SOMETHING TO THINK OVER.

You are aware that you cannot go without food and still retain your strength; yet you do neglect the exercise and recreation necessary to perfect health and long life.

Why don't you buy a bicycle, ride it and add ten long years to your life? You can then, with clear brain and added energy, accomplish more than you do now, and in less time.

With an easy-running Stearns Bicycle you can save enough time to enable you to make delightful outings.

The Stearns is called the Yellow Fellow because of its orange finish; we have it in black if you prefer.

CANCER CAN BE CURED!

For six years I suffered from cancer, and so on relief I used Burdock Blood Bitters. I used seven bottles faithfully, when the cancer gradually dried up and finally disappeared. I am now eating well and rejoice that by using B.B.B. I have escaped death either from the surgeons knife or from the cancer itself.

SHORTNESS OF BREATH.

"Since last year I have had serious heart trouble caused by malaria. Shortness of breath, smothering spells on retiring, violent palpitations, etc., often made me give up all my duties. I procured Minard's Heart and Nerve Pills. I found to my surprise and delight that they gave almost instant relief. I got healthy, restful sleep, my heart troubles disappeared, and I now feel very well and strong indeed." Mr. HING MOORE, Ingersoll, Ont.

Cardinal Newman.

The stir made by Tract 90 gave it an immense circulation, with the proceeds of which Newman bought a library, now included in that at the Edgbaston Oratory. Though he bore with a dignified self-control what his friends looked on as a persecution, a tract generally as one that explained the Thirty-nine Articles by explaining them away could not but increase the distrust with which he had long been regarded by both the Evangelical and the Establishment party in the Church of England. Several recent occurrences, on the other hand, had impaired his confidence in her position; especially the "Jerusalem bishopric" which he regarded as a fraternization of that church with a German non-episcopal community, and also a hostile intrusion into the diocese of an Eastern bishop possessing the "apostolical succession and primitive doctrine."

Against that measure Newman and Dr. Pusey had solemnly protested, but in vain. Their interference had given offence in high ecclesiastical quarters, and not a few made themselves merry at their expense. Some of his followers began to whisper: "Our great admiral will transfer his flag to another ship." Others said: "The Church of England will be the better for losing a formidable guest. The scorn born by a chance gust into a china vase, if it continued to grow there, would break it up."

In 1845 Newman's secession was not attended by that of as many others as had been expected; though it included one—a great power in himself—the poet Faber, who renounced poetry for a higher work. But it left profound misgivings in the breasts of others, who continued their researches, carried their principles out in their parochial labors, and watched the signs of the times. They had not to wait long. The "Gorham judgment" was pronounced, and within a few years about three hundred of the Anglican clergy—some say four hundred—had followed his example (many of them, like Mr. Allist, to their worldly ruin and that of their families), together with a far larger number of highly educated laymen. Newman's lectures were believed to have assisted many persons in doubt at that crisis. Mr. R. H. Hutton, whose work on Newman appears far the best thing on the subject which I have seen, wrote in it as follows:

When Newman at last made up his mind to join the Church of Rome, his genius bloomed out with a force and freedom such as he never displayed in the Anglican Communion. And elsewhere he thus illustrates that remark.

The "Lectures on Anglican Difficulties" was the first book generally read, amongst Protestants, in which the measure of his literary power could be adequately taken. . . . Here was a great subject with which Newman was perfectly intimate, giving the fullest scope to his powers of orderly and beautiful expression, and opening a far greater range to his singular genius for gentle and delicate irony than anything which he had hitherto written. Never did a voice seem better adapted to persuade without irritating.

I was among the many present at those lectures in 1850, and to me nothing—with the exception of the Divina Commedia and Keats's Digby's wholly noncontroversial Moore's Catholicism—had been so impressive, suggestive, and spiritually helpful. I was also struck by their impassioned eloquence, which brought to me the belief that if this man had chosen for himself a parliamentary career he must have carried all before him. The extreme subtlety which belonged to his intelligence was then shown to be but one of many faculties, and opposed no hindrance to his equal power of exciting vehement emotion; though he did so apparently unconsciously—on this occasion perhaps restrained by the solemnity of the subject discussed and the circumstances that the lectures were delivered in a church. Many passages might be cited in illustration of this remark, such as the last half dozen pages of the tenth lecture, contrasting the calm condition of the Church in the days of Janesanism, the French Revolution, and Napoleon, when the Pope was a prisoner, and when many among the Church's enemies boasted that the papacy was at an end, with the sudden change when her chief enemies had vanished, and there had returned her an energy and health not hers for a long preceding time. Nothing about those lectures was more remarkable than the serenity with which they were composed. They were written as they were read—once or twice a week, I think,—a rapidity as great as that with which the "successive chapters of his

Such, ever since my boyhood, had been my aspirations; how much more must they have been his! Yet that day, as we walked together—for he was good enough to accompany me most of the way to Oxford, those aspirations did not seem to smile upon him amid the summer field flowers as they had smiled four years previously—that night when the cold Christmas winds blew the Cathedral chimneys over us. Newman's mind, however, was not like Mr. Ward's, which always saw with a diamond clearness what it saw at all; it included a large crepuscular region, through which his intelligence had to pass before its dawn broadened into day. No one could appreciate better than he the subtlety of illusions or their dangerous consequences; no one could feel more profoundly the pain of severing old ties. But he had told us that he could never see why any number of difficulties need produce a single doubt as regards matters of faith. And perhaps he might have added that he could never see why any amount of suffering need paralyze action in matters of duty, when at last certainty had emerged from the region of doubt. Daily I heard reports, which he met neither with encouragement nor denial, but with reserve. Some of his followers began to whisper: "Our great admiral will transfer his flag to another ship." Others said: "The Church of England will be the better for losing a formidable guest. The scorn born by a chance gust into a china vase, if it continued to grow there, would break it up."

The poverty to which religious education was thus condemned, he sides its more serious consequences, had others with a touch of the ludicrous about them; but, as some one remarked, "No one who laughs with consideration would laugh at such a jest." I confess I was pained by the very humble labors to which Newman seemed so willingly to subject himself. It appeared strange that he should carve for thirty hungry youths, or sit listening for hours in succession to the eloquent voices who came to recommend a new organist and would accept no refusal from him. Such work should have fallen on subordinates; and their salaries it was hard to provide. The patience with which he bore such trials was marvellous, but he encountered others sorer still. I can not think that he received from Ireland aids proportioned to what ought to have been his. The poor, who had no direct interest in the University, paid for it in large annual contributions; but the middle and higher classes were proportionately less liberal, and there were also, perhaps, jealousies, to which it is now needless to advert. In Ireland, however, Newman found many private friends who honored him aright and were greatly valued by him. Among these were Dr. Moriarty, long the head of All Hallows College, and later Bishop of Kerry; Dr. Raneal, principal of Maynooth, the learned, the accomplished, and the kind; Dr. O'Reilly, S. J.; the late Judge O'Hagan, and others. He worked on, cheered by the grateful sympathy of men like these, including that great Irish scholar, Egan O'Curry, to whom he had given the Irish professorship, and whose lectures—a most valuable store-house of Irish archeology—were attended.

He was cheered by the great interests of religion which he believed to be at stake; and by the aid which Irish genius and Irish aspirations, if true to their noblest mission, must largely, as he also believed, have ministered. In that hope he gave Ireland three of his noblest volumes and seven of the best years of his life. Newman was one of those who could work and wait. I remember his saying to me once, when things were looking Apologia followed another many years later. His genius was also stimulated by a sudden pressure.

I had become a Catholic more than five years later than Newman. The time when I was most of the way to Oxford, those aspirations did not seem to smile upon him amid the summer field flowers as they had smiled four years previously—that night when the cold Christmas winds blew the Cathedral chimneys over us. Newman's mind, however, was not like Mr. Ward's, which always saw with a diamond clearness what it saw at all; it included a large crepuscular region, through which his intelligence had to pass before its dawn broadened into day. No one could appreciate better than he the subtlety of illusions or their dangerous consequences; no one could feel more profoundly the pain of severing old ties. But he had told us that he could never see why any number of difficulties need produce a single doubt as regards matters of faith. And perhaps he might have added that he could never see why any amount of suffering need paralyze action in matters of duty, when at last certainty had emerged from the region of doubt. Daily I heard reports, which he met neither with encouragement nor denial, but with reserve. Some of his followers began to whisper: "Our great admiral will transfer his flag to another ship." us usually dark: "We must not be impatient. Time is necessary for all things. If we fail at present to create a Catholic university, there remains another great benefit which we may confer on Ireland. We can in that case fall back upon a second college in the Dublin University; one so dignified a seat as Trinity College, and in all respects its equal; one doing for Catholics what Trinity College does for Protestants. Such a college would side over the bad time, and eventually develop into a Catholic university."

Many years have passed since he spoke, but neither a Catholic university nor a Catholic college, founded at once on the two principles of "religious education" and of educational equality, has yet been provided. A Newman was given to Ireland, one longing to make of her what she was called in early Christian times—namely, "the School of the West"; and apparently she knew nearly as little what to do with the gift as England had known. The opportunity was lost. A foundation stone was laid. On that occasion I wrote an ode. On that occasion I wrote an ode. On that occasion I wrote an ode.

The Story-Teller at Fault.

"Well," said he, "you perceive that everything is not easy that looks so. But if you, Thady O'Kelly, will give me five pieces more, I'll do another trick for you as good as the last."

clouds. He next took out of his bag a fine hare, which he placed on the thread, and to the increasing astonishment of the beholders, the animal ran up the line with as much dexterity as if she had done it all her life.

"There is not a more active man in the known world than the very individual who is talking to you now," said the fat man.

"Up with you, then," said the juggler, "but I warn you, if you let my hare be killed, I'll cut off your head when you come down."

"I'm afraid the hound is eating the hare, and that our fat friend is falling asleep."

"I'm afraid the hound is eating the hare, and that our fat friend is falling asleep."

"Now," said the Caol Riava, turning to him, "I have rendered you invisible in order that you may witness all that is about to take place here, without being recognized by any of your daily acquaintances."

"Well," will you give me five pieces if I stir one of my ears without stirring the other?"

"What's the matter?" said the king. "The harpers are murdering one another, please Your Majesty."

without murdering the musicians too. "Who began it?" said his Majesty. "A stranger thought proper to find fault with their music," replied the attendant.

"Is it me, myself, you mean?" said the Caol Riava. "Who else?" said the captain. "That the hand may turn into a pig's foot with you when you think of tying the rope," says the Caol Riava.

"What's the matter now?" cried the king, yawning and stretching himself. "Please your Majesty, we hanged that vagabond according to Your Majesty's orders, and he's as well as ever again now in spite of us."

"Take him and hang him again, then, and don't be disturbing me about such trifles," said the king of Leinster, and he went off to sleep again.

"Well," said the Caol Riava, "do you wish to hang me any more?"

"I'll have no more to say to you," said the captain, "you may go wherever you like, and the sooner the better. We got trouble enough by your already. Maybe 'tis the king himself we'd find hanging the next time we tried it."

"Since you are growing so reasonable," said the Caol Riava, "you may go out now and take your three friends down again. They will not be so much the worse for their experience, but they can thank you for finding them more comfortable quarters; and I give you a parting advice, never again while you live interpose between a critic and a poet, a man and his wife, or a mother and an only child," after which he spoke these lines:—

"He who censures a strain, which a minstrel composes, Must lie upon something less grateful than roses; He who takes up a quarrel begun by a poet, May at bottom have wit, but lacks wisdom to show it; For than him a worse ninnny will rarely be found, Who would peril his nose for a dealer in sound."

"I often heard it," replied the chief musician. "Or did you ever hear a parcel of beetles buzzing about in the dusk on a summer evening?"

"I did," said the chief musician. "Or a bitter faced old woman scolding in a passion?"

"I did often," said the chief musician, who was a married man. "Well, then," said the Caol Riava, "I'd rather be listening to any one of them than to your music."

"What's the matter?" said the king. "The harpers are murdering one another, please Your Majesty."

to tell the king of Leinster when he calls for it. "Saying this he disappeared, and the lady, bursting into tears, begged her husband's forgiveness, and assured him that she would sooner die a thousand deaths than act in such a manner, if extraordinary influence had not possessed her."

"Please Your Majesty," said the story-teller, "there is nothing like the plain truth, and I will tell it to you if you desire it."

The king commanded him by all means to do so. Accordingly the story-teller began, and gave a detailed account of the adventures of the day, his difficulty in trying to invent a story, the benevolence of the friendly Draoidhe (or Druid), and the ingratitude of his wife, remarkable in itself, and still more so in the singular manner in which it was explained.

Correct Speaking.

What is it to speak correctly? It is to accustom oneself to speak and write accurately, having special care to use no language or utter any statement that is not elegant or strictly truthful. Avoid the use of all slang words and phrases. They are odious, and no amount of personal grace in the speaker can compensate for the disagreeable effect that the use of slang has upon the hearing.

What Is Cheapness

Cheapness is not peculiar to prices. Goods are often cheaper than the prices; particularly is this true when the purchaser feels that the goods are bought with a certain amount of uncertainty and unreliability. We have no cheap goods, although no one disputes the cheapness of our prices.

Your friends would appreciate a nice Fancy Rocker or Table, selected from our stock. Goods selling now will be stored until required.

WITH INVALIDS. Yes! with invalids the appetite is capricious and needs coaxing, that is just the reason they improve so rapidly under Scott's Emulsion, it is as palatable as cream.

OUR BIG EXHIBIT OF NEW CLOTHS

We are opening our different lines for the new season, with much the same feeling of confidence which a fellow experiences when he has a good thing. So many good cloths grouped together that it is impossible to tell you all about them. Come and see the
