with the installation of another machine in its Port Arthur mill. Another project directly traceable to the Australian treaty is the organization of the Canadian-Scottish Paper Mills, which will erect a coating mill for book and litho papers on the Pacific coast.

We have repeatedly heard it stated in this House since the opening of this session that if Canada is going to prosper, there will have to be quite a radical change in the tariff to look after the needs of Canadian industry, and that we must have what has been called tariff stability. Some have said that we should have a high tariff, and some newspapers have advocated a tariff, brick for brick, with the American tariff. Others proclaim that the policy of Canada from this time onwards must be a protectionist tariff, and Canada must be definitely committed to the policy of protection. For the last forty years, Mr. Speaker, Canada, no matter whether it was under a Liberal or a Conservative government, has been under a protective tariff. In 1878 when the question was up, an amendment was moved to the budget by Sir John A. Macdonald. I am not going to quote the amendment, because it was put on Hansard just a year ago by the then member for Brome, Mr. McMaster, but I should like to quote a part of Sir John A. Macdonald's speech to show that Canada over forty years ago was suffering from the same ills that afflict her to-day, and that after forty-eight years of the National Policy she has not advanced one bit. She is still suffering from the same ills, and we hear almost the same speches, word for word, to-day as were made in the House of Commons forty-eight years ago. What did Sir John A Macdonald say? He said:

> We have no manufacturers here. We have no work-people; our work-people have gone off to the United States. They are to be found employed in the western states, in Pittsburgh, and, in fact, in every place where manufactures are going on. These Canadian artisans are adding to the strength, to the power, and to the wealth of a foreign nation instead of adding to ours. Our work-people in this country, on the other hand, are suffering for want of employment. Have not their cries risen to heaven Has not the hon. the Premier been surrounded and besieged, even in his own department, and on his way to his daily duties, by suffering artisans who keep crying out: "We are not beggars, we only want an opportunity of helping to support ourselves and our families." Is not such the case also in Montreal and in Quebec?

Then another part of the speech refers to the Maritime provinces. He predicted that if the National Policy were inaugurated we should prosper. He said:

> We shall then grow up rapidly a good, steady and mature trade between the provinces, rendering us independent of foreign trade, and not, as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia formerly did, look to the United States or to England for trade, but look to Ontario and Quebec—sending their products west, and receiving the products of Quebec and Ontario in exchange. Thus the great policy, the National Policy, which we on this side are advocating, would be attained.

These remarks, Mr. Speaker, are very much like the speeches we have listened to in this House since January 7, of this year, and if, after fifty years under a National Policy consistently maintained, Canada is not prospering, there must be some reason for it. If one would take a map of Canada and examine it closely he could easily tell the reason for it. I do not want to be accounted a traitor to the country I love or anything else in that line, but I may say that the reason is that you are trying to do politically what cannot be done, in view of the geography of the country. The natural trend of the trade of the country is north and south, and you are endeavouring by political lines to turn the trade—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Why does the hon. member say the natural trend of the trade is north and south?

Mr. LOVIE: Because the south raises products which the north needs, and the north raises products which the south needs. I am not speaking of Canada alone, but I am dealing with the whole continent. Do not imagine that I am advocating annexation. I merely look at the map of Canada and I say that is one of the reasons why Canada is not prospering.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is the natural trade of Canada in wheat from north to south, and from the south to the north?

Mr. LOVIE: Probably not in wheat, but we have other products.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Take meats and dairy products.

Mr. LOVIE: It is north and south in meats.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Not at all.

Mr. LOVIE: Indeed it is.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is the United States not a large exporter of meats and is Canada not a large exporter of meats?

Mr. LOVIE: If the hon. member will wait I will answer his question. I will touch on the question of cattle raising later.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I will await your pleasure.

Mr. LOVIE: I propose later on in my address taking up the question of cattle raising as regards Canada and the United States. We have heard in this country—the matter has been discussed time and again—about the wonderful prosperity of the United States through its protective tariff, and certainly we have to admit that the United States is a very wealthy country. There are a great many things about the United States we do not know, unless we go after the information. During this session and preceding sessions I have been endeavouring to get first-hand information regarding conditions in the United States to ascertain how the tariff affects agriculture. In seeking to obtain this information I wrote to the chairman of the Fair Tariff League, which is composed of about two million members all over the United States. I am going to place on Hansard the information I received. A great deal of this information is along the line of the answers which I received from the Fair Tariff League. It has reference to the agricultural industry and the cattle raising industry of the United States. This information was contained in an article written for publication, but it came into my hands before it reached the press in the United States. The article reads:

The Farmers Eighty-Seven Cent Dollar.

This refers to the American farmer, not the Canadian farmer. The article says:

American farmers should be very prosperous; there was never so great a demand for their products. They export $2.000,000,000 worth of products.

Russia is out of the market as an exporter of food stuffs, formerly one of our principal competitors. Germany is 20 per cent below pre-war production, and the other war worn nations of Europe are below normal in production This should make our farmers accumulate profits against harder competition in days to come. Instead of accumulating handsome money reserves, according to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace in 1920, (our farmers lost 3.1 per cent of their capital; in 1921 they lost 1.4 per cent. in 1922 they made a profit of 1.5 per cent and in 1923 a profit of 1.4 per cent. The year of 1924-5 was very little better than the previous year.

In the best of these years they made 1½ per cent on their capital being less than ¼ of the rate they paid on their farm mortgages—6.7 per cent. The average farmer received as his reward for the management of his property and his personal labour in the year 1922-3 $454 and in the year 1923-4, $520. He got less than the average wage that he paid his hired man, without board, the same years—$501 in 1922-3 and $563 in 1923-4. We can easily understand how he feels when he reads of the astonishing profits of many of our manufacturers and the cash dividends and their enormous increase in capitalization.

Our farmers used to think that they could make big profits out of the tariff as so many manufacturers do. They know better now, after the ridiculous attempt in the emergency tariff of 1921 and the present tariff enacted in 1922. Our farmers know that 90 per cent of their crop must be sold on the export or free trade basis of Liverpool and Hamburg at the price obtained in those markets less 1000 miles of land transportation and 3,500 miles of ocean carriage. The farmer knows that he must buy many of his manufactured supplies in reverse order, that is the European price, plus ocean and land freights, plus unreasonably high tariff rates. The American farmer sells Europe minus, he buys Europe plus. He is the milch cow of production. He has always been a protectionist, at least in the northern and western States, but he knows that the present customs and most of the tariffs since the Civil War have not been honestly protectionist, but grossly over protective and profiteering. The excess cost of the present tariff over and above the requirements of reasonable protection is fairly estimated to be not less than $5,000,000,000, and American farmers being about one-third of our population and buying more than average citizens lose one third of this duty. Should it be any surprise under these circumstances that our farmers now demand equality with manufacturers, either through a righteous reduction in duty on manufactured products, so that our farmers may buy their manufactured supplies more favourably, and their 87 cent dollar should be made of equal purchasing power with the manufacturer's dollar, or that the federal government shall establish a farm market corporation with $100,000,000 which shall sell our surplus crops abroad in such quantities as to create a scarcity demand at home and thereby raise domestic prices 15 per cent and raise the farmers' 87 cent dollar to par. One or the other of these things must be done; our farmers will not work for nothing, nor should they.

On the question of what the American farmer is doing along the line of trying to bring himself up to the level of the protected manufacturer, we have been reading in the press reports of the Haugen bill which is expected to go through the United States Senate. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) two years ago stated that if the tariff was going to be raised in Canada and if the United States tariff was to be maintained as it was, the United States farmer, to use his expression, would be getting his feet into the trough just as well as the others. The United States farmer is evidently going to get his feet into the protectionist trough along with the others and what the outcome will be it is very hard to say. The United States congress will evidently not be allowed to adjourn without something being done to settle this question. This is from an article by Tom King who writing from Washington under the heading "Putting up Farm Prices," says:

Even the defeat of the Haugen bill in the House would not put an end to the agitation. The House cannot adjourn for more than three days at a time without the consent of the Senate, and the senatorial farm bloc announces that congress will not be allowed to adjourn until farm relief legislation of a satisfactory kind is passed.

This is certainly worth while watching in the United States. The Manitoba Free Press in an editorial headed "Nearing the Showdown," says:

Thus the tariff is to be made "effective" for farmers. They are to be given—in the language of the Canadian protectionists—"adequate" protection. Agriculture is to be placed on a parity with industry, partly by huge cash subsidies from the public treasury, and partly by much higher prices to be charged hereafter to the consumer behind the tariff wall against the world.

It is a logical working out of the doctrine of protection. If the manufacturers are to have high prices guaranteed by law, why not the farmers? Why should not the farmers, as well as the railways, the manufacturers and the wage earners, be helped to more abundant prosperity by legislation?

But who is going to pay for it all?

That is the crux of the whole situation.

Food prices will go up and with them the wage level. The manufacturer will charge still more and the transportation companies will demand higher rates. But can all this additional burden be heaped upon the salaried classes, unskilled labour, and the people with fixed incomes?

They are the ones who are going to bear the brunt of the burden.

It is an interesting experiment upon which the United States is apparently about to embark. Will it vindicate protection or destroy it? If the result of the legislation now before the United States congress—assuming it to be enacted and enforced—does not redress the inequalities of the present system but merely raises prices all around, adding to the burden of the classes that cannot be protected, what then?

That is the question that has to be answered.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is it the intention of the legislation to which the hon. member has referred to raise the tariff all along the line on farm products in the United States?

Mr. LOVIE: The idea is to give the United States farmer what his product is worth in the markets of the world plus the tariff. The surplus will be exported and sold and the country will assume the loss.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is that relief to be given by raising the tariff on farm products entering the United States?

Mr. LOVIE: No; a fund has been created for the purpose, to put the United States farmer on a level with the protected manufacturer.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is something on the line of the Pattersen scheme in Australia.

Mr. FORKE: Much the same.

Mr. LOVIE: According to Tom King the bill will apparently have to go through congress. It is seeking to put the farmer on a parity with the manufacturer. As the Free Press says: "What then?" What is the result going to be?

This article from which I am about to quote has been circulated all through the United States by the Fair Tariff League. It is headed "Fordney-McCumber Tariff Facts." It is produced by an organization which is utterly opposed to free trade, a body of men who are avowed protectionists, only as they say, they are fair protectionists; they are against profiteering. This is a criticism of the Fordney-McCumber tariff from United States people themselves:

The Fordney-McCumber Tariff act (1922) was passed in the interest of a special privilege class of manufacturers, who alone profit at the expense of every other class, including not only persons engaged in great agricultural industries and all other natural industries, but at the expense also of every person who works for his living and every person engaged in legitimate business.

The Fordney-McCumber Tariff act costs the people of the United States not less than $4,000,000,000 a year in excessive prices of the things they have to buy. Of this enormous sum only $500,000,000 goes into the United States treasury as tariff revenue; the other $3,500,000,000 goes into the pockets of the specially protected manufacturers. That is—87½ cents goes to profiteers—12½ cents goes to the government.

[Mr. Lovie.]

In other words, the Fordney-McCumber Tariff act costs the American people annually as much as it costs to run the entire government of the United States.

The Fordney-McCumber Tariff act not only increases the prices of all manufactured products, but it opens the door to profiteering, first, by shutting out competing articles so that exorbitant prices can be charged, and second, by pyramiding tariff rates and providing the opportunity for additional exorbitant increases.

The Fordney-McCumber Tariff act is the chief and almost the sole cause of the present high cost of living and the continuous increase in living cost from time to time.

An analysis of 29 industries making the merchandise that fills our retail stores—cottons, woolens, aluminum wares, gloves, hosiery, glassware, china, etc., shows that the Fordney-McCumber act permits the manufacturers to charge over $5,000,000,000 above the price of the imported article. If but two-thirds of the total was added, $3,300,000,000, to these articles there would be a tariff tax of $30 per capita or $150 per year for the average family of five.

Every rent payer, every builder and every home-owner is a victim of the tariff. An analysis of seven basic industries, pig-iron, bar steel, rails, structural iron, cast and wrought iron pipe, tin-plate and terne plate, and wire and wire work, shows that the Fordney tariff gives these industries allowances of $351,000,000 which cost the consumers twice this sum at retail, or $702,000,000. There is no reason for this tariff except price raising. We are the greatest and cheapest producers of steel on earth. In the three years of 1919 and 1921 inclusive, we exported, of these products 50 times more than we imported. The tariff on all railroad construction material is a big factor in existing high freight rates.

The steel tariff, made solely in the interest of the steel trust, is also one of the prime causes for high railroad rates, both passenger and freight.

The American Federation of Farm Bureaus estimates that the Fordney-McCumber Tariff costs the American farmer $301,000,000 more than all benefits received.

That is the tariff which is bearing heavily on the people of Canada and evidently it is not doing much good to the people of the United States. I do not remember who made the remark but it was stated in this House during the present debate—and I believe the statement is true—that the United States in spite of being a protectionist nation was able to undersell Great Britain on their own market in steel rails. That remark is absolutely correct. The impression was left that in spite of the high protection, or on account of it, whichever way you choose to take it, the United States could undersell Great Britain right in its own markets. Well, there is another reason altogether for the ability of the United States to undersell Great Britain in the British market, and it is this: that the United States has the greatest, the most easily available, and the most easily worked supply of iron ore that is to be found anywhere in the civilized world. This article from which I am going to quote is brief, but it will give the House an idea of the efficient way in which the iron ore is handled in the United States. It reads:

Said Henry W. Oliver in a letter to Mr. Frick, July 27, 1897, when they were acquiring some fifty per cent of the known deposits of the lake Superior region. "We are mining it at present for less than five cents per ton for labour." Eight men in ten hours with one steam shovel mined and loaded into cars 5,800 tons of ore in ten hours and 164,000 tons in one month. Three steam shovels mined "from its natural bed 915,000 tons of ore during the season of 1900, working day shift only. Five tons of ore are lifted by the steam shovel (like sand or gravel) at each stroke, and five full-weight lifts will fill a car. A twenty-five-ton car can be filled in two and a half minutes, which is at the rate of 600 tons an hour."

The most efficient and cheapest rail transportation on earth is that of the Pittsburgh, Bessemer and Lake Erie, owned by the United States Steel Company, whose vice-president, Mr. J. T. Odell, said of it in 1897, "the lowest rate per ton mile, the highest average length of revenue haul in proportion to its track mileage, the greatest density of tonnage in proportion to its freight train mileage, the greatest average paying load, and the lowest 'ton-mile cost' of any road on the American continent reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission." Nine ships can be docked at the same time. Twenty-five thousand tons of all classes of freight can be handled every ten hours. A 6,000-ton ship can be cleared in fourteen hours and in the same time from the moment the hatches are opened the ore can be at the furnaces at Pittsburgh. A new steam shovel was completed last winter by which a train of thirty-five to forty cars will be loaded with ore in two hours. A forty-ton car of coal can be unloaded and partly trimmed in the ship in thirty-six seconds.

These feats were in the infancy of the industry. Today, says J. G. Butler, a veteran of the industry, the great car dumpers will lift a car containing 110 tons of coal, dump its load and repeat at the rate of thirty cars per hour, with no manual labour beyond pressing a button. "Now we have vessels loading as high as 12,000 tons at the upper ports in one or two hours with one or two men on the dock, and unloading their cargo directly into fifty-ton cars in about the same time, with practically no manual labour.

"Now we handle this vast tonnage entirely by machinery. Steam shovels mine the ore; it flows by gravity into great vessels; huge unloaders transfer it to railroad cars, and car dumpers empty it under ore bridges—all the work being done by power and at a speed little short of miraculous."

Let me now quote what is said with reference to the cost of production. This will answer the question as to the difference between the United States and Great Britain in this regard.

With these facilities "by 1897 the cost of steel rails on cars at the Braddock mill was only $12 a gross ton"—2,240 pounds. Said Mr. Schwab, May 15, 1899, in a letter to Mr. Frick. "I know positively that England cannot produce pig iron at actual cost for less than $11.50 per ton, even allowing no profit on raw materials, and cannot put pig iron into a rail with their most efficient works for less than $7.50 (additional) per ton. This would make rails at net cost to them of $19. We can sell at this price and ship abroad so as to net us $16 at works for foreign business, nearly as good as home business has been. What is true of rails is equally true of other steel products. As a result of this we are going to control the steel business of the world. You know we can make rails for less than $12 per ton, leaving a nice margin on foreign business. Beside this the foreign costs are going to increase year by year because they have not the raw materials, while ours is going to decrease."

I made certain inquiries of the Department of Railways regarding the price paid for steel rails. We know that in Canada we have used a tremendous amount of steel rails in the past in our railway construction and we shall have to use a great deal more in the future. I asked also how many tons of steel rails it would take to lay a mile of track, giving rails of different sizes. I will read first the answer as it relates to price:

The United States price for open hearth steel rail is $43 per gross ton, f.o.b. mill.

We have evidence here from the vice-president of this company in the United States that they can produce at $12 a ton, yet we find that the price at their mill is $43, in addition to which there is $7.84 in duty and $4.84 in freight.

The Canadian average price is $46.50, f.o.b. mill. We have no recent figures on British rail, but I understand the ruling price is about $39 per gross ton, f.o.b. mills, or $40 to $40.50 f.o.b. shipping port. The duty on United States rail is $7.84 per gross ton and on British-made rail $5.04 per gross ton. The ocean freight on British rail to St. John or Montreal is approximately $5 per gross ton.

In reply to my question as to the tonnage required to lay a mile of track the answer I got reads:

Of 80-pound rails, it takes 125.7 tons (2,240 lbs.) to lay a mile of track.

Of 90-pound rails, it takes 141.4 tons (2,240 lbs.) to lay a mile of track.

Of 100-pound rails, it takes 157.1 tons (2,240 lbs.) to lay a mile of track.

We have in Canada, roughly speaking, 40,000 miles of rails for which we have paid an excessive price as a result of protection, and we shall have to meet the interest on that money for all time. Had Canada been operatiing under free trade the railways would have been able to purchase their rails from the United States at very much cheaper rates, as the British people have done. Some time I am going to work out these figures, for I am sure it will be interesting to find out just how great has been the excess that Canada has had to pay in connection with its rail purchases. Those of us who are engaged in agriculture more particularly west of Red river, know that both machinery and blacksmithing are very expensive. Agricultural implements cost at least one-third more than they should, and the reason for this is not the Canadian tariff, the slight fluctuations in which, one way or the other, have no very great effect on the price.

The reason for the excessive cost of these implements is the fact that there is such a tremendous tariff on steel in the United States which is reflected in the implement industry. The result is that our blacksmiths find that they cannot work under present conditions with the prices they have to pay. The excessive tariff on steel in the United States is at the bottom of the tremendously high prices which our farmers and blacksmiths have to pay for the implements they use and this is making it impossible for our farmers to carry on profitably. The price of an 8-foot binder in Canada is for instance, $275, which is $100 too high. No one can afford to pay that price. One reason why the manufacturers of farm implements in eastern Canada are producing comparatively little is this very fact, that the farmers cannot afford to purchase the machinery. There is not a farmer I know of in the west who would not buy a lot of new implements to-day if the prices were within reason. Take the seed drill as another example of the high prices we have to pay at the present time. We used to think that this implement was high at $125, but to-day we have to pay about $250 for it. Surely something will have to be done to bring down these prices; otherwise agriculture will not be able to carry on. Something will have to be done or agriculture will not be as profitable as we wish it to be. In the case of other classes of machinery the cost is equally high. What would hon. gentlemen to my right have to say to the statement that some years ago I paid $16 for four horseshoes? The price of steel is tremendously high. It is not as high as it was but it is still much higher than it should be. I am afraid the Fordney-McCumber tariff has been one of the greatest factors in maintaining these high prices.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What protection does steel enjoy under the present United States tariff?

Mr. LOVIE: I have that information somewhere in my notes but I cannot put my hand on it at the present moment. During recess I may be able to get it and will give it to my hon. friend this evening.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon friend has been arguing that if the United States removed their tariff on steel the price of iron and steel would go down?

Mr. LOVIE: Yes, that is my argument. The tariff is too high.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I thought my hon. friend was arguing that it costs more to produce steel rails in England than it does in the United States.

Mr. LOVIE: It costs a great deal more to produce steel rails in England than it does in the United States. Over there they are able to produce then at $19 per ton, but in this country we have paid $43 plus the freight. In the United States they claim to turn out steel rails for $12 a ton, but they sell them for $45 a ton, consequently the United States steel men make a very large profit.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend should have the tariff there, should he not, in order to show the difference between the price in England and in the United States?

Mr. LOVIE: The evidence on this matter is on record in the United States. I have not worked out the figures myself from the United States tariff. I have here a statement as to the effect of railway rates in the United States, and it reads as follows:

Railway rates are high because of high operating costs. So much of the income of the railroads is paid out for equipment, fuel, and wages, that all other expenditures are comparatively inconsiderable. The wages of two million railway men are unusually high principally because the cost of living is high beyond all precedent, and railway workers must be paid accordingly. Fuel is high for the same reason—high wages in mine and transportation and high cost of retail distribution. Railway equipment is extremely expensive, because of high, general wages, and because manufacturers of many products used in railway equipment are over-protected, and their prices are higher than they would be under a fair tariff. This affects 2,580,000 cars, 69,000 locomotives, rails and other supplies.

The cost of living to the people of the United States would be reduced about $3,000,000,000 by a moderate and reasonably protective tariff in lieu of the present Fordney law. This reduction in living costs would quickly bring a reduction in freight charges, which reduction Senator Capper, chairman of the Senate farm bloc, says is the most important matter before Congress in the interest of agriculture.

As transportation is an enormous charge upon agriculture, American farmers, especially in their present distress, feel keenly the hurt of high freight rates, and should be relieved by the immediate correction of the present tariff—a correction that would help everyone and hurt no one.

The statement has often been made in this House—in fact I think it has been made during the present debate and has not been denied—that agriculture in the United States is not prospering. Upon that point I should like to read the following statement from Governor Lowden, taken from the Breeders' Gazette of December 3, 1925:

A Message from Gov. Lowden

President of the Holstein-Friesian Association of America

The most hopeful sign for the future of American agriculture is the new interest which other classes are taking in the problem of the farm. It has gradually dawned upon others that the problem of agriculture is the problem of all. We are beginning to see that in this complex civilization of ours all of the great industries must keep in step. If one lags behind, all the others suffer.

During last summer more than 200 bankers in Nebraska attended the short course in the agricultural college at Lincoln. They returned to their homes enthusiastic, and are preparing to go back another year with the leading farmers of their several communities. The great national organizations of industry are awakening to the fact that the one limiting factor in the future growth of industry is the food supply. They are more and more concerning themselves, therefore, with the well-being of agriculture. I think they begin to see that our greatest asset as a nation is our fertile soil. Whatever depletes that soil must inevitably slow up industry. It is also now recognized by all thoughtful men that an unprofitable agriculture must hasten the exhaustion of the soils. Farmers who are pressed for cash to meet their overhead expenses must devote the largest acreage possible to cash crops, without reference to future productiveness.

Only the other day one of the profundest and wisest students of the agricultural situation of whom I know said to me that the most important thing of all at the present time is to make the country as a whole understand the importance of the farm problem. His idea was that if only all classes of men could be brought to see that there is a farm problem, its correct solution would be seen to be so vastly important to the future of our nation that an answer would be then found.

We can have a balanced nation only if we have a prosperous agriculture. We cannot long have one standard of living in the country and another in town. Those conveniences now regarded as necessities in the city must not be considered luxuries upon the farm. We must contrive somehow to improve educational facilities in the country, just as we have improved them in the modern public school in the city. How to balance agriculture economically, socially and educationally with other industries is the problem that confronts us. It is gratifying to know that other forces of society are beginning to recognize the problem.

So the problem in the United States, as in Canada, is how to make agriculture prosper and bring it up to a level with other industries. We in Canada are largely concerned with finding markets, but the most important markets we have to consider are our overseas markets. It is true we have a home market, but without the stabilizing effect of importations coming into the country, that is something not to be depended upon. In the United States the feeling is the same way. Over there the Fordney-McCumber tariff has so reduced importations into the United States that they miss the stabilizing effect of those importations. One hon. member, during the present debate, asked the question why no complaint had ever been voiced by the American people against the Fordney-McCumber tariff. It is not right to say that there has been no complaint against that tariff on the part of the United States people. The research department of the American Farm Bureau Federation, after a thorough investigation, declared that there is practically no benefit to any phase of the American cattle industry from the present tariff, and that it is a distinct injury to cattle breeders. The United States tariff commission reported to Congress in 1922 that the only effect of the emergency tariff was to injure Canada. In 1923 the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Pennsylvania Farm Bureau, the Illinois Agricultural Association, and others, appealed to the tariff commission for relief from this tariff. Over there they say that the United States tariff on cattle is a direct affront to Canada, which formerly exported some 200,000 head of range cattle annually. It will be seen that a large proportion of the people of the United States do not think very much of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. This article goes on to say:

> We make a mockery of our boast that our unguarded Canadian boundary line is imaginary only. We fortified it with worse than guns, with a tariff of distress and ill will that gave us never a benefit.
> Canada errs in attributing this action to the American people. She apparently thinks that our public rules in tariff matters. She does not realise that the Fordney law was enacted by a few over-powerful manufacturers, who betrayed the principle of protection, fooled the people, and disregarded the better judgment of many manufacturers who wanted lower duties on their own and other manufactures.

After reading that article, Mr. Speaker, I would be very chary in advocating any retaliation against the American tariff, because as I have already said, geographically the trade of this continent will flow north and south. The American or any other tariff does not keep out goods from any country, but simply makes those goods more expensive, raises the cost of living and makes it harder to live.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 24, to provide for changing the names of certain Pension Fund Societies.—Mr. Mercier (St. Henri).

Bill No. 13, respecting a patent owned by The John E. Russell Company.—Mr. Spence (Earkdale).

PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE

The House in committee on Bill No. 11, to incorporate the President of the Lethbridge Stake.—Mr. Jelliff—Mr. Duff in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. ROGERS: Explain.

Mr. JELLIFF: This is a bill to incorporate as a corporation sole the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, otherwise known as the Mormon Church. This body was incorporated originally under an ordinance of the legislative council of the Northwest Territories in 1897, giving them power to acquire and to hold and to use for religious and charitable purposes certain properties within the Northwest Territories, especially in the province of Alberta. Since that time the church has extended and now wishes federal incorporation in order that it may control and properly administer its property in other parts of Canada. The bill is modelled on one passed in 1924 incorporating in a similar manner the Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Prince Rupert, and also on an earlier one passed in 1917 incorporating the Bishop of Mackenzie river. The powers and authorities given in this bill are exactly the same as in the two previous bills passed by this parliament.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. LOVIE: When the House took recess at six o'clock I was endeavouring to show that the Fordney emergency tariff put on by the United States Senate, according to the Fair Tariff League, has not benefited the farmers of the United States and has cost them about as much as it has the farmers of Canada. I have shown pretty clearly that agriculture has not been prosperous in the United States. I wish to place the following item on Hansard in connection with that feature:

> What it means to American farmers to produce and sell on virtually a free trade basis, to buy their requirements from profiteering manufacturers, and to have their foreign market restricted is indicated in official reports that 47 per cent of all persons adjudged bankrupt in Idaho in 1922 were farmers, and that from 32 to 78 per cent of all formal bankrupts in Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, North Dakota, South Dakota and Montana were farmers.

I will now deal very briefly with the transportation question in Canada. First and foremost I should like to take up something which has been brought up in this House very often during the past four years, and something about which we have not heard a great deal during this session. It is something the Manitoba Free Press has been hammering about pretty consistently, and that is the writing off of the excess capitalization of the Canadian National Railways. That paper says:

> Strong objection is taken by newspapers and politicians, all violently hostile to the Canadian National system, to any suggestion that the capitalization of the Canadian National should be reduced to a level where it will represent the replacement value of the system. They see certain advantages—not, of course, for the Canadian National—in leaving things as they are.
> In the first place the present arrangement naturally discourages the administrators of the Canadian National. No man works with zeal on a hopeless job. This is regarded, by these parties, as all to the good.
> The deficit on the Canadian National, artificially swollen by this undue capitalization by thirty or forty million dollars, gives them a chance to knock government ownership of railways.
> And, most important of all, while the capitalization is kept high with its resulting huge deficit, the people are not likely to demand lower freight rates from the Canadian National Railway.

On June 17, an editorial in the Free Press made the following statement:

> What the commons and senate at Ottawa had better do is to forget about any grand scheme of amalgamation, and to take immediate action toward writing down the capitalization of the Canadian National lines, which now stands at a little better than two billion dollars. That is an absurd sum on which to attempt to ean a dividend. It should be written down to at least the approximate true value of the system as an operating railway property and then it would be possible to ask the Canadian National Railway management to show what it can do toward making the system pay its way. The people of Canada will have to pay for the sum written off the present capitalization, but in doing that they would be left with a properly valuated railway system and not with an inflated ballon. It is the sensible way to rid ourselves of an incubus incured through the co-operative and co-ordinated bungling of former governments, and of former railway promoters who had a way with them when they made a drive on Ottawa for millions in bond guarantees.

One of the necessities in the transportation problem of western Canada at least is the immediate completion of the Hudson Bay railway. It is absolutely needed on account of the fact that the live stock industry in western Canada has not been in a very healthy condition during the last few years and is not going to improve on account of the high freight rates from the west to Montreal and then across the ocean. The present route could be shortened very considerably by a five hundred mile run up to Port Nelson, and a short and also a cool haul from there on. The question is always asked, is that route feasible? Why, of course it is feasible, and has been feasible for two hundred and fifty years. If any one will refer to the debates of the Senate three years ago—and I think a Senate debate three years old might be quoted—he will find that Senator Rufus Pope mentioned the fact that the year before the war three German ships had come into a harbour about one hundred miles north of Churchill, on the 1st of May, and had gone out and in all summer; they put up there for the winter and only left when the war was declared. The Hudson's Bay Company have been using that route for two hundred and fifty years, and all information that is now available shows that all that is required is to complete the railway to that port so as to make it available at least for taking out the live stock from the Canadian west.

The cattle industry in Canada, which had an open market in the country to the south as long as the Underwood tariff was in existence, received what one might call a very rude shock when the Fordney emergency tariff was put up against it. And what was the reason for putting on the Fordney tariff? During the war the immense packing houses in the United States worked under high pressure to supply the vast quantities of beef required by the soldiers overseas, and when the armistice was signed this market suddenly disappeared. In the meantime, the ranchmen were improving their producing facilities; a great many others went into the cattle raising business in the United States, largely in the western part of the country, and also into ranching. As a result of the campaign to "produce, produce, produce, if you want to win the war," these people incurred tremendous obligations which proved to be millstones around their necks when the armistice was signed and that large market was done away with. Consequently there was a demand upon the United States Senate that something be done to help them out of their predicament, and the result was a tariff to prevent live stock from coming into the United States market from any source. For many years there had been an embargo against Canadian cattle going into Great Britain except for immediate slaughter at the port of debarkation, so that in Canada we were left without a market; there were far more cattle in Canada than could be consumed, and the market dropped to zero. Later the embargo against Canadian cattle was removed, so that cattle could go into that country to be finished as feeders for as many months as the British farmers wished to feed them. But there is one feature about the British market; it only accepts good cattle. British cattle are the finest in the world; they have fewer substandard cattle there than any other country. Canada has many substandard cattle, and the United States is in the same position. If we had the market open to the south of us a lot of Canadian cattle which will never make export cattle could be sold as feeders. On account of the high rates on cattle going to Great Britain, only the best cattle could be sent across. Of course we wish all the cattle in Canada were good ones, but unfortunately they are not. The Fair Tariff League of the United States says:

> Our tariff on cattle is a direct affront to Canada, that formerly exported some 200,000 head of range cattle annually.
> Our northwestern farmers need these Canadian feeder-cattle. The United States as a whole requires 4,500,000 feeders annually.
> The just wrath of Canadians will not be overcome in many years. Their purchases from us were reduced by $400,000,000, in one year, not from anger only, but mostly because we would not accept, on fair terms, of such of their commodities as we could well use in payment for our goods.
> If we took all of Canada's exports they are too small in quantity to affect the value of our herds that number 68,000,000 heads.
> Canada errs in attributing this action to the American people. She apparently thinks that our public rules in tariff matters. She does not realize that the Fordney law was enacted by a few overpowerful manufacturers, who betrayed the principle of protection, fooled the people, and disregarded the better judgment of many manufacturers who wanted lower duties on their own and other manufactures.

Canada cannot of her own initiative open the market to the south of us. It has been argued in this House every year during the last four years that Canada should have an ambassador at Washington. If I remember rightly money was voted for that particular purpose but evidently it has never been used. It is not reasonable to expect the British ambassador to be acquainted with Canadian conditions and he would not be as interested in Canadian business as a Canadian would be. I would urge on the Prime Minister and the cabinet the necessity of appointing an ambassador at Washington to look after Canadian interests and to try if possible to bring about the removal between the two countries, at least as regards our natural products, of what the people of the United States term this tariff of hate and ill-will. It is going to be to the mutual advantage of both these countries to trade with one another, and when that cannot be done it is not going to help very much for members to say in this House, which is the highest court of the realm, that we are going to retaliate on them.

As regards the question of local transportation I am heartily behind the proposition that was brought up in this House about a week ago by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Fansher) to the effect that the duty on heavy trucks should be reduced. When the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) introduced his resolution he asked that the duty on light trucks be reduced, but the hon. member for Last Mountain stressed the fact that the solution of the transportation problems at least in the western prairies would be materially aided if heavy trucks could be used. He stated that a five-ton truck was a size that should be allowed in duty free because, as the hon. member put it, at the present time no one can farm profitably more than fifteen miles from the railway. This is about as far as one can draw a load of wheat to market with a team of horses and return the same day. With a heavy truck, perhaps not even as heavy as a five-ton truck, that could carry a hundred bushels of wheat the distance could be extended to thirty miles. Instead of taking two days to make that trip as one would with a team of horses, one could put in two trips in a fairly long day. The hon. member for Last Mountain ought to receive the support of hon. members in his request for the removal of the duty on five-ton trucks so that they may be purchased as cheaply as possible. This will greatly help farmers who live a long distance from the railway.

As I said in the afternoon, seeing that our railways have been built at such a high price, a protected price having been paid for all the steel plate, spikes, bolts and other things that go into them, the country cannot afford to build any more railways than are absolutely necessary. But the men who have gone out to the prairies cannot afford to haul grain for thirty miles during the cold winter weather there is in that part of the country.

If it is not against the rules to refer to a bill that is to come before the House, I should like to say a word about agricultural credits, concerning which I believe a bill is to be introduced this session. That is something that I for one would stand squarely behind. The object of this bill is to provide cheap money on long-term credits for agriculture. It is generally expected that in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime provinces this legislation will not be of very much use, for the simple reason that the people of those provinces can borrow money in eastern Canada just as cheaply as the rates that the western farmers are requesting. Interest rates on long-term loans in western Canada are very high; they hang like a millstone on the necks of many farmers, in fact on practically all of them. A request has been made for long-term credits through federal land banks after the pattern of the federal land banks of the United States which have proved so successful. The request is quite a reasonable one. Seeing that the government of Canada can borrow money at five per cent and that one per cent will always clear the expense of a loan, money can be lent at six per cent, and one per cent more for amortization would in thirty-five years absolutely wipe out a loan. To prove my contention that one per cent covers the expense of all money in the federal land banks of the United States I will read an advertisement which I tore off the back of the February number of the Geographic Magazine. This article which is entitled "Federal Bank Bonds, Safe, Standardized, Stabilized" states:

> The record of these banks through eight years of active operation demonstrates that the legal spread of one per cent between the bond interest rate and the rate charged borrowers is ample to meet expenses, build adequate reserves and pay a fair return to the stockholders in the form of dividends. The present average net monthly earnings of the federal land banks considerably exceed $700,000.
> The management of the banks is in the hands of men trained in banking procedure and thoroughly familiar with agricultural conditions in their respective regions.

I am not going to read any more of this article except that it states that federal land banks are located at:

> Springfield, Mass.; Louisville, Ky.; New Orleans, La.; St. Paul, Minn.; Wichita, Kans.; Baltimore, Md.; St. Louis, Mo.; Columbia, S.C.; Berkeley, Calif.; Houston, Texas; Omaha, Nebraska; Spokane, Wash.

And they have been operating for eight years. Surely it is not an experiment in that country; and I can see no reason why they would not be just as successful in Canada as they are in the United States.

Mr. McMILLAN: What interest does the farmer have to pay there?

Mr. LOVIE: The advertisement does not give the interest. The hon. member for Macleod says that the interest is five per cent and one per cent expense.

In regard to the question of conserving our forest resources, those of us who have to travel through those thousand miles of rocky country where we see the marked effects of fire would like to stand behind the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) in everything that his department is doing to conserve the forests of this country. Not only is the timber being destroyed in those regions which lie between Ottawa and Winnipeg, but on account of the trees being so near the rock, in fact many of them growing on moss on top of the rock, the moss is burned right off and the rock exposed so that the seed that has been left there is all burned out and the country becomes a barren wilderness instead of being what it should be, one of Canada's assets. The pulpwood industry is certainly one of Canada's assets and if it could be properly looked after, it would for all time bring in good revenues to the Dominion. I am not blaming anyone for the fires that occur there; it is most unfortunate that they should occur, but I should like every Canadian, no matter whether he be Conservative, Liberal or Progressive, to do all in his power to stand behind the Minister of the Interior and any organization who are doing what they can to preserve the wonderful heritage of timber we have in this country. But I am not in favour of preserving this heritage to the extent of advocating an embargo on pulpwood, for the simple reason that eighty per cent of the pulpwood of this country is on crown lands and cannot be exported. Pulpwood taken from those lands must be manufactured in this country. Along the line of the Canadian National railways there are large numbers of settlers who are endeavouring to clean up the land and make it suitable for agriculture. What was solid timberland they are converting into farms, and I for one certainly would not compel those people to take any price offered them for their pulpwood without giving them the benefit of competition. I want to see the Canadian farmer get the best possible price for his timber. I would no more think of putting an embargo on pulpwood obtained from private lands than I would suggest an embargo on wheat; and I know that those of us who come from the west would fight bitterly any proposal to place any such restriction upon the export of wheat. Such a policy is not right and it could never do any good. I do not think it is in the interests of Canada to put an embargo on pulpwood. It is useless to say that the United States need our pulpwood; they do not need our wood, because they have more pulpwood than we have. There is more timber across the line than there is in Canada. I want to read to the House an advertisement which appears in the Breeder's Gazette of May 6th, 1926, with reference to the timber industry of the United States:

Douglas Fir—America's Permanent Lumber Supply

The densest and heaviest forests the world has ever known stand to-day between the west slope of the Cascade mountains and the waters of the Pacific.

This forest region contains 26 million acres of towering trees—more than 700 billion feet of merchantable timber—three-quarters of which is Douglas fir; the rest Sitka spruce, western hemlock and western red cedar.

The average yield of these forests is in excess of 30,000 feet per acre and in some cases 150,000 feet and more. One Douglas fir tree here sometimes produces more lumber than five acres in other forest regions.

What is of more vital interest to the people of the United States is that under modern methods of lumbering, foresting and fire protection, these forests will be a permanent source of lumber supply for the entire country for all time.

Where timber has been cut and fires guarded against countless millions of young Douglas fir trees from nature's own seeding appear and in their vigorous growth offer a new merchantable supply of the finest quality within a comparatively few years.

Emphasizing the importance of Douglas fir, we quote from United States Forest Service Bulletin 88:

"Douglas fir may, perhaps, be considered the most important of American woods . . . . Its rapid growth in the Pacific northwest forests, its comparatively wide distribution and the great variety of uses to which it can be put place it first . . . . As a structural timber it is not surpassed."

We in Canada are just as much interested in preserving our timber supply as the people of the United States are in protecting their resources, although I do not know that we can claim to have gone to the same trouble as they have done to prevent fires. However, I plead with every Canadian to do all that is humanly possible towards preserving this wonderful heritage which we have in this country.

I want to say just a word or two on the budget, which I have not so far discussed. I have touched upon the tariff, which of course is closely related to the budget, but other matters to which I have referred have no direct connection with it. Inasmuch, however, as we are allowed considerable latitude in a debate upon the budget I shall take the liberty of quoting briefly from an article I have here commenting on the statement which the Minister of Finance has submitted to Parliament. I quote this article in order to make my own reference to the budget as brief and concise as possible. What I am about to read is taken from a Toronto publication which hon. gentlemen who belong to the United Church will recognize. The New Outlook, in its comment on the budget, has this to say:

With the announcement of the tariff changes, and especially the reductions in the income tax the people of Canada got the surprise of their lives. Some modification of the burdens of taxation which have pressed upon all classes since the war were anticipated, but the changes introduced by Hon. James A. Robb, Minister of Finance, in his fourth budget presentation, are so radical as to be almost sensational. A drop from $60 to $10; from $80 to $20; from $100 to $30, etc., on income taxes at one step is something so unusual in budget revisions as to call for universal comment. The reductions in this department give greater relief to those of moderate and small incomes than to those of larger means. The percentage of reduction grows less as the income increases. Few will dispute the fairness of this principle, as by this adjustment the burden of taxation falls on those who are most able to bear it. There is a good deal of dissatisfaction among manufacturing firms, especially motor car makers and dealers, over the lowering of the tariff on automobiles. This was to be anticipated; but the closing of factories even for a few days, and the throwing of thousands of men out of work, has not been taken very seriously. A good many have regarded it more as a political gesture than as a counsel of necessity. The return to penny postage, and the abolition of the irritating receipt stamp has been hailed with general satisfaction. Perhaps the most beneficial effect of the changes submitted for the approval of parliament will be the impression made, both at home and abroad, of the reviving prosperity of the country which makes possible such a lessening of the burdens of taxation.

If I may be permitted a personal reference to illustrate the impression which the present prosperous condition in Canada is making upon people in other countries, I may mention the fact that my mother, who is between eighty and ninety years of age, said in a letter I received from her this week that she had been reading everything she could lay her hands on in reference to affairs in Canada, and that she was quite pleased to gather from all that she had read the fact that the country was prosperous and that the outlook was bright as a result of reductions made in this new budget. Obviously, therefore, people outside of Canada are following this budget with interest.

One thing that seems to have been stressed in the debates that have taken place in this House from time to time in connection with the tariff is the desire of some people outside and of some members of parliament to have this country definitely committed to a policy of protection. In this connection, I should like, if the House will bear with me, to read a brief extract from an article discussing the question of protection as a policy for the United States. Certain questions have been asked in that country, and as they are quite applicable to Canada it is well that we should have them answered before we are absolutely committed to the principle of protection. This is the quotation:

> Are we to protect ignorance, shiftlessness, incapacity, plants that are out of date, and would be destroyed if not protected or rebuilt? Are we to protect plants that are so badly located or badly managed that the same conditions in a non-protected industry would put them out of business? If we are to do this, then protection becomes an alms-house and asylum for cripples and incompetents, and all such must be protectionists demanding profits and good living by tariff legislation. In fact, protection, honestly considered, can be given only to those industries and persons that are efficient, especially adapted in equipment, location, efficiency and circumstances assuring successful production at as low cost to the consuming public as prevails in non-protected occupations, where the most capable make large profits and the unfortunate have to quit.
> That is: protection requires the use of every ordinary advantage in the way of training and efficient personal capacity, favourable, natural conditions and adequate equipment.

[Mr. Lovie.]

We know that this does not always occur, for there is a good deal of lobbying in and around the House of Commons. Manufacturers, without giving any thought to costs of production, clamour for an increase in the tariff in order to be able to carry on, whereas if they operated under competitive conditions they would be obliged to readjust their affairs or they would probably go out of business altogether. We hear a good deal about closed factories, and the closing of factories is invariably attributed to reductions in the tariff. I do not know whether this is so or not, but I may tell you something. Five of us in one day went into southern Ontario and examined the Welland canal from end to end. Returning from Port Colborne we passed a factory with closed doors; I think it was in the town of Thorold. It was a glass factory, and naturally enough we asked why it was closed. The reason given us was that these particular manufacturers could not successfully face the competition they encountered. Several other questions were asked, among them one by myself to this effect: "I suppose plenty of sand and other raw materials are available for the manufacture of glass in this locality?" "No," our informant said, "that is one of the unfortunate features of the case. The sand for most of the glass manufactured in this factory had to come from the United States." It seems to me a self-evident fact that factories should be located in close proximity to the source of raw materials, because raw materials cannot be hauled very profitably when the present high cost of transportation is considered. Probably it was just as good that this particular factory went out of existence; all industries should be so located that they can be carried on economically and profitably. But under the policy of protection industries have grown up without any regard to where the source of raw material was located; the only important point seemed to be that there was sufficient protection to allow them to carry on. I for one —and I know that the group of which I am a member take the same view —will not stand for the recognition of the principle of protection as the guiding principle of the Canadian tariff.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the hon. gentleman tell me how close the textile industries in Great Britain are to their supply of raw materials, or the rubber industry in the United States?

Mr. LOVIE: The industries referred to by my hon. friend are a long distance from the source of supply of raw materials, but I would point out that sand is a very heavy commodity, and on that account its transportation is extremely expensive. That is one reason why I emphasize the handicap of carrying on the factory previously referred to.

In conclusion let me say, Mr. Speaker, that when we are asked to commit ourselves definitely to protection the great underlying principle of our tariff it makes me think of some lines of poetry I memorized in my youthful days. We all know that one's memory is more retentive in the days of our youth, and that things learned then remain with us throughout our lives. This particular piece of poetry, committed to memory long since, is as vivid in my mind as when I first learned it. The lines in question run as follows:

> And shall the foeman dare, boy,
> And shall the foeman dare,
> While British hand can wield a brand,
> To plant his banner there?
>
> No, by our fathers, no, boy,
> No, by our fathers, no!
> From England's vales to Scotland's dales
> Our people thundered "No".

And just as emphatically as those men would have answered, "no" if any foeman dared to lay a hand on that country, I for one will answer "no" in the present crisis in our history; and I will not be a party to committing Canada to the adoption of the policy of protection.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of the House to-night at any great length. On every occasion on which I have spoken I have endeavoured to be brief, and I shall not depart from that course to-night seeing that I have only got a lot of timber—in other words, rows of empty seats—to talk to.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You will not get many empty seats here.

Mr. MULLINS: The constituency of Marquette sent me here for the purpose of endeavouring to make my influence felt on this House. There are several important matters I wanted to bring forward to-night in connection with the budget, and it is regrettable that the attendance is so slim. It is always more inspiring to a speaker to be privileged to address a full House. It seems to me that when it comes to a question of legislating for the good of Canada we should consider ourselves one big family, regardless of whether we come from the Maritimes, from Quebec, from Ontario, from the middle west, or from distant British Columbia. I do not think it is fair for some hon. members to get up and leave the chamber when other hon. gentlemen are endeavouring to make known the needs of the country; it would be far better for all of us to remain and exert our utmost endeavours to do what is best for Canada. Personally I have striven throughout the session to stay here and listen to every speaker; even when speeches were made in French I did my best to follow the ideas outlined. Some years ago I remember reading Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure and one of the points emphasized was the desirability of members abstaining from reading written speeches and endeavouring to express themselves extemporaneously. Since coming here I have also read Mr. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules, in which hon. gentlemen are warned against reading essays. Now, I intend to follow the rules of this House, and if I cannot talk extemporaneously on questions of vital importance I will either keep my seat or keep out of the House. I read in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules that the following resolution was adopted by the House on April 19, 1886:

> That the growing practice, in the Canadian House of Commons, of delivering speeches of great length, having the character of carefully and elaborately prepared written essays, and indulging in voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, is destructive of legitimate and pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the sessions of parliament,—

And so on. Now, Sir, I intend to live up to the rules of the House. I am going to abide by the rules as I find them, and furthermore I shall be very brief.

It is hard for a man who comes from western Canada to remain here when the west is calling to us as it does at this particular season of the year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MULLINS: I know very well that in saying that I have the sympathy of my Progressive friends, and also of hon. gentlemen from Saskatchewan. I know they feel the call from the west just as I feel it. Perhaps I have been in the west for a longer period than most of the other western members and on that account the call appeals to me with greater force. It seems to me that instead of wasting time we should get through the business of the House with greater promptitude in the interests of this country. I read in one of our journals a piece of poetry which seems to me to express in a vivid manner what I might call the sentiment of the west. That poetry is thus worded:

Put me west of old Fort Garry,
Where the prairie roses bloom,
Where the auto laughs at distance
And a man has elbow room.
Let me ride upon the pilot,
When the first through train goes out,
Let me hear the settlers welcome it
With joyous, ringing shout!
Let me be upon the prairie
When they start a baby town,
And they're living under canvas
While the first mud-sills go down;
For it truly stirs the blood
To see cities in the bud,
And to feel a nation growing
From the fertile prairie mud.

I have listened to speeches from hon. gentlemen representing many sections of Canada. I have listened to hon. gentlemen from the Maritimes, from Quebec, from Ontario, from many different provinces and districts. In the few brief remarks I intend to offer to-night I would like to express my views as a member of the great Canadian family. For I prefer to look upon Canada politically speaking, as a family. The interests of the family, as a whole, are one, but if any particular member is suffering from peculiar misfortune or disability, special consideration should be generously extended. If the Maritime provinces, if British Columbia, if the great west, if Ontario and Quebec have each peculiar and individual problems, or at times suffer exceptional disadvantage, let us not hesitate to give special attention to their condition. Even a gesture makes for goodwill. All this no doubt is subject to the qualification that the concession must not be such as will prove injurious to the family as a whole. The principle is really justice, justice to the nation as a whole, the greatest good for the greatest number, and justice to each individual member, part and section of the community so far as it is possible to effect it.

Hon. members representing other sections of the country have placed their positions before the House. I wish to do so, Mr. Speaker, as far as agriculture in the west is concerned. And that is a big and vital subject, because the top six inches of the soil of those great western prairies has to go a long way toward liquidating the debt of this country. Give us half a chance and we will help the rest of the country pay that debt.

I have spoken many times on one particular subject, and I was told to-night that I was not to touch it; to keep away from it and let the steer alone for once. I fully intended to, and I am not going to say very much on that subject. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) has ceased to read his newspaper; I have tried my best since I have been in this House to get him to reduce the rate on steers. I ask him again to give us the $15 rate to England; unless he does so that industry will shrink until it disappears. The hon. member who preceded me spoke of cattle going to the United States; give us the $15 rate for mature cattle and there is a market overseas which cannot be blocked. I have in my hand a request from one Scotch firm for 5,000 head of cattle; there is a wonderful trade in the Old Country. It is true that some rubbish is not fit to go over there, because the Scotchman is a pretty canny chap and wants well bred steers. Ship the rubbish to the United States if you will, but do not ship them, the immature young well bred steer off the western prairie. Saskatchewan, listen to me; I mean this. A well bred yearling or two-year-old growing on your farm is the best value you have and the best asset to any bank in western Canada; nothing on the farm will pay as well.

I have heard a great deal about the shipping of dead beef, but that is not feasible, as the minister knows. I am sorry that I must take issue with my leader on that matter; he as well as others on this side have spoken on that question and I am afraid I cannot agree with them. Let me say for the information of the House, after being in the trade for fifty years and after having shipped dead beef, that you will only try one shipment. The minister only tried one, and he knows that the loss amounted to about $50 per head. The logical way to ship Canadian cattle to the British Isles is on the hoof; that has been proved to be the only feasible way. I can demonstrate that with a statement by Mr. McLean of the Harris Abattoir Company; I do not know why he has had a change of heart, but he was formerly an advocate of the dead beef business. I quote:

9 p.m.

It would be unwise for any province of Canada to attempt a chilled meat business at present, stated Mr. J. S. McLean, of Toronto, at the annual meeting of the Western Canada Live Stock Union. His company, the Harris Abattoir Company, had discontinued chilled meat shipments because seventeen shipments made in 1921 lost the company an average of 2⅛ cents per pound. The total loss on 1,200,000 pounds was $28,000.

I was in the London market and saw South American chilled beef selling at 4½d. per pound, with our best Canadian steers selling at 11d. Which do you prefer? Those who advocate the shipment of dead beef do not understand the situation, and they are playing into the hands of the enemy in the Old Country—those who were opposed to the admission of Canadian cattle into the British Isles. The minister knows that I am correct in that statement.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Absolutely.

Mr. MULLINS: Ireland and those other countries say that Canada should ship dead beef; Ireland ships a million head of cattle to England a year, while Canada ships one hundred thousand. Ireland could be put into one corner of my constituency, but we are only shipping a hundred thousand head of cattle each year when we should be shipping a million. They want Canadian steers.

Let me say in passing that I did not intend to mention the steer; I have enough material without it, but the hon. gentleman who preceded me mentioned it, and so many professional men on this side of the House talk of dead beef that I want to put them right, in order that they may understand the subject thoroughly. That business is not practical; it is impossible; it brings us into competition with South America, which can ship no other way because its cattle have to cross the equator. It is impossible to ship dead meat from Canada and compete with South America. They would not ship their cattle dead if they could ship them alive, and the enemies of Canadian cattle in England are asking Canada to get into that dead meat trade, in order to get them out of the road of live cattle. The live Canadian steer is the finest of all animals, and the Scotchman knows it; just thirty days after the steer is landed in England it is ready to go on the market at the top price. I am sorry to see the Mail and Empire, a Conservative organ, persistently writing of the dead beef business; it is wrong, and I say so from the floor of this House; speaking from experience. I made one shipment of 600 cattle from Boston, which I have never forgotten; they went into competition with the cheap stuff from South America, and the loss was so great that I am not going back into that business.

I want hon. members of this House to know that the only salvation for Canada's cattle industry is live cattle, with more ships, and—for the last time, for the benefit of the minister—the $15 rate on the government ships. The minister has that power; he can give us that rate to-morrow morning if he will. But when I asked the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) the other day if it was possible for Canada to have a $15 rate on live stock he told me that the question would be better answered at some other time, some future day. We in western Canada are tired of waiting. I do not say this for my own benefit, because I am out of the business; but I do say it for the men who have the cattle. The hon. member who just took his seat knows all about it. Do not come west, Mr. Minister, and give us another interview in the Free Press, to say that you are still doing something for us. Do not repeat that statement which you give us yearly; do something to-morrow morning instead. Who owns the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and who is operating it? It is owned and operated by the government of the day, and if my party were in power and would not use these ships to-morrow to relieve the man on the land I would cross the floor of the House in five minutes. I would not sit in this seat longer than that if my party would not give that industry consideration, in order to keep the fertility in the soil of western Canada. Western Canadians know that our production is dropping from thirty bushels to the acre; you in Saskatchewan are dropping from fifty bushels, due to the lack of live stock on the farm. You are taking the fertility out of the soil, and you are putting nothing back into it through lack of live stock.

Mr. VALLANCE: If the minister reduces the rate to $15, will the hon. member walk over to this side?

Mr. MULLINS: That is not the only question to be settled. There are other big economic questions up for consideration, but if the minister will do it, I am big enough to give him credit for it in western Canada. I know there is a practical man on this side of the House who will do it if he gets hold of the lines, and if he does not do it when he gets the chance he will hear from me pretty loudly. Why should I cross to that side? I have told you twenty times, and I say it again now, that I believe in live cattle shipments, not dead meat shipments.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the policy of this side. The dead meat shipments are advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MULLINS: But they are not in power. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) said that the government merchant marine were out of the combine, and that I was a year late in making my representations. I do not think I was one minute late. If you are not in the New York combine, you are in the trade combine out of Montreal at all events, and what is the difference? There is no difference whatever. You could sail those ships to-morrow morning if you wanted to.

The Jensen line, a privately-owned line in Toronto, is sailing four ships, and they would carry the cattle at $15 if they could be protected against a rate war. Those ships carry nothing but live stock going east, and they come back empty. Why cannot you do it with the merchant marine boats? There are twenty-four ships, of 8,000 tons each. I have crossed the ocean, Mr. Speaker, on small boats of 3,500 and 4,000 tons. For thirty-five or forty years I have been crossing the ocean on just little tubs, boats that could not begin to compare with those of the government merchant marine. They try to tell us that these boats are no good, but they are splendid sea-going boats. Do not give these boats away; do not sell them for $45,000 or $50,000, because you are going to want them soon, and you will certainly need them when you open up the port I am going to ask you to open up.

I must ask your pardon, Mr. Speaker, and the pardon of the House for touching on the cattle question at all. I would never have brought it up if the hon. gentleman had not reminded me of it, because there are so many other important questions affecting this great Canadian family that we are supposed to represent in this House. We have the Maritimes with their coal problem, Alberta with her coal problem, Ontario with her peculiar problems—we have just heard of Toronto's need for a customs house; and in western Canada we have our great problems of transportation, better banking facilities, and the need for cheaper money. Do not go out there, you easterners, with your capital, and charge the exorbitant rates of interest, 8, 9 and 10 per cent, that you are charging out there, which works against the man on the land. No man can stand that exorbitant rate of interest. You have got to give the farmer in western Canada cheap money; you must help him and encourage him, and if you do that, we shall have a wonderful country.

For the benefit of the treasury benches, let me say this: Do not buy these corners here in Ottawa. Do not waste any more money on these buildings, because the day is coming when this parliament will be sitting in Winnipeg. There is the axle, half way between the Atlantic and the Pacific; there is the logical place for this parliament, and once you give the people of the west a chance, the bulk of the population of this country will be found west of Winnipeg on those great prairies. You gentlemen opposite who have the lines in your hands, hold those bronchos in and tell them to give you a $15 rate and cheaper money, better transportation and cheaper rates, so that the farmers of the west can get their products to the markets of the world.

It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to take up as much time as I have done, but I wanted to place myself on record for the benefit of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), for I shall not be here for the vote on Tuesday night. The hon. gentleman was for some reason or other very anxious about my seat and about my two friends here, who are just as loyal to the farmer in western Canada as any hon. gentleman sitting at the Progressive end of the House. I want the hon. gentleman to watch every step and move that I make in this House, and be sure and tell the people of Marquette of everything I do, which he said he was going to do. The hon. member for Brandon says there will be very few Conservatives come back to this House after the next election. He made me feel very anxious about this seat which I have been trying to hold since the 7th of January. I almost felt I was going to lose my seat when I learned that he had said in Toronto:

> One thing I do know is that the Conservatives, if there were another election, would never get the representation they have now in the west. They have seven members now from Manitoba, where they are in the minority.

Then he goes on openly to admit that he is a Liberal. He is reported as follows:

> The present Liberal government in Ottawa, in the opinion of the Progressive leader, will last this session without any difficulty. It may last its full term. "After all," said Mr. Forke, "the Progressives are simply Liberals in action."

Mr. FORKE: I would like to say for the third and last time—because this is the third time I have had to rise to deny that statement—that I never made it. I am not ashamed of it at all, but I did not make it.

Mr. MULLINS: I have never seen the statement denied. If I was misquoted in the press, I would correct the error. When I joined the Progressive party some years ago I thought they would be of some use to western Canada, but at the very first meeting I attended they began attacking the tariff. You have played on that string too long in western Canada. It is the only thing you have. You play with it, when it is not of vital importance to western Canada. It is like playing a Chinese fiddle with only one string. But you make the admission which has appeared in the paper. I have known you and I have always felt that you were just a good solid staunch Liberal, but that was the first time I saw the acknowledgment in the paper that you were a Liberal in action. Now, I think enough has been said about you—the big stick and that sort of thing; but I do not think you would use the club very severely on any one. Having known you for a great many years and having known your sentiments, I say that you are a Liberal, and you have a right to go over to the treasury benches and take a portfolio. There is no one more honest in Canada to-day than the gentleman we call "Bob Forke". I know enough of procedure not to call members by name in this House, but I talk to my hon. friend just as we talk on the western prairies. The hon. member for Brandon knows our manner of speaking on the prairies, but in the House we address hon. members in a different way.

I do not wish to criticize the banks, but I want to give them a little advice. I suggest that they should give their branch managers out west more discretion, that they should say to them: "You shall have more latitude with regard to the man on the land, and, taking into consideration section 88 of the Bank Act, advance money to him at a reasonable figure, six per cent and no more."

In regard to rural credits. I would substitute the words, Mr. Speaker, "agricultural credit." I do not approve of any man going into debt if he can help it. I wish to see the man on the land out west get out of debt. A mortgage on a farm on the prairie is a cloud on every golden wheat field. If conditions were favourable out there there would be no reason to borrow money. An open letter was written to Mr. W. F. Maclean, House of Commons, Canada, from McAuley in my constituency, which reads:

> The people of this district have been put to considerable inconvenience by the closing up of the branch of the Royal bank at this point, for no reason other than they had been offered an inducement to do so by the Bank of Toronto, which has a branch ten miles from here which, we understand is not paying due to a limited territory and if they can secure our business it will help them, so a "saw off" was arranged and our business was traded for a similar concession at some point in Quebec.
> The Royal bank officials admit that they have made a profit each year since opening in 1919 and their local loans were repaid without loss. We are told that there was approximately $90,000 on deposit here when they closed and the manner of closing out was done in a most artibtrary manner. On Tuesday January 26, word came to the local manager that the doors were to be closed on January 30, no notice was given but the news soon spread and depositors came in to withdraw their accounts and take away securities lodged in safe deposit boxes, rented from the bank.
> Depositors were given the option of taking their deposits in cash while it lasted or having it transferred to any branch of the Royal. In cases where no instructions were given the account was transferred to the Bank of Toronto at Welwyn, Sask., which the bank was no doubt allowed to do under the Bank Act, which we understand is very favourable to the banks.
>
> As soon as our board of trade learned that the bank was to be closed a public meeting was called and a delegation of two were sent to Winnipeg to wait upon the western representative of the Royal bank, to ask that they keep open for at least a month, so that we could take steps to secure another bank, or at least to allow us reasonable time to settle our business affairs. They said they could not do this as their hands were "tied".
> The delegates called upon the representatives of several other banks, who agreed to consider the matter of opening here, but we now find that the Bankers' Association has whipped these into line, and the Bank of Toronto people who bargained for our business, are laughing at our futile efforts.

For a time they had a branch bank at McAuley, but for some reason or other the boards of the banks made some kind of trade and left that place without a bank. The farmers need banks when they are shipping their grain, and they need them also for their savings. The bank manager of a small branch must have wider powers in western Canada, because he really knows the conditions. If in the matter of loans he is subject to a limit of one or two thousand dollars and he has to send to the head office at Quebec, Montreal or Toronto for authority to make a larger loan, it takes a couple of weeks, and it is then probably too late to meet the requirements of the man seeking the loan. Furthermore, the loan is often not granted because in the head office they do not know the real conditions as well as the man on the ground. We want more banking facilities out west. This letter was sent to Mr. Maclean and a copy was forwarded to me. I have read it for the benefit of the Banking committee and I ask that when that committee meets again something be done to help the men in the rural parts of that great western country.

I will speak now on an important subject —and I know there will be severe criticism, but I am going to stand up against it; a good many men in a certain line of business will take objection to what I am going to say in this connection. I say that the proper method of making a success of the farming industry in the west is by the promotion of the co-operative spirit. This proposition was started by my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) some years ago. A bill was introduced to provide for the marketing of the grain of western Canada. It was followed up and a great many people criticized it, but they have adopted that plan, and I say the system of co-operation is the only true system to provide for the marketing of the grain product.

I have closely watched the operation of this system. It is run in an honest way, and I believe it is going to be very successful. Such a system is imperative. I have always said that in order to be successful the farmers should get together—but not for politics; keep out of that issue altogether. It is imperative that the agricultural leaders of the west, and the leaders in manufacturing, railways, banking, and other commercial interests of the east should get together on common ground, for a common understanding, for the common good of all concerned. I wish to refer to a statement made by President Roosevelt on this point—and I may say that I had the honour of riding on a ranch with that gentleman, who has crossed the Great Divide. I met him on another occasion in Toronto and I was with him also in Dakota; I slept with him under canvas many years ago. I always admired Teddy Roosevelt. He said:

> The co-operative plan is the best plan of organization, wherever men have the right spirit to carry it out. Under this plan any business undertaking is managed by a committee, every man has one vote and only one vote, and everyone gets profits according to what he sells or buys or supplies. It develops individual responsibility and has a moral as well as a financial value over any other plan.

The farmers of western Canada have made numerous attempts to solve the question by co-operative marketing by the wheat pool. I feel that it is the only solution of the question of marketing the grain in western Canada. The day will arrive when the western country will produce men who will not be swept off the rocks by the surge of a popular political wave. I want the hon. member for Brandon to listen to this statement. I have made some study of the question. This is a matter I have worked out—I do not mean my speech—and I did it particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Brandon:

> Co-operation Is The Clarion Call
> The day has now arrived when western Canada must produce agricultural leaders who will not be swept off the rock of reason by the surge of a popular political wave; leaders who are capable of understanding that the need for legislation is only incidental, that the primary need of the prairie farmer is broad, comprehensive co-operation—co-operation in production, co-operation in distribution, co-operation in marketing. It is true that production must be largely an individual matter with the farmer, but if he can cut his threshing bill in half by co-operation, what is to prevent him from cutting his ploughing and seeding bills down through get-together methods? Why cannot he make a weedy farm as unpopular as a skunk in the dairy room, and thus save for himself the millions of dollars it costs the western farmer annually to grow weeds?
> The tariff is a matter that has finally got to be solved by a mutual agreement and understanding between the farmers and the manufacturers. No sane, concerted action has ever been adopted in connection with the Canadian tariff, and there will never be a solution as long as senseless political sparring at long range continues. We do not purpose discussing the tariff question in this pamphlet, because of the reasons just stated. Here is something worth noting, however: The farmers complain that the tariff cost them some $9,000,000 in 1922, but never a word is said about the loss of $150,000,000 to the farmers of western Canada in 1922 through weeds.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said that I discussed the Australian treaty all through the constituency of Marquette and evaded the tariff issue. That is not the case. The question of the tariff was discussed on every platform in Marquette. I had before me a memorandum of subjects so that I would not go astray. I had so many heavy subjects to handle, such as the expenditures of the country, questions pertaining to transportation, and so on, that at times I may have been able only to touch on the tariff lightly. Perhaps that is what the minister alluded to, but the tariff was discussed on every platform and was explained to every woman in the county. In order to realize that the women of Marquette appreciated the value of protection, you have only to count the Liberal votes in Marquette where the silver-tongued orator, Dr. Roche, used to have a close call. It was always a close constituency, and the majority I received showed that the ladies in that constituency recognized the fact that the government had made a treaty that hurt the Canadian hen. Every time the ladies there wanted to buy spring millinery and new dresses they thought of the tariff and they went to the polls and voted accordingly.

At Shoal lake we have the highest class dairy in the country; nothing in Canada can beat it because it is carrying off all the prizes against the world. It took the first prize at the National Exhibition at Toronto. A lady from McAuley carried off the first prize for dairy butter, and the women in that constituency know that the treaty which the government made permitting Australian butter to enter Canada was wrong and against their interests. I am well aware of the support that I received and the vote that was quietly registered. It was largely Liberals who voted for me because they knew that the government had made a treaty that was affecting their interests.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to put down the paper he is reading because I cannot talk to him when his face is concealed behind a paper. I have been looking at his kindly face for forty years in western Canada and I have no ill-feeling towards him. I like to see his genial smile, but when he hides his face behind a newspaper I cannot speak to him. The Canadian dairy cow is speaking through me to you and she says:

Why did you do it? I tried to give you the best milk that could be produced and you made a treaty allowing Australian butter to come in. The Canadian hen says: I laid the best eggs in the world for you and you have made a treaty allowing Chinese and Australian eggs to enter Canada in competition with the finest egg in the world, the egg that is laid in Canada under the most sanitary conditions. I have seen people in those foreign countries raising eggs; I have seen how they feed the hens, and I refuse to eat imported eggs. I appeal to the minister to do something in the interest of the farmers out west.

There were 253,000 tons of screenings at Fort William out of last year's crop and they were disposed of in this way: 126,000 tons went to the United States, only 995 tons came to Manitoba—and part of that I fed—and the balance went to Ontario points. If the government want to do a favour to the farmers on the prairies they will prevent these screenings from going to the United States and let them go back to the western farmer at a reduced rate so that he can feed the young growing cattle. The men who are running the grain pool are putting in a screening elevator; they are going to clean some of the wheat at home and we shall have the screenings for feed.

I am looking forward to the day when we shall get on to the right system of farming and have homes, not boarding houses on the prairies. I have been taken to task for speaking of the cowless, sowless, chickenless farmer. I did not mean anything wrong although I meant every word I said. I did not mean to be insulting to any man who is growing wheat in western Canada. The man to whom I was referring was not the mixed farmer but the man who has not a home on the prairies, who is just exploiting the soil, and who is ready to move out at any time. The Saskatchewan members know him well. You will have more patriotic citizens when you have them making homes for themselves, because a man will defend a home before he will defend a boarding house. I want to see the farmers of western Canada build comfortable homes for themselves, make them congenial and keep the boys at home. I do not want to see the boys lured to the city because they see their brothers there getting rich through other sources. I want to see the coarse grains driven to market on four feet through live stock such as hogs, cattle and so on, because that will make any farmer in the west rich. He cannot become rich just by growing grain. My hon. friends from Saskatchewan know that there must be diversified farming if they are to succeed. It is imperative that the prairies shall be populated, and homes will be established there when that great country gets half a chance in the way of transportation so that the barriers may be broken down and we may get to the east and reach the ocean through the Hudson Bay railway.

Mention of this project brings me to a question which has been discussed to a considerable extent. If I may say so, I happen to be the only man in this House to-day who was present at the meeting in Winnipeg thirty-eight years ago when Hugh Sutherland, a personal friend of mine, and Mr. Scarth, were contesting that seat. Hugh Sutherland brought forward a telegram announcing that the rails were on their way and that the road would be built. Well, that was thirty-eight years ago and we have been building the Hudson Bay railway ever since. At every political meeting since that time the people have been told that the work would be proceeded with, and bit by bit the road has been constructed until at the present time it is within ninety-two miles of the water's edge, having been constructed up to Kettle rapids. But that is as far as it has gone. Now the government tell us that they are going to complete the Hudson Bay railway. Let me assure them that I am heartily with them and I trust that they will carry out their intention.

In this connection I have been criticized for having gone to Middlesex and talked to some of my old time friends who were in the cattle business. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) knows just what I said, and he can bear me out when I declare that nothing that I had to say could possibly call for adverse criticism, inasmuch as I did not discuss the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member is no doubt aware also of the identity of the person who sent a certain telegram which has provoked so much criticism of myself. All the way from Arkansas I have received communications more or less to the effect that my comments on the subject had left a nasty taste in the mouths of these people. I never opened my mouth in regard to the Hudson Bay railway. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is not here, but I want to tell him that when he refers to the hon. member for South Oxford as the gentleman who was with me on the platform he is entirely mistaken; it was the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. D. M. Sutherland) who accompanied me. The hon. member for South Oxford was out west and he did say that the Hudson Bay railway should be built, but Doctor Sutherland was with me on the platform and was never west of the Great Lakes. He did observe at the close of the meeting that the government were throwing away millions in connection with the Hudson Bay railway and that this was a waste of money. These remarks he made after I had spoken and I said to him from my seat, "Wait a moment; you are wrong; you do not know what you are talking about." As I say, this was at the close of the meeting and I had no opportunity whatever to make any statement. Now I ask my hon. friend from Lisgar to go to Marquette and explain the circumstances to the people there. I have been criticized severely in this matter but this is one of those occasions in politics when one is misrepresented, whatever one may do. It does not matter whether you keep silent or whether you speak; people will criticize you. Let me say, however, that here as well as elsewhere I stand absolutely for the farmers of western Canada, and I defy any man to show wherein I have done anything that will tend to prejudice their interests. And so long as I have the honour to occupy the seat for the constituency of Marquette I will do everything in my power to further its interests in every way.

I am absolutely at a loss to know who is distributing the pamphlets criticizing the Hudson Bay railway. Who is the man and where does he come from? I do not believe that he has ever seen Hudson bay. I do not think he knows anything about it. Yet he or somebody else goes to a lot of expense to have these pamphlets printed and distributed. If this Mr. J. L. Payne wants a picture of the Welshman in the gulf I will bring a lantern slide and show it for his benefit. The year in which the embargo was placed against Canadian cattle I was waiting in Montreal with a friend who had 507 head of cattle in this vessel and she was stuck in the ice in the gulf for two weeks. Some of the boys took a picture of her. But that would sink into insignificance in comparison with some of the pictures that appear in this pamphlet, a copy of which has been left in my post office box.

I have read in the Ottawa Journal an article on Hudson bay, and while I do not want to fall out with the press I must point out that this article is altogether wrong when it states that money spent on the Hudson Bay railway is just so many millions thrown to the icebergs and the wolves and seals. Why, while I was reading this article in the spring people were bathing in Hudson bay. I had up in my room to-night a gentleman who was in swimming in the bay and he told me that the water was warm in September. The gentleman to whom I refer, Mr. Hoey, was a member of this House in the last parliament, and the Premier of Manitoba as well as the mayor of Winnipeg have told me the same thing. A friend of mine spent from May to November last year at Hudson bay and as a result of his observations he was able to assure me that in his opinion the bay was navigable beyond a shadow of a doubt. I know myself that it is navigable, and there is no reason why the Hudson Bay railway should not have been built. If it had been built all the way and had been found then to be impracticable, the people of eastern Canada might with justice have exacted their pound of flesh.

I want to tell the Minister of Railways that if he wishes to create a reputation for himself he will complete this project, but I am afraid that the course which the government is at present pursuing is a mistaken one. I am sorry that the minister is not in his place, because it was my desire to put my views particularly to him. I do not want to be in any way critical; but I must ask him to give the country an honest deal in this matter. He can make a record for himself if he will go about the completion of the Hudson Bay railway in the right way. Do not let him give us assurances as was done in the case of the Canadian National, that the thing can be done for ten or twelve million dollars and then find in the long run that the cost has increased to some four hundred millions. We want a railway which will be honestly constructed in every detail.

In this regard I desire to quote a letter which will speak for itself. What the government is doing at present is this: it is simply laying down what may be called cull ties. These ties are being spread along the line and they are not more than six inches in diameter. They are made of swamp cedar and are being purchased from the United States. Surely this is appalling. A friend of mine, an old cruiser, happened to be going on an expedition along the route of the Hudson Bay railway, and in reply to a request I made of him to keep his eyes open and advise me of conditions he writes me the following letter from the Pas. It is important that hon. members should be apprised of the contents of this letter. It is addressed to myself and reads:

> Referring to my previous correspondence with you, I am giving herein a few more particulars in connection with the H.B.R. You may remember that in 1918 a large quantity of material was taken from the H.B.R. caused through the exigencies of war. Included in the items were sixty cars of steel, each containing thirty tons. Probably locomotives to the number of a dozen, in addition to flat cars and a very large number of ties were also removed. I have never yet heard whether the H.B.R. was given any cash credit for the equipment thus taken, but if so, it would be very interesting to know the amount so credited. I understand that the ties thus removed were used on the line between Preeceville and Kenville.

You may not know, but it is a fact, that large supplies of edibles are always kept in warehouse at Port Nelson. From information I have gathered, large quantities of these supplies are sold at cost to the Hudson's Bay Company, particularly to Mr. Harding, manager of the H.B.C. post at York factory.

This is the point which to me is of most importance.

It is more than interesting to note that the ties now being distributed along the Hudson Bay railway are in no cases No. 1, but are better described as being culls made from old swamp cedar. A man who knows a great deal about ties tells me that many of the ties are only five or six inches in diameter and are not likely to hold the spikes.

I am mentioning these matters to you as I should like some one to put questions to the Minister of Railways on the points raised by me in this letter.

If the government are starting the work of completing the Hudson Bay railway in that fashion the prospect for us in the west is not very hopeful. If you put down ties that will not carry a donkey engine you are not going to be able to transport much traffic. I ask the government to remember that there are going to be heavy wheat trains and heavy stock trains rolling up to Hudson bay. I have every confidence that this route is navigable, regardless of what Mr. Payne says, or what any pamphlets profess to show. I know it because of this experience: I have crossed the Atlantic ocean about 104 times. In the course of these trips I have asked the old mariners I encountered on the cattle ships how they have spent their lives. Many have told me that they have spent years fishing and sealing in Hudson bay. I have asked them often what that route was ilke, and their reply has invariably been, "I would rather navigate the Hudson bay route than the strait of Belle Isle. It is not nearly as dangerous, it is a far better and an easier route." Think of the ships that have been wrecked on the island of Anticosti. Why, if you took a map of Anticosti you would not be able to put the head of a pin upon a place where there had not been a shipwreck. On the other hand, ships have gone in and out of Hudson bay freely and I only know of two vessels that have been wrecked in the course of a long period of years. My implicit belief is that the Hudson bay route is a safer and easier route than the St. Lawrence route. I have no fault to find with the legitimate claims of St. John or Montreal, and I have been shipping out of the latter port for a great many years. But these ports enjoy a big trade from Ontario. All I ask is that we in the west be given a chance. There is no existing route as satisfactory for the transportation of live stock as the Hudson Bay route will be when it is completed. I have seen from 100 to 150 cattle thrown into the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec due to the heat and imperfect ventilation on the cattle ships. You will never get happenings like that on the Hudson bay route. Our western cattle are raised under cold, bracing conditions. They are healthy and hardy and will stand the Hudson bay route twice as well as they do the existing long railway haul to the Atlantic. It is the long haul from Winnipeg to the seaboard that is mainly responsible for shrinkage in the number of weight of cattle; they do not suffer so much on the ship. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has crossed the Atlantic several times and knows that I am speaking the truth in regard to this matter. It is the railway haul, not the ocean trip which is most to be feared. Given fair weather, you can maintain your cattle in good condition on shipboard.

Much criticism of the Hudson bay route is being indulged in. I am sorry to say that even some hon. gentlemen on this side criticize the project, and make fun of me when I refer to it. But I want to remind my critics that some years ago it was said that only a strip of 46 miles west of the Great Lakes was fit for agricultural purposes; the rest of it was a frozen and arid district. That statement was made by a prominent engineer, but some of us have lived to see how foolish that prediction was. It was said at the time of its inception that the Canadian Pacific railway would not pay for the axle grease used on it, that it would traverse an arid and frozen country. The man who made that foolish prediction published a book on the subject. He was a most learned engineer, and he considered it to be his mission to save this country from the great loss of building the Canadian Pacific railway. Away back on May 6, 1886, an old friend of mine, Mr. W. F. Luxton—the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) knows him well,—wrote an article in the Winnipeg Free Press, of which he was editor. That article, the language of which is as applicable to-day as it was then, was thus worded:

This project is the bright hope of the Canadian northwest. Compared with it, many other most important things are insignificant. It is nature coming to disperse the barriers which she herself has raised. Our natural disadvantage is that our land is too remote from the sea coast and the markets of the old world; our wonderful natural advantage is that in Hudson bay we have a sea coast near at hand, and via Hudson bay we have a shorter route to the old world than that of our neighbours in the east. While nature has placed us far inland, in the very centre in fact, of the broadest portion of the continent, she has placed near at hand the great inland sea that will solve the difficulties of our position. Our lands are the most fertile in the world, and the opening of the Hudson bay route must instantly bring us as near to European markets as are the provinces in the east or the states to the south and east. The prospect is magnificent! No more exciting offer was ever held out to any people than that which is now extended to us by the Hudson Bay railway and the great natural privileges with which it is to connect us. Let us see to it that no man dares to oppose this great country in this its great desire.

We have been a patient people in the west in regard to this project. Now after all the time that has elapsed, we are looking to this government to complete the railway and complete it in an honest fashion. If the present government cannot do it, let them make way for hon. gentlemen on this side. Then the road will be built and built in an honest manner. Then we shall see great trainloads of grain and cattle thundering over the Hudson Bay railway on their way to the ocean terminal. There is a paper called the Journal published in Ottawa. I read it every morning. I do not know why that paper criticizes the Hudson Bay route in the manner it does. It doesn't care a tinker's darn for Harry Mullins, Mr. Murphy or the member for Springfield (Mr. Hay). But the man who writes for the Journal is only one individual. Does he know all about the subject? Has he been to Hudson bay? With his limited knowledge of the subject, is he going to endeavour to mould public opinion? I have been up that route—although not quite as far as the Minister of Agriculture—I have been all over it, I have photographs of the route and of the country. It is a splended route and a splendid country. The district through which that road will pass is a fine country. The district tributary to the railway is exceedingly rich in minerals, and the waters of Hudson bay teem with fish. Many western men, including the mayor of Winnipeg, have been over the route and seen the country for themselves. The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) has been all over that country and knows it well. He knows that it is a wonderful country, and that the Hudson bay line will pay well.

The opponents of the project are now attacking Nelson; they want the terminus diverted to Churchill. But the harbour at Nelson is a splendid one; there is nothing wrong with it. The work will not be as costly as has been said; the Journal had better go up there, take a trip over the road and find out what we have. I appeal to hon. members from Quebec to stand back of the project; do not fight it. I do not need to appeal to hon. members from Saskatchewan; they know all about it. I belonged to Ontario in my boyhood days, and you professional men from Ontario should not block us in the realization of this hope. Is there another Mr. Marler to spring up and thunder in this House, with his documents and data, against the Hudson Bay railway? I wish I had a legal mind and could pile up legal data as other hon. gentlemen have done; I would like to be able to prepare a brief, but I have not the legal mind; I can only appeal from the common sense standpoint. But I am afraid some of these eastern men are going to talk against that project, and I know they are absolutely wrong and unfair to our western people. What an opportunity we have, with an outlet on the Atlantic; now with an outlet in the middle west and another at the Pacific coast! We can have a wonderful Canada and I appeal to you not to block this proposal. We have sympathy for you in the Maritimes and in all the other provinces and I ask you not to take issue with us, because this railway will solve the greatest question in those prairie provinces.

A great deal has been said about the climate at the bay. I have a document here from a gentleman who knows all about it, who has lived there for a long time. It is too voluminous to read, but the climate is said to be free from disagreeable features or conditions of exceptional seasonal severity; it is a climate of beautiful warm summers, cold but exhilarating winters and short interventions of spring and fall. Between the Pas and Winnipeg there is a difference of about three degrees of temperature the year round. Not only are summer temperatures especially favourable to plant life, but the length of daylight, about eighteen hours in these latitudes, and its low absolute altitude are important and unfailing influences in the rapid growth of field crops. We in the west are two or three weeks ahead of Ontario now; the grain is up and the grass is growing; the west is calling those who belong there. I have lived in the west for half a century, and I feel satisfied that if you give us an honest road to Hudson bay and complete it to tidewater there will be no handicaps at all. The merchant marine will come there and every ship will be needed; do not sell another boat, because there will be plenty of cargo both ways.

I have taken up a good deal of time on this matter, but I would have liked to say a great many more things about it. However, there will be another opportunity for me to speak on the Hudson bay project, and for the benefit of the hon. member for Brandon and the hon. member for Lisgar I would like now to give my views on the questions of the tariff and the budget. I am sorry I must be absent on Tuesday when the vote is taken, but I have to leave on account of my health; do not think I am shirking my duty. I am going to talk to you now about your pet tariff, and then I will close. I know you want me to come to that soon.

I know, as do my hon. friends, that the world likes a man who keeps his word. It pays a man to keep his word in western Canada, because half of the business there is conducted by word of mouth. I have seen hundreds of thousands of dollars change hands without the help of our legal friends; they were not needed. They take a man at his word out there, and if you make a statement on any public platform in the west, be sure you are correct; the men there will not stand back of you if you break your word. I know the Minister of Agriculture wants me to talk on the tariff for a few moments, because he said I bamboozled the electors in my constituency. I did no such thing. I have lived under Sir John Thompson, Sir Charles Tupper and all the prime ministers down to the present, including the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier; we have always had a tariff since the days of confederation. How will we get revenue without a tariff? The Prime Minister stated in Neepawa, I think, that he was going to have a tariff board, but what did he do? He formed a tariff board, and immediately emasculated it .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: I think that is the word; he immediately emasculated that tariff board—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: If the word is wrong I am willing to be corrected; I am not as highly educated as some of our university graduates, but I am sure the word is right, because I looked it up before using it. That was what happened to the board, and it was absolutely unfair; the west did not like it. On that account, for the benefit of the hon. member for Brandon and the hon. member for Lisgar I want to put myself on record, so they may go to Marquette knowing how I stand. I stand for a man who will give his word and keep it. But the Prime Minister went to Kingston on October 21, just before the election, and told the manufacturers there that he believed they should have protection. He remarked:

> We realize that our industries here have to have safeguards with respect to competition from other parts of the world; competition from the country to the south of us; competition from conditions as they are in England, and we think that is all the more reason why, in these days of depreciated currency and the like, we should have the benefit of expert advice and information on all these great questions of the tariff.

The tariff board was formed, and on it was appointed a personal friend of mine, a gentleman I have known for many years, Mr. McKenzie. I know he is not a high tariff man; his father was not and neither is he. The matter of any proposed tariff changes should have been left to that board, in all fairness. The people of western Canada will not take that question as seriously as the hon. member for Lisgar does. He said he was going to watch my step in this House, and that is one of the reasons why I want to place myself on record to-night; I want to show where I stand.

So far as reducing the income tax is concerned, the reduction will help the young man who is getting three or four thousand dollars a year and has some idea of getting married, but it does not help very much the poor fellow who has a little faith in this country and has invested his money in the stocks of Canadian companies. I know a chap who has invested all his life's savings in Canadian companies, to help promote industry in Canada, and who is living on his dividends. Why should you curtail his income? You take mighty good care of your own salaries, and go after the fellow who has a little faith in his country and is drawing an income from dividends from Canadian companies; you tax those dividends three or four times. But you do not tax your $14,000, your $10,000 as ministers, and your $4,000 indemnities. You have that fixed so that you will pay only one tax, but you are going to tax three or four times the dividends of the man who is trying to help build up his country. Think it over. Do not block industry in this country. I am not making this appeal for myself, but for the many people in this country who have their money invested in Canadian companies and are living on their dividends.

The automobile tax reduction is not such a great thing. To me it does not mean very much. I believe in protection, but I do not believe in a manufacturer hiding behind the tariff and making a fortune out of it. As my right hon. leader says, I would see that he was not allowed to do that, especially the man who is manufacturing implements. I would have a tariff board, and I told the people of Marquette that we would have a tariff board. But the kind of tariff board I mean is not one that would take an industry by the scruff of the neck and throw it out of business, saying: Get to one side, you do not know your business. That is what the government has done in connection with this automobile reduction. They have made a drastic cut in the duty. I saw those four thousand splendid people from Oshawa come and stand in the front of this building. Unlike the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I did not pick out a young fellow to talk to; I picked out an old fellow, and I asked him, "How long have you lived in Oshawa?" "All my life," he said. "Do you know Mr. McLaughlin?" I asked him. He said "I do." Mr. Speaker, old Mr. McLaughlin had no motor car. I was in California some years ago and bought a motor car there, and I was driving Mr. McLaughlin in my car through the orange groves in that southern country. I drove a McLaughlin buckboard and a McLaughlin buggy on the western prairies, and they were made of real honest material. I bought a car in the United States—get this, Mr. Member from Brandon, and tell the people of Marquette about it; I want you to tell them—I bought a car in the United States, and the spokes flew out of it and the body began to squeak; it was the poorest, shoddiest material that was ever put in a car. I bought a D-45 McLaughlin in Canada; I had it eight years, and I only gave it up because I got so ashamed of the people of Winnipeg asking me, "Mullins, when are you ever going to change that car?" I was afraid to let it go. I would rather have one McLaughlin car made in Canada than twenty shoddy cars made in the United States. Just look at an American Ford coming into the city of Winnipeg. Look at the wheels shimmying and wobbling. I believe the hon. member for Brandon is too shrewd a Scotchman to vote for anything like that. I am sure he would rather give double the money for a Canadian made Ford or a Canadian made McLaughlin. I do not think the hon. member for Brandon had anything to do with this cut in the duty on automobiles. I do not think he wielded the club over the government's head in the matter. I think his sympathies would be with the 4,000 men who came to this parliament asking us to protect their homes and their livelihood.

Some hon. member has said that the city of Hamilton consumes as much beef as we export. I have not checked that up, and I do not know whether it is right or not, but I should like to see a few Hamiltons and Torontos with their industries out west, and I would like to have a few of them scattered through the constituency of Marquette, to consume the products of our great prairies. Would I support a measure that would have a tendency to drive those 4,000 men away from Oshawa where they have made their homes, where they have lived all their lives, where they used to build buggies for Mr. McLaughlin, and where they said they had splendid homes and fine working conditions—would I drive them across the line? No, Mr. Speaker, not by my vote in this House, not if I lose my seat in Marquette forty times over; I will never do it. I spoke to these men, and found out from them the inside conditions. I do not hold any brief for Mr. McLaughlin if he was hiding behind the tariff, but I do say that you should have put the tariff board to work and have found out the facts before you touched this industry. It is unfair to cut the tariff without investigation.

Let me say a word to the Labour leaders from Winnipeg. I sat under the ministry of one of them. I listened to him preaching for a number of years, and he was a splendid chap. I do not know what has changed his ideas; I do not know what is the matter with him now. He used to preach splendid sermons in our church.

Mr. BENNETT: He has fallen by the wayside.

Mr. MULLINS: I do not know what has changed him. I do not know anything about his colleague (Mr. Heaps) as a preacher, but I do know about the other man. I know a manufacturer in Winnipeg, manufacturing gloves and mittens. At the request of the industrial bureau I put a little money in that business to help him out. He had a hundred girls at work, and one Saturday he came to me with beads of perspiration standing on his brow, and said he had no money to pay those girls and asked me to help him out. He took me over to the Bank of Toronto and got me to endorse a paper for him so that those girls could receive their weekly pay. That fellow was not drawing as big a salary from the business as those girls were. They were making from $25 to $28 a week, and that poor fellow who was manufacturing these gloves only drew $100 a month. As I walked across the market square with him I heard a man standing on a soap box fairly eating up the poor employer; he was just devouring him, running the poor employer down, and here was a poor employer with me who was sweating drops of blood to meet the pay cheques on Saturday night. So I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, have a kindly word for the manufacturers. They are not all you think of them; be fair to them. I say that honest labour has a right to organize, and to strike if they are being oppressed by capital—yes, every time; but do not be unfair to the manufacturer. These men who came from Oshawa were being treated fairly. Every one of them that I talked to spoke very highly of his employer, and they were all well satisfied with their working conditions.

I am going to support the amendment, and I want to let the people in Marquette know that the government did not carry out its promise that it would appoint a tariff board and have a thorough inquiry into the question of the tariff before taking action. I am not finding so much fault with the budget as with the method adopted by the government on this occasion. That being the case I cannot support the motion to adopt the budget. I appeal to hon. members of this House not to be unfair to industry, not to take too narrow a view of it, and not to be too rabid in their ideas in regard to the western country and the building of the Hudson Bay railway. With these remarks I leave the situation in regard to the problems of western Canada in the hands of my hon. friends on this side of the House.

Mr. J. ETIENNE DUSSAULT (Levis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when at the opening of this session, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) proposed your re-election as Speaker, I enthusiastically approved of it like every other member of the House. Of course, you were best qualified to hold that position under the abnormal and difficult conditions due to the result of the last general election. But in doing so, the Liberal party gave the country and parliament further evidence of their self-denial and they deprived themselves of the services of one of the most able members of parliament and of the most eloquent orators of our race. Mr. Speaker, let the first words that I utter in this chamber be words of hearty congratulation to you.

I do not intend to speak very long on the subject which is now before the House, but I would not take up the budget at once without saying to the hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Baker), like hon. members who preceded me, how much we appreciated his delicate feelings in expressing himself in this House in the French language. The example which he set is worth being followed by every one of his English speaking colleagues. The compliment which he paid to us was appreciated not only in this House, but I venture to say in our whole province and the people of my district whom I met on my last week-end trip have asked me to thank the hon. member for Toronto Northeast on their behalf and to tell him that if he keeps on studying the French language, they will soon be glad to call him "Boulanger" and should he go further, to open to him the doors of the Liberal party. The electors of the constituency which I have the honour to represent have received with a great deal of pleasure, I should say with enthusiasm, the budget as presented by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). I come from a district where wealthy people are an exception. A good number of my constituents, perhaps not the average but those who have some means, enjoy a decent comfort. They were among those who, under the old scale of taxation had to pay an income tax ranging from $40 to $200 a year. The present budget decreases their charges considerably and enables them to get a little more than what they formerly used to consider as luxury; it enables them to give their children a better education and, at the same time, to enjoy more of the pleasures of life. They have been just as happy to hear that the Minister of Finance did not have to show deficits or to announce an increase of the debt. Judging from the present budget, we may state that our country has gone through the after-war crisis and that, in the future, our financial results will favourably compare with those obtained by our beloved chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Ever since the beginning of this session the members sitting to your left strove to show, in all possible manners, why and how they have been reelected as members of this House. They state that, in their constituencies, the only important issue was that of high protection. Since this session began hon. members from the Maritime provinces have told us that they had been elected, not only in order to favour protection, but in order to uphold the rights of those provinces. The members from the West told us: We must have freight rates which will enable us to ship our products to the European markets; but everyone of them favours protection. Among the members who sit to your left, Mr. Speaker, I seek in vain for one who said: I favour high protection, I want a higher tariff on such and such an article manufactured in this country; I would like to see the duty raised 10 or 20 per cent above what it is to-day. They are in a general way in favour of high protection, and nothing more.

With us, Mr. Speaker, conditions differ somewhat from those in the rest of the country. In the province of Quebec, the people are not exclusively supporters of free trade, but they do not advocate a high tariff, and you will readily understand why. In such constituencies as are depending on industry, it is more than likely that the voters should demand more protection in favour of the industries on which they depend for their living; but when hon. gentlemen on the opposition side tell us that the province of Quebec as a whole is advocating protection, I feel that it is my duty to take exception to such a statement. For instance, Mr. Speaker, in the constituency of Levis, which I have the honour to represent in this House, there is not a single industry that is dissatisfied with the extent of protection enjoyed at the present time; and for years and years back, the people of Levis have been taxed for the benefit of the manufacturers. For that reason, it would hardly be fitting to come and tell them: You ought to consider yourselves fortunate in having to pay a higher price for anything you purchase inasmuch as what you thus pay goes towards the making up of wages earned by your workers! There is no worker in our district who can make a living out of the wages resulting from a high tariff policy. Should the big interests ever decide to establish any new industry in the city of Levis or in the town of Lauzon, I think that my constituents would be justified in protecting and doing their utmost towards safeguarding the capital from which they would derive their means of subsistence. But until such industries are established I see no reason why our people should be keen on paying a much higher price for anything from which they derive no benefit, directly or indirectly. And, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the people in Ontario are beginning to admit the fitness of what I have just said. In fact, last night I clipped from the Star a short item reproduced from the Hamilton Spectator:

> Everything that gives Quebec and Ontario a common aim, everything that turns the sympathetic attention of men in Ontario to Quebec and of men in Quebec to Ontario, is of value to both. The growth of manufactures in Quebec will in time bring industrialist and workman there to see the viewpoint of the Ontario manufacturer.

That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what we said to the voters during the last electoral campaign. We said: "If the manufacturers expect the province of Quebec to patronize them, the least they can do is to come along and let us benefit by their investments and thus assist in the development of our province."

The chief industry in my constituency is that of steel shipbuilding and neither the employers nor the workers engaged in that industry could depend on protection for the betterment of the conditions they are confronted with; a high tariff would solve none of their problems. Their competitors in that branch of business are British firms, from the United Kingdom, and every one knows that no party would ever undertake to increase the tariff to the detriment of British shipbuilders. The remedy to the ills suffered by our workingmen employed in that particular industry is within reach of the administrators of this country: it is the readjustment of dry dock charges for ships in need of repairs, and such a readjustment can be made without any loss of revenue to the public treasury. Rates charged for the use of the dry dock in the case of ships to undergo permanent repairs should be decreased by half, so as to enable our Canadian shipyards to compete successfully with foreign shipbuilders.

This, as a rule, is what takes place when a large ship, liner or cargo boat is stranded somewhere in the river—the insurance companies concerned in the salvage of that ship immediately call for tenders from the different Canadian shipbuilding companies as well as from American and English shipyards. When thus competing, Canadian builders, as for instance those of Levis, must add to the cost of actual repairs such rates as they are compelled to pay for the use of the docks. Their competitors in England, who have been engaged in that industry for centuries, own their own dry docks and, in the price of their tenders do not include docking charges. Mr. Speaker, here in Canada, the department of Public Works would only have to lower by one half their docking charges and as an immediate result, our Canadian shipbuilders would be in a position to compete with the British shipyards. In fact, what happens when the Canadian employer is thus prevented from securing a contract? The ship is raised and laid up in the dry docks where she undergoes temporary repairs, which means, for instance, that whatever plates of the hull are warped or twisted are not even removed but covered with new ones; then the ship is launched again and with a full or half cargo, proceeds to Europe where the permanent repairs are to be made. If dry dock charges allowed our contractors to compete for the job not only would it not cost one cent more to the country, but the vessel remaining here for a full month would be a four or five times better paying proposition than when the length of its stay is a mere three days; moreover, our workers would find employment for one, two or three months. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that common interest demands that those engaged in ship construction and repairs should live near the dry dock, since a dry dock without expert workmen would be like a hospital without a doctor; if these men are not kept employed they must look for work elsewhere. I do not say they will leave the country but they will go away in search of a living. It is one of navigation's essential needs, Mr. Speaker, that dry docks be properly supplied with material and labour.

But there is more than that. The other day when we were discussing the estimates of the Marine department, on an item of $35,000 being called, an item having to do with continuing the subsidies paid for salvaging equipment in the province of Quebec and in British Columbia, some hon. members asked the Minister of Marine what services had been rendered to navigation by the Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Co., which receives an annual grant of $25,000 from the Dominion government. Since nearly all the employees of this company come from my riding, and since the main artery of the company's operations is in the city of Lévis, on the south side of Quebec harbour, I know better than any other what signal service these people have rendered navigation along the entire course off the St. Lawrence. This company, which employs all the men I have just mentioned, has a very powerful equipment; I even venture to state that no other firm of the same character in the whole of the Dominion, on either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, can compare with it in this respect. In order to keep this entire outfit under steam during the season of navigation, to be ready to respond instantly to a call for succour, to keep and pay regularly skilled salvage workers, the company is put to an expense far beyond its income; hence it would naturally operate at a heavy loss. It was to avoid this loss that the Marine department was asked to grant a subsidy. To show how well this company does its work I shall cite one instance which occurred in our district last December. On December 6th the steamer Airedale started down the river from Montreal; at Ile-aux-Coudres, just below Quebec, she ran ashore going at full speed. The underwriters got into touch immediately with the Quebec Salvage and Wrecking Co., and the latter lost no time in despatching a wrecking crew to the scene. But the company's equipment was not powerful enough for the work in hand; they had to call on the Marine department for help with boats and men. In passing I wish to congratulate the Minister of Marine on the fine work done by his department at the time. Mr. Speaker, in cold December weather when ice was beginning to form on the river these men succeeded in floating the vessel in four days: they started on December 10th; on December 15th the Airedale had been floated, brought to Quebec and put in dry dock. On December 17th, two days later, she left Quebec, reloaded with all her cargo. You readily grasp, Mr. Speaker, the importance to navigation of such assistance to ships in distress. You know that on the 1st of November each year, because of the approach of winter, the shipping underwriters charge a special rate not on vessels alone but on their cargoes as well. If, on account of neglect on the part of the government or shortsightedness in the Marine department, this ship had not been salvaged the insurance companies would have been obliged to pay the full value of the policies on the boat, which amounted to a considerable sum, and on the cargo besides. The insurance companies would have passed these charges along to all the goods shipped and all the boats leaving Quebec or the St. Lawrence after December, and the following year insurance rates would have been raised; and when an insurance company has once raised its rates you know what trouble it is to have rates reduced later to the old figure. As you can see by what happened in this particular instance, dry docks, salvage equipment, skilled labour, the Marine department, the lighting of the channel, the buoy service, dredging by the department of Public Works or of Marine, all form part of the one scheme of things, all have a share in making the St. Lawrence an inland waterway renowned for its safety in shipping circles the world over. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that next year the Minister of Marine will not be bothered so much when he asks for a renewal of this subsidy.

Increasing the safety of navigation on the St. Lawrence will do no harm to traffic on the lakes. If the insurance companies raise their rates on the St. Lawrence shippers in Quebec province will not be the only ones to suffer; the same higher rates will be levied on goods coming from Ontario via the lakes and on goods from the west. So when these gentlemen help to keep the St. Lawrence salvage service well equipped they are striving, like the rest of the country, to ensure favourable rates.

Mr. Speaker, among all the members from the Maritime provinces who have told the House of the evils that beset that part of the country only one pointed to any remedy. I am speaking of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). After explaining in detail just what industries are affected in his province, after an eloquent plea for his fellow-citizens, he indicated as a remedy the re-establishment at Moncton of the administration of the Intercolonial with the understanding that the railway would be maintained and operated in the interest of the Maritime provinces and under the direction of high officials from those provinces, and he said: "That is what I demand, and what I will continue to demand as long as I sit in this House."

Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's stand appears rather selfish to me. Of course the Intercolonial serves the Maritime provinces, but it also serves all the counties on the south shore from Montreal to Campbellton; and if there be two paying divisions on this railroad they are certainly those between Montreal and Levis and Levis and Campbellton. It is only in Quebec province that the railroad makes any profit at all; and I do not think it quite fair that the system should be operated solely for and by the Maritime provinces when it derives its revenue from the population of our province. Why is such a request made? The reason is not far to seek; certain members are evidently dissatisfied with the way patronage is exercised in their district. And I can quote the hon. member for Kings (Mr. J. A. Macdonald) who said that in his part of the country the only people employed are those recommended by the Liberal committee or the Liberal member, or ex-member, or the Liberal candidate. It is a pity the hon. gentleman doesn't come and see how things are where I come from; if he thinks he is on a red-hot gridiron he would find that I am not on a bed of roses. There things are just the opposite: patronage is in the hands of the Conservatives and is used for the sole advantage of Conservatives. Since October 29 last I have recommended people three or four times, not because they were Liberals but because they really were in need of earning the money; I would no sooner recommend a man than he would be discharged forthwith. So I wonder what it would profit these people from the Maritime provinces to do away with the staunch friends they have just now in the head offices of the railway. And since that is the way with patronage, Mr. Speaker, I wish you would come down to my riding and see some of the properties belonging to the Railway department. You would find a deep-sea wharf built by the Department of Public Works and later given over to the Intercolonial. I am certain that not $1,000 a year has been spent for the maintenance of this wharf, and if repairs are not undertaken immediately it will be carried away by the ice. You will say: But you should take the matter up with the railway board. The railway commissioners tell us: We cannot pay attention to the claims of members of parliament, particularly Liberal members: that would be patronage.

I do not see why we should not bring about a better understanding between the people of the Maritime provinces and the people of the province of Quebec. We are all anxious to ensure their full rights to these provinces; however, they should not try to trespass on the rights of their neighbours. I would be perfectly willing to have an Intercolonial Commission composed of representatives of the Maritimes and of one or two representatives from Quebec province in the interest of the south shore of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Campbellton. But when it is suggested to establish one sole dictator at Moncton and to operate the Intercolonial for the exclusive benefit of the Maritime provinces, we claim that nothing of the sort was promised at the time of Confederation.

Nevertheless, I wish to congratulate the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) on having had the courage—lacking in his colleagues from the Maritimes—to tell us frankly what he is after and what his constituents expect. We know that these gentlemen want the railroad administered for themselves and only by their own people, without consulting the other provinces. Not a very auspicious start, I'll admit, for negotiating an agreement between the Maritimes and Quebec, where the Intercolonial passes; but it is a start at any rate. However, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we of the province of Quebec will not allow ourselves—and our constituents would not stand for it if we were to countenance such a proceeding—to be swept aside in the administration of a public service which is absolutely essential to our trade. Mark you, I am not speaking of secession. During the election, last October, there was some mention made of secession in the Maritime provinces; this was badly received in Quebec. As a new member in this House I found that the following which appeared in the Halifax Herald of February 18th last was in very bad taste:

> The possibilities of commencing a secession movement in the Maritime provinces were to-day informally discussed by a handful of local businessmen, headed by Walter H. Tennant, a prominent manufacturer of this town. It was stated that a meeting to formally debate the topic would be called at an early date and Mr. Tennant was authorized to secure a speaker and arrange the details of the meeting.

Mr. Speaker, you know that during the period when the province of Quebec had most reason to complain of the treatment we received at the hands of those who governed us, nobody ever raised these cries of secession, because they were known to be too dangerous. If to-day it is sought to create a movement along that line in the rest of the country and bring about a political divorce you can rest assured that Quebec will be against the divorce no matter what form it may take. Quebec will be the last province to separate from her sister provinces; but she will know how to safeguard her rights in their entirety, no matter what may happen.

Mr. SAMUEL CHARTERS (Peel): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate and at this hour of the night I have no intention of delaying the House for more than a few minutes, and I rise only for the purpose of making an observation or two regarding matters directly affecting the people of the district from which I come. The greater number of the people in the county of Peel are engaged in what is called mixed farming in the widest sense of the term, in stock raising, grain growing, dairying, fruit and vegetable growing and other lines akin thereto. Others in the urban section are employed in the manufacture of boots and shoes, woollens, bricks and the growing of flowers.

These industries and occupations are all dependent for success on the home market, something that we hear very little about during this debate in comparison with other years. The value of the home market is well illustrated by three or four items which I wish to present. In one year, 1922, of all the food produced in the Dominion of Canada the following are the percentages consumed by the Canadian people:

	Per cent
Beef	96
Pork	93
Mutton	97
Butter	94
Eggs	98
Potatoes	97
Turnips	97

Other lines of vegetables, fruit and so on were consumed in the same proportions. The portion of the home market with which the people I represent are most directly concerned is that which consists of the cities of Toronto, Hamilton and all the adjacent towns and villages. Within a radius of forty-five to fifty miles there is an urban population of no less than 700,000 people, a population greater than that of Alberta, or Manitoba, or Nova Scotia, and almost equal to that of Saskatchewan, a population comprising one-twelfth of all the people of Canada. A district of that size surely deserves the consideration of the government and of membrs of parliament generally. In that area there are manufacturers of all kinds whose wants have to be supplied. They are supplied by the farmers of the surrounding districts. Any policy that retards progress in that section, that fails to promote prosperity in that urban district, injures very greatly the farmers of the surrounding country. It is contended, and not without a good deal of justification, that every one of the industries and occupations to which I have referred are injured to some extent because of the action or on account of the inaction of the present administration. For that reason there is no free trade sentiment in the county of Peel or the adjoining counties of Halton, Lincoln, Wellington and York or indeed from Kingston down to Niagara Falls, and there has been no free trade sentiment in my constituency for a number of years.

In the election of 1921 the opponents of the then government took the ground that the tariff was no longer an issue and that nothing was to be gained by discussing it. In the election contest of October last the candidate supporting the administration took exactly the same ground, stating not that the tariff was too high, but that in many cases it was much too low. I want to refer to one or two of his statements. Speaking at Erindale, where hon. members will probably recall the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made the second speech in the campaign, the candidate supporting the present administration made this reference to the tariff:

> The whole tariff on fruits and vegetables is absurd under present conditions, and if I am elected to parliament, I shall make every effort to secure the adjustment to prevent the flooding of our market with produce from the southern states at the same season when it is in direct competition with our own home-grown stuff.

Again speaking at Brampton on October 27 he said:

> The fruit and vegetable growers were entitled to something in the nature of a luxury tax, or something to keep out the fruit and vegetables that come here and take the taste out of the mouths of the people for their fruits in due season.

And again at Clarkson on October 20 he made this statement:

> I do not wish to deprive anyone of the right to their strawberries in January, or their peaches in May; but if they want them they should be prepared to pay a luxury tax on them. This may not be orthodox Liberal policy, but it is justice.

A similar position was taken by those supporting the candidate. By the way, six cabinet ministers, including the Prime Minister, paid a visit to the constituency, and others used influence in different directions. I took the ground that the tariff was not too high as applied to the industries that obtained in the county of Peel.

I said that these industries had been suffering because of conditions created by the government or because of something the government had left undone. The boot and shoe industry, which has two factories in that constituency, has suffered in common with the rest—not because the cut in the tariff was so very great, although it has been great enough to increase the importations in different lines, but because of the attitude of influential supporters of the government in relation to it. We are told on the one hand by one supporter of the administration that industries that cannot meet competition under a tariff of twenty per cent have no right to survive. Another one equally influential tells us that the boot and shoe industry is the next to be attacked by those who are opposed to the tariff and anxious to introduce a policy of free trade. The trouble is not so much what has been done as the threat that is being held over manufacturers of this line of goods.

It is also no longer denied that the action of the government has very seriously injured the woollen industry. Not only have mills been closed down and men driven out of employment, but many have been actually forced to go to another country in order to secure the work which they are denied in Canada. In addition to this the hope of many that out of and in connection with this industry a sheep industry would be developed that would be of great value to the farmers of Canada, has of course vanished.

We have in the county of Peel no fewer than six modern, well-equipped, brick-making plants, the success of which depends almost altogether upon the local market. When building operations are very dull, as they are at present in Toronto, and particularly so in Hamilton, these plants are of course not busy. Some of them are closed down at the present time; others are working on short time and with small staffs. The conditions in the larger towns and cities is illustrated by the condition that exists right here in the city of Ottawa. Hon. members may have noticed in the Ottawa Citizen the other morning a statement giving a comparison of the building permits issued during the first four months of 1925 with those issued in the same period of 1926. In 1925, in those four months 245 building permits were issued in Ottawa for buildings that cost a total of $1,260,709. In the same four months in 1926 the number of permits issued was 120 and the value of the buildings was estimated at $305,000. In other words, the number of permits was cut in two while the value of the buildings was one-quarter of what it was in the same period the year before.

Take the matter of dairy products, fruit and vegetables. I have no disposition to go over the ground which has already been so well covered, but I must observe that the district from which I come is greatly interested in both these lines, and the feeling of the people there is that a policy of protection is indispensable. Those who have studied the question, those whose living depends upon the proceeds of these industries, are firmly of the conviction that a good substantial tariff is essential if they are to succeed. They have no hesitation in saying that when any country raises its tariff 10, 15 or 25 per cent, it is the duty of this country and this government to increase the Canadian tariff by the same amount. We are not afraid to say that in the matter of dairy products, as well as in connection with fruit and vegetables, we are in favour of a brick for brick policy in order that we may be able to keep our market for our own people rather than divide it up with other countries who increase their tariffs to our disadvantage.

Let me now refer for a moment to the flower growing industry. One of the greatest flower growing centres on the American continent is the town of Brampton where there is a plant of some twenty-six acres all covered with glass. The industry at this moment employs more than 325 men and it is interesting to note that its consumption of coal last year was 14,000 tons. Now, if there is one commodity more than any other that is a luxury it is flowers, and surely if anyone finds it necessary to go out of this country to secure his requirements in this respect, he should be prepared to pay a duty. There are fifty-two other plants in Peel and the surrounding counties all of which afford employment to a large number of Canadian workmen. If people want to import flowers, is it not reasonable to expect them to pay a fair duty? What are the facts in relation to this business? A few years ago the American duty was 25 per cent on cut flowers and the Canadian duty 17½ per cent. Our producers secured some business in the cities of the United States, although their exports were not very considerable, but the moment they began to assume appreciable proportions the American government at once raised their tariff from 25 to 40 per cent and so shut out the Canadians. I made a personal appeal to Mr. Fielding when he was Minister of Finance, urging the case of our Canadian producers and asking that they be given treatment comparable to that extended to those engaged in the same business in the United States. I received a negative reply. The request was repeated to the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) last year, when I pointed out that as a result of the duty on coal having been increased our Canadian flower growers were still further handicapped. Coal is really the raw material of this industry, and when the duty was raised fifty cents a ton the result was an increase of $7,000 in the coal bill which this one concern I have mentioned had to foot. Surely, therefore, it was fair to request that the duty on American flowers coming into Canada should be increased in proportion to the tariff which the United States had imposed against this country. The answer the Minister of Finance gave was that no further increases in duties would be made that year. Perhaps he will be wiser this year, and as he is making some changes he may see his way clear to concede a wise and necessary adjustment in this regard. I repeat, if there is anything that is a luxury surely it is flowers, and if the people of Canada think it necessary to go outside Canada to get their flowers they should be prepared to pay a reasonable duty.

The question comes down to this: whether or not free trade is the goal to which the present government is striving. If it is then the government should have the courage to stand up and declare its policy and put it into force, giving the manufacturers and all others concerned an opportunity to test it.

The government should do this and take the consequences. On the other hand, if we are to maintain the principle of protection, then I contend, as we all in this House contend with the exception of twenty or thirty members, that there should be a tariff sufficiently high to protect the manufacturers, the workingmen and all other classes affected, giving them the right to the Canadian market first of all and enabling them to develop to the fullest their respective lines.

During the election campaign, and in this House three or four or five times in the course of the last parliament, the Prime Minister very wisely made the statement that until the finances of the country were in a more satisfactory condition even necessary public works would have to be denied as, in fact, they were being denied hon. members who were making applications to have various things undertaken by the government. That was a wise stand to take. Now I want to give two or three examples of the manner in which this policy announced by the Prime Minister has been carried out. There is in the county of Peel a property known as the Port Credit harbour. Fifty years ago there was considerable shipping there, grain and other commodities being handled. Changing conditions, however, have put the harbour out of business, and nothing has been done at this point in the way of shipping, no grain of any kind nor other commodities having been handled in the past thirty years. Every government for fifty years now has been appealed to, first of all to repair the harbour, then to restore it and finally to replace it; because, strange as it may appear, there is in reality no harbour now. Even the wharf has been allowed to disappear. That was the condition last year. All appeals made to previous governments have failed, but last summer while the election was on this government was approached for assistance for the harbour. The government looked upon the request kindly. They said that something must be done. They thought that here was a property that must be preserved and protected. The matter appeared to them so urgent that they could not wait until a government dredge could be brought to the mouth of the river and so they hired a dredge from the harbour commission in Toronto. It happened that a government dredge was operating at the same time in the Thames river in the county of Kent. That dredge was costing $216 a day while this other one secured from the city of Toronto was operating at a cost of $346 per day. The matter was so very urgent however that evidently the government thought they must have this dredge. Now on August 12 the bargain was entered into and the dredge was forwarded. It was to operate until such time as the harbour might be made capable of accommodating such shipping as might be available. I may observe that the election was in progress at the time the dredge was going full swing. The people who had been hoping for years that something would be done to improve the harbour were rejoicing when this work was started and they were informed that this was but a small evidence of what would be done if support were given the present government. Well, the dredge continued operations for twenty days at a total cost of $6,937 or, as I have said, $346 a day. At the end of that time, however, the dredge disappeared, having done its work in helping to influence the electors to support the government candidate. And that was the end of the matter. When the question was asked in this House, if the operations would be continued, the minister replied, "No, as dredging to meet present requirements completed last year." The "present requirements," of course, were of a political character. The minister probably knows nothing about conditions in the place where the property is situated. The facts are that this money was expended because, and only because, there was an election in progress. Further than that, the money was expended to no purpose. There was no value in it, there is no improvement in the harbour property so far as shipping is concerned. I make the statement now that but for the fact that an election was on, and that Peel was a county that had not supported the Liberal party for many years and it was thought this would have an influence on the people, no dredge would have been sent in, and the expenditure of this money would not have been incurred. That is one case where the promise of the Prime Minister to practise economy has been broken. I do not need to stress the matter further.

Now let me give one more case. Within three or four miles of that place there is another property owned by the government, which is known as the Long Branch rifle ranges, and consists of 463 acres. It is under the control of the Department of National Defence, is within five or six miles of the city of Toronto, and is situated on the Toronto-Hamilton highway—perhaps the most extensively travelled roadway in Canada—is in a growing district, and is very valuable. For some years efforts have been made by real estate men and others to induce the government to sell the property, but without success. There had also been appeals made to the government to set aside a portion of the property for park purposes. The application was made by the township council, by the people of the village of Lakeview, also by the trustees of the public school board, but no response was received other than one of a negative character. Last year, however, just when the election was on the way, it was announced that the government had decided to give a 99-year lease for seven acres of this property to the township, and it was to be used for a park. Again, as at Port Credit, the band was out, a procession was formed, dancing and other celebrations were carried on to spread abroad the news of the wonderful work the government was doing in the interests of the county of Peel. That was just before the writs were issued.

It will be remembered that on September 5 the Prime Minister made his statement that the elections would be held on October 29. Three days afterwards, on September 8, the Prime Minister visited the townshhip in which this property is situated and addressed the electors. On the following day, that is to say on September 9, advertisements were published asking for tenders for the purchase of 26 acres of this same property, the tenders to be returned on September 25. It was very well known by everybody in the neighbourhood, and by many in the city of Toronto, that the placing of this property on the market at that time was for the purpose of allowing it to be secured by a very ardent, a very industrious, and a very capable supporter of the Liberal candidate. Three tenders were received. The first was from Abraham Swartz for $1,100 an acre; the second was from Hubbs & Hubbs for $1,200; and the third was from W. G. Harris for $1,351. The highest tender was not accepted, and Hubbs & Hubbs were allowed to change their tender from $1,200 to $1,525. They were given the property at that value, and it is in their possession at the present time. That is to say, 26 acres of as valuable property as can be found in the province of Ontario, outside the cities and larger towns, have been given to these men in the middle of an election campaign for $40,000. What happened subsequently? A short time afterwards the property was subdivided by the men in charge and was placed on the market at a valuation of $150,000. That is the price the government of this country was prepared to pay in order to secure support in a district within a few miles of Toronto. As a result of this transaction there is no doubt whatever that the government will lose a sum not less than $100,000. Why do I say that? Because the men who purchased it have placed it on the market at a valuation of $150,000. They make this comment in their advertisement:

> Lakeshore properties similar to Parkview have increased over 100 per cent in four years. Parkview will do the same or better.

Under such conditions as I have indicated there should be some explanation from the government, and there should be some better price paid for the property, although a transfer has probably been made by this time. On March 15 in answer to the question, "Is it the intention of the government to offer the remainder of the property for sale" —that is the rifle ranges property—the minister replied, "No." In the middle of an election campaign the government picked out 26 acres of the most valuable of the whole area of 463 acres. They put it on the market in order that friends and supporters might secure it at a tender lower than the other two, but they allowed their friends to change their tender after the other offers had been put in, and gave them this property under the conditions that I have explained. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is time that attention should be drawn to matters of that kind. Now that it has been ventilated the House and the country will know what estimate to put on such transactions, and for that reason I do not intend to pursue this particular matter any further.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is always ready to lend a helping hand if there is a brother in distress, especially about election time. The third of the ministers to employ public funds in order to assist the Liberal candidate in that election was the hon. gentleman who presides over the Department of Agriculture. Ten days before the election a grant was made by the department when nobody expected any such grant to be made; when in fact the grant had not even been passed by parliament. There is in the county of Peel an organization known as the Alfalfa Seed Growers' Association. Ten days before the election a cheque was received from the minister's department addressed to the funds of this organization. It was not handed to the treasurer and deposited as an ordinary cheque would be, but was passed around amongst interested individuals to allow them to know what good work the minister was ready to do. It was said the amount was very small, but it indicated the willingness of the minister to grant funds for election purposes in the county.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will my hon. friend give some authority for making the statement he has? It is the first I have ever heard of it.

Mr. CHARTERS: I suppose that is the way my hon. friend administers his department. There is no doubt about the facts. My hon. friend can verify them if he looks the matter up and will be able to unearth a cheque.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are grants going out to organizations every month in the year, and the grant to this organization must have gone in the usual way.

Mr. CHARTERS: This is the first time a cheque of that kind has ever reached the county of Peel in that way or in any other way from the department.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend will have to produce some evidence for his assertions.

Mr. CHARTERS: We will give you all the evidence you require.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You have not given it yet.

Mr. CHARTERS: My hon. friend squirms, and I do not blame him for it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No squirming about it.

Mr. CHARTERS: It is time that he and other ministers of the crown devoted some attention to saving public money rather than squandering it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has made a statement that is false.

Mr. CHARTERS: I have already exceeded the time I intended to occupy, and I simply wish to say this in conclusion: The evidence I have given of these three transactions can be multiplied over and over again in the case of Canada as a whole. The acts are worthy of general condemnation, and if the opportunity is given, as it probably will be in a very short time, the people of the Dominion will express their feelings about such conduct as did the people of the county of Peel who were expected to be influenced by improper methods. The people of the county of Peel condemned the action of the government in the strongest possible way by giving the largest Conservative vote that has been recorded in the county for upwards of twenty-five years, and I have no doubt when the proper time comes the people of the Dominion as a whole will be equally emphatic in their condemnation.

Mr. A. P. CULLIGAN (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, this is my first attempt to address this honourable House, and for that reason I crave the indulgence of hon. gentlemen. It is not my intention to speak at any length.

Before dealing with the budget, I shall refer to a few remarks made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) during the debate on the Address. The remarks in question were uttered on February 1, and will be found on page 614 of Hansard. My hon. friend made reference to the "lumber lords" in the province of New Brunswick, and I have no doubt he included myself in that class, as I happen to be in the lumber business. I wish to point out to this House that I belong to the New Brunswick Lumbermen's Association and believe that I have attended every meeting of that body during the past year. I also wish to state that there was no promise made by the Hon. Mr. Baxter that he would favour the lumbermen provided they would support him. It is not necessary for me to speak of the depression that has existed in the lumber industry since 1921 and still continues. We as lumbermen in the province of New Brunswick felt we could not continue to operate unless we got some concessions in the way of cheaper stumpage. We appeared before the Veniot government on several occasions and pointed out to them the absolute necessity of relief in the way of stumpage reduction; otherwise we would be obliged to curtail or close our lumber operations. At that time we were paying a stumpage of $4 per thousand feet as compared with our friends in Quebec paying $2.70. Not only that, but there is a difference from 15 to 18 per cent in the scale of logs in favour of Quebec operators, so that you will readily see that it was impossible for us to carry on and compete with our Quebec friends. It was not until a few weeks prior to the election, held on August 10, 1925, that the then Liberal government made a reduction in stumpage of $1 per thousand. Why was this done? Simply to try to swing the lumbermen into line, or at least part of them. After the announcement of the reduction of $1 per thousand the lumbermen met and talked the situation over. It was then that we all agreed to support the opposition, and we felt that since Hon. Mr. Baxter knew the deplorable condition that existed in the lumber market, if elected to power he would give such assistance as was necessary for us to carry on our operations, and also give employment to thousands of men who have no other way in our province of earning a livelihood and supporting their families. Not only that, but we all felt that it was high time to hurl from power the most extravagant and unbusinesslike government that ever held the reins of power in the province of New Brunswick. To convince you of these facts, all that it is necessary to do is to read over the financial statement of our province from 1917 to 1925, during the regime of the Liberal party, and one will readily see that the Liberal party have doubled the bonded debt of our province, and have nothing much to show for the huge increase in the public debt.

My hon. friend went further and stated that Mr. Baxter promised the lumber lords if he and his party were placed in power he would put a stop to the Grand Falls water power development that was so much talked of by the Liberal party. Now, I want to say frankly that no such promise was ever made by Mr. Baxter to the lumbermen. The facts are that the lumbermen, as well as all other classes, were anxious to see the Grand Falls power developed. Mr. Baxter and his supporters announced from every platform during the campaign that the development would be carried on, but not along the same lines as the Liberal party proposed; and I wish also to state to this House that the people of New Brunswick are very fortunate indeed that a change of government has taken place and to have such a capable man as the Hon. Mr. Baxter at the head of the government to develop our water powers, and also to carry on the business of our province in a business-like way. The government has now undertaken to develop the Grand Falls power without one cent of cost to our province. Had the Liberal party been returned to power and undertaken to develop the Grand Falls as outlined by the Liberal Premier, Mr. Veniot, to my mind our province would be in bankruptcy before many years. To convince you that what I am saying is true, all one needs is to read the history of the development of the Musquash power, which was carried on by the Liberal party in the province of New Brunswick. When the bill for this particular power came before the House it was stated that the cost would not exceed one and one-half million dollars. Up to to-day the Musquash development has cost our province close to four millions, and I understand there are still unpaid claims to the extent of some seven or eight hundred thousand dollars.

Just one word more with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester. He stated that the bushmen were only receiving $1 per day for their labour during the past winter. I wish to state that this is not correct so far as Restigouche county is concerned. Wages paid in the camps in Restigouche county were from $30 to $40 per month. I want to state further that most of the men employed nowadays in the woods work either by the thousand feet or by the piece; and I can tell this House that in my own camps most of the men working in this way made as much as from $65 to $70 per month. It is absolutely necessary for them to earn this amount of wages in order to support their families.

The constituency I represent, Restigouche-Madawaska, is located on the border line separating the province of New Brunswick from the province of Quebec, and the activities of its people are largely taken up by fisheries and lumbering. It means that we are closely interested in freight rates and that the problems arising from this indicate matters are of extreme importance to us if we are to have a fair show in marketing our natural and industrial products in central Canada.

Although we are not very much interested in the reductions in the tariff in so far as they affect us directly, we are Canadians and as such we are anxious to see this country of ours and every section of it treated with fairness; and I might add right here that, in my humble opinion, the reductions in the duties on automobiles and automobile parts will not produce the relief that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) believes, but on the contrary they will endanger the very life of this industry, thereby affecting seriously the 35,000 men earning their living at it.

As a solace for the handicaps that the Maritime provinces are up against, the government has appointed a royal commisison to inquire into the Maritime rights. But this panacea has not in the past proved to be of much use. Royal commissions have cost the country considerable money, and in most cases their findings have been of no avail. The pulpwood commission is one case in point. This commission cost over $75,000 and was barren of results.

Maritime rights are a vital question in Canadian national life, and every unprejudiced man will agree that if this confederation is to be upheld, these rights must be respected and looked after with fair justice. Early and adequate action must be taken by the government, because there can be no prosperity for the Maritimes until the present conditions are corrected.

Will the royal commission appointed to inquire into the Maritime rights be a cure-all? I am afraid it will not! The order in council creating the commission defines its powers as follows: To make "an examination from a national standpoint of all the factors which affect the economic position of the inhabitants of the provinces in question" and "upon the result of such inquiry and examination there should be based specific recommendations which in the opinion of the commissioners would result in affording relief from the conditions complained of." But after all that has been written on this particular question of Maritime rights during the last two or three years, the government should be very familiar, if they are really in earnest to give help, with every aspect of the questions raised which have been fully debated in the press of the whole country. It seems to me, under present circumstances, that the action of the government in apointing a royal commission to look into Maritime rights was taken to gain time, and to evade the responsibility of deciding the course to be taken. All the matters coming under the investigating powers of the commission have been discussed time and again all over the country, in all their phases and bearings, and still no solution has been arrived at. Will the commission be in a better position than the government, with all the material they have in hand, to decide what course should be taken? I should say not! I am afraid that all this show is simply, once more, to pass away time and drag along the final settlement of this important question of Maritime rights.

The axis of political influence is decentered. With the new state of things, the older provinces, who are responsible for the building of the new provinces, have lost their control of the government. It is now from the west that comes the influencing hand. Since the election of the hon. the Prime Minister in Prince Albert, and the appointment of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Dunning) as Minister of Railways and Canals, an altogether new direction has been given to Canadian politics by the government, which still claim that they maintain the Liberal principles, while actually they only sacrifice the interests of the country at large to snap the support of the Progressives.

Conclusive evidence is at hand that the present government is led by Progressive intrigues. Numerous proofs of it have been given since the opening of the present session. But it is not my intention to go into these details. I simply wished to mention them so that my name shall be on record on this question.

As one of the members from the Maritime provinces, and especially representing Restigouche-Madawaska, it is my duty to endorse all the legitimate claims made in favour of the eastern provinces and, further, to plead for my constituency. Public works were promised to the late member, Mr. Michaud, which have never been carried on. The county I represent deserves a little more rocognition and protection from the government. Promises were also made, I understand, to the late member that dredging would be done at Campbellton for harbour improvements. A dredge was to be sent to Campbellton last summer to commence the necessary dredging, but the people are still waiting for it. I do hope these promises will be fulfilled this coming summer. It is a case in point showing the way the present government fails to carry out its promises.

I need not stress further the claims of the Maritimes, and especially of Restigouche-Madawaska. Better informed speakers than myself have covered the ground fully and forcefully. I simply wished to express my views on the budget as submitted, so that the stand I shall take when the vote comes will be made clear.

On motion of Mr. MacLean (Prince) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Motherwell the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Monday, May 17, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 111, to incorporate the Executive Council of the Free Methodist Church in Canada.—Mr. Ross (Kingston).

ROUYN RAILWAY BILL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I notice in Hansard of Friday, that while I was absent, an inquiry was made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) regarding papers relating to the Rouyn railway. I find that in the course of a day or two all the papers will be brought down on an order for return secured by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. O'Neill).

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): This is a matter of great importance to the House and everything has already been made public through the Privy Council. It is now weeks since the contract with Quebec was entered into and I can see no reason why it should not be now tabled. There can be no excuse.

Mr. DUNNING: I expect to table it in the course of a day or two.

PROPOSED NEW LINE TO PACIFIC

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): On Friday last there was also an inquiry by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Foster) with respect to a proposed new line to the Pacific coast. The department has no information with regard to it.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GOVERNMENT ELEVATORS

Mr. MANION:

1. Are negotiations in progress for the renting of the newly built government elevator at Prince Rupert to the wheat pool?

2. If so, on what terms?

3. Has any grain yet passed through the Prince Rupert elevator?

4. Have the government owned harbour board elevators at Vancouver been working to capacity in the past year?

5. How many bushels of grain passed through these elevators in 1925?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The negotiations have been concluded.

2. Pursuant to an order in council of the 29th of April, 1926, the lease of the Prince Rupert elevator to the Alberta Co-operative Wheat Producers, of Calgary, was approved. The lease runs for a period of two years, from the 1st of August, 1926, for a nominal rental of $100 per annum, the Alberta Co-operative Wheat Producers Limited bearing all expenses in connection with the operation of the elevator, the said elevator to be operated in accordance with the provisions of the Canada Grain Act and the rules and regulations passed by the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada.

3. No.

4. No.

5. Receipts, 19,148,932 bushels; shipments, 19,587,936 bushels.

AIR SERVICE

Mr. FAFARD:

1. What amount of money was spent by the Air Service in 1922-23-24-25?

2. What amount was spent in each province in the said years 1922-23-24-25?

3. What amount does the Air Service propose to spend in each province this year?

4. Is it the intention of the government to have the Air Service under the control of the Interior department?

BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

Mr. COOTE:

What were the total receipts and expenditures of the Board of Grain Commissioners for each of the past five years?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

Year	Receipts	Expenditures
1921-22	$1,937,323 03	$1,237,531 18
1922-23	2,364,037 48	1,460,511 69
1923-24	2,319,971 02	1,559,138 37
1924-25	2,322,765 79	1,470,145 56
1925-26	2,685,293 59	1,613,003 59
	$11,629,390 94	$7,340,330 39

The receipts for 1925-26 may be increased, as the books for the reception of refunds are not closed until about the 20th May.

STATISTICAL BRANCH

Mr. DOUCET:

1. What is the total number of employees in the Statistical branch?
2. What is the total amount of their salaries?
3. What is the cost of printing and publishing the various statistical reports?
4. What is the total revenue of the department on the sale of these publications, and what other source of revenue exists?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

The total number of employees in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics was:

1. On April 30, 1926, 224.
2. For month of April, 1926, $25,533.
3. Fiscal year 1925-26, $99,217.
4. None. All revenue from the sale of government publications is received by the Department of Printing and Stationery. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics have no other source of revenue.

IMPORTATIONS OF SILK

Mr. DOUCET:

What quantities of velvet, velveteen, silk and plush velvets of not over 24 inches in width, and silk fabrics of not over 26 inches in width, have been imported into Canada: (a) from all countries, (b) from France, Italy and from each of the countries which benefit under the clause "the most favoured nations," for the fiscal years 1923-24, 1924-25, 1925-26, respectively?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

No statistics are compiled showing importations of silks according to various widths.

BATTLEFORD GOVERNMENT LAND

Mr. DAVIS:

1. Has the land formerly occupied by the Royal Canadian Northwest Mounted Police at Battleford, Saskatchewan, been leased since the removal of the police?
2. If so, when, to whom, and at what rental?

3. Were tenders asked for or advertised for, and where?

4. What were the names of the tenderers and the rental offered in each case?

5. Has rental been paid for the use of this land, and if so, what amount?

Hon Mr. STEWART:

1. Yes, pasture has been leased.

2. Lease dates from 1st July, 1925, when R.C.M.P. vacated pasture, to Bernard Phillips, $220 annual rental.

3. Yes. By advertisements and posters under the direction of the agent of Dominion lands at Prince Albert.

4. Bernard Phillips; H. Barclay Bragg. Annual rental of $220 and $125 respectively.

5. Yes. $220.

Mr. DAVIS:

1. Has the hay land connected with the property of the Indian department at Battleford been leased since the industrial school was closed?

2. If so, to whom was it leased, and under what conditions?

3. Have these conditions been complied with?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

It is presumed that the above question relates to the Indian industrial school lands situated in South Battleford, Saskatchewan.

1. Yes, most of the lands.

2. (a) The Saskatchewan Conference Association of Seventh Day Adventists. (b) For a term of fifteen years at a nominal rental of one cent per acre on the condition that the said association repairs and maintains the buildings to the satisfaction of the department.

3. Yes.

MR. J. C. BLANCHET

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Was Mr. J. C. Blanchet, of Chartierville, county of Compton, Quebec, appointed to any branch of the Customs department?

2. If so, at what date, on whose recommendation, and what salary?

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN:

1. Yes.

2. April 22, 1926, Civil Service Commission, $600 per annum. Reports from the collector and inspector concerning his qualifications for the position have now been received and the advisability of accepting the appointment is being further investigated.

DALHOUSIE PREVENTIVE SERVICE

Mr. CULLIGAN:

1. Was J. Edwin Cook of River Charlo, New Brunswick, a returned soldier, appointed by the Civil Service Commission to the position, special customs, grade 1, in the preventive service with headquarters at Dalhousie, New Brunswick, in the year 1925?

2. Was the said J. Edwin Cook ever ordered to report for duty? If not, why not?

3. Is it a fact that another person, A. Wallace of Dalhousie, New Brunswick, was subsequently appointed to this position? If so, on whose recommendation?

4. Is it a fact that the choice of the Civil Service Commission was rejected? If so, why?

5. If Wallace was appointed to the position, on whose recommendation was appointment made?

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN:

1. J. Edwin Cook of River Charlo, New Brunswick, was assigned by the Civil Service Commission to the position of special customs officer, grade 1, at Dalhousie, N.B.

2. No. Mr. Cook was not a resident of Dalhousie, N.B.

3. Yes. Mr. A. G. Wallace, the second candidate on the list, being a resident of Dalhousie was subsequently appointed.

4. Answered by No. 1.

5. Answered by No. 3.

STRIKE IN GREAT BRITAIN—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN WHEAT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What steps are being taken by the government to safeguard Canadian wheat in view of the general British strike now continuing?

2. As a matter of emergency has arisen will the government provide some measure of protection to our wheat by either financing it or affording some sort of guarantee as to prices?

3. Has the government communicated with the banks, or the Canadian Bankers' Association, to come to the help of the grain dealers if the strike continues indefinitely, so that the farmers who grow wheat will not suffer?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think this question might be dropped. It relates to a strike that is happily ended.

Question dropped.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MONTREAL STREET RAILWAY PURCHASE

Mr. FOSTER:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways purchased the electric line running from about Moreau street to Bout de L'île, from the Montreal Tramway Company or one of its affiliated companies?

2. If so, for what purpose and for what price?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. Yes.

2. General railway purposes. The management considers it not in the public interest to publish price.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NOTE ISSUE

Mr. FOSTER:

1. Is it a fact that R. W. Pressprich and Company of New York are to-day offering $2,500,000—4 per cent notes due July, 1927, of the Canadian National Railways, guaranteed both as to principal and interest by the government of Canada?

2. If so, why should this offering not be handled through a Canadian institution?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

The management of Canadian National Railways has no information as to what securities R. W. Pressprich and Company are offering, but assume that the notes referred to are part of an issue of 20 million dollars of 4 per cent notes made and sold by the Canadian National Railways on July 1, 1924. If R. W. Pressprich and Company bought a block of these securities and are now offering them for sale the Canadian National Railways have no connection with the transaction.

MASSEY-HARRIS COMPANY

Mr. FOSTER:

1. Has the Massey-Harris Company, Limited, of Toronto, been granted supplementary letters patent, confirming a new by-law No. 00 recently adopted by the directors of the company?

[Mr. Davis.]

2. If so, is the government aware that the powers given under the said supplementary letters patent are very detrimental to the small shareholders?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Supplementary letters patent dated the 1st of March, 1926, were granted to the Massey-Harris Company, Limited, for the purpose of converting the 250,000 shares of the capital stock of the company of the par value of $100 each into 125,000 cumulative preference shares of the par value of $100 each, and 125,000 common shares of the par value of $100 each. The supplementary letters patent in question were issued under section 34 of the Companies Act, and were based on a resolution of the shareholders of the company passed at a meeting held on the 13th of February, 1926.

2. No objection to the issue of the said letters patent was made by any shareholder of the Massey-Harris Company, Limited. The material on file shows that the resolution was sanctioned by more than two-thirds of the votes of the shareholders in person or by proxy cast at a special general meeting of the company duly called for considering the same. There is no information on the files of the department indicating the effect, detrimental or otherwise, to the small shareholders of the company.

ALBERTA HOMESTEADS

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River):

1. What number of entries were made in the province of Alberta under the Dominion Lands Act during the period 1908 to March 31st, 1926, (a) pre-emptions, and (b) purchased homesteads?

2. What was the area of (a) pre-emptions and (b) purchased homesteads?

3. What was the gross revenue received from (a) pre-emptions and (b) purchased homesteads?

4. What amount of arrears is due on (a) principal and (b) interest?

Hon. Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

1. (a) 12,449; (b) 1,919.

2. (a) 1,991,840 acres approximately; (b) 307,040 acres approximately.

3. (a) $5,432,681.98; (b) $1,027,431.63.

4. (a) Principal $1,439,821.55 approximately; interest $752,760.16 approximately; (b) principal $54,166.04 approximately; interest $25,833.75 approximately.

LEEDS VILLAGE—LYSTER MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. DOUCET:

1. Who has the contract for rural mail delivery between Leeds village and Lyster, in the county of Megantic, Quebec?

2. When was the contract last renewed?

3. Were any tenders asked for?

4. Were any complaints lodged with the department against the said contractor?

5. If so, what were the nature of said complaints?

6. What steps has the department taken in the matter?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. There is no contract for the performance of a rural mail delivery service between the points mentioned, but there is a contract for the carrying of mails between Leeds village post office and Lyster station post office—the contractor being Joseph Roy.
2. 31st March, 1926.
3. No.
4. No.
5 and 6.—See answer to No. 4.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

MILITIA TRAINING CAMPS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Are any June or other training camps being held for the militia: (a) city units; (b) country and rural units; (c) permanent force?
2. If so, where, for what units, length of time, and how many officers and men?
3. What will be done this year for artillery units as to training?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SPECIAL CUSTOMS PREVENTIVE OFFICER—DALHOUSIE, N.B.

Mr. CULLIGAN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Civil Service Commission, the Department of Customs and Excise, and any other department or official thereof, relating to the appointment of a special preventive officer for the Department of Customs and Excise at Dalhousie, New Brunswick, in the year 1925 and since.

SCREENINGS

Hon. Mr. ROGERS:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters, telegrams and other documents relative to the purchase of screenings during the years 1917 to 1921, inclusive, along with a statement showing the firms from which the said screenings were purchased, the amount from each firm, the price paid, to whom sold, the amount to each firm and the price in each case.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Friday, May 14, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): When I moved the adjournment of the debate on Friday night, I did so in the hope that my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) rather than myself would speak to-day, and I feel that the House would prefer to hear that hon. gentleman. I sincerely trust, however, that at some future time we may have the pleasure of hearing him. Now, inasmuch as only one side of the case has been presented from the province in which I have the honour to represent a constituency, and lest the people of that province in common with the members of this House should think that the representatives of Prince Edward Island are all of one opinion in regard to the budget which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has brought down on this occasion, I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I present the views of those people as I understand them. Before I proceed to discuss the budget, however, I beg to be allowed to welcome back to the House the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who unfortunately has been absent through illness. I am sure that all sides, irrespective of party, are glad to see him once more in the House. I think I may also say on behalf of hon. members on this side that we shall all be only too pleased to welcome back, when he returns, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) who, I understand, has been slightly indisposed for the past few days. I for one admire our public men, whatever party they may represent. I have admiration for the leader of the opposition and respect for his followers, not only those who occupy the front benches but the members of that party generally. Naturally, too, I admire the members of my own party, and before I resume my seat I shall probably have something further to say on that point.

As it is always a pleasure for one to be able to bring good news, I think the position in which the Minister of Finance found himself on April 15, when he was able to present to the House the budget now under consideration, must have been very gratifying indeed. Not only must it have been a matter for congratulation on the part of the minister himself, but it must have afforded the people of this Dominion from coast to coast an unusual degree of satisfaction to have such a budget brought down in this parliament. Our friends opposite tried, of course, as one would naturally expect an opposition to do, to criticize the budget adversely but I think the House will agree with me when I say that this criticism has not been characterized by any note of seriousness. The tidings which the Minister of Finance was able to broadcast to the people of Canada a month ago were of such a character that they must have been received with enthusiasm by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. When for some fancied reason people fear that some dreadful pall is hanging over them, that some dire calamity is about to befall them, it is doubly gratifying to them to find that after all their fears were unfounded, that the storm that threatened has passed, and that the sun will shine with increasing brightness, dispelling the gloom.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, though perhaps unintentionally, have painted a gloomy picture to the people of Canada. They have tried to tell the people, or at least some of the people, that if this dreadful alliance between Progressives and Grits continued the country would certainly be ruined. Those hon. gentlemen must have been greatly disappointed when the Minister of Finance was able to show that the Dominion had been able not only to meet all obligations but to report a surplus of over $20,000,000, besides reducing the income tax and in other ways lightening the burden of the people. In view of this satisfactory condition of affairs, my task to-day is a comparatively easy one. I do not think it requires any special pleading to convince a man that it is easier for him to pay $30 instead of $100 in income tax, nor is it difficult to prove to him that he can much more readily afford an automobile which costs to-day $150 less than it did previously. I do not think, either, that it calls for any special pleading to convince the people of this country that the return to the two-cent postage rate will benefit them at the same time increasing the revenues of the country as we hope it will. Contrary to the views expressed by some of our friends across the way, I firmly believe we shall see an increase in the sales of automobiles, an increase in our postage revenue, and if not an increase at least a very slight falling off in our income tax revenue. Taking the revenue as a whole, I hope the next budget statement will show that the various reductions announced by the Minister of Finance this session have not materially affected it.

My good friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) has moved an amendment to the budget. However its real intent may be camouflaged, I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, most emphatically to the fact that the hon. gentleman's amendment constitutes a direct vote against the budget in every particular. It is a direct vote against the reduction in the income tax; it is a direct vote against the reduction in the automobile duty; it is a direct vote against the return to penny postage; it is a direct vote against the wiping out of the receipt tax—in fact it is, I repeat, a direct vote against the budget as a whole. I do not think I need labour that point any further. Our friends opposite camouflage their opposition to the reduction in the automobile duties by saying: Leave that to the tariff board. I venture the assertion, Mr. Speaker, that if the tariff board has recommended such a reduction, our friends across the way would immediately have condemned the tariff board and declared: This is something that the government should handle themselves and not leave to the tariff or any other board. In a word, they would have found some excuse for voting against the budget.

Although these hon. gentlemen have to a certain extent opposed the legislation that has been brought down, such as the bill for the revaluation of soldier settlers' land, the old age pensions bill and the rural credits bill, I am certain that they will not have the courage to vote against the final passage of any of these measures. I think I am safe in saying that they will sit absolutely quiet and swallow every bit of legislation when it comes up for third reading.

Mr. MANION: May I ask my hon. friend who on this side of the House ever opposed the revaluation of soldier settlers' land?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): My hon. friend will remember that there was a great deal of criticism of this measure from his quarter of the House.

Mr. MANION: There was criticism as to method, but there was no opposition to the principle. My hon. friend is hedging now, that is all.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I feel sure that in the course of a few days when the measures I have referred to come up for final disposition my prediction as to what will happen will be fully borne out.

Now, a great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about the pledges that they allege the Liberal government have broken during the past four years. We have been told that every pledge made to the people in 1921 has since been broken by the government. I take very strong exception to this allegation. In the 1921 election the big question before the electorate was: Will we be able to make revenue and expenditure meet? The Liberals said: Give us a chance and we will do it. They have accomplished this, as I shall show in a few minutes. They also promised to reduce the tariff on the implements of production. I submit, Sir, that this pledge has been fully redeemed. I remember quite well in the first two sessions of the last parliament hon. gentlemen opposite day after day taunted the government wtih having succeeded to office on the strength of these pledges: To reduce the tariff, and to make revenue and expenditure meet. We were told that the government had accomplished nothing towards the redemption of these pledges, that they were standing still, in fact they were afraid to make a move to implement those promises. Immediately the tariff reductions were made our friends opposite changed their tune and declared that we had ruined every factory throughout the Dominion. I state most emphatically, Mr. Speaker, that the pledges made to the people in 1921 by the Liberal party have since been fulfilled by this government. We have made revenue and expenditure meet, we have reduced the tariff on implements of productoin, and also the duties on certain commodities. The ruin that our friends opposite predicted would follow reduction of the protection enjoyed by the manufacturers of agricultural implements did not follow; on the contrary, instead of driving our implement manufacturers out of business, their financial statements disclose that they have been making more money than they ever made under the former tariff. Our friends of the opposition are not now charging this government with doing nothing, they are not charging us with breaking our pledges, except in one particular. They claim that the Prime Minister pledged himself at the opening of parliament not to interfere with the tariff. Well, Sir, I do not think that the Speech from the Throne can be fairly construed as constituting such a pledge, nor do I agree that either the government or the Liberal party were in any way committed to the course suggested by our friends opposite.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish for a few minutes to deal with the financial condition of the country in an endeavour to prove to the House and to the people that we have met our pledges with respect to making revenue and expenditure meet. In this connection I propose to put a few figures on Hansard The gross national debt reached its peak in 1921. The public records show a reduction in 1925 of $84,000,000. The net national debt reached its peak in 1923. The public recards show a reduction of $4,698,116 for 1925, and a further reduction of $22,353,000 by this budget. In other words, there has been a reduction in the net debt of over $27,000,000. These figures are from the public records and can be verified by any hon. gentleman. They wil be found at page 46 of the Public Accounts. Sir, we have more than met that pledge to make the national revenues and expenditures balance, we have placed on the right side of the ledger a substantial surplus in reduction of the national debt.

But let me go a little further. Since confederation we have had only eleven surpluses totalling $101,000,000; of these this government has to its credit a total of $58,692,182, made up of three surpluses as follows: 1924, $35,993,593; 1925, $345,589; 1926, $22,353,000. This government has been able to show a surplus greater by $15,602,277 than the surpluses shown by all governments from confederation to the present day. That is a record of which we on this side of the House should be extremely proud. We have been twitted by hon. members opposite since 1921 with our supposed inability to make revenues and expenditures meet, but these records prove the contrary. I do not think we need more substantial evidence of the progress made by this government in meeting its obligations and keeping its promises in this regard.

It has been stated that a large portion of our expenditure is uncontrollable, and I think that is perfectly true. It is very hard under present conditions for any government to show a substantial reduction in yearly expenditures. We have such large amounts as our provincial subsidies, aggregating over $12,000,000; interest on war debt amounting to $167,000,000; interest on debts other than war debt of over $12,000,000; pensions of over $36,000,0000 and superannuations of over $1,600,000. These are fixed charges which no government can escape; so long as Canada is a self-governing country these obligations must be met yearly, and it is impossible to make any substantial reductions in these amounts. I could make further reference to these matters but I think it is not necessary, because I feel sure the people in general are quite aware that this government has made revenue and expenditure meet. Not only that, but it is substantially reducing the debt, and everyone knows that Canada has turned the corner so far as her financial obligations are concerned.

The hon. member for Fort William in his speech the other day attributed a great deal to Providence; he said that Providence had been kind to this government and that by the assistance of Providence they were able to show a surplus. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, I must say that Providence was very unkind to the last administration, because never in the history of the Dominion has such a continuation of deficits been rolled up as was done by the late government. I therefore think I am safe in saying that, if the surplus shown by this government is attributable to a kind Providence, that Providence was certainlv unkind to hon. members opposite when they were in office. On the other hand the hon. member said that Providence was kind to drunken men, and often took care of those in an intoxicated condition when they were not able to take care of themselves, alluding to the present government. If that be so it would have been much better for this country if our friends opposite had become intoxicated in 1911 and remained in that condition until 1921. Our finances would have been in much better shape, because the situation was certainly serious when this government came into power and there has been nothing but improvement since then. When this government came into power in 1921 the estimates for the coming year were prepared and, I understand, were largely in excess of the revenue expected. So, if our friends had been returned to power, we would have had a continuation of those deficits which were rolled up in previous years. When hon. members opposite undertake to criticize this government on their financial showing, they do it with very poor justification.

The hon. member went further in speaking of the manufacturers, and said that he for one would be willing to pay his share of any increases in price necessary to keep the manufacturers in business. I suppose the manufacturers will have no objection to accepting money from hon. gentlemen across the way, but I venture to assert that these hon. members and the supporters of the Conservative party throughout the country will be just as willing to accept the benefits accruing from these reductions as will members and supporters of this party. If the hon. member for Fort William wished to contribute something to keep the manufacturers in business I suppose his contribution would be received, but I do not think he was serious in that suggestion.

The hon. member went still further, and said that this country had been treated by the United States as a customer who, having gone in to deal with a storekeeper, had been kicked out of the store. I take exception to that statement; the United States has not treated us in that way. I wish to point out to hon. members who may not fully understand the situation that we in the Maritime provinces are almost wholly dependent upon the United States for a market, and this statement applies especially to the people of Prince Edward Island. We are an agricultural province; we have no industries of any kind, and if this budget works an injury to some other provinces, I certainly do not see that it can possibly be injurious to Prince Edward Island. I do not understand how hon. members opposite representing that province can vote for the amendment, thereby voting against a reduction in the income tax; a reduction in the duty on automobiles; a reduction in postage; against the wiping out of the stamp tax on cheques and, in fact, against every other item contained in this budget. I do not see how they can do that and square themselves with the people of their province. That is none of my business, however, and I leave it to the hon. gentlemen and their own electors. They are able men, well qualified to judge the situation; they are fair men, and I give them credit for carrying out their convictions as they understand them. So far as I am concerned, I believe that this budget in every particular is beneficial to the people of the province of Prince Edward Island.

[Mr. A. E. MacLean.]

It was stated, and stated very emphatically, during the last election campaign, that this government was driving business out of the country, that it was ruining the industrial life of this country. I have a few figures here which I do not think bear out that statement. They show the prices at which the stocks of our leading banks sold in 1921 and 1925, as follows:

	Price 1921	Price 1925
Canadian Bank of Commerce	$184	$213
Dominion Bank	192	205
Imperial Bank	180	159
Bank of Montreal	205	259
Bank of Nova Scotia	251	275
Royal Bank of Canada	196	238

That does not look as if this government was driving the banks out of business at any rate. It does not look as if this government was hurting industry in this country. I have a few more figures here regarding the industrial situation, showing the prices realized for industrial bonds in 1921 and in 1925, as follows:

	Price 1921	Price 1925
Canada Cement	$54 00	$106 00
Hollinger Mines	7 35	14 95
Dominion Canners	27 00	134 00
Canadian Salt	62 00	152 00
City Dairy	76 00	88 00
Dominion Glass	55 00	107 00
Canadian Cottons	72 00	119 00
Steel Company of Canada	55 00	91 00
Dominion Bridge	69 00	101 00
Sherwin-Williams	90 00	125 00
Ontario Steel Products	53 00	68 00
Asbestos	44 00	89 00
Penman's Limited	95 00	159 00
Spanish River	54 00	100 00
Laurentide Paper	71 00	80 00
Tuckett's	40 00	65 00
Provincial Paper	94 00	101 00

Even the most sanguine broker could not hope for a better showing than those figures indicate in the prices of industrial securities. In a great many cases the prices have doubled and trebled as compared with 1921. So as far as the financial situation of our country is concerned, I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite, by any special pleading, can prove to this country that any of our industries have been seriously affected, let alone driven out of business.

Coming to the tariff, I wish first to point out that the difference between the position of the farmer and the position of the manufacturer is very marked indeed; so much so, that there is really no comparison at all. The manufacturer, under protection, can set his own price. He can take the cost of production, add to that the cost of distribution, add insurance, add all taxes on his business, federal, provincial and municipal, including the sales tax, add the duty on the imported article, and to all these he can add a good substantial margin of profit, and then go out and sell his product in a protected market. The farmer, on the other hand, has to sell his product in open competition with the world. There is the comparison between the two, and when our friends across the way talk of protecting the farmer I think they are endeavouring, to say the least, to camouflage the situation. They are endeavouring to pave the way to lining up the farmers of this country in support of a high protective tariff all round, but I think I shall be able to show as I proceed that protection can be of very little use to the farmer when he has a large surplus to export.

Our friends from the Maritime provinces, a great many of them, have been elected on the question of Maritime rights. The provincial papers at that time said that these men were neither Liberal nor Conservative, but that they were supported by a large number of the independent people of the Maritime provinces as Maritime righters, and that they were going to be independent in their viewpoint. But I notice that our friends across the way from the province of Nova Scotia, since coming to this House, have not been very independent in their viewpoint. Whatever their attitude may be in the future, they have up to the present been very strong supporters of the Conservative party, and they have strongly advocated the principle of protection. That, of course, is their own affair. If the principle of protection is satisfactory to the people of Nova Scotia, if protection is essential to that province, our friends are no doubt doing right in supporting that principle, but representing as I do a constituency in the Maritimes which is altogether an agricultural and a fishing constituency, I cannot see how a high protective tariff can be of either direct or indirect benefit to that province or to my own constituency in particular. I do not wish to be considered an extremist in my tariff views. We realize in the province of Prince Edward Island that if we had free trade with the rest of the world, it would be of advantage to our little province in particular, but none of us has ever advocated that. We are big enough and broad-minded enough, I trust, to be willing to contribute our share of any protection that is needed for any legitimate industry in this country, and I think the people of that province, both Liberal and Conservative, will continue to maintain that attitude and be willing to pay their share to see that no industry shall suffer unduly from too radical reductions in the tariff. But we feel very strongly on this point: Where any industry is receiving a degree of protection which is out of all proportion to that which it should receive, our people are very, very strong in the contention that that protection should be brought down to a reasonable point which would allow the people of our province to import, if they wished to, these products at a reasonable figure, thereby contributing to the revenues of this country a certain proportion for the upkeep of the government, rather than allowing the whole amount of the protection to be turned into the coffers of the manufacturers. That is the attitude, I believe, of the people of the province of Prince Edward Island.

So far as the automobile industry is concerned, that is only one of the many which we thought was possibly receiving too high a protection, and that a reduction could be made. I have an article here on Maritime rights which appeared in the Canadian Annual Review this year. It was written by W. C. Milner, B.Sc., LL.D., and I should like to put an extract from it on Hansard. The author gives his view of the situation. I am not saying that I accept that view; I simply give it for what it is worth. The writer says that one-half or more of the people of the Maritimes are engaged in agriculture. For lack of markets this industry has practically made no progress in ten or even twenty years.

He goes on to state that there cannot be successful competition against the farmers of Ontario and Quebec in the Toronto and Montreal markets. I wish to emphasize that as a fact which we realize in the province of Prince Edward Island. We cannot compete with the farmers of Ontario and Quebec in their own markets, and it is absolutely impossible ever to think of doing so. The writer goes on to say that the list of articles produced in the Maritime provinces for which there is a demand in the central provinces is exceedingly small. Efforts have been made to extend west the demand for fresh as well as for cured fish, but that demand has been exceedingly limited and the movement has virtually failed. Nova Scotia apples are in request, but on the other hand, the British Columbia product is retailed in nearly all the grocery stores of the Maritime provinces. New Brunswick ships certain commodities west, and Prince Edward Island has of late years developed a large egg trade with Montreal. The writer further states that there is a wide demand for the silver fox pelts of Prince Edward Island. He says that the coal industry has been regarded of late as the obstruction that hindered the progress of the Maritime provinces. He remarks that the coal areas are owned and operated by Montreal capitalists who, being human, work for their own profit while their expenditures are necessarily enormous. The local consumer complains that the price has advanced from $3.50 per ton delivered at Halifax twenty years ago to $12 a ton at the end of 1924. The expenses of every household have been raised as a result and the increase has added materially to the cost of living. A reliable mining man has furnished the following statement:

> The contention is made in the press that no increase in wages or cost of material warrants the advance, and demands are made for an investigation that will go to the root of the matter and ascertain the cost of mining and profits. If it costs the people $12 per ton to mine and deliver their own coal it is argued it would be more profitable to take off the duty, import cheaper American coal, and close our mines entirely. In other words the coal mines ought not to be a burden on the other industries of the country.

This writer has no doubt given considerable study to the matter. As I say, I am not endorsing his views, I am simply giving them as coming from a gentleman who has made a study of the subject.

4 p.m.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Will the hon. gentleman name one mine in the province where the cost of coal is $12 at the pit mouth?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): In this case the price is given as $12 a ton delivered.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: You said it was the price at the pit's mouth.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): No, I did not say that. I said the price was $12 a ton delivered.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Where?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): At Halifax. If there is anything in the contention advanced it would be worth while to have the subject looked into carefully in order to find the best possible remedy. Personally I would not for one moment advocate closing the mines in Nova Scotia; that is the last thing I would want to see done. May I repeat that we in our province are willing to contribute our share towards the maintenance of the industry, and if further protection is needed the subject should be given very careful consideration.

As I have already explained the exports from Prince Edward Island are largely of an agricultural character. These are supplemented by the harvest of the sea which includes all kinds of fish. But we cannot ship these commodities to central Canada, it is simply nonsense for us to talk about it. On Friday night the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Charters) gave a statement showing the percentages of certain farm products that are used in the Canadian home market. Let me say that the province of Prince Edward Island has no home market to consume its agricultural products. As regards the province of Nova Scotia, outside of a few carloads that are shipped from Prince Edward Island, the farmers of that province supply their own home market. Therefore Prince Edward Island is forced to sell its products in the world's markets in competition with the world at large. The potato trade of Prince Edward Island last year amounted to millions of dollars, but our producers are forced to ship those potatoes to the United States in the face of a duty of fifty cents per hundred pounds. In a poor year and with low prices that duty is paid by the Prince Edward Island farmers; there is no doubt in the world about that. This year happened to be an exceedingly good year for them, and our producers were able to make a profit. The year before the growers made no profit. What we need in Prince Edward Island is larger markets. May I suggest that one of the duties of the new Tariff Advisory Board should be to get in touch with the tariff commission of the United States in order to see if some arrangement could not be worked out whereby there could be an exchange of products between that country and Canada on a more equitable basis. I believe there is a big field for the tariff board in that direction. I do not think the people of the United States are so unreasonable as to refuse to give serious consideration to a proposal for a reduction in the duty when it can be demonstrated that it would be as much to their advantage as it would be to ours. The United States certainly needs our seed potatoes because over there, as a result of growing potatoes uninterruptedly for a number of years, the tuber is attacked by certain diseases before coming to maturity. To such an extent have these diseases impaired the quality of the American potato that it cannot be used for seed purposes. The result is that nearly every year the United States is forced to come to Canada for a supply, and the seed potatoes of Prince Edward Island, being free from disease, are greatly in demand. These seed potatoes are put up in the most careful way and are closely inspected and certified to before being shipped. I believe that if the facts were made known in the right quarter we might look for a reasonable adjustment of the tariff. In my opinion the Tariff Advisory Board could take the question up with a likelihood that results of the most advantageous character would follow in the case of both countries.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken during this debate on the desirability of increasing the raising of sheep and lambs in the interests of the farmer as well as of the wool industry. Many lambs and sheep are raised in Prince Edward Island and shipped to the United States notwithstanding the duty of $2 per head. This duty constitutes a very heavy handicap when it comes to shipping sheep or lambs, but the United States still is our best market.

The same thing is true all along the line. We have a large number of cheese factories in that province which are modern up-to-date establishments and our cheese grades as high as any on the market. It is shipped to Montreal and Great Britain where we receive full price for it so that we have no complaint against any other part of the country in that regard. A high duty on cheese coming into Canada would not affect the price fixed by the British market.

We have a fresh fish trade, a poultry trade and an egg trade and I will deal with the question of eggs later. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) could deal with the export of fresh fish much better than I could, but in case he overlooks it I may say that our exports of fresh fish in 1925 to all countries of the world amounted to $9,736,925 of which our exports to the United States amounted to $9,305,782. In other words in 1925 all but $431,000 worth of our total exports of fresh fish went to the United States.

We have an important lobster trade in Prince Edward Island and a large quantity of canned lobster goes to Great Britain and other European countries as well as to the United States. But we have also a large live lobster trade with the States. We have also a considerable trade in fresh mackerel, halibut, cod and smelts. Smelts are allowed to enter the United States free of duty. The other day the hon. member for Fort William said that the United States kicked us out of their market, but this is one article alone that brings in a very large revenue to the fishermen of Prince Edward Island and the other Maritime provinces and the United States has not kicked us out with respect to it. There is a duty of two cents on mackerel, two cents on halibut and one cent on codfish entering the United States. Our hon. friends opposite would like to start a tariff war with the United States but that would be one of the worst calamities that could happen to the Maritime provinces and especially to Prince Edward Island. The moment you begin a tariff war with the United States and get into operation, this "brick for brick" policy which our hon. friends opposite have been talking about, you shut the people of the Maritime provinces out of the only market they have in the world for their products. We are compelled to sell to the United States; we cannot reach any other market, and I for one do not wish to see any tariff war begun with the United States in connection with any of these articles. I do not think I need labour these points further.

I have in my hand a clipping which I think is of interest, if not to this House, to the province which I represent. Shortly before the opening of the present session of the legislature of Prince Edward Island the government of that province sent a representative to the British West Indies to look into trade conditions there. This was a mission similar to that undertaken last year by the former member for Cumberland, Mr. Hance Logan. Mr. Harvey McEwen, who is a member of the executive of the Conservative government of Prince Edward Island and a very strong supporter of the Conservative party, spent some time viewing trade conditions in the West Indies in the hope of benefiting trade between Prince Edward Island and the West Indies. Speaking in the local legislature on his return, he made this statement after reviewing his experiences in the West Indies:

> Touching on provincial claims, Mr. McEwen said that one of our biggest claims is that we did not benefit by the protective tariff as they have done in other parts of Canada. Neither the Liberal or the Conservative party can adopt a policy that best suits all Canada, that is going to suit the Maritime provinces equally as other parts of the Dominion.
> Transportation does not tell the whole story. The transportation this province wants are lower railway rates to Halifax and St. John, so that we can put our stuff on board the ships at these ports. It is an impossibility to send our produce to Upper Canada. They don't want it, and lower rates on the Canadian National railway, is simply making it easier for them to send their stuff down here. We might save a little on the freight we have to pay on their goods, that is all. In nine years out of ten they have enough for themselves. They don't want our cheese, our butter, our eggs, or fish, etc.

They want the Maritime provinces to hunt up their own markets, while they take the pure gold and spend it there.

He then went on to give a further review of his trip. No Liberal member could express the views of the Liberals of Prince Edward Island better than Mr. McEwen did in the statement I quoted. Those are the facts of the case and I am glad to see our Conservative friends as well as our Liberal friends appreciate the situation. A few minutes ago I referred to the subsidy which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) suggested he might give in ease of freight rates as a compensation to the Maritime provinces. Here we have the statement by one of the right hon. gentleman's own followers that he cannot see how a subsidy to the Canadian National system or any other Canadian railway system would be of any benefit to the shipment of the products of the Maritimes to the central provinces.

I wish to say a few words in regard to the tariff which will always be a live question in this country. I notice that the Montreal Star on October 7, 1925, gave a report of a conference held at Washington of representatives from all countries in the world with regard to interprovincial trade and trade throughout the world in general. At that conference the following resolution was passed:

A resolution calling for abolition or diminution of present customs barriers between nations was adopted at the closing session of the inter-parliamentary union here to-day. The resolution, which was introduced by Adolph Braun of the German delegation, calls for the appointment of subcommittee to draw up a plan. It was passed without opposition.

In that resolution we can see the trend of the nations of the world in regard to the tariff question, and I believe instead of a gradual increase in tariff duties, the time is not far distant when the countries of the world will realize that it is to the benefit of all concerned to have freer trade and will attempt to abolish or to reduce to a certain extent some of those tariffs which at the present time are certainly heavy obstacles in the way of trade. In discussing the reduction in the duty on agricultural implements, hon. gentlemen opposite have been quoting comparative prices of 1921 and 1925 respectively. That, I submit, is absolutely unfair. Everyone knows that there was no reduction in the duty either in 1921 or 1922. The reduction did not take place until 1924 and it was not effective until the beginning of the implement season of 1924. So that the only fair comparison that can be drawn in discussing prices is between the seasons of 1924 and 1925. There is no doubt in the world that prices increased between the years 1921 and 1924 and they might have gone on increasing still had the duty not been reduced; for the manufacturers of agricultural implements will continue to take every advantage of the tariff so long as that privilege remains open to them. And they had that privilege until the year 1924.

I have here a report of an industrial commission appointed by the provincial government of Ontario, a government which nobody will think of accusing of having shown any Liberal tendencies. The members of the commission were asked to investigate all phases of the subject, not confining their attention to agricultural implements but taking into consideration industry generally throughout the province. Their report shows a substantial reduction in the prices of implements between 1924 and 1925. The list is of considerable length, covering every article of use to the farmer. It shows—to mention one or two examples—a reduction of $23 on binders, $23 on corn binders, $21 on double disc harrows, and so forth, right down the column.

Mr. MANION: When were the reductions made on implements?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): They became effective in 1924.

Mr. MANION: They were made in 1923.

Mr. ROBB: No, 1924.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): This list of reductions is illuminating, and is all the more valuable in view of the source from which it comes. It has not been prepared either by the manufacturers themselves or by any Liberal newspaper or Liberal interests; it comes from the government of the province of Ontario as a part of the findings of an independent commission appointed by that government to look into the question in all its ramifications. I repeat, when hon. gentlemen compare prices as they were in 1921 with prices in 1925 they are treating the subject altogether unfairly. We know very well that the manufacturers will exact to the last ounce their pound of flesh, and the fact is that they kept increasing their prices so long as they enjoyed protection; but immediately the duty was reduced, prices came down. Now, the same thing will happen in connection with the automobile industry.

With the permission of the House I desire to incorporate this list in Hansard report.

In the last parliament our good friend from Brantford, Mr. Raymond, asked the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) a question which I want to bring to the attention of the House, in this connection. On June 2, 1925, at page 3958 of Hansard, there appears the following:

Mr. Raymond: The hon. member has referred to the industry of Brantford. If he were successful in the coming general election, would he raise the duty on agricultural implements to the figure it was at when he left office?

Mr. Meighen Undoubtedly I would, and I say so unhesitatingly. Will the hon. member support this resolution now? I hope the hon. member will support it.

Mr. Raymond: I cannot say that that will lead me to support it.

That reveals the attitude which our friends opposite took at that time, and had they been returned to power there is no doubt whatever that the country would have had to submit to an increased duty because we have in the passage I have just quoted the undertaking of the leader of the opposition on the question. I am glad to say however that this party is still in power. Hon. gentlemen will have observed that, according to their financial reports of the past year, the manufacturers of agricultural implements were able in spite of the reduction to produce at a profit. Last year was one of the best seasons they have had in their history. And in connection with the automobile industry it is noteworthy that at the present time the reports show that the sales of cars are increasing. In other words, the manufacturers are beginning to adjust themselves to the reduction in the duty and they realize that as a result of that reduction there will be an increase in business inasmuch as the people will be better able to afford cars than they were before.

I do not think it would be difficult to discover the reason for the Conservative party's failure in the last election. Our friends the Manufacturers' Association held a meeting in Montreal some time in the fall of 1924 when they passed resolutions, the general effect of which was that the Conservative party did not succeed in 1921 was that the manufacturers did not realize the full significance of the situation and so did not make any efforts to influence the people to support the Conservative party. The Manufacturers' Association at that time were evidently confident that the Liberal party would not reduce the duties, and therefore they did not take any active part in the campaign. If that is true we can readily see just what the vote of the people will be if they are left to themselves. We know as a matter of history that the country was decidedly Liberal, or at any rate anti-Conservative, in 1921, and in my opinion the explanation is that they were allowed to cast a free and independent vote. In the last election, on the contrary, every effort I believe was made by the Manufacturers' Association throughout the country to help the Conservatives to get back into office in order that the manufacturers might remain safe behind the ramparts of gold which the leader of the opposition at one time condemned.

As regards the duty on automobiles, perhaps I might emphasize its effect by suggesting an analogy. Suppose some corporation came to this House and asked for a charter giving them power to employ as many as 10,000 hands and to tax the people of Canada to the extent of $14,000,000 to pay the wages of those hands, with the additional power to tax the people to the tune of an extra $5,000,000 which the corporation might lay aside for the purpose of paying dividends to their shareholders, nearly all of whom lived abroad. Now how many members on either side of this House would support a proposition of that kind? There is not an hon. member on either side who would vote for it and go back and face his own constituents. Yet that is exactly what our automobile friends are asking this House to do. They are asking for precisely the same power, in a different form, as this hypothetical corporation demanded. I believe that with $20 on every hundred dollars' worth which the automobile manufacturers turn out they ought to be able to take care of themselves. If for every $100 they produce they are given a preference to the extent of $20, that is in my opinion good treatment; while on cars over $1,200, if they have a protection of 27½ per cent, they are undoubtedly enjoying a safe margin to operate on. I do not think our good friends across the way need lose any sleep over the automobile manufacturers. Certainly this budget is not designed to hurt the industry. The very fact that 50 per cent of the car has to be manufactured in Canada should be a splendid help to the employees rather than a hindrance. We all know that our automobile manufacturers have the advantage of the British preference in exporting to the old country and to British possessions under treaties and this budget in effect tells our motor manufacturers: You must give the men employed in your industries more work, you must manufacture 50 per cent of your cars in Canada in order to receive certain drawbacks and also certain export privileges. No hon. gentleman in any part of the House can object to giving more work to the men engaged in our automobile factories and we all know that the manufacture of 50 per cent of the car in Canada means more work for Canadians. I feel sure that when this matter is properly adjusted the results will be entirely satisfactory to those concerned as United States manufacturers cannot get in those preferred markets except through the Canadian channels set forth in this budget. My good friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) has drawn our attention to the fact that Mr. Ford has made an enormous amount of money under the Canadian tariff, all within a comparatively short period. Well, this indicates that there is something absolutely wrong with the protective system, and it seems to me that Mr. Ford might very well be satisfied with a little less profit. But he has always proved that the lower the price of his cars the greater the sales, and it is quite likely that the larger turnover which he is already enjoying as a result of the reduction in the tariff duty will enable him to maintain the rate of dividends that he has hitherto been able to distribute to his shareholders. I think it is clear to all that the automobile industry will be very well able to take care of itself under the budget.

As I have said before, Mr. Speaker, my good friends on the opposite side who represent ridings in the province which I also have the honour to represent have the interest of the island at heart, and I know they are anxious to do their very best on its behalf, even if it entails the sacrifice of political prestige. Therefore I cannot see how they can very well support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fort William, which, I repeat, is a direct vote against the reduction of the income tax, against the reduction of the duty on automobiles, against the reduction in postage, and against the abolition of the receipt tax. Indeed, it is almost a direct vote against the reduction of the national debt.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made that statement two or three times. I should like to point out that my amendment is distinctly a criticism of the government for not making a thorough examination before changing the tariff, and for that alone.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): No doubt my hon. friend and his colleagues are quite willing to camouflage the situation, but however much as they may try to conceal the real intent of the amendment, the statement I have made is absolutely correct. It is a direct vote against every proposal in this budget. If not, the amendment should have been specific as to what parts of the budget the opposition approved and what parts they objected to.

Mr. MANION: Should we not have said that we have confidence in this government!

An hon. MEMBER: Surely.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): My hon. friend might do far worse than that.

Mr. MANION: Impossible!

Mr. ROGERS: We do not really know what the budget proposals are; they have not all been stated yet.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): As the hon. Minister of Finance remarked last week, whatever changes may be made, the budget will continue to be a truly Liberal one and also very popular.

Now, the question of agricultural imports and exports has been gone into pretty fully by a number of hon. members, but as our friends opposite are featuring it very strongly this session I wish to present a few figures to the House. It is only very recently that our friends of the opposition have been shedding tears of sympathy for our farmers. Although they were in power from 1911 to 1921, during all those years we did not hear very much from them about the needs of our farmers. We all remember the Conservative campaign cry of 1911: No truck or trade with the Yankees. Well, soon after our friends came into power we find that the largest importation of eggs in our history took place—not all from the United States possibly, but the volume was tremendous. In 1913 we imported no less than 13,158,538 dozen. In 1914 we imported practically a similar amount. Eggs continued to come into this country in large quantities right down to 1921. All through those years our friends were not shedding crocodile tears over the woes of our farmers, in fact they never moved a hand to prevent this gross injustice, as they now term the importation of eggs and dairy produce. I submit it is rather late in the day for the opposition now to try to make the farmers of Canada believe that they are their friends. As has been pointed out time and again, when we have a surplus of products protection cannot be of any benefit to our producers. Take silver fox furs. In my province it is a large item of business and we used to enjoy a splendid trade with the United States. Then the government of that country put on a duty of 50 per cent and shut us out of the American market completely. Will any of my hon. friends opposite say that our silver fox breeders would have been benefited by a retaliatory duty of 50 per cent on similar furs coming from the United States? The proposal would have been absolutely foolish, for it would not increase the price of silver fox furs in the Dominion by a fraction of a cent. The same argument holds good all along the line. We have a poultry association in the island which last season handled about $400,000 worth of eggs. In their report they state that $26,000 worth of those eggs was shipped into the United States, also a large quantity of dressed and live poultry. A duty on these articles would have no effect and would give no benefit to the Maritime provinces in any conceivable way, so the question of the import and export of agricultural products between the countries of the world is one which I really do not think our farmers will take seriously. I am sure that if the tariff board now constituted believe it to be in the interests of the farmers of Canada to have protection on certain articles, they will not be slow to recommend it, and I think this government would take that recommendation into consideration. No one is more ready to accept such a recommendation than I, and no one is more ready to see the farmers and fishermen of this country receive some benefit, but until I am shown that that benefit will be derived I do not think it wise to start a tariff war with the United States in which we may perhaps lose some of the benefits we already enjoy.

The question of the Hudson Bay railway is too large to go into at the moment. I was opposed to the construction of this railway until a delegation came to Ottawa last session, and until I saw some photographs showing the work from start to finish; I was then convinced that that road should be completed. I believe both parties are committed to it; I notice that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have so expressed themselves, so I do not think it is a party question. The honour of the Dominion is at stake; we should complete this road, for which we are led to believe certain lands were reserved, and some sold, the resulting funds being earmarked for the construction of this railway. If this is the case we should go ahead and complete the ninety-two miles still to be constructed. I must say, however, that as a Maritime man I can never be convinced, that this will be a successful grain-carrying route, or that it can be used for the export of cattle, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) suggests. But if there are minerals, fish, timber, lumber and pulp wood in that country we should complete the road and give those people a chance to transport these products. This will help increase the wealth of our Dominion, and I think it is only justice to the people of the west who have been hoping for this road for so long. The photographs which were shown in this building revealed that a work of great magnitude has been constructed at the bay. When we see a steel bridge a mile long extending from the shore to an island to form part of the harbour; when we see the tremendous equipment, the steel bridges built over every stream and river, the grading all done and everything ready for the rails to link up the work at the bay with the rest of the road, we should not hesitate one moment. Every member of this House should support the proposition, see that the work goes ahead, then wait for further developments as to the feasibility of carrying grain before further expenditures are made. That is my attitude, and if that route can be made feasible no Canadian will oppose the further development of the port, if it is to be a benefit to the country as a whole.

In dealing with the question of the potato trade of Prince Edward Island there is just one little feature I would like to point out. A couple of years ago the railway management decided to close a small station near my home because of the lack of business; the station had fallen below the margin of business required for a booking station. We took up the matter with the management and pleaded with them to let the station remain open for another year to see what would develop. I wish to put on Hansard what the potato trade of that province will do if given a chance, not only for the farmers of the country but for the Canadian National Railways as well. In 1922 the earnings at that station had fallen below $5,000, and the freight moved was only slightly more than 1,000 tons; in 1923 the earnings were $6,700 and the tonnage about the same; in 1924 the earnings had increased to $9,800 and the tonnage to 2,100 tons, while in the year ending April, 1925, the earnings had increased to $23,370. That is what this country, given a chance, will do for the Canadian National Railways and for the farmers of the province, and I ask this House to do everything possible to assist that industry. The farmers and potato growers there are forced to build their own potato warehouses; it is impossible to ship out the tremendous crop in the fall, so frost-proof warehouses must be constructed at a station, and under the present arrangement the Canadian National Railways will not put in a siding to these warehouses unless they receive full payment for such construction. These sidings cost from $1,000 up, and it will readily be seen that a couple of farmers joining together and building a potato warehouse costing from $5,000 to $8,000 will have a heavy additional expense in building a siding which may cost from $1,000 to $2,000. I would like the Canadian National system to take this matter into consideration and see if some scheme cannot be arranged by which sidings may be built to accommodate these potato shippers. I venture to say that the cars going over every new siding will increase in number from year to year, and will show a revenue to the railway. If some plan could be worked out whereby a bonus would be given on each car of freight to be applied to pay for siding accommodation, or some similar system for the benefit of the farmers and potato growers, it would not only benefit that particular class, but the country as a whole.

I wish to thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) although he is not in his seat, for the splendid assistance he gave in making Prince Edward Island a disease-free area, a statement of the cost of which I would like to put on Hansard. Our products are now shipped to the markets of the world labelled as dairy products from a disease-free area, and I am pleased to be able to state that we are receiving the benefit of this work through an enhanced price for our products. With the permission of the House, I should like to put this table on Hansard. The total cost for covering the whole province was only $57,000 approximately, and the results have been wonderful. The local government have done their share, and I wish to express the appreciation which the farmers of the country feel for their action in endeavouring to put this thing over. The table is as follows:

We have heard a great deal from our friends opposite to the effect that they always stand four-square by their policies, that everybody can always know where they stand, that they have always stood for instance, by the principle of protection. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has declared that emphatically time and time again. This government, on the other hand, has had many reflections cast upon it for having been what has been called a wobbling government; it has been said of it that you never know exactly where it stood. The right hon. leader of the opposition is a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, a gentleman who has the admiration I believe of the people of this whole Dominion no matter what their politics may be, but we find that his party, and he as leader of that party, have not always stood four-square by their policies as they claim to have done. In 1910 the right hon. leader of the opposition supported the Lancaster motion for the total abolition of the Senate. Last year he was very severe in his criticism of the right hon. leader of the government for attempting in any way to change or interfere with the Senate.

Again, in 1911, the right hon. leader of the opposition moved for a reduction of duties. In 1925 he moved a similar resolution, but this time it was for higher protection. The same inconsistency was shown in their attitude in regard to taking over the Canadian National railway. The right hon. leader of the opposition pushed the resolution through the House guaranteeing principal and interest on the Mackenzie and Mann railway, and to take over this and other roads. But last year, at the time of the election we were led to believe that the Conservative party were willing to abandon these railways and turn them over to private ownership. I do not know whether I am justified in making that statement or not, but that was the information we received in our little province.

Mr. MURPHY: Does not the hon. member know that that statement was explicitly denied by the right hon. leader of the opposition through the newspapers of this country?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I cannot say that I saw the denial.

Mr. MURPHY: It appeared in many newspapers, notably in the Free Pres, in a half-page advertisement.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Then we shall have to take it as read, but at the time the campaign was on, it was the general belief that that was the attitude of the Conservative party.

Mr. ROGERS: The Liberals were wrong again, as usual.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): That appeared not only in Liberal newspapers, but in the press of Ontario which reported speeches of the right hon. gentleman at the beginning of the campaign. He went so far as to say that if it was impossible to bring the Canadian National railway system to the position where it would be on a paying basis, something else would have to be done about it. However, I do not wish to take any undue advantage of the right hon. gentleman seeing he is not here. I am glad to see, however, that hon. gentlemen opposite at the present time are willing to own the Canadian National railway system, now that it is making such splendid progress under present management and that they are willing to adopt it as their own creation and stand behind it, I presume, to the limit. I am pleased to see that they have changed their minds, if they did have any intention of abandoning the government railways, and have come to what I believe is the right attitude on this very important question.

Again, in 1923, the policy of the Conservative party as announced by the leader of the opposition was "Ready, aye ready," but in 1925 it was not ready until after a plebiscite or a general election had been held on the question of our participating in overseas wars. So it is always well to remember the old proverb, "People who live in glass houses should not throw stones." I suppose both sides have their faults and that each side can be called to account for something. If this government is guilty of all the sins that our friends opposite have charged against it, I think our friends opposite need to be reminded occasionally of some of their own shortcomings.

With regard to the interests particularly of the little province from which I come, there are many improvements we need. There is, for instance, a second car ferry steamer. That is something the government will have to consider in the not distant future. The steamer we have now has given splendid satisfaction up to the present, but she cannot go on forever, and our people feel that they should be safeguarded against any return to the former transportation difficulties we had by providing now for another car ferry as soon as possible.

We are always looking for something in the way of branch railways in the province of Prince Edward Island, and I am afraid that we have been waiting perhaps a little more patiently than other parts of the Dominion. I hope our good friends from the west, if the Hudson Bay railway is completed, will not forget that there are other places in this Dominion that should receive some consideration in the matter of branch lines. Particularly is this true of some of the outlying sections of Prince Edward Island which have not railway facilities to-day. These parts should receive consideration as soon as the management of the railway is able to take this matter up.

In conclusion, there were certain matters referred to by two hon. members of this House at the beginning of this session and speeches made along a certain line which I think should be abandoned. We had the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) charging the Liberal party with all kinds of practices during the election campaign in the province of Quebec. Then we had members on this side of the House making similar charges against the party opposite. I do not think it is fair to the leaders of both our great political parties in this House to treat them in this way. We have in the leader of the opposition a gentleman of outstanding ability who has given possibly of his best to this Dominion, and I do not think it is right for us to criticize on the floor of this House any attitude he may have taken during the election campaign. On the other hand, I think it is unfair for hon. gentlemen opposite to criticize the leader of this government in connection with these matters. He has given of his very best to this Dominion for the past few years, and I think there are enough really big questions in this country to occupy our time without bringing these matters up. We should leave these personalities alone, and rising above such things, give our public men a fair chance. They are doing the best they can on behalf of this Dominion. Their's is a big task to carry out. Canada is a difficult country to govern, and the members of the administration, it seems to me, occupy a very unenviable position. Let us as members of this House endeavour to see to it in our respective communities that the political leaders, no matter of what party, shall be given that fair play and that considerate treatment which they merit.

In the last campaign flag-waving was unfairly resorted to; it was responsible for the loss of a great many votes to the Liberal party. Let me also say this to Liberal members from Ontario and Progressive members from the west: if there is not as large a representation of these two parties in the House at the present time as there should have been it is due to the fact that we defeated ourselves by running too many candidates. In too many instances there were three cornered fights with Liberal, Progressive, and Conservative candidates in the field. If Liberal and Progressive aims and policies are the same why not stick to our guns and meet our Conservative friends on equal grounds, not with our forces divided. Then, I hope, we shall emerge from the next conflict with a greater measure of success than rewarded our efforts at the last election—as I feel sure we defeated ourselves in many constituencies, and I trust that the splendid showing made by the present administration in the financial situation of the country will continue, no matter what party may control the situation in the future.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I join with the last speaker in congratulating our genial friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) on his return to the House.

There is no question but that the budget, which we have been discussing for the past three or four weeks, presents features of considerable interest. It will probably be very favourably received in the middle west, with perhaps little enthusiasm in Quebec, with some hostility in Ontario, and with very little enthusiasm in the Maritime provinces. The reduction in the income tax was overdue and will be welcomed by all wage earners who are now taxed; but the double taxation on industry which it now introduces is as vicious in principle as it is altogether foreign to Canadian experience. May I point out that respectable people of the middle class who have invested in industry, perhaps the savings of a lifetime, are now to be taxed as a result of their thrift, and faith in Canadian industry. There is no doubt that tax-free victory bonds will, under this budget, command an additional premium.

There is another regrettable feature about the budget. According to the figures presented by the Finance minister (Mr. Robb), the Canadian automobile industry has provided a market for a very considerable quantity of iron and steel to the value, I believe, of $11,000,000. In addition to the reductions of duty already brought into effect I understand the Finance minister contemplates putting this large amount of the material entering into automobile manufacture on the free list. May I say that to the extent that that is done it is going to further unfavourably affect the iron and steel industry which is in a very bad position to-day, particularly in the Maritime provinces, as the minister must be aware.

Coal and steel are the twin industries of Nova Scotia, but the present budget provides no relief and gives no encouragement to these industries. I think that is particularly unfortunate in view of the unfair competition which results from the depreciated currencies of our European competitors, more especially Belgium and Germany. I have no doubt the Finance minister is aware of the fact that during the past winter a considerable tonnage of Belgian and German wire rods came out to Sydney at a cost of about $9 per ton less than it was possible to produce them at that point. Such a condition of affairs is, to say the least, regrettable. However, I will not labour the point any further.

It is unfortunate that the government took action on the tariff and entirely ignored their announcement in the Speech from the Throne as to the necessity for careful inquiry by the Tariff Advisory Board before making any changes in the duty. This point has been dwelt on by other speakers, and I will not now further discuss it.

5 p.m.

There is another matter which has not as yet been discussed in this House. For the past three or four weeks a committee has been conducting an investigation into the matter of unrestricted reciprocity as understood by a gang of smuggling crooks aided, abetted and protected by officers of the Department of Customs and Excise, with the attendant and consequent debauchery of the preventive branch of the Customs service. May I impress upon both my hon. friends the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs and Excise the absolute impossibility of stopping smuggling in the Maritime provinces and Quebec in view of our enormous coast line, extending as it does from Passamaquoddy bay, New Brunswick, up the bay of Fundy into Minas' basin, thence along the south coast of Nova Scotia, and the entire coast of the island of Cape Breton—which island lies within 150 to 200 miles of St. Pierre, the supply station of the eastern smugglers. Then you have also the entire coast of Prince Edward Island, through the straits of Northumberland, the gulf of St. Lawrence and the north and south shores of the St. Lawrence river and right up to the city of Quebec, a coastline of not less than fifteen hundred miles. On eighty per cent of this entire coastline liquor can be landed and distributed during the entire season of open navigation. I am satisfied that if the Minister of Customs and Excise had at his disposal one hundred armed vessels and one thousand coastguards he would not be able to stop smuggling in that section of the Dominion so long as customs and excise duties remain at their present high figure of $10 per gallon. So long as the duty on a case of whiskey is $21.50 or approximately one hundred and fifty per cent of the c.i.f. cost and in proportion on other liquors, it is simply impossible to stop smuggling. The c.i.f. cost of ordinary brands of good Scotch whiskey, landed at Halifax or any other port in the Maritime provinces, or in the St. Lawrence, is about $14. On the other hand the duty is over one hundred and fifty per cent and the spread is so great as to make it impossible for any government to stop this smuggling. The same argument applies to cigarettes. If the Minister of Finance will reduce the imposts to what they were three years ago he will accomplish a change for the better. I may be told that hon. gentlemen on this side raised the duties to their present figure. I think they did. And I fancy it was done at the behest of certain "unco guid" people in Toronto and some others of that stripe. When they did so they made the greatest possible mistake in the interests of public morality, sobriety and good conduct in this country. I hope the government will make a change and reduce these duties to at least one-third of those now in force. If they do that they will find that four-fifths of their difficulties in connection with the smuggling of cigarettes, tobacco and liquor will disappear over night, with an accompanying decrease in debauchery, crime and all the evils attending the operations of the rum runner and smuggler.

In regard to the desirability of a national policy for fuel, let me say that in no country in the world is fuel a matter of greater importance that it is in Canada. It is the foundation of industry, and without the assurance of a continued supply the capital needed for industry cannot be obtained except on speculative terms. From the heard of the Great Lakes westward there need be no fuel problem, as the British Columbia mines can supply the whole country west of the Rockies and under reasonable, fair and practical freight rates the Alberta mines can supply the middle west and also can command most of western Ontario. While last year there was a considerable increase in the output of Alberta coal, there was a very decided drop in the production of Nova Scotia coal. Altogether we produced in 1925 slightly over 13,000,000 tons and we bought and brought into this country from various sources, largely from the United States in round figures 17,000,000 tons in addition. In other words we did not produce 45 per cent of our requirements.

The industry in Canada has an investment of from $146,000,000 to $150,000,000 and is entitled to all the consideration possible as regards not only protecting the industry but making this country independent of any foreign country for its indispensable fuel. Unless our policy in this matter is completely changed this Dominion will some day suffer as to both its domestic fuel and fuel for its manufacturing activities. With a national fuel policy providing an adequate duty on the various kinds of coal and fuel, be it bituminous, anthracite or coke, Canada can within ten years be placed in a position entirely independent of any outside source of supply.

Let us consider the situation in the United States. There was a time when we in Nova Scotia despatched each summer from the town where lives the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) more than 1,000 vessels loaded for eastern United States points and an equal number sailed from Cape Breton. The United States government later imposed a duty of $1.75 a ton on our coal and stopped that business instantly with the result that they have developed their own resources; they are to-day shipping into Canada from ten to twelve millions tons of coal annually and they are now by far the greatest coal producers in the world.

Surely we can take a lesson from the experience of other countries. Are we wiser than the combined peoples of all the world? It would seem as though we thought we were, but I am sure and I think most hon. members are also sure that we are not. Every business man, every man of any intelligence who reads the newspapers knows what the situation is. The remedy is obvious and I cannot understand why we do not put it into force. Three things we ought to do. We should first impose upon coal a duty sufficient to enable us to control our own market. We should have an adequate protective duty on all classes of coal, coke and patent fuels equal to, say, not less than 25 per cent of the present laid down, c.i.f. cost. That would be, say, $1.25 to $1.50 a ton, the duty to apply to all coal, coke and patent fuel imported irrespective of its origin or the purpose for which it may be used. I have said that the rate should be $1.50 a ton and if it were that duty would be considerably lower than that at one time imposed by the people of the United States on Nova Scotia coal then largely shipped and sold by us to New England cities. Some of my hon. friends may balk at a duty of $1.50 a ton. While the industry is certainly entitled to that amount of protection I wish to emphasize the fact that a rate of duty less than one dollar a ton applied to all classes of fuel will entirely fail of its object, be mischievous and disappointing.

I now want to make some reference to my good friend the Minister of National Defence, who is familiar with this subject on which a discussion took place on various public platforms in Pictou county a few years ago when we had the mutual pleasure of meeting each other during the campaign of November, 1921. My hon. friend at a meeting at Trenton six days before the election made this statement:

> After all our discussions about far away politics, the important thing that has to be settled on December 6, is what is to be the future of this town. You want to consider between now and then as to which one of the men who come to you and ask your suffrages can best help in changing the conditions as they now exist, and can best bring to the solution of the problems that face you all, that capacity which will mean that once more we will have prosperity where now we have doubt and despair.
> Where do we stand in regard to this matter? What is the situation? We have in the candidate of the Conservative party one story and one story only, from him and his friends: "We are not going to make any changes in the tariff. You should bow down and worship the National Policy, that second Ten Commandments which cannot be touched or interfered with." That wonderful policy under whose benign sway conditions of unemployment and distress have come which exist in this and other communities? He doesn't propose to change a single line in this wonderful document. Are you going to get much help or comfort from that quarter? Not at all.

He proceeded:

> Well, the primary cause of these conditions here is the enormous imposition which has been allowed to be placed upon the carriage of the products of the industries of this country of Pictou. Our coal mines are not working because it costs $2.30 a ton more to carry their coal to Montreal. Your steel works are not working because it costs $4.80 a ton more to send your products to your markets.

My hon. friend was wrong by $1 a ton. It was $3.80, not $4.80. He continued:

> I come to you and I say that I speak for myself and my party, and that coming into power, as we will on the 6th of December—

And they did.

> —we propose to change those railway conditions, so that you will be able to send your products to central Canada, and thus compete with the Steel Company of Canada, and the Americans at that point.

He did change them; or his friends did change them; the rates that he then complained of they further increased in 1922 and again in 1924. He continued:

> You have been told that there is a wonderful duty on steel. Protection on steel. There is no protection on steel. What is a 10 per cent duty on your products? There must be higher duty put on. I frankly say that I stand for that. I believe in that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Will my hon. friend kindly tell me from what paper he is quoting?

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not quoting from any paper; I am quoting from the notes of the shorthand reporter who took down the hon. member's speeches at the various meetings. I have a great deal of it in addition to this and I will let my hon. friend have the whole of it after I get through.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is trying to get on Hansard an alleged report of a speech which I never delivered, and for the purpose he is following the course adopted in the last parliament by a member who is now Prime Minister of New Brunswick. I affirm again that the alleged speech which my hon. friend is trying to attribute to me was never uttered by me, and the report is a false one. I made that statement in 1924 on one occasion when His Honour the Speaker ruled upon my point of order, holding that it was not in order for an hon. member to quote in this House any report that did not appear in the public press and the author of which was unknown. My hon. friend does not tell us who the stenographer was, and we know nothing of the origin of this alleged report.

Mr. CANTLEY: I can give the minister the name of the stenographer. He is Mr. J. R. McGregor whom the minister knows well.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): It was my hon. friend's secretary who made the speech, and not I. I never uttered those words in the way in which they are reported.

Mr. CANTLEY: What does my hon. friend mean by the phrase "in the way" the words are reported?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): I never used the words which my hon. friend is now quoting and which, as I have said, were quoted on a former occasion in this House and ruled out of order by the Speaker. At that time Mr. Baxter attempted to get the words into Hansard and upon my raising a point of order the Speaker ruled that they were inadmissible.

Mr. CANTLEY: My hon. friend has a great deal more parliamentary experience than I have. Indeed, I have practically none. Perhaps the rules of the House may prevent my quoting the speech, but I hardly expected that the hon. gentleman would stand up in his place and plead for mercy at my hands in this matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): I rise again to a point of order. The hon. member has no right to put words into my mouth, words which I never uttered. A stenographer produced a certain alleged report which was never made public and which was used entirely for the purpose of misrepresenting me, and I say that the report is utterly false. I would call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the ruling given on the previous occasion by Mr. Speaker Lemieux. On May 15, 1924, Mr. Baxter having attempted to quote this false and fabricated report, the Speaker ruled as follows:

> I think it is perfectly clear that the hon. gentleman is wrong in reading a report containing certain statements which are specifically denied by the hon. Minister of National Defence. That is my ruling. I hope the hon. gentleman will accept the ruling and not continue to read from an alleged report. The hon. member says it was not a report published in the press but was specially taken down by somebody at a meeting. It is not usual to quote from a report the author of which is not known. . . . . The report is said to have been taken at a certain meeting but the statements contained in it are specifically denied by the Minister of National Defence. Under the circumstances I think the hon. member, who is well aware of the spirit and letter of the rules of the House, should abstain from quoting from the report.

I would ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANTLEY: I have already given the name of the author of the report. I was present at the meeting—

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): My hon. friend never met me on a single platform in Pictou in that campaign.

Mr. CANTLEY: I did not say I did.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Minister of National Defence has categorically denied having made such a speech as the hon. member is quoting from, and I must ask that it be not further referred to.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think it was said at that time—I do not think the minister will deny it—that I had issued a manifesto to the people of the county.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): Mr. Speaker, the point I make is this: my hon. friend is quoting from a document containing utterances which are absolutely fabricated, and is attempting to ascribe to me words that I never used at all. The alleged report from which the hon. gentleman is quoting never appeared in the public press and was never heard of until weeks, indeed months, afterwards, when it was produced and its statements ascribed to me.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Cantley) is quoting just now.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not quoting at all at the moment. And what I have been quoting from is a speech which was delivered by the minister at Trenton, whereas the speech to which he has been referring and which was under discussion here last year or the year before was one which was made at Stellarton.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): It was the same speech taken by the same stenographer.

Mr. CANTLEY: It is not the same speech.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Minister of National Defence having repudiated the speech alleged to have been delivered by him, I must ask the hon. member to take his word and refrain from further references to it.

Mr. CANTLEY: I bow to your ruling, Sir, but I am rather surprised at the attitude taken by the minister: I gave him credit for a little more courage.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): My hon. friend had so much courage in 1921 that he never met me on a single platform to discuss public questions.

Mr. CANTLEY: I had courage enough to appear on platforms in 1925 when the minister avoided me.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish): You probably would not have been there if I had arrived.

Mr. CANTLEY: Why did the hon. Minister of National Defence mobilize his entire forces—horse, foot and artillery, commissariat and war chest, and in the dark of the last September moon leave the fastnesses of Pictou, which had supported him for thirty years? Why did he abandon, even as did Kruger, that other celebrated man of war, the wife of his bosom and his little ones, leaving them to the tender mercies of the Tory enemy? Under cover of night he marched from Pictou and dug in in the mountain fastnesses of Antigonish, forty miles away, and to-day he warms his cabin in the vale of Kippoch with peat, the duty on coal being too high. Now he talks about people not having courage to meet him! With whom does the balance of courage lie to-day? I think it is for the minister and not for me to explain any want of courage.

To come now directly to the budget. Iron and steel, the basic industry of civilization, has made but little progress in Canada during the past fifteen years. We have advanced perhaps one and a half per cent in Canada while in the same period the expansion in the United States has been about 75 per cent. During the past year Canada imported about $181,196,800 worth of iron and steel products, largely from the United States, while the value of these duty free products imported in 1925 was $15,126,109; in the same year dutiable tonnage was imported to the value of $120,000,000. In 1926 the free tonnage imported was valued at $22,000,000 and the dutiable at $158,000,000.

Here is another arresting fact in connection with the matter. Our free and dutiable iron and steel in 1925 was valued at $134,000,000 or an increase of $46,000,000 over that of 1924. The point is that the proportions of free or 99 per cent rebate steel is going up year by year, and going up rapidly. We have a tariff that is the laughing stock of any commercial man in any country who has any knowledge of fiscal affairs. Our tariff contains items respecting the iron and steel trade that have not been altered for nearly thirty years. There are to-day in that tariff over seventy items that are either entirely free or enjoy a rebate of 99 per cent, and this country has gone on for years collecting large amounts of duty on certain iron and steel products running into enormous figures only to rebate them again later.

The iron and steel tariff as it now exists is the most irrational and confusedly mixed mass of out-of-date schedules imaginable. Take one item No. 387:

> Swedish rolled iron and Swedish rolled steel, nail rods under half an inch in diameter, for the manufacture of horse shoe nails.

There has been no Swedish rolled iron for use in the manufacture of horse shoe nails imported into this country for years—and still the item remains. Swedish rolled iron nail rods were replaced by mild steel years ago. Then take item 1005:

> Steel under one-half inch in diameter or under one-half inch square when used in the manufacture of locks and knobs.

That item was put there when Sir Charles Tupper introduced his first iron and steel tariff in 1887. What does it mean? It means the little spindle that goes through a door lock and engages with the knobs. This steel has been admitted into this country for thirty years free of duty although it could at any time during all those years have been made in any of our mills. Ontario factories have been making locks and knobs for thirty years and have enjoyed ample protection on their product—and still have had that particular item coming in free. I might say the same of thirty other items. Why do we not profit by the wisdom and experience of the United States? There is no such nonsense in their tariff. Take iron and steel. The United States customs authorities have been dealing with these matters for sixty years, they have evolved a tariff whose definitions are so clear that they cannot be evaded. Take paragraph 306 of the United States tariff which deals with steel:

"All metal produced from iron or its ores, which is cast and malleable, of whatever description or form, without regard to the percentage of carbon contained therein, whether produced by cementation, or converted, cast, or made from iron or its ores, by the crucible, electric, Bessemer, Clapp-Griffith, pneumatic, Thomas-Gilchrist, basic, Siemens-Martin, or open-hearth process, or by the equivalent of either, or by a combination of two or more of the processes, or their equivalents, or by any fusion or other process which produces from iron or its ores a metal either granular or fibrous in structure, which is cast and malleable, excepting what is known as malleable-iron castings, shall be classed and denominated as steel."

There you have a definition of steel which cannot be got around in any way whatever. Every item of iron or steel that is made in the United States and that falls under any of the categories of iron and steel products is amply protected, with the result that there has been an enormous growth in the volume of these products and to-day that country, in respect to that production, leads the world.

Consider the type of competition which the steel plants of Canada have to contend with. Take the United States Steel Corporation, organized in 1901. To-day it has 138 miscellaneous works and departments, comprising 112 blast furnaces, 34 Bessemer converters, 332 oil heated furnaces, 44 blooming and slab mills, 15 billet and sheet-bar mills, also eight rail mills, seven universal plate mills—I might read the whole list, but I will not weary the House. Consider their resources in another way. They have 237,714 acres of gas and oil territory, 1,407 active gas wells and 246 active oil wells, 20 gas compressing stations, 8 gasoline plants with a pipe line distribution system aggregating 1,285 miles. In 1925 they had a production of 15,738,157,000 cubic feet of natural gas—practically all consumed in their own plants—97,910 barrels of crude oil, and 1,313,088 gallons of gasoline. Look at their ore resources. They have 19 active mines which produced last year 27,996,845 tons of ore, and several other mines in reserve. They have railway equipment, including 1464 steam locomotives, 61,916 train freight cars and 2,600 odd other items of railway operating equipment. They have also 139 lake and 35 ocean steamships, and 413 river transport vessels.

Then take their production. The output of the several principal departments for the year 1925 in comparison with results for the preceding year was as follows:

	1925 tons	1924 tons
Iron and manganese ore	27,996,845	24,774,541
Limestone, dolomite and fluorspar	5,344,893	5,033,889
Coal	31,475,568	27,738,007
Coke	16,301,224	14,408,041
Pig iron, ferro and spiegel	14,798,999	12,683,729
Steel ingots (Bessemer and open hearth)	18,898,697	16,478,857
Rolled and finished steel products for sale	13,271,010	11,722,908

Consider what they contributed to the taxation of the United States. Last year they paid in federal taxes nearly $51,000,000, and their volume of business was $1,406,505,195, an increase of about $200,000,000 over the year before, and their total undivided surplus on December 31, 1925, was $521,863,109. That is the corporation and the kind of competition which our iron and steel plants have to meet, and the better to aid them we carry their steel on our canals free of all tolls, and impose a trifling duty—the Minister of Defence says ten per cent—and with what result? Out of seventeen Canadian blast furnaces to-day we have only six in operation; of open hearth furnaces we have forty odd with about 25 per cent of them in operation.

Consider for instance the situation to-day at Sydney Mines. For the last four years not a wheel has been turned nor a furnace lighted in connection with that plant. There are situated two modern blast furnaces; about one hundred and fifty retort coke ovens; a coal washer, than which there is none better on this continent; five 70-foot open hearth furnaces modern in every respect. This plant is situated on top of the finest metallurgical fuel in the world. Why is it not operated; why have we to-day almost two thousand men, in that town of ten thousand people, without work?

Go to New Glasgow, the home of the iron and steel industry of this country, where all the pioneering work in connection with that industry was done either in New Glasgow or in Ferrona, a few miles away. I left school at less than fifteen years of age, after having a difference with the schoolmaster; he is now in heaven, while I have only reached the House of Commons, which certainly is not thought to be the gate to heaven. I have wrought at nearly everything in connection with the iron and steel trade; I know what it is to get up at six o'clock in the morning; I know what Blue Monday means, and the attractive anticipations of Silver Saturday; I was associated for a period of nearly forty years with the men who were the pioneers.

Graham Fraser, Simon A. Fraser, Forrest McKay and Harvey Graham; these were the men whose vision, industry and perseverance fought out in eastern Nova Scotia, long before any steel was made in Ontario, all the problems in connection with the utilization of our own and, later, the Wabana iron ores. We built there the first commercial coal washer on this continent; we installed and worked successfully a battery of retort coke ovens, three years before there was a retort coke oven erected anywhere else on this continent. I can claim honestly and with some pride that New Glasgow is entitled to the credit for all the pioneering work in solving the problem of making first acid and later basic open hearth steel successfully from our own and also from the Wabana red hematite ores.

Take the situation at New Glasgow to-day; there you may see a forge and mill plant costing say $10,000,000 or more, and how much work is now being done there? We should have 4,000 men working, as we once had. The situation during the past two years has been such that those men who could not get away, simply because they owned their houses, have had to exist on sixty, seventy and eighty days of work each year. All the young, active men who were not tied down went to the United States, and we have left only the older men who, unfortunately for themselves but luckily for the town, are not able to get away being house and property owners. The Scotia company operating that plant never built a single house for its employees. The men were thrifty, largely of Scotch descent, built and owned their own houses. We have had and have there to-day the most intelligent and capable class of labour, not excelled by any other on this continent, but what kind of treatment are they getting? Absent treatment, under which all the active and energetic young men, the best blood, the best brains and brawn of our country have gone to work in a foreign land. How long are we going to put up with it? Only until the people get another opportunity to give a verdict against the party now posing as the government of this country.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal more that I should like to say, but time is moving on, so I will conclude with an appeal to the Minister of Finance, to the government, to hon. members opposite and to all parties in this House to give consideration to a matter which, to my mind, vitally interests not only the workers of Nova Scotia but the national safety as well. Involved in it are protection to and extension of the coal, iron and steel industries of this country. The next great world struggle for national extension, development and sea power will be on the Pacific. When that time of stress and struggle comes—and it may come much sooner than most of us expect—Canada will be involved. I do not suggest that our armed forces will be engaged, but none the less this Dominion will be profoundly affected. One of the combatants will conserve and reserve for their own purpose the basic, indispensable products of coal, oil, iron and steel. In view of such a possibility should not and must not we as a nation now take thought and develop our resources, both as to fuel and iron and steel, the most valuable of all metals, so as to make ourselves entirely independent of any foreign source of supply, and thus comply with the first law of nature, that of self-defence? To that end we must develop our coal resources and stimulate in every way possible the iron and steel industry of Canada; only in that way can we make this Dominion economically independent as concerns all essential materials. Such a policy will bring prosperity and contentment to the Maritime provinces and will be a large factor in the unification, development and safeguarding of the Dominion. I thank you.

Mr. P. L. HATFIELD (Shelburne-Yarmouth): The hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) addressed much of the early part of his remarks to what he called camouflaging the issue by the opposition, and I could not help thinking, Mr. Speaker, that that came with very ill grace from the hon. member. In rising to open his remarks he admitted that he had attempted to camouflage the issue on Friday night in moving the adjournment of the debate, because he expected me to make his speech for him this afternoon. We on this side of the House do not believe in camouflaging the issue; I would not consent to that sort of treatment, and told my hon. friend that he would have to make his own speech. But he had not proceeded very far, Mr. Speaker, before I rather regretted my decision, because I discovered that in large measure he was delivering the speech which I am now supposed to give. Perhaps the House will be the gainer, however, because I will be enabled to delete from my remarks much of the data and statistics which he has already given.

Notwithstanding the fact that I have had the honour and privilege of sitting in this House during the last parliament and up to the present in this parliament, this is the first occasion upon which I have risen to offer any extended remarks in the discussions which have taken place from time to time. There is a very good reason for that, I think. Hon. members will recall that in the elections of 1921 the province of Nova Scotia, from which I have the honour of a seat, returned to this House a solid contingent supporting the present right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who was subsequently called upon to form a cabinet. Included in that contingent were such eminent statesmen and parliamentarians as the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, Hon. A. K. Maclean; he who is now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald); H. J. Logan, George Kyte, the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), and others that I could mention. Under those conditions it seemed almost superfluous that I, a backbencher, coming to this House for the first time, should be called upon to make any general remarks in the debates as they came before this House, as the interests of our province were so well taken care of by these hon. gentlemen. But you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that something else happened in the province of Nova Scotia since the last parliament dissolved. We had a general election in October last, and the province of Nova Scotia did on that occasion what she has done on many another—she almost completely reversed herself in so far as her party representation in this House is concerned, and today, Sir, we have only three members on this side from the province of Nova Scotia giving support to the government.

The hon. Minister of National Defence, by reason of his departmental duties, can hardly be expected to give the same detailed consideration and time to the debates here as he otherwise might do. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has had his lips effectually sealed by his elevation to the Deputy Speakership. So, Sir, under those conditions it does seem proper and right that I should now rise in my place and attempt to discharge my duty as best I can in presenting to the House the interests of my province as I see them, and particularly of the constituency which I have the honour to represent.

I ask the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker, in that I desire to offer the most of my remarks and to plead more particularly with this House on this much vexed and much mooted question of Maritime rights. But before I do that, may I be permitted to offer a few general remarks in connection with the budget itself?

I think there is general agreement in this House and in the country that Canada has at last, as we say, turned the corner of hard times and is now on the road towards a better era of prosperity and national development. I think, Mr. Speaker, it should be common ground for general satisfaction, and indeed profound gratitude, that that is the case, because we remember, Sir, that when we entered the post-war period there were those in this country, perhaps best qualified to judge, who viewed with concern and gravity the position of this country so far as the future was concerned. Indeed, Sir, they went so far as to express grave doubts as to whether or not Canada could ultimately recover and recoup herself from the great losses of that terrible world conflict. It is because the budget statement reveals the condition in this country that it does reveal that I think we should find common ground for general satisfaction and profound gratitude, because there is no gainsaying the fact that while we may not all feel that Canada is all the way on the road to prosperity, she certainly is on the way.

I am not one of those, Mr. Speaker, who think that all this is due to short-time administrations and overnight policies. Depression and prosperity in a country are not as a rule the result of short periods of administration; they are rather the result of long periods of administration and they are not always the result of conditions within the borders of the country itself. World conditions usually account for prosperity or depression in a country to a greater extent perhaps than the conditions at home; it is international, rather than national. For instance, this country, our Conservative friends say, came through the great world war in as good a condition as or better than any other belligerent country that entered the war when Canada did and stayed in to the finish. I think that is true, and Canada can have a pride in that, but our Conservative friends say: We did it; it is the war-time administration that is responsible for the success of Canada in that war. That may be true, Mr. Speaker but on the other hand, if the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) would permit me to borrow an expression from his spech, it may be also true that our success was in spite of the war-time administration. But I feel that nobody upon reflection will deny that the great contributing cause to the success of Canada in that war was more due to pre-war administrations than to the war-time administration itself. Obviously, Mr. Speaker had Canada been governed by administrations weak and spineless, without courage and vision, the conditions in the country which we would have had to turn over to the war-time administration would have reflected the character and quality of the governments that had governed for a decade, a decade and a half or even two decades before, and it is because Canada did possess governments and administrations with courage and vision and the genius to govern that they were able to turn over to that war-time administration a country strong, virile and potent in all the essentials and in all those things which were vital to withstand the terrible onslaught of that war. Even a government of devils—and I would not suggest for a moment that the war-time administration was a government of devils—could not utterly destroy and wreck our country in the four years of actual warfare. Just so it is true, Mr. Speaker that a government of angels could not have saved this country from the terrible strain and terrible effects of that awful conflict, and that is why it is, Sir, when we came into the post-war period, that Canada of necessity must have been weakened and broken well-nigh to the point of utter discouragement. That is why it is that when we came into the post-war period, the war-time administration of necessity turned over to the post-war administration a country very much weakened and a country not able to function as she would in peace time. That too, Sir, is why it is that our Canadian statesmen and those who are in the best position to judge did have grave doubts and grave concern in respect to the future of this country.

It is because the budget statement reveals the fact that we have now turned the corner of hard times and that we are now on the road to prosperity, that we must I think find common ground in that situation for great satisfaction and profound gratitude. Our friends opposite, Mr. Speaker, were quite willing apparently to admit that, for the hon. member for South Wellington, who was put up to answer the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) admitted that there was a return of prosperity in this country, but, he said, it was not due to anything this government had done; it was in spite of what it had done; it was all due to Providence, he said. To complete the parallel between the criticism of the present day opposition and the criticism of the old opposition in the Laurier-Fielding days, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the budget revision of 1897 there were the same dire prophesies made as to what was going to happen to the industries of this country, and when those things did not happen, then was raised the question of the uncertainty; it was claimed that capital would not be invested, and importers would not import, because they did not know what was going to happen to the tariff. We have that same criticism to-day—tariff instability. Then, when all else failed, and the Finance ministers of those days were able to bring down budgets showing surpluses instead of deficits, they said the government was lucky. It is all there on the records, Mr. Speaker, and it compares almost word for word in many instances with the criticisms of the present day opposition. To complete the parallel, they said that this prosperity had come in spite of the government; it was due to Providence.

I think my hon. friend from South Wellington was hardly orthodox in his treatment of Providence in the remarks he made the other day. The hon. gentleman, it would seem, limited the scope, the power and the beneficence of Providence to certain years and certain times, and to crops rather than to men. For instance, he said that when there was prosperity in 1925 it was the result of good crops; and when there was depression in 1922 and 1923, because of poor crops, he absolved Providence from all responsibility in the matter. In other words, when there were good crops and good times in 1925 it was a case of thank Providence; but when there were poor crops and depression in 1922 and 1923 it was a case of thank the Mackenzie King government and Robert Forke.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does not the hon. gentleman know that there was a larger crop in 1923 than in 1925?

Mr. HATFIELD: The hon. member for South Wellington attributed the good crops to Providence.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will admit this at once: My hon. friend is no more in error in this statement than he is in others.

Mr. HATFIELD: Thank you. I am dealing with the speech of the hon. member for South Wellington in which he said that Providence was to be thanked, particularly for the good crops.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend will find there was a heavier crop in 1923 than in 1925.

Mr. HATFIELD: I hope the hon. gentleman is not as much astray in that statement as he is in other assertions which he makes to the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a good recovery but, unfortunately, it is a little late.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HATFIELD: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was attempting to show the similarity of the criticism offered by the present day opposition to that offered by the opposition in the old days of the Laurier-Fielding administration. I had tried to show as best I could that they first talked of the sorrowful wails that were going up in respect to what was going to happen to the industries of Canada. Then they spoke of the uncertainties of the tariff; when better times came they spoke of good luck, and finally the comparison was made complete, I thought, when they said it was due not to this government but, in spite of it; and it was all due to Providence.

I had attempted to show that the years 1922 and 1923 were lean years as regards the wheat industry of this country. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) interrupted and advised me that the year 1923 was a good year in the wheat growing industry. But I thought I could recall very vividly the remarks of hon. members representing wheat growing constituencies and I thought the substance of their remarks was that the wheat growing industry was not flourishing in 1922 and 1923. During the dinner hour I took occasion to speak to some hon. members from those western prairies, and they say that while it is true there was a comparatively good yield in 1923 the price was particularly low; that owing to the fact that they had had very lean years prior to 1923 they were not able to overtake their losses; that the wheat growing industry as such was languishing, and that there was no prosperity in the business.

Our hon. friends opposite should put first things first in their criticism of Providence. They should first thank Providence that this country possesses what she has possessed since confederation and what we hope she always may possess under the guiding hand of an all-wise Providence, namely good administrations. We on this side of the House may be pardoned if we take occasion to thank Providence that that great army of wheat growers is represented in this parliament in no inconsiderable numbers, and that they find so much in common between the policies of this government and their own that they can give us their general support. We on this side may also be pardoned if we thank Providence that we have the opposition which we possess in this country to-day. May we not be permitted to couple with that a pious hope and wish that that opposition may be maintained for a good many years to come for the general good of Canada as we understand it?

That brings me to the question of Maritime rights. In casting about for some manner in which to give consideration to this subject in order that I may deal with it intelligently, regularly and in order, I have decided to follow the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) who made the first speech in this House for the Maritime righters so-called and who committed them to a general policy. In criticizing my hon. friends I do not wish them to think for one moment that I have any personal suggestions in what I have to say. They are all worthy representatives and Nova Scotia at least has no occasion to feel anything but proud of the men she has sent here to represent her in this parliament. It is their attitude on the question of Maritime rights which I desire to criticize and I will do so as far as possible in a friendly way.

My hon. friend opened his remarks somewhat after this manner. He said: On two main, outstanding, salient points we are of one mind, namely, that we are to give strict adherence to the principles and policies of the Liberal-Conservative party as they have been enunciated in this House and out of it time and again by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), and unswerving loyalty to the leader of the Conservative party in Canada. As regards the last part of that I think there is no difference of opinion between us. It is generally considered that those of the Conservative candidates who would be elected in that election would sit in opposition behind the Conservative leader. But when my hon. friend says that the main, outstanding, salient points which are to govern his attitude and that of his colleagues in this House are that they are to give strict adherence to the principles and policies of the old Conservative party and loyal support to the Conservative leader, I feel I am entitled to take sharp issue with him and to say that as far as I understand the matter that is not the ticket on which they were elected.

Mr. SMITH: Does my hon. friend suggest that the member to whom he is referring was not elected on the platform of those two salient points which have just been mentioned?

Mr. HATFIELD: That is my belief absolutely.

Mr. SMITH: Then the hon. gentleman's belief is ill founded.

Mr. HATFIELD: We shall see. I know my hon. friends have always declared, at least they have done so during the past two years, that this was their policy. Let me hint, however, that what these hon. gentlemen do, makes so much noise that it is impossible for us to hear what they say. They are on record in relation to Maritime rights and I intend to inform this House just what reasons have forced me to the opinion I have formed on this subject. If hon. gentlemen will take up any pre-election issue of the Halifax Herald, the official organ of the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia, they will find, in an advertisement covering practically half a page, two very excellent pictures of the hon. members for Halifax. In the left hand corner there is a complimentary likeness of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) and in the right hand corner an equally good one of the junior member (Mr. Quinn). In the advertisement there is not very much typographical matter, but what there is stands out in bold relief, printed in large black letters. This is what one reads—and bear in mind that this was before the election:

Province above Party. The crisis in its affairs calls all citizens together whatever their party leanings, to act in concert on behalf of their native province. Divided we are destroyed—

May I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether in their opinion so much of the advertisement as I have just read suggests for a moment that the salient grounds on which members from the Maritime provinces were elected were strict adherence to the old Conservative policy, and an uncompromising pledge of loyal support in this House to the leader of the Conservative party? Let hon. gentlemen turn to another page in the same paper and they will find a larger advertisement carrying, as I interpret it, a general appeal to all candidates in Nova Scotia representing the party opposite. I invite the attention of the House to the terms of this appeal:

Partisan politics has led to the betrayal of the Maritimes.

That, remember, was before the election. But after the election partisan politics evidently is to be the dominant characteristic of hon. gentlemen's attitude towards the question of Maritime rights. To proceed:—

—Partisan politics is dead, dead and dust as far as the people of the Maritime provinces are concerned. As a unit they are going to support the Maritime ticket which is pledged to work en bloc for Maritime interests. Vote as a people, not as a party. Support the Maritime ticket.

That, as I say, was before the election. After the election hon. gentlemen, being comfortably seated in this House, take the view that they are here to give strict adherence to the principles and policies of the old Liberal-Conservative party.

Mr. SHORT: Have not the Conservative members sent here from the Maritime provinces all advocated in their speeches the interests of the Maritime provinces? Have we left undone anything that we ought to have done? Have we not done more than the "Sixteen" did during the past four years?

Mr. HATFIELD: What my hon. friend and his associates did prior to the election was to declare that they were going to break away from the old party lines.

An hon. MEMBER: We did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. HATFIELD: I know, of course, that hon. gentlemen do not like to be told this, and they do not admit it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): It is not so.

Mr. SHORT: What we did say was—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HATFIELD: My hon. friend is a goodnatured fellow and I am willing to let him ask any question he likes.

Mr. SHORT: I am merely saying—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HATFIELD: As I remarked before, hon. gentlemen's actions are so noisy that we cannot hear what they say. Let me proceed with this advertisement, however; I do not want the House to lose sight of it.

Vote as a people, not as a party. Support the Martime ticket

Suppose they had put right under that advertisement the declaration of my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Smith), that the two salient planks of their platform were, in the first place, strict adherence to the principles and policies of the Conservative party—the old policies, not the new ones—and, secondly, unswerving loyalty to the Conservative leader; would not that advertisement have had a somewhat different complexion? Of course, I have no fault to find with hon. gentlemen for holding such a view of their responsibility; it is entirely a matter for themselves. But I do say that they are not treating with any degree of fairness, either the House or those who elected them when they declare in one breath that they were elected on a Maritime ticket to support a Maritime platform and calmly tell us in the next breath that they were elected as Conservatives to support the old policies of the Conservative party.

Mr. MANION: They are the same.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): To be consistent with the policy upon which we were elected, would the hon. member suggest that we ought to sit behind the leader whom he is following at this moment?

Mr. HATFIELD: No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Then, logically, where is our place to-day?

Mr. HATFIELD: As my hon. friend believes as he does his logical place is, I suppose, just where he is. Hon. gentlemen are Conservatives first, last and all the time. My complaint, however, is that they are more Conservative now than they were during the election, for they owe their election to the fact that the great body of independent electors in Nova Scotia took them at their word when they promised to put province above party and subordinate all party interests to the greater demands of the Maritimes. The people assumed that they would support the Maritime platform. But it is one thing to make professions before an election and quite another thing to face the music when responsibility is assumed.

Mr. hon. friend wants to know what, in my opinion, Conservative members from the Maritime provinces should do and what position they should hold. Well, I would expect them, if they wanted to keep faith with their electors, to do as they promised and support the Maritime ticket.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Are we not doing exactly what we said we would do?

Mr. HATFIELD: If my hon. friend will let me make my speech I will try to show that in my opinion he is not.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): It is my hon. friend's opinion, not the opinion of the electors.

Mr. HATFIELD: That will be determined later on; that is just my point, Mr. Speaker. No, I would have thought had my hon. friend played fair with the people who elected him and with this House—because he has to come to this House for every bit of legislation that he hopes to get for the benefit of the Maritimes—I would have supposed he would have told us something about the history and the origin of this question of Maritime rights, and what the platform was upon which he was elected. Then if he had said what his position was in respect to that platform I would have no fault to find. But neither he nor his friends have referred to it, not in a single instance have they let us know there was a Maritime rights platform. But I would suggest, Sir, that there is a very clear-cut, specific and definite Maritime rights platform. I do not know that it is worth anything; some people suggest it is, others suggest it is not. But there is such a thing, it is in existence, and the great body of independent electors, yes, and many of the Liberal electors in the province of Nova Scotia supported my hon. friends opposite because they believed those hon. gentlemen were going to give strict adherence to the principles and policies of the Maritime rights platform.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will try to give you a bit of the history of the origin of the Maritime rights party and the Maritime rights platform as I see it. I may be very far astray, for I am speaking as a Liberal from Nova Scotia and I could not be expected to see eye to eye with my hon. friends opposite. But this is what happened as I understand it. In 1920 and 1921 you will recall that we had two elections in that province; in 1920 a provincial election, and in 1921 a federal election. Both of these elections were fought out mainly on the old party lines, and the principles and policies to which my hon. friend now gives allegiance were very much discredited in those elections, so much so in the case of the federal contest that the Conservatives did not succeed in electing a single candidate. In the provincial election they did elect some, but they were hopelessly beaten. Subsequently there loomed on the horizon another provincial election, and my friends got together and said: "What are we going to do about it? It is no use to make an appeal on the old Conservative principles and policies, because they are utterly discredited in this province. What will we do?" Well, it is said necessity is the mother of invention. I want to congratulate my hon. friends on the fact that they must possess some person in their party who is endowed in large measure with this inventive genius. He said, "This is what we will do. The census of 1921 reveals the fact that we are the only province in the whole Dominion that is relatively losing population—we are the only province in the Dominion that is losing representation in the House of Commons. This all grows out of confederation. Now we will capitalize the discontent and the unrest that is abroad in our land and we will say that it is all due to the fact that Conservative and Liberal governments alike have utterly disregarded the solemn pledges of the fathers of confederation in so far as this province is concerned. Repeatedly have we spoken about these pledges, but neither of the old parties has yet brought them to the attention of the federal parliament." And the provincial government, Mr. Speaker, which had been Liberal for nearly forty-three years, was charged with neglect in that they had made no appeal to the federal government to have those wrongs righted. So our Conservative friends in Nova Scotia said, "We will form a new party and call it the Maritime Rights party; we will announce a new platform in which we will incorporate the grievances of this province by reason of the lack of interest taken by the old parties to have those grievances redressed by the federal authorities."

Now, that was accepted generally throughout Nova Scotia as a good thing. It was not a party thing, as I understand it. The Armstrong government in its dying days passed a resolution in which they set forth what they regarded as the rights of the Maritimes, or the rights of the province of Nova Scotia under confederation. In order that I may not be accused of making up this resolution I will read a copy of it. By the way this does not deal with the Intercolonial railway, it having been treated separately. This is what the resolution says:

> Therefore be it resolved that it is the opinion of this House that, subject to section 121 of the said British North America Act, the regulation and control of taxation, trade and the fisheries of this province should be relaxed and modified by the government and parliament of Canada in such a manner that the interest of Nova Scotia may be prejudiced no longer in such matters and that business and industry may be encouraged and stimulated within the province.
> And be it further resolved that it is also the opinion of this House that the Governor in Council should proceed with the least possible delay to prepare or cause to be prepared a statement of the particulars in which the interests of Nova Scotia have been prejud ced by the economic system of the Dominion of Canada, and should make application to the government and parliament of Canada for appropriate redress and equitable remedies.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the Maritime rights programme as understood by a certain section of the people of Nova Scotia, namely, that we should come to this parliament and seek to have a modification and relaxation of control of our trade, our taxation and our fisheries, and that there should be an inquiry into the economic system of Canada as it affects the province, and that the status and utility of the Intercolonial railway should be gone into; these things should all be made the subject of an independent, competent and authoritative commission, or committee or tribunal, or anything you like to call it; that the case of Nova Scotia should be stated before that tribunal, and should then be brought to this House for appropriate redress and equitable remedies. That resolution represents the views of one section of the people of Nova Scotia speaking through its representatives.

What was the attitude of our Conservative friends? Here is the platform, Mr. Speaker, as enunciated by the opposition in that provincial election. I should like hon. members to notice that virtually the same phrasing is used almost in every instance in the enunciation of their platform. This is how it reads:

> A competent, independent, honest and authoritative inquiry into:
> (a) The economic conditions of private and public business.
>
> (b) The status and utility of the Intercolonial railway.
>
> (c) The merits, record and results had, and probably to be had, from the economic system of Canada, their effect upon business interests and prospects of Nova Scotia, including the cost of living and the cost of production.
>
> (d) Removal of the economic injustices and disabilities under which the province is found to be labouring, and in the event of failure to obtain redress, to submit the question directly to the people of the province to obtain the will of the electors in regard to the injustices complained of, and in particular to mandate and empower the provincial administration to petition and request the Dominion government to modify or relax its arrangements on the subjects of taxation, trade and fisheries which may be found to prejudice the business and industrial interests of the people and the province of Nova Scotia.
> (e) If after such action the federal authorities will not meet our fair demands with respect to freight rates, trade adjustment and the fisheries, then we must carry our case to the Birtish government for such amendments to the British North America Act as may be necessary to ensure the welfare and existence of the people of this province.

There, Mr. Speaker, I submit is practically the same bill of rights—the same platform—which makes up the Maritime rights platform, the platform which the so-called Maritime rights ticket is pledged to support, namely, that a thorough and competent inquiry should be made into our trade and our fisheries and our taxation, into the economic system of Canada as it affects our province, and into the utility and status of the Intercolonial railway. That, to my knowledge, is the only thing that was ever suggested in connection with this Maritime rights problem as a policy or as a platform until we came to this House and found hon. gentlemen opposite saying they were sent here as Conservatives to support the old Conservative party and its leader.

Mr. FOSTER: Might I ask a question? What was the hon. gentleman reading from?

Mr. HATFIELD: I was reading first from a resolution passed by the Armstrong government near the end of its last session and then from the published platform of the Conservative opposition in that campaign, which appeared in all the papers of Nova Scotia.

Mr. FOSTER: In the local campaign?

Mr. HATFIELD: Yes.

Mr. FOSTER: I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have not heard of it before, and did not see it.

Mr. HATFIELD: Perhaps that accounts for the position my hon. friend and his friends are now prepared to take on this question. I am sorry to think that there is an hon. member in this House representing a Nova Scotia constituency who has never heard of the platform of the party to which he belongs.

Mr. FOSTER: That was not my platform.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Might I ask the hon. member which of the two platforms he supported last June?

Mr. HATFIELD: It would not have made any difference, because they were both alike. As a matter of fact I was consistent, and voted for the Liberal candidates.

An hon. MEMBER: Always!

Mr. HATFIELD: Always, because I believe the solution of Maritime difficulties is to be found in the policies of the Liberal party.

Mr. HANSON: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is hardly fair to the speaker to interrupt him continually. It is different if he allows the interruptions, of course, but during a debate it is not the proper thing to cross-examine the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD: My hon. friend asked me which policy I supported. I will tell him that I said in my platform and put in all my campaign literature that on two issues I asked for independence; first, on all issues which were strictly of a moral character, and secondly, all issues pertaining to the province of Nova Scotia. I said then, and on this ground I stand now, that if this government fails to bring down legislation which will assist in solving the problems of Nova Scotia I will use every legitimate means in this House of Commons to resist.

Mr. PRESTON: My hon. friend had better get busy, then.

Mr. HATFIELD: If my hon. friend will permit me to say so this government has done the only thing done by any government to help Nova Scotia. They have appointed a royal commission.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Another commission?

Mr. HATFIELD: Yes, another commission. Do my hon. friends repudiate the policies of their own party, when they made that the very foundation of the whole business? I have here an article taken from the Halifax Herald in respect to this matter of a commission. I was going to come to it a little later, but my hon. friends are impatient and will not wait. I have copies of articles appearing in the Halifax Herald over the signature of Hon. J. F. Cahan, who is now a member of the Rhodes government in Nova Scotia, and who I think, is the only minister of the crown enjoying the unique distinction of having special legislation passed to enable him to become an assistant minister. That was done in the province of Nova Scotia, and Mr. Cahan says:

> The candidates who will oppose the government in the coming election are pledged to obtain: "a thorough and reliable report on the natural resources and assets of the province" and "a competent, independent and authoritative inquiry into the economic conditions of public and private business, the status and utility of the Intercolonial Railway; the merits, records and results had, and probably to be had, from the economic system of Canada; their effects upon business interest; and prospects of Nova Scotia, including the cost of living and the cost of production."

Everything in connection with Maritime rights establishes that all these issues should be submitted to an independent committee, commission or inquiry, entirely free from partisanship and politics. My hon. friends have very quickly forgotten the position they occupied such a short time ago. They repudiate their own leaders; they repudiate their own platforms and say, "We don't know anything about it, we have forgotten so quickly." You cannot expect much, Mr. Speaker, from a representation in this House composed of men of that description. If my hon. friends will take it good naturedly I have still another evidence which may convince them that this is not a party question. The father of Maritime rights, Mr. W. L. Hall,—"Laurie" Hall, as he is called in Nova Scotia—led the Conservative opposition all through the fight, until the going looked good and it was thought that there was a prospect of getting into power. Then a certain gentleman came from Ottawa and usurped the position held by Mr.

Hall, taking the throne himself. Both these gentlemen are on record in connection with their independence on this question, and with the permission of the House I would like to read what Mr. Hall said, speaking at Truro. Perhaps the hon. member for that constituency will recall the visit of Mr. Hall, who was on the platform with Mr. Rhodes. This is what he said about the affiliations of the candidates of his party:

> It would be hard for him to say what would be the remedy, but if the Conservatives were returned to power they would appoint a commission to investigate—

Then he goes on to say more, and this is tragic:

> He is not prepared to say just what fiscal policy is best suited for Nova Scotia, but he was ready to repudiate his stand on protection if, after being in office—

Do not forget that, because it is all conditional on their being in office.

> —and ascertaining the needs of the province—

Which he admittedly does not know and will have to get from this commission.

> —he find free trade most beneficial.

Couple with that the declaration of my hon. friends here, who say that the main, outstanding and salient point which should govern our attitude here is strict adherence to the old Conservative policy; I think my hon. friends had better revise their conduct and have a get-together meeting to find out why they are here and what they are supposed to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to take the plunge which my right hon. leader took when in Nova Scotia, and ask, "What are Maritime rights?" I am going to place myself in the judgment of this House when I say that, after listening to all the hon. gentlemen opposite from Nova Scotia expatiating and expounding on this question since they have been here, I do not believe a single independent member of this House can take pencil and paper and write down a clear-cut, concrete summary of what Maritime rights are. We have heard the hon. members from Cape Breton Island, and I have no fault to find with them. It is perfectly natural; since they do not know why they are here, I can quite understand why they do it. They say this is the whole trouble with the Maritime provinces: We want a duty on coal and on steel. Unquestionably that is what their people want them to say; therefore they say it. We come down to Pictou, and the hon. member for that constituency (Mr. Cantley) made a similar statement, and his interests are that way. Then we come to the port and county of Halifax, and hon. members representing that constituency say: No, the big thing we want is Canadian trade through Canadian ports; that is why the province of Nova Scotia languishes; we have got to have the port of Halifax serve as a sort of sieve through which all through freight must pass. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have yet to be convinced that any policy which does nothing more for a province than to let freight originating in another province and destined for another place pass through it is basically and fundamentally a sound policy on which you can build up industry in any province. What we must do, in my judgment, is to find policies that will originate freight in the province of Nova Scotia; then we have done something worth while.

There was another hon. gentleman who spoke. Oh, he says, that is not it at all. He was making a very weighty argument, and a good one from his point of view; he was on the question of freight rates, I think. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), and a more courteous member we have not in this House,—he never interrupts a speaker except to ask a very pertinent question, and he asks it always in a very gentlemanly way—rose in his place and said: "What would my hon. friend suggest as a remedy?" What was the answer? Unwittingly, I think, the hon. member told the truth. He said: If my hon. friend will induce those who occupy the treasury benches to come over on our side of the House, and let us over on that side, I will advise the government—meaning, I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the main, outstanding, salient point which is going to guide his conduct in this House is to get into office—like Mr. Hall, down in Nova Scotia, who said: Put us in office, and then we will do these things—notwithstanding that his colleagues had said: No, we are the committee to settle this question and we are going to settle it on the floor of this House, and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) said: "We will keep the House in session all night if necessary in order to get the pay for our cow." Yes, Mr. Speaker, it makes all the difference in the world whether you are on this side of the House or on that.

My hon. friend, however, went a little further, and I rather regret that he did. I think he should not have done it; I hope he will not do it again. He rather suggested what we as boys called dirt. He said: "And I will not ask for a portfolio either." He went out of his way to say that; it was not called for at all. Just out of the egotism, I suppose, that he possesses, he thought: That is the thing to say, and I will say it. But he said more than that. He said: I will be content to advise the government from the very fringes of my party. I want to say to hon. members that if they will take the records of this House and observe from them the conduct of my hon. friend when he had a seat in this House, they will appreciate what he means when he says: I will be content to hang on to the very outskirts of my party if they will only take me back. I regret that the hon. gentleman said that respecting the hon. member for Waterloo.

My hon. friend from Cumberland went further even than that. He said: So far as I know, my leader is the only leader of any political party who up to date has given us any tangible and specific remedy for the ills which afflict the Maritime provinces. Well, having expatiated and expounded on the ills of the Maritime provinces as he did, one would almost have thought that he would have taken the House into his confidence and told them what that policy was, but you can read his speech from Genesis to Revelations and you will not find another reference to it. He should at least have done his leader the honour and credit of stating what that policy was. But there is not a word about it. The fact is, his mind and his lips could not work fast enough to denounce the Prime Minister of this country. The Prime Minister came down to Nova Scotia, he said, and asked, what are Maritime rights?—or words to that effect. My observation has always been, Mr. Speaker, that the man who undertakes to bolster up his own case by pulling down his neighbour's has a mighty poor case of his own to bolster up. While I did not have the honour and privilege of listening to the right hon. leader of the opposition when he was in Nova Scotia, I did read the substance of what his remedy is, and I hope no one will repudiate it if I take occasion to recall it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, he was misquoted.

Mr. HATFIELD: In effect it was this. He said: The trouble with Nova Scotia and the Maritime provinces is that you are denied the markets of central Canada. The fathers of confederation intended that through the operation of the Intercolonial railway you should have those markets, but the freight rates have been made excessive, and you are denied the central markets of Canada for your production. My remedy, he says, is that we reduce those freight rates, and whatever loss comes to the railways in consequence the general treasury of Canada will make up. That sounds pretty good, Mr. Speaker, until you look into it. I took occasion, just as an ordinary business man, not with any particular knowledge of these things—I cannot deal with these highfalutin things, freight rate structures and all the rest of these scientific terms—but as a man who has some production in the province of Nova Scotia for which he wants markets, I can consider this as a business man would have to consider it. So I said to myself: What are the products for which we want markets in the central provinces? Which of our products can be successfully marketed, say, in Ontario? Now the production of Nova Scotia runs to about $145,000,000 or $150,000,000 a year. Agriculture accounts for something like $22,000,000 to $25,000,000; coal, about $19,000,000 or $20,000,000; steel products, about $12,000,000; timber, about $12,000,000; and fisheries, about $10,000,000. Now let us take the products of the farm. Does anybody suggest for a moment that the dairy farmer of Nova Scotia can successfully find a market for his butter in Ontario? Why, the very competition he endures in Nova Scotia now is the competition from Ontario butter laid right down on the counters of the stores of Nova Scotia and sold in competition with our own butter. Does anybody suggest that we could successfully find a market for our beef animals or our beef in Ontario? Obviously that cannot be done, because the very competition we endure down in Nova Scotia in the beef proposition is Ontario beef. The price we get for our beef in Nova Scotia is what Ontario and western beef costs laid down at the vendors' stores. That is what determines our price. Could we successfully market our fruit, our apples, for instance, in Ontario, where they have millions of barrels for export? Could we find a market in Ontario for our smaller fruits, for strawberries? We ship from my county thousands of bushels of strawberries every year to the United States and go over the tariff, Mr. Speaker, to do it. The hon. member for Argenteuil, speaking the other day on this question of strawberries, said: What we need to do in order that our appetites may not become satiated with American strawberries is to jack up the tariff to a level with that of the United States. Then the hon. gentleman spoke of peaches. He said he was dining at the Chateau Laurier and enjoying a splendid dish of peaches until he found out the peaches were canned in the United States. Then, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman must have had a nauseating experience of some sort because he retained such a keen recollection of the incident. Now, I have been interested in the export of strawberries in my day, and I took occasion to look up the tariff. I went to the Finance department and asked Mr. Russell if he would give me the duties on strawberries and fruits. I have the figures here in his own handwriting and these are the facts: The duty on strawberries coming into Canada is two cents a pound. The duty on strawberries going into the United States is one and a quarter cents a pound.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HATFIELD: So, Mr. Speaker, if we were going to engage in a levelling up process with respect to the duties we would have to cut three-quarters of a cent off our duty. With respect to peaches this is what I found: The duty on peaches entering this country from the United States is one dollar per hundred pounds. The duty on peaches entering the United States is half a cent a pound. There again, Mr. Speaker, if a levelling up process takes place we will have to cut our tariff in two. I hope my hon. friend (Sir George Perley) will not experience that nauseating feeling again when he next purchases peaches at the Chateau Laurier.

Mr. GOTT: Will the hon. gentleman go a little further and give the duties on tomatoes?

Mr. HATFIELD: I am not talking about tomatoes; the hon. member for Argenteuil said nothing about tomatoes. We do not grow tomatoes in the province of Nova Scotia to any great extent so far as I know, certainly not in my own section of the province. What I am talking about is the policy of the leader of the opposition who says that we must get markets up here for the products of Nova Scotia.

Mr. GOTT: Is the hon. gentleman not aware that the United States customs officers can put an embargo on peaches overnight?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not butt in.

Mr. HATFIELD: Will my hon. friend tell me what that has to do with the getting of our products into central Canada by the process of cheapening the freight rates?

Mr. GOTT: Give them their own markets.

An hon. MEMBER: What about fish?

Mr. HATFIELD: I will come to fish in a minute.

Mr. GOTT: I will answer your question if you will permit me.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Mr. HATFIELD: You have made half a dozen speeches of this kind already. Let me make one. This is my first speech in five years. Does anybody suggest for a moment that through the process of cheapening freight rates we can ever find a market in Ontario say for the timber and lumber we have in the province of Nova Scotia? It cannot be done. What about the products of the mines, the coal mines? Whatever solution you find for the difficulties of the coal mines—heaven knows I hope you will find one; I am depending on the royal commission to find a solution—you will never settle the situation there by the process of cheapening the freight rates. No government ever did it, and no government ever will do it.

Now as to fish. Can we, through the process of cheapening the freight rates, ever find a sufficiently large market in central Canada for our fish so as to enable us to build up a great fish industry in the province of Nova Scotia? Hon. gentlemen must take this fact into account: The man who catches the fish gets from one to two cents a pound for it. Afterwards there is a shrinkage in the fish to the extent, perhaps of forty or fifty per cent. Finally it is sold up here for twenty-five cents a pound, and the freight amounts to $1.80 per hundred pounds. You can see from these figures where you are going to get in, undertaking to create a big demand for fish in the central provinces through the process of cheapening the freight rates. If we are ever to have a market established here for our fish there must be a lessening of the spread between the price as paid to the producer and what the consumer has to pay for his fish.

Will my hon. friends from the Maritime provinces suggest that we could find a good market up here for our live lobsters? Not at all, the thing is ridiculous. And so we might go on through the whole list of our products. There is nothing in the idea. We could not get profitable markets in central Canada for our products even if nearly every dollar of freight charges was removed.

But there is another side to the question and that is that if you cheapen the freight rate to the central provinces you must also cheapen it on the way back. That will make it more difficult on our part to meet competition; we cannot get away from that fact. If you cheapen the freight rates to Nova Scotia our producers have got to accept lower prices. Let me relate to you a little incident that came to my notice during the election campaign last October. In a pine grove in a strictly rural section of the county of Shelburne there was a hall in which we held a meeting, and I noticed that the interior had just been sheathed with pine sheathing. Having been engaged in woodwork in my younger days I had some knowledge of the good milled woods. I saw at once that this wood was well milled and I said to one of the party, "From what mill does that sheathing come?" He replied "We did not buy it here". I asked "Where did you get it?" And what do you think he told me? He said "We bought it in Ontario". Every bit of that pine sheathing was bought in Ontario, the freight to Nova Scotia was paid on it, and it was taken up into that rural district into the very heart of a pine district. There was a stream near on which there were two saw mills, and there was a woodworking plant in the same county. But those mills could not compete with the Ontario product. That kind of thing cheapens the cost of articles produced in Nova Scotia, and makes competition that much more difficult for our producers. The "cure all" policy of my hon. friends opposite will not work. Its effect will be the same as in the case of all Conservative policies as far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned; that is to say, it is all for central Canada and has nothing in it for the Maritime provinces. That is the way this policy will work.

9 p.m.

Perhaps you will permit me to tell you a little story as a relief to the dry details I have been presenting. I do not know whether it is permissible under the rules to tell a story.

Mr. ROGERS: It all depends upon the story.

Mr. HATFIELD: It seems, Mr. Speaker, that in a certain home there was an infant which, in spite of the fact that it was given plenty of good nourishing food, wasted away and did not thrive. A specialist was called in who made a careful examination of the infant and then said, "It is a perfect specimen. I cannot for the life of me see why this child does not thrive on the nourishment it is receiving." One day, by accident, the secret of why the infant did not thrive was discovered. The nurse having given the baby its bottle had gone out of the nursery to attend to some other duty. However, she had occasion to return almost immediately and then she made the discovery. It seems that in this home they had a pet monkey which had learned just about what time each day the baby was fed. Accordingly he secreted himself and on this particular day; when the nurse went out he slipped into the cradle, took the nourishment from the bottle, and in order to quiet the crying baby put the end of his tail into the infant's mouth. That is the effect of my hon. friend's policy. Ontario gets the cream and grows fat, and we get the monkey's tail and starve.

My hon. friend said that the Prime Minister came to Nova Scotia in all his ignorance, although he did not use that expression; and he said: "What are Maritime rights?" It was my good pleasure to listen to the Prime Minister when he made that speech, and even as politics are played in Nova Scotia our Conservative friends did not play the game. They divorced those words from the whole setting, the whole context of what the Prime Minister said. They singled out that one phrase: "What are Maritime rights?" and they said: The Prime Minister is ignorant on that subject. I never listened to a better speech on Maritime rights than the one which the Prime Minister made on that occasion. He said: "What are these Maritime rights that our Conservative friends down here accuse us of absolutely disregarding? I recall perfectly that the Maritime provinces sent a delegation advertised as being one thousand strong to my government. Before they came to the government they got together and they said: 'We are going to centralize on one great big over-shadowing Maritime right. So great is it that the others are not worth mentioning. We are going to concentrate on that one question and put it up to the government?' " What was it? It was that the Mackenzie King government so frame their policy in regard to the British preference that all British goods coming into Canada would have to enter through Canadian ports direct in order to get the benefit of that preference. The Prime Minister said: "When you got to Ottawa you found that through the wisdom of our legislation we had already provided that very thing for you, with the exception of a fraction of one per cent—so much so that you did not make even half a fight in connection with that question." Let me say in passing that this budget proposal takes care of the fraction of one per cent and makes it a statutory measure. The Prime Minister went on to tell us what his conception of the Maritime rights are. This is it and I believe conscientiously and frankly he is basically and fundamentally right. He said, as we say: "I do not think you can depend on the central markets of Canada for your production in this province. What you require is the overseas markets. You must have the markets of the United States, the West Indies, Australia and the markets of the other dominions."

The other night we listened to a speech by the hon. member for Pictou who portrayed very vividly and correctly the great prosperity which prevailed in Nova Scotia in those old days when we were trading—where? In central Canada? No; we were trading with the nations of the world. My hon. friend said that Nova Scotia ships were to be found on every ocean trade route in the wide world and he was right. What we need is a return to those conditions. I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of the treaties which have been made; that is another argument; but I say that the Prime Minister is fundamentally and basically right when he says as regards Nova Scotia: You will have to get those international markets and your trade must be international.

I am speaking longer than I had intended, but I want to make an illustration of just one commodity that we produce in Nova Scotia in order to show hon. members what can be done if we secure those overseas markets. Let us take the question of fish, about which my hon. friend opposite asked me. If you go to the Marine department under this government and ask the director of fisheries and his assistants what the prospect is for a market for our fish in England, you will be astounded at what they will tell you. They will tell you that the markets of England can easily take care of 1,000 tons of fish a day. We can start that market on 100 tons a day. The market is there ready for us; it is not a market that has to be built up. The fish merchants of England, I am told, will take care of their end of the business; the transportation between Halifax and England will also be taken care of, and what we must have is government assistance at this end. This government must step into the breach and help us in Nova Scotia to build up that great fish industry.

I was going to say that the hardy fisherman has altogether too few friends in this parliament; I am going to revise that and say that I do not believe there is a single member in this House of Commons who is not an absolute friend of the fisherman, but the difficulty is that we apparently have too few members who understand the fisherman's problems and who are in a position to promote his interest in this House. I understand the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) made some reference to the fisherman the other night and made an appeal for him. This is a question on which we should not draw party lines at all; we should be of one mind in regard to this great industry. But do hon. members know what is required? I am told that if we are to develop that market we shall have to come to the government and ask for about $1,000,000 covering a period of a few years. If I were to come here and ask this government for $1,000,000 they would have me examined by a specialist to see what peculiar form of insanity I was suffering from. True, we will spend millions over in the Old Country to bring settlers to Canada in order to settle them on the waste lands of Ontario and the west.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Maritime rights.

Mr. HATFIELD: If that is not Maritime rights it is just about what I would expect my hon. friend would state.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I am agreeing with the hon. member.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is it nothing to hon. members opposite that the fishermen of Nova Scotia be helped to find a market of 1,000 tons a day for their product?

Mr. SMITH: In speaking about overseas markets, what overseas market would the hon. member suggest that Nova Scotia sell its coal in?

Mr. HATFIELD: I told my hon. friend a moment ago that I am not going to be drawn into an argument on the merits or demerits of any policy. Fundamentally and basically the Prime Minister is right when he says that Nova Scotia must go overseas for its market.

Mr. SMITH: Answer the question.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Tell him about the fish.

Mr. SMITH: We are more interested in Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. HATFIELD: The hon. member is, and that is why he comes here and swears allegiance to the protectionist policy. That is why he is where he is.

Mr. SMITH: I would like to inform the hon. member that I swore the same allegiance to my constituents.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. SMITH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member is rising to a point of order, he is out of order.

Mr. SMITH: I am rising to a question of privilege. The hon. member suggests that I did something in this House that I did not do in the constituency from which I come. I deny that. I say that I proclaimed in my constituency the same policies that I proclaim in this House.

Mr. HATFIELD: I am not going to enter into any argument with my hon. friend on that. I do not know what particular argument he made in his constituency. I have read to the House the documents.

Mr. SMITH: The hon. gentleman has no documents of mine that he is reading from.

Mr. HATFIELD: I said that is the policy to which the Maritime ticket is pledged, if we can believe the organ down there which is the mouthpiece of his party. I am not going to be drawn away from this question of fisheries. If my hon. friend has no interest in the fishermen, I have.

Mr. SHORT: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) is always very courteous and I am sure he wants to be as generous as possible, but in the interests of orderly debate I cannot allow these numerous questions and all this cross-examination. It is not proper and it certainly is not conducive to satisfactory debate. I must ask hon. members to allow the speaker to conclude.

Mr. HATFIELD: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I shall soon be through. To come back, however, to the fishermen, I am credibly advised—I am not giving you my own opinion—that without any difficulty whatever the production of the fishing industry of Nova Scotia can quite easily indeed be increased tenfold. We have in Nova Scotia a production of $10,000,000 in fisheries out of a total annual production from all sources of $145,000,000. Multiply that by ten and you get $100,000,000 of new wealth, as my hon. friend for Hants-Kings (Mr. Foster) suggested the other day. Again, we have a fishing population of 20,000, which multiplied by ten would give us an increase to 200,000 persons interested in the fishing industry in that province. I ask hon. gentlemen in all fairness whether that is not something to which we should give, fair unbiased and honest consideration without reference to party interest. When this question is properly studied and the right course is pursued, and when we get a square deal from all sides of the House, the fishermen of Nova Scotia will come into their own.

Now, I had a good deal more to say, but I will not constitute myself a nuisance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HATFIELD: No, I will be brief. There are however, two or three things further which I feel it necessary to touch upon. My hon. friend made some reference to the fiscal policy of the country. Let me say quite frankly that I am not going to make any mere theoretical arguments in respect of the tariff, for I do not attach much importance to that sort of thing. I am not so foolish as to suppose that under no circumstances whatever can there be any virtue at all in a protective tariff. And by the way, what do we mean by protection? One man who advocates protection himself may be apt to call the other fellow a protectionist also, but surely there is a dividing line. In my view, any tariff levied against imports of goods manufactured in this country is protection even though it be only a tariff of one per cent. It is protection to that extent, at any rate, and if it is 50 per cent, then obviously it is high protection. If you ask me whether I am a protectionist in the sense of affording a reasonable measure of preference, then I say absolutely I am; but if by the question you imply that I should endorse any tariff high enough to shut out all imports, to abolish competition, and to turn the great consuming public over to monopolies and combines, then unhesitatingly I declare I am not a protectionist. As I say, I do not hold the view for a moment that under no circumstances at all is there any virtue in a protective tariff, because when we turn to the country south of us we find a nation who are doing well under high protection. Neither, on the other hand, am I going to argue that there is nothing in free trade to recommend that policy. I do not say that there is no virtue in free trade as it is practiced in England. Indeed, we have only to study the economic history of that country to find that nation has been able to build up the most enormous trade and the most extensive commerce in the world under free trade. Holding these views, I am bound therefore, to conclude that somewhere between the two extremes we must find the remedy, and my conviction is that in order to arrive at the most satisfactory policy we must take into account all the circumstances and the conditions under which the tariff must function. That is the point I want to make so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned. In that province we are so situated geographically that it is impossible for us to prosper under high protection, and in my judgment that is what is mainly responsible for our troubles. Take the automobile industry, for example. You could not establish an industry for the manufacture of automobiles in the Maritime provinces; you would be obliged to come to upper Canada, the centre of distribution and population. Competition alone would force you to select that field. Nor could we supply the market created by the new industry in Ontario with our production under competition. But, under present conditions, when we buy an automobile we are compelled to pay the tariff and all surcharges, and that is the tragedy of our situation in Nova Scotia. We have to buy from a highly protected market everything we require, and sell in competition with the wide world. The province of Nova Scotia simply cannot exist under such conditions.

My hon. friend referred to the royal commission on Maritime rights. I cannot for the life of me understand why it is that hon. gentlemen opposite do not hail the appointment of a royal commission as a great Maritime victory, to use the Halifax Herald's description. It is undoubtedly a great victory for the Maritime provinces. There has never at any time been an organization of any kind in the Maritime provinces that considered the question of Maritime rights on a wide scale, that did not preface everything it had to say with the opinion that an investigation must be made, and by an authoritative commission independent of party politics. And that is the basis of a proper investigation. My hon. friends' associates in Nova Scotia are not averse to commissions. What did Premier Rhodes do? Speaking as a Liberal I am going to concede a good deal and admit that he did a very wise thing when he went overseas and got Sir Andrew Duncan to come and investigate the coal strike. Sir Andrew was well received in the province of Nova Scotia, and his report was given careful consideration, and this because the public knew that he was not tied by political strings but was entirely free to investigate the matter as he thought fit. They therefore accepted his verdict. I say, therefore, that it is an earnest of good faith on the part of this government that they should select Sir Andrew Duncan as head of the commission to inquire into the Maritime situation from the national standpoint. Hon. gentlemen say that they want this to be an inquiry of the House of Commons; they want members of parliament on the investigation. Let me tell the House that the Rhodes government appointed a committee of members of the local legislature to inquire into certain questions affecting the agricultural industry in that province. These gentlemen came to my county and held an inquiry into agriculture there and the people pleaded with them to do something to put our district under the restricted area, having it declared free from bovine tuberculosis. When the commission reported back they treated this request with silent contempt; it is not even mentioned in their report. I am told that what they did recommend in substitution was that every one of the farmers of Yarmouth and surrounding districts should keep a colt! That is the solution they offered the farmers there for their difficulties in connection with their troubles. The farmers in western Nova Scotia know very well that it costs twice as much to raise a colt to salable age as can be procured for it when sold, and that if they followed the advice of the commission, instead of making two blades of grass grow where one grew before they would simply be pulling up the one already there and leaving only a hole in the ground.

Now, is there anything in this budget that hon. members from Nova Scotia can vote against? Can they vote against the abolition of stamps on receipts, against the reduction of the sales tax, against the reduction of the income tax, against penny postage? Above all, can they vote against the provision in connection with the British preference with regard to the entry of goods into Canada from the United Kingdom direct through Canadian ocean or river ports? Can they do it, Mr. Speaker? If I would not be misunderstood, I should like to ask: Dare they do it? What will they do with the reduction of the duty on automobiles? We know what they did in the last parliament; almost to a man they stood up and voted for it. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black), who represented the Conservative party of Nova Scotia in that parliament, went out of his way to state his position. He said this, Mr. Speaker, and, mark you, the tariff on automobiles was not under discussion at that time. As I say, he went out of his way to make this statement:

> I protest just now against the protection given to automobiles. It is beyond all reason that you can go across the line and buy a machine for half what it costs when you have to buy it in Canada. That protection is not what it should be.

What is he going to do in this parliament with respect to this matter? I am told that some hon. gentlemen opposite made a canvass in their campaign and said—I cannot vouch for this— that that was what they believed in and what they were going to support. If there is any single issue our hon. friends will be watched on—and I do not want to intimidate them—it is as to what they are going to do in regard to the reduction of the tariff on automobiles.

Now, my hon. friend mentioned confederation. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to go into the history of confederation as respects Nova Scotia. Every hon. gentleman knows that we did not go into confederation voluntarily. We were not permitted to give an opinion on the question. Mr. Fielding said in this House in my hearing that we were booted and kicked and sold into confederation. Sir, we were not sold, because a sale always involves a consideration, and we received no consideration. We were simply given into confederation. But what happened then? The best thinking people of the province, once we had become a part of the Dominion, said, "We will undertake to build up a sound, sturdy Canadian sentiment in the province, we will try to make our people Canadian." And so they put it in their literature and taught it in their schools and their press, and they succeeded. But just the same there is another sentiment in Nova Scotia. They are not satisfied with the way in which they came into confederation, they are not satisfied with the relative progress, I was going to say, but rather, lack of progress, which has taken place since. So there has grown up quite parallel with the one sentiment that other sentiment of unrest and discontent; and if a certain resolution moved in the local legislature a few years ago looking towards secession had been allowed to get its head above water, my conviction is that we would have been astounded at the result of the referendum which was proposed in that resolution. Not that I suggest for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that that would have been the sane, serious, sober, considered opinion of our people; I think it would not have been that; but, with the unrest down there and the propaganda that would have been used, our people would have been swept off their feet on this issue, and that is why that resolution was not allowed to be proceeded with.

But, Mr. Speaker, this question of confederation is one which I am sure, every hon member in this House and every hon. member in the Maritime provinces should take very seriously. Our people will never support secession unless every last resort has been exhausted. But should they do so it will not be with gladness; it will be with sorrow and very grave regret after every possible avenue of escape from such a grave step has been sought. But, Mr. Speaker, if the public men of Nova Scotia continue to play party politics with this grave issue, then the great union which forms confederation will always be threatened and in doubt. If the interests of the province are to be sacrificed upon the altars of political partisanship, then confederation can not and will not endure and, I go so far as to say, confederation should not endure. But if our public men will rise above their party prejudices and their party passions, and will earnestly seek for the light, I am sure a way will be found. When the province of Nova Scotia can march shoulder to shoulder and step to step with the sister provinces on the road of national prosperity and national development which we all hope for, then and only then can we strike the word "secession" for all time from our vocabulary so far as Nova Scotia is concerned.

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to say anything on the budget, having spoken at some length on the Address a few weeks ago. However, there are one or two points which I desire to bring to the attention of the House, and on looking over the resolutions which will come before us in committee a little later on I find I shall have no opportunity there to express myself, so I am compelled to take advantage of this occasion.

I was very much interested in the eloquent address of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hatfield). He stated that it was his first speech in five years. He certainly has done very well indeed. I was rather struck, however, by his remark that Nova Scotians were nurtured in their youth by sucking a monkey's tail. I glanced around the House and the first man I caught sight of was the Deputy Speaker, then I noticed the fine looking specimens from Nova Scotia on the government side, and also the equally fine specimens on our side, and I came to the conclusion that it must be a pretty good monkey.

The hon. gentleman's statement with regard to what was said during the election by the hon. gentlemen from his province who now occupy seats on this side of the House interested me too, because apparently what they had to say on that occasion was very successful indeed and was accepted by the people of Nova Scotia. So far, then, as to following the platform of our right hon. chief, I would say that he has declared himself quite clearly for Maritime rights, and therefore hon. gentlemen from the Maritimes on this side of the House have every reason to follow the present leader of the Conservative party with the fullest possible confidence that he will give to Nova Scotia and other Maritime provinces their rights when opportunity offers.

I was astonished by one statement made by the hon. gentleman to the effect that the solution of Maritime rights lay in the hands of the Liberal party. For a moment I was staggered, because I was wondering what the Liberal party in Nova Scotia had been doing for the last forty-two years, and I thought that if they do not do any better in the next forty-two years all of us will have passed away and it will not matter very much.

Now, with regard to the budget, the government in preparing it has ridden absolutely true to form as far as keeping its promises is concerned. In 1919 at their great convention held in this city the Liberal party made promises which they failed to carry out when they obtained power. Then again on the hustings during the last election and on many occasions since, finally in the Speech from the Throne, the government made a clean-cut declaration to the effect that nothing drastic would be done with the tariff until the tariff board had given each specific case careful consideration and reported to the government. As hon. gentlemen are all aware, after making that clean-cut declaration in the Speech from the Throne a tariff board was appointed in April, three or four months later, and eight days afterwards the government brought down the budget in which they took a directly opposite stand. Everyone knows that the Speech from the Throne is looked upon by the people of this country as being important; they consider that it carefully and thoughtfully outlines the policy of the government for the session, and in addition they make every effort to be present to hear this important declaration read. There is a fight for seats in the Senate, and you will notice that many members of the House of Commons appear here in their best bib and tucker, wearing their Sunday suits and with their hair done up a little differently from the day before. I remember a few years ago one man thought this such an important occasion that he appeared here in the middle of the afternoon arrayed in all the glory of full evening dress, and made a tremendous impression. That is just an indication of how important the Speech from the Throne is. But now we find that it has been entirely forgotten by this government; they have cast it aside, utterly ignoring the tariff board which they appointed, and taken a directly opposite course. So long as this government is in office we will find that there will not be very much importance attached to the Speech from the Throne, and it will become no more noticeable than the announcement of a new guessing contest appearing in our daily papers. After all, under present conditions, it is nothing more or less than a guessing contest.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Another extraordinary statement was that the government had given the matter of the tariff on automobiles very careful consideration for a whole year. It is very remarkable that if they studied this for a whole year, in the month of January, after taking advice it is to be presumed from experts, they arrived at one conclusion, and in the month of April they completely changed around and came to another. The general understanding was that they had taken some advice, but they took it from the third group in this House, and it was offered in such a way that they could not refuse to listen. These conditions have a very serious aspect because that sort of thing breaks down the stability of business; there is an uncertainty prevailing among our business men; capital is afraid to invest here under these conditions because it is not known what sudden change is going to occur while this government is in office.

Some hon. members have tried to make us believe that the farmers of the United States, after giving careful consideration to the matter of the tariff, have come to the conclusion that they do not want any more protection. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), speaking on April 22, made the following statement:

> I find now that the farmer bloc in the United States have turned against the high tariff and they are crying out against it. I believe they are appealing to congress to make a change.

Let us look into that statement for a moment to see if that is really the case. In connection with dairy produce we find that just a short time ago, when the large quantity of butter which had been held up in Australia and New Zealand through a seamen's strike was released and attempting to find a market all over the world, some of it was shipped into the United States. They promptly responded by placing a tariff of some twelve cents per pound against it, increasing their tariff from eight to twelve cents. That is just twelve times as much as our government think necessary in order to protect Canadian dairymen against the same butter, or three times as much as they think necessary to protect our farmers against American butter. In looking over the situation we find that practically everything the American farmer produces is under protection and that many of the articles he commonly purchases are absolutely free, with no tariff whatever.

There is one commodity, however, which has not been given protection; I am now referring to hides. We find that, when the Fordney tariff was introduced—and I may say that the farmers took a very prominent part in putting that tariff through—some of the leading agriculturists objected to the tariff on hides because they thought it would raise the price of shoes. They did not realize that the price of hides has very little to do with the price of the finished product. It was also stated that the American farmer complains that the tariff affords the dealers an opportunity to fix prices. We find that many of the articles on which prices are fixed in the United States have no tariff whatever. I might mention gasoline, and many agricultural implements which are sold in zones according to the location of the market. If it is in Montana or the central western states there is a certain price set by the implement dealers at which the implements are sold, and on many of these articles there is no protection whatever. In the matter of rough lumber prices are fixed by the dealers and there is no tariff, while the same thing applies to shoes.

We find that after all the cost of distribution has more to do with the final price than has the tariff. According to the United States Department of Labour, out of every dollar's worth of bread sold in the United States—I am speaking now of wheat bread, and there is a protective tariff of 42 cents per bushel on wheat—the farmer gets 16.8 cents; the transportation companies get 4.4 cents; the elevator companies 0.8 cents; the miller 6.1 cents; the baker 57.4 cents and the retailer 14.5 cents. Accordingly it will be seen that the baker receives nearly four times as much as the farmer, the retailer gets almost as much as the farmer, and those two together receive 71.9 cents, or nearly three quarters of every dollar. It will therefore be plain that the cost of distribution is one of the reasons for the fixing of prices, and we find that there has been a tremendous increase in that cost. Rents are higher; taxes of all kinds have increased, and wages are very much higher also.

Now let us see whether the United States really wants a lower tariff. I mentioned the matter of butter a few moments ago, and I may say that the dairying interest of the United States is perhaps one of the largest branches of agriculture, owning 25,000,000 milch cows valued at $1,287,000,000. Then look at another section of the cattle business, that of beef cattle breeding, and see what they think of the tariff. On December 11, 1925, the annual convention of the California Cattlemen's Association was held in San Francisco, and a resolution was passed requesting congress to pass a bill imposing an import duty of 6 cents per pound on green hides and 15 cents per pound on dry hides. In the same month the Nevada Land and Live Stock Association held its annual meeting at Reno, when a resolution was passed favouring a tariff on hides and non-edible fats, two by-products of the packing house. Then the Texas and Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association held its annual meeting at Fort Worth and passed a resolution demanding the imposition of an import duty of 6 cents per pound on green hides and 15 cents per pound on dry hides. To give you an idea, Mr. Speaker, of what that proposed tariff really means, let me say that green hides were selling in Calgary last week for 5 and 5½ cents a pound.

The New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, at their meeting held on March 15 and 16 last, at Albuquerque, passed a resolution demanding an adequate duty on the importation of hides and canned meats. The Colorado Stock Men's Association, at their meeting held on June 13 of last year, emphasized that a tariff on hides was necessary, and made a protest against the continued purchase of foreign meats for the army and navy. I have here also a resolution passed by the Colorado Republican Association, asking for the same thing.

Here is a portion of a letter I shall quote to you, appearing in the Producer, the official organ of the American National Live Stock Association, published in Denver. This correspondent says:

> Nothing is really the matter with the hide market at this moment but the fact that the United States, by reason of free trade, is a dumping ground for the surplus hides and skins of the wide, wide world. The Canadian packer peels a hide from a steer, and sends it to this market free, that would have been taxed two cents a pound had it entered on the animal's back. During the nine-month period ending with September we imported hides and skins to the value of $77,581,000, compared with $54,551,000 during the corresponding period last year, which is one reason why the market collapsed.
> A reduced take-off may improve the situation, but, with South America, Australasia, Africa, and Asia dumping hides into this market, the prospect is anything but luminous. Consumers are paying war prices for footgear, and the shoe industry is bragging about prosperity. But for the fact that hides are a by-product of the cattle industry, the present situation would be intolerable. It is in striking contrast to the stout prop inserted under the sheep market by rising pelt prices.

These beef men that I have been quoting from have about forty million head of cattle under their control in the United States, valued at $1,052,000,000, indicating that they are a very important factor in the agriculture of that country.

No protests are received from the sheep men. They are enjoying great prosperity to the south of the line at the present time, and this was brought about by very heavy tariffs ranging from 50 to 100 per cent on wool. In addition to that, shortly after the war, when Australia and the Argentine were shipping lamb and mutton carcasses into San Francisco on the one side and into Atlantic ports on the other, the American people took hold of the matter promptly—they did not put off or argue about it or ask the advice of any third party; they promptly put on a tariff to keep out that mutton and lamb, and the sheep industry in that country is in consequence in a very fine condition to-day.

This matter of hides has an interest to the Canadian people. It shows the absolute folly of leaving a market wide open to be dumped into by all parts of the world. Just imagine $77,000,000 worth of hides being dumped into that country when these people already possess 65,000,000 or 70,000,000 head of cattle.

There is one other factor by which we can judge farming conditions on both sides of the line. With these two countries lying alongside each other, both speaking the same language, and living under practically the same conditions, we shall always find a certain amount of travel from one side to the other. If times are better in the United States, then our people will flock over there and settle on the land or go into business there. If times are better on the Canadian side, then we find our American friends coming north to locate on this side of the line. What have been the figures during the last four years regarding our immigration and emigration across the line ? During the four years ending 1925, 46,218 more people left Canada and crossed the line than arrived from the United States and settled in this country, indicating that our people were going to the country with the high tariffs, where things were protected, where the markets of the farmers were protected and taken care of by the government on that side of the line, as against wide open markets and low tariffs in this country, where we have to compete with Chinese, Japanese and low wage countries all over the world.

You will see by the figures that I have given that the American farmer, instead of wanting his tariff lowered or removed altogether as has been indicated by some of the speakers in this debate, is clamouring for an even higher tariff on many of the products of the farm.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

There is one other point, Mr. Speaker, that has interested me in this debate. I have been rather surprised to hear the home market sneered at in some parts of this House. Let us take a brief glance at our market situation. In Canada we have large areas of agricultural land, but we find that we cannot consume all that we produce here. We must find an export market for our surplus products. We have two opportunities on a large scale that are open to us, the one market lying to the south of the line in the United States and the other across the water in Great Britain. We find that the market to the south of us, the most convenient market, the one most easily and cheaply reached, is barred to us to a very great extent owing to the high tariffs prevailing in that country since 1922. We find, on the other hand, that to ship to the Mother Country necessitates in some cases, from such points as Calgary, for instance, the shipment of our live stock and other products many thousands of miles by land and many more thousands of miles by water before they reach that market in Great Britain. We must realize, too, at the very inception that this cost of transportation to market is charged in the sale of the product; that is, a deduction is made when the product is first purchased to cover that cost. Anyone would imagine that under those conditions in this country of large distances, with a sparse population, with more railroads than we can properly maintain at present, and with other costs existing in this country, our people would value at once the importance of developing a home market here which would give us the opportunity to sell many of our products within our own country without going to the cost of paying very heavy freight rates on our products to outside markets. Canada in my opinion is not going to thrive to the greatest extent by developing agriculture alone, although I have been connected with agriculture all my life and am a farmet yet. Canada is not going to thrive by the development of industry and manufacturing alone. But when we get these two working in combination, we have the one creating a very important market for the other, and in that way we can bring about a prosperity in this country that has never prevailed here before. I think the most fortunate farmer is the man who can look out of his window and see five or six smoke stacks in active operation within easy distance of his farm, guaranteeing to him a ready market right at hand for all of his products. Under those conditions he saves all the extra freight that the man has to pay who finds it necessary to export his goods to market.

In the exportation of our surplus products there are three or four things to which we have to give careful attention if we are going to meet the competition in other lands. One is to see that we furnish in these markets our product in such a way as these markets demand. We must see that the quality is first-class in every respect. We must take care that the products are always of a uniform quality, being the same to-day as to-morrow and a year from now. Another point we must take care of is to see that we ship in sufficient quantities to meet the demands of the market, so as to maintain the sale of our products there, and be able to fill any further demand that the market may require from time to time.

The other day I was struck with a statement that was made here about the sale of our steers across the line. One hon. gentleman stated that we must have access to the United States if we were to get rid of a certain quantity of our cattle, because they were not acceptable in the British market. I admit that a large number of our cattle would sell better in the United States than in Great Britain, but there is one thing that we must not lose sight of, and that is that the farmers of the United States took a very active part in putting this Fordney tariff into effect and in placing this duty on live stock and other products, and they are going to keep those duties there just so long as they think they are going to benefit the American farmer. They are not going to lower the duty as the result of any appeals we may make to them. We would have to show them that they could make more money by lowering the tariff than by maintaining the present duty. These cheaper steers being barred from the United States—and they are not acceptable in the Old Country—the problem remains very largely in the hands of the Canadian farmer himself. His object then must be to improve the quality of these steers, first, by better breeding and then by better feeding. I want to emphasize the necessity for better feeding, for the reason that it matters not how well you breed a steer, if you starve him during his growing years you will find that you have only got a scrub steer. By good breeding and good feeding you can furnish a steer that will meet the market requirements in any part of the world. Let me point out too that the farmer is suffering a very heavy loss by producing animals of scrub quality and starving them in addition. In the first place he loses when it comes to marketing his cattle. During the months of September, October and November a large number of cattle are sent to market and their value will run from a cent and a half a pound to six and seven and even eight cents for animals of first-class quality at that time. In the first place the farmer loses in price on account of the poor quality of his stock, and in the second place he suffers an additional loss by reason of lack of weight, a result of having starved the animal.

There is one other point I should like particularly to refer to. I wish to endorse what the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) had to say with regard to the manufacture of our raw products at home as far as possible. We all realize that this cannot be done in a day. We all appreciate the fact that a good many of our raw products will have to find an outlet in other markets for many years to come; but we can begin and manufacture as many of these products at home as we possibly can. Keep your dollar at home and get another chance at it is a very excellent slogan to follow. A dollar sent out of the country is gone forever, but spend a dollar with your neighbour across the street and you find that you will get that dollar back after a while. I was much impressed during the early Klondike days when Seattle was making a very strong effort to get much of the trade in the Yukon country. If a man went in there to outfit they never let go of him. If the store he went into could not furnish him with the goods he needed they phoned over to their rival across the street so that he could supply whatever was necessary. In that way they kept their dollars in Seattle, and Seattle to-day is one of the largest and most prosperous cities on the Pacific coast.

There is one other matter I wish to refer to, and that is the matter of cement. We have on the Pacific coast two large cement factories near the city of Victoria. One is located at Tod Inlet and the other at Bamberton. These plants, which are about two miles apart, are located about fifteen or seventeen miles northwest of the city of Victoria. Both were built up by Canadian and British capital; they are entirely British in their capital. They represent a total investment of about $3,500,000. The plant at Tod Inlet has been closed for a period of five years because they could not find a market for its product. The plant at Bamberton is running about three-quarters time, grinding up six hundred tons a day of lime rock and shale and manufacturing this into cement. Last year this one factory spent $600,000 on wages and materials required in the process of manufacture, as well as in meeting taxation.

Now I wish to outline very briefly the process of the manufacture of cement so as to make my point clear when I reach it in a moment or two. These two kinds of rock, shale and limestone, are first blasted out of the bluff and the ground three times under what is known as the wet process. It is ground down until it is practically as fine as flour. It is now known as slurry. Then this material in its wet condition is put into large tanks. It there undergoes a thorough mixing and three or four per cent of gypsum is added for the purpose of preventing the cement from setting too soon when it is put into place. This mixing process is very thorough indeed. At this particular point the chemists make an analysis of the mixture in order to see that it is uniform in every possible respect. Then this material is pumped into long kilns that revolve very slowly, these kilns being about one hundred and eighty-five feet long and nine feet in diameter. The slurry goes in at one end of the kiln, which is slightly tilted. At the other end finely powdered coal is used as a fuel for firing, and a temperature of 2,700 degrees Fahrenheit is developed. The slurry passes down through the kiln and when it reaches the heated area the moisture is given off. When it is exposed for a period of about three hours to this high temperature it assumes what is known as the clinker stage. That represents seventy-five per cent of the process of manufacturing. All that is necessary afterwards is to grind the material into powder, and sack it. What we are dealing with just now is the fact that this material is being shipped from Japan in Japanese ships at a ballast rate which is merely nominal. It crosses the Pacific and comes into competition with the cement produced on this side. To give you an idea of what the competition is like let me say that the machinery required in the manufacture of cement in British Columbia is very expensive; heavy taxation federal and provincial, has also to be met. As to labour, white men are paid from $4 to $6 a day for a day of eight hours. The price paid for Japanese labour in cement factories in Japan averages only 98 cents per day and the workmen work from ten to twelve hours. The cost of production in Japan, therefore, is only a very small portion of the costs of the manufacture of this material in Canada.

10 p.m.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Now, there is no chance for any of our humourists in the House to indulge in any of the old, stale jokes with respect to infant industries. This industry is not an infant industry at all. However, I wish to approach the consideration of this question from the broad principles that we want Canada to be a country in which we can pay decent wages, and where we can maintain a fairly high standard of living for our working people. One of the greatest attractions which this Dominion of ours presents is the fact that a man can come here, can work for reasonable wages, and if he is thrifty and will take care of his earnings—if he is a Scotchman there is no possibility that he will fail in that particular respect—he can very soon improve his conditions and surroundings, and by the time he has reached middle age or a little over he will be able to retire in comparative comfort. That is one of the attractions of Canada, and if we can only continue that attraction by maintaining a proper standard of living for our working people and paying them decent wages we shall not only be able to retain our own people but also attract desirable immigrants from outside. I do not want for a moment to hold up the idea that Canada should be known as a cheap country. I never saw a cheap mining camp that was any good; when it got to be a cheap community everybody left it. Neither have I ever known a cheap country that amounted to very much. If there are any persons in Canada who want to live in a cheap country let them cross to the other side of the Pacific where they can be accommodated at any point. We want to maintain Canada as a decent living country, where decent wages will be paid, where we shall have a reasonable standard of living and where we shall not experience oriental competition. The desirability of the last—named condition was recognized long ago in British Columbia where we have gone to the extent of passing certain legislation in order to exclude oriental competition from Canada. If that has been necessary in the case of orientals themselves, is it not more necessary to keep out the cheap products of oriental countries when they are brought into competition with the products of our own country? Why should we pay for the building up of homes in Japan? Would it not be far better to help Canada by building homes in our own country and furthering its development by having our natural products manufactured by our own people? Is there anything more ridiculous than the spectacle of a ship entering the ports of British Columbia with manufactured rocks when there are three huge ranges of mountains extending from the far north to the American boundary containing enough shale and limestone to supply this whole continent with cement if it were necessary? Our inability to meet the situation is certainly no reflection on our workmen or on the people who own those industries in that part of the country. The matter is simply one of low standards of living and low wages, as I have tried to make clear in my previous outline of the subject. These are the things which make it possible for those countries to place their goods on our market at such a price that we cannot compete.

Just in closing I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to this particular situation and ask him to take such steps as are necessary to protect our working people and those who have money invested in this industry on this side to such an extent as to enable us to hold our own in this market. If necesary I would ask him to invoke the dumping clause if an opportunity is found of doing so.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, this debate has already continued at such length that I feel a certain reluctance to prolong it. That is not said by way of criticism of either the number or the length of any of the speeches that have been made. Indeed, I should like to convey my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) who delivered his maiden speech to-night. I believe all of us, regardless of party, will say that it is one of the best, most interesting and most informative speeches that have been delivered during the budget debate. If it was, as he says, his first speech in a period of five years. I would express the hope, I believe, of the House, that he do not continue to hide his light under a bushel for a similar length of time.

I feel that I can sincerely congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) upon his budget; upon the manner of its presentation and, with one or two reservations, upon the subject matter thereof. The people of Canada welcome his assurance that the credit of the country has never stood higher than it stands to-day; that the country is becoming more prosperous; that financial conditions are better; that we have a very large balance of trade in our favour, and that he has been able to make a substantial reduction in the national debt. I believe they received with still greater satisfaction his announcement of a reduction in taxation and with satisfaction fully equal to that, his statement with regard to the improved position of the National railway.

The National railways in the year 1925 show an operating profit of about $32,000,000, an improvement of $15,000,000 over 1924. It should be remembered that that excellent showing is made in face of the fact that there was a substantial reduction in freight rates in western Canada during the year. It should also be remembered that freight rates in Canada are lower than they are in the United States. Indeed it is true that if rates in Canada were approximately those of the United States we would have had in 1925 on the National railways an operating surplus of some $60,000,000. In past years—and it is not many years ago—we had both in this House and out of it many pessimists with regard to the National railways. We had those who feared that the National railways would bring financial ruin to the country, but the improvement made since Sir Henry Thornton took charge has been so remarkable that opposition or criticism has been practically silent in the last year or two. The only member we have in the House to-day who still voices his disapproval and distrust of the principle of public ownership in connection with the National railways is my good friend the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) who is now looking in my direction and who once said—he has not said it recently—he would sell the railway for a dollar—in fact he reduced his price to fifty cents. He is a man of such sound common sense that I am sure he will be honest enough with himself to admit at no distant date that he was wrong and that the National railways will become our greatest national asset.

Last year, together with the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) I made some suggestions as to the possibility of effecting great economies by the amalgamation of the two great railway systems of Canada. That suggestion was not received with great favour by the leader of the government, or by the leader of the opposition, or by the leader of the Progressive party. They seemed to have the idea that monopolies either public or private were bad in principle. I have pointed out and do so again that a public monopoly is devoid of all the sinister influences that apply to private monopolies. The one is conducted for profit; the other for service. It was not my intention to speak to-night about amalgamation of railways; I make this reference merely because of the speech made by the member for South York. Last year when I spoke on the question I stated, upon the best authority in Canada, that $100,000,000 could be saved by a combination of the two railway systems. The hon. member for South York a few weeks ago raised that to the huge sum of $200,000,000, and last week he increased it to $300,000,000. I desire to dissociate myself from any such hopeful prediction as that. Indeed, I do not press the question at all at this time. The railways have been very prosperous in the last year, and for that reason some of their difficulties have been removed and the question is not a live one. I can however conceive of a situation when conditions may not be so good as last year when this may become a live issue. I think I am expressing the wish of the great majority of the Canadian people when I say that whenever and if an amalgamation comes about, it will be under public and not private ownership. If the discussion we had last year had no other effect, it did at least something to destroy the propaganda which was so active and which looked to the amalgamation of the National railways with the Canadian Pacific under the control of a private corporation.

I should like to make reference to a report issued by a committee of the upper house—a report to which no attention whatever has been paid, and quite rightly so. I am referring now to a report of a committee appointed by the Senate last year to investigate the railway situation. That committee made a superficial investigation in camera and issued a report in which various methods of dealing with the situation were outlined. One method was favoured above others, and it was to the effect that the two great railway systems should be combined under one management; that the shareholders and bondholders of the Canadian Pacific should be guaranteed a fixed dividend in perpetuity, and that after all other obligations had been met, the resulting profit, which must be very great, should be divided equally between the security holders of the Canadian Pacific and the government of Canada. I was not surprised that the people of Canada paid very little attention to it. Such an arrangement would be a jug-handled bargain indeed. The people of Canada were expected to guarantee dividends thus giving an absolutely safe investment to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway and further allowing them, without taking any risk whatever, the risk being taken by the Canadian people, to share equally with the government any remaining profits. Such a suggestion was no compliment either to the Canadian people or to the Canadian parliament.

[Mr. Euler.]

May I refer briefly to a recommendation made by the committee on the National railways during the last two sessions? That recommendation had to do with the writing down of the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways, something which I think the government should consider most seriously as soon as possible. The National railways are burdened with a much higher capitalization than they should carry as a business proposition under public ownership. That tremendous capitalization or, rather, over-capitalization, is the direct result of the failure of private ownership. It is therefore unfair to the Canadian National Railways as a public system that they should be burdened in perpetuity with a load which was left to them as a heritage from the failure of private ownership. The amount of indebtedness owing by the railways to the general public, the bondholders, is about $913,000,000. My figures may be a little astray, as they are not quite up to date, but I do not think that they are far out. The interest on that debt amounts to some $38,000,000. Besides this, there is owing to the government of Canada a sum of $690,000,000 upon which there is interest amounting to $31,000,000. It has been suggested that it would be fair, to write off the amount of indebtedness owing by the National railways to the Canadian government and to confine the capital on which the railways might be expected to earn a fair return to the amount of indebtedness owing to the general public of some $900,000,000.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What good would that do?

Mr. EULER: It would at least rob the opponents of public ownership of an argument which they have used altogether unfairly for the past five or six years. I am not contending that it would save one dollar to the Canadian people; it would not. But it would put the National railways of Canada on a fair business basis, as would have been done if the system had been reorganized by a private company. Had the National railways been taken over by a private concern, they would have been reorganized and the capitalization would have been fixed on such a basis as would make it possible to earn a fair return on the investment.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Just a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend is repeating something he has heard but which he does not understand. I apologize; I do not mean any offence.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I suppose the hon. member thinks he knows all about it.

Mr. EULER: I do not. I apologize to my hon. friend for the remark.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Don't bother.

Mr. EULER: If that suggestion were adopted, I would point out that in the year just passed, with an operating profit of $32,000,000, the railways would have come within six or eight million dollars of paying their way, and next year you would find that the difference would be entirely wiped out.

I want to deal briefly now with two or three outstanding features of the budget. It has been described as a Robb budget, as a popular budget, and as the people's budget. I believe it is a popular budget, and I imagine that my hon. friends opposite believe this also, although they might not ascribe the same reasons for its popularity as do hon. members on this side. It is a popular budget because for one thing it immediately touches the pockets of everyone in Canada, and that is always a cogent argument everywhere.

Mr. MANION: When the hon. member says that it touches the pockets of nearly all of the people, what does he mean?

Mr. EULER: Well, it does not take so much out of their pockets as was taken before. What I have reference to is the reduction in taxation. I shall come to that later. I presume it is not possible for a government to bring down a budget that would be entirely satisfactory to everyone, even if there were no such thing as party politics. I approve strongly of a good many things that are in the budget—and I have not always approved of budgets brought down in this House. Ever since the introduction of the stamp taxes I have opposed them. The stamp taxes have been properly described as nuisance taxes, and last year when the Minister of Finance abolished the stamp tax on cheques on sums of $5 and under, he took a step in the right direction, which was appreciated. This year he has wiped out the tax on receipts and that is a further step towards a better condition. I hope that he will continue the good work, and in another budget wipe out these taxes entirely.

The people are glad to see a reduction in postage to two cents. A good many of our friends opposite seek to minimize the importance of that reduction by suggesting that the cost of ordinary postage might well have remained at three cents and that the additional revenue might have been applied to the extension of rural delivery. Now I should not like to put any obstacle in the way of serving the farmers and rural residents better in the matter of mail delivery, but I want to caution the government that this is perhaps one of the most costly services we have in Canada, a service the cost of which probably is perfectly justifiable. In my opinion, however, the rates charged for a public service ought to bear some definite relationship to the cost of that service, and I would no more blindly recommend a suggestion of the kind made than I would the granting of a subsidy by way of giving lower freight rates to any one section of the country at the expense of another.

Mr. JACOBS: Unless you wanted their support.

Mr. EULER: The hon. gentleman is perhaps more interested in that than I am. I would also compliment the minister upon having simplified the income tax and, more than that, upon the reduction he has made in that tax. He has not reduced the income tax as a whole, but he has done one meritorious thing on which we are all agreed. He has so modified the tax that no man with a moderate income will pay any income tax whatever That is as it should be. I find myself, however in accord with some of the criticism made with regard to one phase of the income tax proposals. I do not believe in the principle of double taxation of incomes. The minister, perhaps inadvertently, has applied a principle the effects of which possibly were not entirely appreciated. The proposals in the budget in relation to income tax are a direct, if an unintentional blow, at the theory of joint stock organizations. Under the budget proposals, every joint stock company in Canada will pay an income tax of 9 per cent on its profits. If the remaining profit be then disbursed by way of dividends, the individual recipient of such dividends will again pay a tax, thus paying a double tax, first through the company, and then as an individual. As I say, I do not believe the principle of double taxation is sound, I do not believe it is just. I realize that no man will popularize himself by apparently defending the wealthy or the well-to-do; but it seems to me that justice ought to be impartial, whether it applies to the well-to-do or to the poor, and it is for that reason I am mentioning the matter now. A joint stock company after all is a perfectly legitimate way of doing business, and I think no obstacle should be placed in its way. I am not now particularly referring to large corporations—they usually can take pretty good care of themselves—although I think the principle is sound all the way through. I am referring to the thousands of smaller corporations. I suppose that in my own city of Kitchener there are probably a hundred small corporations in mercantile, manufacturing and other lines of business organized as joint stock companies. for them there is double taxation all along the line. I might perhaps give an example to illustrate how unfair it is. We will say we have a dry goods business on one side of the main business street in my town trading as Brown Brothers with a capitalization of $100,000, and organized as a joint stock company. The principal owner of the stock is one man, with sufficient stock held by a few other individuals, possibly members of his own family, so that the business may be organized as a joint stock company. Across the street is his competitor Smith, who conducts the same kind of business with the same amount of capital. Both concerns make the same profit, say $10,000. The joint stock company is assessed 9 per cent on its profits, less the exemption of $3,000, or $630; the individual tax afterwards paid by Brown upon the dividend will amount to $245.90, or a total of $875.90. Smith pays only his individual tax on the profits he takes out of his business and transfers to his own pocket; in other words, he will pay an income tax of $290. That is surely unfair discrimination.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the hon. gentleman kindly elucidate what happens in the case of the joint stock company that is compelled to retain the profits in the business?

Mr. EULER: The individual shareholder in that case would get no dividend and therefore would pay no tax on it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But is it not a fact that the proposed legislation taxes the increment whether it is distributed or not?

Mr. EULER: It taxes the profits of the joint stock company.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Whether distributed or not.

Mr. EULER: Correct. I merely want to point out this discrimination, which it seems to me should not exist. I have taken the liberty of discussing it with the Minister of Finance, and while he is very reticent, as most ministers are, I have some hope that he will modify his proposals in such a way that the injustice will be removed.

I wish to discuss briefly the reduction of the tariff on automobiles. I should like to make my position clear because I think most hon. members who were in the last parliament know my attitude on tariff matters. My attitude in the House as well as during election has always been that of a moderate protectionist. I hope the word "protection" does not offend the ears of my good friends of the Progressive group. Indeed I think during this session I heard the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) say he would stand for a little protection because he wanted to see our industries grow, and I admired him for his candour. I have always believed in a tariff that will enable our legitimate industries to live and prosper and grow. It is also fair to say that I have always contended against a tariff so high that it enables the taking of undue profits from the consumer. Now, the ordinary member of parliament—and I suppose we are all ordinary members—

Mr. JACOBS: No, no, speak for yourself.

Mr. EULER: I will except the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). He is far above the average. But members of parliament generally have not the information which would enable them to say what a tariff should be in order to serve the purpose which I have just stated. I have not that information. I doubt very much whether the Minister of Finance himself, able as he may be, is in a position to say just what the rate should be on every commodity in the tariff. For that reason in previous sessions I have urged repeatedly, as have other members, that a tariff board should be appointed clothed with the necessary power to make investigation and submit recommendations upon which an intelligent rate of duty could be established.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. member define a little more closely what he means by "an intelligent rate of duty?"

Mr. EULER: I would say such a rate of duty as would serve the purpose I spoke of—to enable industries to live and continue in this country. I should have thought this explanation hardly necessary after I had stated my position with regard to the tariff. We have had a tariff board appointed, and I want to congratulate the government on its action in that respect. I hope the members of that board will work absolutely without prejudice and to the satisfaction of all concerned. I say quite frankly that I would have preferred to see the reduction of the duty on automobiles referred to the tariff board. Certain reasons have been given why that was not done. For example, that the automobile business had been demoralized for some time because of rumours that the tariff would be reduced, and it was not felt desirable therefore to refer the matter to the tariff board and so continue that demoralization for another year. I give the reason for what it is worth.

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend suggest that the government wanted to put the automobile manufacturers out of their misery at once?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is reading something into my remarks that I never intended. But I also desire to say that for some time I have held the view, in common I believe with every member of this House, that the tariff on automobiles was higher than it should be, and that there was a greater spread between the price the United States purchaser paid for his automobile and the price paid by the Canadian for a similar car. I know that is the truth. We had a debate on the subject last year, and on that occasion a good many of my Conservative friends opposite, some of whom are not now present, including hon. members from the Maritime provinces, voted for the resolution in favour of a reduction of the tariff on automobiles. I believe that the cost of the Canadian car has been higher than it should be; I believe that of some of that cost has been on account of the tariff, and I am satisfied that the cut from 35 per cent to 27½ per cent will still enable our automobile industries to survive and to progress. I do not pretend to know a great deal about the automobile business, but I have made some inquiries since the budget was brought down, and I believe that the cut to 27½ per cent is quite justifiable. I say quite as frankly that I am not so sure about the cut to 20 per cent, and for my part I would play safe to ensure that the automobile industry will survive. I am quite certain the minister intends to do that. I do not know what plans he has in mind, I do not know that he is going to make any modification in his budget, but I have sufficient confidence in him to believe that he will not deliberately destroy the automobile industry or any other Canadian industry and that matters will be adjusted to the satisfaction of all concerned, consumer, manufacturer of cars and makers of parts. Having this conviction, and believing that the automobile tariff is higher than it should be when placed at 35 per cent, I am faced with this: Which is the more important, the thing itself or the method by which it is done? So far as I am concerned I think one can quite justify his action in supporting the thing which is right even though he does not entirely approve of the method by which it is done. I say so knowing that possibly my statement is open to criticism. I am quite certain however that there are many members opposite who, though they are going to vote against the reduction in tariff on automobiles, would like to vote for it, and they are doing so contrary to their own convictions. In making that statement I am making no improper insinuations, because I know what the exigencies of party politics demand. If I were satisfied that ruin would follow the reduction in tariff on automobiles I would vote against the budget. I do not believe that, but I do hope that we will find, either in committee or in some other manner, that such an adjustment will be made as to enable the automobile industry to survive and that the condition, following the passing of the budget and the budget resolutions, will be such as to enable the manufacturers of automobiles, the makers of parts and the consumers to be reasonably well satisfied.

Now Sir, I am going to make the one statement which I think is of greater importance than anything else I have to say. The tariff is, I believe, a very important factor in the industrial life of Canada. Believing that, I also believe that we should have a reasonable stability of tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EULER: By that I do not mean that there should be no changes from time to time, but I would invite the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance to make some declaration that we might henceforth hope for reasonable stability of tariff, except in so far as changes may be considered advisable after careful examination and recommendation by the tariff board.

Mr. EVANS: May I ask a question? Does the hon. gentleman realize that the tariff is borne entirely by the basic industries or by the lowering of the standard of living of the working people?

Mr. EULER: I am sorry I cannot follow my hon. friend at the moment into a discussion of the tariff in all its bearings. I think he understands the attitude I have taken, and I suppose the only conclusion we can reach at the moment is to agree to disagree.

In conclusion, Sir, I may say that I must take the budget as I find it, just as must every other member of the House. I have to either accept it in whole or reject it in whole, and, as I see it, the preponderance of merit in the budget, in the things I have enumerated and which I strongly favour, is so much greater than the demerits which I hope to see corrected in due course, that I will support the budget.

Mr. MANION: Before my hon. friend resumes his seat I would like to point out that he said he would later show how the budget was going to benefit the people as a whole. Would my hon. friend elaborate that remark?

Mr. EULER: I would refer, for instance, to the great mass of people who will find relief in the reduction of income tax. The people will be able to buy automobiles a little cheaper, and are doing so right now. They will get the reduction in postage.

Mr. MANION: Where do the ordinary working man and the small farmer come in?

Mr. EULER: Is my hon. friend now showing special consideration for the farmer?

Mr. MANION: I have always shown special consideration for the farmer, and so has my party. They have shown just as much consideration as has my hon. friend, but I am asking a fair question. My hon. friend said that this budget would relieve the great mass of the people. I asked him in all sincerity, to elaborate a little. He speaks of the income tax and cheaper automobiles, but how about the ordinary working man and small farmer, who never earn $3,000 a year?

Mr. EULER: I should say the small farmer and the working man benefit by the reduction in duty on automobiles.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): How about the duty on electric lighting equipment?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There is no change, is there?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Yes, 25 per cent.

Mr. A. C. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, as one of the younger members of this House I have taken very little part in the discussions which have been carried on, but I feel that I cannot let the opportunity pass to make some observations on the budget. After doing that, and before concluding my remarks, I wish to take up certain matters which are of particular interest not only to the county which I have the honour to represent but to the Dominion as a whole.

I do not intend to follow the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) very closely in my remarks, but I would like to make a few comments upon his speech. In attempting to do so I realize that in making my first speech in this House I am in a very disadvantageous position. The hon. member is an old parliamentarian with a great deal of experience, and is recognized, I think, as one of the smartest men on the government side. if that were not so we would not have heard that he could have had a portfolio in this government. On various occasions in the past the hon. member has criticized the government—much more strenuously than in his remarks to-night—for their nibbling tactics with regard to the tariff. I wonder if the reason that he is not so strong in his criticism to-night is because this time they have taken a whole bite instead of a nibble.

He says this is a popular budget. I believe the hon. member was elected as an Independent Liberal, and to me the addition of the word "Independent" must mean something. I do not know whether he has always been elected as such, but I do know that the riding which he represents is one of the most highly developed industrial districts of Canada, and I wonder if that has anything to do with the use of the word "Independent." If his constituents should be here when the budget vote is taken I wonder what they would think, seeing him vote directly against something which materially affects them. I am sure they would not support him in the next election.

Mr. EULER: Does not the hon. gentleman believe that my constituents will know exactly how I vote?

Mr. CASSELMAN: I realize that, but I also realize that before we have another election possibly three or four years will have passed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I mean exactly what I said. In that time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) may adopt the suggestion advanced to-night by the hon. member and show by his actions that the tariff is going to be stable and that industry can go along unafraid of the changes which may be brought down in the next budget. As this is the first speech that I have attempted to make in this House, I promise hon. members, if they will grant me their indulgence, that I shall get through as quickly as possible.

My first statement must be that I am dumbfounded at the action of the government in claiming office in the face of the adverse vote at the polls. When one considers the platform on which the election was fought, I could not believe that those members forming the government were the same individuals who pledged themselves to Senate reform, reduction of taxation, and above all, that there should be no changes in the tariff that would be detrimental to industry until after full investigation had been made by that much talked of tariff board. As a result of this, I must state that so far as this government is concerned their first object seems to be to keep themselves in power, and secondly, to do nothing that will in any way injure their prospects at the polls, if any they have. The only conclusion, therefore, that I can draw is that this government is looking after themselves first, and the interests of the country second, provided that in looking after the interests of the country they do nothing which will in any way affect their political prospects.

The Minister of Finance, when he laid his budget proposals before the House on the 15th day of April, drew the attention of the House to the remarkable development that had taken place in our trade. He further pointed out that the favourable trade balance of over $402,000,000 was the greatest in the history of the country with the exception of the war years. From the discussion which has taken place since that day—and may I refer particularly to the address that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) made some days ago—I think that the opinion of the majority of the members of this House is that that favourable balance of trade is not in the interests of this country. The hon. member excepted the war years. I presume that he did this in fairness, knowing that during the war years there were more reasons for certain industries being developed than there were at any other time. But I do not think he should have done so because to me there is a great similarity betweeen the balance of our trade in the war years and our balance of last year. In the war years our balance of trade was caused largely by the fact that we were shipping ammunition out of this country. Ammunition in itself is deadly to man. Last year our balance of trade was caused by the fact that we were shipping out of this country large quantities of raw materials, materials upon which we should have done the finer work. Although their shipment was not deadly to man, it was deadly to industry in this country. I am favourable to action which increases our trade, but, on the other hand, I feel that the policy which we must pursue to build up this country is to retain these raw materials and work into the finished product as far as possible these great resources with which a beneficent Providence has so bountifully blessed us. Unless we do this, I do not see how it is possible for us to secure the one thing which will solve many of our various problems, particularly our railroad problem, namely population.

Having mentioned population, I would like to place on Hansard certain figures which I have just received from the Department of Labour of the United States. Before doing so, I would like to remind hon. gentlemen that in the last five years there have gone from this country to the United States over 600,000 of our very best citizens. Why did they leave this country? They did not leave because of their dislike for Canada. They left here for the simple reason that it was not possible for them to get any work in this country. I do not see before me at the moment the letter to which I have just referred, but if I remember the figures correctly they showed that in the year 1925, 123,000 or 128,000 Canadians went to the United States. During the fiscal year, which runs until the first of March, that had decreased to a certain extent, but I do not think there is any decrease at the present. As a matter of fact, from my own personal observation—and I am in a position to make personal observation—I think there are more people going to the United States at the present time than have ever gone before. It is my privilege, due to the fact that my home town is Prescott, directly across the river from Ogdensburg, where the American consular office is situated, to see the workings of that office. I am also privileged to be in my own office on Saturdays and as a rule for a few hours on Monday morning, and I do not think on any day since the session opened I have been in my office when I have not drawn affidavits for some Canadian citizen who was going to the United States. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the effect that the requirements that one must meet in order to go to the United States are now well known, and it is only through some technicality that these people come to a law office. I had occasion this morning to go to the American consular office at ten o'clock. I found there ten Canadians waiting their turn to get vises to go to the United States. Those ten Canadians come out of a population of approximately 100,000, and if the exodus from Canada to the United States to-day is in the same proportion all over the Dominion as it is in this particular consular district to which I refer, hon. gentlemen can see that in the neighbourhood of at least a thousand Canadians have gone to the United States to-day.

I have before me an article written by Mr. Herman Kull. Any one who is familiar with the district at Ogdensburg will know that Mr. Kull is chief immigration inspector at Ogdens-burg. This letter is dated Ogdensburg, New York, September 10, 1925, and reads as follows:

> August immigration from Canada at this point broke all records for the month. The figures show a gain of 7,367 over August, 1924.

It is all very well, Mr. Speaker, for members of the government or for those who are suporting the government to say that people have always gone from this country to the United States. I am willing to grant that, but never in the history of this country have people gone to the United States to the extent to which they are going at the present time, and the figures which can be obtained from any official source only show those who go through the legal channels. If hon. members were familiar with the schemes which are used to get into the United States, they would know that those official figures in no way give a proper idea of the exodus.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to be as complimentary as I can to the hon. Minister of Finance, but I regret that it is not possible for me to be as complimentary as were some hon. members who have preceded me. There are some changes in the budget which I think are commendable, possibly not as commendable as they might have been, because I do not think that they should ever have been made law in the first place. Take the receipt tax, for instance. I think the Minister of Finance himself will admit that this tax has always been a failure. I do not think there was ever a law passed that was observed as little as this law. The removal of the receipt tax gives relief to certain corporations and certain classes of business, but it does not give any relief to the farmer or to the man who really requires relief.

The Minister of Finance has been complimented very highly for reducing the sales tax. I am willing to compliment him for that as well. My compliments may be more or less left handed because of this fact: Before making the reduction the tax was raised, thus getting us back to the position in which we were before.

Great credit has also been given the Finance minister for the reduction of the income tax. In this respect I feel very much like the hon. member for North Waterloo, who preceded me, but in my statement I will not go as far as that hon. gentleman did. I grant you that certain people who previously paid taxes have received a reduction, but I venture to assert that when one year has passed and we find out the amount of money that is received from income tax, it will be found that instead of there being a great reduction the taxpayers of this country will pay just as much money as they did before the so-called reduction went into effect. I say that for this reason: After the budget was brought down I was at home and some nine or ten people came to me with their income tax returns. One of them was a man who last year had paid something less than $3, but who under the new tax will not pay anything. Almost every other individual in the group was a person who had received a certain income from stocks which previously were exempt from taxation, the taxation being paid by the corporation. Now, although most of those people were strong supporters of the government they were greatly surprised and aggrieved, in view of the announcement as to the reduction in taxation which they had seen in the newspapers, that their taxation had doubled and in some cases trebled.

The Minister of Finance has also been given great credit for the reduction in the postal rates. In that respect there is very little actual saving to the country. There is a reduction in the three cent rate but not in the local rate. If it were possible to secure statistics showing the proportion of local letters that pass through the mail as compared with the number of three cent letters you would find, I think that there are as many of the former as there are of the latter. The reduction in the postage rate amounts to one cent. The farmer will not derive any great advantage from this. If any hon. member holds a view to the contrary let him go out to the country and interview every farmer he meets as to how many letters he writes. I think it will be found that if a farmer benefits to the extent of fifty cents per year by this reduction he is one of the biggest correspondents among the farming class.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to enter into any discussion in regard to the tariff, but I shall place on Hansard an article which appeared in the Toronto Mail and Empire of April 28th. The article in question deals in a general way with the advantages of industry, but alludes more particularly to the manufacture of motor cars. The article starts out by saying:

> The great majority of Canadians who can afford to have motor cars already have them. Every man who owns a car is poorer to-day than he was the day before the Mackenzie King government reduced the tariff, because his car is worth less. If for any reason he wants to sell his car without buying a new one he will feel the full effect of the reduced value. If he desires to buy a new car the price quoted will be lower, but when he offers his old car in part payment he will get so much less for it that he will receive very little advantage from the lower price of the new car, and in many cases no advantage.

I am told that in ninety per cent of the cases where people buy cars they have an old car to dispose of. If that be the case, and the statements in the foregoing paragraph are correct, only ten per cent of the people who buy motor cars at the present time are going to receive any advantage because of the reduction of duty. I am speaking only of the purchasers of cars. I make no reference to those men who, because of the change in duty, will have to follow the million Canadians who have already crossed the border into the country to the south in order to seek employment. The article continues:

> Will the man who never had a car because he could not afford it be any better able to buy one if the money now put into circulation in Canada by the automotive industries is sent to the United States instead? If he is out of employment will the shutting down of many Canadian plants help him to get work or if he has employment will his salary or wages be increased by the wrecking of a great Canadian industry?
> The output of the Canadian motor car factories for the last fiscal year was valued over $110,000,000. Will the sending of a large proportion of that amount to the United States add to the prosperity of Canada? Will it help men employed in other Canadian industries, of farms and factories or those engaged in mercantile business and the professions?
>
> An answer may be found in the result of an experiment of a manufacturer in a small New England town in the days when the manufacturers of the United States had a struggle for existence and were in constant danger owing to the attacks of free trade theorists who wished to take away their protection. This manufacturer decided to mark all the money paid out in wages to his employees and ask the merchants and the banks of this little town to let him know how many hands the money passed through within three weeks after it was paid out in wages to his employee. Careful records were kept and it was found that on the average every dollar paid out in wages had passed through the hands of eight different persons.
> For instance a workman paid his doctor five dollars; the doctor used the five dollars to pay a grocer's bill; the grocer paid it to a baker; the baker paid it to a miller for flour; the miller paid it to a farmer for wheat; the farmer bought groceries with it; the grocer paid it to a carpenter who made some alterations in his store; the carpenter spent it at a hardware store; the hardware merchant paid his butcher's bill with it; the butcher paid it out to a farmer's wife for butter and eggs; the farmer's wife bought dress materials at a dry goods store; the dry goods merchant gave it to his daughter to pay her music teacher; the music teacher used it to pay her dentist. If the money had been followed for a year instead of for a few weeks the record of circulation would have been even more surprising. Consider the effect upon Canadian trade if even half the money now paid out in Canada by motor car manufacturers in wages and for materials is sent to the United States to pass from hand to hand in that country instead of in Canada.

It is not my intention to follow this subject further. I shall content myself by saying that the arguments advanced in the foregoing article are absolutely irrefutable.

The next subject I wish to take up, and which is of particular interest to the locality in which I reside, is the development of power on the St. Lawrence river, and I trust I shall be pardoned if I adhere rather closely to my notes in discussing it. As the question of power development has already been discussed in the House this year in connection with the resolution moved by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), I will take up this branch of the subject first.

For years an agitation has been carried on in eastern Ontario to have the great sources of power on the St. Lawrence river developed, due to the fact that eastern Ontario could not compete with the western part of the province industrially because of the excessive cost of power. Industry has attempted to get a foothold in eastern Ontario, but whenever an application for power would be made to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, the body which to a large extent controls power in Ontario, the estimated cost was such that invariably the industry in question settled in the western districts where power could be secured at a fraction of the cost. The transportation advantages which we enjoy in the east were of no avail because of the high cost of power. Steps were taken to remedy this situation, one of the reasons being that the sources of supply in western Ontario were nearing the verge of exhaustion. The St. Lawrence being an international waterway it was necessary for the federal government to make arrangements with our neighbour to the south for the required development. Applications have been made by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the Ontario government for the right to develop power at Morrisburg, this being the desirable location agreed upon by the experts of the department, but in spite of the fact that these applications are of long standing no progress has been made in the matter. I am informed that no reply has ever been given to the Ontario government or the Hydro-Electric Power Commission. The International Joint Commission was capable of arranging the scheme, but rather than use this existing organization the government has seen fit to appoint various commissions or bodies, and although these bodies have been in existence for several years they are apparently no nearer their goal than they were a year ago. We have been told by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) that that body is due to report during the month of June. If they report favourably I assume from what the minister has said that the province will be authorized to commence the development. But what will be the result if we receive an unfavourable report?

I am under the impression that the report will not be favourable owing to the fact that as a rule United States interests are unfavourable to this kind of development as a public ownership project. I have also had an opportunity of talking to various members of the United States body and unless the have changed their ideas, or unless their ideas have been misinterpreted by me, I feel the development will be delayed for many years. Another very important point is that along the United States shore during late years, and since this agitation for power development has become more acute, water rights have been secured by large private interests, and as there are no powers of expropriation in the state, this in itself will delay the development in the event of the United States members of the commission being favourable to the development.

I wish to compliment the Minister of the Interior upon his statement that this government admits the right of the province to carry on the development. I was greatly surprised at this admission because of a previous experience. Some two years ago I had the pleasure of hearing Sir Adam Beck address a large mass meeting at Prescott where he made the statement that the former Minister of Railways and Canals, Mr. Graham, had admitted that afternoon to him the right of the province to carry out the development. That statement was received by those present with great satisfaction, but that satisfaction was turned into consternation a couple of days later when there appeared in the press an article in which Mr. Graham denied making such an admission.

The eastern part of Ontario is sorely in need of power development. With this development we can go forward and carry our share of the immense burden under which the people of this country rest. Without it we must continue as we are now in a more or less dormant state. For this reason, as well as the fact that the development of industry will result in advantages to all classes of the community, I urge the government to use as much pressure as they reasonably can to have the development carried through and to free themselves from being dependent on various commissions except for the technical advice which they will give.

The other subject which I wish to take up and which I think is of greater outside than local interest is the development of navigation. May I make reference to a development which, in my estimation will do more than possibly any other scheme to assist both those in the west who are interested in the transportation question and the Maritimes which, in my opinion, have not procured what they reasonably expected when they entered confederation? In opening this subject, as one of the younger members of this House I feel that I am voicing the sentiments of the younger element of the central provinces when I say that we realize the great difficulties under which both the east and the west are suffering. It is the desire of the central provinces to look at these difficulties from a national standpoint rather than from the selfish standpoint of their own interest, and to do everything that can be done to assist those parts of the country which require assistance owing to their geographical position or from other causes. But on the other hand we expect that in turn you will realize that we who furnish the large proportion of revenue to the country shall have assistance from you in those things which make for our economic well-being. During the last decade an amount of money verging on $100,000,000 has been spent on the new Welland canal. Although that money is being spent in the central part of the Dominion, that development is bound to result in great benefit to the west by way of reducing rates, and if the proper policy is put into effect by the management of our National railways the eastern provinces will also benefit greatly. Their benefit will come about through decreased freight rates, reduction of debt on the National railways, and above all, through the return of empty cars there will be car space that can look after the carriage of their coal and other products.

When the Welland canal is completed I feel that although a great benefit will be derived from the development, a small further expenditure would almost double the benefit. When the Welland canal is completed deep water navigation will be open to the foot of lake Ontario. From there east to a distance of over sixty miles a very small expenditure, which I am told the federal government of the United States are willing to be responsible for, will open the river for boats which will be running in and out of the lake ports. This would make the town of Prescott the eastern terminus of the deep waterways system. Although the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is not in the House now I would like to compliment him upon an address he delivered or an interview he gave in Toronto, I believe, in October of last year, when he favoured carrying on this development as far as it could be carried on without too great an expenditure being required, and in which he favoured Prescott as the eastern terminus of the deep waterways system.

Any one who is familiar with conditions with respect to both our railway facilities at Prescott and our harbour there will at once realize that this undertaking would be the only logical one to carry out. Lack of grade on the railways from Prescott east is such that a maximum load can be carried. This statement could not be made to apply if Prescott were situate even fifteen miles west because as soon as one goes west of this point grades are encountered which diminish to a large extent the carrying capacity of a railway engine. The only expenditure that would be required is an elevator at Prescott of reasonable capacity to look after the late shipments of grain which cannot get through to Montreal, and as the harbour is kept clear of ice in the winter it would be possible for boats to be laid up with cargo for storage until such time as it is needed for transshipment. By carrying through this proposal, which I strongly urge should be taken up by the government of the day in time to ensure that it will be a reality when the Welland canal reaches completion, a step will be taken which will result in an advantage in price of several cents per bushel upon all western grain carried in this way. This is estimated by various parties who have gone into the rates at from four to eight cents per bushel. It will also result in traffic which is not now going over our National railways being routed in that way and this would mean a greater use being made of our own ports and a consequent increase in railway revenue. The Halifax elevator would then become more than a monument to the present senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black). There would also be the advantage of return cargo being available for the products of the Maritimes, which are now labouring under railway rates that they cannot reasonably overcome under present conditions.

In closing I would draw the attention of hon. members to a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Associated Boards of Trade of Ontario, held at Kingston last fall. I believe copies of this resolution are in the hands of the Prime Minister and various members of the government, but I would like to put it on record. It states:

> That the Ontario Associated Boards of Trade are clearly in accord with the Dominion Marine Association in the opinion that the progress which has been made in the construction of the new Welland ship canal, and the heavy investment in the Canadian canals system demand that the preparation of a trans-shipping port on the Canadian side at the foot of deep water navigation be no longer deferred; and that the Dominion government be urged to announce the selection of the trans-shipping port at the point considered to be in the best interests of the citizens of Canada, and to hasten the steps necessary to ensure the erection of transfer and storage elevators for the first grain cargoes to come down through the enlarged canal.

Mr. S. C. ROBINSON (West Essex): Mr. Speaker, if it is the wish of hon. members and the understanding of the whips that I should go on to-night I will take only half an hour of the time of the House. I would not speak at this late date were it not for the fact that I represent so important a constituency as West Essex.

The most important item in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is the reduction in the duty on automobiles, which will affect the main industry and some 280 manufacturers of parts. This is a serious matter to my riding and one which was not contemplated after the speech from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at Richmond Hill on September 5 last and the further promises made in the Speech from the Throne, all to the effect that there would be neither increases nor decreases in the tariff until a thorough investigation had been made by a commission. The people of the country now realize that the promises and pledges of the Prime Minister only amount to a scrap of paper. The effect of this reduction on the industrial and building operations will be serious indeed. I am informed by the manager of the Chrysler corporation that they had a building programme which would take three years to carry out and it was their intention if possible to do all their export business from Windsor instead of from the United States. As a result of the budget announcement, however, this building programme has been held up indefinitely. The Ford, Ontario, motor plant had a programme to manufacture closed bodies in Canada. It was to be the first plant of its kind and was to cost some $500,000, while the equipment and machinery would cost some $380,000 more. This programme also will be held up indefinitely. They were to employ 1,000 men in this branch of their business. It seems that the policy of this government is to penalize industry wherever it is successful. We find another example of this in the woollen industry. I think it only fair that the government should announce beforehand the next industry to be attacked so that those engaged in that industry may be prepared for the worst. Rumour has it that next year it will be either cottons, furniture, or the boot and shoe industry.

As regards the income tax, we are all pleased to note the reduction in so far as the exemption up to $3,000 in the case of married men is concerned, but instead of referring to it as a reduction, the minister should have described it as a transfer of income tax. What is really taking place is the transfer of the tax from one class to another. It is being placed upon those who derive their incomes from dividends and who will suffer from the system of double taxation. Had it not been for the extravagance of the present government, reductions could have been made in this direction some two years ago. I trust that the reduction in postage will not be seized upon as an excuse to cancel the order in council of October last directing the Civil Service Commission to regard favourably the application made by employees of the postal service for an upward revision of their salaries. This is badly needed by the postal service employees in the cities, owing to the fact that rent and living expenses are much higher in these centres than in rural Canada.

In the election of 1921, in the by-elections of 1923, and again in the general election of October last, the main issue of the compaign was the tariff, and to illustrate the change of sentiment among the people I may point out that whereas in 1921 the late Hon. W. C. Kennedy carried what is now East and West Essex by a majority of 7,195 votes, that majority in the by-election of March 1, 1923, for the same territory, was cut down to 1,072, while in the recent election held on October 29 West Essex was carried by a majority of 2,521 in favour of the Conservative candidate, the other two Essexes also voting in support of the Conservative policy.

The border cities, and especially the city of Windsor, have grown more rapidly in the past ten years than any other part of the Dominion, but I regret to say that this growth has been at the expense of the rest of Canada. There are coming to Windsor every day hundreds from the prairie provinces and the west and from the Maritimes, and these people either acquire homes or rent their houses. If therefore they cannot find employment in Windsor and vicinity they are obliged to go to the other side, especially their sons and daughters. So that it is only a matter of time in most cases until whole families drift over to the United States.

Referring to the want of sufficient tariff protection, Messrs R. G. Dun and Company last year reported that fifty-four industries in the border cities had either closed their doors or failed in business. Let me mention a few instances to show how the border cities have suffered for the want of adequate tariff protection.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Mr. McKENZIE: Did R. G. Dun and Company report that it was for want of tariff protection.

Mr. ROBINSON: I did not say that.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood you to say that.

Mr. ROBINSON: No, I did not say that. The Fisher Body Company had a plant manufacturing automobile bodies at Walkerville. This plant closed its doors at the end of 1924. The company's capital investment amounted to $1,700,000 and they employed 950 hands, 95 per cent of whom were good Canadian citizens, the other 5 per cent being of foreign birth. Nearly all of these men have gone over to Detroit to find employment in automobile body plants there. The work in this plant comprised woodworking, metal stamping, body assembling, plate glass pressing, painting and trimming, while the imports consisted generally of body steel sheets, gum lumber, and plate glass. These commodities could not be purchased in Canada. The reason this concern closed its doors was the fact that they could not compete, especially for the foreign trade, with similar industries operating in the United States under mass production.

General Motors established themselves in Canada during the war with a capital expenditure of over $2,000,000 in land, plant and machinery, but they have not turned a wheel in the past two years. They employed from 1,200 to 2,000 men, making the engines, rear axles, and so forth, for the automobile industry. Not having sufficient protection, they found that their branches on the other side, by reason of mass production and lower overhead expense, could absorb the duty and export from Detroit under a tariff of 27½ per cent, whereas the duty on the complete automobile was 35 per cent. Had the duty on engines, rear axles and other parts manufactured by them been 35 per cent, the same as on the car, they could have continued operations in Walkerville, employing probably more men than formerly. The manager when closing the concern said, "We will be back some day when the Canadians wake up."

Let me cite another industry which is suffering from inadequate protection, a paint and varnish concern in Windsor. This company was kept busy supplying paints, varnishes and so forth for the agricultural machinery industry in Canada, but since the duty has been taken off materials entering into the manufacture of agricultural implements, the Windsor company has been seriously injured. The manager, when soliciting an order, was shown the prices quoted from Chicago and was told that if he could meet those prices he might have the order. This was impossible and in consequence that business is lost to the Canadian industry; the orders for paints for agricultural machinery now go to the United States.

Another industry that many hon. members may not be familiar with is the Canadian Steel Corporation of Ojibway. I know whereof I am speaking for I am a member of the council of the incorporated town. It may be news to them to know that this institution has spent some $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 in completing their immense dock, railway tracks and sidings, blast furnaces, machine shops, and other buildings, which, owing to the lack of a stable fiscal policy and of sufficient protection to warrant their completing their work and manufacturing in this country, have been at a standstill for the past five years.

Last year there was imported into Canada $150,000,000 worth of iron and steel products, mostly since the tariff has been taken off such articles as enter into the manufacture of agricultural machinery. It is customary to measure the business activity of an industrial country in terms of steel and iron production. The steel and iron industry in this country has been passing through a severe depression, thanks largely to the action of the King government. When the duties on agricultural implements were reduced, the King government, in order to pacify the manufacturers of agricultural implements, cut the duty on steel and iron. This basic industry as a result has been hard hit and transferred to the United States.

The authoritative magazine of the industry on this continent is the Iron Age. Discussing the situation this paper says:

> Canada's steel industry is passing through one of the most trying periods in its history. The July pig iron output of only 21,000 gross tons was the smallest since monthly records were started in 1917. Only 73 tons of basic iron were made, compared with 38,600 tons in June. The steel output of 22,400 tons in July was the smallest since October of last year. The July figures represent a decline of 66 per cent in pig iron and 78 per cent in steel from the outputs in May. While March and May showed the largest output in both pig iron and steel since May, 1924, the average rate of the first half of the year is less than in any year since the war. Meanwhile, Canadian consumption of rolled steel from the United States is growing apace. June and July shipments from the United States amounted to 92,000 tons, or an average of 46,000 tons a month, as against an average of but little over 20,000 tons a month in the first five months of the year 1925.

The Iron Age's statement is an admission that the King government has by its attitude to this industry practically transferred Canada's steel and iron business across the line.

The following official figures from Ottawa are illuminating:

Comparative Industrial Pay-rolls in Canada by Department of Labour

	Under Mr. Meighen's administration 1920	Under Mr. King's administration 1924
Agricultural implements.. .	$ 13,894,561	$ 8,678,706
Steel and pig iron..	20,728,447	7,211,716
Castings and foundings.. ..	27,847,249	20,759,935
Railroad rolling stock.. ..	18,834,322	13,482,632
Total Canadian industries ..	$132,885,132	$99,613,638 or $33,000,000 less

Comparative Sales of Canadian-Made Goods

Agricultural implements.. .	$ 50,301,302	$ 24,773,648
Steel and pig iron..	138,382,823	33,687,178
Castings and foundings.. ..	99,892,583	58,014,378
Railroad rolling stock.. ..	60,359,520	44,795,097
All Canadian industries ..	$640,233,785	$368,476,850 or $272,000,000 less

Is it any wonder with figures such as these we have business failures and that hundreds of thousands of our workers had to leave the country? The figures prove better than anything else the contrast between Mr. Meighen's 1920 administration and Mr. King's 1924. Mr. King said that the cost of living was outrageously high and his policy would greatly reduce it. The Labour department of his own government at Ottawa tells us that in 1922 the average cost of 236 commodities gave an index number of 152.7, while in 1925 this index number grew to 158.8. In other words, it has cost the people of Canada 4 per cent more to live upon imported goods under low tariffs than it did to buy home-made goods under protective tariffs, and this higher cost must be paid from greatly reduced incomes and increased taxes. This expenditure of Mr. King further has lost to the farmers alone their share of 33 millions reduction in pay-rolls; the railroads have been deprived of hauling 272 millions of finished goods, not to mention the carrying of a whole army of commercial travellers who have been compelled to reduce travelling to a minimum because of slack in the demand for their goods. Is it not astonishing in this century of science and in this country of supposedly level-headed people that such a blunder should have been permitted. The loss of $33,000,000 in wages would mean 22,000 workmen thrown out of employment at the rate of wages of $1,500 per year.

The farmers of Essex county are also suffering from unfair competition with early vegetables and fruits from the United States, especially those who grow under glass. When their product is ready for the market they have to compete with the surplus from the more southern districts of the United States. I maintain that they are entitled to protection, especially during the season when the better quality of Canadian products is ready for the market.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me make some reference to what Australia and the United States have done under a protective tariff. During the last four years the United States has experienced unprecedented prosperity. Heretofore in my memory Canada has always shared in that prosperity. We may have been six months later in getting it, but we were always six months later when a depression came along, as well. President Coolidge in his message to congress on December 6, 1923, said:

> The present tariff law has accomplished its two main objects; it has secured an abundant revenue and been productive of an abounding prosperity. Under it the country has had a very large export and import trade. A constant revision of the tariff by the congress is disturbing and harmful. The present law contains an elastic provision authorizing the president to increase or decrease present schedules not in excess of 50 per centum to meet the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. This does not, to my mind, warrant a rewriting of the whole law, but does mean, and will be so administered, that whenever the required investigation shows that inequalities of sufficient importance exist in any schedule, the power is authorized to make adjustments.

I have the report of a speech made by Sir James Elder, before the board of directors of the Canadian National Exhibition last September. This is what he has to say regarding the tariff in Australia:

> "Australia is now riding on the crest of a phenomenal wave of prosperity, and the wheels of industry are spinning as never before, so much so that the people of Australia are fast being relieved of the heavy burdens of taxation. Protection has been the one cause of Australia's wonderful success in the interchange of trade with the other countries."
> Sir James declared that during the past three years Australia had reduced her war debt by over $110,000,000, while the aggregate federal debt had been decreased to the extent of $200,000,000. Australia had not only reduced her public debt, but the government was seized of the importance of relieving the people of heavy income taxation and four reductions had been made since 1914, the present tax being on the basis of pre-war days, plus 20 per cent, and further reductions were contemplated in the very near future.

I claim that if protection and an increase in the tariff has done so much for the United States and Australia, Canada should adopt the same principle and we would experience unprecedented prosperity.

I would just like to touch on the question of taxation. As everyone knows, this country is overburdened with taxation, and under the present government there seems small chance for relief. In Ontario we have municipal, provincial, and Dominion taxes, twenty in all as follows:

Real estate.
Business tax (Corporation).
City income tax.
Federal income tax.
Cheque tax.
Gasoline tax.
Automobile tax, sales and license.
Sales tax.
Real estate transfer.
Amusement tax.
Stock transfer.
Excise tax on beer.
Sleeping and parlour car tax.
Business tax to province, to provincial secretary.
Manufacturing license to Ottawa.
Tax on notes and overdrafts.
Matches.
Playing cards.
Tobacco.
Workmen's compensation tax.

I claim that if Canada had raised her tariff instead of reducing it as she has done five times in as many years, we would have been able to reduce our taxation the same as the other English-speaking countries have done. President Coolidge says:

> There is a limit to the taxing power of a state beyond which increased rates produce decreased revenue. If that be exceeded, intangible securities and other personal property become driven out of its jurisdiction, industry cannot meet its less burdened competitors, and no capital will be found for enlarging old or starting new enterprises. Such a condition means first stagnation, then decay and dissolution. There is before us a danger that our resources may be taxed out of existence and our prosperity destroyed.

Just a word or two in connection with immigration. It is almost universally agreed in this country that instead of spending millions of money to bring immigrants to this country, such money would be better spent in the application of some scheme to keep farmers' sons at home. I have this suggestion to make, that where there is no room on the farm for the sons when they grow up, they should be assisted in establishing themselves as farmers, under a scheme such as that which was employed in connection with soldiers' civil re-establishment.

I have been several times in the United States consul's office in Windsor, which office has had to take larger quarters to enable them to take care of the rush for vises to enter the United States. A large majority of these applicants are from the farms or the small towns in Canada, and, I am sure they would welcome some encouragement to establish themselves in this country as farmers. There seems to be no let up to the emigration from Canada if one is to judge by the birth certificates required from the Ontario government and the crowds at the United States consul's offices. The number of vises issued at Windsor to native born Canadian citizens during the period from January 1 to April 30, 1926, with similar figures for the same period of 1925 given for the purpose of comparison, is as follows:

	1925	1926
January..	260	262
February..	219	295
March..	294	540
April 1 to 30..	235	514
	1,008	1,611

The London Free Press of April 17 of this year states as follows:

A larger number of Canadians have been passed through the office of the American consul in London this week than in any previous week since the beginning of the vise regulations on July 1, 1924. This week 170 Canadian-born people have left London and the six counties of this consular district for the United States. The week previous the figure was 114.

Unemployment and the lack of a satisfactory guarantee of steady employment is said by the consul, G. R. Taggart, to be the reason generally given by the applicants for vises. Another reason is said to be the lack of diversity of employment.

I have been asked many times why a car made in Canada costs so much more than one made in United States. From the Dodge factory in Toronto I have secured a statement showing how each hundred dollars of the increase is apportioned. The statement is as follows:

1. Duty paid Canadian government on import of raw materials, $35.05.

2. Increase in Canadian dealer's commission over United States dealers, due to increased investments and lessened sales field, $24.

3. Increased cost of materials purchased from Canadian vendors over and above the replacement of same from the United States due to Canadian increased cost of producing, $17.02.

4. Entering our purchase price on parts supplied by parent plant is a charge enforced by Canadian government in establishing a fair market value, $8.65.

5. Increase in Canadian direct labour cost, occassioned by smaller production, which production does not warrant the installation of improved labour-saving devices, $2.08.

6. Overhead expense, which can only be reduced to the United States overhead minimum by volume of production, which is at present impossible in Canada, $6.51.

7. Selling and commercial expenses which are occassioned by a lessened prospect ratio of sales, $6.69.

The Minister of Finance, at page 1647 of Hansard says:

While we all admit that Canada has more taxes than we would like to have, and more taxes than we had prior to the entry of Canada and of the whole world into the war, nevertheless Canada is not taxed to a degree that would induce any of our citizens to leave Canada and go and live in some other country.

This is not in accordance with the facts. A British subject whose income is earned and whose business is in the United States, while residing with his family in the border cities, where this whole American income is spent, is penalized for doing so. As an example, take a man who is a large owner and the general manager of a business, and who purchases and maintains a motor car for his use in the conduct of his business. Such a car is listed as an asset on the books of the corporation, and its operation is charged to the expense account so that its ownership can be very easily proved. Through an arbitrary and inflexible ruling of the Customs department many such persons have been forced over a period of years to pay customs tariff on cars so owned for the privilege of expediting passage from one's office to his residence. On the other hand to avoid paying such duty these persons could have an office boy—an American—drive them back and forth by bonding the car, as many Americans do, thus contributing not one penny in the shape of taxes, part of which would go towards helping to build and maintain these roads. Further, while spending no part of their income in Canada, they can drive their cars twenty-four hours a day for six months in the year, which is the period of the bonding limit. This is the grossly unfair feature of the regulation.

For the privilege of residing and spending one's whole American income in Canada, one is further forced to pay tribute in the shape of taxation, which, by comparison with the present rate in the United States, is excessive, the Canadian tax being approximately four or five times as large as one would pay to the United States government. From my personal knowledge, I could name dozens of well-to-do Canadian citizens who have moved to the United States owing to the comparatively heavy taxes in Canada.

The recent departmental ruling in regard to the stamp tax on cheques drawn on American banks is very unpopular with the banks in the border cities, and I presume it is the same at other international boundary points. Border cities bank managers positively know of Canadian firms, as well as American branch companies located in the border cities, who maintain accounts in Detroit banks on account of the stamp tax on cheques in general, and particularly because of the stamp tax on cheques drawn on American banks.

I would like to point out another fact that has developed, and which has been found to be most irritating to customers of the border cities banks, and that is that very frequently American cheques deposited by bank customers in the border cities, after stamps were affixed and the cheques forwarded to Detroit for collection, were returned for various reasons unpaid, and the stamps detached before reaching the Canadian banks who had forwarded them. The result is that if Canadian banks are requested to reforward these cheques the customer is obliged to pay again the stamp tax, because the stamps must reasonably be affixed. I was told by one bank manager that a concern in Detroit had a deposit of quarter of a million dollars in a Canadian bank, and that the whole amount was withdrawn on account of this tax.

Before I take my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate you on your reappointment to the high office you have held since 1922. I am a new member of this House, and for that reason I am not much versed in the intricacies of parliamentary procedure, but since the session began I have been greatly impressed with the fairness and impartiality which at all times Your Honour has exhibited.

On motion of Mr. Fraser the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

Tuesday, May 18, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Second report of the select standing committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—Mr. Cahill.

VICTORIA DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): By leave of the House I beg to propose the following motion which, if it does not meet with unanimous approval, may stand as a notice:

That when this House adjourns on Friday, the twenty-first instant, it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, the twenty-fifth instant.

Motion agreed to.

POWER DEVELOPMENT ON THE ST. LAWRENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask my right hon. friend the leader of the House whether he has noticed the statement contained in this morning's papers to the effect that New York interests are seeking to make a very large development of power on the St. Lawrence, and that the consent of the government of Canada would first have to be obtained for any such development. Has any application for consent been made to the government?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has been the first to draw the matter to my attention. I am not aware of any application of the kind having been made to the government. If any should be made, it will be dealt with in accordance with the policy laid down by the government at a previous session.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I would like to draw the attention of the government to a despatch from New York appearing in yesterday's Ottawa papers, as follows:

Licenses for the development of water power on the St. Lawrence river involving an expenditure of more than $200,000,000 will be granted soon to the Frontier Power Corporation of America, the Herald-Tribune learns. Although no official announcement has been made, the paper says that members of the state power commission have decided to ignore the threat of Governor Smith to make public development of water power the greatest issue in the state, and are ready to support the project of the Frontier Corporation which is a subsidiary of the Aluminum Company of America, the Dupont De Nemours Company and the General Electric Company.

Having regard to the very great importance of the question of development power on the St. Lawrence, has this matter of the proposed development in the state of New York been brought to the attention of the government, and are the government taking any steps to protect Canadian interests in this connection?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This has been brought to the attention of the government by my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) who is now leading the opposition. He mentioned it a few moments ago and the member for East Algoma will find my reply in Hansard tomorrow. It will, I think, answer his question.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the Toronto Star contains an article to the effect that the Home Bank depositors have not been able to get their 35 per cent because some of them have not enough influence with this government. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the statement is true; and, if so, will he see that this condition is remedied?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that influence or the absence of influence will not have any effect in this matter. I understand that recently some of the depositors met to consider the position in which they find themselves, and that they are coming to Ottawa to make certain representations as to their claims. As soon as those representations have been heard I shall be in a better position to tell my hon. friend their substance.

TARIFF ADVISORY BOARD

REPRESENTATION OF THE PUBLIC AT HEARINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE SPENCE (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the government, and particularly that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday, headed, "Tariff board to hear plea of steel firms." This is the article:

> Of several appeals already before the advisory board on tariff and taxation, the first to be considered will be those originating from two Canadian steel companies—the Algoma Steel Corporation and the British Empire Steel Corporation Limited. These applications will be taken up by the board at a meeting to be held in Ottawa on Wednesday, May 26, at 10.30 a.m.
> The applications from the two companies named are based upon the incidence of tariff on various phases of the Canadian steel industry, with special reference to drawbacks, unequal costs, depreciated currency and several other factors.

Manifestly, Sir, this is only the forerunner of many such applications, and what I want to know is this: As a humble citizen and one of the great consuming public of this Dominion, how am I going to be represented before that commission? Has the government made provision for such purpose? If not, why not?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The department received applications from two steel companies, if I remember correctly, desiring to be heard before the tariff board. I referred these applications in the regular way to Right Hon. Mr. Graham, chairman of the board, who told me that he was going to fix a day when there would be a general hearing, and all the steel interests of Canada and those interested either for or against a higher tariff would have an opportunity of coming before the board and making their representations. I am sure Mr. Graham will be as glad to hear my hon. friend as to hear any other citizen of Canada.

SENATE VACANCY—MR. LOGAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. T. MacNUTT (Colchester): In view of the statement made by Mr. Logan of Cumberland, Nova Scotia, at a meeting a short time ago in the town of Parrsboro, to the effect that he had received an appointment to the Canadian Senate, at which meeting he received the congratulations of the mayor of that town and others, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if that statement is correct.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not aware of any such statement having been made. Mr. Logan has not made that statement to me. When he does so I will give my hon. friend a further answer.

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask if the long awaited report from the Civil Service Commission to the government is ready for publication, and if the government have come to a decision in regard to the matter.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend knows, Mr. Speaker, a sub-committee of the council was appointed to consider the report from the Civil Service Commission, and a number of representatives of the civil servants, both of the inside and outside services, asked to be heard before that committee. They were heard, and requested that the report be not acted upon at present, but that it be referred back to the Civil Service Commission in order to permit them, the civil servants affected, to make further representations. They contended that they had not had the opportunity to make the representations they would have liked to make before the Civil Service Commission, and asked that this opportunity be now given them. The government has thought it advisable to meet their request in that regard and the report is being referred back to be dealt with when the commission is reconstituted.

PROPOSED NEW LINE TO PACIFIC

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. DeWITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): On May 14, after drawing attention to an article appearing in the Canadian Gazette of London regarding a new line to the Pacific coast, I asked whether representations had been made by the Canadian Pacific looking to the acquisition of that line. The Prime Minister referred the question to the Minister of Railways, who on Monday said that the department had no information. Am I to understand that he speaks for all the departments of the government in making that reply?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have not had an opportunity of consulting all my colleagues in regard to the matter. I answered the question so far as it related to the Department of Railways. I do not find around me anyone who has more information than I have in connection with this matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DISCLOSURE OF CERTAIN INFORMATION REGARDING OPERATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. DeWITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): I asked another question in reference to the purchase by the Canadian National Railways of an electric line running from about Moreau street to Bout de l'Ile, to which the minister replied that the railway has been acquired for general railway purposes, but that the management considers it not in the public interest to publish the price. Am I to understand that information as to the price will be given at a later date, in committee or at some other time, or is this a final refusal to give the House this information?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): It is my practice, and has, I believe, been the practice of former ministers to refer inquiries relating to Canadian National matters to the management of that company. Many questions have been asked and are being asked about which it has not been considered in the public interest to give detailed information. I think the House is fairly familiar with past practices in that regard. However, I have on the order paper a notice of motion regarding the appointment of a special committee with respect to government railways. When that committee is sitting the officers of the Canadian National Railways will be present and any question which has not been previously answered satisfactorily may then be directed to the officials of the railway. I cannot guarantee that an answer will be returned in every case, because everyone knows that in a great business institution it is not always the part of wisdom to make public all information and details regarding its operation. I feel sure the committee will straighten out matters of that kind, and my hon. friend will be satisfied.

[Mr. Foster.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I realize very well that we cannot discuss this matter at present, but I would hesitate very much in believing that the minister is now stating the considered policy of the government. So far this House has never been refused in the answers to questions on the orders of the day information as to capital purchases. It will be a very startling proposition indeed if that policy is to be carried on in the future.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I think this is really a matter of some public importance, and I therefore put it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friends insist I will move the adjournment of the House in order to discuss this matter of public importance.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must be allowed to conclude his question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought so. Having pointed out the importance of this matter I was about to ask if that is the considered policy of the government. Are proper questions, properly put, involving no question of management or of operation but relating to capital account, not to be answered in this House? That is the question.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is surely making a mountain out of a mole hill; I made no such statement of general policy on behalf of the government. I told the hon. gentleman who asked the question how he might get the information with which he has not already been supplied. So far as the general question is concerned I think probably something is to be said for the position taken by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). Speaking offhand, I cannot think of a circumstance which would involve the refusal of information as to capital purchases. Perhaps my hon. friend will take my assurance that there is no intention on the part of the government to introduce a change of policy in regard to this matter.

Mr. O. B. PRICE (Westmorland): Just in this connection, I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that within the last two or three weeks I had a question placed on the order paper regarding the amount of tonnage handled by the Canadian National Railways at St. John,

New Brunswick and at Portland, which I wished for comparative purposes. The answer given was that it is not in the interests of the railway to divulge that information. Now I wish to point out that the Prime Minister of this country, speaking at Moncton, New Brunswick, on October 13, 1921, promised that if returned to power—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. PRICE: I want to ask—

Mr. SPEAKER: No debate can take place at this stage. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. PRICE: I would like the privilege of asking the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) if he proposes to continue the attitude which he has assumed with regard to this matter and also with regard to other matters which are coming up concerning the people's railway. I would like to know if it is his intention to give this House the information to which it is entitled and to which the country is entitled, or if he proposes to continue to refuse—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PRICE: I want to know, are you going to give me the information or are you not?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no intention, Mr. Speaker, neither has the government any intention, of withholding from this House any information to which it is entitled upon any matter whatsoever. This particular matter has been attended with difficulty ever since this country entered upon the railway business. Previous ministers of railways on both sides of the House have had the same difficulty with it, as the records of Hansard will demonstrate.

As to how far it is wise to make public through the medium of this House the details of the business of the Canadian National Railways, for the benefit of the competitors of the government railways, is a question which I have constantly to endeavour to decide, just as previous ministers of railways have had to decide it in relation to all matters of this kind. I may make errors, but they will be honest errors.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOYS: This is a speech, not an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. minister is quite in order. Three questions have been put to him, one by the hon. member for Kings-Hants (Mr. Foster) another by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and another by the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price), all bearing on the relation between the government and the Canadian National Railways. The minister is trying to convey to the House what was the policy followed by previous ministers with regard to such matters. But I would suggest, if the House will take it from me, that it stop this debate at once and proceed to business.

Mr. DUNNING: May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to finish my answer?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Commence it.

Mr. DUNNING: I may err in judgment as to what it would be against the interests of the railway to make public, but I can assure the House that it will be my endeavour at all times to make public the maximum of information which can be made public without detriment to the real interests of the Canadian people and their interests in this railway.

Mr. PRICE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

DISMISSAL OF MR. ALEX. D. KING

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): I should like to inquire from the Acting Postmaster General in this House with respect to a motion I placed on the order paper early in the session calling for the production of documents in connection with the dismissal of Mr. Alex. D. King, postmaster of Oxford, in the county of Cumberland, Nova Scotia. This order was passed by the House on the 15th of March, but the papers have not yet been tabled. May I inquire when I may expect them?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I shall be pleased to make the necessary inquiry, but I should not be surprised if the papers had already been tabled.

Mr. SMITH: They have not been tabled yet.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will see.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, May 17, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A.

Robb (Minister of Finance), that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): Mr. Speaker, there was a time in Canadian politics when the attitude of government and opposition was so partisan, so uncompromising, that neither could predicate any virtue of the other. Both were agreed that so far as the other was concerned "no good could ever come out of Nazareth." In those days it was considered an unpardonable political crime for a member sitting in opposition to think that the government could ever be right, and it were veritable treason for a supporter of the government to imagine that the government could ever be wrong. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to no such view. In this House I give my allegiance to the Conservative party, because I have faith in that party; in its policies and its principles, and because I have faith in its leader, who, for constancy of purpose, and rare gifts of intellect, has certainly no equal in this parliament, and perhaps has had no peer in any parliament that Canada has had since confederation. But these considerations shall deter me never from discussing questions of great national importance in a manner devoid of prejudice and with an eye single to my country's good, as it is given me to discern that good. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am guilty of no serious political heresy when my first words on the budget are words of sincere congratulation to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) upon the masterly manner in which he presented his budget to parliament. I am happy to be able to add that my congratulations may properly extend beyond the mere external form in which that budget was presented, for there are many things in the budget itself with which I am heartily in accord.

We are told, for example, that the financial condition of this country has improved. I do not question that statement; I do not desire to dispute it. As long as it is my privilege to occupy a seat in this House, any information to the effect that our country's finances are in an improved state wil be received by me with genuine pleasure and acclaim, no matter of what political stripe the Finance minister may be who makes that announcement.

The present budget also gives promise of a somewhat substantial reduction in taxation. This laudable and desirable end is to be obtained, in the main, by the reduction in the sales tax and the abolition of certain other nuisance taxes, for the most part imposed by the present administration upon the Canadian people. In taking this step the government but does belated justice to the Canadian taxpayer. It but removes from his path a few of the snags and thorns with which this administration has bestrewn his path since assuming office in 1921. When the administration led by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) who, unfortunately, due to illness, is unable to take his place in this House at the present time, went out of office in 1921, the sales tax in this country stood at 1½ per cent to the manufacturer and 1½ per cent to the jobber. In the first year of the King administration that tax was increased to four and a half per cent. In the second year of their administration the King government, not content with that increase, further increased the sales tax to six per cent. This unwarranted and unjustifiable increase served to seriously hamper and impede Canadian business in this country. So numerous were the protests against this excessive increase that in 1924 the King administration reduced the tax from six to five per cent where it remained until the present reduction was announced. There can be no doubt that the serious, the heavy, increase in direct taxation imposed by this administration upon the Canadian people since 1921 constituted one of the major grievances of the people against the King government during the last federal election and, perhaps, Sir, in the salutary and chastening effect of the last election we may seek and find the real explanation of those reductions in taxation now so tardily announced, for verily, in the case of all governments, the fear of the people is the beginning of wisdom.

The budget proposes that after the first of January, 1927, the benefits of the British preferential tariff shall apply only to goods conveyed direct without trans-shipment into a sea or river port of Canada. I am in hearty accord with this proposal. It is a step in the right direction, and I commend the government for taking it. I point out, however, that trade statistics for 1924 show that in that year we imported British goods to the amount of $153,586,000. Of that amount $152,586,000 worth came directly through Canadian ports. If these figures are correct this proposal will apply to substantially less than one per cent of the goods coming from Great Britain to Canada, consequently it will not mean a great revival in trade or commercial activity through Canadian ports. However, it is a step in the right direction, and since it is not often that this government takes a step in the right direction, I heartily commend it.

We had a protracted and somewhat heated discussion over the proposal to reduce the duty on automobiles. Let me say, Sir, that I hold no special brief for the automobile industry in Canada. My attitude towards that industry is essentially the same attitude that I take towards every other great and useful industry. My desire is that it may prosper and develop, returning fair dividends to those who have invested their money in it, providing a continuity of employment and living wages for Canadian workmen, and giving fair prices to the Canadian public. What measure of protection will enable that industry to perform these functions I am unable to say, and no other member in this House, whether he be opponent or supporter of the government, can so determine without first having a full knowledge of all the facts relating to that industry. The only way these facts can be ascertained and a just and intelligent decision arrived at is by referring the question of the protection to be accorded that industry to a competent and impartial fact finding commission endowed by the government with all the necessary powers to investigate, and to furnish parliament with a report based on such investigation. Even in ordinary circumstances this would have been the proper course for this government to pursue, but, Sir, I submit that in the present instance the government can adopt no other course without forfeiting its dignity, its honour and its self respect. For in the Speech from the Throne the government adopted the policy of investigation by a tariff commission. I quote from the publicly declared policy of the government, incorporated in that speech —and perhaps the right hon. leader of the government will recognize this quotation:

> —that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes; that changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto.

This language, Mr. Speaker, is not ambiguous; there is seemingly here no equivocation; there is certainly no qualification and no limitation. The policy of the government, namely, investigation by a tariff board, was to apply to all the industries in Canada enjoying any benefits under our protective system. By taking the course outlined in the budget with respect to the automobile industry the government completely stultifies itself, ignores its publicly promulgated policy on the fiscal question, and shamelessly breaks faith with the Canadian people. By proposing this reduction without investigation this government singles out one industry from the hundreds in this country enjoying benefits under our protective system, sits in judgment on that industry, and renders an adverse verdict without giving those affected an opportunity to be heard or to call witnesses in their own behalf. How can we square that action with our much belauded sense of British justice and of British fair play?

Now, Sir, I wish to make my stand on this question absolutely clear. Let me candidly assert that had the case of the automobile industry been referred to a tariff commission, and had a full and impartial investigation revealed that the duties should be reduced by ten or fifteen per cent—aye or by twenty per cent—I would, certainly under those circumstances have supported such a recommendation in this House. But, Sir, I shall not sanction, and I never shall support, a blind step that may seriously dislocate and perhaps ruin an important and useful Canadian industry, especially when such a blind step is taken in direct contravention of the government's publicly declared policy on the fiscal question. I may point out that those who aid and abet this administration in violating its plighted word to the Canadian people do no very great credit to themselves; and no real service to this government. Nothing will more effectively destroy respect for all constituted authority in this or in any other country than for a government, the very embodiment of that authority, to treat with wanton disregard its plighted word and deliberately break faith with the country. These, I might say, are testing days for constituted authority, not only in our country, but the world over. Men are to be found even in Canada who would desire to bring all constituted authority into popular contempt. Whoever else may assist these misguided souls in their nefarious work, they certainly should not have their cause advanced by the actions of the government of Canada. Whatever else a government may or may not do, it certainly should not violate its plighted word, or disregard its publicly declared policy. Faith must be kept with the people if constituted authority is to be respected by the people. I commend that proposition to the present government.

There is yet another aspect of this question, and one that I approach with very great diffidence and reluctance. I apprehend that the attack on the protective system made in contravention of the government's fiscal policy, on an industry located in Ontario, a province having no effective voice in the government, may cause a repetition of those lamentable provincial and racial prejudices from which Canada has suffered in the past, and which all true Canadians must deplore. I might say, without wishing to re-open old sores, that there was a time, when the great English-speaking province of Ontario, and the equally great French-speaking province of Quebec were separated by a gulf created by misunderstanding and prejudice. We all know something of the difficulties which statesmen from both of these great provinces experienced in their efforts to reconcile differences in the legislative union of upper and lower Canada. It was to overcome an impasse created by prejudice that the statesmen from both provinces conceived the idea of effecting the larger union of 1867. Even after confederation was achieved the greatest difficulty which confronted Canadian statesmen was to reconcile the rival claims of the different provinces, different races and different creeds. To accomplish this great ideal Sir John A. Macdonald laboured long, faithfully and successfully. Shortly after he passed from the political stage in this country his work was taken up by a no less distinguished Canadian, a French Canadian, the great and gifted Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We know well with what reluctance Sir Wilfrid Laurier accepted the leadership of his own party. He feared that his race and creed might interfere with his party's chances for success at the polls, but Sir Wilfrid Laurier triumphed over prejudice. He had not advanced far on his brilliant career before his name became respected in all, and revered in thousands of, English speaking homes in every province of this Dominion. Sir Wilfried Laurier won and retained the confidence of English speaking Canadians, because he was ever willing to concede to other provinces, to other races and to other creeds that same measure of justice that he desired for his own. If he were alive to-day and leading this government—and I imagine in their hearts hon. gentlemen must feel that they are experiencing a great loss because he is not here, and sometimes when they contrast Sir Wilfrid with their present leader, they must "sigh for the touch of that vanished hand and the sound of that voice that is still"—if he were alive to-day and leading this government, would he advance or sanction a measure, the effect of which is to deny to one of Ontario's important industries the same treatment which this government concedes to all other protected industries in all other provinces of Canada? He certainly would not countenance such a thing, and I appeal to the representatives of Quebec, you who followed and revered him, not to sanction by your support an injustice which Sir Wilfrid Laurier would certainly have scorned to perpetrate. I do not say, Sir, nor do I believe that it was the voice of Quebec which compelled the government to mete out unequal treatment to an Ontario industry. We may shrewdly guess from whence the pressure came. It probably came from a small coterie of well-meaning theorists in the Liberal and Progressive ranks who preach free trade in respect to all commodities, but show their good sense by limiting its practical application to a single ingredient of a rich man's cocktail. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is alleged by those who support the government in reducing the duty on automobiles that public sentiment favoured such a reduction. If public sentiment is to determine the fiscal policy of this country, then it follows, as necessary corollary to that argument, that in cases where public sentiment favours an upward revision of the tariff, such increases should also be made without reference to the tariff board.

4 p.m.

This brings me directly to the case of the two great basic industries of my native province, steel and coal. There is a strong public sentiment in Nova Scotia, I might almost say that there is complete unanimity among the Liberals and Conservatives in that province, in reference to the need of increased protection for both of these industries. In respect of the steel industry, the steel workers of Sydney, who number among them Liberals, Conservatives and Labour men, recently passed a resolution calling upon this government to grant increased protection to the steel industry; nor has the Liberal press in the province been silent on the subject. The Sydney Record, a very estimable paper, which is looked upon as the accredited organ of the Liberal party in the island of Cape Breton, has been printing for the last three months editorials pointing out the urgency and the desirability of increasing the duties on steel and iron products. In doing this that Liberal paper is but adopting the same editorial policy which the Conservative journals in the province of Nova Scotia have steadfastly maintained for a long time. Next to coal the steel industry is one of the most important industries in that province. Around it the city of Sydney has sprung up. That city, with a population of 25,000 souls, depends entirely upon the steel industry. If this industry should cease to operate, in a few months time grass would be growing on the streets of Sydney, and the same is virtually true of New Glasgow and Trenton in the county of Pictou. So anxious were the people of Nova Scotia to establish this steel industry that they personally subscribed about one and a half million dollars to the capital stock of the steel companies operating in that province. For the most part this stock was subscribed by men and women of limited means. It represents the accumulated earnings of years of hard work. If the government does not come to the assistance of the Nova Scotia steel industry at the present juncture to protect it from the unfair competition of foreign countries, where the currency is depreciated and labour is cheap, then that industry will in all probability go into bankruptcy. At this moment it stands trembling upon the very brink of financial collapse. Now if public sentiment permitted the government to make a departure from its fiscal policy in respect of the automobile industry, public sentiment should also allow it to make an upward revision in the tariff in the interests of iron and steel products.

I was amazed a few months ago to hear the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Antigonish) telling the House and the country from his place in parliament that he was opposed to any further increases in the duties on iron and steel products. I know, of course, that the hon. gentleman is not now representing the industrial county of Pictou; I am fully aware of the fact that he is a political exile from the county of his birth. But surely he still cherishes that fond regard for his native county which we all cherish for the place of our birth. I appeal to him, therefore, to join with the Nova Scotians who are making an effort to save the industry, even if he has to repudiate the stand which he took in this House on a certain occasion when he was making a plea for Progressive support to keep the government in power.

I do not intend to discuss at any length the coal industry of Nova Scotia and of the Dominion generally, having dealt with it extensively on previous occasions. I have discussed the subject dispassionately and have adduced irrefutable facts to show that the industry is suffering from unfair competition from the American bituminous mines. I may point out that, because of geographical advantages which they enjoy, the coal miners of the United States can turn out an average of 5.7 tons of coal per man per day while in Nova Scotia our miners can produce only 1.7. In a great many instances the United States miners can put coal on board the cars at the pit mouth in the bituminous fields at less than $1 per ton, and in almost every case they are putting coal on the cars at a lower cost than the industry in Nova Scotia pays for labour alone. When we entered confederation we were promised a market for our coal in central Canada, and that market is there. Central Canada imports easily over 15,000,000 tons of coal per annum, sending out 120,000,000 Canadian dollars to pay for its supplies obtained from the American fields, thus providing work for American miners. That market in central Canada rightly belongs to the provinces of Alberta and Nova Scotia. I say, therefore, that we need a fuel policy inaugurated and kept in force by the Dominion government to enable us to have ready access to the market that should undoubtedly be supplied by our mines.

I was interested in the speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) last night. It was one of those beautiful canned speeches which the Minister of National Defence probably sent to every Liberal candidate in Nova Scotia at the last general election. I recognized in it the fine Italian hand of the minister. I could almost visualize our opponents in the last federal election standing up in the little country schoolhouses and delivering an address substantially of the same character. Perhaps that accounts for the fact that in counties traditionally Liberal, Conservatives were elected by substantial majorities. The hon. member said that we could not look to central Canada for a market for our products. I should like the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King), who made the same statement in the Maritimes, to tell this House to-day where we could sell our coal and steel products if not in the markets of central Canada. I have gone thoroughly into the question and I may assure the government that if we are precluded from the markets of central Canada we shall be able to work our coal mines only two days a week while our steel industry will operate for just a day and three-quarters in the week. Central Canada is our natural and rightful market for the steel and coal products of the province of Nova Scotia, and it is upon these two industries that the prosperity of agriculture in that province depends. If we are given an opportunity to develop these industries we can provide an ample home market for the farm products of Nova Scotia.

I shall refer now for a moment to a matter that interests my own constituency peculiarly, and having discussed it I shall have done. Some hon. gentlemen think that all the coal areas in Nova Scotia are owned and controlled by the British Empire Steel Corporation. For their information let me say that in the county which I have the privilege and the honour to represent in this House, however feebly, we have extensive virgin coal fields. We have, it is estimated, over 2,000,000,000 tons of coal available in the county. At present capitalists cannot be induced to undertake the development of the industry for the simple reason that we have not enough protection to induce them to invest. The result is that in my county we have only one small mine working, employing about 450 men and producing about 600 tons of coal a day, whereas if we had an adequate measure of protection and cheaper transportation which would enable us to take advantage of the markets of central Canada we could produce in that county, not 600 but 20,000 tons daily. One reason why we have so far been unable to develop these coal areas is the fact that we have been denied, both by Liberal and by Conservative governments, adequate transportation facilities in the county. We have had in this parliament during the present session a discussion on the Hudson Bay railway. From my place in this House I told the representatives of western Canada that if I were convinced that the railway would assist in developing that great western country it would certainly have my support. I still maintain that attitude, and I intend to support the measure on the terms which I suggested. But I think I am within my rights in asking these same people, in view of my sympathy with their transportation requirements, that they take the same attitude towards the transportation needs of the county I represent. We require the construction of a railroad of some sixty miles from the town of Inverness to Cheticamp to open up one of the most highly mineralized sections of Nova Scotia and, indeed, of the Dominion. I know it would be useless to ask the government to provide a million dollars in the estimates to construct this road inasmuch as I have no Progressive support to offer them; but I am going to appeal to the leader of the government, who, however much we may disagree with him and his government on his policies, is after all a Canadian and wants to see every section of the country prosperous. He has appointed a commission to investigate Maritime rights. That commission will be going to the province of Nova Scotia and I would ask that it be instructed to visit the county of Inverness to look into the transportation needs of that district. It is only a small thing I ask of him, and I think that in justice to the people whom I represent he will certainly not deny it.

[Mr. Macdougall.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given expression to my objections to the budget. I agree with some of its features, but I cannot bring myself to support the budget because it gives no material assistance to the basic industries of the province of Nova Scotia—the industries of steel and coal.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I say at once how much I regret that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is prevented through illness from being in his seat to-day. My right hon. friend is not one who lightly abandons any duty which pertains to his office, and I am sure it is very much against his will that he is not now in the House. I sincerely hope that his indisposition may be of brief duration, and I know I speak for all on this side of the House when I say that we shall be glad indeed to join with his friends opposite in extending to him a very hearty welcome back at the earliest possible moment.

Perhaps my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Macdougall) will not deem me guilty of discourtesy if I do not attempt to comment seriatim upon the various points he made in the course of his address, but rather deal with them incidentally as I develop what I have to say this afternoon. May I say to him, however, in passing, that notwithstanding some personalities, which I do not think added at all to his speech, his presentation this afternoon was very worthy of one who comes into this House as a new member and addresses it for the first time.

I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that the absence of my right hon. friend is as significant at this moment as it might have been had this debate not now been in progress for over a month. I believe that everything which could be said by my right hon. friend has already been expressed by those who sit around him. I admit that he would probably have added some pointed and pungent remarks which would have lent zest to the course of the debate, but so far as the argument itself is concerned I think everything that could be said against the administration has been said by one or other of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I doubt if anything could be added from their point of view with reference to the merits of their side of the case as they may see it.

In the absence of my right hon. friend I shall attempt this afternoon to address my remarks especially to those criticisms which have been made against the government in a general way, and against myself in particular. I might as well begin at once by referring to the speech which I made in North York in September last, and which has been referred to so frequently in the course of this debate. Listening to the remarks of my hon. friends opposite, I take it they feel that because, in appealing to the country on September 5 last I ventured to express the hope that the government would be returned with a larger majority than it then had, and because my hopes and expectations in that particular were not realized as fully as I had wished they might be, they should now be sitting on this side while I and my party should be occupying their seats. That seems to be the essence of the criticism with reference to the remarks I made at that time. I do not think my hon. friends opposite have fully appreciated the real point of my speech in the particular to which they have so frequently referred. I was explaining to the electors of North York the reason why it seemed advisable to the government not to proceed to hold a fifth session of the then parliament, but rather to seek the return of a new parliament at an early date. I pointed out that there were strong reasons why in the national interest the government with the small majority we then had should not attempt a last session of an expiring parliament; that anything of the kind would certainly prove to be an expensive business; that the government would find it very difficult to bring forward any measure which would not be controverted by hon. gentlemen opposite and its purpose misconstrued. I also pointed out that another very serious consequence of attempting to carry on for a fifth session would be the continuance of the detraction to which, despite the improved and improving conditions in the country, we had been obliged continuously to listen during the last two sessions of that parliament. The result of further misrepresentation of conditions would, I contended, inevitably have been that the prosperity to which we were all looking forward so earnestly in the interests of our country would be impeded and delayed.

That was the theme I sought to develop, I was dwelling entirely upon the difficulty which any administration must encounter by holding on with a small majority through a last session of parliament. Indeed, as I recall the facts, at the moment, I stressed the point that in that particular Liberal administrations had taken a different attitude to that followed in previous years by Conservative administrations. I cited the fact that when the old Conservative administration of which Sir John A. Macdonald was leader had been in office for a period of eighteen years, notwithstanding the death of their great leader, hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party of the day contrived to hold on to office until the very last hour of the last day of his last parliament—that the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald was succeeded by the Hon. Sir John Abbott, that Sir John Abbott was succeeded by Sir John Thompson, who in turn was succeeded by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was succeeded by Sir Charles Tupper, who continued to hold office until the clock struck the last minute of the last day of the last session of that parliament. I drew attention to the fact that the Liberal party did not think the best interests of the country could be served by continuing to hold office in that way. I further drew attention to the fact that when Sir Robert Borden succeeded to the leadership of the Conservative party he held office for the complete five years, and that when the term was extended by mutual agreement for a year beyond that permitted by the constitution as originally drafted, he continued in office until the very end of the period alloted. That was the point which I was seeking to bring to the attention of the electors. I stated it to be my view that the country was entitled to have an opportunity to pass upon the questions of the day and return a new parliament, which coming fresh from the electorate would be able to deal with important questions in accordance with the national will as then expressed.

During the course of the general election there was another point on which I laid a great deal of stress, and I should like to remind some hon. members of it this afternoon. I took occasion, wherever I spoke, to point out what seemed to me a very great mistake that was being made by some of those who were opposed to the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite. It seemed to me that forces which should have been united were divided, and as a consequence of their division that there was a weakening of their position in the face of a common political foe. Since I have had the honour of leading this party I have stressed the importance of all groups having great interests in common joining closely together on the principles they hold in common rather than emphasizing minor differences which in turn lead to divisions that not only serve to weaken their own ranks but correspondingly to increase the strength of those whom they commonly oppose. That was my position, and I think the result of the election has shown very clearly that the position then taken, in the interests of those who have at heart some of the great, fundamental principles of Liberalism as it is known in a broad way, was amply justified. Happily, since the election I think the principle I was then emphasizing has come to be appreciated more widely throughout the country and in this House. Those who are opposed to hon. gentlemen opposite on a great question such as that which we have been discussing during the past month have seen very clearly that the interests which they have in common are much greater than the minor differences which divide them, and I must thank hon. gentlemen opposite for having helped in a most effective way to make clear the line of cleavage.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I come at once to the amendment which is before the House. In doing so I must say that I think the House was entitled to have had from hon. gentlemen opposite, in the form of an amendment to the budget, something which would be at least expressive of their own fiscal policy, that is to say, if they are really serious about it. We heard a great deal during the last election of hon. gentlemen opposite fighting for increased tariff, for higher protection, for the maintenance of an all round protective tariff and the like. The right hon. leader of the party took the position that that was the only outstanding question, and a large number of his candidates in different parts of the country stressed that point very strongly. All through this debate most of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken have laid particular emphasis on the need of a consistently maintained protective tariff, to put it in its mildest form, while some have spoken of the need for higher protection. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in a budget debate where a great issue of this kind is being discussed, hon. gentlemen opposite might have been expected to frame some statement in the form of an amendment which would have expressed an attitude they have in common. The fact that they have not done so, it seems to me, makes it perfectly clear that despite all their professions and protestations on the subject, hon. gentlemen opposite are not united on the question of all round protection.

My hon. friends opposite have been fond of pointing over to this side of the House and saying that there were members seated here who favoured protection, and they sought to have it appear that this side of the House is not of one mind on these questions of the tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends say "hear, hear.' At all events I would say that we had the courage to state our position regarding higher protection in no uncertain terms in the Speech from the Throne, and we are stating it in no uncertain terms in the resolutions which the Minister of Finance will bring in when this debate is concluded. We have unhesitatingly stated our position in a very clear and emphatic way.

But I can imagine what has happened, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance introduced his budget on a Thursday afternoon. On the following Tuesday afternoon the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) brought in the amendment now before the House. May I describe it at once as a milk and water amendment, one portending neither good nor ill, to any of the hon. gentlemen opposite, in so far as the different constituencies they represent are concerned. The amendment does not touch the vital question of tariff at all; it relates solely to a matter of procedure, nothing more or less. It leaves absolutely alone the great question in virtue of which hon. gentlemen say they should be in office.

In the days intervening between the Thursday and the following Tuesday of which I spoke, hon. gentlemen opposite had their caucus, as everyone knows. It is not for me to say what went on in that caucus; I do not pretend to know and I do not wish to know, but I can imagine very well that the right hon. leader of the party—and in this I will say that I think he is consistent and fearless in his stand—would have liked to have a resolution brought in as an amendment to the budget declaring for a consistently maintained protective tariff. No doubt he and some of his friends so expressed themselves, but when they began to look over the field and take a census of their members, they found that many gentlemen from the Maritime provinces, though they were prepared to talk about Maritime rights and to take their seats in this House on the cry of Maritime rights, were not prepared to include all round protection in the list of Maritime rights. And I think they also found that my hon. friend from South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) and some of his friends from Manitoba and others from Alberta, when they were confronted with the thought of introducing an amendment on what has been claimed to be the main issue, namely, the question of a protective tariff consistently maintained, shied away from anything of the kind, and that after a while, the more the matter was discussed the fewer they found in their ranks who were prepared to stand up and support an amendment to the budget declaring for a consistently maintained protective policy.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend is entirely mistaken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would go further, and say that I believe what I have said in regard to the Maritime provinces and in regard to Manitoba and Alberta is true also of a number of constituencies in Ontario represented by hon. gentlemen opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: Is Kitchener one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will have a word to say about Kitchener a little later on.

Now may I say, Mr. Speaker, that the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in presenting this milk and water amendment is all the more remarkable in view of the emphatic declarations made by the leader of the Conservative party during the last campaign. I will not attempt to quote these at any length, but I would like to read from the speeches delivered a few positive statements made during the recent campaign by the right hon. leader of the opposition as to the position of his party. Speaking at Wingham on September 9 my right hon. friend is reported in the Toronto Globe as having declared that—

> The basic, underlying policy which must be adopted if Canada was to recover and grow was an immediate revision of the tariff on a definitely and consistently protective basis.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The applause to which you have just listened, Mr. Speaker, emphasizes the truth of what I have said. These gentlemen are prepared loudly to applaud a sentiment of the kind, but they are not prepared to bring in an amendment which gives expression to that view.

Let me quote another statement. On September 11, speaking at Leamington, the leader of the opposition is reported, through the Canadian Press, in the Ottawa Citizen, as follows:

> The first tariff he would raise if he got into power would be the tariff on agricultural products. It was absurd that early fruits et cetera should come into Canada without contributing to the revenue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite say, "hear, hear." Then why is there no amendment to that effect? Why this milk-and-water resolution on a matter of procedure and the vital principle of the tariff left untouched?

At Halifax, as reported in the Halifax Herald, of September 15, Mr. Meighen said:

> I say now that the tariff on coal should only be increased as a part of a general policy, a real definite protective policy such as the United States have adopted, and I would stand in the way of any increase in the coal duties as a single step by itself.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The "hear, hears" are getting fewer, I notice. Then coming to Amherst, on September 19, as reported in the Montreal Star:

> Mr. Meighen told his audience that he would put the tariff on products up to that of the United States in the first three months after he was returned to power, if successful at the polls. A protective tariff was the "dominant essential in the conduct of Canadian affairs."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear." We have been in this House four or five months, and as yet they have not brought forward an expression of view along the lines their leader said he would adopt in the first three months after he was returned to power.

On September 1, speaking at Moncton, the right hon. leader of the opposition said:

> This Dominion has no chance for its industrial life save under a protective tariff.

On October 5, speaking at Edmonton, as reported in the Edmonton Journal, he said:

> The only way to secure to Alberta coal the great market of Ontario and the east generally is by the placing of a tariff against foreign coal, which with the additional aid of federal absorption of part of the freight rate on the long haul, will definitely put Alberta coal into the Ontario market. If elected to power I pledge myself to see that this is done.

May I draw the attention of hon. members to that statement? The right hon. leader of the opposition, speaking in Alberta, said: If elected to power I pledge myself to see that that is done, namely, that a duty is imposed which will permit Alberta coal to get into the market in this part of the Dominion. He did not say—and I have read the report with as much care as possible—he does not appear to have said in Alberta what he said in the Maritime provinces, that he would stand in the way of any duty being put on coal unless it was part of an all-round protective system. It was in that respect a very different statement he made to the people of the western province. To quote further:

> The first thing to be done is to place a duty on foreign coal which would effectually prevent it from competing with Canadian coal in its own home market.
> After the United States raised their tariff, I would have raised the Canadian tariff to the same height.

Then on October 7, at Vancouver, as reported in the Vancouver Province, he said:

We will first address ourselves to framing a tariff policy. We will put our tariff wall right up to the level of the American tariff wall.

At Calgary, on October 10, as reported in the Calgary Albertan, he said:

My pledge to the farmers is that the tariff on farm products coming into Canada will be just as high as the protective tariff on farm products going into the United States.

At Moose Jaw, on October 12, he is reported in the Regina Leader, as follows:

It had been said that Mr. Meighen would put the tariff on implements back where it was. "I will do that," declared Mr. Meighen.

Where are the "hear, hears" now? Not one that time. On October 20, at Woodstock, as reported in the Woodstock Sentinel Review, the right hon. leader of the opposition said:

Canada must have a protective tariff, not only for the farmers and the manufacturers, but for every class of production in this nation.

On October 21, at St. Mary's, he is reported in the Montreal Star as follows:

He announced his intention of imposing a tariff which would bring the Canadian duty on agricultural implements at least nearly as high as in the United States.

Then at Dunnville, on October 22, as reported in the London Free Press:

Mr. Meighen gave assurance that "the first thing the government will do after the 29th of October, just as soon as it can do it under the rules of parliament, will be to raise the farm products tariff right up to the American level."

Then at Toronto, on October 26, as reported in the Mail and Empire:

He (Mr. Meighen) agreed that a tariff could not be placed on coal except as part of a general policy. Second, regarding the output of the farm, he advocated a tariff right up to the height of the American level.

Again in Toronto, on October 26, as reported in the Star, he said:

It was only reasonable that a protective tariff system must be consistent, and the coal mines of Nova Scotia and Alberta would be given an opportunity to cultivate the home market.

Now we come to Kitchener, to which my hon. friend has referred. I notice that at Kitchener, speaking of the tariff, the right hon. leader of the opposition is reported to have said—I quote from the London Free Press, October 27:

We will take the tariff of farm products in this Dominion and the first thing we will do we will raise the tariff right up to the American level.

He touched not only on the duties at Kitchener, but also touched on the question of the British preference, and what did my right hon. friend say at Kitchener, speaking on the British preference? The Toronto Globe of the same date reports him as having said:

I believe the British preference is wrong in principle and unjust to the workers of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite say, "hear, hear." I wonder what they would have said if I had made an utterance of that kind in Kitchener? I wonder what they would have said if I had selected the one community in this country that has the largest number of German citizens in it, to go there and say: "I believe the British preference is wrong in principle, and unjust to the workers of Canada."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I confess I experienced some surprise when I read those remarks of my right hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are my hon. friends moaning about? I say I did experience some surprise when I read those remarks. I really thought that my right hon. friend, while I have no doubt as to his sincerity in what he is there expressing, would have carefully avoided making that particular remark in Kitchener, that he would have confined such remarks on the British preference possibly to the city of Toronto or some other city in this country.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did my right hon. friend keep that in mind some years ago when the proposition to build a navy was up?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, he had it in mind. There were a great many remarks attributed to me that were never uttered by me, if my hon. friend will do me justice in the matter.

Now I come to the last quotation, which I am making only for the purpose of illustrating what I have said already. On October 28, at Alexandria, as reported in the Montreal Gazette, my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition said:

The United States tariff on farm products should be met point for point, in the Canadian customs duties.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say, after all these declarations made through this country, from one end to the other, in the course of a general campaign, appealing to the people of this Dominion to return him to power in order that he might form an administration to put the protective policy into force, it does come indeed as a matter of surprise that when there has been such an opportunity as that presented by the budget now before us to introduce an amendment that would give expression to these views with respect to a protective policy, no amendment of the kind is made by hon. gentlemen opposite. There can be only one explanation, and that is that despite all their professions they are not, as I have said, themselves united on that question.

May I add, further, that the surprise is the greater inasmuch as a direct challenge was made to hon. gentlemen opposite on this very subject in the Speech from the Throne. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall), who was speaking a few moments ago, read a paragraph from the Speech from the Throne which is quoted in the amendment that is before the House. I need scarcely say that hon. gentlemen opposite had the Speech from the Throne before them when they were drafting the amendment. The beginning of the paragraph from which the quotation in question has just been made reads as follows:

> My ministers are of the opinion that a general increase in the customs tariff would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to national unity. In their view the incidence of this form of taxation should bear as lightly as possible upon the necessaries of life and on agriculture and other primary industries.

Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite felt that was an expression of view which was not in accord with their own why did they not say so? Why did they not move an amendment challenging a statement of that kind? Very little was said as to this expression of view, however. I can see nothing in criticism of that declaration even in the debate on the Address; I do not know that it has been challenged during the entire debate on the budget. The government stated its position clearly upon the matter without any fear, and hon. gentlemen opposite could readily have stated their own position in as complete a way.

Now may I add this: The action of hon. gentlemen opposite in evading the whole question in their amendment is the more extraordinary and remarkable when one considers their professed solicitude for the manufacturing industries of this country and in particular for the automobile industry. May I point out this fact to those who are manufacturing automobiles, making motor trucks and the like: Hon. gentlemen opposite knew what the resolutions of the Minister of Finance were, and the cut he proposed to make in the duties. They knew of the proposed reduction in the duties when they had their caucus, and when they were considering this matter. Therefore, had they been really sincere in their professed opposition, they could have brought in an amendment to the budget expressing regret that the automobile duties were being reduced to the extent that they were. Did they do that? No, not a word was expressed in that amendment in reference to the customs duties. The amendment brought in related to a matter of procedure. And why was it drawn in that way? It was so drawn in order to avoid giving any expression of opinion on the tariff itself. That is perfectly apparent. Last year when the duty on automobiles was being debated half a dozen or more hon. gentlemen opposite voted in support of a resolution to reduce those duties. Those half dozen, I presume, could hardly have been counted upon to stay with the rest of the party on a motion which dealt with the question of the reduction of duty. I point these matters out in order that the manufacturing interests of the country, and in particular our friends in Oshawa and some other places whom some hon. gentlemen opposite were ready enough to introduce to the government that they might make representations, should understand that hon. gentlemen opposite had it in their power to propose a specific amendment to the budget on the question of the reduction of the duties. But they did not do it. They merely brought in this amendment which deals, as I have already stated, simply with a matter of procedure, and does not touch at all the reduction of duties of which we hear so much.

May I go a step further and say this: I do not believe that hon. gentlemen opposite have been prepared at any time to introduce an amendment to the budget for a consistently maintained tariff when debate thereon was possible in this House. In the several sessions of the last parliament you have an exact parallel, Mr. Speaker, to the tactics we are now witnessing anew. In the campaign of 1921 the Conservative party, under the able leadership of the right hon. leader of the opposition, told the people over and over again in different parts of the country, that the question of a protective tariff was the all important question. If time permitted I could read dozens of statements, even more emphatic than those I have already read pertaining to the campaign of 1925, advocating an increased protective tariff for Canada as the great necessity of that time. Such was the nature of the announcement made in the campaign. What was done afterwards? In the session of 1922, the first session following the election, my hon. friend who is leading the opposition this afternoon (Sir Henry Drayton) brought in an amendment to the budget. And what was the nature of that amendment? Another milk and water affair, that was all. It was an amendment that expressed regret that the Liberal party had not carried out all at once all the pledges that it had made at a Liberal convention that had previously been held. That was the substance of it. You could get anyone on either side of the House to vote for an amendment like that; it could not do him any harm or any good in his particular constituency. Hon gentlemen opposite found then, as they have found now, that they could not unite their party on an amendment for a consistently maintained protective tariff to the budget. That is what happened in 1922. What happened in 1923? What action did those gentlemen, who are so fond of having the country and the manufacturers believe that the manufacturers' interests are peculiarly their own, take in 1923? Why, in 1923 the Conservative party never brought in an amendment to the budget at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: They were shut out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, they were not shut out. As the official opposition they had the opportunity and the right to move the first amendment and I can assure my hon. friends, if I had time to turn to the records, that several days elapsed before any amendment was moved. The amendment that was brought forward at last was moved by the leader of the Progressive party, but hon. gentlemen opposite had not the courage to stand up and show where they stood on this great tariff question. They were prepared to let the Progressive party make their statement of tariff policy but although they had the opportunity they were not willing to move an amendment to the budget showing where they stood on the tariff.

I have just spoken of the session of 1923. Now let us take the session of 1924. What did they do at that time? They allowed the opportunity to pass, and again they failed to introduce any amendment. This time an amendment was brought in by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), an amendment relating to the cost of living. Hon. gentlemen opposite who profess to be such protagonists for a protectionist tariff policy did not even attempt to bring in an amendment. They left it to the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth), whom they are particularly fond of denouncing, to bring in an amendment at that time in connection with the cost of living. The day after the amendment had been introduced, to show the courage of hon. members opposite, some one of their number raised a point of order with respect to it which anyone familiar with parliamentary practice would know that you, Mr. Speaker, could not rule as having been properly raised. While the point of order was under consideration hon. gentlemen opposite came along with an amendment declaring that there should be a consistently maintained tariff policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite actually brought in an amendment on the subject of protection but knowing all the time that when the Speaker declared the point of order was not well taken their own amendment would be ruled out and there would then be no chance to discuss it. That is what happened on that occasion. What followed in the session of 1925, just before the general election? There again my hon. friends opposite came along with an amendment. Was it for a consistently maintained protective policy? They could have taken the same amendment that had been ruled out the year before and have presented it. But they did not. My hon. friend the member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) presented the amendment. It was another milk and water affair. It declared there was still too much in the way of taxation, and expressed regret that the public debt was not a little lower than it was.

An hon. MEMBER: Was that a milk and water amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Milk and water, I should think it was. It was very thin milk and very poor water at that. That was the best amendment hon. gentlemen opposite could move and at the same time carry with them a united party. I have outlined the position of hon. gentlemen opposite at every session of parliament since 1921. Not once did hon. gentlemen opposite during the course of any debate on the budget bring forward their so-called policy of protection so that at the proper time they might stand and fight for it in the parliament of Canada. They refrained from doing so just as they have refrained during the present session.

To-day we are confronted with the amendnent before us, on which hon. gentlemen nope to unite their party, and in favour of which they invite the House to vote. The amendment, moved by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), reads as follows:

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the late general election campaign assurances were repeatedly given by the Prime Minister and other ministers of the crown that before further tariff changes were made an opportunity would be given industries affected thereby to be heard before an advisory board.

That such assurances were officially incorporated by the government in the Speech from the Throne of the present session in the following words:

"Changes in the tariff should be made only after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the necessary qualification to advise the ministry with respect thereto. A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith."

That such tariff advisory board was accordingly appointed.

And this House regrets that in the case of drastic changes announced in the budget such assurances have not been fulfilled.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say in the first place that the government did give assurance at the last general election that a tariff board would be appointed. It is perfectly true, as the quotation from the Speech from the Throne says, that in the Speech from the Throne it was stated that a tariff advisory board would be appointed, but I need not go further than the amendment itself to prove that the government has carried out its pledge in respect to the appointing of that board. The amendment quotes from the Speech from the Throne the statement that a body possessing the necessary qualifications to advise the ministry with respect to the tariff will be appointed. It says:

A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith.

Then what is the next line?

That such tariff advisory board was accordingly appointed.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the statement that the government has carried out the broad policy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —carried out the broad policy of appointing a tariff board which it stated to the people of Canada it would carry out. It has appointed a tariff advisory board, and the amendment of my hon. friend states that the government had promised that such a board would be appointed and that such tariff board was accordingly appointed.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the government intend to submit anything at all to the board?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let my hon. friends be patient. They are beginning to see the force and effect of their amendment. Let me make this clear; in all the discussions that took place in the general elections, and in the declaration in the Speech from the Throne, the government was setting out a broad policy, was discussing general policies. If my hon. friends will look at the speeches that were made at the time this declaration of policy was announced they will also find that on each occasion that reference has been made to the tariff advisory board care has been taken to state that the government did not intend, on the subject of tariff matters, to tie the hands of parliament in any particular. I desire to make that perfectly clear. A direct statement was made that in the last analysis the tariff had to be settled on the floor of parliament, and that the government did not intend, by appointing a tariff advisory board to advise the minister to tie the hands of parliament in any way.

Having said that much, may I come to the point which I know is in the minds of hon. members opposite. They have overlooked altogether the significance of the broad statement of policy, and they have concentrated their minds on two words in the amendment:

That before further tariff changes were made an opportunity would be given industries affected to be heard before an advisory board.

They are concentrating their minds on the two words "before further". I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to find any place where those two words appear in any declaration made by myself on behalf of the government. There was no statement that before this tariff board was appointed no tariff changes would be made in this parliament. When hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to raise a debate on those two words "before further", while allowing the whole question of the actual tariff changes, which after all is the vital thing, to go by the board, I confess I cannot but feel that they are prepared to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. May I say in perfect frankness to the House that I would have very much preferred, before the changes proposed by the Minister of Finance were made, that the matter should have been referred to the tariff board. That is what I wished and that is what every hon. member of the administration wished might have been done.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Who drove you to it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are dealing with a practical situation, and I hope my hon. friend will allow me to conclude. I say that the government would have preferred to have had the tariff board appointed in time to deal with these matters, if that had been possible.

It was no fault of the government that we were unable to get the tariff board consituted sooner than we did.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members opposite, who know a good deal more about the difficulties the government had in getting a tariff board appointed than some of them would care to confess, know that the government did its utmost to get the tariff board appointed fully a month and a half before it actually was appointed, that we hoped and did our utmost to secure a certain personnel that we believed would commend itself to the House and the country. After very considerable effort, and some reasonable expectation, we were unsuccessful in obtaining the services of a certain gentleman we sought for the position of chairman of the board. We were fortunately able to obtain the services of another gentleman, whose appointment commands public confidence throughout the country, but it was with the greatest difficulty we finally persuaded him to accept the position. Only as a patriotic duty, and with a knowledge of the difficulties confronting the administration, could the Right Hon. Mr. Graham be persuaded to accept the post. The government did its utmost to get the tariff board constituted in time to refer the motor industries customs tariff to that board, but we were unable to get the board constituted in time to permit an investigation before the Minister of Finance brought in the budget. We had then to consider a very practical question, and that was whether we should wait for another year before making any changes in the duties on automobiles and motor trucks, simply because we had been unable to get the tariff board constituted at the time we hoped it would be possible to constitute it.

There is a further point I desire to make perfectly clear. While it is true that, so far as the letter is concerned, we were unable to place before the tariff board for consideration the matter of the present duties, yet so far as the spirit of our pledge is concerned it has been fulfilled to the last degree. The spirit of the pledge respecting the appointment of a tariff advisory board,—and hon. members opposite know it—is that there should be careful investigation concerning the effect of any change in the tariff before it is made. That is the purpose of the advisory board. That has been done with respect to the duties—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it has been done with respect to the reduction of duties which the House is called upon to consider. When my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) was Minister of Finance he had, I think I am safe in saying, advisers around him in the Department of Finance who were able to give him the benefit of their experience in so far as tariff matters were concerned. They could tell him what in their view might be the effect of any changes that might be proposed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Prime Minister has not those advisers. The one gentleman who was competent to advise him is not there now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I happen to know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly the gentleman whom my hon. friend has in mind may not now be in the department, but I may tell the hon. member that there is one gentleman who has been in the Department of Finance for some thirty or forty years and who is more conversant with tariff matters than anyone else in the Dominion. He knows more about the tariff in Canada than any other individual, and he is at present in the department, having associated with him others who are also quite competent to offer advice.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): He was superannuated ten years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends may have been anxious to effect his superannuation, but what this government was concerned with was to retain the services of an officer who had proved himself invaluable.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I must rise to deny that statement. The gentleman himself asked for superannuation. I did not want to superannuate him and his retirement was not forced upon him. On his first seeking superannuation no effort was made to hasten his departure and he stayed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend retained him as an adviser.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The Prime Minister is wrong again; I did not say I had him as adviser. He is of course an estimable man who knows the details, not of Canadian business, but of the customs tariff, and he is exceedingly good on statistics.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There may be differences of opinion as to the special qualifications of the gentleman in question, but I think I may safely say that the country has always placed implicit confidence in the judgment of Mr. Fielding in relation to fiscal matters.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear." Well, it was Mr. Fielding who brought back to the Department of Finance, to advise him on fiscal matters, the gentleman to whom I am now referring—Mr. Russell. And he was brought back for the very reason that, as I have said, he is regarded from one end of the country to the other as the outstanding authority in Canada on questions relating to the tariff. But the matter has not been considered by Mr. Russell alone, but by others as well. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) himself has given unflagging personal attention and a great deal of time to the consideration of the whole subject.

Now may I point out to the House this difference between the automobile industry and any other industry that might be mentioned. The question of the duties on automobiles has been the subject of debate, not in the course of one session only, but in two consecutive sessions of parliament. It was discussed very fully in the last session and it has been carefully considered in parliament again this year. I think I am perfectly correct in the statement that it was generally understood that there was to be a reduction in duties so far as motor cars were concerned. An impending change was in the air, so to speak; one of the main considerations that influenced the government in this matter was the possible effect, upon the industry, quite as much as upon the consuming public, of a decision to leave the matter in abeyance. Knowing that the question was very much in the air, the government had to consider this point very carefully. Had we decided to make no change at the present time but to refer the matter to the Tariff Advisory Board it would have meant that the people from one end of the country to the other, knowing that the whole question would be discussed at a subsquent session of parliament, and being convinced that some reduction in the duties would inevitably follow, would have declined in the meantime to purchase automobiles in the expectation of the advent of cheaper cars. What would have been the effect on the motor industry itself, if matters had been left in that state of uncertainty? I venture to suggest that the same result would have ensued as was witnessed prior to the reduction in the duties on agricultural implements. Purchasers of those implements, in the expectation that a reduction would be made in the tariff, refrained from purchasing agricultural machinery and implements for a considerable time, and when the tariff was reduced and they saw just where they stood, they gave their orders. As a matter of fact the agricultural implement industry is in a better position in Canada to-day than it has been at any time. Now, I venture to say exactly the same sort of thing will happen in connection with automobiles. When this matter is settled by parliament the public will be able to secure motor cars at lower prices and will be prepared to make their purchases at once. Consequently, as I have already said, the industry as well as the country will prosper. There can be no doubt that obviating, as we are, any interval of uncertainty, the motor industry itself will thereby stand to gain.

I hope I have made clear the position of the government in this matter. Certainly I have had no other desire than to take the House into the fullest confidence of the administration in regard to the whole question. We should have preferred to have had the matter referred to the tariff board, if such a course could have been followed without probable injustice to the consuming public as well as injury to the industry itself. But we felt that the motor industry was in a different position from others in that its whole position had been fully discussed during the course of two sessions of parliament. Every phase of the situation had been considered, and we felt that we were carrying out the spirit if not the letter of our obligation and pledge in having the subject carefully investigated by the officers of the department and those associated with them. Then, coming to the practical question as to what was the wisest thing to do under the circumstances I have described, we took the course which we believed to be in the interests alike of the manufacturers and of the purchasers of automobiles.

I may add this further word: we are prepared to assume full responsibility for the step we have taken. If there is any doubt in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite whether this government did the right thing in dealing with the motor industry in the manner I have stated, I ask them to consult public opinion from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There can be no question whatever that public opinion must govern in the long run; public opinion must decide whether a government has been right in its actions or not. And I submit that no single enactment has ever been proposed by any government which has more completely met with popular favour than the action of this government with respect to the reduction in duties on automobiles and motor trucks.

All that we have heard in the discussion of the automobile industry, since the changes proposed in the budget were announced, finds a complete parallel in what transpired with respect to other changes that have recently been made in our tariff. I might cite in particular the reduction in the duties on agricultural implements. When the government made a slight change in 1922 and another change in 1924—it mattered not how slight or how considerable the change was—the language of hon. gentlemen opposite was just as extravagant in predicting ruin to the industry. We saw organized propaganda carried on to persuade the people that the government was destroying an industry which it had singled out for harmful discrimination. The statement was made that the government was attacking that industry in order to curry favour with the Progressive party—the same sort of talk precisely as we have heard during the past month in connection with automobiles.

Mr. CLARK: We pointed out that—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What occurred in connection with the agricultural implement industry will I believe take place in the motor industry as a result of the action which the government now proposes should be taken by parliament.

Mr. ROGERS: That will mean that motor cars will go up in price.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But agricultural implements have not gone up in price. My hon. friend may be living in a part of the country which is identified with agriculture, but evidently he has been paying attention to something else.

Mr. ROGERS: No, indeed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the Prime Minister referring to the remission of the sales tax?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am referring to the remission of the customs duties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We claim that the agricultural implement industry was left in a better position owing to the fact that raw materials had been put on the free list. Is that what my right hon. friend is referring to here?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. Now let me ask my hon. friend a question: In what year did they have the full government programme?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am speaking of 1924 in connection with the amendments then made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am going back to the year 1922.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: 1924.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will take 1924 too, but for the moment I am referring to 1922. In that year we made certain tariff changes and I should like the House to note what hon. gentlemen opposite said would be the effect of those slight changes. I have in my hand the statement made by the right hon. leader of the opposition in regard to the reduction made in 1922 of 2½ per cent on agricultural implements, and I ask the House to listen while I read this to see if it does not sound very much like what we have heard in the course of this debate. The right hon. leader of the opposition was addressing his remarks to the then Minister of Finance. They will be found in Hansard of June 6, 1922:

> I believe he will find in relation to implements he has done something which very probably will injure the manufacturer and his employees, very probably will turn workingmen on the streets in various cities of this country; but will not reduce by one cent the cost of the implement to the consumer in Canada.

That was in 1922. In 1923, speaking at Lachute, Quebec, on December 29, as reported in the Montreal Gazette, the leader of the opposition said in reference to this 2½ per cent reduction on agricultural implements:

> There had been a reduction of 2½ per cent on agricultural machinery, and thousands of artisans had been driven from the country.

Then on March 3, 1924, when the larger reductions were thought of, the same kind of expressions were used. Speaking on the Address—this was even before the change was made, when it was simply suggested there might be a change as the country had attained a position where the government felt they might well relieve the public of a certain amount of taxation—the leader of the opposition said:

> It—

That is, a reduction on agricultural implements.

> —will merely remove the manufacture from one country to another, it will merely dispose of it to the United States instead of holding it in Canada, and in a very short time the farmers' last state will be even worse than the first.

I am reading these extracts, Mr. Speaker, in order to let the House and the country see how much weight should be attached to the extreme statements of hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to tariff changes, because fortunately we have the agricultural implement industry as an object lesson. It is not a matter of conjecture; we know what the effect of tariff changes has been on that industry, as I intend to show in particular a little later on. Now, listen to this: I do not think it has been surpassed by anything that has been said in the course of this debate. I should like the House to measure the value of all the utterances of a similar character of our friends opposite by the value that is to be attached to this particular utterance. Speaking on May 15 in regard to the changes then proposed in the tariff on agricultural implements, the right hon. leader of the opposition said:

> There is alarm, there is dismay, there is a stoppage of expansion, there is depression. . . . . To-day every member of this House knows that the feeling through Canada is anything but wholesome or hopeful. The barometer of migration is ominous. From the city, from the town, from the factory, from the farm, the procession is distressing. A year ago its volume suddenly rose to three times its normal dimensions. And still they go. Their numbers may diminish with the saturation of the United States—but are we making work for them in Canada? We are circumscribing the area of employment every day. The inevitable consequences are upon us. Capital alarmed, business harassed, production dislocated, agriculture unassisted, labour contracted, tens of thousands of our children exiled, the debt heavier, taxation multiplied, the budget juggled, these are the reapings of thirty months of this government, the cruel cost to date of its brief and inglorious career.

And then, as though that were not peroration enough, there follows this:

> Almost anything would be better than what we have now. We are in a condition of anxious enervating suspense, industry—

Listen to this gem:

> —industry crouching under a sword tossed between two leaders in this House, a state of perpetual premonition, a sort of endless thunder and lightning, betokening a destructive storm.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is Mr. Speaker, charitable to assume that that kind of language was the result of this continual pounding of desks by hon. gentlemen opposite while their leader was speaking—this "thunder and lightning" that was betokening the coming storm. That is how the changes in the budget were then characterized by the right hon. leader of the opposition. Leaving the atmosphere of parliament and speaking at Montreal on August 27, 1924, the right hon. gentleman said:

> Every farm implement was higher in price than it was—

That is, as a consequence of the tariff reduction.

> —that 24 farm implement factories had closed with the workmen thrown into the streets; . . . . and that over the whole range of Canadian industry 1,000 plants and factories had been "boarded up" since the tariff cutting bid for Progressive support in parliament was commenced in 1922.

What are the facts? Let us take first of all the prices of agricultural implements. Perhaps my hon. friend from South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers), who was talking about these prices, will listen to this list which I have had carefully prepared by the statistical branch of the government:

Prices of Agricultural Implements

The cost of a selected list of agricultural implements in Ontario on certain dates was as follows:

January, 1924	$928 50
May, 1924	880 50
January, 1925	860 00

This list includes walking plow, disc, rake, binder, mower, drag harrow, disc harrow, wagon, and sleigh. Now let my hon. friends opposite listen to the western prices in Regina territory:

January, 1921	$1,525 00
January, 1924	1,358 00
May, 1924	1,291 00
January, 1925	1,244 75

The western list includes walking plow, disc drill, hay rake, binder, mower, drag harrow, disc harrow, lift gang, wagon and sleigh.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the price to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly about the same.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend would be good enough to give those figures to Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The figures will appear in Hansard all right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want to see the results of the sales tax.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend can figure that out for himself at any time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the whole point.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FOSTER: Will my right hon. friend be good enough to give the comparative prices in 1921 and 1925 on the different kinds of mowers, seed drills, rakes, hay loaders, hay tedders and so on? Perhaps he has the information at hand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I have not; but if my hon. friend will take the trouble to read the speech I made on the budget last year he will find, I think, most of the information he desires.

Mr. FOSTER: I thank my right hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING Now, let me make a statement that perhaps will not be questioned. The right hon. leader of the opposition said that every farm implement was higher in price than it had been. I think what I have just quoted answers my right hon. friend on that point conclusively. The next statement was that twenty-four implement factories had been closed, with the workmen thrown into the streets. Let me give the House a statement of the number of persons reported on the pay rolls of thirty-seven manufacturers of agricultural implements.

Mr. LADNER: Are those wholesale or retail prices?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are not prices at all that I am now giving.

Mr. LADNER: I am referring to the agricultural implements, just for information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are the prices as they appear in the price list.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think it is fair to the right hon. Prime Minister or any other gentleman who has the floor, to be interrupted like this. When we have reached the committeee stage questions may be put, but when the House is sitting as such and the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition addresses the Chair he should not be subjected to these interruptions; it is not fair.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. LADNER: I am addressing my words to Mr. Speaker, whose observations were particularly directed to me. I merely wanted some information which was not given by the Prime Minister. I did not intend to be impertinent, nor did I expect an impertinent reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: No one thinks the hon. gentleman was impertinent; he never is, and could not be. But I say it is not proper that the Prime Minister or any other hon. member who has the floor in a budget debate should be constantly interrupted in this way. It is turning his speech into a cross-examination, which is not fair to the hon. member who addresses the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to proceed. I will now give the total number of persons on the pay rolls of thirty-seven manufacturers of agricultural implements, as shown in the returns made to the statistical branch of the government. On April 1, 1922, there were 5,205; April 1, 1923, 6,580; April 1, 1924, 6,176; April 1, 1925, 5,793, and on April 1, 1926, 8,257. That shows the extent to which working men were thrown on the streets and driven out of the country. At the time the right hon. leader of the opposition made that statement, April 1, 1924, there were 6,176 persons on the pay rolls of these thirty-seven manufacturers of agricultural implements. On April 1 of this year there were, not 6,176, but 8,257; so much for the effect of the changes in the tariff. Now I would like to come to this year, as an indication of how matters are now prospering. On January 1 of this year 7,084 persons were employed in the manufacture of agriculture implements; on February 1, 7,494; March 1, 7,859, and on April 1, 8,257. I have no doubt that during the rest of the year we will find the number increasing, for the reason that the business itself is not only prospering within this country, but in competition with foreign nations as well.

That is the next point I wish to come to. We were told that we were ruining industry and sending people out of the country, but what do we find? We find not only that conditions have improved with respect to domestic sales but that, as a matter of fact, in the export of agricultural implements there has been an increase of very material proportions. Let me read the values of the exports of farm implements and machinery by years:

1921-22	$ 5,345,308
1922-23	6,066,893
1923-24	9,339,519
1924-25	11,342,712
1925-26	13,628,341

In 1924-25, after our budget changes were made, the exports amounted to $11,342,712 and for the complete twelve months of 1925-26, $13,628,341. In other words, from the time the change was made the exports increased from $9,339,519 to $13,628,341. These are the facts which may be cited in reply to the assertions made at the time as to what the effect of the government's action would be. If more is needed to make clear the position of the implement manufacturers I would quote for just a moment from the reports of one or two of these companies. We find that so far as the implement manufacturing business is concerned, the companies are beginning to pay dividends, for practically the first time in their history, and that not only on preferred stock but on common stock as well in some instances. I have here the report of the Cockshutt Plow Company, appearing in the Financial Post of February 19, 1926. I will not read the whole of the report, but just one or two statements:

The annual report of the Cockshutt Plow Company for 1925 shows profits from operation after providing for depreciation of $313,501, compared with $64,347 in 1924.

That is what the report of this year shows. The vice president of the company, outlining the position of the industry, said:

Referring to the year's operations and the outlook, vice-president F. Perry says:

The improvement is encouraging, and it is to be hoped that prices of agricultural products are emerging permanently from the depression in relation to other prices into which they have been sunk since the war. The success of the company's business, he says, is directly dependent on the prosperity of the farmers. While business in eastern Canada has also improved, the increase was by no means so marked as in the western provinces. Foreign sales, however, have reached a higher figure than in any previous year.

Collections, on the whole, have been good, and the shorter terms of credit which were introduced some time back are now beginning to show a beneficial effect in the reduction of the amount of dealers' and farmers' paper carried by the company, and a corresponding reduction in the company's borrowings from its banker. On December 31, the company's bank loan was entirely paid up, and its trade liabilities reduced to a minimum.

That the company is now in a position to take advantage of improved conditions, including the Russian orders for tractors which have been received, has been reflected in the action of the market and the substantial advance in the quotations for the shares of this company.

That is a pretty good record for two years; improving business in eastern Canada; increases even more marked in the west; foreign sales reaching a higher figure than in any previous year; collections good; reductions in the company's borrowings from its banker; trade liabilities reduced to a minimum, and substantial advance in quotations for shares. What more could you possibly wish for any industry anywhere?

Now take another great company, namely the Massey-Harris. The report of that company appears in the Financial Post of February 12 of this year, and is headed as follows:

Massey-Harris Company. A great Canadian industry which stands second in its field in world trade. Big improvement in business is now being experienced.

The article goes on to say:

Speaking of the farm implement industry in general and of the Massey-Harris Company in particular, Thomas Bradshaw, general manager of the company referred to, states that the implement business is in a better position to-day than it has been since 1920. Sales during 1925, especially in the home market, increased considerably. . . . . Mr. Bradshaw estimates that farm equipment sales in Canada during 1925 were from 60 per cent to 75 per cent in excess in 1924.

There is a statement which has a direct bearing upon the motor industry at the moment. I said a little while ago that the moment the country knew that the question of duties had been settled, purchases immediately began to be made. I would like to read that sentence again:

Mr. Bradshaw estimates that farm equipment sales in Canada during 1925 were from 60 per cent to 75 per cent in excess of those in 1924.

I contend that that is very largely to be accounted for by the fact that many farmers were waiting until the question of the tariff was settled, and until they were in the best position to make purchases. The article goes on to say:

Exports likewise showed a healthy increase. Farm implements were exported to practically every grain growing country of the world, with Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, New Zealand, Australia, Argentina and the United States as their chief destination.

As to 1926, the prospects are for still further improvement in the implement industry. The demand for goods should be greater and plants more fully occupied. Mr. Bradshaw makes the point that perhaps never before has the feeling between the implement manufacturer and the farmer been so harmonious.

I will just add this further statement as to the company's report for the year ending November 13 last:

The company's report for the year ending November 30th last, showed net income of $2,346,543, compared with $1,065,180 for 1924, while in addition there was $661,139 made available by recovery of assets previously written off. This indicates a splendid recovery of the company's affairs. A few years ago the company owed its bankers a sum between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000, representing implements sold on credit. Not only has this debt been liquidated, but recently the company has been able to show a substantial cash surplus.

May I add this further word? After it became apparent that the agricultural implement industry was going to improve, we were told that it was not so much the implement industry that hon. gentlemen opposite were concerned about as it was some subsidiary industries from which raw material had to be obtained, and particular mention was made of the steel industry. Now what is the position of the steel industry, a manufacturer of parts of agricultural implements? The Financial Post of December 11, 1925, has an article headed:

Steel of Canada crosses par for first time since merger organized in 1911. Investment history made as well-managed steel enterprise makes good visions and promises of promoters of pre-war days.

Here is the paragraph that bears on the point:

This week the common stock of Steel Company of Canada sold over par for the first time in its history. This event is of importance for investors because it indicates that the public is now beginning to recognize Steel of Canada as one of the basic securities of Canada, a security that is bound to reflect business conditions in general and that may, in time, be regarded as a barometer of Canadian business just as United States Steel is regarded as a barometer of business in the United States.

Then within the past month the Financial Post, which keeps track of these matters, has two further references to the financial position of these implement companies, one on May 14 referring to the Cockshutt Plow Company.

It is being credited that dividends will be increased on Cockshutt shares before the end of the year, probably at 4 per cent.

The item with respect to the Massey-Harris Company says:

The preferred issue is now regarded as being on a sound dividend basis, with good prospects for a moderate dividend on the common in the not far distant future.

There, Mr. Speaker, in a word is the answer to the assertions made by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the effect of the government's reduction of customs duties on the implements of agriculture. At that time the government stated that it felt secure in the action which it was taking, that it believed the result of the changes being made would not only be of assistance to the farming community, but would prove beneficial to the companies as well. In every particular the position taken by the government at that time has been implemented to the full. Now I venture to say, Sir, when we are permitted to consider a couple of years hence the effect of the changes we are making to-day in the duties on automobiles, we shall find this whole situation with relation to agricultural implements paralleled in all the particulars I have mentioned with respect to the motor industry in Canada.

May I say just a word about the manufacturing industry as a whole in this country? To hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk, one would think they were the only persons concerned about the well-being of manufacturing in Canada, and they never cease to stress the point that manufacturing in Canada is suffering under this administration.

Mr. BENNETT, Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." I want this noted, because it bears out how much reliance one can place on "hear hears" or statements of the kind that are made. I want to bring this point to the attention of my hon. friend who has just interrupted, and he may be surprised to know it. Will he be surprised if I tell him that this year for the first time in the history of this country our exports of manufactured goods exceed our imports?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: It is mostly paper and that class of raw material.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is exports of fully manufactured goods.

Mr. BENNETT: Paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Paper may be imported too, if my hon. friend insists on thinking only of paper. Let me give to the House statistics that cannot be controverted as to our exports and imports of manufactured goods.

Mr. BENNETT: Our imports would be steel, principally. We are the second customer of the United States in steel.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me place on Hansard, if I may, the actual figures with respect to imports and exports of manufactured goods in Canada during the years this government has been in office, and see what the showing is. These figures are with respect to manufactured goods in Canada as a whole:

Imports and Exports of all Manufactured Goods, 1921-1925

Fiscal year ended March 31	Imported	Exported	Excess of imports over exports (—) Excess of exports over imports (+)
1921..	929,874,130	665,087,939	—264,786,191
1922..	531,355,579	410,869,738	—120,485,841
1923..	574,551,323	515,173,415	— 59,377,908
1924..	639,343,645	591,829,306	— 47,514,339
1925..	576,031,243	591,598,479	+ 15,567,234

In other words, Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friends opposite were in office, in 1921, the total importation of manufactured goods was $929,874,130, whereas the total amount of manufactured goods imported for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1925, had dropped to $576,031,243. Now let us take the exports. In 1921 the total exports of manufactured goods amounted to $665,087,939. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember that prices were very much inflated at that time and that they were still exporting on war contracts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not in 1921. If my hon. friend wants to take a war year, or any year where we have not got stagnation in the buying countries, he would not take 1921.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was a post-war year, in which a number of contracts were being carried on, and the total export of manufactured goods in 1921 amounted to $665,087,939. The year following is the proper one with which to begin making comparisons. There is disclosed a steady increase in exports. I would like hon. gentlemen opposite and the House to get the significance of the figures presented in this table. Let me give the excess of imports over exports or the excess of exports over imports for the different years. In 1921 the excess of imports over exports was in round figures $264,000,000; in 1922, that had dropped to $120,000,000; in 1923, it had dropped to $59,000,000; in 1924, it had dropped to $47,000,000; but in 1925, the exports exceeded the imports by $15,000,000. There is the proof that manufacturers in Canada have prospered under this administration. Consider for a moment the significance of those figures.

Under the late government, the official statistics show that the Canadian market was on balance invaded by imported manufactured goods to the tune of $264,000,000, or considerably more than a quarter of a billion, in 1921. This government, they say, has been pursuing a policy of tariff reduction inimical to the interests of our manufacturing industries, yet in each succeeding year the manufacturers of Canada, taken as a whole, clearly have more and more occupied the home market, if we balance the exports against the imports of manufactured commodities. Finally, after our 1924 budget, which the opposition declared was going to ruin the Canadian manufacturers, our manufacturers, taken as a whole, won out on balance against their competitors from abroad, and exported $15,000,000 more manufactured goods to other countries than other countries sent to Canada. This showing will undoubtedly be better in 1926, in view of our enormous favourable balance of total trade, but apart from that, the table shows conclusively that under the present government, Canadian manufacturers are more than holding their own, not only in the markets of Canada, but in the markets of the world. The record shows clearly that the great body of Canadian manufacturers are more completely holding the Canadian market than they were four or five years ago. The facts given in the table are a complete refutation of the blue ruin utterances of the opposition.

May I give one other brief reference which I think will be illuminating as to the manufacturing industries of this country and the state of Canadian trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite are continually comparing conditions in Canada with conditions in the United States to the detriment of their own country. They cannot deny that; they are continually doing it in their public utterances, and yet the available statistics disclose that instead of there being reason to belittle our country there is the strongest reason in the world why we should make it plain to everybody that we are in a much better position than our neighbours to the south.

Mr. CLARK: In that case why are our people going to the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They continue to go, in so far as they may be going, because of the propaganda in which hon. gentlemen opposite indulge.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I venture to say that of the people who have left Canada for the United States more have done so in consequence of the talk of hon. gentlemen opposite than because of any other reason. I go further and I say that in addition to this fact it is also true that thousands of people who otherwise would have come to Canada, have been led to locate in other countries because of the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friends seem to delight in keeping up a propaganda aimed at depreciating Canada; they seem to delight in deriding and belittling their own country—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Slandering it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, "slander" is not too strong an expression to use. Such conduct as that cannot be indulged in without having very serious effects upon this country. Now, this policy of belittling Canada is shown to be without justification when one considers the total trade of the Dominion, that is the import and export trade and realizes that for the year ending March, 1926, there was a favourable trade balance of $401,134,000. That is a figure that has never been reached before in the history of this country, excepting possibly, when munitions of war were being exported. Even the United States, notwithstanding the immense trade which it enjoys, does not begin to have as favourable a trade balance as Canada enjoyed for the last fiscal year. In proof of that may I offer the following figures. For the twelve months ending March, 1926, the visible trade balance of Canada amounted to $401,134,000, and that for the United States to $352,364,000. The trade of Canada and the United States for the twelve months ending March 31, 1926, was:

	Canada	United States
Imports..	$ 927,403,000	$4,412,293,000
Exports:
Domestic produce.. ..	1,315,193,000	4,667,166,000
Foreign produce.. ..	13,344,000	97,491,000
Total exports..	$1,328,537,000	$4,764,657,000
Favourable trade balance	$ 401,134,000	$ 352,364,000

Recently published figures of the United States bringing its trade statistics down to the end of March show that for the first nine months of its fiscal year ending June its favourable trade balance or excess of exports over imports was $187,000,000. Adding to that figure the favourable trade balance of the United States for the three months, April, May and June of last year, namely, $165,000,000, we find that the total favourable trade balance of the United States for the period included in the last Canadian fiscal year was $352,000,000, or a cool $50,000,000 less than our favourable trade balance in the same period. This fact is a remarkable demonstration of how Canada is holding her own in the markets of the world. The policy of the present administration, of cheapening the instruments of production, has operated to increase the volume of Canadian exports.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Will the right hon. gentleman be good enough to give us the trade balance between Canada and the United States for the same period?

Mr. ROBB: We are trading with the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The trade balance between the two? I have not the figures here, I am sorry to say. In what I have said to-day and I must apologize if I have taken up an undue amount of time, I have endeavoured to show that the blue ruin representations in which hon. gentlemen opposite have indulged are not justified by the facts, but that as a matter of correct record this country has really gone steadily ahead in the manufacturing industry, not only absolutely in its own accord but relatively in comparison with its neighbour and chief competitor.

I should like to say something further with respect to some of the features in the budget. During the course of this debate so much has been said about the need for protection and the like, which is not borne out by the facts, that I am afraid the House and possibly the country have lost sight of the budget itself and what it discloses—what it discloses of improved conditions in our own country, and what it promises of reduction in taxation to the people. If it may be permitted I should like to say a few words on that aspect of the question and therefore as this is a convenient point of departure, Mr. Speaker, I ask that you call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Bennett.]

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. R. J. Manion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the course of my remarks during the afternoon, referring to the fact that hon. members opposite failed, in the last parliament during the course of any debate on the budget, to move an amendment declaratory of their professed advocacy of protection, I omitted to make mention of one incident to which I had intended to refer, but which helps to illustrate the truth of what I was seeking to have the House appreciate, namely that the hon. members in one way or another contrived to avoid a full discussion of the question of protection which would place the House in relation thereto definitely on record in any budget debate. The point that I overlooked referring to—I had it before me but overlooked it—was the circumstance that on the eve of the assembling of parliament at its last session there appeared in the Ottawa papers and other papers throughout the country a statement in the nature of a manifesto of the Conservative party in respect to its views on protection, and when the House assembled members discovered that this manifesto was in the form of a resolution on the order paper in the name of the right hon. leader of the opposition. That resolution did contain in it a statement that:

> This Dominion requires an immediate revision of the Canadian tariff, on a definitely and consistently protective basis.

That resolution appeared on the order paper on February 5, 1925. It remained there day after day, but was never taken up in the course of the debates in the House. It remained there, I would like to point out to the House, through the whole of the discussions on the budget. If the right hon. leader of the opposition and members of his party had been really anxious to test the feeling of the House on a declaration of that kind, that was the appropriate time to do it. As a matter of fact the debate on the budget last year lasted altogether, I think, forty days and forty nights, the longest debate that ever took place in this House on any single question. During all that time this motion of the right hon. leader of the opposition remained on the order paper. It continued on the order paper until about the end of the session. I think, to be exact, it was on June 2 that this resolution was moved as an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply. It was on the order paper until the day before, and a good many hon. members were taken by surprise when they found it had been withdrawn from the order paper and was being introduced as an amendment to the motion to go into supply. However, the House had had enough of discussion on the tariff question and dealt pretty summarily with this motion. It was debated a few hours, I think, and finally was disposed of on division, by a vote of 147 to 37. In other words a majority of 110, in the House as then constituted, voted against a resolution declaring that this country required an immediate revision of the Canadian tariff on a definitely and consistently protective basis. The interesting fact in regard to the debate that took place on that resolution was that not only every Liberal member of the House of Commons, but every Progressive member, the Labour members, the Independent members, and the only lady member in the House, voted against it. It was virtually on this resolution that hon. members opposite conducted the recent campaign.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear". I believe he is following me in this debate. And yet we come to the first session of the new parliament and that resolution is entirely discarded, and instead of having anything declaratory in regard to the necessity for an immediate revision of the Canadian tariff on a definitely and consistently protective basis, we have the resolution now before us dealing with a matter of procedure.

Hon. members opposite have sometimes expressed surprise that, in view of their campaign last election, and in view of the fact that as a party they were returned with the largest number, they should not be sitting on this side of the House conducting the affairs of the country. Let me say to the House frankly that after the election of October last, when I called to confer with His Excellency on the question as to what course should be followed as a result of the situation that had been created by that election, I took the position that in my opinion the right hon. leader of hon. gentlemen opposite could not command the support of a majority in this House of Commons, and I took that position largely because of this resolution which had been defeated in the House by a majority of 110 in the previous parliament, and by reason of the attitude which hon. gentlemen themselves had assumed during the campaign when they told the people that the one great issue, so far as they were concerned, was the tariff. I said quite frankly that I did not see how members of the Progressive party, or of the Labour party or independent members of the House, any more than members of the Liberal party could endorse the fiscal policy of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). I was prepared however to leave it entirely to the House of Commons itself to declare its views on the matter, and I think hon. gentlemen will credit me with having endeavoured in every possible way to allow that expression of opinion on the part of parliament to be altogether unprejudiced and untrammelled. The House of Commons did declare itself on the question of majority support, as it will be called upon again to-night to declare itself; and I would say, in all seriousness, to my hon. friends opposite that after parliament has recorded its vote, upon the conclusion of this debate to-night, the country will take little stock in further references to the alleged inability of the government to function or to the assertion which has been so strenuously put forward, that the government has no right to continue in office.

I said that I desired to offer a few remarks regarding the budget itself and to remind hon. members, before they came to cast their votes, just what the budget discloses and what is proposed in the resolutions which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) will move in due course. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, may I take this occasion to join with others who have spoken on both sides in extending heartiest congratulations to the minister on the budget which he has been able to bring down as a consequence of the financial position in which the country finds itself to-day? If he has succeeded, as I believe he has, in presenting to this House what is unquestionably a more popular budget than any that has ever before been submitted to parliament, a budget that means more in the way of reduction in taxation than any other which it has been the good fortune of this country to receive, the credit cannot be too largely attributed to the minister himself, for the manner in which he has presided over the finances of the country, the great caution and care he has exercised with respect to expenditures, and the eminently capable way in which he has furthered the financial policies which this government has deemed most in the interests of Canada.

The minister last year in presenting his budget said that he wished to err on the safe side. He preferred to over-estimate any expenditures that might be made, and to underestimate the revenues of the country. He came to parliament this year and was able to show that as a matter of fact that was what he had done; the surplus of last year was shown to be greater than he had assumed it would be when he made his statement to parliament. I am sure hon. members will be pleased to learn that the Minister of Finance has followed the same cautious course at this session. In presenting his budget a month ago he underestimated the revenues of the country for the last fiscal year while he overestimated public expenditures, with the result that the surpluses which we have to declare to the country to-day are very much greater than were anticipated when the budget was brought down last month. Fortunately we are now in a position to submit the complete statement for the last fiscal year and the facts disclosed therein will, I am sure, be received by the country with the greatest satisfaction. The minister estimated in his budget statement that the increase in revenue would be $29,965,520; as a matter of fact, it is $32,900,000 odd. He also over-estimated expenditures, for, as the facts now show, the surplus of revenue over expenditure instead of being $55,000,000 odd, as the minister stated then, is $58,404,000, while the surplus over ordinary and capital expenditure instead of being $38,065,000 is $41,594,000. The surplus on government services is also higher than the minister had predicted: Instead of being $33,910,000 as he estimated it is $37,526,000. The net public debt on March 31 my hon. friend estimated would be $2,395,000,000 odd; as a matter of fact it is considerably lower than that, being $2,391,000,000. The public debt reduction during the past year, instead of being $22,353,000, as the Minister of Finance anticipated, is $25,969,000, or very nearly $26,000,000.

These are some of the features of the budget which the Minister of Finance has presented to parliament and the country on this occasion, but there are other aspects of the situation which are equally noteworthy. He pointed out that through the management of the finances under his direction the bonded indebtedness of the country had been very much reduced. The bonds held in the United States have been paid off in part, while the rate of interest which we were obliged to meet on bonds has been considerably lowered, by the refunding of loans effected. An appreciable saving has been effected in that way. With respect to the Canadian National Railways the minister was able to report that instead of the railways being any longer a liability they are rapidly becoming a national asset. In addition to that he was able to report progress in the right direction so far as the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is concerned. He was able to point out that through the removal of the cattle embargo, brought about under the present administration, the number and the value of cattle being exported from Canada to the British market had largely increased, while he was able to make the gratifying announcement that trade through Canadian ports had made material progress. The hon. member who spoke this afternoon (Mr. Macdougall) observed that the trade coming through Maritime ports under the British preference was almost within one per cent of 100 per cent, and he credited the government with arranging to include that extra one per cent. What he failed to notice, however,—possibly he may not have been aware of the fact—is that the reason the 99 per cent of that trade is coming through Canadian ports is to be found in the action taken by this government three years ago providing that on the trade coming through our ports a discount of 10 per cent on existing customs duties under the British preference would be allowed, the effect of that policy having been to divert practically the whole of the trade enjoying the preference.

In addition to these unmistakable and unquestionable evidences of the growing prosperity of the country the Minister of Finance was able to announce to the House a reduction in taxation in many directions. In the first place there was the reduction in taxation in customs duties on automobiles, motor trucks and motorcycles, then the reductions in income tax, certain reductions in the sales tax, and the abolition of the receipt tax. Then, too, there was the announcement of the return to the penny postage. These are all a part of the budget which the minister has presented to the House and which hon. members will be asked later on to declare themselves upon as either favouring or rejecting. I think it is well that these points should be emphasized, because hon. members are apt to lose sight of them in the course of a long debate such as we have had on this occasion. May I, by way of further confirmation of what I have already said, draw the attention of the House to the fact that the earnings of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1925 will show an excess over all operating and income charges of $30,433,852. But the figures have since come in with respect to the other three months of the present year, so that the fuli return is now available for the fiscal year 1925-26. This will show earnings in excess of operating and income charges, not of $30,443,000 but of $33,000,000.

I have already spoken of the favourable balances of trade which have been referred to by the Minister of Finance. Our favourable balance of trade now stands at $401,000,000 odd. This is an increase in our export trade during the year of $247,000,000. The favourable balance this year has increased from $284,000,000 to the $401,000,000 already mentioned. Of this increase no less than $104,000,000, or 90 per cent, is accounted for by trade within the empire. Hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes assert that the government has effected little by its policies. I am seeking not to indulge in generalities but rather to give to the House concrete and exact evidence with respect to our achievements.

One of the important strokes of policy which the government effected, and which previous governments had failed to bring about, was the removal of the British cattle embargo.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite may exclaim, but for twenty-five years the embargo was on, and our friends of the opposition were in office at that time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, part of the time. It was unquestionably due to the efforts of our High Commissioner, the Hon. Peter C. Larkin, supported by the present administration, that that embargo was removed after we came into power. Let me give the House a statement of the effect of the removal of that embargo on April 1, 1923. For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923—to give the figures before the removal—25,758 head of cattle, valued at $2,809,796, had gone into Great Britain. In 1924, after the removal of the embargo, our exportations of cattle to Great Britain had increased to 59,486 head, valued at $6,287,815. In the next year, 1925, that business had increased to 86,245 head, valued at $9,125,667. This last fiscal year ending March 31, 1926, instead of the 25,758 head of cattle that went into the British market before the embargo was removed, 117,819 head were landed there at a valuation, not of $2,800,000 odd, but of $12,432,954.

Now a word in regard to the reduction in taxation. As hon. members know, in addition to the miscellaneous small changes to meet growing conditions, there is a reduction of the tariff duty on automobiles valued at not more than $1,200 and on motor trucks and motorcycles from 22½, 30 and 35 per cent to 12½, 17½ and 20 per cent, while on automobiles valued at more than $1,200 the tariff duty is reduced from 30, 32 and 35 per cent to 15, 25 and 27½ per cent, being the British preferential, the intermediate and the general tariff respectively. I quote these figures that hon. members may have clearly in mind the extent of the reduction in duties that has been made.

In regard to the income tax, the Minister of Finance was able not only to announce a reduction, as he described it, "all along the line," but he was also able to inform the House that the act is now being presented in a less complicated form than heretofore, and that the reductions which he was proposing —this is something that I believe has never been paralleled before—would take effect during this present year, on the incomes of the year just concluded. From one end of the country to the other there is scarcely a home which does not appreciate the fact that it has less to pay out in taxation to the federal treasury than was the case a year ago. To emphasize the importance of the reductions effected, Mr. Speaker, let me cite a few specific instances. On an income of $3,000 the tax was $40; that income is now completely exempt. On an income of $6,000 the tax was $178.50; it will now be $70. On an income of $12,000 the tax was $871.50; it will now be $460. On an income of $18,000 the tax was $1,753.50; that has been reduced to $1,210. There can be no denying the saving which these reductions mean to individuals, to business interests and to future investments in this country. But in order that hon. gentlemen may see that the government's exemptions extend even further than what I have indicated, may I remind the House that in previous budgets the government granted certain exemptions based on the number of children in a family and increased these exemptions on one or two occasions.

The hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) the other evening, referring to the income tax, pointed out that there seemed to be less gathered into the treasury from this source than formerly, and he deduced from that the thought that the country was in some way going behind. What he failed to recognize was that the exemptions I have referred to were reaching out in the directions which it was hoped they might; that is, that large numbers of families which were formerly obliged to pay income tax were now exempt. Under the present budget a man with an income of $4,500 and a wife and three children is entirely exempt, but in 1921, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, he had to pay $76, and last year he contributed to the treasury $40. There is a showing, Sir, which I think will be appreciated by every family in the Dominion.

I omitted to mention that there are also certain sales tax exemptions on a number of articles; that on canned fish for example, the sales tax has been reduced from 5 per cent to 2½ per cent; I did mention that the receipt tax has been completely abolished; and that penny postage will come into force again after July 1 of the present year. Altogether my hon. friend estimates that by his budget he is relieving the people of $25,000,000 of taxation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote two paragraphs from the speech which my hon. friend made when introducing his budget and to ask the House for a moment to consider seriously their significance. He had drawn attention to the fact that great as are the exemptions in taxation which he was prepared to ask the House to make at the present time, he believed they would have been greater still, and that our prosperity would have been still more pronounced, if some of the citizens of the Dominion, rather than knocking conditions in this country, had instead been doing something in the way of boosting them. This is what my hon. friend said in that regard:

> The Canadian people, in coping with the era of depression which followed the collapse of the post-war boom, have been unnecessarily hampered by a plague of gloom which shrouded the thoughts and utterances of too many Canadians, and but for which the prosperity of the moment would be even greater than it is to-day my privilege to record.

But he closed with this optimistic note, which is the other side of the picture:

> This era of depression has been overcome: all statistical compilations which mirror the year to year business of Canada prove it. Canada to-day is steadily growing more prosperous; there is less unemployment; the influx of settlers is growing; and with a hopeful spirit manifesting itself throughout Canada from coast to coast, the year 1926 is full of promise.

Had the right hon. leader of the opposition been present I would have quoted at considerable length from some of his utterances which, I think, indicate the shroud of gloom to which my hon. friend may have had reference, but in his absence I will defer all but one or two brief quotations. I hope hon. members will acquit me of any discourtesy in giving these quotations in the absence of my right hon. friend; I give the quotation and the source in each case, only because I am referring to my right hon. friend as the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, and naturally his expressions gain wider currency than those of any other member of his group. Let us see, in view of what we already see and know to be the case in regard to the figures which have been quoted to-night, whether there really is or was justification for expressions such as these. In the Toronto Mail and Empire of August 19, 1925, just when we were beginning the campaign, I find my right hon. friend quoted as follows:

> Why are we stalemate, why are we in a state of semi-paralysis, bleeding at every pore . . . . the reason is the government's failure to provide adequate tariff protection. . . . .

Then in Saskatoon on October 3, as quoted by the Saskatoon Daily Star, the same graphic language is used:

> Don't ask for anything in the way of assistance because it cannot come. No one can show benefits to Canada, but at any turn our life blood is leaking out and our resisting powers are shattered.

Then in this city on October 28, speaking in the arena, my right hon. friend used these words:

> We ask the people to consider the facts.

I would like my hon. friends to consider those words, "the facts."

> The debt higher,

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the debt is not higher; that is the point I am trying to make. What I want to illustrate to my hon. friends opposite, if possible, is that they have got into the habit of making assertions which are not correct but which are doing an infinite amount of harm to the country and no good to themselves. As Canadians, what is to be gained in seeking to make out conditions in this country to be bad, when we know them to be good?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend addressing himself to me?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I am looking at the hon. gentleman; but I am addressing myself to all hon. gentlemen opposite.

> We ask the people to consider the facts. The debt higher, taxation higher,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it is not; taxation is lower, and I will prove it to my hon. friends.

—our country shunned by immigrants,—

And no wonder, if they were to believe that the things hon. gentlemen opposite say were true. I have already stated that any persons intending to emigrate to Canada would soon go elsewhere if they were to read the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite.

—our life blood draining away. We trace these defects not to any blight of Providence,—

That was a kind thought.

—but to the misdirection of public policy, to the substitution of party barter for political principle,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, that is also untrue.

—to the impotent and blundering legislation of a group of men who call themselves the government of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought that would give my hon. friends a lot of pleasure, but when they think of it, these are mere words, mere assertions, unfortunately not one of which is true. Now listen to the statement in regard to the Canadian National Railways and see how true it sounds. This statement was made at the same time.

If they—

That is, the members of the present administration.

—had designed to wreck the system (Canadian National Railways) they could not have pursued a more effective course than that which they have pursued during the last four years. . . . . they have poured capital moneys in . . . . for purposes non-essential, for purposes wholly of luxury to maintain a scale of competition between the two great systems beyond the financial capacity of the people of Canada to sustain. By so doing they have inundated the system with hundreds of millions of debt, and the struggle for the next four years will be to rescue it from the mire and the swamp into which by this policy they have plunged it.

I venture the assertion, Mr. Speaker, that language of that sort cannot be exceeded. Hyperbole is a figure of speech, but this goes far beyond hyperbole.

With this statement on the one hand, which I think I am justified in characterizing as a picture of gloom, let us take the facts on the other side, facts which cannot be controverted, with respect to the actual prosperity of the country. Here I would like to quote from sources which I think my hon. friends opposite will agree are authentic. I take first of all the statement of the Royal Bank of Canada, which is a conservative organization in more respects than one. In its bulletin issued in March, 1926, the latest I could get, I find the following paragraph:

The generally favourable annual reports issued by the leading Canadian corporations, combined with the excellent position of all statistical indices, and a general increase in the volume of forward buying, indicate a more encouraging outlook for Canadian business in 1926 that at any time in the past five years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite also say "hear, hear"? This relates to our country; it is not a matter of party politics. This is a statement of actual facts, indicating a condition in this country of which every Canadian should be proud.

The annual statements recently published by the leading industries and public utilities, with few exceptions, show an improvement in earnings over 1924.

Commercial failures continue to decline, both in number and volume of liabilities. The seasonal curtailment in general empoyment was the smallest yet registered for January, the index standing at 89.6, the highest for the month since the rcord was begun in 1920.

Speaking of failures in business, the right hon. leader of the opposition was fond of quoting from Dun's Review. Let me give the House the figures from 1922 to 1925, taken from Dun's Review. The number of failures is as follows:

1922	3,630
1923	3,197
1924	2,445
1925	2,337

This indicates a steady reduction in the number of failures since this government has been in office. Now let us take the liabilities represented by these failures. The figures are as follows:

1922	$76 314,000
1923	61,853,000
1924	63,325,000
1925	45,399,000

This shows a reduction of nearly twenty millions in 1925, proving that the business conditions of the country are very rapidly improving.

Now I would like to say a word in regard to bank deposits. On March 31, 1926, the savings deposits in the chartered banks of this country totalled $1,337,500,00, the highest figure in Canadian history, and I would draw attention to the fact that these deposits represent a dollar worth one hundred cents and not depreciated currency, as was the case when my hon. friends opposite were in power. Then let us take the matter of life insurance, which is another index of the prosperity of the people. The aggregate amount of policies in force at the end of 1921 amounted to $2,935,000,000. At the end of the fiscal year 1925 they amounted to $4,159,000,000, or an increase in four years of 42 per cent.

Take the building permits issued in sixty cities in Canada. During the first four months this year they amounted to over $41,000,000, the highest figure for these months in any year since the records were kept by the government of Canada.

Take the ownership of automobiles, another index. It is estimated that the number of automobiles owned in Canada in 1921 was 465,000; at the end of the last fiscal year the number was 728,000 or an increase in four years of 56 per cent, indicating considerable prosperity on the part of the people of this country.

But take the basic facts of production—agricultural production, mineral production, water powers and the like. In agricultural production the total value in 1923 was $1,350,000,000; in 1924, $1,443,000,000; in 1925, $1,708,000,000 or a gain in two years of $358,000,000 in our agricultural production.

Our mineral production in 1923 was $214,000,000; in 1924, $210,000,000; in 1925, $225,000,000.

The water power developed on March 1, 1922, amounted to 2,763,000,000 horse power; in 1926, 4,290,000,000, or an increase of over 55 per cent in less than four years.

The favourable balance of trade I think I have already given. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, the balance of trade was against us. At the end of the fiscal year March 31, 1922, it had changed to a favourable balance of $6,000,000. That has run up year after year as follows:

1923	$142,000,000
1924	165,000,000
1925	284,000,000
1926	401,000,000

I could take up further time, but I shall refrain, in quoting from financial papers to show that with respect to any of these matters that I have referred to, in a comparison of basic production between the United States and Canada, the position of Canada is infinitely better and sounder than that of the United States.

In regard to immigration, as hon. gentlemen opposite are inclined to raise the question now and then, may I direct their attention, by way of giving them a cheering note, to the figures for the present year:

	1925-1926	1924-1925
January	2,324	2,007
February	4,396	2,210
March	15,229	6,575
	21,949	10,792

In the first three months of this year 21,949, as against 10,792 for previous year. So much for the present government being retained in office.

May I cite a few figures with regard to returning immigrants from the United States? The number of Canadians returning from the United States continues to show an increase. The total for the last fiscal year was 47,222, as compared with 43,775 for the previous fiscal year. These were persons who have resided for over six months in the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just one word about the significance of the figures which I have just quoted and in particular as to the significance of the reduction in taxation which has been effected by the present budget. That reduction in taxation is due to the policies of this administration, persistently and consistently pursued during the last four years.

When this government came into office it was confronted with a very difficult situation. We started out to try to meet that situation by introducing policies which we hoped would further production, would lead to wider markets, would be of service to industry generally, and we also sought in a very drastic way to reduce public expenditures so that we could cut down taxation. Now we have succeeded in reducing expenditures to a very considerable degree. But hon. gentlemen opposite, being possessed of the habit of criticising not fairly, but rather of saying anything which might be detrimental to the present administration, have even during the course of the present debate undertaken to say that this government has not cut down expenditures. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who was acting as financial critic in the absence of the hon. member for West York, made a very positive statement in that regard, a statement which was followed, I notice, by one or two others who spoke after him. At page 2459 of the Hansard of April 15th, he is reported as saying:

> So that the government year by year is progressing on an ascending scale in the matter of national expenditures.

He is also reported as saying:

> On the other hand, in the public services of Canada, there has been year by year under this government an annual increase in our expenditure. I make that statement without fear of contradiction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that statement is contradicted by all the official records and the facts that we have; I say that without any fear of contradiction. In charity to my hon. friend who made the statement, I must say that he came into the breach rather quickly and did his best to meet the obligation customarily assumed by the hon. member for West York, who is the regular financial critic of the opposition, and I think he must unintentionally or unwittingly have made the statement that he did.

Hon. gentlemen may say that we are referring to one set of figures while they are referring to another. There are three comparable sets of figures so far as expenditure is concerned. There is, first of all, the total expenditure of the country, including everything—the grand total. In the second place, there is the expenditure which is the ordinary expenditure so classified, together with the expenditure on capital and special accounts. That leaves out of account any expenditure in the way of advances to the Canadian National Railway or to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Finally, there is the ordinary expenditure so classified in the public accounts of the country. Now I say without any possibility of being contradicted from official sources, if you take any one of these three groups of comparable expenditures, you will find that there is not a time since this government came into office up until the present moment when the expenditure has not been reduced every year, year by year, excepting this last year, where there is a slight increase that I shall account for in just a moment—a slight increase which, when explained, will help to show to the House that the record which the government has been making in reducing the expenditure has been kept up all along the line.

Perhaps I may explain at once what the additional expenditure is that has increased the total somewhat. Last year there was an expenditure for the general election of about a million and a half dollars; I shall give the exact figure later. That was an expenditure of an exceptional character. It cannot properly be regarded as indicating any lack of effort on the part of the administration to continue reducing the expenditure.

But there was another item which was very much larger, and that is the amount paid by the government to the Home Bank depositors, which is an exceptional expenditure and which cannot be considered as coming within the ordinary expenses of government.

In the third place, there was considerable increased expenditure incurred in payment of pensions to the returned veterans, due to the policy which the government adopted of permitting appeals to a pensions board. A considerable amount of increased expenditure was incurred on that account. These three items together will account for from one to two times the difference that exists between the expenditure of this and of the previous year. But let me give the House, so they will be of record, the exact expenditure under these three heads. The total expenditure of Canada for the fiscal years 1920-21 to 1925-26, both inclusive, including advances to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, are as follows:

1922	463,528,389
1923	434,735,277
1924	370,589,247
1925	351,169,803
1926 (estimated)	355,928,000

I say these figures show a substantial reduction in the total expenditure year by year, with the slight increase that I have accounted for in the last year. Now take the total ordinary, special and capital expenditures of Canada for the fiscal years 1920-21 to 1925-26, both inclusive, not including advances to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. These figures will be found on page 44 of the Public Accounts of Canada for the year 1925. Under the total disbursements I will quote from the Public Accounts as they are here:

1921	$418,620,544 48
1922	365,701,790 85
1923	350,608,546 72
1924	344,021,786 75
1925	339,902,775 94
1926 (estimated)	342,228,000 00

There is a steady decrease year by year, excepting for the last year, where the estimated figure is $342,000,000. Then you have on the first column of the same page the expenditures chargeable to consolidated fund, what is known as the ordinary expenditures, and you find these reductions:

1921	$361,118,145 21
1922	347,560,690 63
1923	332,293,732 09
1924	324,813,189 75
1925	318,891,901 25
1926 (estimated)	321,350,000 00

These figures have been checked up by the Auditor General of Canada, and I hope that from now on hon. members opposite will not make the assertion, which helps to destroy the credit of this country, that expenditures have not been reduced in the manner I have described, because the Public Accounts make perfectly clear exactly what has taken place in the way of reductions.

Now I will give the figures in reference to the extra amounts that I said accounted for the increase of the past year. Payments to pensioners increased over the previous year by $2,273,752. The Home bank depositors received $2,521,000, and the cost of the general election is estimated at $1,652,000, or a total increase accounted for by these three items of $6,446,752. Now, may I make this assertion, which I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to correct? It is that the difference between the grand total expenditure to-day and the expenditure in 1921-22—and in that year we had only been in office three months—amounts to $107,000,000. That represents the difference this year as compared with the expenditure in 1921-22. But if the comparison is made with the year 1920-21 when the right hon. leader of the opposition was in office, the difference will be found to be $170,000,000 instead of $107,000,000. In other words during these two years $277,000,000 in the way of additional expenditures were added to the obligations of this country over and above our rate of expenditure in the fiscal year 1925-26. Now if we have succeeded in bringing down taxation in the way we have it has been due to the fact that we have consistently and persistently pursued a policy of reduction in expenditure.

There is one other observation I would like to make. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we have increased taxes. The statement was made by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdougall), who spoke this afternoon. He said the sales tax during the period his leader was in office, and before, was less than it was after we came into power—that we added to the sales tax and some other taxes. Why were these additional taxes imposed? It was because of the financial situation that had developed under hon. gentlemen opposite which was bringing this country to a state of ruin and bankruptcy and which had to be stopped at all costs. Hon. gentlemen opposite when in office—and this is apart altogether from war expenditure,—went on increasing the total expenditure of the country at a very considerable figure. But they did not meet that additional expenditure by taxation, they met it out of borrowing. Now every dollar borrowed means so much in the way of future taxation, and all the money hon. gentlemen opposite borrowed during those years to meet current expenditures instead of raising it by taxation is properly chargeable to themselves rather than to this administration by way of taxation. When we got into office what did we find? We found that the credit of this country had depreciated to a point that the country had to pay seven per cent interest at New York to finance the very best securities, government guaranteed securities of the Canadian National Railways, and we found the dollar worth only 82 and 83 cents.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend is surely wrong there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I simply wish to say that what my right hon. friend has stated is incorrect.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Wherein is it incorrect?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend should know that the discount at that time was five per cent. He has quoted the extreme rate of discount during the period to which he alludes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend, and I challenge him to correct me, that he himself was responsible for borrowing money at seven per cent on government securities.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend has invited some challenging and I tell him this: During the period that we borrowed money in New York we got it on as favourable terms as any other country in the world—in fact more favourable.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Furthermore, as I showed in this House two years ago, at the time of the hundred million loan in New York we then got a higher price.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I direct the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentleman has not challenged my statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It remains perfectly true that he himself was responsible for paying seven per cent on government guaranteed securities in New York, and we have been obtaining loans on those securities at four and a half per cent, and certainly under five per cent when the last loan was made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend must think that he makes the money market.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me make the position clear. I say we found the country in the position I have described when we came into office. We discovered that if we were to save the credit of Canada, if we were to prevent this country from drifting into the position of other countries in the world whose currencies were completely depreciated and whose credit was going from bad to worse, we would have to balance the budget instead of having deficits year after year as hon. gentlemen opposite had. We started out to balance the budget. We made that our first effort, and although we had to deprive ourselves of the opportunity of doing much in the way of public works and aiding other enterprises, we nevertheless believed that the patriotic thing, the right thing, to do was to effect the most rigid economy and to retrench as much as possible, and that was and is our policy.

Now, may I say this so that there shall be no mistake about it: Hon. gentlemen opposite came into office in 1911. They found the revenues and the expenditures of the country fixed within very definite bounds. By 1914 they had increased the expenditure of Canada very considerably. When the war came on—

9 p.m.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the revenues?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The revenues had not increased proportionately. When the war came on, instead of increasing taxation hon. gentlemen opposite during the first couple of years raised less money in taxation from the people that remained at home. I wish to make a further statement, which I challenge any hon. member to deny—and I think it is the most astonishing statement that anyone could find it possible to make—and that is that the whole capital cost of the war and of demobilization, during the four years of war and the two years of demobilization—every dollar of that remains to be paid. Not a single dollar was raised in taxation by hon. gentlemen opposite to meet the capital cost of war, not a single dollar was raised by the conscription of wealth, although men were being conscripted. These are the facts.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend has again thrown out a challenge. I do not think his statements are true. I think my right hon. friend is entirely wrong. Further than that, he is wrong in the judgment of a gentleman in whom he has great confidence. I refer to the Right Hon. George P. Graham who, from his place in this House, denounced the late government for overtaxing the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is entirely mistaken. The Right Hon. Mr. Graham agreed absolutely with the statement I made to the House. My hon. friend will find figure for figure in the Public Accounts. He will find figure for figure in the statistical year book. Any hon. member who will look up the facts will find that with respect to the capital cost of the war and demobilization every dollar of it was met by borrowed money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My right hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, says that I will find I am wrong, and makes his reference to Hon. Mr. Graham. I will state what I am referring to, so that my right hon. friend will be sure to find out that he is absolutely incorrect, as the fact is. Exception was taken—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was a challenge given; is the right hon. member afraid to hear it? The fiscal policy of the then government was objected to strenuously by Hon. Mr. Graham, or, as he is now, the Right Hon. Mr. Graham, on the ground that it was absolutely too heavy a burden for the people of Canada to carry, and it was also objected to by the present Minister of National Defence. In so far as the cost of the war is concerned my right hon. friend's figures are incorrect. I pointed that out two sessions ago. Sir Thomas White made his calculation of five hundred million dollars odd.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I direct attention of the House to the figures I quoted in the previous debate. They are on Hansard, and I am ready to submit the matter to the Finance department, to the statistical department of the government, or to any authoritative body. I stand by the statement I made that it is absolutely correct with regard to the cost.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my right hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Mr SPEAKER: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my right hon. friend go a little bit further?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am trying to—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am trying. Mr. Speaker, to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. He has offered to refer the whole question to any department, or to some authority or other. I am quite willing that that should be done if he will refer the whole thing—if he will refer for example the whole amount of the addition to the capital debt of $90,000,000 not shown, and if he will also refer the whole question of expenditure as given at page 3256 of Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not wish to refer anything unless I referred the whole of it. But let me go a step further. Not only is what I have said about the capital cost of the war quite correct, but hon. members, in placing this colossal mortgage on the back of the country—because that is what it is—increasing thereby the interest on the public debt that has to be carried year by year, made it more difficult for subsequent governments to collect taxation to help to meet that great obligation. They issued a large proportion of their bonds tax exempt. When they were carrying on the finances of this country by issuing tax exempt bonds and were increasing the public debt of this country in that way they were laying up an obligation which subsequent governments had to meet and which we had to face. That is why we had to put on extra taxation—because hon. gentlemen opposite had borrowed instead of taxed and robbed us of the opportunity of getting in the form of income tax what we should have had and what any government should have had as a source of revenue.

I am taking more time than I should, but it is better that the country should know the exact facts, and I think hon. members will acquit me of the charge of having taken up too much of the time of the House this session. I certainly did not take up much of the time during the first month. Let me supplement what I have just said by an accurate statement of the figures. I will deal with the revenue from taxation only, since that revenue constitutes the real binder upon the taxpayers of Canada. The revenue raised in the pre-war fiscal year ended 1914, after hon. members opposite had been in office three or four years, amounted to $126,143,275, or $16.40 per head of officially estimated population. In 1911, when hon. members opposite came into office, the revenue from taxation was not $126,000,000 but $88,000,000 odd, or $12.31 per head of population, instead of $16.40, showing that as soon as my hon. friends came into office they began to increase the expenditures of the country. In 1915 the revenue from taxation amounted to $97,000,000 odd, or $12.40 per head of the population. In 1916 the revenue from taxation was $124,000,000 or $15.51 per head of the population. Those were war years. Hon. members will notice that less was raised in taxation during the war years than was raised in taxation in 1914, the year before the war commenced; at a time when the financing should have led to increased taxation, less taxation was being imposed. Then in the year 1921 the government raised from taxation the sum of $368,770,498, but they added to the national debt $92,000,000, a process which implies future taxation. If they had sought to balance the budget as we have sought to do, they would have had to raise $460,780,858. In 1922 the revenue from taxation was $319,926,013, but they added to the national debt $81,256,817. To balance the accounts for the year they would have had to raise $401,182,830. It was this ruinous and spendthrift course which in two years added $173,000,000 to the national debt, more than one-half the total pre-war debt of Canada. This had to be stopped, and that is what this government sought to do. We set out to do it first of all by seeking to cut down expenditure and by introducing policies which would lead to increased production. In 1923 we raised in taxation $335,453,431. That was not enough to balance the budget and we were forced to add to the national debt $31,641,067, but that was the last addition we made to the national debt; since that time we have been reducing the national debt rapidly. In the three latest fiscal years combined, 1924, 1925 and 1926, this government raised by taxation in the aggregate $962,913,325, but at the same time we wiped out the national debt to the extent of $62,308,183. The current taxes of the country during the three years were something like $900,600,000, on the basis of a tax revenue of about $300,000,000 per annum. Yet those who in 1921 imposed on the people in current taxation $368,770,498 and in future taxation $92,010,360, or a total of $460,980,858, and in the year 1922 in current taxation, $319,926,013 and future taxation $81,256,817, making a total of $401,182,830, have such short memories that they now accuse us of excessive taxation.

With the permission of the House I desire to place on Hansard a carefully prepared comparative table showing taxation necessary to balance the budget, actual total taxation and consequent addition or subtraction to the public debt. The statement covers the years from 1921 to 1926, both inclusive, and shows that in 1921 there was added to the public debt over and above taxation levied the sum of $92,000,000 odd. In 1922 there was an addition of $81,000,000 and in 1923, $31,000,000. In 1924, 1925 and 1926 there were subtractions of $36,000,000; $345,000; and $26,000,000 respectively. In other words, there was a saving to the taxpayer in present taxation or future taxation arising out of debt of over $100,000,000 as compared with 1922, and over $160,000,000 as compared with 1921.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Will the Prime Minister say whether the amounts guaranteed on behalf of the National railways are included in the statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the statement includes the amount for the Canadian National Railways, but it includes ordinary, capital and special expenditures and the cash advances made to the railways to meet the interest payments due to the general investor. I will now give the statement to Hansard:

Comparative table of fiscal period 1920-21 to 1925-26, both inclusive, showing: (a) Taxation necessary to balance Budget; (b) Actual total taxation; (c) Consequent addition or subtraction to Public Debt.

—	Taxation Necessary to Balance Budget	Actual Total Taxation	Addition to or Subtraction from Debt
1921	460,780,858	368,770,498	+92,010,360
1922	401,182,830	319,926,013	+81,256,817
1923	367,094,408	335,453,341	+31,641,067
1924	305,725,213	341,718,807	−35,993,594
1925	293,568,929	293,914,518	− 345,589
1926	301,311,000	327,280,000	−25,969,000

This table shows:

The amount of taxation required in each year to balance the national accounts. In last 3 years averaged slightly over $300,000,000 as compared with $401,000,000 in 1922 and as compared with $460,000,000 in 1921.

A saving to taxpayer in present taxation, or future taxation arising out of debt of over $100,000,000 as compared with 1922, of over $160,000,000 as compared with 1921.

I hasten now, Mr. Speaker, to bring my remarks to a conclusion. One feature of the budget which I am sure will commend itself to the House and the country alike is the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has undertaken for the first time to disclose what proportion of the taxation of the country goes to meet war obligations as contrasted with the proportion which is devoted to the discharge of obligations arising out of ordinary business of the government apart from the war.

To some of us, it is difficult to think in terms of the large sums with which I have been dealing. Our case will perhaps be clearer if it is stated in terms of the tax contributions per individual and the increase or decrease in the amount of the individual's share of the national obligations, taking the populations from the census and the annual official estimates of population.

Taxation in 1921 was at the rate of $41.96 per head of the census population, but the government also borrowed and spent $10.47 per head of the population, making the total contribution of the individual in present and future taxes $52.43. Similarly in 1922 taxation of $35.78 per head was supplemented by borrowings of $9.09, or $44.87 in all. In 1923 the individual's share of the national taxation was increased to $36.93, but the borrowings on his account were reduced to $3.48 or $40.41 in all. In 1924 his taxes were again slightly higher at $37.04, but instead of adding to his obligations he reduced them by $3.90, or in other words, his net payments in current taxes were only $33.14. In 1925 his taxes were $31.42 and his obligations reduced by 4 cents, making his payments in current taxes, $31.38. Finally, in 1926 his taxes were $34.47, but his capital obligations were reduced by $2.73, leaving his net contribution for current purposes $31.74. Here are the figures in tabular form:

TABLE SHOWING TAX CONTRIBUTION PER INDIVIDUAL AND THE INCREASE OR DECREASE IN THE AMOUNT OF THE INDIVIDUAL'S SHARE OF THE NATIONAL OBLIGATION FOR THE FISCAL YEARS ENDED MARCH 31, 1921 TO 1926, INCLUSIVE

—	Per head census or estimated population	—	Per head census or estimated population	—	Per head census or estimated population
	$ cts.		$ cts.		$ cts.
Taxation in 1921 was at rate of	41 96	but government also borrowed and spent	10 47	making total contribution of individual in present and future taxation	52 43
Taxation in 1922 was...	35 78	supplemented by borrowings of	9 09	or in all.....	44 87
Taxation in 1923—the individual share of the national taxation was increased to	36 93	but borrowings on his account were reduced to	3 48	or in all.....	40 41
Taxation in 1924—his taxes were again slightly higher at	37 04	but instead of adding to his obligations he reduced them by	3 90	or, in other words, his net payments in current taxation were only	33 14
Taxation in 1925—his taxes were	31 42	and his obligations were reduced by	0 04	making his payments in current taxes	31 38
Finally, taxation in 1926—his taxes were	34 47	but his capital obligations were reduced by	2 73	leaving his net contribution for current purposes.	31 74

Thus the average present and future taxation of the Canadian people for current purposes has been reduced from $52.43 per head in 1921 and $44.87 in 1922 to $31.38 in 1925 and $31.74 in 1926, the slight increase in the latest year being due largely to the increased payments in war pensions and to the compensation paid to the Home Bank depositors. Of that $31.74 of current taxation, $17.09 or considerably over half was due to the war.

Stating the same thing in terms of the family, one may say that the current cost of government per family of five in present or future taxation amounted to the following sums over a period covering the last six fiscal years:

Fiscal year ending	Cost of Government per family of five
1921	$262 15
1922	224 35
1923	202 05
1924	165 70
1925	156 90
1926	158 70

In other words, the annual present or future taxation for current administration imposed upon the Canadian family is over $100 a year less in 1926 than it was in 1921. Or for every dollar of taxes which the average family paid for current purposes in 1921 it paid 60½ cents in 1926. The record speaks for itself.

Let us now for a moment consider what becomes of this $158.70 of taxation which the family of five paid for current purposes in 1926. First and foremost, $85.45 or more than half, went to meet the current expenditures arising out of the war, while $5.60 represents the year's advances to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Subsidies to the provinces account for $6.50 and the year's outlay on the building of the new Welland canal for another $6.30—an expenditure which in other days would have been met by borrowing. Leaving these latter items out of account, the first two alone, which had no existence before the war, account for $91.05 out of the grand total of $158.70, leaving $67.65 as the figure of current taxation for ordinary purposes, as compared with $82.00 for the family of five before the war.

Here again, we have evidence of the economy and efficiency with which the regular administration of the country is being carried on—evidence which is truly remarkable in view of the fact that the dollar of 1926 has less than two-thirds of the purchasing power of the dollar of 1914.

I must now in conclusion thank the House for the indulgence it has displayed in following me in the remarks I have made to-day. I have thought it desirable in view of all that has been said throughout the country at various times, as well as in the House in the course of this debate, to submit to the people what I believe to be a true statement of the present position of Canada, a statement which, far from disclosing any trend in the direction of ruin, as one might gather from some of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, reveals a tendency in a diametrically opposite direction towards increasingly greater prosperity. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if to-day we are able to announce to the country a vast reduction in taxation as disclosed in the budget now before parliament; if we are able to give to the people the figures quoted in the course of my remarks to-night, and which are unmistakable in their significance as to the prosperity which at present prevails in Canada, it is due first of all undoubtedly, and above all, to a beneficent Providence. But it is also due, I humbly contend, to the persistent and vigorous effort on the part of this government to retrench in matters of expenditure, and to the wisdom of policies which have been inaugurated making for greater because cheaper production as a result of the reducing of duties on the implements of production, and in other ways. I submit, Sir, that the prosperity of the country is due in very large measure to these circumstances and to the fact that the government has endeavoured to secure larger and wider markets by means of trade treaties entered into with France, Italy, Holland as well as with other parts of the empire, as for example, our sister dominion of Australia. It is due partly too, to the removal of the cattle embargo—another evidence of this government's desire to secure wider markets for the people of Canada. The present satisfactory state of affairs in the country, I now say, will be enhanced in larger measure by a continuance of the pursuit of that policy of cheaper production in relation to agriculture, mining, lumbering and fishing, and it will be materially aided by the reduction in the duty on automobiles and motor trucks, which beyond question are instruments of production in every field of industry, making as they do for the freer and more expeditious distribution of the products of industry, and materially promoting the business of manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers and consumers alike. The reduction of the customs duties on automobiles will, we hope and believe, without injury to the industries concerned, make this great utility more generally available to the people of the country and at a lower cost than formerly. Again may I say that the budget which has been brought down on the present occasion speaks for itself as to the efforts which this government has made during the past four years to bring about improved conditions in Canada. And the conditions in the country speak for themselves as to what has been accomplished in that period of time.

If anything else has been needed, in addition to what has already been mentioned of the policies adopted to further the interests of this Dominion, it is to be found in the supreme effort of the government to keep Canada united from coast to coast, to prevent divisions from arising in different parts of the country through any attempt to protect special interests at the expense of the rest of the community. We have sought in all that we have done during the period that we have been in office to reconcile differences rather than to exaggerate them, and as far as lay in our power to minimize and where possible to put an end to differences between classes, between races and between creeds in order to make our country a united Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, believing that as we make Canada strong so are we making, in the surest and most enduring way, the finest contribution we can make to the great empire to which we are all so proud to belong.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I rise to support the amendment. In clear and unambiguous language it is a challenge to the honour of the House, an appeal to the conscience of the nation. Anyone who has listened to the lengthy oration which we have heard this afternoon and evening must realize how truly, in the mind of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), any appeal to honour is "milk and water." Milk and water! That appeals to the honour of this nation and this House; that promises made in the Speech from the Throne are not made to be disregarded but to be kept; that promises made to induce support are made for the purpose of being kept when you have the power to keep them and are not to be repudiated in the House you control. Milk and water? Of course, milk and water! Anything that savours of national honour is milk and water. The long series of misstatements to which for three or four hours we have listened to-night are simply calculated to mislead and indeed to discredit and dishonour parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is not parliamentary to say of an hon. member that his statements are calculated to mislead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I have a right to say that misstatements have been made. And misstatements are never made but for one purpose—to be believed. Therefore if they are to be believed they must be misleading.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will find in Bourinot that even such an expression as "the hon. gentleman is not candid in his statement" is not parliamentary. I rule that the expression "calculated to mislead" should be withdrawn.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly I withdraw the statement without hesitation if Your Honour so rules. But I desire to point out that the distinction between saying, "a man is not candid" and "what he says is calculated to mislead," is so clear that even a first year student-at-law would understand it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT: There cannot be any misunderstanding about that. Now, Sir, we will proceed a step further. The words, "glaring misstatements" have been held in the British House of Commons to be in order. I did not characterize these statements as glaring misstatements, but as calculated to mislead the House and the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: I withdraw the observations if they are ruled out of order, but I made them for the purpose of characterizing my appreciation of the statements that were made. As the right hon. gentleman proceeded with his speech I could not help but think, Sir, of the series of great debates in the British House of Commons that took place between Disraeli and Peel. You will recollect that Peel had been the leader of the Conservative party, and later he introduced a measure which resulted in the repeal of the Corn Laws, although he had appealed to the people for support to retain them. Mr. Disraeli, as he then was, attacked Peel and pointed out that such a course robbed parliament of its reputation and destroyed the honour of the institutions they were sworn to protect. During the course of his observations on one occasion Mr. Peel made some reference to Mr. Canning, whom he had not treated very well. Thereupon Mr. Disraeli said he could not understand the right hon. gentleman ever mentioning the name of Canning in view of the way in which he had treated him.

This afternoon the House heard the right hon. leader of the government refer to a speech which he said was made in Kitchener by the leader of the opposition. He is not in his place to answer for himself I very much regret to say, but I have before me the report in the paper published in the community in which the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) resides, and I find that next day in the Kitchener Record he summarized the observations made by Mr. Meighen in this way:

> Mr. Meighen states correctly that he in parliament favoured giving preference for preference, which is exactly the attitude I repeatedly ascribed to him.

Those are the words attributed by the hon. member for North Waterloo to the right hon. leader of the opposition in the speech to which the right hon. leader of the government has referred. In that summary there are none of the terms to which we listened this afternoon. I have read the report of the speech made by the right hon. leader at Kitchener for the purpose of ascertaining if the language used in the local paper could be attributed to him. He did say:

> We believe in preference for preference.

Those of you who read your Hansard will realize that when the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, introduced his budget in 1897, in which he gave a preference to Great Britain without receiving any, Sir Charles Tupper, then leader of the Conservative party, protested. He said we could have had a preference without giving any at any time if we so desired, but that is not what we want. We want something for something and not nothing for something. We are not going to give away our heritage and our patrimony unless we get something in return. Therefore Sir Charles Tupper opposed the preference put forward by Mr. Fielding. And what is more, the Conservative party has steadfastly clung to that one conviction, that we must receive a preference if we give a preference. The right hon. leader of the opposition was upbraided, at least by the hon. member for North Waterloo, because he did not go far enough in his speech. He said:

> That would be of no practical use whatever. If Canada gives a preference it must necessarily be on manufactured products, the very thing Canadian industry does not desire.

In that statement signed by the hon. member for North Waterloo there is no reference to the observations which are now attributed to the right hon. leader of the opposition. I go further. I have in my hand various statements made by him in other places in which—

Mr. EULER: If I may interrupt my hon friend? I am sure he would not do me an injustice.

[Mr Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly not.

Mr. EULER: The mere fact of my statement in regard to the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition at that time I think does not necessarily preclude his having said what the Prime Minister says he said.

Mr. BENNETT: That may be, Mr. Speaker, but in the report of October 28, 1925, of the meeting held in the town of Kitchener by the right hon. leader of the opposition there appears no language such as that attributed to him by the right hon. leader of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend, will he say I quoted from a source which does not exist?

Mr. BENNETT: No, Mr. Speaker, I will have occasion before I conclude to refer to the erroneous impressions which the right hon. gentleman created. I did not say he was quoting from a source that did not exist, but I do say that his quotation was not correct. Let us go a step further in respect to that. The right hon. gentleman said he was greatly surprised that the leader of the opposition would make the statements which he was alleged to have made at Kitchener. That is what brought the Canning incident to my mind. The county of Waterloo has a history. It was once represented in this parliament by the right hon. leader of the government. In 1911 he there sought re-election, and the nomination proceedings were reported by the Toronto Globe:

> Hon. Mr. King read extracts from Mr. Borden's speeches in the House of Commons, in which the Conservative leader referred to the danger of war with Germany, and urged the government to go to Britain's aid with a dreadnought or a cash contribution.

These are the words of Mr. King:

> Are the people of this country to place at the head of affairs a man who would be precipitated into such a position as this, who will take from the treasury, and who would have taken enough money to build two dreadnoughts and send that money to England, so that they could spend it as they please! and against what country? He was ready to send money to build warships to fight Germany.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just reminded the House that it is desirable to look in the local papers for accurate reports of what takes place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just a moment, I have the right, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I protest. What is my right hon. friend's question? Let him ask it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that what he is reading at present—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have a right to deny a statement. I say that the statement my hon. friend is reading is not a true statement; that has been repeatedly stated on the floor of this House. He will not find in any paper published in Waterloo county the words attributed to me which he is now reading. They were never uttered; the proceedings that are purported to be reported in the quotation he gives were held in camera and not in public.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am making a statement which I am entitled to make, when my hon. friend makes a challenge of this kind. This has been denied over and over again, and he comes now, in 1926, with statements which have been denied since 1911. I deny emphatically the statement read by my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has denied that the report in the Toronto Globe is accurate. The Toronto Globe was then supporting him and his party. I am now quoting these further words from the Toronto Globe. The correspondent adds this:

> A larger number of delegates were of German descent, and they loudly applauded Hon. Mr. King's statement.
> Referring to the candidature of Major Weichel, he asked: How are the Germans of this country going to stand behind him, when he is supporting a man who is taking such a stand in regard to the defences of the empire?

These are not my words; they come from the Toronto Globe. The Toronto Globe supported my hon. friend's party at that time and the Toronto Globe correspondent was in the secrets, at least, of the Liberal party. I can understand the right hon. gentleman's memory being defective. I would not like to say, fifteen years later, that a particular incident was or was not correctly reported. I read this from the Toronto Globe for what it is worth, just as it appears.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that, far from my memory being defective, I remember distinctly that as soon as that report appeared in the Toronto paper I denied it emphatically and challenged anyone to prove it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Any hon. gentleman may deny a statement.

Mr. STEVENS: He did not rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CANNON: Give us some more of that stuff.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not now discussing the war with Turkey. I will reach the Solicitor General by the time we get to Mesopotamia, and possibly the flesh pots of Egypt; I do not know, we may discuss those subjects.

Mr. CANNON: I think you struck me once before.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no memory of it. The hon. gentleman flatters himself, which is not unusual. Now, Mr. Speaker, may I proceed? I was observing that it is no wonder the hon. gentleman was somewhat surprised at the observations attributed to the leader of the opposition which were alleged to have appeared in the papers. I have no more reason to believe the paper was correct in its observations with respect to my right hon. leader than I have for disbelieving the observations which appear in the Toronto Globe with respect to the Prime Minister.

So much for that phase of it; now let us proceed to the next point made by the right hon. gentleman. With great care and at considerable length he stated that this country had reduced its debt and reduced the burden of taxation upon the people of Canada since this government came into power. In making that assertion he placed on Hansard a mass of figures, and challenged anyone to controvert his statements. I hold in my hands the public accounts for 1925 and I ask hon. members to turn to page 46. There we find that on March 31, 1922, the debt was $2,422,135,801.73. The right hon. gentleman gave us the exact figures brought down to date, not the figures which were presented by the Minister of Finance but those figures corrected by him, and here they are, in order that there may be no misunderstanding: $2,391,000,000. So that to-day we are said to have a debt of $2,391,000,000, whereas on the 31st day of March, 1922, we had a debt of some $2,422,000,000. That is the real state of the public accounts as disclosed by the records and the speech of the Prime Minister. But it is not important to add together what the income may have been and deduct from it what the expenditures may have been; the cold facts are that in the next column it is shown that in the year 1922 the debt increased by $81,000,000 in round figures; in 1923 it increased by $31,000,000, making a total as you will observe of $112,000,000. From that we deduct $35,993,593.86, the decrease in 1924; $345,589.29, the decrease in 1925, and this year's reductions, which are said to be some $33,000,000. Adding those together we get a total of about $69,000,000 against additions to the debt of about $112,000,000 leaving a net increase of $43,000,000. Those are the facts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend dispute the accuracy of the figures I gave with respect to the reduction in expenditure, as found on page 44 of the Public Accounts? I was talking of the public expenditure when I quoted these figures.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. BENNETT: I must protest, Mr. Speaker; this is the second or third time the right hon. gentleman has interrupted in this way.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman will please put his question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend—who is now speaking about the public debt; I was speaking of expenditure—say that the figures I quoted as to the revenue and expenditure are not exactly as set forth in the Public Accounts?

Mr. BENNETT: I hope the right hon. gentleman does not think we are as gullible as all that. If, when the government came into power, the debt of this country was a certain amount, and to-day it is more than that, what is the result?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask another question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I was courteous to hon. gentlemen opposite when they asked me questions, and I am entitled to the same courtesy. May I ask my hon. friend if the figures he is giving the House at present do or do not include the amounts paid out for the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course they do not, except to the extent that the direct obligations were included; they do not include the indirect obligations at all. I am coming to the railway situation in a moment, and when I get through with that I suppose the right hon. gentleman will have some more questions. Let this country and this House be under no misapprehension. When the right hon. gentleman came into power the debt of this country was as I have indicated, and to-day it is greater. What interest have we in income and expenditure if at the end of the period of time the obligations of this country, apart altogether from its indirect obligations with respect to the railways, are more than they then were? Let there be no misunderstanding in that respect; these are the facts.

I do not propose to go into the question of income and expenditure except to point out that in the year 1920-21 the government of the day determined that at all hazards it would balance the budget. You will observe that for the first time in the history of Canada the government then collected more than $400,000,000 in revenue. That will be found at page 45 of the Public Accounts, the exact figure being $436,292,184.41. In 1922, in consequence of certain remissions of taxation, that was reduced to $382,000,000, but in the year in which this government had full control, in 1923, it exacted from the people $403,000,000, and the next year $406,000,000, so that of the three times in the history of this country in which over $400,000,000 was extracted by way of taxation from the people of this country, two of them were occasions on which the taxes were imposed by the government of the right hon. gentleman opposite. That is the position, and notwithstanding this fact, the condition of the national finances is as I have indicated from the Public Accounts, and not otherwise. So much for the national debt situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? He has referred to page 46. Unfortunately I had not the opportunity to look at page 46. I do not think my hon. friend wishes to mislead the House, but will he say whether I am wrong in this? On page 46 of the Public Accounts, in the fourth column is given the net debt of Canada, and for the year 1922 that is shown as $2,422,000,000, in round figures.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In 1923 the net debt is given, in round figures, as $2,453,000,000; in 1924, $2,417,000,000; and in 1925, $2,417,000,000. Those are the figures that are given there, and the last two years show a very distinct reduction in the net debt of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: I said all that, but I am pointing out that if you take the national debt of this country for the year in which hon. gentlemen opposite assumed control in this country and the national debt to-day, and if you take the deficits on the one hand and the surpluses on the other, you will observe that this country to-day is worse off than when they came into power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall not interrupt my hon. friend again, but may I make this one observation?

Mr. BENNETT: If it is a question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was not the year we came into office the year when he and his friends were in office for nine months, and this government for only the other three months?

Mr. BENNETT: My right hon. friend is permitting his feelings to get the better of him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I said 1922. That, of course, was the fiscal year for which we had control—at least, I was not here, as the right hon. gentleman knows. At any rate I tried to give my hon. friend the benefit of that. I took the succeeding years as well. I took the surpluses on the one hand and the deficits on the other, and took the debt, and showed what was the difference in the national debt of this country.

My right hon. friend has claimed great credit to the administration for having created what he called wider markets. Wider markets for whom? Will any hon. gentleman opposite deny that every trade treaty that has been negotiated by this administration since it came into power has resulted in increasing the trade of that country with us and decreasing the trade of this country with them? Wider markets? The United States, in their official bulletin issued in November, 1924, pointed out that every revision of the tariff in this country under the present government had been a revision downward, and that the effect of revising it downward had been to increase the trade in manufactured goods of the people of the United States with Canada, with a corresponding loss to our manufacturers in this country. Talk about your treaty with the West Indies, or about your treaty with France or Italy or Australia. The cold-blooded facts are these: We have increased the trade these countries have done with us, but we have lessened the trade we have done with them. That is the position. Hon. gentlemen opposite get up and tell this House that this government is widening markets in this country. Of course, you are widening them; you are widening them for our competitors, for those countries who are sending out commercial agents to every part of the world. You are widening them for the United States, increasing the sale of their products to us, and diminishing our sales to them, with corresponding loss of work for our own people. So much for that.

Then, arising out of that matter, my right hon. friend referred to the great reductions that had been made in the duties on agricultural implements, and to the decrease in prices with respect to them. That, he pointed out, is a wonderful thing accomplished for this country. But, Sir, I will point out that the prices of implements in western Canada at least are not any less than they were before this tariff was reduced if you deduct the sales tax and adjust your prices accordingly. What happened? Let us look this thing fairly in the eye. A colleague of the right hon. gentleman whom an informed electorate rejected in Durham cried almost in tears when the government reduced the duty on agricultural implements, and further, if the right hon. gentleman will induce Mr. Massey to withdraw the privilege that he attached to a letter he wrote to the right hon. leader of this opposition, so that the letter may be given to the people of this country, we shall have a clear understanding of what he thought of those reductions in the tariff. Why, Sir, what happened then? Mr. Massey, the president, and Mr. Bradshaw journeyed to this city when the duty was being removed, and told the government of the day what the situation was. Ruin staring them in the face, they said; workmen who had been with them for years thrown out of work. And the government did what? It took off the sales tax, and it made free the materials that they use in the manufacture of their machines. That is what the government did. And the Massey-Harris Company is better off to-day and actually is enjoying higher protection than ever before. I warn my friends to the left—Beware! The government that yielded to the importunities of Mr. Massey, the government that put upon the free list all the materials that are used in the manufacture of implements, the government that did these things is now playing with this automobile tariff, and the people of this country who have been made to believe that this government is going to strike a blow at protection will find out before very long that the automobile industry will have a higher rate of protection than it ever had.

Mr. ROBB: Then why delay the process?

Mr. POWER: What are you complaining about then?

Mr. BENNETT: Because of the duplicity of this government.

Mr. POWER: The people won't mind the duplicity if they get lower prices.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman thinks that national honour can be bartered and sold for dollars and cents. I say it cannot, and before I conclude I hope to show to this House, and peradventure to the people of this country, that to continue longer this form of hypocrisy is to put a premium on organized cant, and is saying to the people of this country: "We can fool you by buying you with your own money." There are some, I daresay, who will applaud that idea as being sound. I refer to my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) and to my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power).

Mr. MALCOLM: I did not applaud.

Mr. BENNETT: You looked as though you would like to. Let me proceed a step further. What has been the result in Nova Scotia? The two great factors that are to be considered in the manufacture of implements are steel ingots and pig iron. Do you realize what the position of this country was before the right hon. gentleman passed his tariff and put these materials on the free list? I have in my hand the figures with respect to the iron industry taken from the Iron Age, with which I am sure most hon. gentlemen are familiar and you will observe that the way in which they compute is from an index number. They take 100 as representing the monthly average production of pig iron in 1913 in the United States and Canada. In 1914 the figure stood at 69 for Canada and 75 for the United States. I will skip the years 1915 and 1916 when production went up, and will come to 1919. In that year the figure in the United States was 100 and in Canada 81. The next year the figure went up to 120 in the United States and in Canada to 96. In 1921 it was 54 in the United States and 60 in Canada. In 1922 the figure was 87 in the United States; in Canada it had shrunk to 38. In 1923 the figure in the United States was 130 and in Canada 87. In 1924 when this beautiful scheme devised to please Mr. Massey became effective I find that in the United States the relative number was 101 and in Canada it was 59. In 1925 it was 118 in the United States and in Canada 58. I have the various months right down to 1926. We find that in January of this year the figure was 130 in the United States, and that was 30 over par. In Canada the figure was 68 or 32 under par. In February the figure in the United States was 114, or 14 over par as against a figure in Canada of 60, or 40 under par. In the month of March the figure in Canada was 64. The figures in the United States for that month have not been compiled, but they were over par. That is what happened. We have an industry on the verge of bankruptcy, one of the very greatest industries that ever can be established in this country. Protection has been taken from it and as a result the United States blast furnaces and steel mills are running to capacity, while the Nova Scotia mills are being ruined and are on the verge of bankruptcy. These are facts from which there is no escape. It is pointed out that the result of this has been to remit $3,000,000 to the Canadian farmers, representing the sum which it is asserted the Massey-Harris Company unjustly extorted from the people of this country, nevertheless that same Mr. Massey is chosen as a leader in Israel and the colleague of the right hon. the Prime Minister.

Then I turn to steel ingots, and I find the same position relatively. Starting with the index number of 100 I come down to the year 1924 and I find that in the United States the number was 122 and in Canada 62. In 1925 the number was 146 in the United States and 72 in Canada. And if you take the record month by month you will find this is what happened: Just as soon as these materials were placed upon the free list just as soon as Canadian development stopped, just as soon as the tariff was remitted against the importations for these purposes, our production lessened. The index number in the month of June in the United States was 81 and in Canada 79, only two below. In July the number was 74 in the United States and 60 in Canada; in August 101 in the United States and 26 in Canada; in September 112 in the United States and 21 in Canada; in October 123 in the United States and 23 in Canada; in November 123 in United States and 26 in Canada; in December 141 in United States and 30 in Canada. We have steel ingots in January of this year in the United States at 165 or 65 over par; in Canada down to 79. In February the number was 150 in the United States and 61 in Canada. In March it was 165 in United States and 68 in Canada. There is the tale.

An hon. MEMBER: There is the story.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there is the story. And what do the people of Nova Scotia, what do the people of the lower provinces, get for it? What they receive is a royal commission. Massey gets a seat in the cabinet; and the Prime Minister dare not have made known to the people of this country the communications sent by Mr. Massey to my right hon. leader in which he stated what he thought of the right hon. Prime Minister and his government when they reduced the duty on agricultural implements.

Furthermore, paints and varnishes, materials that go to furnish employment for Canadians, are coming in free, and tending to reduce the number of people working in the agricultural implement industry in Canada. I point out that the number of these employees, greater though it is now than in 1921, is thousands less than it was in 1919. In the factory which the Massey-Harris Company owns at Batavia they are making more money than ever to-day, and this money is going into the exchequer of the Canadian company. But in order to accomplish that result manufacturing is being carried on in the American plant; the Canadian plant is becoming a mere assembling plant for American materials. They manufacture in their factories in the United States and buy in the open market the materials required for manufacturing purposes which are used in their factories in this country. These materials are shipped across to Canada and assembled here. That is the story with respect to the effort to reduce the duties on agricultural implements. The price of agricultural implements has not been reduced except to the extent of the sales tax. What has happened is that injury has been done to that great enterprise, the agricultural implement manufacturing business in Canada, to say nothing of the injury resulting from the destruction of our iron and steel industry, the lessened demand for Canadian paints and varnishes and all those other materials that enter into the manufacture of the finished product.

But that is not all. The right hon. Prime Minister stated a moment ago—I do not know what induced him to do it—that the right hon. leader of the opposition had pointed out that the result was going to be tremendously injurious to Canada. At column 2106 of volume 3 of the debates of parliament for 1924 I find these words from the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen:

> Now I am going to make a few remarks on the present changes.

That was after the King government had swept away the sales tax and made various changes in the duty.

> They embrace reductions on agricultural implements; reductions, however, far more serious in the case of those other manufactured products which enter into the construction of such implements; reductions as well in mining and logging machinery. There is a reduction in implements of some four per cent on the main items, five per cent on some others, and as high as even ten per cent. Reductions are given however on what are called raw materials but what are really manufactured materials produced by other supplying plants. The importation of these materials is allowed virtually free, wholly free in so far as pig iron and steel are concerned, and almost free as respects all other commodities. Just what the effect is to be on the agricultural implement industry I do not undertake to say; time will tell. I do not presume that very great change is made as respects that single industry; but the penalty is heaped on others in order that hon. gentlemen to my left may be enticed.

Those were the words of the right hon. gentleman. He did not for a single moment raise a blue ruin cry or that the changes in the tariff would mean destruction to the industry. He said that he could not say just what the result would be, but he added: You strike at the whole fabric of protection, you destroy these smaller industries that are supplying component parts to the larger industries, and you are giving employment to thousands of workmen in foreign lands that they may be able to partly manufacture or partly process goods that are sent into this country to be completed and afterwards sold to the Canadian people. That is what has happened in the case of the agricultural implement industry. The manufacturing is carried on in the plant at Batavia. The plant at Toronto has become more and more an assembling plant. Let us look these facts squarely in the face; let us be under no misapprehension with respect to the situation. That is what is being done in the case of one of our greatest industries. In the United States it is said that steel is king. That means that the steel industry is so important to the people that there is a direct relation between the prosperity of the steel industry and the prosperity of the country as a whole. And in the United States to-day you will find the prosperity of the steel industry reflected in the prosperity of the people themselves.

10 p.m.

But in this country the pig iron and steel industry has fallen to the condition I have mentioned, with the result that in Nova Scotia the desire has been expressed for a plebiscite on secession.

The right hon. gentleman closed his speech with a plea for national unity.

An hon. MEMBER: What a joke!

Mr. BENNETT: National unity! While with one hand destroying our industries and with the other giving our raw materials to the manufacturers of the United States and permitting them to come in here with their finished products. That is what they call national unity. National unity in their dealings with the Maritime provinces which have made such a contribution to the country with their vast resources! Do hon. gentlemen realize that the people of the great republic to the south of us regard those deposits which are capable of making pig iron and steel as one of the most priceless assets of any country in the world? Yet this government now prides itself on the fact that it has practically closed up that industry, or put it on the verge of ruin, while the United States industry flourishes as it never has before. They talk of national unity with legislation such as that. Is it any wonder that the people of this country last fall, sickened by this cant and hypocrisy, went to the polls and voted as they did? Can there be any doubt as to that? The party with such a small and insignificant following sitting to the left of the Speaker last session came back this year to parliament 116 strong. Then I think a further test could be fairly applied, and the facts will be found in the Labour Gazette of 1926. The figures are as follows:

Cost per week of a family budget of staple foods, fuel and lighting and rent in terms of the average prices in sixty cities in Canada.

In 1922 when my right hon. friend was thoroughly in the saddle surrounded by a government of his choice, we find that the average cost of living was $11.03. In 1926 it was $11.63, or 60 cents more. Then we come down to the grand total, including rent and coal, and in January, 1922, we have $21.52 as against January this year, $21.96, or 44 cents more in January, 1926, than in January, 1922, as the cost of living of the average man. This is the government that is supposed to have cheapened the methods of production and lessened the cost of living, produced the prosperity budget, and saved the people from blue ruin!

Reference has been made to immigration. I am not going to dwell on that, more than to make one or two general statements. Since the government opposite came into power we have lost 500,000 of the best men and women in Canada. They have left our shores and gone to the United States of America. Why? The right hon. gentleman had the effrontery to tell the House that the reason was that members on this side of the House had circulated propaganda containing statements derogatory to the country. I think that statement is beneath contempt. Has this parliament sunk to such a low level that men may not point out the facts without being slandered because they attempt to do it? Is it the idea that we should enjoy the false security which emanates from a failure to appreciate the conditions under which we live? The ostrich covers his head in the sand and thinks he is safe. The counsel of this government is to emulate the ostrich, cover our heads in the sand, and feel that all is well. Surely the right hon. member does not mean that. Surely that cannot be possible. Then he makes charges against the leader of the opposition who has gone to and fro in this country and appealed to reason and to the considered judgment of the people and shown them the facts. He has conducted no war in Turkey, but he has appealed to the records of the country, the state of its population, the movement of its people, its imports, its exports, the operations of the tariff upon our well being. He has pointed out these things, with the result that the majority of the people of Canada may believe in his policies. We are told that to point these things out is a crime. Now it is about time that sort of argument in this House ended. If hon. gentlemen will remember the sort of campaign conducted prior to 1922 by two hon. members sitting opposite, you will understand why they think recourse to that sort of argument would be what they would indulge in. Does the right hon. member remember his speech regarding the chief seat in the synagogue and the broadening of their phylacteries? Does the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) remember the appeals he made with respect to the government having earned the contempt of the country? Does he remember how he pointed out the dire disaster that was overtaking this country? That was right and good, that was well! Responsible government no longer existed. The country was being ruined because they were not in power, and now, because they sit in the seats of the mighty and enjoy the sweets and emoluments of office, then indeed any observation one ventures to make by way of criticism is regarded as lese majeste. The right hon. member has not yet aspired to the position of dictator. There is not much of Mussolini about any hon. members opposite, but I have no doubt the wish is father to the thought. I have pointed out what has happened in this country, and stated that people were leaving the country. Why? The answer is simple. It is because there is nothing to do in Canada, and no work to be got here. I could name you now one hundred men and women I know who have left this country in the last five years because they could not get any work to do. I have seen men with tears in their eyes, beseaching me to try and find a job for them in Canada. I have seen women who had to go to the United States to find employment in offices and in factories. I have seen men who had come from Britain leave this country for the United States. I have heard the statement made that there are no soup kitchens in Canada. We have had soup kitchens in this country during the last few years. We have men in this country who can find no work to do who are compelled to live on the benevolence of their friends. An attack has been made on St. James street, and one who has been denounced most frequently is a gentleman who out of his own purse, without any publicity about it, conducts free soup kitchens and supplies food to hundreds during the winter. Let us face these matters frankly. Men and women leave the country because they have no work to do, and why? The reply is clear and obvious; it is because we are bringing to this country the product of the hands and minds of thousands of people who should be employed in Canada and not in the United States. What is more, the people of this country understand it.

The people, as the right hon. gentleman admitted this afternoon, were appealed to by this party for support in the election last October on one ground, namely, that this country's market should be kept for Canadians, that we should develop our latent resources, and use the means at our disposal, namely the tariff, for the purpose of affording that equality of opportunity to Canadians which existing legislation denies them. I think it is about time we faced the issue fairly. My right hon. friend referred to the volume of trade, to the great excess of exports over imports $402,000,000, and yet if you look at the trade returns for this twelve months ending March 31, you will find the two items alone made up $800,000,000 of the total of $1,300,000,000 of exports. What were they? The products of western Canada, principally wheat and cereals, and wood and pulp and wood products. I have the figures before me if hon. members are interested in them. Surely the people of the country and the members of the House know that in the year 1925 we had the second largest crop in our history in point of value; and this year the value of our exportable trade in grains and cereals totaled over $600,000,000, while over $270,000,000 of our exports consisted of pulp and paper. In other words, nearly $900,000,000 out of a total of $1,300,000,000 comprised grain and pulp and paper.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), reflecting his mind, point out that there was a balance of trade in our favour during the past year of $402,000,000. I had thought that the practice of computing a country's prosperity solely by reference to the trade balance had been altogether abandoned. Has the Prime Minister taken any cognizance of our invisible imports? In England the other day it was contended that there was an adverse balance of trade, but when account was taken of the great invisibles such as freight, interest, foreign investments and so on, that unfavourable balance was converted into a substantial balance on the right side of £150,000,000. But what about this country? During the last eleven years this Dominion has borrowed from the United States an average of $200,000,000 per annum. Now, how does that money come into Canada? It comes in one of three forms: in gold, in merchandise or in securities. We do not get any gold, for the reason that our banks do not maintain more that $100,000,000 in gold for the purpose of protecting their currency. We did, however, get that money for the most part in merchandise—merchandise that could and should be made in Canada. If you reckon the invisible imports, therefore, you will find that instead of a favourable balance of trade we have had one vastly different and one which the government has no reason whatever to boast of. I have inquired of those who know as to what the value of these invisible imports might be. There are differences of opinion on the question, but there can be no doubt that they amount to a very substantial sum. It will suffice, however, to say that we have been receiving on an average from the American people a couple of hundred million dollars per annum by way of loans during the past eleven years. I leave that for the consideration of the government. Do hon. gentlemen realize that included in our exports to the United States there is bootleg liquor? That liquor is consigned to Mexico, but it remains in the United States; sometimes in winter it is consigned to Mexico via Ford, but its destination is immediately to the south of us. It is estimated by the Prime Minister himself that the smuggled imports amount to over $100,000,000 at least, and probably the sum is greater than that. These are all factors that should be carefully considered, and I venture to say that if you were to analyze the trade balance minutely you would find that the figures to which reference has been made are as deluding as figures well can be. The truth of the matter is that to an increasingly greater extent this country is obtaining capital from our great neighbour to the south, and upon that capital interest must be paid.

Surely it is time we paused and took stock of the situation. In exporting, as we do today, logs and pulp in the unmanufactured state, we are probably losing $5 for every dollar we get. If that estimate is excessive I suggest that $4 is a safe figure. Take asbestos, and nickel to a greater extent. In the case of all these partly processed materials, has not the time come for us to consider what our exports mean to us? Then there is a point that should never be lost sight of when we are shipping out of the country these vast quantities of pulp and paper, namely that we are denuding our lands of their forests and, what is more, destroying capital that cannot be replaced. This is a serious matter. What is the reason our friends from the United States come here and establish industries? Because Canada is the greatest depository of raw material now available on the continent. Should we not therefore carefully ponder the situation and try to understand why it is that other countries are preserving their forests while we are allowing ours to be exploited to our very serious disadvantage? These are questions that call imperatively for consideration. When I say that the major part of our exports consists of the two items I have mentioned, let me add that it looks as though the limit will soon have been reached so far as our exports of wheat are concerned. This is a grave matter and one that is of vital moment to the country from which I come. The limit of the absorbing power of the purchasing countries of the world to which we ship our wheat and cereals is nearly reached; how nearly I do not know, but I do know that from an analysis of the figures made by men in the trade it is quite clear that with the effort being made to stimulate the production in European countries, and with the possible come-back of Russia at no distant date, we have nearly attained the maximum so far as our exports of grain in Western Canada are concerned. If that be so, then at once there arises a question of the first magnitude which demands the serious consideration of the government. I mention this in passing, because it must be clear that in Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain and other countries a most determined effort is being made to-day to do all that can be done to stimulate production and to obviate as far as possible any reliance upon other peoples for food supplies. The effect of shipping out all this grain rather than manufacturing it into flour in our own country, and the present condition whereby the foreigner gets the benefit of these exports to the extent he does, is reflected in the invisible claims that are made upon us. I will not argue this point to-night, but I may tell the Prime Minister that if only he will look closely into it he will be forced to a conclusion wholly different from the one he has expressed.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member suggest that the present government could prohibit the exportation of pulp?

Mr. BENNETT: I am satisfied, in the language of Mr. Gladstone, that the resources of civilization are not yet exhausted against its enemies, and it would be easy for this government to pass legislation controlling the exports of raw material from Canada.

Mr. POWER: What resources does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. BENNETT: Again, with Mr. Gladstone, I decline to prescribe until I am called in. So much for immigration and trade, and so much for the public debt.

Now let me consider questions more immediately dealt with in the budget. One of these is the income tax reduction and the reduction in the duty on automobiles. The Prime Minister this afternoon challenged the opposition in reference to its amendment, and rather questioned the sincerity of the motion. He suggested that the amendment did not ring true to the principles the opposition espoused and the principles it enunciated during the election. He added that at least during this session we had not endeavoured to indicate our reliance upon the maintenance of a general protective policy in this country. I find by reference to Votes and Proceedings No. 17, at page 58, that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) moved in amendment to the Speech from the Throne the following motion:

That the following words be added to the said Address:

"We desire respectfully to express regret that the Speech from the Throne gives no indication of policy designed to enlarge the volume of employment in Canada, and particularly to give to the producers of farm products, coal and other primary products the advantage they are, under present world conditions, entitled to enjoy in the market of this country."

Could anything be clearer than that? I will admit that my right hon. friend at that time was inadvertently absent from the House, but at any rate the fact is that the journals of this House show that by this amendment the party on this side of the House asked for protection. The amendment was negatived by a vote, I think, of 115 to 125.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that nothing could be clearer than that the word "protection" does not appear in the amendment?

Mr. BENNETT: I know it is quite unnecessary to use the word "protection" to carry its meaning to the right hon. gentleman. In England, for instance, it is called what? The safeguarding of industry. We desire that Canadians should have an equal opportunity to work out their destiny and develop the resources of their country. You may not use the word "protection", but the only method by which you can secure that growth of trade, by which you can safeguard the industrial life of this country, is by the adoption and the maintenance of a uniform principle of protection. It is perfectly true that the word "protection" is not there, and yet every speech made upon that amendment was a plea to the government to embark upon a policy of defined and maintained protection. Those speeches were made alike by members from Ontario and from British Columbia, by members representing the fruit growers of Nova Scotia and the lumbermen of New Brunswick, by members representing the artisans in the industrial centres, by members representing all walks of life and all trades—they made speeches upon that amendment in which they pleaded for the safeguarding of the industrial and agricultural life of this country, for the protection of the fruit industry and the vegetable industry from the encroachment of our neighbours, in order that we might be able to bring back those 500,000 people from the States, and, bringing them back, to keep them in this country. The greatest problem that confronts Canadian men of thought and vision to-day is to keep in this country the people we have here and to add to their number. That, Sir, can be done in one way, and one way only—by giving our men and women work to do. You cannot give them that work unless you protect them against the unfair mass production of their richer and more powerful neighbours.

Let us go a step further and look at what happened with respect to our balance of trade with the United States. My hon. friend referred to the balance of trade in this country. I am getting away from the main line of my argument, but I left out something a moment ago, and my remarks must necessarily be disjointed because I did not have any time to collect information while my right hon. friend was speaking. What happened? Last year we sold to the United States $474,890,000 worth of goods, and we bought from them $609,820,000 worth. And as was pointed out in official documents issued by the government of the United States, our tariff reductions have meant an increasing demand in this country for their manufactured goods. The result is that that balance of trade adverse to us represents over $100,000,000 in money that we gave to our powerful mass-producing neighbours to the south and that we could have spent at home in making Canadian goods. Until that fact is ground into the hearts and minds of the Canadian people and they realize it—as I believe they are beginning to—and until a government sits on the treasury benches which will give effect to that principle, the movement of our people south will continue. It is bound to. It is simply the attraction of the large body for the small. The great industrial hive of Montreal is affected by it. Ontario, our foremost province industrially, has felt it as no other province has. This afternoon my friend referred to what had taken place in the city of Branford. The best answer to that is the absence from this House of the member who formerly represented the city of Brantford. I am sure my friend was wrong in what he said respecting the Cockshutt Plow Company. They are going to make a first payment on the arrears of their preferred dividends, not on their common stock. And according to the record in the Secretary of State's office the Massey-Harris Company recently underwent a recapitalization by which its 250,000 shares were converted into 125,000 preference and 125,000 common—very greatly, it is alleged, to the detriment of some of the smaller shareholders; a matter about which I express no opinion, being without any knowledge respecting it. But I think my friend must be entirely mistaken if he assumes for a moment that industrial activity in Canada is spelling any form of prosperity for those engaged in it, for reasons which I shall presently point out.

I was proceeding to discuss the question of the reduction of duty on automobiles, upon which the right hon. Prime Minister laid a great deal of stress. It is a perennial subject; it was discussed in this House last session and the session before. I ask hon. members to bear with me while I point out two or three observations that I think worthy of their attention. I ask the House for a moment to look at what transpired in the course of the debate upon this subject. I find that the same motion made last year was again moved this year, and I notice that the Minister of Finance on that occasion made some very pertinent observations. He said:

> If his statement to-night is correct it would seem that there has been some United States capital invested in the business since then. But without going into that feature, I would remind the hon. gentleman that no matter where the capital comes from, the industry gives employment to Canadian labour. There are 78 plants engaged in the manufacture of automobiles and their accessories in Canada, employing Canadian labour, and subject to Canadian taxation, a considerable amount in taxes finding its way into the Canadian treasury.

He went further, he added:

I submit to hon. gentlemen that the automobile is a fair source from which to collect revenue.

As I said in opening it is on the eve of the budget, and the government must have revenue from some source. Demands come to the government from those who desire expenditure for new railways, the extension of existing railways, harbour improvements, bridges, grain elevators and other public works—these alternating with requests that we part with various sources of our revenue. If we are to meet our national obligations—the interest on the national debt, the pensions that we owe to our soldiers and the widows and orphans of those who will never come back, and the cost of administration, we must have revenue from some source, and if you take away the revenue we are getting from automobiles we must secure it by imposing duties upon some other commodity.

I ask my friends to the left to keep that in mind. Rejoicing though you are to-day on the reduction of the duty on automobiles, remember what the Minister of Finance said on that occasion—and he is still holding that portfolio—that if the duty on automobiles was lessened he would have to get the revenue from some other source. He is not getting it this year; he is going to fool us and get it next year. That is the position. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) in the course of some observations said that a 10 per cent reduction in duty might be reasonable on the lower priced cars, leaving the duty unchanged on the higher priced cars. Then the vote was taken on March 16, 1925. This is an interesting matter. The House, unable to get more detailed knowledge with respect to this matter, having in fact no detailed knowledge, groping in the dark, some members believing the duty too high and some believing it to be too low, and all desiring to receive further knowledge, were implored by the Minister of Finance to wait until the budget came down. That was what he pleaded for. The right hon. Prime Minister this afternoon said that the Conservative party in caucus assembled had not dared to frame a resolution with respect to automobiles. He also said that the reason the government had not proceeded with the tariff commission in advance of the budget was because they were unable to get the gentlemen they desired and therefore had to deal with the matter before it could be referred to the commission. I will tell the House why this reduction in the automobile tariff took place. It did not take place because they could not refer it to the tariff commission; it did not take place because the Progressives alone wanted it; it took place because those who supported it could not trust the Prime Minister and wait for the budget. They did that last year and were deceived, so they insisted on it this year. That is what happened, if hon. gentlemen would like to know, and I venture to say that the Minister of Finance was not any too strong on incorporating the reduction in the automobile duty into his budget without a reference to the tariff commission.

The Prime Minister referred to what took place in the Conservative caucus. So far as I know the matter was not discussed, but there are rumours which seem to be fairly well founded, in view of what happened, that those from Saskatchewan and Quebec and other parts of Canada who desired a reduction in the automobile duty said, "We will not wait for the budget; we were asked to wait last year and nothing happened; we are taking no chances this year, but we will insist upon it in the budget itself," and that is the reason it is there.

Now let us go a step further. The right hon. Prime Minister this afternoon gave as a reason for not submitting this to the tariff board the fact that he had not time to do it before the matter had to be dealt with in the budget. Let us look at the facts. I find the Minister of Finance reported in the Montreal Gazette of October 13, 1925, as having said:

We say that neither those who ask higher tariffs, nor those who ask lower tariffs should be ignored, but we do say that before ruling for or against either, a case must be made out, and proof given to a board of competent advisers. . . .

Then I find that the right hon. Prime Minister used practically the same words, only in his case he promised to have a woman on the board. He said:

If someone comes from the prairies and says we sell in a free trade market and buy in a protected market and ask for a policy of free trade, no government could do it, because it would create discontent in Ontario and Quebec. Similarly if a group of men came from these provinces and asked the government to shut out outside goods by a high protective tariff, could a government listen to that?

He says they could not do so, and then continues:

We are not a cabinet of supermen,—

That is news.

—but we can get together men who are experts. We have decided to form a board to consider all tariff schedules, and to call for advice to the board representatives of manufacturing, of commerce, of agriculture, of labour, and also of the women, so that the homes would be dealt with fairly. We will consider the tariff with the advice of this board.

That is what the Prime Minister said when seeking the support of the electors of this country. Then again, speaking in Montreal, he said:

The government believed that since many technical matters were involved it was well that there should be formed a body composed of the experts in the government's service, with an advisory board of representatives of the various interests, and including a woman, who would study tariff matters, and whose recommendations would be brought to the study of the cabinet. He did not believe the government should seek to be arbitrary or be governed by dogma in such a matter.

In the city of Quebec he repeated the same thing.

That board would be above partisan appeal or sectional interest. It would study the situation on its merits and its recommendations would be made to parliament direct. . . .

Then further:

It was his intention also to see that a woman was named because he thought it only meet and proper that the growing importance of women's interests in the life and work of the nation should be given the recognition it deserved.

I could read more of the same thing but, Mr. Speaker, as in many other matters of this character, the Prime Minister has seen fit to forget his promises and has remembered only the power which he has attained by making these pledges and then repudiating them.

There was a distinct promise to the electors of this country that there would be a tariff board. The Conservative party promised the same thing in the speech made by my right hon. leader in 1925. Not only was a tariff commission promised, but one in which the evidence would be open to the public, in order that the public might have the fullest information with respect to changes in the tariff. That was the promise given by the Conservative party. We realize, as every man in this House must realize, how difficult it is to understand fully the complex operations of the tariff, and to come to an adequate and proper conclusion with respect to how far-reaching its ramifications may be. For instance, during the recent election I told the electors of the constituency in which I live, that, in my private opinion, the tariff on automobiles was higher than it should be, but I said I did not pretend to be able to speak with authority because I had not the requisite or necessary knowledge. But I said I knew that the party to which I belong had pledged itself, if returned to power, to obtain the appointment of a board to receive the evidence and place it before parliament in order that its recommendations might be understood fully in the light of all the evidence adduced, and in order that parliament might arrive at proper conclusions. What happened? The people realized that that was so; they believed the statements made by this government when they said that was what they proposed to do. This government promised the tariff board before parliament met, and when parliament assembled the Speech from the Throne indicated that a tariff board would be appointed.

This afternoon my hon. friend pointed out that the words "not before" were used in the amendment, but I point out to him that the Speech from the Throne contains stronger words than those. It says that changes in the tariff should be made "only" after the fullest examination of their bearing upon both primary and manufacturing industries, and that representations requesting increase or decrease of duties should be made the subject of the most careful investigation and report by a body possessing the qualifications to advise the ministry with respect thereto. "A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith." You will notice that it says "only"—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After investigation.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely, by an advisory board. That investigation has not been made because the board was not appointed, it is said, in time to conduct it.

Now let us go a step further. Surely my right hon. friend knows that in the United States there exists a similar advisory board. He also knows that when the first tariff was passed after the Republican party last came into power a duty of 30 cents was imposed against Canadian wheat. Then, when the new tariff was prepared, the duty was increased to 35 cents, and the farmers of the western states said it was not high enough. What happened? An investigation was held in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and as a result of that investigation the President increased the duty to 42 cents. There was no necessity to call congress together to do that. I wonder if anyone in this House thinks for a moment, or if this country will be deluded into the belief, that this government could not have passed legislation to reduce the duty on automobiles without calling parliament? Is anyone fooled by that sort of cant, or deluded by that talk? What was done when we reduced the duty on wheat? An order in council was passed reducing the duty on American wheat, and automatically our wheat went there free. How is it done in England? After an investigation has been made it is carried out by parliament in some instances, and in others it is not. This country could have passed legislation by which power would have been given the Governor in Council to reduce the duty on automobiles if the investigation held by the advisory board so warranted. That is the position.

Mr. ROBB: Will my hon. friend say that under the order in council affecting the duties on wheat, passed by the previous government, there was no Canadian wheat shipped into the United States?

Mr. BENNETT: Why, no. What I am saying is that under the War Measures Act at that time we passed an order in council the effect of which was to let wheat come into this country from the United States free, and as a result of a reciprocal arrangement ours went in there free.

Mr. ROBB: I am asking my hon. friend if any Canadian wheat went into the United States, or if any United States wheat came in here?

Mr. BENNETT: No United States wheat came in here so far as I know, but some of ours went in there, in the vicinity of $10,000,000 worth. I am pointing out to my friend that surely this parliament could devise legislation to provide for a reduction in the duty on automobiles if the investigation warranted, and no member of this House should be put in the invidious position of being called upon, without adequate investigation, to arrive at a conclusion on a question of such serious moment to the people of this country.

Mr. ROBB: Let us be clear. If during the interval after prorogation, between now and the next parliament, the tariff board should recommend to the government that we reduce the duty on cotton, would my hon. friend endorse that proposition?

Mr. BENNETT: Not unless the legislation so provides. I pointed out that existing legislation does not confer that power upon the Governor in Council, and my hon. friend chose cottons in order that he might strike terror, I suppose, into the heart of some people whom he is very anxious to placate, and has always been very desirous of doing so. It is something he understands fairly well. It was very astute of him to suggest cottons, but I do not think it will have the desired effect. If this parliament so desires, it can do what has been done in the United States. I have the statute under my hand. The Governor in Council could be clothed with the same powers as the president of the United States, and upon a report made to the Governor in Council, upon the evidence being submitted, the government could either increase or reduce the duties if they so desired. That is the point I desired to make, and I desire to make it abundantly clear that any excuse given for breach of faith, for breaking a solemn promise made by the representative of the sovereign in this country, is wholly without warrant and without merit in view of the use of the word "only."

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend advocate that we should follow that policy?

Mr. BENNETT: My right hon. friend this afternoon said that we were simply raising a matter of precedure. That reminds me of the story of the Irishman who was condemned to death, that being the penalty fixed by the statute for his offence, and he complained that he was being hanged merely as a matter of form. I am not advocating any course. I am giving the answer which must be in the mind of every man to the paltry excuse given by the Prime Minister, that we could not have this board function because it was not appointed in time. Anybody knows that if the necessary legislation had been desired, the thing could have and would have been done; the legislation could have been passed.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Does the hon. member, or does the Conservative party advocate that such legislation be passed?

Mr. BENNETT: I have pointed out to the Minister of Finance that it was not the function of an opposition, in answering the statement made by the Prime Minister, in answering the excuse he gave—which was absolutely without merit—for not referring this matter to a tariff board, to state what one would do. But I say this: If the Conservative government had been in power, it would have neither increased nor reduced the duties without first referring the matter to the tariff commission as had been promised.

I put this to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). He has farmers in his constituency upon whose homes mortgages are being foreclosed, I am sorry to say. That is going on in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. If the mortgagee made a promise by which he said, "I will not foreclose your mortgage until next year. I will leave the matter in abeyance until then, and will not take any proceedings in the meantime," and then all of a sudden he violates his solemn word, goes to the judge, gets an order against the mortgagor and takes possession of the farm, what would you think of him? By a series of subterfuges, and by the use of language for disguising thought, you may endeavour to make the Canadian people believe that you made no promise to them, but in the Speech from the Throne you said that these changes should take place "only" after the fullest examination by this new advisory board. In the most solemn way known to our institutions you made that promise to the people of this country, and in the face of that promise you have violated your pledged word and introduced a measure for reducing the duties without the question having first been heard by the tariff board at all. You may argue as much as you like, but stripped of everything, the cold facts are there and speak for themselves. Then you go about and endeavour to arouse the passions of the people by making them believe that these rich manufacturers are profiting at their expense, that the people are being exploited. You do that in order to make them forget the main issue, in order to make them forget the broken word, the broken faith, the broken promise, and remember only the material benefits. Since when was honour to be sold for dollars?

Let me quote to you, Sir, a word from the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who is good enough to listen to me. This is what he said in the town of Waterloo as reported in his own paper on the 26th of September last:

> I voted against the government on the budget of last year, not because of any great injury from the slight reductions in tariff (for no industry in Kitchener or Waterloo was injured), but because I did not like the adoption of a policy of haphazard changes.

Those words I commend to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and to this government. I ask the Minister of Finance now, on what considerations, on what investigation, in view of the promise given in the Speech from the Throne, did he arrive at the conclusion he has stated? The great Gladstone—and whatever else may be said this at least has always been true, that the expositions of financial matters by Mr. Gladstone are still treated as models upon which Chancellors of the Exchequer pattern their deliverances—had something to say about public sentiment in a speech he made in 1860. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in moving the new automobile duties referred to public sentiment, and I desire particularly to direct attention to the exact words he used in that regard, because they are all important. He said:

> There is a pronounced sentiment in this country in favour of a reduction in automobile duties.

An hon. MEMBER: So there was.

Mr. BENNETT: Assume there was. Is it a government at all that yields to sentiment? Such a one is not worthy of the name of government. Listen to the words of Mr. Gladstone when delivering his great budget proposals in 1860, when he proposed to reduce the income tax:

> For that public feeling we have not only respect, but sympathy; while we do not admit that it is our duty, as persons charged with the conduct of public affairs, to shape our measures according to any feeling or sentiment whatever, until we have examined the practical form which they are to take, and tried it in the best light of our understanding.

I commend that to the Minister of Finance. I saw many thousands, at least two thousand men and women, gather in front of this parliament building. The practical operation of these tariff changes so filled them with fear of the ultimate result upon their lives, in their homes and in their factories, that they journeyed to this city to present to the government their case. This government heard them, gave them fair words, and they departed. Since then we know that a great effort has been made in many sections of this country to induce the government to reconsider its proposals. It has been said that the government does not propose to do so. I recall history again. Mr. Disraeli pointed out to the farmers of England, to the country squires, that Mr. Peel was getting ready to let them down. Now, in the case of agricultural implements in Canada, remember what happened. The government was adamant. Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Massey pointed out the ruin that confronted them. No change resulted, but finally, not directly but by removal of the sales tax, by making free the materials that enter into the construction of the machines, the government gave them a higher protection than they had heretofore enjoyed, and they are more prosperous by reason of it than they were before. I ask hon. gentlemen to my left who cheered so lustily when the reduction of the duty on automobiles was announced to pause and ask themselves whether or not they will be once more the victims of deception.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. EVANS: I was going to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I see nothing to laugh at.

An hon. MEMBER: You are so funny.

Mr. EVANS: Does the hon. gentleman know that this question was discussed in this House at the last session of parliament, and that it passed by the aid of his own party seeing that six hon. members in their ranks voted for it?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend the member for Rosetown has not appreciated the question. I pointed out that because of the lack of definite information—obtained only through the methods the government suggested and the opposition had also suggested —as to the effect of the operation of the removal of the tariff on automobiles or its reduction, that hon. members voted in accordance with their views without the information that might be forthcoming. I also pointed out that a promise was given by the government in the Speech from the Throne that this reduction would not be made until after investigation. In violation of that promise, and in breach of the plighted word of this country as represented by the government, the reduction has been made without an investigation. I say further that in private life no man would for a moment tolerate such conduct.

Yesterday I was in New York and picking up one of the newspapers there I read that a great statesman of that country was endeavouring to define national honour. He said that national honour consisted in having the same regard for the obligations of the nation that you have in private life as man to man. I ask: Is there a man in this House who, having given a promise such as that contained in the Speech from the Throne, would dare break that solemn promise and call himself a gentleman of honour? Is a pledge given by this government to stand on no higher ground that a scrap of paper or the treaty of Belgium? Let us look this thing fairly in the eye. Is there one standard of honour for individuals and another standard for the nation? The Prime Minister pointed out the other day that he had a duty as leader of this House—not as leader of the government but as leader of the House—representing, as he did, for the moment, the people of Canada. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance in the conduct of his business stoop to such conduct as that?

An hon. MEMBER: Never.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course he would not, and yet this nation is asked to do it—not the government but the nation. Because for the moment hon. gentlemen opposite represent the nation. So do hon. gentlemen farther down, and hon. gentlemen to my left; they represent the nation. Because, under our parliamentary system, where you have a majority gathered together for the moment, that constitutes the nation, just as the Prime Minister said the other day. And the right hon. gentleman is leader of the nation for the moment, and notwithstanding the lofty attitude that he adopts with respect to unity and national honour, he asks this country to break its plighted word, to repudiate its promise; he asks this nation to become known amongst the nations of the world as a nation of repudiators. Some men may hold the honour of their country too lightly, but there are others who in their homes will solemnly consider this matter, because after all there is a conscience in the nation, although sometimes people may think there is none. Since 1921 there has been little conscience in the Dominion of Canada. Why? Because government has ceased to be an organized institution for the benefit of the people. Government has become a machine by which appeals are being made from day to day, from group to group, and class to class to enable hon. gentlemen opposite to maintain themselves in power. Some there are in this country, thoughtful men, who from day to day, in pulpit and on platform, are pointing out the loss of national honour that is going on. That situation arises because of the fact that government in Canada to-day consists only of men who are making appeals to classes, to groups, and to individuals in order to enable them to get a majority to carry on and to hold on. What is more, that is openly admitted. Such being the case where are my hon. friends who preach higher standards of morality? Where are the many hon. gentlemen who, sometimes in the pulpit, denounce the existing conditions of this country? I ask again where are they? Where are my hon. friends with this vaunted regard for political honour that comes with their advent into the body politic? Where is the national honour to-night? Trampled in the dust.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen need not laugh. I put this question to them: If the bank that took a three months' note from you and lent you a thousand dollars on it the next day said. "We are going to sue you because we have changed our minds; we are going to make this a day note instead of a three months' note," what would you think of such conduct? Might is right, that is the theory, the old Prussian theory. When we have a majority a pledge is a scrap of paper. Might controls the situation; let us do as we please in this matter regardless of our promises. Hon. gentlemen opposite have pledged their solemn word. The pledge is there, they cannot change it. But the word that under our institutions was placed in the mouth of the representative of the sovereign counts for nothing. That representative must now be told that it was all camouflage, that it meant nothing, that it was just a play on words. That is all.

I have here a little information that I am sure would be exceedingly interesting at least to some hon. members. I notice, for instance, that the reduction of the duty upon automobiles is going to be greatly to the benefit of this country, just as was the reduction in the duty on agricultural implements. The argument advanced this afternoon was this: Reduce the duties and you get more people at work. The country is more prosperous and everyone is happy. My hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said he is against that sort of thing because it is a haphazard way of proceeding. I hope he has not changed his mind. Now let us see what the argument was this afternoon. It was that because in the case of agricultural implements you have alleged benefits, therefore in the case of motor cars you will have similar results. That is the argument, that or nothing. Well, if it means anything at all it means that this House is going to take the sales tax off automobiles and let all the raw material come in free. If it does not mean that it does not mean anything. Now let us know what has happened. There was a gentleman named Clifford who once sat in this House, and he came from Oshawa. He visited Ottawa last week. He went back home and gave an interview to the press and what did he say? This is what he said, and his statements appear between quotation marks:

L. O. Clifford, former M.P. for Ontario who has just returned from Ottawa, where he went for a special conference with Rt. Hon. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister, states that he had a long talk with the Premier and has the assurance "that Oshawa will be looked after".

"You can go back to Oshawa, and tell the manufacturers to keep their industries going," Premier King told Clifford, "You may tell the people that their interests will be looked after."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What date is that?

Mr. BENNETT: The date given is May 17th. He was here last week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that I have not spoken to Mr. Clifford for a week or more. I shook hands with him the other day when he came into my office with some other gentleman, but I never discussed the question of automobiles with him.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say it was on that occasion. Do not be hair splitting. Mr. Clifford says he came up to have an interview; that he had one, and that the Prime Minister told him that Oshawa would be looked after. He said:

You may tell the people that their interests will be looked after and the manufacturers can keep their industries going.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I told him to go back and read the nineteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles.

Mr. BENNETT: I am so glad to see that my right hon. friend has become scriptural, because I think he will have to do much reading of scripture before he will find justification for putting in the mouth of His Excellency a statement which in a few weeks is repudiated. I think there is a statement somewhere in the Bible—it may not be in the Acts of the Apostles—that by their fruits ye shall know them.

An hon. MEMBER: Something about Judas?

Mr. BENNETT: Not for a moment would I suggest him. Judas was a man of great capacity. I desire to point out that since the reduction in the tariff has taken place there have been nine bankruptcies in Oshawa and a prominent lawyer in that city tells me that during the twenty years he has practised there he has not known so much depression. It does not end there. We find from a great American newspaper the net result of this upon the community:

Buick Gets Canadian Order as Result of Reduction in Tariff

The first direct result in the automobile industry from the reduction in the Canadian automobile tariff was reported by the Buick Motor Company, a division of general motors, in the nature of an order for immediate shipment of 50 Buick automobiles to McLaughlin Motor Car Company at Montreal.

H. H. Bassett, president and general manager of the Buick company, in making public the information, stated that this is the first order for a finished car ever received from Canada by the Buick company.

The new cars, Mr. Bassett said, provided the opening to establish a substantial business for American automobile manufacturers in the Dominion of Canada.

In other words for the first time, by reason of this tariff which was not considered by the government in the manner promised, you have completed automobiles imported into the country, and that means just that much less work for Canadians. I do not mean that it is the first time completed automobiles were imported into Canada, but the first time completed automobiles ordered by the manufacturers of cars in Canada were imported into Canada—that is, distinguished from cars in a partly manufactured condition. What does it mean? It means that without regard to promises, with wholly inefficient and inadequate information, without regard to the subsidiary or allied companies, a tariff is placed upon the statute book lower than would have satisfied the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) or lower than the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) was willing to suggest should be imposed, or lower than the Minister of Finance was prepared to suggest. In order to make what would be a popular budget, you have repudiated your promise and put under your foot the Speech from the Throne as though it were a piece of paper. That is my view. I have always advocated that these whole problems should be studied and the duties revised as the facts warranted, and upon that I now stand.

Mr. ROBB: May I ask a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: The hon. gentleman just stated that fifty Buick automobiles had come into Canada. The duty on these cars would be 27½ per cent under the reduction. Does he think that duty is too low?

Mr. BENNETT: All I know is that any duty which gives an unfair advantage over Canadians to the great people to the south of us is a duty which is not sufficient. By that I am prepared to be judged from one end of the country to the other. Any duty that sacrifices Canadians for foreigners, whoever they are, is not an adequate duty, because it does not safeguard Canadian industry, it simply leaves Canadians to become hewers of wood and drawers of water for our neighbours to the south.

An hon. MEMBER: Does the hon. member advocate a prohibitive tariff?

Mr. BENNETT: Yesterday I observed an advertisement of the Dodge Motors in New York. They have reduced the price of Motors, and they point out how they are able to do it: they state that it was by increasing production, thereby lessening the unit cost. That is the whole story. This country can never become a competitor of our great mass-producing neighbours to the south until we realize that essential fact. My hon. friend asked me if I wanted a prohibitive tariff, and my answer is that I want a tariff that will enable the Canadian manufacturer to go on producing his goods cheaper every year by reason of increased volume of production. For example, we have a repair shop in Calgary, and the overhead is say $6,000 a year or $500 a month. If they repair 500 cars per month it costs $1 a car, but if they repair 1,000 cars it is only 50 cents a car. If we can increase production by preventing competitors from coming in, we will reduce the cost by decreasing the unit cost and in that way we benefit the consumer. There are times when it is more. This party realized that, and they placed in the resolution a provision that if the tariff were taken advantage of for the purpose of exploitation, then the government of the day would, by excise or other forms of taxation, protect the consumer from such exploitation by the manufacturer, not only with respect to the effect on a particular industry, but with respect to the effect on others. With respect to that matter I have not the knowledge to speak with authority, neither have hon. members opposite; but I do know the effect on allied industries, the industry, for instance, that produces the articles that go into the manufacture. If you go into the pages of history, and if you recall the speech of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) and consider the industries that are affected, producing the component parts of the motor industry, you will understand that the tariff is a structure. If you strike out one brick you may impair the whole foundation of the whole wall, and if the wall is impaired what becomes of it? It is not the tariff on automobiles we are concerned about; it is the effect upon the industrial life of the country and upon the industries involved, the increase of unemployment, the destruction of investment of capital in Canada in any industrial enterprise. Men are already inquiring, what do we get next? I suppose that is the reason the Minister of Finance suggested cottons, in order that those interested in this industry shall keep quiet and not make observations, because they may be struck next. Who is to be struck next? Is it the furniture or the boot and shoe manufacturers? Which is it to be? Is it the artificial silk industry? I put these questions to the House because the destruction of these subsidiary interests in the manner indicated is something no Canadian can look at without having the greatest apprehension as to what the result will be.

My right hon. friend has referred to the income tax reduction, and I shall make just half a dozen observations on that score before I conclude. I say without any hesitation whatever that the income tax reductions, of which the government has been making so much, are more apparent than real; they are not reductions at all. I do not suppose that any greater bluff was ever worked upon a people. The illustrations given this afternoon by the Prime Minister had reference to incomes earned or incomes treated as though they were earned. Mr. Gladstone once remarked that there were two classes of incomes, one, the lazy income and the other the income derived from skill, enterprise, brains and the salary that one was able to command by reason of ability and acumen. The schedule which the Minister of Finance read to the House a few weeks ago is one in which every dollar of income was put upon a basis of salary or earned income. My right hon. friend will remember that before the amendments were passed at all salaries were taxed to the fullest extent. Now, what has happened? Earned incomes and incomes from investments are all on the same level and the only man who is hit by this tariff is the man who invests his money in a Canadian industrial enterprise. Does the Prime Minister realize just what that signifies? Let us take an illustration. Before the statute was passed, the man who had money invested in American securities had to pay the full amount on his income, just as the salaried man was obliged to do. But if anyone had shares in a Canadian industrial enterprise he was relieved of the normal tax; and this on the old principle of taxation, that the same government should not tax twice the same piece of money. Under the present proposal if a company has $25,000 available for dividends the government takes 9 per cent or $2,250, and that leaves $22,250 for distribution among the shareholders. That money goes into the hands of the shareholders and is taxed on the same basis as the American income or any income that may come from England or Germany. Let us bear that in mind. Now what is the government discriminating against in this connection? It is discriminating against money derived from Canadian industry, so that the $2,250 of taxation which the company I have just suggested by way of illustration has to pay to the government, does not represent the full extent of the tax which is levied on that money inasmuch as every one of the shareholders must pay his private tax. In other words, that $25,000 pays at the rate of 9 per cent and perhaps 10 per cent more in the hands of the shareholders. Why should the government place such a handicap on Canadian industry? Do hon. gentlemen opposite think that any man would be inclined to invest money in industry in Canada under such circumstances? Yesterday a banker of international reputation said to me, "Mr. Bennett, that is certainly a fine budget which your government has introduced. It will be the means of sending a lot of money to New York for investment." Of course it will, and for three reasons: first, because the return on American investments is larger than on investments made in Canada; secondly, because the investments are more liquid and marketable; and thirdly, because of the assurance and stability due to the tariff policy in force in the United States. What, on the other hand, have we in this country? If a man invests money in industry here he is taxed to such an extent as to be altogether discouraged from leaving his investment in that industry or adding to it. First of all the government taxes the corporation 9 per cent. Now it is true that in the United States the tax is 13 per cent, but we must remember that the shareholders there are free from the normal tax. The company having been once taxed, the government there considers that it would be eminently unfair to tax the individual shareholder a second time on the same money. But we have abandoned that sound principle. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, this is a rich man's budget. Look at the schedule. The man with an income of $250,000 pays nearly fifty thousand dollars less than under the old act; the man with an income of half a million pays over $100,000 less and the man with a very much larger income pays some quarter of a million dollars less than before. But if an individual who has put by some money invests it in a Canadian enterprise yielding 7 per cent he will pay full tax on that $70 income from the thousand dollars of his investment, as he will not be free from the normal tax. The budget is a discrimination against incomes earned from Canadian securities. I could give the names of men and women to-day who have been realizing on Canadian securities and who are now withdrawing their investments and sending their money to the United States, to Great Britain and to France. To-day there is a steady stream of money going to the brokers of Wall street from Canada. It is estimated that as large a sum as $75,000,000 of Canadian money has been invested in government securities of Chile, Argentine, Italy and other countries. This, Mr. Speaker, is not a simple matter. It is one that strikes at the foundation of our whole industrial development, for if capital is to be twice taxed we shall find that people will refuse to invest in Canadian enterprises. I say, therefore, that instead of being a prosperity budget this budget is calculated to turn class against class. The government will go to the country and say, "Look at what we have done for the poor man." Well, I know of poor men who have saved money which they have invested in industry, and those men will suffer in consequence of this budget. During the last few years there has been considerable thrift in Canada and men have invested in industrial enterprises, drawing 6 or 7 per cent on preferred shares. Now their income will no longer be free from the normal tax, and inevitably they will withdraw that money and invest it in the United States where they will enjoy the protection of a stable tariff and other advantages to which I have referred.

There is one other matter which I desire to mention and which arises out of the observations made with respect to the motion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) regarding the tariff board and the question of protection. It was said by the leader of the government that my right hon. leader did not introduce his resolution into this House although he might have done so at any time before the budget was brought down. Let me read from the speech of the leader of the opposition:

> It is a matter of regret to me, Mr. Speaker, that I am compelled to move this resolution, which has stood upon the order paper since the opening of the session, in the form of an amendment instead of as a substantive motion. On private members' days, which, under the rules, were alone open to me for this purpose, the order never was reached except at so late an hour of night as to render it impracticable to have it moved and discussed, and the government saw fit to decline to give any special preference to the motion or to fix a day for its discussion as a substantive motion. That it now becomes an amendment to supply and on that account is open to the government to be accepted as a motion of want of confidence, is no choice of mine; it is the only alternative left. I avail myself of that alternative and shall present the reasons why I think the motion should be adopted, why at all events, if it cannot appeal to this House, it should appeal to the people of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Was not the leader of the opposition perfectly free to move the resolution as an amendment to the budget had he so desired?

Mr. BENNETT: Only one amendment can be moved to the budget and the motion of the leader of the opposition embodied some matters that could not very well have been introduced in such an amendment. Surely the leader of the government must have overlooked for the moment the fact that the government declined to afford the leader of the opposition facilities to move his motion. There are gentlemen in this House who know that what I say is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The order was called on different occasions.

Mr. MANION: At eleven o'clock at night.

Mr. BENNETT: It was called too late for discussion. Let me ask the Prime Minister this question: Did the leader of the opposition ask, or did he not, for facilities to move his motion, and were those facilities refused or not?

Now I have spoken at intolerable length, Mr. Speaker, but the leader of the government traversed so much ground that it was necessary that some at least of the matters that he touched upon should be dealt with. My right hon. friend suggested that the amendment does not embody the faith of the Conservative party in the principles which it espouses. The Conservative party has espoused and I believe, will continue to espouse under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman who leads it the principle of protection for industries, for agriculture, for mining, in fact for every branch of Canadian life. The Conservative party believes in it not as an expedient but as a principle. It does not believe in it merely for the purpose of getting into power, and would rather be out of power and see the principle maintained than derive power at the sacrifice of that principle.

The greatest of the problems of this Dominion which call for solution is the problem of the loss of our people. Side by side with that problem goes the problem of taxation. When the hon. gentleman talks about the remission of taxation, I would point out to him that the Minister of Finance to-day has remitted practically the same burden of taxation that he imposed. The income tax in the United States will be wiped out in three years. In 1853 Gladstone laid down his plan by which the income tax was to be entirely removed by 1860. It was first imposed by Pitt, then suspended for a time, and afterwards reimposed. Gladstone said that it was an instrument to be used sparingly because it was a safeguard to be relied upon in times of great national difficulty.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the House said this afternoon that parliament had not made adequate provision to deal with the war expenses as the war proceeded, and he read certain figures that would indicate we did not exact from the people by taxation the amount of money that we should have exacted. Yet if he will turn to the Public Accounts he will find the sums of money raised by ordinary taxation during the conduct of the war amounted to hundreds of millions of dollars. Sir Thomas White, who was then Minister of Finance discussed frankly with the House these problems in their entirety. He stated that he was endeavouring during the war to lay the foundations of some form of prosperity that would enable the people to bear the additional burdens imposed upon them by the war in the way of annual taxation, at the same time exacting from them the maximum burden of taxation from day to day. It is true tax exempt bonds were issued. They were also issued in England and in the United States. This was done by the Canadian government because the effort made by us was so astounding, so vast and so successful that no chance could be taken of wrecking our credit by emitting securities that would not be absorbed.

When Gladstone brought down his budget in 1865 I find the entire national revenue of Great Britain was about $350,000,000 or £70,000,000, and at that time its population was only about 30,000,000. Now when we consider that Canada is raising every year as vast a sum as that, with a population of only 9,000,000, we must realize that we are a people of great courage and great enterprise. To that extent I agree with the Prime Minister. I know of no man on this side of the House that either consciously or unconsciously ever said a word against the greatness of this country. Its achievements have been the finest of any country in the history of the world. But there can be no doubt that we are drifting, drifting, drifting. If we point out that its national existence will cease if we continue upon this course, if we point out that history affords us a sure chart by which to steer our course, we do it because we realize that in the experience of men of the same civilization there is to be found the best chart, and the best beacon by which to guide our course. We know that wherever men are gathered together, wherever nations are speaking through their representative institutions in a desire to increase their prosperity and foster the greatness of their country, they have recourse to legislation to protect their people from the inroads of those who from various reasons are able to undermine their industrial life. Why amongst all the nations of the world should we be the only people who do not believe in and practise the principle of protection? Are we wiser? When I hear the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister himself proclaim a doctrine at variance with the doctrine that is influencing the conduct of other nations, I say to myself: Are these supermen or not? They tell me they are not. Then I ask them this question: Why should we not in the light of reason be guided by the experience of hundreds of millions of other people of the world? The war of commerce is with us, night and day, in season and out of season it is being waged pitilessly against this country. The great people to the south are seeking to capture our market which their mass production makes possible for them, unless by measures national in their character and protective in their essence, we do something to safeguard the industrial life of this country. Unless and until we do that we cannot keep our population. We can adopt immigration policies and bring people here from other lands, only to see them slowly trickle down to the great republic to the south, only to see our best men and women leave us because there is no work for them at home. We know in the light of history, in the light of experience and in the light of knowledge that comes to us from reading and from observation that there is one way, and one way only, by which to make this country great—that is to develop our resources by our own people, and so give them increased employment. When we depart from that policy we are on shifting sands, we are following false lights, and shipwreck is inevitable.

The amendment for which we are ready to vote as a united party means protection for our agricultural, our mining and our industrial life. That is, the amendment is based upon the maintenance of good faith and honest dealing. I will watch with interest, as the nation will watch, the men who make loud their protestations in the market places of higher political morality than those who oppose them, stand in their places this night and vote for national dishonour, the repudiation of our promises and the disregard of our plighted word given in the most serious and most solemn way that a nation can speak. Our contentions may be laughed at, jeered at, treated as a joke. But when we find the national life of this country being sapped and destroyed, when we find political morality no longer the watchword of contending parties, but merely the spoils of office, perhaps—perhaps the people of Canada will look back upon this night and think of the men who have violated those professions and stamped dishonour on the national life of this young Dominion.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly it is cruel to tax the attention of the House at this hour of the night and after this protracted debate. I would certainly much prefer to avoid adding any observations; but in justice to the electors who have sent me here and to a certain category of people in the province of Quebec and elsewhere, whose views I think I fairly represent, I have a few things to say with regard to the budget which do not entirely coincide with the views expressed on either side of the House. I will endeavour to confine myself to those.

On the trade returns presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and so eloquently dwelt upon this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I need not insist. These figures are satisfactory in themselves; but, on the other hand, the experience of the world and economic evolutions have demonstrated that an increase in trade is not always and under all circumstances an indication of standing prosperity. Increase in trade, either in imports or exports, may mean much or little, or very different things. Increases in imports may mean a decrease in home production or an increase in purchasing power. Increases in exports may indicate a decrease of purchasing power, a decrease in home consumption, or an increase in the foreign debt which is met by merchandise instead of by money. A favourable balance of trade has been many times discussed from various viewpoints. I will not indulge in any theorising on the matter, but I think I express the view of those people who are not particularly interested in the success of one party or the other by saying that the trade situation of the country is fairly satisfactory. It offers an indication of a safe recuperation from the crisis through which we, with the rest of the world, passed during and after the war. It certainly does not warrant the wailings of the Conservative party, expressed previous to the election, during the electoral campaign and since. On the other hand it cannot be ignored that there is still uneasiness in the country and a disquietude in many spheres of our economic life. The emigration of our population to the United States is still going on, not to the same degree as in years past, but sufficiently to engage the attention of the government and of all people having the welfare of Canada at heart.

As to the primary cause of that situation, to confine it to a fiscal policy which, after all, has been practically the same for the last fifty years is, to my mind, disregarding the real facts of the case. The deeper and more permanent cause of that uneasiness, of that disquietude and emigration to the United States is to be found in our war follies, and this cannot be too much insisted upon in order that future generations may learn by the past. We should be thankful to the Prime Minister for having put his finger this afternoon on that element of the situation. What has been the main cause of the depopulation of our rural districts and the concentration of our people in the large industrial centres, and the volume of unemployment, at times larger and at times smaller, but always a problem since the war? It lays in the war itself, or rather in the exaggerated part we took in it. The enlistment of soldiers took away most of the able-bodied men from the farm and from industry in order to make them destroyers of life, destroyers of wealth and destroyers of economic balance, instead of keeping them in this country to work for our future generations. Whether we did right or wrong I am not discussing at the moment, but I think we should acknowledge this fact. A further cause of the rural exodus was the building up of those temporary war industries which offered abnormal wages to young people who had no particular propensities for trade or for industry. It brought them to the cities, young women as well as young men, disgusted them with rural life; so that when the war was over and these industries closed, they did not go back to the land. They impoverished the rural part of Canada and kept up the volume of unemployment in the cities to an abnormal degree.

With regard to the balance of wealth, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) once quite rightly said on a public platform in Montreal, that while, on the whole, the war had not impoverished Canada, it had displaced wealth. Anything that tends to disturb the economic balance of a country does not make for the good of that particular country. You may have the same amount of money in the country, either deposited in banks, invested in industry, or employed in various ways, but if the apportionment of that amount, represented either by liquid money or by values invested in farming or industry, is not fairly balanced among the masses of the people, you have a poorer country than if you had less money better apportioned. That has been another result of the war.

Then there was created a derangement in the industrial life of Canada. I think it was the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) who mentioned the other day a certain industry which, before the war, made carriage wheels. During the war it was transformed into a munition factory, and, following the war, turned into something else. What does that mean? Does it mean the putting of capital into an industry for the purpose of developing that industry normally? No; on the contrary, it means useless expenditure; it disturbs the industry, its machinery, its labour, and creates uneasiness.

Then, during the war fever and the period of folly which followed, our people fell into habits of extravagance, in the domestic life, in industrial pursuits, in trade enterprises and in the works and expenditures carried on by public bodies, manifesting itself to-day in the abnormal taxation. That is not only on account of the direct expenditures of the war but also results from the indirect expenditure grafted, so to speak, upon the war debt and inflated by the war spirit. It means an increase in the cost of living, an increase in the burdens, public and private, of the mass of the people, and therefore it means difficulty, uneasiness and emigration.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has spoken of the 500,000 people who have gone to the United States from Canada, and he attributed that exodus to the fiscal policy of this government. He said the only way to call back those people was to confirm a policy of protection. Is protection really the remedy to all our evils? How can it be applied, and to what degree should it be applied? Let us for a moment consider protection, first as a means of fostering industrial activity, and then as a mode of taxation.

I was somewhat amused, and felt somewhat like Rip Van Winkle in listening to this long debate on the respective merits of free trade and protection. It carried me back to my boyhood days. When I first entered political life, I was sent as a delegate from my present constituency to the great Liberal convention held in Ottawa in 1893. The byword of the Liberal party then was that there should be no rest till the last vestige of protection had been destroyed; on that cry the elections of 1896 were carried and won; but, as was explained afterwards, while the rank and file of the Liberals crusaded against protection, the leaders made arrangements with the parties interested in protection, so that there was not much change.

Since then the fiscal policy of Canada has been about the same. In spite of the loud declamations in favour of protection, on the one hand, and the denunciations of protection, on the other, practically we have had the same fiscal policy in this country for the last fifty years. Now, is that policy good or bad? I am beginning to feel somewhat disquieted and, I must say, a little disgusted at hearing always quoted the example of England, on the one hand, as proof that we should adopt free trade, and that of the United States on the other, as evidence that we should go in for a stiff protection. Canada is not England nor is it the United States. For the short time of my life in which I believed in the creed of free trade, even then I had already the habit of trying to understand what I said, which brought me many difficulties in my political life. So I began to study the question. I read Cobden, Adam Smith, Frederic Bastiat, Molinari, and other authorities, and I became convinced that free trade was a great theory. But then, I also had another habit, which I have cultivated, of looking to the applications of theory; and to my great surprise I found out that free trade.—or rather the policy of free importations, because free trade never existed—produced, in England, economically and socially, the same results which high protection produced in the United States: concentration of wealth, depopulation of the rural districts, industrialization of the country, to the same extent, and perhaps more so, in free trade England than in protectionist United States. Why? I think the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Hatfield) told us yesterday: because the geographical, economic and industrial conditions of the two countries were so different that two different policies could produce the same results.

Canada cannot and never will be the shipping country which England is, and therefore can never expect from the exchange of her merchandise on all the seas the same results which a free importing country like England has obtained, thanks to her geographical position and to her search for foreign markets in all neutral lands and in almost all semi-civilized countries on the face of the earth. Canada, on the other hand, cannot expect to be as self-sufficient a country as the United States. The climate is against us; the geographical configuration of the country is against us. There will always be more difficulty in creating a well balanced internal trade in Canada. There will always be greater difficulty in balancing the agricultural needs of the central provinces and the industrial development of the east. Instead of trying to hypnotize ourselves with the results of the policy obtained in England, under conditions which cannot exist here, or with the results obtained in the United States, under conditions which are different from ours, why not at last take an inventory of the real conditions of our country and think and act as Canadians instead of being mere copiers of England or the United States?

Especially am I always surprised at finding that the Conservative party, which boasts so much of its loyalty to all British institutions and precedents, British example and British traditions, should have become so thoroughly imbued with the Yankee spirit in matters of trade and economics. I am not prepared to say, as the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) said a short time ago, that the policy of protection necessarily makes for war and hatred between nations. There again history would prove that free trade England has looked for more wars, has waged more wars, and provoked more wars, on account of her free trade policy, than the United States have; and the United States were more often at war before they became protectionist than they have been since they adopted the high tariff policy; but that, I think, proves nothing one way or the other.

Let us take protection as it has worked in Canada, for the last fifty years, and as applied by the protectionist party. Has it produced all the results which we are told it would produce if applied now? And should it be on a higher scale of duties than was established by the Conservative government previously? We have heard nothing as to that, except the famous "brick for brick" declaration. But as protection has been applied under the Conservative regime, by the party which invented protection as a gospel and a policy, what has it produced? It has undoubtedly created and developed some large industries. But it has also contributed to crush a great many small and local industries. Perhaps as the hon. member for Wellington once said, I lack the practical spirit. But, to my mind, not being interested in any industry whatever, I consider that a greater wealth and a more enduring prosperity would result in this country by the spreading and maintenance of small local and domestic industries, in every province of Canada, than by the concentration of large industries in a few cities of Ontario and Quebec. In that respect I am not only expressing the view of an unpractical French-Quebecker, but it is one of the main arguments made last year in the province of Nova Scotia by one of the leaders of the Conservative party, by a colleague, for a time, I think, of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), certainly of the hon. member for Calgary and of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen)—an argument made by the Hon. Mr. McCurdy, who pointed out that the National Policy, so-called, and as applied under both Conservative and Liberal governments, has destroyed all industries in Nova Scotia. I need not read the extract, I gave it during the debate on the Address. In Ontario and even in Quebec, the same result has obtained, to a lesser degree, but sufficient to drive the rural population from the farming districts to the urban centres. More so in Ontario than in Quebec, because the industries in Ontario are more even dispersed in various centres of medium size, whilst in Quebec, up to a few years ago, the large industries were practically all centred in Montreal, Quebec and a few other towns. But since a new impetus has been given to industry in the province of Quebec the same process is taking place. Four or five years ago, I was passing through that magnificent region lying north and south of lake St. Peter, those splendid rural districts which have been counted as the most fertile producing parts of Quebec at least, if not of Ontario as well. Well, the population of these districts has diminished largely in the last ten or twenty years. Some of the people have gone to industrial centres such as Three Rivers, Shawinigan Falls and Grand'Mère. Many others—seeing their sons leave the farm and go to work as labourers in the city, seeing also their daughters follow them to become operatives in factories or to adopt some other occupation—have abandoned the farm because they no longer had the family labour at hand to cultivate it. This has been one of the main causes of the migration of our rural populations to the United States. Thus the over-industrialization of Ontario and Quebec had begun this process of unrooting our rural population long before the war. The war simply gave a new impetus to the process. It also began to have this effect: Producing wealth, not properly balanced, impoverishing gradually the villages and the rural districts and enriching the industrial centres, it created in our cities, as in every other industrialized country, this double curse of modern times: plutocracy and pauperism. In spite of all statistics—large deposits in banks, stock exchange reports, et cetera, this does not mean wealth, still less prosperity and happiness.

But there is something more. Most of the industries in this country, created under the protective system, organized themselves without any state supervision, without any legal control as the real amount of capital invested therein, and the amount of water added to the real amount of capital. What is the result? To-day the purchasing people of this country are paying for the commodities they consume, for the goods they use, not only a fair remuneration upon the real amount of capital invested in the making of those goods; but are making returns to the financial sharks upon the amount of watered stock, of valueless paper, all called "capital." I do not believe in that. If you take these two things together, there is sufficient explanation to be found of the fact that the industrialization of this country has not benefited the whole of the Dominion, and there need be no surprise that some of our provinces should entertain a feeling of distrust, almost akin to hatred, against other provinces which they hold responsible for the state in which they find themselves.

But somethng more, and from a national point of view something of a more disquieting nature has occurred, especially since the war. I stood for protection, reasonable protection, for many years, because I thought it was one of the obstacles to the penetration of our country by American influences. But since the war, and largely on account of our war follies, our fiscal and economic regime is now tending to make Canada a field for the investment of American capital. Some people rejoice in that. I do not. I think there is more danger to the national independence of Canada in the purchasing of our waterpowers, and of our sources of wealth, either in the forest or in the mine, by American capital than there is from the fact that some of our industries suffer from the competition caused by American merchandise entering this country. It is all very well to say that American capitalists and industrialists are coming to this country because they find conditions here suitable to their purpose—that they would not advocate any such thing as political or economic union with the United States. So long as the social and economic conditions of Canada were such that it was to the advantage of the American investor to maintain this state of things, very well. But now that we have higher taxation in Canada than in the United States—because we were more foolish during the war than the Americans were, because we spent more money, because we ruined more people, because we uprooted more of our young population from the soil for war purposes than the Americans did—the economic and social conditions in this country are getting to be such that it is becoming more advantageous, from a purely economic point of view, to invest and to live in the United States than in Canada. When the American investor finds out that his investment in Canada, that the development of his trade in Canada,—shut off from the United States by the American tariff,—is less profitable to him than his investment in the country to the south, that he is running just as much risk, if not more, and reaping less profit than he would in the United States, it will not take a lifetime before he finds means—perhaps with the help of a portion of the Canadian press and a good many of our ultra patriots—to start a movement that may take the form of independence, to begin with, but will have for its object economic union at first and afterwards political union with the United States.

There is more to be feared than the penetration by American capital. American capital does not come into Canada as English capital used to come, merely as an investment. Those great industries which are put up and developed by American capital, are also managed by American citizens with all their genius, their spirit of enterprise, their courage and their energy,—no doubt a splendid thing from a purely material and economic point of view, and I am second to none in rendering homage to the genius and energy of the American people and their great captains of industry. But they also bring with them, and naturally, without any effort or any propaganda, spread around them the spirit of Americanism. I have already noticed in the province of Quebec, where industries have been established by Americans and are managed by Americans, a new social spirit among the people working for them and living near them. With the penetration of capital, is coming the penetration of habits of work, the penetration of social habits. Over and above that, there is the penetration of the so called American literature, which the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) mentioned the other day, in the form of American magazines, Sunday papers, and so forth; and again we had the manifestation of that characteristic Yankee tendency which prevails on that side of the House in the suggestion by him of a remedy in the shape of "protection" by way of a customs duty. He says that it would not prevent a better class of American publications from coming in, because people would gladly pay the duty, but that it would shut off the worst class. I believe the contrary. People who are looking for the worst class of American publications will gladly pay ten or fifteen cents more to have them and read them; but the seriously inclined people will perhaps hesitate before paying thirty-five or fifty cents for the serious American review. Here again I suggest that the remedy is not simply the imposition of a duty. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) said. "Do not count honour by dollars." I say do not combat foreign influences by the mere imposition of a duty. If you want to counteract the influence of American publications in this country, you must develop in all spheres of life the spirit of Canadian nationalism. It is not by making the people more British that you will prevent them becoming more American but it is by making them more Canadian. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) had the courtesy of saying that the province of Quebec was better preserved from that penetration. Quite true. But why? The province of Quebec is better preserved on account of its language first; but a large and increasing number of our people read and learn the English language thoroughly. The language barrier itself would not be sufficient. Unfortunately, too large a proportion of that influx of American literature comes into the province of Quebec and penetrates Canadian homes; but it has less effect, not only because of the language but because of the religious spirit and social tradition inherited by centuries of attachment to the soil of Canada. It is because we are more thoroughly and exclusively Canadian. I am surprised that people who are so prone to denounce the penetration of American influences do not realize that the greatest moral strength we can use to counteract that penetration is by inducing as many French Canadians as we can to settle and live in the English speaking provinces of Canada, not as foreigners, but as Canadians, to help to stamp in those provinces that type of social life that has made the province of Quebec, and which still maintains in that province, the only real obstacle to Americanism which remains in Canada.

It has been stated several times that Quebec is protectionist, and that Quebec, had it not been for the conscription or other war issues, would have voted protectionist. I am surprised at the creation and the maintenance of that legend. I take it for granted that many of those who express that view speak in good faith. Undoubtedly it is due to the fact that some newspapers in Quebec, with a large circulation, controlled by men of strong influence, consider themselves the whole of Canada, of the empire and perhaps of the world. Being protectionist they think and assert that the whole province must be protectionist. On this matter I will take the testimony of a good friend of our province, one who knows it well, who has lived in it for some years, who is a pronounced protectionist and an avowed Conservative. I refer to my excellent friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). A year ago last fall, there was a by-election in the city of Montreal in the St. Antoine division, decidedly one of the most Conservative and protectionist ridings of the whole province. The election was fought purely and simply, as this debate has been, on what these gentlemen call the principle of protection, and the protectionist candidate was defeated, upon which the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George wrote a very interesting letter; I thought it was the most complete expression of opinion on the political situation at large, and especially in Quebec. It appeared in the Montreal Gazette on December 10, 1924, and in it Mr. Cahan stated:

> I was especially impressed during the last election contest in St. Antoine division by the number of former supporters of a protective tariff who expressed reluctance to vote for Mr. Birks. They recognized the personal moral worth and the commercial and industrial standing of the Conservative candidate; but they were not quite satisfied with that kind of protection which Mr. Meighen seemed to advocate.
> More or less casual conversations with my fellow-electors at the clubs and on the street have clearly convinced me that the electors have now begun to discriminate between the general policy of protection and the incidence of the existing customs tariff; between the existing high customs duties which unduly favoured certain industries, and the existing low customs duties which tend to drive other industries out of existence. When invited to vote for a protective policy, they instinctively enquired: "Protection to which industry, and to whom?"
> In those conversations several industries were frequently referred to which, in the course of years, by corporate consolidations effected under the law or by commercial agreements formed within the law, had become infant prodigies and practical monopolies, which, by taking full advantage of the existing tariff, were thereby enabled to deal harshly with the consumers.
> It is evident that the high cost of living, the imposition of income taxes and the existing precarious conditions of employment, have led thousands of voters to discriminate between that kind of protection which would enable Canadian industries to withstand foreign competition and to create local employment, and that other kind of protection which would continue to enable a monopoly to oppress the local consumers.

I think I may take this as the full and candid expression of the reasoned opinion of the protectionist Conservatives of the province of Quebec generally. Now when you come to the mass of the rural population, to consider that they are protectionist by tradition or habit is to ignore the whole history of the province. The province of Quebec has never responded to an appeal for high protection but has voted against all such appeals.

Mr. HANNESSON: Is the hon. member in favour of protection as a principle?

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not see any principle in protection.

Mr. HANNESSON: If the hon. gentleman is not in favour of protection is he in favour of free trade?

Mr. BOURASSA: No.

Mr. HANNESSON: Then what is the principle he stands for in regard to the tariff?

Mr. BOURASSA: If the hon. gentleman will wait, I will endeavour to express as shortly as possible what I think is the view of the great mass of the people of the province of Quebec on this issue: of the thinking man by reasoning, and of the mass by instinct and tradition. We do not make a religion either of free trade or protection—at least I do not. As I told my hon. friend, for a couple of years I believed in free trade almost as much as in my creed.

Mr. HANNESSON: Free trade as it is practised in England?

Mr. BOURASSA: When I was a greenhorn I believed in free trade as it is practised there, but as I got to know something I believed in nothing. I think the best policy for this country is a policy suited to our needs and conditions, and for that reason I stand for no principle in tariff matters and for no stability, so far as duties are concerned.

Mr. HANNESSON: No principle?

Mr. BOURASSA: No; it is purely a matter of business, which must be governed by the circumstances of time and locality and by geographical and climatic considerations. We stand in Quebec—at least, I do, and I think that in expressing my personal views I am voicing the opinions of a large number of people in that province—we stand, I say, for a reasonable measure of protection. We stand for home industries, by which term we mean industries that use our native products, mineral or animal.

Mr. HANNESSON: May I ask a question?

Mr. BOURASSA: If my hon. friend will let me develop my point he will see better whether there is any necessity for him to ask his question. I am at one with gentlemen opposite in advocating a policy, not of embargo but of encouragement, aimed at inducing capitalists or industrialists who have money invested in our forests and mines to develop their industry, and so far as conditions will permit, to manufacture their products up to the finished state in this country. I believe in turning all Canadian wood into Canadian paper, so far as we can possibly do so, rather than allowing our wood to go to the United States to enrich American manufacturers. I believe in converting Canadian minerals, nickel, asbestos, and so forth, into finished commodities, rather than allowing them to go to the United States to enhance United States capital; I prefer to have them developed in Canada and so afford employment to Canadian labour. I believe, again, in protecting the beet sugar industry, and in that respect I entirely agree with the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong). But I certainly do not believe in a tariff policy which has succeeded in creating a sugar monopoly in the hands of a few men in Montreal and elsewhere in Canada and enabling them, by means of sugar duties, not only to receive incomes from the capital they have invested in Canada but also to maintain the sugar plantations which they have purchased in Cuba and in the West Indies. In short, if by encouragement to local industry we mean, as in this instance, protection for beet sugar growing I am in favour of a policy that will assist our producers. But let that policy be one such as is in force in Germany, Belgium, and France. Let us encourage the growers of beets in this country rather than the producers of cane in Cuba and the West Indies, because all the genius of all the Conservative leaders and partisans will never make cane growing possible in this country. Likewise, I am opposed to protection on cotton in the degree and in the manner in which it has been afforded in Canada during the past forty years, forcing the masses of the people to pay from 25 to 50 per cent more for all their cotton goods than they would have had to pay for cottons produced either in England or in the United States. I am opposed to such protection for the reason that the soil of Canada will never produce raw cotton; and, for another reason, that the industry, in Quebec at least, has been over-capitalized. Its stock has been watered to the limit, so that every time we buy a yard of cotton in any form, we are making remunerative not only the legitimate capital invested in the industry, but the watered stock that has been added to it. For that kind of protection I have never stood and I never will stand. On the other hand, I am in favour of protection on woollens, because, in my opinion, if properly applied, such protection should be an encouragement, both to the makers of woollen goods and to the farmers who raise sheep and sell their wool. I was very much interested in the proceedings at a meeting in Toronto last fall of an association of people interested in the woollen industry. I was struck not only by statements made by manufacturers but by the views expressed by farmers. At that meeting, Mr. Dryden, of Maple Shade farm, of Brooklin, Ontario, director of the Canadian Co-operative Wool Growers' Association, spoke as follows:

> We can grow successfully in Canada every type of sheep, including merino. Sheep breeding in Canada is economically sound, because our flocks are not subjected to droughts which occur in other sheep breeding countries or suffer from the diseases which have to be faced by the sheep breeder in Great Britain. Yet in the small area of Great Britain they maintain 24,000,000 sheep, while in Canada we maintain only 2,500,000, while we now only grow some 15,000,000 pounds of wool. There are no climatic or physical reasons why we should not grow 50,000,000 pounds of the 70,000,000 pounds of wool consumed annually by the people of Canada. Sheep fit into the business of mixed farming as no other farm animal does and in my opinion the raising of sheep in this country is directly connected with successful farming. There should be a flock of sheep on each Canadian farm.

I entirely agree with that. Protection, so far as the woollen industry is concerned, should be applied in such a manner as to force the manufacturers to buy their raw material from local producers. They should use wool grown in Canada and should not be enabled to import their wool from foreign countries, afterwards making the Canadian people pay unreasonable prices to swell their capital.

With regard to boots and shoes, the same reasoning holds good. This is an industry which to a very large extent has been implanted in Quebec. I do not want to plead the case against them, but I desire to give to the House the testimony of one of the best informed men in that industry, the manager of one of the most successful boot and shoe factories in the province of Quebec. A few years before the close of the war he said to me: "After this war is over the boot and shoe industry will pass through the greatest crisis in its history." I asked him why he thought so, and he said that he was of this opinion because, carried away by the allurements of war profits, the operators of most factories were changing their equipment. They were leasing—they could not purchase them—from the American Shoe Machinery Company, machines specially adapted to the making of army boots. They were obliged to pay royalties on these machines and were engaging large numbers of new labourers, educating them in the use of this special machinery which would be absolutely of no use after the war. After the war, he said, the manufacturers would find their factories over-equipped, while they will still be compelled to pay royalties to the American company. They will also have on their hands labour utterly unsuited to the trade on a peace basis. This is exactly what happened.

So far as woollens and boots and shoes are concerned, I think I may safely say that the industries to-day are suffering, not because the average duty is too low, but exclusively by reason of the application of the British preference and because of a lack of expert appraisal at the customs. There, again, I have received all my information at first-hand. Under the British preference as applied during the past twenty-five years by both Conservative and Liberal governments, not only do British goods enter into keen competition with the products of these two industries in Canada, but goods manufactured in France, Belgium and Germany, under depreciated currencies, are foisted upon the Canadian market in competition with our manufacturers. These goods are 90 per cent manufactured in these foreign countries; and after receiving a small finishing touch in England they are stamped as British and are imported into Canada in competition with Canadian labour, and, for that matter, with British labour as well. In other words, under that famous British preference policy, we are protecting not only British capital and British labour at our own expense, but French, Belgian and German labour and capital. The only profiteer within the British Empire is the British trader who, since the development of social and economic difficulties in England, finds it more profitable to have his goods made in foreign countries and shipped to Canada under the so-called British preference policy.

Mr. FORKE: Does the hon. gentleman know that there are many people in Canada who are unable to buy boots at the prices asked for them?

Mr. BOURASSA: I quite agree with my hon. friend. I think during the war the boot and shoe makers prepared what happened to them afterwards by the extravagant prices they then asked for their product. On the other hand, will the hon. gentleman go the length of saying that we should handicap industries established in Canada—always with the reservation that they be honestly capitalized and properly managed,—in favour of foreign articles made under conditions that cannot last, their price being depreciated by reason of abnormal conditions?

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend's address, but I should like to know how he would keep down domestic prices unless by some outside competition?

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh yes, I want competition, but I want fair competition. I want, for example, absolute competition with regard to all those industries that go on the foreign market to purchase their raw material and come and manufacture it here. But when you have an industry which is a help not only to the capitalist, not only to the labourer, but also to the farmer, I say this is a national industry for which all classes of people should be prepared to make some sacrifice—not an undue sacrifice—just as I consider we should be prepared to make some sacrifice to help the western farmer to get his product more rapidly and more cheaply to the grain markets of the world. Likewise the western farmer should be prepared to pay 25 or 50 cents more for a pair of boots in order to keep up an industry which is national in its character and which makes use of goods produced in Canada and which will help their fellow farmers in the eastern provinces.

The disposition taken by the government with regard to the application of the British preference is a good one, and so far as it will apply only to goods coming through Canadian ports I could not be against what I advocated in this House some twenty-four years ago. But I think we should go further. In that respect I think we should imitate the example of the Australians and see that at least 80 to 85 per cent of these so-called British-made goods are really British-made, and that no foreign goods should be imported as so-called British-made goods.

Having said so much with regard to protection as an economic policy what about it as a mode of taxation? In this respect I must say that I am perhaps worse than I was twenty-five years ago! As a means of raising revenue I think it is absolutely indefensible. I believe much less in a so-called "tariff for revenue" policy than in a frank and open protective policy. If it is protective, then it is no revenue producer. If it produces revenue, then it is no protection, because when you get revenue you must import goods, and therefore you must eliminate the protective element. Then I am opposed to protection as a mode of taxation because it is essentially directed against the family, and because it is a mode of taxation which the taxpayer realizes the least. Hundreds of thousands of excellent people in this country would vote against any government which would tax them $25 a year, but who, without knowing it, ungrudgingly pay $200 indirectly, either to the government by way of customs duties added to the price of the goods they purchase, or by the higher price they pay for the goods of the protected manufacturer. I believe in the saying of John Morley, that the tax-gatherer is a great school master; but in order that the lesson taught to the taxpayer is not lost, he must realize the amount of money he pays to the state and for what purpose. Therefore I entirely agree with some of those gentlemen on the other side who have said they would much prefer increasing direct taxation and diminishing indirect taxation.

As regards direct taxation, this budget is in many respects an improvement. I will not refer to the Victory bonds exempt from taxation. That was a great mistake and an injustice to the people of Canada. Perhaps there might have been some excuse at the time those bonds were issued, but I consider that instead of decreasing the taxation the people have to pay in order to reduce our war debt, we should increase it. It is unjust to our children to lay upon their shoulders the whole burden accumulated by our follies during four years of war. Let those people who are responsible for the war, for the enlistment of men, for conscription, for war expenditure far beyond the normal means of this country, far beyond the moral or political obligations of this country, in order to keep up that military display which has been so scathingly described by Sir Andrew Macphail, let those people—all of us, since we are all responsible,—let our generation pay for that folly, and at the same time let us have the courage and the disinterestedness to say to those who follow us: Do not repeat our folly. I say again, it is unjust to diminish war taxation as long as the war generation lives. I agree entirely with the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that what strict social justice would have demanded would have been a capital levy immediately after the war, so as to reach the immoral, the abnormal and abominable profits made during the war, out of the blood and the blinded patriotism of this country, by warmongers who shouted "King and Country" while they were pocketing money at the expense of our people. I remember the excellent saying of Sir Thomas White, on one occasion in Montreal, that it was a crime for any Canadian to get rich during the war. Well, if that was the case, why has no government had the courage to apply proper punishment to that crime by levying a sufficient amount on those immoral profits so as to lift the burdens of the war from the shoulders of those who were not responsible for it?

With regard to other taxation, the receipt tax perhaps might have remained; but it was very much evaded and, as has been well said, was an annoyance rather than a source of revenue. I would maintain the tax on cheques and, indeed, increase it. I received the other day from a man in business a statement showing how this tax applied. He had a list of cheques he had either paid or received, I am not sure which, during a period of two or three months. By the accumulation of small cheques he had paid quite a sum of money, but on one single cheque of some $15,000 or $20,000 he had paid only $1. I think the limit of $1 on cheques is too low, and should be increased. The reduction in postage does not appeal to me; it was not a very heavy burden on the average ratepayer and could have remained for a few years longer. I admit it is not popular to say so, but we must have the courage to teach our people that we must pay our debts more quickly than we have been doing. We must therefore preserve, I think, all the means of taxation and revenue which are not too burdensome on the average man.

With regard to the sales tax, there are certainly some corrections still to be made. I sent the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) a statement the other day, showing the absurdity of the application of that tax in certain cases. A small lumber dealer with a small shop classed as a factory is obliged to obtain a license. Last year he sold to the farmers around him $2,200 worth of goods, out of which he and his family lived. He employs his son and one workman, yet he was taxed $110 on this $2 200 of gross receipts, which included the cost of his material. That is nonsense. The sales tax on small industries of that nature which are local, belonging to the small social economic life of the village or parish, should be abolished.

It is different with the tax on profits. I read in the press that a delegation from Montreal came here requesting the government to abolish the tax on the profits of so-called public utilities. They made a very eloquent plea because of the difference in treatment accorded the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and these so-called public utilities in Quebec. Let us understand each other. The public utilities in Quebec at present are, or in the very near future will be, one single monopoly composed of various corporations interlocked with each other in the hands of two or three men, one of whom is Sir Herbert Holt. Let us examine the position of that so-called public utility, and its service to the public. I am not taking my facts from a socialist organ, but from the Montreal Gazette of February 19, 1924, in which is reproduced an article appearing in the Financial Post. That shows how the genius of Sir Herbert Holt has developed this industry. I am not going to read the article at length, but some parts of it are very interesting. It explains that Sir Herbert Holt began by taking the old Montreal Gas Company and the Royal Electric Company and developing them with such ability, that at present the shareholders of the Montreal Light Heat and Power Consolidated, who had shares of $100 in these companies now hold, without having disbursed one cent of money, 7½ shares of the new concern, equivalent, according to current market quotations, to $1,100. But, they say, all along the company has shown great consideration for the public, and the present dividend is limited to 7 per cent. But 7 per cent, on a capital multiplied seven and a half times, means 52½ per cent; so that, at the present time, the ratepayers of the city of Montreal, of the island of Montreal, and before long practically one-half the province of Quebec, will be remunerating the shareholders of these companies to the extent of 52½ per cent, which perhaps will be multiplied by four before very long. That has come about through the high protective policy of the Taschereau government which has found such praise by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which the Montreal Gazette very properly qualified as "a Tory of a Tory" government. The "protection" afforded to the public utilities of Quebec means that the companies under Sir Herbert Holt have laid their hands on all the water power around the island of Montreal; they have prevented so far the development of the Long Sault by rival companies, all for the benefit of the people, of course! Now they come and ask, in the name of the people, to be exempted from taxes on profits. I hope this government will now be sufficiently informed of the situation to resist that demand.

With regard to the income tax, I approve almost unreservedly of the changes which have been made. The increased margin of exemption was called for; the government have eradicated the absurd and unjust discrimination between married people under the laws of the English speaking provinces and those under the laws of Quebec, which discrimination has existed ever since the establishment of the tax. It took nine years to get this reform, and I congratulate the government on having made the change. Respecting the exemption on children I repeat what I said at the beginning of the session, namely, that the exemption should be extended to the age of twenty-one years. We pretend that we want to encourage higher education, and that we want to give inducements to all fathers of families to give as complete an education as possible to their children. I do not know how it goes in the English speaking provinces, but in the backward province of Quebec, with its antiquated system of education, we want our children to learn our own language and all that it carries with it, and we desire them also to learn the language of our fellow citizens of English origin. There we desire to carry on the education of our children as long as we possibly can, and I think this government should have lengthened the exemption to twenty-one years of age, as an inducement to fathers of families to continue the education of their children. It will certainly come in time; it took three years to get the first exemption, and it has been increased gradually.

The change which puts the householder, unmarried but with family charges, on the same footing as married people, is also an excellent one. There are in our province many young men and, I will not say young girls, or old maids, but less-young girls, who carry on the heavy but sacred social duty of looking to the education of young children who have been left orphans, young brothers and sisters. It is proper. it is just, it is a social duty that they should be treated just as fathers and mothers of families are.

A point was made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) which I think was very well taken, and which I uphold entirely, as to the discrimination between the ratepayer who owns his home and the leaseholder under the present system. The owner of a house is not obliged to take into account the yearly value of his property as forming part of his revenue, while the leaseholder is taxed upon his revenue without any deduction as to the amount he pays in rental. The hon. member made a comparison with a farmer, but the comparison can be made the other way. I know people in Montreal who live in houses certainly worth $100,000 or perhaps $200,000, representing a yearly value, let us say, of 5 per cent. They do not pay a cent of taxation for the enjoyment of that property, and I think that is not just. I think that there should be deducted from the charges as against income a yearly value of about $600, representing the average rental, which would go in favour of the property owner as well as of the leaseholder, and that the owners of expensive property should pay something on the yearly value of the house they inhabit.

As to the tax on dividends, well, I would have bad grace to criticise that, because I asked for it; I have been asking for it for many years. It is called a duplication of taxes. I cannot see it that way. But suppose, first, that it is. There are many things upon which we pay taxation several times. Take real estate, for instance, bringing in revenue; we pay the municipal taxes, we pay the school taxes, and we pay the income tax. Why should the stockholder be more favoured than the owner of real estate? It has been said that we must encourage investment in industry. Very well, but I am more concerned with people who invest in homes and cradles than with people who invest in factories. If a company has made profits, after it has paid its taxation and the rest of its profits are distributed among its shareholders, if those shareholders draw an income from the company equivalent to a salary which is earned year after year, why should the man or the woman who enjoys an income of $5,000 or $6,000 from that investment pay less taxation than the man who earns $5,000 or $6,000 from his labour? The employees of these profit-distributing companies are taxed on their salaries; why should not the stockholders be taxed on their dividends? In many cases I am sure the managers or boards of directors of these companies will object to giving salary increases to their employees on the ground of the taxation they have to pay. Therefore, as the income of the employee is limited because of the taxation levied on the company, why should not the stockholder also be limited in the profits he may draw, by reason of the taxation? I think that is essentially just and equitable.

It is also said that this tax is discriminating against Canadian companies. I do not read the act that way. Any Canadian who invests in foreign companies is obliged under the present law to declare his income from foreign investments and to pay according to the same scale of taxation as if he had invested in real estate or in a Canadian company. Of course, I admit that there is more chance of evasion if you hold stock in a foreign company, but you have that in every country of the world. I was told the other day by someone who knows very well the functioning of the income tax in England that the amount of English capital invested abroad for the purpose of evasion of taxation is enormous. The same thing exists in France, Germany, Belgium, everywhere. You cannot stop it. But the idea of making of the stockholder a privileged ratepayer in this country, or rather of preventing him being a ratepayer, of not taxing him on his personal income apart from the taxation levied on the profits of the company, that I have never been able to understand, and I think the government has made a wise readjustment. Of course, proper care should be taken to collect the tax upon income derived from foreign investments and upon debenture coupons. I do not know, but I have been informed by people in Montreal who have a deep and intimate knowledge of financial operations that a very large amount of money invested in coupon bonds evades taxation—I do not agree with someone who spoke this afternoon against the idea of a stamp tax. If a stamp tax was imposed upon debenture coupons that are collected through Canadian banks, and the holders of those debentures were allowed to deduct that revenue from their tax bill in Canada, probably the result would be much more favourable to the Finance minister than it is at the present time.

With regard to the increase or the decrease in the income tax, I am rather inclined to agree with my hon. friend from West Calgary that this is no decrease of taxation. It is better than that; it is a readjustment of taxation, and that is what we need. For the reasons that I have given, for reasons of morality, for reasons of social justice, and for reasons of sound business, this is not the time to reduce taxation. But this is the time, and it is always the time to readjust taxation from year to year, in order to maintain a sound economic balance as between country and city, as between farming and industrial life, as between the various portions of Canada. That is what I call a budget nationally thought out, a proper and socially equitable budget. I do not say that it entirely responds to all requirements, but it is certainly a move in the right direction. It is certainly a budget that tends towards a better balanced application of taxes than we have had in this country since the war, and therefore, with the suggestions that I have made, and which I hope the Minister of Finance will take into account this year, and next year, and in all the years to come, readjusting the taxation from year to year, I propose to vote for this budget and to maintain the policy of this government, rather than to tie myself to the narrow policy of the Conservative party looking to protection, undefined, unbalanced protection, as the sole and only remedy for all the evils of this country. I did not believe in that remedy in years past. I believe still less in it under the present circumstances, and still less when all that great policy of upholding the principle of protection falls down under the four wheels of a motor car.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, before I address myself to the question before the House, I should like to say that I feel very sorry indeed that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is not with us to-day. I am sure that we would all have been delighted to have had him here and heard him address this House. Because of the circumstances under which he is absent, I am sure we all hope that he will very soon be in a position to return again to this House.

Before I discuss the features of the budget I want to refer to some remarks uttered by hon. gentlemen during the present debate. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken), in discussing the conditions in Canada, placed before the House a few days ago an idea to this effect: That industry in Canada had not been prospering during the last few years. He quoted certain figures and facts from the reports of the two great Canadian railway companies to show that agricultural products had been moving in greater quantity than had industrial products, and because of that fact he maintained that Canadian industries had been passing through a very serious time. If I may I would read the quotation in question, and it is this:

> My argument therefore is that the traffic arising from sources other than the carriage of farm products was substantially less in 1925 than in the year before so that in consequence we had a greater degree of general business depression last year.

On looking up the reports of these railway companies I found that everything he affirmed was true except the hon. gentleman's conclusion. With the permission of the House I will place certain traffic figures on Hansard, and I will merely refer to them to show the increase or the decrease in the volume of various commodities carried by our railway companies.

Taking the report of the freight movement of the Canadian National railways for the years 1924 and 1925, and considering that agricultural products were supposed to have moved in greater quantity in 1925 than in 1924, I find the hon. member was incorrect in his statement. I will not state the total amounts moved but will merely give the increases and the decreases as they are taken from the report. The decrease in the amount of agricultural products moved in 1925 as compared with the year 1924 was 144,479 tons.

The decrease in animal products carried in 1925 as against 1924 was 12,647 tons. Of products of the mines there was an increase in the amount carried in 1925 over 1924 of 671,006 tons. Of products of the forest there was an increase in 1925 as compared with 1924 of 360,437 tons. Of manufactures and miscellaneous products there was an increase in 1925 over 1924 of 1,626,326 tons. The grand total of increases for 1925 amounted to 2,500,643 tons. In the case of agricultural products the decrease in movement in 1925 amounted to 157,126 tons. The increase in tonnage of products of the forests and mines, and manufactures and miscellaneous, in 1925 amounted to 2,657,769 tons. These figures dispose altogether of the statement which the hon. member made. It proves very conclusively that the Canadian National Railways moved a greater tonnage of manufactured goods than it did of agricultural products in 1925. In view of these facts it is unfortunate that the hon. member should have made the mistake he did.

Now taking the Canadian Pacific annual report for the year ending December 31, 1925 we find the movement of freight set out at page 35 and I quote from it the following figures: The movement of flour in 1925 was decreased to the extent of 906,370 barrels. There was an increase in the volume of grain moved of 31,657,227 bushels or 949,716 tons. There was an increase of 30,787 head in the number of live stock moved. The movement of lumber increased in the same year, that is 1925, by 56,642 thousand feet. In the movement of manufactured articles there was an increase of 502,664 tons. The movement of all other articles increased by 831,765 tons.

May I explain to hon. members who are not conversant with conditions in western Canada what happened there during the last two or three years. In the year 1923 we had perhaps one of the best crops in the history of the west. Now, when a good crop is assured in western Canada there is a general movement of trade because the people of the west require many necessaries to enable them to handle their crops. In the year 1923 we had a "carry over" of grain products to the following year and that was included in the tonnage moved in 1924. In 1924 we had a very light crop in western Canada, consequently there was a reduction not only in the quantity of grain but of manufactured products moved. In 1925 we had no "carry over" of grain which the railways move in the spring. That explains why the situation was of that nature which the statistics indicate. I repeat that the hon. gentleman misrepresented the fact when he stated that manufactured goods had not been moved in an increased volume of tonnage.

The hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Murphy) in his speech referred to the Progressive movement in western Canada. He stated that the Progeessive movement there was declining. He made a further statement with respect to a certain farmers' periodical, namely, the Grain Growers' Guide, which was challenged by another hon. member. The statement of the hon. member for Neepawa was to this effect:

> Until the present time the subscription price has been $2 a year, $1 of which went to pay for the paper, the other dollar being the membership fee in the Farmers' Local.

And so on. Now, Sir, I have been a subscriber to the Grain Growers' Guide from the year it was first printed, and I have never known my dues to the Farmers' local to be paid by the Grain Growers' Guide. I know from personal experience that statement is absolutely incorrect, and it is no indication of the hon. gentleman's intelligence to have made such an assertion.

Now, I wish to say a few words with regard to the budget. In the first place I think the budget will be accepted generally by the people of this country. I sat in this House during the last parliament and in my opinion this is the best budget that has ever been brought down during that time. I believe I can support it with a good deal better spirit than any budget which has been submitted to parliament since 1921. Like the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) I regret very much that the government has seen fit, in a way, to reduce the special taxes for war revenue purposes. I think those taxes should be kept up as long as it is necessary to meet our war expenditures because personally I have not very much use for war. So long as people feel they must pay for wars the less likely they will entertain any desire of supporting future wars if they can help it.

1 a.m.

The Finance minister stated that the national debt at the present time amounts to $2,417,437,685. That is quite a large debt. Heretofore we have never made, any provision for the reduction of our national debt. All that we have done is to take the surplus we might have at the end of the year and apply it in reduction of the national debt. I think the time has come when we should make provision for the reduction of the national debt, and that provision should be included in the budget. There should be an item of expenditure in the estimates to cover the actual reduction of our national debt, and personally I will not feel satisfied that we are handling that situation effectively until such provision is made. It is not enough to depend on the surplus each year for the reduction of that debt.

There is one omission in the budget which is rather surprising to me and that is that the Minister of Finance did not forecast the revenue for the coming year. I am quite ready to admit that it is a hard thing to forecast revenue, and any Minister of Finance who attempts to do it is more or less in the class of a prophet. But at the same time it gives a good deal of satisfaction to the people if they have some indication as to what the minister expects in the way of revenue for the coming year.

Referring to the income tax, I think it is now on a basis where it should be kept for some years to come unless something extraordinary happens. I would not like to see the income tax any further reduced, except perhaps in the lower incomes. As far as the higher incomes are concerned I think they should be kept as they are, because after all is said and done the people who have the income are those who should be the most heavily taxed, and the income tax in my judgment is one of the fairest taxes that we have. A good deal has been said with reference to the favourable balance of trade, namely to the extent of $402,000,000. The Prime Minister this afternoon referred to the fact that the balance of trade in Canada's favour was greater than the balance of trade in favour of the United States in her national trade, namely $402,000,000 for Canada and $352,000,000 for the United States. One thing which we must take into consideration is the fact that Canada is a debtor nation. We are paying out interest charges each year, and consequantly in order to meet those charges, we must export goods. That is the only way we can pay our interest charges and our debts abroad. By reason of the fact that we are a debtor nation it is necessary to be a tremendous exporter of goods to meet obligations incurred for what we import. The United States is a creditor nation, and consequently, because of that fact, she does not have to export a surplus of goods to pay for any liabilities she may have abroad. As a matter of fact the time is coming when we may expect the United States to have a balance of trade against her, on account of the payment of debts due to the United States.

The Prime Minister seemed to think that a good deal of this balance of trade was due in large measure to the methods of the government. There may be something in favour of that proposition, but do not forget that the people who make prosperity in this country possible, and who make it possible to have a balance of trade of $402,000,000, are the people who take off their coats and produce the wealth of the country. If the people of Canada had not been industrious, more particularly in our agricultural section of Canada, we would never have that favourable balance of trade, but we must always remember that any favourable balance of trade or any method of paying our liability can only be secured by producing goods and rendering service.

There is one item I should like to suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the government regarding our obligations abroad. At the present time Canada has no means of telling how much we owe abroad by way of liabilities or debt. I think it would be quite possible for the Bureau of Statistics to secure the information, and if we had it we would be in a position to know just how our trade balances stood. We may not be exporting enough goods at the present time, even allowing for the surplus we have had during the last year to pay our liabilities abroad, and if that is the case we should be in a position to know it and be able to tell how much we have spent by way of surplus to meet the liability. It seems to me the Bureau of Statistics should be taken care of to a greater extent than it is at the present time. I do not think they have been given the opportunity to obtain as much information as they might have, and there is much information we should have from that bureau which we have not got and which would be of great value in future in determining our future policy.

The Minister of Finance in his closing remarks made a statement I think we all approve of. He pleaded for unity in Canada, and in that I agree with him, but let me say there can be no unity in Canada so long as injustices remain in this country. The only method whereby we can secure unity is to see that justice is rendered to all sections of Canada; when that is done we will have that unity which is so much desired by all classes of the country.

Since this session opened our hon. friends to the right have been very much perturbed about the farmer and have expressed themselves very freely as to his condition. They maintain that the farmer is not receiving justice under present conditions, and they are quite right. But they propose, in order that the farmer shall receive a greater measure of justice, to place a higher protective duty on farm products. That is their remedy and the only remedy they propose, so far as I have been able to gather up to the present time. Let us see where the farmer would stand under a protective system. Let me remind hon. members first of all that very nearly fifty per cent of the population of Canada depends wholly or indirectly upon agriculture. How has protection treated the farmer in the past? It is only necessary to look over the statistics carefully to ascertain how the farmer stands under a protective system. In 1923 I went to a good deal of pains to find out how the farmer stood, and after the investigation I made I felt that the farmer was robbed at the point of exchange. That is to say, when he came to exchange the products of his labour for the products of the factory he was robbed, because he did not get a fair exchange; so much so that, taking into consideration the prices as they were at that particular time, 1923, the farmer had to incorporate in his products approximately two and a half hours of labour in exchange for one hour of factory labour. Under those circumstances no agricultural section of Canada can be prosperous. I do not think it is quite as bad to-day, on account of the fact that the price of farm products have risen quite substantially during the past two years. There is also a greater degree of prosperity among the farmers than there was in 1923. But notwithstanding the increased price of products the farmers to-day are not receiving equitable treatment when they come to exchange those products for the things they require. That is readily understood when you examine the situation. As has been stated on many occasions, we farmers buy in a protected and sell in an open market at world's prices, because we export large surpluses of farm products. Under our fiscal policy the manufacturers can control to a large extent the prices of the commodities they sell, and by reason of that fact the farmer is unable to compete with them in the interchange of products.

Our Conservative friends have been assiduous in trying to cultivate the affections of the farmers. Now let me say this: I do not care how high the tariff may be on agricultural products. The fact is that just so long as the farmers sell individually and compete one against the other, not only in the home market but in the markets of the world, just so long will they be absolutely at a disadvantage under protection. Unless, therefore, the farmers realize that their only hope is in selling co-operatively, then under no circumstances can they expect to be prosperous in a country in which there is a protective tariff. Let me give the experience of Australia. I have gone to the trouble to find out just what the situation is there and I think the House will be interested to follow the trend of events in that dominion. Some time ago as the result of a general election the Australian people found themselves face to face with a situation very much the same as we have here at the present time. No party had a majority in the House and none could carry on except upon a basis of co-operation. There were three different groups in that parliament, one of which was the farmer party. This party made an alliance with the high protectionists, two of the farmer representatives going into the cabinet. Eventually they had to accept the protective policy of the group with the largest following who had formed the government. That government increased the customs duties and in the long run the Australian farmer demanded protection for himself. And he was protected. The result is that to-day in Australia there is a two-price system in connection with the sale of farm products. Consideration is first given the requirements of home consumption, and what is left is of course exported. Take for instance the sugar cane industry. They can tell exactly how much sugar is produced, and I am informed that during the last year it required about 60 per cent of the sugar cane grown in the dominion to provide for home consumption, 40 per cent being exported. What happened? The cane growers received $12 per ton for their product on that portion consumed at home, while on the 40 per cent which they exported they received only $3 a ton. I may remark here that there is in Australia a Labour Arbitration Board, and the moment the prices of farm products went up under that system, owing to the fact that the farmers were in control of prices in the home market, the workingmen demanded a higher wage. They went to the board, pressed their case and got an increase. What happened again? Up went the prices of farm products. So in Australia they are afflicted with this vicious circle. And that is what will happen in Canada if the policy advocated by the Conservative party is put into effect and the farmers ever control the selling of their own products.

Our friends on many occasions have brought to the attention of the House the fact that the farmers of the United States have high protection, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said more than once that when he comes into power he will erect a protective wall brick for brick with the United States. One would naturally think that the protective tariff in the United States should have operated beneficially to the farmers, but as a matter of fact it has not, because of the fact, as I have pointed out, that they compete one against the other in selling their products. What is happening in the United States at the present moment? The farmers are telling the government quite frankly that it has fooled them on the question of the tariff, and they are demanding that congress set aside $375,000,000 for the purpose of taking care of the exportable surplus of farm products in the United States, in order that this surplus may be taken off the market, leaving the farmers in a position to increase the price of the product to the home consumer. That is the position the farmers are in to-day in the United States, and I understand that congress is thinking seriously of applying that suggested remedy. Under the circumstances it strikes me as folly for the farmers of Canada to accept the policy laid down by the Conservatives. I admit that if we were selling all our products through one channel a protective tariff would be a fine thing, for we could then take advantage of it. But the fact is that we cannot and until such a co-operative organization is actually in operation we shall not be able to do so.

A good deal of criticism has been made with reference to the reduction of duties on automobiles. The only fault I have to find is that it is not great enough. I should like to see a further reduction made in these duties, and in my opinion, judging from the profits which I have seen that these companies make, if a further substantial reduction were made the manufacturers would still be left with sufficient protection. It is rather amusing to hear our friends discussing the motor industry. One thing that has struck me more forcibly than any other in this connection is the fact that not one of these gentlemen seems to know anything about the industry, for there is not a practical motor man in this House. Most of the arguments are based on supposition and supposition alone, and just so long as that sort of debate goes on it will be impossible for us to know what the actual facts are in relation to the motor industry in Canada. Some time ago, as we all know, there was a delegation here from the city of Oshawa and surrounding towns to interview the government with a view to securing the restoration of the reduced duties. Having given the question careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that quite evidently there is an understanding between employers and employees in eastern Canada that while they can get a high duty on whatever commodities they manufacture, they are in position to exploit a large section of the Canadian people. And they are quite willing to carry on that exploitation if they can. It seems to me that this delegation was here merely for the purpose of securing from the government the privilege of exploiting the masses of the Canadian consumers for another period of time. That is how it strikes me at any rate. Under the circumstances I am glad that the government reduced the duty on motor cars, and, I repeat, I would have been ready to support a still greater reduction had they had the courage to propose it. I have heard it rumoured. I do not know with what truth, that the higher officials of the General Motors Corporation of Canada do not even use the cars they manufacture in Oshawa, but bring in their cars from the States because of the fact that even after paying the duty they can get them cheaper. As I say, I do not know whether that is correct or not, but the rumour is so strong that it seems to me there must be some modicum of truth in it.

I think in some former debate I drew the attention of the House to this circumstance. We have natural resources in abundance, we have also machinery of production second to none in the world, and to supplement these we have a virile manhood willing to produce the things we require for our sustenance. Yet notwitstanding that fact we find a very large proportion of our population to-day is on the verge of want. Why is it that in a country so wonderfully endowed with natural resources, the machinery of production and a virile manhood, 25 per cent at least of our people are on the verge of the bread line almost all the time. That is the real problem before us. I do not think the fiscal question is the most important that we have to deal with. It does not make any difference whether you go to a highly protected country or to a free trade country, you find a similar amount of destitution in either. It seems to me we have been wasting a tremendous lot of time in dealing with the fiscal question instead of applying ourselves to the one essential problem. We should see to it that we get enough purchasing power into the hands of the consumers so that they can buy what we produce. In other words, it is a question of effective demand. When we have sufficient purchasing power then we will have an effective demand, and when we have an effective demand then all our industries will be running at full speed. And until we have that effective demand through increased purchasing power we can talk ourselves black in the face regarding free trade and protection and never accomplish anything worth while.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) to-night made some reference to capital. He complained that under this budget people were selling their Canadian stocks and bonds and investing their money in Wall street in United States securities. I regret my hon. friend is not in his seat. I am afraid that he has not grasped even the first principles of economics. Had he done so he would not have made such a statement, for he is far too intelligent to make such an error. It is not possible for any great amount of money to be transferred from Canada to the United States or to any other country. We do not transfer money—we do not get money when new capital comes into this country. Money in the final analysis is merely a medium of exchange. It just measures values, or we express values by money. The only function of money is to facilitate the exchange of goods and services. We never export money unless we export bullion or gold when it is coined, and there is very little of that exported or imported. Now, what happens when we get new capital? For instance, if $200,000,000 of American capital comes into Canada it does not come in the form of American currency, because we do not allow that currency to circulate in this country. In the first instance that capital no doubt comes in by way of a bank credit, but just as sure as we get a bank credit of $200,000,000 of new capital from the United States, that will be followed by goods because that is the only way that capital can flow from one country to another. Some of our friends make the mistake of thinking that money is capital. Money is not capital. It never was and never will be. True, you can purchase capital if you have money, but money in itself is not capital. Capital is, for instance, factories, the machinery of production, raw material, and so forth; that is real capital, but money in itself is not capital at all. That is where many of our protectionist friends go wrong. For instance, our friends to the right say: You ought to treat capital a little better. If you would cut down taxes on capital we would get much more outside capital to develop our resources. But what about their high protective policy that they talk so glibly about? It is a direct tax on capital coming into this country because that capital, as I stated before, comes in in the form of goods, and those goods have to pay duty. Therefore our friends are very illogical in their reasoning. They want to see more capital come in. All right, then cut down your customs duties and you will get capital more readily than under present conditions. That is the only way.

Our friends also seem to think that capital is of more value than labour; that is to say, they would give the preference to capital over labour. Let me give the House a quotation from Abraham Lincoln, which I think fits the situation exactly. This is what he said about capital:

> Capital is the fruit of labour and could not exist if labour had not first existed. Labour therefore deserves much the highest consideration.

I quite agree with that. Greater consideration should be given to those who produce capital than to capital itself, and until we make up our minds to adopt that as our policy the workers of this country will be always shouting for higher tariff duties in order that they may be able to get work.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Would the hon. member tell the House whether Lincoln was a protectionist or not?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not care what he was. I am merely quoting his opinion because it fits present-day conditions. It is not material to my argument whether he was a protectionist, a free-trader or a tariff for revenue man.

I would like to say a word about the Tariff Advisory Board. I am not satisfied in my own mind that this board is going to be worth anything; in fact, Mr. Speaker, I think that those who believe it will be of some value are more or less living in a fool's paradise. Let us consider the members composing the board at present, and see what business they are engaged in. One I understand to be a newspaper man, and also a politician; another is a boot and shoe manufacturer, while the third member is a farmer. I quite agree that if they look into the question of whether or not we should have a tariff on magazines coming into Canada, that member of the board who is a newspaper man will know something about it; he should, because that is his business. So far as boots and shoes are concerned, and as to whether we should have a higher tariff, a lower tariff, or no tariff at all, that member of the board who is a practical boot and shoe man will be able to give valuable information, and will know what he is talking about. In dealing with agriculture the third member will no doubt be able to give a good deal of intelligent service. But that, I think, is about all they are capable of inquiring into. When it comes to other industries such as the automobile industry, for instance, in all its ramifications, what hope is there of a board of that description being able to get an intelligent viewpoint of the whole circumstances? It would seem to me almost impossible under these circumstances for this board to function efficiently.

In connection with the tariff board in the United States, I would like to draw the attention of the House to one point. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) referred to this board to-night and stated that our Tariff Advisory Board should have practically the same powers as that of the United States tariff board. That is, that they should have such power that if they find that the tariff should be raised or lowered, they may put that tariff into effect according to their judgment. I trust that that will never take place in this country. I think the representatives of the people, who are elected to this House to look after the public interest, should always keep control of the fiscal policy. I read an article the other day regarding the situation in the United States, where the board is composed of six members, I believe. Some time ago an application was made to that board to inquire into the sugar industry of the United States. That was done, and three members of the board thought the tariff should remain as it was, while three others, because of certain facts they had discovered, reported in favour of a lower duty. The board was deadlocked for some time and the report was not brought down for some twelve months. Eventually the administration tried to get rid of one or two of those members in favour of a reduction; they were offered all sorts of privileges and all kinds of high-salaried jobs, in order that the sugar trust might exploit the United States citizen by keeping a high tariff on sugar. I think such a condition is intolerable, and I do not believe the Canadian people would welcome it. However, I am quite willing to give this board an opportunity to function and we can then judge of its usefulness by the fruits of its labour.

I wish to make a protest, however. I suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the government that as far as I can see no provision is made for anyone to look after the interests of the consumers before that board. We can well understand that the individual consumer of farm implements, sugar or anything else, is not in a position to come before that board and plead his case. In consequence, then, if fairness is to be done the consumer as well as the industry under investigation, there should be a representative there to look after the interests of the consumers, and to see that all the facts are brought forward. I would suggest to the government and more particularly to the Minister of Finance that a representative should be placed at the disposal of the consumers in order that their interests may be protected.

Now I have only one other subject to deal with, and I will be very brief. I would like to speak for a moment on the situation in the House of Commons as we find it at present. After the last general election we found that no party or group in this House commanded a majority, which meant that we either had to have another election, or that two or more of the groups must come together, carry on the government and allow parliament to function. That was done, and I have no regrets to express and no apologies to offer for the course of action I took. Our friends to my right have called us many different names; we do not mind that; we are used to it. But I would like to remind hon. members to my right that had we decided to throw in our lot with them the situation would have probably been reversed. Very little criticism can be levelled at us, therefore, for our action.

The point I would like to deal with to-night is more particularly our parliamentary institution as a whole. We must ask ourselves whether parliament is functioning as effectively as it might function, whether we are rendering the service to this country that we should render, and if not why not. Prior to 1921 we had only two parties in this House, the Liberals and Conservatives. When the general elections were over one party was left with a majority in the House; they took up the reins of government and were responsible for the administration of affairs. The other party formed what was known as the official opposition, the leader of which received something like $10,000 a year over and above his indemnity. For what purpose? To oppose the government measures; to oppose everything the government brought down. The people, by a majority of votes, indicated that they wanted a certain party to form a government and to carry on the affairs of the country. But our politicians decided that something would be added, and that the other party would oppose all the measures the government brought down. That seems to me, Mr. Speaker, to be a ridiculous situation. There is one thing we must recognize. If you look over the industrial field you will find that co-operation is the order of the day, that co-operation is invading every industry in this country. Our parliamentary proceedings, in my judgment, are something like thirty or forty years behind the times, that is to say, behind our industrial development, and the time has come, in my opinion, when if this parliament is going to function under present conditions we shall have to have co-operation in politics just the same as we have co-operation in the industrial field. This parliament has been in session now for four months, and what have we done?

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing.

Mr. GARDINER: Nothing; that is right. We have an insane system of doing the business of this country. If hon. members of this House came to this House imbued with the idea that they were going to support measures, and not parties, we would have transacted the business that was to be done in this House two months ago. I care not what party may come into power; that is immaterial to me. But I do say this: This country is going to demand more from this parliament than what they have received in the past, and the time has come, unless we are going to run the risk of being laughed to scorn by the average person in Canada, when we must rearrange our method of doing business in this House, and I suggest as a remedy for getting away from our present conditions that all groups in this House try and co-operate for the purpose of giving the best legislation and the best administration that we possibly can to Canada.

Mr. L. A. WILSON (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, this is the first occasion on which I have risen to address this House. I have observed since the 7th of January when we met, that every hon. member who rose to speak congratulated you upon the position you occupy as Speaker of this House. I would rather congratulate the House and the people of Canada on having been able to obtain such a gentleman as yourself to occupy the Speaker's chair. I shall not enlarge upon your qualities, upon your ability, upon your savoir faire; it is too well known. But I see, and I believe my friends in this House also see, a different vision. They have watched you since this parliament opened. They have observed your patience, your impartial judgments, your knowledge, and they have sympathized with you in the great work that you have done since that day, and I think I am reflecting the opinion of everybody in this House and of the people of Canada generally when I say that they see a different vision, and that is, notwithstanding the great regret we should feel at your departure, we would like to see you occupy the position of Canadian representative at Washington. I have no mandate to speak for you, Mr. Speaker, nor have I been inspired to make this remark, but, as the gentlemen on the other side of the House have so very correctly pointed out, we are one of the biggest customers of the United States, and I think it is about time that we had a representative at Washington to see that they become our customers as well as we being theirs. With your wide knowledge of affairs, with your manner, and I might add your lovely disposition, you would soon be able to bring down some of the bricks in that wall that at present stands between the two countries.

Mr. MEWBURN: Let us make it unanimous.

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): I shall occupy a very few minutes, as I know the House is tired, and the people of Canada are also tired of this debate, which has lasted now for over a month. I shall therefore restrict my remarks to a few observations as a business man for the last fifty years in the metropolis of Canada.

For the information of the House and those who do not know me intimately—and I am glad for them—I may say that I happen to be interested in several industries in Canada and in several banking institutions; consequently I think I am in a position to make a few remarks on the questions that have come up in this debate. I shall not go into figures, for the figures that I have heard here in the last month would worry a dozen Philadelphia lawyers. I shall take the liberty, however, of giving you a picture as a business man, or as a layman, of what I have observed in this House since the 7th of January.

We were called to meet here on that day, and as you know, Mr. Speaker, it was rather dismal for this side of the House, and probably dismal also for the other side. Really it was not pleasant. I came here absolutely as an accident. Two weeks before nomination day I had no idea that I would ever occupy the honourable position I hold in this House, but Providence decreed otherwise. When I came to this House on the 7th day of January, I tell you frankly, Mr. Speaker, I was absolutely bewildered. I never had any idea of the beauty and grandeur of this chamber. Much less had I any idea of the brilliant parliamentarians that sat in this House at that time and since. Frankly I have been amazed at the ability of some hon. members of this House. I had no conception that the House contained such able men as are in this House at the present time. I had no idea of parliamentary procedure: I had no idea of the number of precedents there are for the guidance of this House, and when I saw the volumes being brought in from the library, Mr. Speaker, from which hon. members quoted precedents going back three hundred or three thousand years, I tell you that I did not feel any higher or any bigger than Tom Thumb. I went to the Minister of Justice and offered him my resignation, but he declined to accept it. I want to say in all frankness that I had no conception of the knowledge or experience possessed by some hon. members of this House. I say to my friends on the street, in Montreal and elsewhere, to-day: If you think there is any sinecure in being a member of parliament, if you think that all he has to do is to walk into the chamber, you will soon discover that you do not amount to very much, and you will cease to criticize members of the House of Commons without knowing the facts as some people unfortunately do throughout this country.

Amongst the speakers that I have remarked, I might with the permission of the House mention a few names. We all know our Prime Minister, and his knowledge of technicalities. We all know our friend the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who was so very patient throughout the month of January. We all know our friend Ed Macdonald, the popular Minister of National Defence. We all know our friend Mr. Cardin, the sympathetic Minister of Marine and Fisheries. We all know our friend the Hon. George Boivin. We all know the Hon. Charles Stewart, our new Minister of Labour (Mr. Elliott) and our Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon). We all know our friend the Hon. James Robb, who is very popular with the automobile people just now. Then there is the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning), that little dynamo from the west; and the Hon. Charles Marcil, of Bonaventure, that veteran member of the House whom we all admire.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't forget the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. WILSON (Vaudreuil): Yes, I have got the name of Mr. King here. Then I come to our good friend Mr. Rinfret, and the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs). Next I come to my good friend the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen who I see is not here to-night through illness. I take this occasion to say—and anybody who knows me will realize that I am sincere when I make this declaration—that I have a high admiration for the right hon. leader of the opposition, but not politically. Next I come to Sir Henry Drayton, ex-Minister of Finance, who has a beautiful smile that never comes off all the time, and who inadvertently and unknown to himself enriched some of his friends on both sides of politics to the extent of over a million dollars when he put up the duty on olive oil. I next come to my hon. friend Mr. Bennett, who made such a wonderful speech to-night; Mr. Guthrie, of South Wellington; Mr. Thomas Church of Toronto Northwest: my dear old friend, Robert White of Montreal; my friend Mr. Cahan, and my old friend Dr. Manion of Fort William. I want to say that I consider Dr. Manion one of the best speakers in this House. I may remark that I know his relatives more intimately than he realizes. Next I come to Sir George Perley, formerly our ambassador to England; Mr. Edwards of Frontenac; that little fighter the Hon. H. H. Stevens. The last named gentleman I am glad to say is not a lawyer, therefore there are hopes for some business men. I must not fail to enumerate my good friend on the other side of the House, the Hon. Robert Rogers, ex-Minister of Public Works, who captured as many elections as I did. Then there is Mr. Maclean of South York, who only wants one railroad in this country. Between Mr. Maclean and myself there has been a friendship of forty years' standing. Next I might mention in succession that great student, Mr. Bourassa of Labelle, Mr. Robert Forke, Mr. Evans of Rosetown, Mr. Millar of Qu'Appelle, last but not least the charming representative from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail).

To those hon. gentlemen who have not the great advantage of knowing their humble servant I may say that in 1896 I happened to be treasurer to the Liberal party in the city of Montreal. This fact is well known to Mr. Speaker. He knew I was the treasurer. At that time our bank account was rather slim; at least he used to tell me so. Mr. Speaker was one of our great favourites.

I am glad that I have been given the opportunity of saying a few words. I know it is only a matter of courtesy. The two whips allowed me to make a few brief observations, being a newcomer to this House and an old friend of both parties. There are some men here who may look upon me with a certain amount of suspicion. For that I do not blame them. I want to tell this House that I am a supporter of the Liberal party, but that I supported my friend Mr. Bergeron, in the county of Beauharnois, now represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Raymond). We elected Mr. Bergeron. On that occasion I was called down by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and he said to me, "Are you not a true soldier in the ranks of the great Liberal party?" I said, "Sir Wilfrid, I am as true as any man in the party. I am not a traitor, but I will not vote for a prohibitionist." Sir Wilfrid Laurier sat back in his chair in the old House and he said, "Larry, I will take good care never to be a prohibitionist". I supported Hon. A. W. Atwater in the St. Lawrence division of Montreal against another Liberal prohibitionist. I do not want to become a prohibitionist, even though I am in Ontario at the moment.

The debates in this House, conducted by all the bright men in all the groups, Liberals, Conservatives, Progressives, Labourites and Independents, have been to me a revelation, I will say to my own son, a student, who is in the House, sitting up there in the gallery, that nobody should come to the House of Commons unless he has attained a reasonable age, so that he can study this wonderful procedure of yours, which I cannot understand. I cannot get into my mind what the "previous question" means, although, it favoured us that time I believe, Mr. Speaker. Then again I cannot understand why one man, because he is an athlete and can get up quicker than another, should have the preference, and that the whole proposal should fall to the ground. I think that procedure should be amended, Mr. Speaker.

I am deficient in classical education, but I think I have a reasonable amount of intelligence, and I may say that if any business concern in this country were conducted on the lines of your procedure, Mr. Speaker, the firm would be bankrupt in six months. I think unless the parliamentary procedure, which is obsolete, is amended the country will also go bankrupt. Since the 7th January I have witnessed some hard hits in this House. I have met members on the other side, and I regret to say that I have had more invitations to lunch and dinner from the other side than from this side of the House. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members on this side will wake up. After all those hard hits I thought hon. members would come to blows in this House, but when you rose and said, "This House stands adjourned until three o'clock tomorrow afternoon," then I saw those members on both sides walk out arm in arm. I know now that that was good cricket, they went to dinner somewhere not in the province of Ontario. I then concluded, Mr. Speaker, that this House of Commons should have been built on the interprovincial border, one half in Ontario and the other half in Hull.

I had prepared a wonderful speech to last three or four hours, which I intended should go in Hansard. I would have mailed 10,000 copies to my electors, and I would probably be defeated in the next election if they ever read it. I came to this House on the 7th of January, and had to return to my country home in Coteau du Lac a tired man, but I received a telegram saying, "Come up, there is a vote". I came up, but there was no vote. Fancy a tired man over sixty years of age coming up here and being told, "I have seen the whip on the other side, and it is all off." On one occasion I asked the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), whom I see across the chamber, if there would be a vote. Do you think I could get any satisfaction out of him? Not on your life. Again in February I was asked to come up and I said I would not come, but the Liberal whip sent for me in an aeroplane and brought me to Ottawa. A vote was taken and we won by a majority of one, and I want the government to understand that my coming up in an aeroplane that night saved the government, so that if there is a vacancy in the other House I am entitled to it. During election time I was questioned about Senate reform. I received a telegram from my friend Brenton MacNab, now running a newspaper at Winnipeg, asking for my opinion on Senate reform, and I replied, "I am opposed to any reform of the Senate until I am appointed."

Now we come to the more serious aspect of this budget debate. I find in the Speech from the Throne a reference to old age pensions. I would deplore the situation if an old age pension act were not placed on the statute books of Canada. It is on the statute books of all civilized countries to-day. I think the majority on both sides of the House will support it, but personally I do not think my province would accept the proposition, for this reason: In the province of Quebec we have very old families and there are many grandfathers, of whom I happen to be one. Their children and their children's children who are working in various parts of Canada and in the outside world send their fathers of over seventy years of age the wherewithal to exist comfortably without being mendicants or having to hang on to the skirts of the Dominion or any other government. I say that without intending to reflect in any way on our friends from the west or from any other province that wishes to take advantage of old age pensions. But in Quebec we have wonderful institutions, both Protestant and Catholic, homes to which we subscribe large amounts.

Hon. gentlemen opposite who happen to belong to a different faith from ours know all about their own institutions, and they know that irrespective of creed or sect all these institutions of both persuasions are doing splendid work. All religions, all charitable organizations are good. In the western provinces, however, we find a newer generation. There are not so many old men there like myself; they have not grandfathers such as those to whom I have referred. There are no grandchildren to send money home to support their dependents, and consequently there is need of this bill. Sympathetically we will support the bill. But I must say that if these expenditures are to run into several millions I for one fail to see why the provinces not participating in the donations under the legislation should not receive their proportionate share to devote to the hospitals and other institutions within their own territory.

Now I come to the question of rural credits, and I may express in passing my pleasure at seeing the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in his place. I have the presumption to believe that I understand this question. I have lived in a rural community for the last five years, having been shoved out of my own legitimate business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.
