Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that this point we are now discussing in regard to Ontario really need not have been raised at all, if we have in mind what took place in debate here before the matter was discussed in committee. In the conference we were simply seeking to give expression to what had been said on the floor of Parliament in regard to Ontario by the Acting Solicitor General himself. Let me read from Hansard, page 2430. The question in our minds was as regards the application of the Ontario lists, and I asked the Acting Solicitor General at the time:

> Assuming that the Ontario law were now passed and that lists were prepared under it by November or December of this year; then those lists would be used?
> Mr. Guthrie: They would be valid for twelve months.

Now, that was the impression we all had at the conference. That was the impression that I think every one had until this morning, when my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) pointed out that a different construction of the Ontario law might leave us in the position of having no Ontario lists until the provincial House had dissolved. Well, that was a situation that we had never contemplated, either in discussion here, when we decided to have a conference, or during the conference itself. All that we are suggesting at the moment is that if possible we give expression to what was in our minds, not at the conference but in the committee when this matter was discussed the other night, namely that we use for federal purposes lists that have already been prepared and concerning which there can be no question.

Mr. MORPHY: I am not quite so clear about the things that are to be done under this Ontario Bill as the leader of the Opposition seems to be. We do not know what the law of Ontario is going to be; moreover, no matter what it is going to be, no matter what it does when finally passed, we have no control over legislation respecting the Ontario franchise or qualifications for voters. There is really involved in this question the thought of what an interesting and difficult situation might arise in the changing views of parties in the Ontario legislature. There is a suggestion from some hon. members that we want to avoid expense. I think every hon. member desires to avoid unnecessary expense, but after all I do not think that we should throw too much expense upon the individual, upon the people at large. That is what the suggestion which has been made would do; it would put every person who is unfortunate enough to be off the list under the obligation of travelling, perhaps, some distance at considerable expense in order to make personal application to have his name put on, and to prosecute appeals, and so on; and upon voting at polling day to bring two neighbours to vouch for him. Here are three oaths; a most complicated piece of machinery, throwing upon the public at large what I conceive ought to be done by the Government—that is, the making of a complete, definite and up-to-date franchise law under which every one would know that his name was on the list, provided he did not by supineness or neglect fail to reach the forum at home through which he might get his name upon it. It looks to me as if the tail were wagging the dog. May I throw out the suggestion to hon. gentlemen that we are really engaged in drafting a franchise law for the whole Dominion? The franchise is a valuable right concerning which the public at large are zealous as well as jealous, and it is the duty of this Parliament to make out a proper list, no matter what the expense may be. Under the Bill as proposed, a part of the expense, it is true, will be avoided in the case of those provinces which have lists. If every province had a list—and I do not see why they should not—the work would be largely done, and, if it was properly done, the only additional expense would be that involved in picking up the few persons who had failed to get on the provincial lists. I do not think that the suggestion of expense involved in bringing that about may be looked upon as an insuperable difficulty. Take Prince Edward Island as a case in point. They have no lists at all. A man walks up to the polling booth and presents his qualifications in the shape of having paid his poll tax, or otherwise; he votes, even though there never was a list upon which his name could be put. I do not know how far I should be right in saying that it is worth while having a list in Prince Edward Island, but it seems to me that if every province were listed either by this Parliament or by the local legislature, there would be a tendency to bring the situation to a finality. But to put upon the individual here and there who is left off the list the onus and the extreme expense of getting his name on does not appeal to me as a democratic way of dealing with the public who desire the franchise. Surely this Government is big enough to carry out its own franchise laws. In fact, we were pretty well agreed in this regard until my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) threw a monkey wrench into the machinery and brought on this discussion. I am satisfied that if the provincial lists were to follow this legislation instead of our following provincial legislation, as hon. gentlemen opposite want us to do, a solution of the whole question would be found.

We were very close to having a list that would be satisfactory to all hon. members; but the hon. member (Mr. Ross), as the Acting Solicitor General says, hugging to himself a Bill that is not a Bill, an Act that is not an Act, an Act that may to-morrow be abandoned altogether and not passed, would put this Parliament into the position of following the arguments founded upon that flimsy basis, and of passing legislation that would not be operative at all because either of the failure of that Bill to be passed, or, if it be passed, later on to be changed, thus throwing all the machinery out of gear.

Mr. ROSS: I did not intend to throw any monkey wrench into the machinery at all, and I do not think I have done so. My hon. friend will see that I did not say that this Act had been passed or was going to be passed or that any other Act was going to be passed. My suggested amendment is entirely hypothetical; it may be operative or it may not. If certain things occur, it will become operative. If in Ontario no lists have been prepared and completed as aforesaid, that is, if no provincial lists have been prepared and completed for provincial purposes within the two years, then there is a hiatus and we would have to appoint registrars.

[Mr. Morphy.]

Mr. MORPHY: This is based on an "if." I understood my hon. friend was going to say that municipal lists were to be prepared every year.

Mr. ROSS: If my hon. friend will allow me to finish my suggested amendment, I think he will see that my suggestion has some merits. If lists had been prepared and completed, they would be used as aforesaid, but the municipal lists are required by law to be prepared annually and to include all persons who would be entitled to vote under this Act.

Mr. SEXSMITH: That is not the case at the present time in Ontario, is it?

Mr. ROSS: The present time would not be affected at all, because provincial lists will be in force for two years from the 20th October, 1919; but if this time should expire and there are no provincial lists in force, and if Ontario, by any accident or by design, should pass this legislation which is now before the legislature, my suggested amendment becomes effective. In that case there is an annual revision by the municipalities and all names which would be on the lists prepared by the House of Commons are put on the municipal lists, and those lists shall be adopted.

Mr. MORPHY: "If."

Mr. ROSS: If that does not happen, my suggested amendment will not become effective.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): We might as well be frank in this matter. The question that is bothering my hon. friends opposite is not one of expense, if we have regard to what transpired in the country when they had control of expenses in the conduct of elections. What is troubling them most now is this, that if we can prevent enumerators from being appointed under this Act, as they would be, going around from house to house and making the enumeration and using their influence, as was done in the West when the provincial elections were held, it is the desire of the Opposition to prevent that as far as they possibly can. My hon. friend (Mr. Ross) has nothing other in view than the fact that an enumerator appointed by the Government has an opportunity of going from individual to individual and imposing his personal views upon him, and if the enumerator is an appointee of the Government, he has a certain amount of influence. That is the objection raised by the Opposition, but it is not stated as a fact.

Mr. EULER: Is it not a good objection?

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Yes it is a good one, but what is practised upon me in my province, I want to practise upon the other fellow. I am willing to be imbued with a Christian spirit to a large extent, but not to the extent of turning the other cheek to the enemy. In a constituency such as I represent, which is 700 miles long by an average of 150 wide. I take the provincial list that has been prepared by the enumerators of the Alberta Government, and who is going to tell me at Fort Chipewyan or at Fort Smith, five or six hundred miles away from Edmonton, who should be on that list? Are you going to place on me the onus of sending men up there at a cost of five or six hundred dollars each to check up that list for me and find out whether all the Indians have been put on it or not. If the provincial lists were prepared to my satisfaction in an honest manner, I would be quite willing to accept them; but I know how elections are run in Alberta, and you would adopt the provincial lists of Alberta, because in 1923 or in the fall of 1922 the Provincial Government must go to the people, and I assume, unless there is something that I do not know of in the federal law, this Government must also go to the people before 1923. In that case we would be within the two year period when we are bound to accept the provincial lists such as they are. It is all right to speak about revision, but who is going to look after and pay for it? Some time ago I gave in this House an instance where men's names had been placed on the list, and the last night before the deputy returning officer gets the lists for the poll, the enumerator who made the list has power under the law to erase every one of those names from the list. It is a noted fact to-day that, as a result of what has been practised in our province, people are applying by the hundreds to this Government for naturalization papers. Why? Because during the election these people were given naturalization application papers. They believed they were naturalized; they were put on the list, and they voted. Are we going to accept this list? Am I to be responsible for going around every Ruthenian community in my constituency to find out if everybody is properly on the list or not? I would rather have an enumerator go around and do that work, even if he uses his influence, because if so, that is exactly what has been practised upon us in that province for the last few years. Let my hon. friends opposite admit that they do not want these enumerators because they are afraid that these enumerators are part and parcel of a machinery that will be used against them. Then we shall be able to deal with my hon. friends.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As regards the enumerators, let me be perfectly frank. I feel the electorate generally has not the same confidence in a list prepared by enumerators as in a list prepared in the regular way for municipal and provincial purposes and serving also federal purposes. If we can, in working on this measure, do anything which will help to bring about in Canada a system of preparation of lists which will serve for municipal, provincial and federal purposes, we shall be rendering a service to all three organized groups. As my hon. friend (Mr. Morphy) said, that was the thought that was in our minds at the conference the other day, coupled with an endeavour to give expression to what had been virtually agreed on between the two sides in the previous evening's discussion. I would suggest that we consider the amendments which the minister has introduced, in the light of what he himself has in mind, namely, framing something that will be applicable to the whole Dominion without exception one way or another. That is the basis on which we should proceed. After we have adopted the general suggestion, we might consider whether we should go further than that and add some amendments to meet a condition that is temporary, and that will exist possibly only for the next year or two. But to throw aside what is of general application simply because there has been brought to the attention of the committee a circumstance that has a bearing on one province for one election, would, I think, be a great mistake and very unfortunate.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Because it may be favourable to Ontario or Quebec to adopt a certain method, is that any reason why I should support that method when it is objectionable to me?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): Then make my province an exception. I do not want the provincial list, and I am going to vote against this amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think in the province of Alberta the lists are prepared by the system of enumeration, and the suggestion that is now being made will not apply to that province at all.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): But if a Dominion election is held within two years after a provincial election, the provincial lists form the basis of the Dominion lists, and I must accept those lists whether they have been prepared correctly or not. If I were a candidate in the same constituency, I would be put to the trouble and expense of going to every individual on that list to find out whether he was properly on the list, and whether men who were entitled to be on the list had ben left off. Who is going to pay for that? Suppose there was no provincial list: I am entitled to my enumeration, anyhow. But in the case of a Dominion election being held within two years after a provincial election, I am bound to accept the provincial lists as a basis for the Dominion lists, and I would have to have enumerators going from one place to another throughout a constituency 700 miles by 150 to ascertain whether these lists were properly made up. I say the Government should pay for that. If I have to do it in the next election I shall not run, because I have not the money to do it.

Mr. ARTHURS: I want to protest against the suggestion that the northern parts of Ontario and the unorganized districts throughout Canada are asking for special treatment. These unorganized districts have always been accorded special treatment in this regard under the law. The Franchise Bill as introduced provided for a system of registration by enumerators, which was essentially the practice followed in the unorganized territories in the past. So we are asking for no special treatment for these unorganized districts in the preparation of the lists, because that has always been the law.

I would also point out that if the present amendment should carry, it will disfranchise thousands of good citizens in Northern Ontario and other unorganized parts of Canada, and we would also have cases in the unorganized portions where there would not be a single inhabitant in some of the polling divisions. I know divisions in my own riding that had a voting population of 200 upwards, but where when the poll was held next year, there were no voters except the returning officer and the poll clerk. The men who had been in that polling division had moved away to other parts, and I say that if this amendment is adopted, thousands will be deprived of their vote through having moved away, or they will have to travel a long distance and give up two or three days' time to make a personal appearance before the judge to have their names put on the list. If they took the alternative and appeared on polling day to vote, who is there in a mining or lumbering district who could swear that these men, hundreds of them, were entitled to vote? I say the provision is absolutely unworkable. I repeat, we are not asking for any special treatment for the unorganized portions of Canada, but simply for the franchise law as it has stood on the statute book for years.

Mr. EULER: I would not like to subscribe to the doctrine enunciated by my hon. friend (Mr. H. A. Mackie). He apparently feels that his party has been getting the worst of it, by reason of certain actions of Provincial Governments, and he would like to get even with them in Dominion elections. I would not care to endorse that principle.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): The hon. member does not quite understand me. I pointed out what I considered were errors practised by the Povincial Government, and I say you should not force me to adopt the results of those errors. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we should not have enumerators, because they see an evil in that. It is an evil that has been practised against us. I say that if it is an evil, that is no reason why I should have to adopt the result of that evil. If there is an evil in having enumerators it is only what is practised by the other side.

Mr. EULER: The hon. gentleman if struck on the one cheek would not be content to turn the other, but it occurs to me that if this method is not adopted, and you place the making of the lists in the hands of partisans he would possibly be struck on both cheeks at once if a different kind of government came into power in this country. What I rose to say was this: While I appreciate what my hon. friend (Mr. Arthurs) has said as being perhaps the only valid objection to the suggestion that has been made from this side of the House, I shall support the proposal of the hon. member (Mr. Ross) because I believe we shall thereby get a more complete and a fairer list at less expense. I have no particular complaint to make so far as the elections of 1917 are concerned with regard to the enumerators in my constituency. They were not perfect, but I have no special complaint to make. I do say this, however: Municipal lists prepared by assessors who are, we might say, experts in that particular work are almost certain to be more complete and more accurate than lists that are prepared by men who are employed in many cases, not so much for their ability in that particular work, but perhaps more for partisan purposes. I am not going to make any criticism of that, because no matter what government is in power, whether it be Liberal, Conservative, Unionist, Farmer, or any other, the enumerators are pretty sure to be selected from amongst the Government's own supporters.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): If you lived in a province where it was possible for the provincial enumerator to erase as many names off the list as he liked just about six hours before the poll opened, would you be willing to accept that list as a basis for your Dominion list, and be put to the personal expense and trouble of checking the list?

Mr. EULER: That may be a very fair objection, but the point I was going to make was that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) would not affect the province of Alberta at all.

Mr. MACKIE (East Edmonton): That is quite right.

Mr. EULER: But as regards the province of Ontario I say the Government would do a great deal better to adopt the lists that are prepared by men who are better qualified than anybody else you could possibly select, than to have the lists prepared by men selected haphazard, according to their partisan affiliations. In the cities you have men appointed as assessors who are reputable in every way, men of ability, and who know practically every citizen in the community. They are not very apt to overlook any one, and as they put names on the list for municipal purposes, it is not likely that they will be governed in the slightest degree by a man's political belief or leanings. I support the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) because I believe it will mean we will get lists that are fairly made up without any reference to a person's political belief, or colour or stripe, or anything of that kind. The case was mentioned here last week of the enumerators in the city of Toronto who had left 30,000 names off the list. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that that could not happen under the assesors' system. According to the amendments submitted by the Acting Solicitor General, provincial lists are to govern if they are not more than two years old. I see no objection why, beyond that time, we should not accept the lists prepared by the assessors. If the Bill now before the Ontario Legislature goes through--

Mr. HENDERS: Why put the two-year limitation on at all?

Mr. EULER: I would be quite satisfied, as far as I am concerned, to change that. But if after the two-year period you want to use lists complete and free from most of the objections that can be urged in political affairs, you cannot do better than accept the lists prepared by the assessors. As far as the other provinces are concerned, I admit that I know very little about their electoral machinery, and there may be very serious objection to the amendment. I think the point mentioned by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) is probably well taken. But if these assessors' lists are taken I think we shall get the best lists available.

Mr. MANION: I desire to point out one weakness in the proposal of the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) supported by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Euler) in regard to adopting municipal lists. For example, I happen to own property in the city of Fort William and also in the city of Port Arthur, and those cities are in separate constituencies. Consequently my name being on the municipal lists of both cities I could, according to this proposal, vote in both constituencies.

Mr. EULER: Those municipal lists are to be taken only as a basis.

Mr. MANION: Property owners on the municipal lists are absolute voters. I go across and vote in Port Arthur at every municipal election and dozens of others do the same.

Mr. EULER: I do not think it is the intention that those municipal lists shall be adopted holus bolus; they are simply to serve as a basis.

Mr. MANION: I quite understand that. But, for example, take a man on the voters' list in the city of Toronto and also on the voters' list of the city of Hamilton, which is only a short run by automobile, and he may be also on the voters' lists of other municipalities in the neighbourhood—I am not acquainted with their names—he might be on half a dozen voters' lists.

Mr. EULER: He can practise personation, of course.

Mr. MANION: It is not a case of personation; he would be voting legally because his name is on the municipal list.

Mr. DUFF: No, he has to vote where he resides.

Mr MANION: I vote in the municipal elections of Port Arthur and of Fort William.

Mr. BELAND: That is quite right.

Mr. MANION: If the municipal lists are adopted for the province of Ontario, my name will be on the voters' lists for the two constituencies I have referred to.

Mr. BELAND: If my hon. friend is on two lists, what of it? It is one man one vote.

Mr. MANION: Then if the municipal lists are adopted, and my name is not struck off either the Fort William or the Port Arthur list, I could vote in the two constituencies.

Mr. BELAND: No.

Mr. MANION: However, Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious to any one listening to the discussion that it is impossible to prepare any law to suit every one on both sides of this House. The members of the Opposition have brought up many amendments to the various clauses, and I think the minister in charge of the Bill has been very fair in adopting them, but if he is going to adopt every suggestion from every quarter, we will have to sit here until September. I would like to see a general law adopted that will be as fair as possible to the whole Dominion, but I do not think it is wise for the minister to attempt to satisfy every hon. member.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will my hon. friend say which of the suggestions made by hon. members on this side of the House have been adopted by the other side?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I could give them in absolute detail.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not know of one to date.

Mr. MANION: I think objection has come to a number of clauses from the other side that have been adopted by the minister, and he can give the details.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am afraid that the hon. member for Quebec East has not been very regular in his attendance.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have been here all the time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You must have heard those suggestions adopted, then.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In order that we may know exactly where we were at the time of this conference, allow me to remind the House what was said the other evening as to what had changed the feeling of most of us on this side. When this Bill was first introduced nothing had been said about the possibility of the Ontario Government devising any machinery for the purpose of preparing election lists. The result was that as we read this Bill it seemed to us that the Government wished to adopt the system of enumeration for the whole Dominion. Once, however, the Ontario Government introduced a Bill which provided machinery for the preparation of lists, and this Act by remaining as it is, just in the words in which it is at present expressed, indicated that where provincial lists were available those lists would be used, our whole attitude changed, because our objection was, first of all, to this system of enumeration, which we think is thoroughly bad; and, in the second place, to the additional expense of preparing separate lists. On Wednesday evening in speaking to the minister I drew attention to the fact that our attitude had changed, because according to his own interpretation of the Bill, since he introduced it in the House, if there were lists in Ontario prepared by the Ontario Government those would be the lists which we would use in federal elections. The point that has been raised to-day through the amendment of my hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Ross) as brought to the notice of the House, was not thought of on Friday night, and has not been thought of since, and was not in the mind of the minister at the time at which we expressed our willingness to accept section 32 as it stands, if it had the interpretation which we believed it to have. Let me read what was said in debate so that hon. members may see the situation for themselves.

At page 2430, speaking myself, I said:

> In order to make clear the effect of the law as it would be if we passed this section,—

That is, section 32 as it stands at the present time.

> —let me put a question to the minister.
>
> Assuming that an election were to take place in Canada within a year of the time the Drury Government was formed, that is, before November of this year, then that election would be held on the lists used in the last provincial election?
>
> Mr. Guthrie: If they were not more than twelve months old.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: If an election came before November of this year, the lists used for federal purposes so far as Ontario is concerned would be the lists that were used in the last provincial election. Now if the general election came in December, before the law now being drafted in Ontario, was put into motion, then the lists would be prepared by enumerators in accordance with the provisions of this Act, without any reference whatever to the law that the Ontario Government is putting through at the present time.

Mr. Guthrie: No, unless lists were prepared under that law.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Assuming that the Ontario law were now passed and that lists were prepared under it by November or December of this year then those lists would be used?

Mr. Guthrie: They would be valid for twelve months.

Mr. Mackenzie King: But if they were not prepared until say March or April of next year and a general election took place before then, lists would be prepared under the provisions of this Act?

Mr. Guthrie: Well, I understand that the proposal is that the Ontario Bill shall be passed and that the provincial lists for this year shall be prepared under it. I understand that they have to be prepared for municipal purposes in any case.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I simply wanted to make the point clear.

Mr. Guthrie: I think that the Ontario law will be in force by December next, anyway. There might be a month or two after November and before the new provincial lists come during which, if a general election were held, we might have to prepare new lists.

Clearly what the minister believed and what he gave the House to understand at that time was that under section 32 as it is in the Bill now, irrespective of any conference one way or the other, if the Drury Government passes the Bill which is before the Ontario legislature at the present time, which makes provision for lists based on municipal lists prepared by assessors, those lists would be the lists used for federal elections, provided that those lists were prepared within this next year.

That was the understanding that we had in this House and it was to give effect to that understanding that we had the conference. I drew attention to the fact that the minister's interpretation of the Act as it was expressed made us seem very much closer together than we had believed would have been possible. The reason I say that is that when this Bill was introduced there was no thought of making provision for the use of Ontario lists whereas the use of provincial lists being provided for as matters are at present the complexion of things is changed. If we can consider the amendments which my hon. friend from West Middlesex has suggested as covered by the interpretation which the minister has given to the Ontario Act, I am perfectly satisfied. I do not think there is any need to go a step further. With reference to the point which my hon. friend has raised, if there is a doubt of any kind we would be negligent if we did not draw attention to it and suggest the insertion of a subclause which would remove any possibility of doubt. When a matter of a complicated kind is under consideration men who have the opportunity of sitting down together and thinking only of what is going to be of the greatest service to all concerned can perhaps work it out more clearly than can be done in a discussion where we jump from one subject to another.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Do the provincial officials have absolute authority in connection with the revising of the provincial lists?

Mr. GUTHRIE: What list does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. TWEEDIE: The provincial lists which are to form the basis of the enumeration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The provincial officers would have the authority while they are provincial lists but they are, under this Bill, accepted as the basis of the federal lists and the final authority in urban centres would be the judges and in the rural centres the judges and the deputy returning officers when a man goes to the poll and asks for a vote. I do not quite agree with the statement of the leader of the Opposition. In the discussion which took place on Wednesday night there was no confusion in my mind about provincial or municipal lists. The first time I saw the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Middlesex and saw the words "municipal lists" I said: "That won't go; I will not agree to that?" When you propose to use provincial lists approved by a province and used in the elections in a province that is one thing but when you propose to use municipal lists that is something entirely different. I think I said at the time that I would approve of provincial lists provided the age was limited and that is what I am prepared to abide by. There was a meeting held on Thursday morning and at that conference we reached an agreement. The leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) and the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy), all from Ontario, were at that conference. I raised the question that I have raised to-day. I think we left that conference virtually in agreement and I spent the necessary time to draw the amendments. They are pretty complicated amendments to draw, they entailed a great deal of difficulty but I thought that I had finally found a way out of it. Now we are met with the suggestion that whereas the province of Ontario has no provincial lists we should accept the municipal lists. The province of Saskatchewan has only municipal lists. There is no official provincial list in the province of Saskatchewan until there is an election. That is the system which Premier Drury intends to adopt in the province of Ontario. I do not agree that we should wait on the whim or fancy of the Ontario Government in this respect. We are going a long distance when we say we will adopt the provincial lists as the basis of our federal franchise. We are going a long distance when we say that they may be two years old. We are going a very long distance when we drop out the original proposition of registration or enumeration in rural districts. Farther than that we have never been asked to go, and farther than that we do not purpose going. When you do give way the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) gets up and says you have never accepted a suggestion or anything of the kind. He must have been in the House while this matter has been under consideration and he will remember that I amended section 16, at the suggestion of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs); I amended section 29 at the suggestion of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler); I amended section 28 in regard to the polling subdivisions at the request of the leader of the Opposition; I amended section 64 at the request of the leader of the Opposition; section 80 at the request of the leader of the Opposition and I propose to amend section 100, when we come to it, at the request of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee).

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think that my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) was referring to the general question but just to a particular matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You do not get credit for anything you do agree to. I have not agreed to these amendments because I thought they made the Bill more workable but simply because hon. gentlemen opposite thought that they made it better. Now I think we have come to a time when the opinion of the House should prevail. There is a very strong feeling on this side of the House that the amendments are unworkable but I am not going to press them for a minute. I think the best thing we can do is to ask that the clause stand for further consideration. Otherwise I am prepared to withdraw the amendments, if nothing is going to be gained by them. Let the clause stand. It will have to stand for a considerable time because the Budget is coming down tomorrow. We might go on to sections 100 or 101.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman said that the amendments provided that the provincial list which is to be used in the province for their own election is the only list which will form the basis for a federal election?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): In the province of Alberta at every election they have a separate enumeration. I would understand from what you have stated that if that is the effect of the law, in my province we are not bound to accept any provincial list of any kind as the basis for a federal election.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If you have a completed provincial list which is not more than two years old it will be the list.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): In Alberta they prepare a list for every election. According to the law if we have an election within two years of the time of the preparation of that list we take the provincial list as prepared?

Mr. GUTHRIE: As the basis for the Dominion list.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): But you added nothing in your remarks to the effect that your amendment only provides for the use of the provincial lists which are used for the provincial elections. In Alberta the law provides for an enumeration every year. Are you, therefore, going to force us by the federal law to adopt a provincial list which is absolutely discarded by the Provincial Government themselves when they hold an election?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It may be a list which, under the law of the province of Ontario, is a valid and subsisting provincial list, and not more than two years old—it is a list prepared within two years by that Government.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): Then I withdraw all my opposition to the adoption of the provincial lists elsewhere, because what the minister now says makes it absolutely impossible for the Federal Government to be bound by any provincial list in the province of Alberta, whether a Dominion election is held within two years of the other Government or not.

Mr. COWAN: As I understand the matter, under this proposal which has come from this most extraordinary conference, the enumerators are done away with in the rural districts. Is that correct?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where there are provincial lists not more than two years old.

Mr. COWAN: If you adopt this proposal the people in the rural districts are going to be put to a much greater amount of trouble to get on the lists than they would have been subjected to under the original Bill—much more trouble. It means that there will be hundreds, yes thousands, of people, especially women, who will not take that trouble. Now that we have enfranchised women we ought to do everything we possibly can to make it easy for every woman who has a right to vote to be placed on the voters' list. Of course, if you provide that they may come on election day and swear in their vote, that is all right. But I know what the result will be because I was a scrutineer, under the old enumeration system a good many times, and in my case—and in the case of every other scrutineer—when a person comes to me whose name is not on the list, we simply say to the deputy returning officer, "Give them every oath in the calendar"—that is the stereotyped phrase—and the result is that they have to take every oath provided for. Well, there are thousands of these women who, when they find they have to take every oath in the calendar will never go near the polling place. I do not think we should put them under any such disability. For my part I think the Government should have adhered to the original Bill; it was a whole lot better than what this reactionary conference has given us.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I object to the amendment because it is absolutely unfair to the people of the rural municipalities. In one province there is the possibility of appointing enumerators to go around from door to door and give the residents the privilege of having their names on the list. In another province that privilege is withheld and you accept as a basis for your Dominion list a provincial list that may be two years old. Then hundreds of people whose names may not be on the provincial list are obliged to watch for a sitting of the court and then go in person, it may be five, ten, fifteen or twenty miles, and make application for the privilege. I consider that is unfair. I know from personal experience what it means to have voters' lists revised, and I would like the minister to state who would be responsible for the revision of the lists in a province where a two years' old provincial list is accepted as a basis in the rural districts?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think I understand the question.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I understand that where you adopt the provincial list as a basis in rural constituencies you do not appoint enumerators. Then who is responsible to the individual elector or to the candidate, whoever he may be?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know what you mean by "responsible."

Mr. SEXSMITH: I mean those who are responsible. In one province you appoint enumerators that go around from door to door—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where they have not any provincial lists.

Mr. SEXSMITH: —and every man and woman has a right to have their names put on the list by the enumerator who calls at their residence. What I say is that in every province where you adopt provincial lists that may be two years old the names of hundreds of people will be absent from the list. I know that to be a fact; I never saw it otherwise. Then you say to these people who may be entirely ignorant of the whole condition of affairs and may know nothing of the requirements of the law, "If you want your name on that list, you must go to the city, town or village (as the case may be) and have your name put on the list, and if you neglect to do so, you will have no vote."

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, no.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Excuse me. There is another provision that you may go and swear your vote in on election day provided you bring with you two neighbours who know the facts and who are also required to swear with you. That is to say, three parties are required to appear and take an affidavit before that particular elector can vote. I think the machinery is altogether too complicated. Furthermore, there is this condition in my riding: When you talk about adopting a municipal list there are hundreds and hundreds of people on that list who reside all over Canada and in the cities of the United States, such as Chicago, Detroit, Buffalo, and New York. Who is going to take the responsibility of permitting those names to remain on or having them struck off the municipal list? I am certain I would not care to take the responsibility, and yet there are hundreds of such people on the list; they own property and are assessed, and their names are on the municipal list, and at every municipal election they have a right to come and vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Putting the oath to them is the only safeguard for which the Bill provides.

Mr. CLEMENTS: I am quite sure that my hon. friends opposite, as well as a great many hon. members on this side, do not for one moment realize the conditions which exist in the province of British Columbia. Without enumeration in that province, I venture to say that in the rural districts at least one-third of the electors would lose their votes. We have no municipalities in the rural parts of British Columbia; they are practically all unorganized districts except in the villages. I want to say to the minister, and to this committee, that it would be most unfair to leave British Columbia in that position. I therefore strenuously oppose any amendment seeking to do away with the enumeration system as far as that province is concerned.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I am not sure that I understand exactly what this proposition means, but so far as I can gather its purport it is this: That if in rural districts there are lists less than two years old there shall be no enumeration or registration. That would mean, if the lists were less than two years old, every man and woman on it would have to swear in order to be entitled to vote. I think the Minister of Immigration and Colonization knows what such a system as that would amount to as far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned, and I can hardly imagine that he was at the conference referred to at which this amendment was adopted.

Mr. CALDER: That has been our system in Saskatchewan for several years past.

Mr. THOMSON: But we have had enumeration; now you propose to do away with that. I think I know what the result will be in the districts that I am acquainted with in the West. At one time the Saskatchewan Government ordered the list to be prepared every year. I presume my hon. friend (Mr. Calder) will remember that, too. That was done for two years in succession, and I recall that in my town I was acting for the Liberals and trying to revise the lists while a friend was acting for the Conservatives, and after we got through twenty-five per cent of the names were struck off the list and perhaps a little more than twenty-five per cent added. I am satisfied, as regards several small towns in the West, that if you adopt the plan suggested by this amendment twenty-five per cent of the voters, in order to have their names placed on the list, will have to go and swear to the facts, with two persons to identify them. That means where you have one hundred voters to be added in a polling place, three hundred people will have to be on hand to swear to the correctness of the applications, and as my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Cowan) says the applicants are liable to have to swear to every oath on the list. I do not think the thing is practicable at all, and I cannot understand how my hon. friend (Mr. Calder) came to agree to it when he knows the conditions in the province of Saskatchewan so well.

Mr. CALDER: I was not very far away when the committee was sitting, and at the time I thought the proposition was a very reasonable one. I am not just so certain of my view at this moment as a result of the discussion that has taken place. I wish to very briefly correct an impression that exists among some of the members on this side. When an enumeration takes place in the province of Saskatchewan it is not provided that the enumerator shall call at every house—that should be clearly understood. If the law provided that an enumerator should call at every house the expense would be enormous—in fact practically prohibitive. As a consequence of that our law has simply provided that the enumerator may, if he chooses, sit down in his own house and make out as good a list as he can from all the material that is available to him. There was a time, some eight or ten years ago, when we required the enumerator to make a house-to-house canvass, but that system was so expensive that we abolished it and adopted the other system under which the enumerator could take the municipal lists or any other material he found at hand and make out the very best list that he could. In addition to that, under the old federal law, as well as under our provincial law, there was always a provision that the voter whose name was not on the list could come forward on election day and swear in his vote. I must say after a great many years' experience with the working out of that law in Western Canada that while occasionally there may have been some slip, as a rule the law has been accepted by our people as workable and fair, and so far as I am aware no serious criticism of it has come from any section of the community.

The real question that faces the committee and which we discussed the other day at our conference is whether or not it is possible to provide some means whereby the enormous cost of preparing lists under a system of enumeration can be avoided. Some take the view that it is better to put enumerators at work in order to get as complete a list as possible immediately prior to the election. Personally I am inclined to the other view; I think that if we can devise machinery which will enable us, looking at it from the federal standpoint, to prepare lists that are reasonably fair, then we should avoid the unnecessary expense of having the lists prepared by enumerators. In Saskatchewan and Alberta, if there have been provincial elections and lists have been prepared which are not more than two years old, we will accept those lists, not as final, but merely as a basis for revision if they are available. In our urban communities there is machinery in the law for the revision of these lists immediately prior to the holding of a federal election. There is no reason why under this proposal every person who is qualified to vote in any of our cities or towns with a population of over one thousand should not have his name put on the list after the writs are issued. If, on the other hand, these provincial lists which are not more than two years old are loaded with the names of persons who are not qualified to vote when the federal election comes round, there is no reason why the lists should not be cleaned up in that regard as well. That position should be reasonably satisfactory to every one; there will be machinery for the obtaining of an up-to-date list immediately prior to the holding of a federal election. Now, as to the rural end of it, those lists prepared within the two year period would be used simply for what they are worth. They are there as a matter of record. It does not follow that any person whose name is on that list is entitled to vote or that any person whose name is not on the list is not entitled to vote. The list is merely to be used as a convenience. It will not be revised in the sense that the city lists are to be revised; it will simply be handed to the deputy returning officer to be taken for what it is worth. Personally I have no objection to that provision so far as Saskatchewan is concerned so long as I know reasonable machinery is provided which will enable any man who is entitled to do so to come forward on election day and put in his vote. That is all that we attempted to provide. Under the suggested amendment now before us provision is made whereby a rural voter whose name is not on the list may apply, in the first place, to a judge and have his name added; or on election day he may have his name added by having his qualification vouched for by two fellow-electors. I say frankly that I can quite understand how it is that members from the East who are not familiar with this sort of law desire to have its provisions safeguarded. In the West we have had a law which enabled the man himself to come forward on election day and swear in his vote, and we have never had any trouble with it. In Eastern Canada there are a good many people who are doubtful of the results of a law of that kind and desire to throw around it certain safeguards. Well, if the proposal made is objectionable and some other safeguard can be found that will be regarded as reasonable, then I think that the committee should endeavour to find that other safeguard.

The problem before the committee has two aspects. In the first place there are those who maintain that regardless of expense we should put an army of officials in the field immediately prior to an election for the purpose of getting the lists and, in the second place, there are those who hold the view that if it is possible to do so—and it would mean a saving of a million or a million and a half dollars—we should endeavour to devise machinery whereby we could avoid that expense. Personally I am strongly inclined to the latter viewpoint. My good friend from East Edmonton (Mr. H. A. Mackie) speaks of the enumerator. I know what the enumerator system is and I think I may fairly say that after observing the operation of that law as a member of the Provincial Government for fifteen years and watching as well the federal elections held out there, the appointment of enumerators and the actions of enumerators do more harm to the Government that appoints them than they do to the other side. That is my experience; if I wanted to run an election and had the choice of appointing enumerators or letting the other fellow do it, I would rather let the other fellow do it.

An hon. MEMBER: You are quite right.

Mr. CALDER: Because there is always a great deal of criticism against that method of building up lists. My own view is that if it is at all possible to avoid that system we should do so, especially if a good deal of money can be saved.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): May I ask the Minister of Immigration a question? He has made a statement which is at variance with the statement made by the Acting Solicitor General, and that is the whole point of my remarks this afternoon. My objection is that we should take in Alberta as the basis of a federal election list a list prepared by the enumerators, because I recognize the very thing that the minister recognizes—that enumerators are not what they should be. But I say that you should not force the provincial list upon us as the basis of a federal election list; that is my whole objection. Now, I want to make sure about this. I asked the Acting Solicitor General: Is it not a fact that you said that the only list we are going to use as the basis of a federal election is the provincial list which is going to be used as the list for provincial elections, and his answer is, yes. Well then, I say I have no objection, because in Alberta we have no such provincial lists. Every time there is an election, a new enumeration is made; but according to the amendment before the House, it is possible that the list prepared by the Provincial Government, which list is not one that they use themselves as a basis for the next election, will be the list which the Federal Government, if they hold an election within the period of two years of the making of this list, will be obliged to adopt, and you are forcing us to adopt a list made up by a class of men to whom you take exception. If you force us to accept a list made up by a class of men to whom you take exception, why do you object to our asking that you accept a list prepared in a similar manner? Who is right, the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), or the Acting Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie)?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: After having listened to what the Minister of Immigration and Colonization has said, it must be apparent to hon. members that those who were together when these suggestions were being discussed have, in regard to this whole matter, a point of view which it may be difficult for other hon. members to have who have not before them the exact amendments that are proposed. It is quite clear to those of us on both sides who discussed this matter that there are distinct merits in the suggestions which are to be moved, if the committee so agrees, as amendments to the Bill as it stands, and I think the discussion, if we have regard to what has been said by different hon. members, discloses that many of the difficulties that are feared in what has been proposed, arise from the members not having before them the exact amendments as suggested. I know we are all anxious to get this legislation through as quickly as possible, and perhaps the quickest course to adopt would be for the minister to state to the committee the amendments he has in mind so that we shall have all the amendments before us and shall then be in a position to accept or reject them speedily. That would save a great deal of debate, and I am sure, if hon. members have an opportunity to consider these amendments from no point of view other than what is best for the country, what will give most confidence in an Election Act and what will avoid most extravagance and lessen the possibility of waste of public money, they will feel that what the Acting Solicitor General is about to suggest is most in accord with the public interest.

Mr. TWEEDIE: The argument on the Opposition side of the House is that to adopt provincial lists as a basis for a federal list would mean a saving of a great deal of money to this country, but I have not yet heard any hon. member point out how the saving would come about. For instance, each province has power to pass a Franchise Act regardless of the franchise qualifications in any other province. Let us assume for the purpose of argument that every province in the Dominion passes different qualifications, and that the Dominion passes a Franchise Act in which the qualifications are different from those of any one of the nine provinces. What would be the result? The result would be that persons who are charged with the preparation of the lists must satisfy themselves as regards every name which goes upon the federal list; and as regards the provincial list forming a basis for the preparation of the federal list, it cannot possibly be any better basis than a list compiled from a city directory or a telephone directory or a municipal list or any other lists of names of people living in the community in which the voters' list is being prepared. Let us assume that the Federal Act provides a residence qualification of twelve months in the district, and that the Provincial Act provides a residence qualification of six months in the district, and that in all other respects the franchise qualifications agree. What does that mean? It means that we have placed in the hands of the federal officers a list under which the qualification of residence is six months. Therefore, the federal officers must satisfy themselves as regards every man whose name is on the list. If we were at a stage where the qualifications for the exercise of the franchise were uniform in the various provinces and in the Dominion as a whole, there might be no question as to adopting the provincial lists as the basis of our lists or as the real list of those who are entitled to exercise the Franchise in a Dominion election. But where the respective qualifications vary, it is absolutely necessary that the qualifications of every man whose name is on any list should be investigated to ascertain whether they conform with the requirements of the Federal Act under which he wishes to exercise the franchise. As a matter of practical economy, I cannot see where one dollar will be saved if justice is to be done in connection with the federal franchise.

If the Federal Franchise Act says So and So may vote and any province varies from that, in that province every name that goes on the federal list must be examined to see whether or not the man has, not the qualifications of the Provincial Act, but the qualifications of the Federal Act under which he wishes to exercise the franchise. I should like to hear some hon. member explain where the real economy in this comes in. I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend (Mr. H. A. Mackie) that what is at stake is really who is going to exercise the authority of preparing the list of voters to be used throughout the Dominion of Canada.

As regards the revision clause, I think I pointed out before that where any class of work is being done on behalf of the Federal Government or the Provincial Government, the officers who are performing that work are the servants of the Federal Government or the Provincial Government respectively. The Government would be ill advised to accept officers of another Government to perform duties in connection with its own Act. You must have the utmost harmony, and you can get that only when you appoint men who are subject to your jurisdiction and instruction. It is an anomaly for us to say that we shall have a Federal Franchise Act prepared for ourselves, and at the same time place the doing of that work in the hands of some persons who are not in any way responsible to this Government.

As regards the conduct of enumerators in Alberta, I must disagree with the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) who says that the lists used in the last election would be the basis of the federal lists. My understanding of the provincial enumeration list is that as soon as an election is held, the list becomes a nullity; it automatically dies under our Statute, because it is used only for the purpose of the particular election for which it was prepared. If we were to hold another election in Alberta three months later, we would still be required to prepare a new list by the method of enumeration, the old list being dead. I have always found that the enumeration method has worked out well in Alberta. There is no doubt that mistakes occur and perhaps once in a while you might find an enumerator who did not do his duty properly; but the practice has been that the enumerator goes from house to house in order to ascertain who are entitled to vote in the city or in the country; he can get that definite information only by going from house to house and office to office to ascertain that he gets the names of all those who are entitled to be on the lists.

Mr. CALDER: The Bill does not provide for enumeration in a city like Calgary.

As to the other point raised, the question of economy, at this very time the Manitoba Government is preparing lists for an election to be held in June or July. In the city of Winnipeg they have personal registration. Every elector must come forward and have his name put on the list. I suppose that will take probably three or four or five weeks. After that personal registration takes place, they must go through a form of revision, to strike off and put on. Let us assume they have completed their list and held a provincial election, and that we hold a federal election six months from now. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that if we took that list which was completed only six months before, and merely revised it for the purpose of our federal election, that there would not be a large saving of money and a great saving of trouble and expense on the part of the people? Notwithstanding the existence of that list, which so far as I am aware is based on exactly the same requirements as our list, as to residence, naturalization, and everything of that character, does he suggest that notwithstanding the expense to which the province of Manitoba has been put in the preparation of that list, we should go to the trouble and expense of duplicating all that work, simply because the list was not prepared by the Federal Government? It seems to me that if we provide the necessary machinery to make certain that that list is not prepared from the ground up, but merely revised for the purpose of our election, we are bound to save a great deal of money and put our people to far less trouble and expense than they would otherwise be put to.

Mr. TWEEDIE: That is exactly the suggestion I intended to make. My point was that if the qualifications for voters throughout the various provinces were uniform with the federal requirements, that system could be carried out. But we have no control over the franchise of the provinces; they can make their own qualifications, and they may all be different at the present time, or, after we pass our Act, they might pass an Act which would be entirely repugnant to ours. My point is that where there is any variation between the provincial and the federal qualifications you cannot adopt the provincial lists, because you must investigate the qualifications of every voter on that list. The province may require a residence of six months in the province, two months in the constituency, and a month in the polling division, and the Federal Act, twelve months in the province, six months in the constituency, and two months in the polling subdivision. Those are three distinct points. They exist at the present time in various provinces. What does that mean? Every one of those names must be investigated to see whether or not the voter has the qualifications which are required by the Federal Franchise Act, and they are not entitled to be put on the federal list until that information has been gathered. It means that you could use the provincial list simply as a sort of index or directory, as a list of the names of people who might possibly have the qualifications. But it is the duty of the federal officers to go out and ascertain whether they have the qualifications required by the federal law, because they were placed on the provincial list under different qualifications.

Mr. ROSS: Maybe I have been the unhappy cause of this discussion. I did not intend to be. In the case mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Tweedie), the protection would be the swearing-in of the voter at the polls.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Does my hon. friend mean to suggest that every man who goes to vote should have to take the oath? You would not get the votes polled in a week in that case.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. ROSS: I am not contending that. The local officers would know whether they had the qualifications. That is not the point I rose to speak on. I have the amendment before me, suggested by the Acting Solicitor General, to carry out the views of the conference held on the 13th of May, and I think they are all an absolute improvement on the Act. I did not move any amendment at all, but simply threw out in good faith a suggestion to the committee. If the committee does not see fit to accept it, well and good.

Mr. HENDERS: I think we are pretty close to an agreement except on the one point as to the provision to be made for the rural votes. I am not at all satisfied with the amendment as it stands for taking care of the rural voters. I am of the opinion that it would be possible to provide that in the rural districts, just as in the city districts, there shall be opportunity for revision some days before polling day. I think if that could be done, we ought to be able to reach an agreement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I want to make it clear that I have not moved an amendment. I have made a suggestion, and the suggestion has certainly come from the conference which was held on Thursday last. I think it might not be out of the way if I followed the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition and let the committee know the exact language of what I suggest. I handed a copy of the document which I have in my hand to the chairman of the committee, but I have not made any motion by way of amending section 32. The ideas of the conference of Thursday last, as reduced to writing by me, are about as follows. I may not have carried out all the views of those present, but I have tried to. There are one or two minor amendments to section 32 before we come to the schedules. I was going to propose that schedule 1, which is apparently a somewhat clumsy enactment as drawn in the Bill, be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

Rule (1). Immediately after the receipt of the writ the returning officer shall appoint, by writing, in Form E one person only to be registrar of voters in each city, town or incorporated village which is wholly or partially contained in the electoral district for which the election is pending and which has a population of over 1,000 or less than 4,000 persons, and one for each additional 4,000 persons, who shall, before acting as such, take the oath in Form F; and the registrars so appointed shall be assigned by the returning officer to such parts or such number of polls as he may deem right and proper.

That is important only in regard to the number of registrars which we will have in urban districts. The next amendment of any consequence would be to schedule B, page 22, which is the schedule providing for the lists in rural polling divisions. I propose to strike out Rule 1 as printed, and insert instead the following:

Rule (1) No rural registrar shall be appointed in any electoral district in any province where provincial voters' lists are available for the purposes of a Dominion election under the provisions of subsection one of section thirty-two of this Act. In such cases provincial voters' lists shall be adopted as final and complete for rural polling divisions; subject, however, to the right of any person to apply to have his name added to the voters' list as provided by section sixty-three of this Act; and subject also to the right of any person resident in a rural polling division to apply in person to the revising officer of any urban polling division in the same electoral district, or if there be no urban polling division in such electoral district, to the nearest revising officer in another electoral district, to have his name added to the voters' list for such rural polling division; Such application may be made at any time during the sittings of such revising officer as provided by rule 13 of schedule A of the said section 32; and the revising officer to whom such application shall be so made, if satisfied that the applicant is a person qualified as an elector to vote at the election then pending within such rural polling division, may by writing under his hand addressed to the returning officer of the proper electoral district, order that the name of such person be added to the voters' list for the proper rural polling division. The revising officer shall thereafter, and not later than the twelfth day before polling day, deliver or send by registered mail to each returning officer and to each candidate in each of the electoral districts affected thereby, a list of all persons added to the voters' lists giving the names, residences and additions of such persons and designating the rural polling divisions in which such names have been so added to the voters' lists. The returning officer shall thereupon and in due time before polling day notify the deputy returning officers in each rural polling division affected of the names, residences and additions of the persons so added to the voters' lists by the revising officer. For the purposes of this rule the method of procedure and the powers and authority of the revising officer shall be similar to those set forth in Rules 14 and 15 of Schedule A to the said section thirty-two.

That would be rule (1). Then the present rule (1) I would merely amend in the first few lines as follows:—

If under the laws of any province no provincial voters' lists exist which are available for the purposes of a Dominion election under the provisions of subsection (1) of section 32 of this Act, the returning officer shall, immediately after the receipt of the writ, appoint by writing in Form E one person only to be registrar of voters for each polling division. Whenever a competent person can be secured—

And add the words:

—who is a resident within the limits of the polling division, such person shall be appointed, and only in case of necessity shall a registrar be selected from an outside polling division.

Then I would also suggest that another rule be added to Rule B to be known as 4 A, or to be renumbered after the clause is passed, in the following words:

Any person claiming to be an elector who is dissatisfied with any decision of a registrar under the last preceding rule may apply to the revising officer of any urban polling division in the electoral district wherein such person resides in the same manner as provided under Rule (1) of this Schedule and such revising officer may hear and determine such application, and may order, notify and report upon the same in the same manner and to the same end as provided under the said Rule (1).

Then I would add another rule as No. 4-B:

Any person who has applied either under Rule (1) or Rule (4) of this schedule to a revising officer to have his name added to the voters' list and whose application has been refused by such revising officer shall not thereafter be entitled to apply to have his name added to the voters' list under the provisions of section sixty-three of this Act. If any person, after such refusal by a revising officer, as aforesaid, shall require or request any deputy returning officer to add such person's name to the voters' list under the provisions of section sixty-three of this Act, such person shall be guilty of an offense under this Act and shall be punishable therefor as provided by section eighty-five of this Act.

Then I make provision for the amendment of subsection (1) of section 32 by changing the term "one year" into "two years" in regard to provincial voters' lists. And it would be necessary to make some amendments to section 33 by adding at the end of subsection (2) the following in regard to voters' lists, that is, where an election has taken place and the lists have been returned to the Chief Electoral Officer and a new election is called:

And the same—

Meaning the voters' lists.

—shall thereafter be completed, revised and distributed as provided by Schedules A and B respectively to section 32 of this Act.

Then I would suggest that subsection 3 and 4 be struck out.

It would be necessary also to bring section 63 into conformity with the provisions which I have just read. Therefore, if my suggestions were met, I would propose to amend section 63, subsection (1) as follows:

At polling stations in rural polling divisions the deputy returning officer shall, while the poll is open, if required by any person whose name is not on the voters' list and who is vouched for by two electors who are resident in such polling division, administer to such person oath number (1) in form "Z" No. 1 of schedule 1 to this Act and to each of such other two persons an oath in form "Z" No. 2 of schedule 1 to this Act, and such oath having been taken by the applicant person and by such two other persons, the deputy returning officer shall at once cause such applicant person's name to be added to the voters' list, with the word "sworn" written thereafter, and subject to the next following subsection of this Act, such applicant person may thereupon vote.

I would add to the next following subsection, which is subsection (2) by inserting in line 30 after the word "make" the following words:

including the names of the two persons who vouched for the applicant person.

I have also prepared a form of oath to be taken by the two persons who act as sureties or vouchers for the persons whose names are so added, which is practically a repetition of the oath of the elector, that they know the elector, and they know and state his qualifications to vote at the election. That, I think, would make more certain that this privilege of voting under section 63 would not be abused.

Then, as I intimated a few moments ago, I would suggest that section 100 be amended by striking out the words "or other persons" in the first line. That would confine the section in its application to railway men, sailors and commercial travellers.

These are the amendments which were in my mind, suggested as a result of the conference which we held on Wednesday. I have given them now to the committee in order that hon. members may fully understand the scope of them; but it must be borne in mind that I have not yet moved them as amendments.

Mr. STEELE: One or two features of this Franchise Act appealed, I think, to almost every member when it was introduced. One was that we were to have valid up-to-date lists, a matter in which the rural constituencies have suffered for many years as compared with the urban constituencies. Representing a rural constituency as I do, I think it is a most important feature of the Bill that rural lists should be up-to-date—even more important, I think, than that the urban lists should be up-to-date.

Another feature which commended itself to me was the simplicity of the machinery prescribed for the preparation of the lists. Perhaps it is expensive. Those of us who have had to do with the preparation and revision of these lists in years past know that the old method in Ontario was exceedingly expensive,—especially to the candidates. We cannot have an accurate up-to-date list without expense. It is a question whether the Government should bear the expense or whether the individual candidates themselves should bear it. After the discussion to-day, and especially after the reading of the Acting Solicitor General's proposed amendments, I have lost my vision of up-to-date lists for the rural constituencies and a simple method of preparing those lists. Franchise Acts in the past have been very confusing to the average man. But I do not think I have ever heard or read of any provisions which were proposed for a franchise Bill which would be more confusing to an ordinary elector than the proposals now laid before the House by the Acting Solicitor General, and if these are the best fruits of a conference, then I would say do away with conferences and leave the matter in the hands of this committee, which could decide perhaps more promptly and with better results what the provisions of the Act should be. Many members probably do not appreciate what it would mean to adopt this method of preparing the lists in rural constituencies. Three or four years ago I made an estimate of the changes which would be made in my own constituency, which is a very small and stable one; there not being many people coming and going. I found about 450 names of new voters on one list as compared with the previous list. That probably is about the average number of changes that take place each year. If we were using a list two years old containing the names of the old electorate and when the women were not included there would probably be a thousand changes. With the women added we would probably have 2,000 new voters. What does it mean when we enter an election campaign to have 2,000 people who are entitled to vote but whose names are not on the list? This amendment provides for people going to some revising officer somewhere and having their names added. If they do not do that they can go up on election day and swear in their votes. Just imagine what that would mean in my small constituency. I venture to say that in North Perth there would be from 4,000 to 6,000 voters whose names would not be on a two-year-old list when the election campaign came on. It seems to me that a statement of this kind is sufficient to let the House see that the system is practically unworkable. The result will be that if that system is followed there will be hundreds of men and women who will be deprived of the right of voting or who will have to go to the polls on election day and swear in their votes. The polling booths will be so congested from morning till night that there will be ill feeling, disturbance and uncertainty at the polls. I sincerely trust that the Acting Solicitor General will return to the original clause, even if it is necessary to make some amendment to meet the question of expense. I think that would be very desirable. I do not see why we should not have in any rural constituency the same system which is adopted in an urban constituency. Have a revising officer in each municipality, and if there are names on the list which should not be there the necessary changes can be made by the revising officer. That would simplify it very much. Voters would know exactly where they had to go and what they had to do, while under the proposed amendment the confusion will be very great because so many people will desire to have their names put on the list.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I understand that a voter in a rural district who is not on the revised list would have the right to vote if the revising officer in some town should add his name. If the revising officer should refuse, would he still have the right to have his name put on the list by a judge?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If he does he will commit an offence which under the Act is punishable. The presumption is that the judge will inquire into the matter and decide whether he has the right to vote or not.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Then the revising officer is the final court of appeal?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Why should there be an appeal in the urban district and not in the rural?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is the same.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: You have an appeal to the judge in the urban district.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A man in the rural district, under the amendment, has an appeal to the same judge.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: That is what I was asking you. I understood he would not have.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, and the decision of the judge will be final in both instances. But if a man in a rural district should attempt to swear himself in he will be liable under the Act.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: The hon. gentleman misunderstood my question. I understand the applicant has an appeal to a judge and that if the judge decides that he is not entitled to vote, he must not swear his name in?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is right.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: With regard to swearing on the name, I concur in what the hon. the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) says, that where the practice has been tried it has been found thoroughly satisfactory. I think that is the agreement of hon. members on both sides of the House who know anything about it. I think it is the best and safest plan you could possibly adopt, and to do away with it is a most dangerous thing.

Mr. MORPHY: In the application of the law is a voter's oath alone taken as sufficient?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: Has that been quite satisfactory without having the oaths of two resident electors?

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I am quite willing to accept that because apparently hon. gentlemen who do not know how the system is actually working in the province of Saskatchewan are frightened. It has been found satisfactory there. But let us have the addition which the Acting Solicitor General has suggested because it may be that people in other provinces, being unfamiliar with the system, are suspicious of it. But do not shut out the right of a man to record his vote by that method in a rural district because if you do you are going to shut out a great many votes.

Mr. HAY: I am not sure that the amendment is going to be workable in country districts. Where a Dominion election was held within two years after the provincial list had been revised, the electors would have no means of placing their names on the list except by making application to a judge or enumerator in a town where there were 2,000 inhabitants. In a large country constituency, such as I represent, I fancy this would be practically impossible. Where the vote is changed so quickly and where a great many new voters are coming in I fancy the Act would be entirely unworkable. If we had 300 names on the list in a polling subdivision and it should be necessary to swear in fifty, sixty or a hundred more, I cannot see how it could be done unless we created double polls in each polling subdivision. It would be practically impossible to get the vote polled in the time allowed for the polling to take place. As far as I can see a thorough revision of the lists in the country constituencies is necessary previous to an election, especially where those lists are two years old. I cannot see any other procedure to follow that would give justice to the people living in the country; and in my opinion it would be a mistake to adopt any amendment that would tend to disfranchise great numbers of these electors. Probably hon. members who represent constituencies in the East have no idea of the size of our western constituencies. For example, my constituency is something like three hundred miles long by one hundred and fifty miles wide, and it would be out of the question for many persons to travel such a great distance to register in any town or village. Yet their only means of getting their names on the list would be on polling day, and they would be compelled to bring two of their neighbours a very great distance to give evidence that they were properly qualified. Therefore I think some other method should be adopted whereby registration can take place in our rural constituencies. I would like the committee to carefully consider these matters because they affect the western constituencies in a very important manner.

Progress reported.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY OF CANADA AT WASHINGTON.

On motion of Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister) for Committee of Supply:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queens): Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of this motion to invite the attention of the House for but a few minutes to what I regard as a question of large importance. I refer to the negotiations which seem to be in progress respecting the representation of Canada at Washington.

During the war a number of business men were sent to United States, appointed to what was called a War Mission, whose business in that country was to endeavour to obtain for Canada a share in the large volume of contracts that were being made for munitions of war and for supplies. I believe that the Mission discharged that duty in a way that brought a great deal of business to Canada, and that its work in that respect was eminently successful. At the last session of Parliament an appropriation of $50,000 was asked for that Mission, and associated with that in the item was, "Representation of Canada at Washington." I am inclined to think that what was contemplated by the Government at that day must have been materially different from the larger project of which we know a little, but very little, at the present stage.

Let me say frankly that my own observation and my own experience in relation to transactions of public business between Ottawa and Washington lead me to entertain great doubt as to the wisdom of the step that the Government are taking. I am afraid that it means that, at a time when everybody is talking of the need of economy; at a time when many worthy projects are turned down because the Government say they cannot find the money for them,—at such a time I am afraid that the Government are plunging into a form of expenditure which promises but little substantial good for Canada but which is full of possibilities of future trouble. But while I give that in passing as my own impression, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I give it only as an impression and one for which I alone am responsible. I realize that the question of representation at Washington is one on which there may be difference of opinion, not unlikely on both sides of the House. I take it for granted that at a later day opportunity will be afforded for a wider discussion of the question. I do not propose at this moment to enter into the wider question of whether or not it is expedient to have representation for Canada at Washington. I quite realize, as I have said, that there are differences of opinion on that subject, and I myself feel that for lack of information we should all be disposed to reserve a final judgment until we are better informed. I do not ask the House to associate itself with the impression I have given. But I do think there is a point upon which the House might well take strong ground, and that is that in a matter of such large importance this Parliament is entitled to be furnished with more information than it has received in this connection.

There has been a great deal of talk from time to time of what is called government by Order in Council. More than once during this session, and not on this side only, members have expressed the view that there was too much government by Order in Council. There is, I am afraid, a tendency in our Parliamentary system—I believe that students of English politics have found the same there—to magnify the power of the Cabinet and to minimize the power of Parliament; and that is a tendency which we should guard against. The Cabinet, after all, is only a Committee of Parliament, and beyond that we should not be prepared to give it unlimited power. There are times, I know, when a Government must determine things promptly. An emergency may arise; a crisis comes; the Government must act promptly; it must come to a decision and trust to Parliament to justify it later. There is another set of circumstances under which a Government may be justified in feeling that they have public opinion behind them. After a question has been discussed for a long time in Parliament, on the platform and throughout the country, a Government may feel that they have a clear knowledge of public opinion which will enable them to reach conclusions without taking Parliament into their confidence until a later stage. But there are no such conditions here. There is no emergency; there is no crisis; there is nothing in connection with this Washington business so far as Canada is concerned which could suffer if it were delayed for a week, a month,—aye for a year; and the Government by Order in Council which might have been justified in time of war, cannot be justified in time of peace.

Then, as to the second point. I have said that there may be occasions when a Government is justified in making up its mind that it has public opinion behind it, after there has been a long discussion, perhaps an agitation,—debates in Parliament; discussions on the platform. All these are conditions, I say, which may create a ground upon which a Government may feel that it has public opinion behind it. But there is no such condition here. There has been practically no discussion of this Washington business, beyond a brief reference to it in the last session, there has been no debate at all. There has been no resolution of this Parliament setting forth that we were dissatisfied with the present state of affairs. There has been no discussion on the public platform. No candidate has presented himself to the electors of Canada on the ground that he wants a definite representation of Canada at Washington. In all these respects, then, there is nothing to justify the Government in coming to a hasty conclusion. Nevertheless, it would seem, from the little information that we have, that the Government are disposed to reach a conclusion without taking Parliament into their confidence.

I have said that it appears that the project the Government now have in hand is larger than was in their mind a year ago. When the item of $50,000 was voted to which I have referred, the minister in charge, the President of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) stated that they were about winding up the business of the War Mission but that it was intended to have a permanent representative at Washington, whose range of duties would be somewhat wider than that of the Mission. Then the question of expense was mentioned, and he said that the cost of the War Mission had been from $4,000 to $5,000 a month. I quote my hon. friend's words:

> The present expenditure in connection with the Mission is between $4,000 and $5,000 a month. We do not anticipate that the permanent representation will exceed that amount.

So it was evident that at that time a very modest project was in the mind of the minister. But what do we find to-day? Not only do we find a much larger scheme indicated by the memorandum read the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster); we find that the modest appropriation of $50,000 last year has already jumped to $80,000 in the Estimates of the present year. I venture to say that if the project be carried out it will be found at no distant date that much more than $80,000 will be needed to meet the expenses.

Now, I have stated, Sir, that my own impressions of this matter are not favourable, but I want to emphasize the fact that I am not asking the House to join me in that. I am reserving these impressions for consideration at a later day if that be necessary. But I want to urge very strongly that in a matter of so much importance Parliament is entitled to have received in a larger degree the confidence of this Government. I say that in a matter of so much gravity, for the Government to withhold information and proceed to commit the country to this new scheme at Washington is a step which Parliament ought to look upon with very grave suspicion. It is a matter of large importance. It is of financial importance; for I am satisfied that even the $80,000 which is asked this year will be found quite inadequate to the maintenance of the proper dignity of Canada's representative as proposed at Washington. But it is important in another respect; it is important in its relation to our communications with the United States. It is important in its bearing on our relations with the Mother Country. It is important in every respect; it comes nearer to being a constitutional change than any of the various matters which have recently been brought to the attention of the House. For all these reasons, on an important matter, on a matter which is not urgent nor pressing, on a matter which affords every opportunity for preliminary consideration and reflection, it would be a wise policy for the Government to halt in their proceedings, and before they go further, to bring the whole matter fully before the Parliament of Canada, in order that we may be able to exercise sound judgment on the subject. For that reason, without dwelling on the matter further, and with the full understanding that at a later stage on the main question, if necessary, I shall be permitted to discuss this matter further, confining myself at present entirely to the question of Parliamentary procedure, I move:

That all the words after the word "that", to the end of the question, be left out and the following words be inserted instead thereof:

"This House desires to record its opinion that before any arrangement respecting the permanent representation of Canada at Washington is consummated, the House should be fully informed concerning the negotiations between the Canadian, Imperial and United States Governments, and all correspondence and Orders in Council on the subject should be submitted to the House."

Hon. N. W. ROWELL: (President of the Council): I am sure hon. members have listened with interest to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) who has moved this amendment. I may congratulate my hon. friend on one point of his remarks at least, that is that, after persistently denying for a year and a half or two years in this House and in the press that Canada's status had been modified in any degree whatever, he to-night acknowledges the fact that there is some modification and improvement in our status, as shown by the step that has been taken.

My hon. friend's criticism of the action of the Government appears to be based on three grounds: First, that there is no occasion for such an appointment, that no conditions exist which call for it; second, that there is no public opinion in the country behind such an appointment; and third, that before any arrangement is consummated, all the facts should be submitted to the House.

friend, let me say with reference to the first, that my hon. friend and the other members of the House have only to recall conditions existing between two great countries having a boundary line 4,000 miles in extent, and in which for many years the chief work of the British Ambassador at Washington related to Canadian affairs, to realize that Canada has important and vital interests at Washington which require the attention of a representative of Canada. My hon. friend has conceded that during the period of the war Canada required representation at Washington and that we were represented by business men who did a fine piece of work for Canada. I am sure my hon. friend realizes the fact that the largest part of the external trade of the Dominion of Canada is with the great nation to the south. Does he realize that the great nation to the south has a larger trade with Canada than with all the republics of Central or South America? We are one of the very largest customers of the United States, and the United States is the country with which we in Canada have the largest trade. Not only the question of trade, but other questions do and must inevitably arise between two nations geographically so closely and intimately related as the peoples of our two countries and these call for the attention of a Canadian minister.

What are the objects of having a representative at the capitol of another state; to safeguard and protect the interests of the people of the country concerned. Does any hon. member doubt that a Canadian, possessing the intimate knowledge which a Canadian should of Canadian affairs and trade conditions, is better qualified, to look after Canadian interests than a man who has not that knowledge or experience? Surely no hon. member will question that fact? That being so, I do not think hon. members will question that it is in the interests of Canada that we should have in the capital of the neighbouring nation a Canadian to look after our rights and interests. I do not wish to mention questions that are coming up. Hon. members have only to recall questions that arise from week to week and from month to month which are provoking discussions in the press of the United States and in the press of Canada, to realize how important it is that we should be in a position to communicate directly with the American Government, to represent the views of the people of Canada to that Government through our representative at Washington in order that the rights and interests of the people of this country may be properly guarded and protected in the premises. In saying this, I have nothing but words of appreciation for the conduct of the different British ambassadors at Washington. They have sought to place themselves in touch with Canadian conditions; they have put forth every effort to represent fully and adequately our views so far as it has been possible for them to do so. In what I have said about the importance of Canadian representation, I do not wish that any implication should arise that the British ambassadors who have been present at Washington have not put forth every effort to look after Canadian interests there.

My hon. friend's second contention was that there is no public opinion behind this change. The difficulty with my hon. friend is that he suffers from such an incurable obscurantism on all matters concerning Canada's status, that he is unwilling to see the evidence of public opinion in this country on this matter. I could turn to the press of Canada, and point out that the Canadian newspapers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with the possible exception of the journal so ably edited by my hon. friend, have been discussing this matter for the past year and a half. My hon. friend says that there is no public opinion behind this change. Let me draw attention to one of the leading newspapers of Western Canada about which I have knowledge because the matter has been drawn to my attention, and I am not sure that what I say of this one paper is not equally true of other newspapers in Western Canada. Every one recognizes the influence of the Winnipeg Free Press as an exponent of public opinion in Western Canada, whether one agrees or disagrees with it. From the time this question was raised that paper has been explaining and expounding the question, urging that the time had come when such a representative should be appointed, and stating that it was the duty of Canada to see that such a representative was appointed. Let me instance the leading papers of Ontario, the Toronto Globe, the Mail and Empire, the Star. I am not sure about the Telegram.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Are they your newspapers?

Mr. ROWELL: The Toronto Globe, the Mail and Empire and the Star have all been strongly advocating the appointment of a Canadian representative. I am not sure but that the same is not equally true of the World, although my attention has not been called to the position of that particular paper, while it has been called to the position of the other papers. Although I have not gone through the press with a view of getting at the facts I am quite sure if you examine the newspapers of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific you will find that this question has been discussed for a year and a half at least and that the overwhelming expression of opinion, as voiced through the press, has been strongly in favour of the proposal which the Government has now consummated.

Then my hon. friend says: Public opinion has had no opportunity to register itself. In that respect I should just like to draw my hon. friend's attention as to what has actually been placed before the Parliament of Canada. In the first session of last year the Estimates were laid on the table of the House on the 19th of March. An item was included providing the sum of $50,000 for the Canadian War Mission and representation at Washington. That estimate came up for the consideration of the House on the first day of April.

Mr. FIELDING: A suitable day.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend says "a suitable day" because he has such an idea of Canada, of her position and her future, that he has not yet been able, since these discussions arose, to take the broad gauge view of Canada's position and her place in the Empire. I appeal to my hon. friends: Have faith in your country, have faith in her people, have faith in their ability to look after their country's interests when the need arises.

Mr. BUREAU: Legislate them good.

Mr. ROWELL: It would take a good deal of legislation to make my hon. friend good.

Mr. BUREAU: Don't use your own yardstick in judging others.

Mr. ROWELL: Turning again to the question of public opinion as expressed in this House, this matter came up in this House on the first day of April, and my hon. friend who was then leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) suggested that the matter should stand over for further consideration. On that occasion my hon. friend the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) asked the question—I was in charge of the estimate—whether it was the intention of the Government to appoint a representative at Washington.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Be careful there.

Mr. ROWELL: I will read my hon. friend's words.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not wonder that my hon. friends are getting a little impatient, because they should know that on this matter the Government is carrying with it, without a shadow of doubt, the judgment of the people of Canada. This matter came up on the first of April, and my hon. friends will find a reference to it on page 1074 of Hansard. In answer to the question that it should stand, I stated:

> It is an item that involves an important principle and will stand some discussion.

Then my hon. friend the member for Maisonneuve asked for information on it, although it was agreed that it should stand over. He asked:

> Has there been any correspondence exchanged between this Government and the Imperial authorities with regard to representation at Washington?

Then he goes on to say that the question came up while Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power, and that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the idea of appointing a representative at Washington, but that the matter had dropped.

Mr. LEMIEUX: A representative at Washington?

Mr. ROWELL: What my hon. friend stated was:

> as Commissioner at Washington, having the same status as our Canadian Commissioner at London.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: Then he goes on to say that the proposal did not eventuate, and he asked what the situation then was. Though it was agreed that the matter should stand over, I stated that the item in the Estimates was to make provision:

> For a permanent representative at Washington. The exact form which that representation will take is a matter of consultation between the Prime Minister and the Imperial Government .....The intention is to continue the present Canadian War Mission in existence until the arrangements are made for a permanent representative. The moment those arrangements are concluded the War Mission will go out of existence, but we do not consider it expedient that there should be an interregnum between the end of that Mission and the appointment of a permanent representative. That is the object of inserting this item in the Estimates.

My hon. friend then made a suggestion as to who would be a good representative, and congratulated the Government on the proposal.

That announcement, Mr. Speaker, was passed from one end of Canada to the other through the public press. It also went over to England and was the occasion of certain questions being asked in the British House of Commons. At the request of the then leader of the Opposition, as I have already intimated, it stood over for consideration and discussion, and it was not called up again for five weeks, until the 5th of May. So if any hon. members desired to formulate any views in reference to this matter they were given an abundant opportunity to do so; they were given nearly five weeks in which to consider the matter before the question was again called up. Did hon. members on that occasion protest against the necessity of appointing a representative at Washington? According to my recollection not one member on the other side of the House raised a protest. The matter was before the House all through the spring session, and unless I am mistaken my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) said not a word about it from the beginning to the end of the session. Other members on the Opposition side did, but generally speaking, their words were words of congratulation on the action which the Government proposed.

Lest there should be any misunderstanding, I was asked specifically on that occasion what was involved in the appointment. I think it was the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) who asked whether the Canadian representative at Washington would have diplomatic standing, and whether he would be entitled to conduct negotiations direct with the American Government, and my answer was that I believed that so far as concerned purely Canadian affairs he would conduct negotiations direct with the American Government, and so far as concerned matters that were not purely Canadian, they would be dealt with in co-operation with the British ambassador. That was the effect of my statement made on that occasion, on the 5th of May, 1919. That is the exact effect of the statement made to the House by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) on Monday last. The principle was clearly laid before the House last year, before the Government asked the House to vote the amount in supply. If hon. members did not appreciate its significance, the Government and members on this side of the House are not responsible for that. If hon. members did not take advantage of that occasion to express their views on the matter, if they had any criticism to offer, hon. members on this side of the House are not responsible. The Government had every reason to believe that they had not only the people of Canada behind them, but a united parliament in the action they were about to take.

My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has said: But you should not have done this by Order in Council. When my hon. friend says that we should have submitted something further to the House than we have submitted, I confess I am at a loss to understand just what he has in view. We have passed no Order in Council in connection with this matter. Nothing so far has been done by Order in Council in connection with this matter. The Government's legislative section and authority to take action during the year was the estimate voted last session; the Government's legislative sanction and authority for action now will be the item contained in the Estimates this session. The item last session passed the House, was concurred in and formed part of the Bill of Supply which was passed unanimously and the Government had the full sanction and authority of Parliament for continuing the negotiations in order to reach a conclusion on the matter.

I should add this matter came up again a few days later, on May 8, 1919, when my hon. friend for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), referring to a despatch which appeared in the papers reporting a question asked in the Imperial House of Commons, inquired in reference to the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington, and then suggested that possibly as that representative would only be a commercial representative or agent, it was not necessary to consult the Imperial Government with reference to the appointment. My reply to his question will be found on page 2202 of Hansard of May 8, 1919, and is as follows:

> The Canadian representative at Washington will be very much more than the Canadian agent. His status will be very different from the status of the Canadian representative in Paris or London. Therefore, there is consultation with the Imperial Government with reference to the appointment. I stated the other evening that confidential communications had been held between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Imperial Government in reference to this matter but that these were not yet concluded and that when they were the House would be advised of the whole purport of them.

Could there be any clearer statement made to the House as to the character of the negotiations that were being carried on? And yet not one member on the Opposition side of the House questioned our proceeding with the negotiations along the line I have indicated, and the spring session of 1919 concluded with not a real word of criticism or of protest. Can my hon. friends, after the matter having been submitted to Parliament as I have mentioned, and after their having failed to offer any real opposition to it or any real criticism of the Government for continuing and concluding the negotiations, with any degree of fairness now seek to criticise the action of the Government in doing what the Government then intimated they were about to do?

The Government continued the negotiations and concluded them. At what date, Mr. Speaker, would my hon. friend say that the Government should have brought this matter again before the House and asked the sanction of Parliament? How could we bring it before Parliament any further than we did until an understanding was arrived at? In confidential negotiations of that kind we could not bring down a partial understanding. The negotiations were necessarily confidential between the British Government and this Government, particularly as they affected representation in another country. It would have been just as reasonable if my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) had been criticised in 1911 and told: "You should not have concluded an agreement at Washington until you first submitted your proposals to the House and had the sanction of Parliament." My hon. friend did what was the reasonable thing to do if the Government of the day was prepared to take the responsibility for it. He went ahead and concluded the agreement and then submitted it to Parliament, as that agreement had to be submitted for it affected the changes in the tariff. That is exactly what the Government did in this case, but they did more—they brought the matter down a year ago while the negotiations were in the early stages and laid the principle of it before the House, they took a vote of the House in respect to it, and there being no opposition they had the mandate of the House to go on with the negotiations.

The Government have now concluded an understanding embodied in the statement made to the House by the Acting Prime Minister, and the House will be asked to give its legislative sanction to that understanding when it is asked to vote the item in Supply which will come up in due course.

What arrangement could be fairer? How could the Government take the House more fully into its confidence than it has done in a matter of this kind? I submit that my hon. friend's criticism is wholly beside the mark and does not touch this grave and important step in Canadian constitutional development.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend must realize, if he is a student of constitutional history, that the conduct of foreign affairs is the special prerogative of the Crown; and when I use the word Crown, I am using it in the sense in which it is used under our constitution: the Crown advised by its constitutional advisers. It is the duty of the Government to carry on these negotiations and to reach a conclusion on them, and there is no obligation to consult the House before they reach a conclusion; in fact, the conduct of foreign relations would, I submit, be impossible, if the Government went further than they have done in the present case. They laid the principle before Parliament; they had parliamentary approval of it; they went on and negotiated an understanding; they have informed Parliament of the nature of that understanding; they have submitted an estimate to the House in order that Supply may be voted to maintain and support the representative thus established.

The Government has followed true constitutional practice and precedent in the course it has taken. My hon. friend's criticism of the Government's course, I submit, is unfortunate in this respect: it may give rise to the impression that there is a real difference of opinion among Canadian people upon this question. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is any real difference of opinion in Canada upon this question. I believe that the overwhelming mass of our people are in favour of the proposal and look upon the step taken by the Government as one distinctly in the interests of Canada, and, I believe, also in the interests of the British Empire. It means that Canadian affairs at Washington, when the representative is appointed, will be conducted by a Canadian direct with the American Government. And I can only repeat that I am sure that is a step that our people desire to have taken. We cannot always remain in a dependent position having our affairs looked after and managed by other people.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend says, "Hear hear." I hope he will say "Hear, hear" with equal emphasis when I say,—that we are not going to change our settled allegiance to the King and cut the tie that binds us to the Mother Country in order to obtain the management of our own affairs.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: We are going to do two things—manage our own affairs and maintain the unity of the British Empire. We believe that we are entitled to manage our own purely Canadian affairs within the British Empire, and that is what this policy implies and involves. In so far as it does involve a constitutional departure—and I agree with my hon. friend that it does involve a constitutional departure—it is the logical and inevitable development of what has been taking place in this country for the past five, ten, twenty, thirty years; it is the logical and inevitable development of the work of our soldiers overseas, of our status under the Peace Treaty, and of the present position of Canada within the British Empire and in the world.

In the course the Government has taken, the Government are carrying out not only the judgment of Parliament but the judgment of the people of Canada having regard to Canada's status and vital interests. For, whatever my hon. friend may say to the contrary, Canada is to-day associated with the Mother Country and the other Dominions in a great League of Nations of equal status under a common sovereign—the strongest and most influential factor for the preservation of the world's peace that exists to-day. And it is of vital moment that good relations should be preserved between the British Empire as a whole and the United States, the other great branch of the Anglo-Saxon race. Good relations between these two countries are not only important so far as they affect Canada and the Mother Country, they are important so far as they affect the future peace of the world. There is no better way to maintain a good understanding than by being able to meet men face to face, to talk over problems in which you are both interested, and to supply full information, for the majority of international, as well as personal, misunderstandings, spring from a lack of knowledge and a lack of appreciation of the viewpoint of the other. I believe that a Canadian representative in Washington, meeting and talking with representatives of the American Government and dealing with problems common to both, will make for strengthening the good relations that now exist between the two countries, will make not only for their maintenance in the future, but also help to remove some of the misunderstandings that from time to time arise between some people in the United States and some people in the Mother Country. The whole effect should be to strengthen and bind together nations having so much in common in their history, in their traditions, in their ideals and in their common love of democratic government and free institutions.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), namely, that all the papers concerning this change should be brought before Parliament and that the question should be fully discussed before a final decision is taken. My hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has certainly not given all the details that are necessary to enlighten the House as to the meaning of the change that is being made. We are just as much at sea as ever after the speech delivered by my hon. friend. We were told in the official statement that was given to the House a few days ago that this change is practically no change at all. Here are the words of the statement:

> This new arrangement will not denote any departure either on the part of the British Government or of the Canadian Government from the principle of the diplomatic unity of the British Empire.

Yet, we are told that this appointment to Washington involves a very important change—the President of the Privy Council having used the words "very important departure." The language is certainly ambiguous, as all diplomatic language is, and I think I am within the mark when I say there are not five members of this House who really know the meaning of the change that is being made by this proposal.

My hon. friend says that Parliament was consulted last year when an estimate was voted for a certain amount, and that my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) at that time approved of the step. The very few words uttered by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve indicate that he understood, as we all did at the time, that the proposal was to appoint a trade commissioner at Washington. The President of the Privy Council at that time said that it was to continue the work done by the trade commission which had been in Washington during the war, and my hon. friend from Maisonneuve said that it was even more important to have a commissioner in Washington than in Paris or even in London. Will the President of the Privy Council say that it is only a trade commissioner that is going to be appointed to Washington?

Mr. ROWELL: I stated then clearly that it was a great deal more. If my hon. friend will turn it up in Hansard he will see it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But my hon. friend will admit that it was understood by the House at that time that the work of the representative was to continue the operations of the trade commission in Washington. Surely the voting of that sum did not mean that Parliament had decided on such an important question as this. As far as I am concerned, I will readily admit anything that looks like national self-assertion, anything which advances Canada along the road of nationhood, appeals to me. As General Smuts said last year, in a figurative way; "The British Empire ended in July or August, 1914," that is, that all the countries under the British flag are sister nations, the word "Empire" meaning a dominant state with subordinate states. But we must know exactly where we are going, because the body that is responsible to the Canadian people for any such important step as this is the Canadian Parliament and not the committee of the Privy Council. If we are to accept the words of the official statement that was made to the House this may be a very important change although later on it is said there has been no constitutional departure. This statement reads:

> Accordingly, it has been agreed that His Majesty, on advice of his Canadian ministers, shall appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary who will have charge of Canadian affairs and will at all times be the ordinary channel of communication with the United States Government in matters of purely Canadian concern, acting upon instructions from and reporting direct to the Canadian Government. In the absence of the Ambassador the Canadian minister will take charge of the whole Embassy and of the representation of Imperial as well as Canadian interests. He will be accredited by His Majesty to the President with the necessary powers for the purpose.

There is no better constitutional authority than Professor Keith and here is what I read in his work "Responsible Government in the Dominions," page 1133 volume 3:

> It would be a completely different thing to approve direct communications on political matters or the direct negotiation of treaties proper, and it would clearly be in theory a termination of the existing unity of the Empire, and the fundamental alteration of its constitution.

The same author in his recent work "Imperial Unity and the Dominions" speaks as follows, page 297:

It would be hopelessly expensive for any Dominion to duplicate the system of consuls, and even if the men were appointed they could not receive any consular status, as the right to appoint consular officers is one which appertains only, and is accorded in treaties solely, to the sovereign power in the Empire. If it were desired to give them consular status, this could indeed be done by securing their appointment by the Crown as His Majesty's consuls for Canada, or whatever other Dominion was concerned, but such an appointment would mean that the holders of office were appointed on the advice of the Imperial Government, and would have to be subjected to the control of the Imperial Government, since that Government would be responsible for them vis-à-vis the foreign Government, as it is not now responsible for mere commercial agents.

The same result can be attained more effectively and easily and much more cheaply, by the use of British consuls by the Dominions, who can pay if necessary any extra clerical expense caused by their employment. The same consideration, it may be added, applies to the representation of the Dominions by diplomatic officers in the foreign capitals: These officers could not, as long as the Empire is constituted as at present, be other than appointees of the Crown on the authority of the Imperial Government.

Mr. Curtis, who is a great Imperialist, in his important book, "The Problem of the Commonwealth" takes the same position, and says:

For, when trying to protect their subjects against disorder, the British Government would be obliged to say that Canadians were no longer included in that description. It would have to declare that Canadians had ceased to be British subjects, and the Canadian Government would have to admit that declaration. These consequences are such as no human ingenuity can change or evade. For all British subjects control of their foreign relations must rest in the hands of one Government only. Any section of British subjects who transfer that final authority to a government special to themselves and different from the government which decides those issues for other British subjects, in doing so renounce their status as such. To reconcile a common citizenship with allegiance to two different states is no more possible than to construct a triangle of which two sides are together less than the third.

This method, therefore, of completing the achievement of responsible government by the Dominions, so much in harmony with the process already followed, and so simple in its inception that it needs but a few strokes of the pen, is one which involves the least moderate change in the condition not only of the Dominion itself, but of all its citizens. It leads not merely to reform but straight to disruption of the Commonwealth—to consequences of the most revolutionary kind; and that, no doubt, is the principal reason why no Dominion Government has ever attempted to follow it. To argue whether they should follow it or not is beside the purpose of this inquiry. The people of the Dominions must settle that for themselves. Here we are simply concerned to discover the most moderate reform which will give them the same responsibility for their foreign affairs as the people of Britain, and to show that this particular method, though simple in appearance, involves revolution and not reform is enough for that purpose.

Mr. DEVLIN: On what page is that to be found?

Mr. LAPOINTE: At page 130. Mr. Curtis, recognizing the natural desire on the part of citizens of the Dominion to have a voice in the control of their own affairs, even foreign affairs, indicates only two methods of arriving at that solution. He says, first you must have either an Imperial Council, or an Imperial Cabinet, composed of ministers of the different Dominions as well as of the Mother Country. The other solution he indicates is an Imperial Parliament—all the apostles of Imperial Federation have advocated the same scheme—and he says it is the only solution for the Dominions, if they want to have a voice in foreign affairs. The only other alternative is independence, and of course he deprecates this mode of arriving at a solution of the question. Now if men, able men, students of constitutional affairs, men who desire a solution of the constitutional relations between the Mother Country and the various parts of the Empire, state that the only way for the Dominions to have a voice in their foreign affairs—if they do not desire independence—is the establishment of an Imperial Parliament which will have the control of all those representations in the foreign country, I say that such a step as the one which has been adopted should have been submitted to Parliament for full discussion before it was entered into. That is specially the case when we have been told for the last two years that immediately after the war an Imperial Conference would be called for the purpose of considering, studying and settling all the constitutional changes which are desirable in the relations between the Mother Country and the various Dominions of the Empire. Why did not the Government wait until this conference had been held before taking a step that may be very important, because when this conference takes place some people may come and say: Here is an accomplished fact; the Dominions have already a voice in their foreign affairs; and that being so they must agree to some Parliament or council or cabinet to which those diplomatic representatives shall be responsible.

Further, Mr. Speaker, it is said that the Canadian representative at Washington will automatically replace the British Ambassador when he is absent. If that representative is appointed by us, surely we will be responsible for his actions. Will the people of Canada be responsible for all the actions of that representative when he acts in the capacity of the British Ambassador in the absence of the regular ambassador? Another question I wish to ask is this: If the Canadian representative acts as British Ambassador surely the British Parliament or the British Government will have something to say in the selection of that representative, and he cannot be selected or appointed on the recommendation of the Canadian Government only? I could not believe that the British Government would agree to be represented by, and held responsible for the actions of, a man in the selection of whom they would have no voice whatever. Again I say Parliament should be given all particulars, all details about this appointment: Upon what conditions the British Government have agreed to the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington? What is the real status of that officer? To what extent will the Canadian people be held responsible for his actions when he acts as British Ambassador? To what extent will the Imperial Government or Parliament have responsibility for the appointment of that officer? Then, and then only, shall we be able to discuss the question, and then only shall the Canadian people be in a position to decide as to the merit or the demerit of the constitutional change effected by this policy.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): It is sometimes said of a policy that it is damned by faint praise. I think it may be said of this proposal to appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington, that hon. gentlemen opposite have praised it by very faint condemnation.

My hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) has referred to certain constitutional authorities and has pointed out the grave apprehensions entertained by those authorities if such a course should be pursued. I do not propose at this moment to enter into the question of the future constitutional relations of the Empire. As my hon. friend has said, that subject will be discussed at a great constitutional conference, not called, I assume, this year, but perhaps next year; and I hope at that conference both sides of this House, whatever party may be in power, will be represented. I believe that as foreign relations in the United Kingdom are lifted beyond the petty controversy of party politics, so the relations of Canada to our Empire may be lifted beyond the petty controversy of party politics in this country. As I have already said in this House, if I should be Prime Minister of Canada when that conference is called, I should certainly invite hon. gentlemen on the other side to participate with us in the discussions which will take place. I am not going to enter into that question now; I have just this to say: that he would be a bold man who would undertake to set forth the precise lines upon which constitutional changes in the future will be worked out and upon which the constitutional relations of the different nations of the Empire to each other and to the Mother Country will be based in the future. On the other hand, I think he would be a timid man who is not confident that the problem is not insoluble and that those relations will be worked out in such a way as to give to every nation of the Empire its adequate voice and place within the Britannic commonwealth.

I should like to point out to my hon. friend that when in days gone by, forty or fifty years ago, the question was raised of handing over to the Canadian people and to the Canadian legislature the control of their public domain, the control of their fiscal policy, the control of all their domestic affairs, the same grave apprehensions were expressed as to the effect which those just and merited concessions would have upon the solidarity of the Empire. My hon. friend need have no apprehensions as to the effect of this proposal. What does it amount to, after all? It amounts to this and only this: that a country like Canada, with eight and a half to nine millions of people, bordering the great republic to the south for four thousand miles and far more intimately associated with that country than with any other country outside the British Empire, should have its representative in the Embassy at Washington which represents the whole Empire. Is there anything startling or novel in that? Is there any reason why it should not be carried out? Does my hon. friend know what the Government did of which he was a supporter? He raises grave constitutional difficulties as to who shall appoint this minister and who shall be responsible for him. Does he know that the Government which was in power before 1911 concluded a treaty with the United States under which three Canadians were appointed to act with three men appointed by the United States Government on an International Joint Committee to deal with the matters covered by that treaty? What are these men but ambassadors, in a sense—ambassadors charged also, it is true, with the duty of settling differences between the two countries not only by judicial determination but also by report and recommendation? When my hon. friend the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) went to Washington in 1911, what was his position, to all intents and purposes? He was an ambassador sent on behalf of Canada to the United States for the purpose of negotiating a treaty. If that is good constitutional practice for three, four or five months, where do you find any violation of the constitution in appointing a permanent representative to do the same thing and to deal with matters of precisely the same or more varied character?

My hon. friends on the other side seem to be strangely alarmed about this proposal. The hon. member (Mr. Lapointe) says that he is very happy to support any assertion of the dignity and status of the Canadian people, or words to that effect. He does not seem to be very happy in his support of the proposal this evening. I hope that his mind will be reassured after this debate has taken place and that he will come to a more illuminating and happier view of the proposal which has been placed before the country.

The hon. gentleman is strangely alarmed as to the terrible consequences which will ensue to this country if the Canadian minister at Washington in the absence of the British Ambassador should venture to carry on negotiations with the United States Government, and he wants to know to what extent the people of this country will be responsible. They will be responsible to precisely the same extent as if the British Ambassador himself had carried on the negotiations; no more and no less. I should have thought that that answer would have occurred to my hon. friend before he propounded that rather curious question.

Well, let us look a little at some of the observations which the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has made. In the first place, in connection with his demand that all the correspondence and Orders in Council should be laid on the table of the House, I should like to say just this: the correspondence has been conducted on the one hand with the Government of the United Kingdom and on the other hand with the Government of the United States. The correspondence does not tell the whole story, because there have been many oral interviews in which the subject has been discussed on many occasions during the past three years. I had the correspondence examined very carefully; I myself examined it carefully. I must say to my hon. friends on the other side of the House that in my judgment it cannot be brought down with any advantage to the public interest,—more than that, without detriment to the public interest. The negotiations with the Mother Country were naturally of an exceedingly confidential character. That is equally true—and I will emphasize this fact—with regard to the negotiations with the Government of the United States. My hon. friends on the other side are well aware, no doubt, that no country has the right to demand that any other country shall receive its minister. Every country grants that only in response to a request, and it is not obliged to grant any such request. We must accordingly be scrupulously careful to respect their confidences. Therefore, while the consultations with the British Government were of a highly confidential nature, whether they were written or oral, so on the other hand, the consultations and the correspondence with the Government of the United States are confidential to an even greater degree and cannot be disclosed in this House. All that has been arranged so far, with the exception of some minor details, perhaps not yet fully consummated, has been placed before the House in the statement read by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) just a week ago to-day, I believe.

As regards taking the initiative in this matter, I accept, at once and with the greatest possible grace, the fullest responsibility for the part that I have taken. It would make no difference whether I accepted the responsibility or not, that responsibility would rest upon me. I began these negotiations with the Government of the United Kingdom more than three years ago by oral discussion with the then Secretary of State for the Colonies and with the then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The matter rested for a time, and then it was taken up again in the autumn of 1917; but on account of war conditions and by reason of the enormous pressure of business affairs between the two countries, the conclusion was then reached that the purpose for the time being during the war would be better served by the appointment of a Canadian War Mission. That War Mission was appointed, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has borne worthy and true testimony to the fact that members of that Mission did splendid, unselfish, patriotic service for the country which they represented. Later on, and after the War Mission had about completed its work, the subject was further discussed. While I was abroad last year it was discussed, not only with members of the British Government, but with some members of the other Dominions of the Empire, notably with the Prime Minister of Australia. The matter stood then until October last when it was taken up in a more systematic form. Negotiations have been carried on ever since, and they have resulted in the announcement which was made in this House just one week ago and which has been received with great favour, not only in this country but in the United States. What reasons are there for appointing a Canadian representative at Washington? I need only emphasize them, as the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell) has dwelt upon this phase of the argument.

Let me pay a tribute to every British Ambassador with whom I have been associated as Prime Minister, Lord Bryce, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, Lord Reading. I found every one of them eager and anxious to do everything within his power to maintain the interests of this country; but Lord Bryce himself said to me that three-quarters of the work transacted by the Embassy at Washington had relation to the interests of Canada. We all know perfectly well that the staff of the British Embassy at Washington was never selected, so far as we could observe, with any special purpose of placing thereon persons specially familiar with the ideals of the people of this country and with conditions in Canada. I felt many a time during the past nine years that we should have a representative at Washington, and I am confident that such was the view of Sir Wilfrid Laurier during the latter years of his tenure of office as Prime Minister. I should greatly doubt whether his proposal merely suggested the appointment of a commercial agent at Washington. Why should you appoint a commercial agent at Washington?

Mr. FIELDING: The Prime Minister says "his proposal." What proposal does he refer to? Where does he find the evidence of such a proposal?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) alluded last year to a proposal.

Mr. FIELDING: Not to any proposal. The hon. member for Maisonneuve said that he understood it was the desire of Sir Wilfrid Laurier to make an appointment, but I am free to say that the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier never made any proposal on the subject.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know that he never made any definite proposal. I was speaking of proposal in another sense. If my hon. friend is sensitive as regards the word "proposal," I will substitute "idea" or "thought," if he finds fault with my language. I know perfectly well that his idea was not put into execution, but I am certain that he had some such idea in his mind and that he did not intend to send a commercial agent to Washington. Why should he send a commercial agent to Washington? If he wanted to send a commercial agent to the United States, he would send him to some of the great commercial centres, such as New York or Chicago. He surely would not send a commercial agent to Washington, because a commercial agent would be practically useless there.

I have spoken of the tremendous interests of Canada at Washington and of the great volume of work in the Embassy relating to the interests of this country. I have spoken also of the absence of any person distinctly Canadian in his ideals or knowledge who might have afforded necessary assistance in dealing with these questions. The condition as it existed before the war in respect of relations between the United States and Canada will continue in the future, and I anticipate great advantages from the proposal which the Government have announced.

Criticism has been made that we should have come to Parliament with these negotiations. We could not come to Parliament with these negotiations because they were of a highly confidential character from first to last. Every gentleman familiar with constitutional procedure should know that in respect of such matters it is absolutely essential that the Government shall take the initiative and that the result of any proposal which they may formulate shall be announced to Parliament afterwards. I should say to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that when we announced last year that we proposed to send a diplomatic representative to Washington, we said about everything that could be said on the subject. That involved everything because the practice of diplomacy is an ancient one and is governed by a great body of rules, conventions and understandings that have grown up, so that the sending of a diplomatic agent is perfectly intelligible to any one who cares to study the subject. Further than that, the whole matter under British constitutional practice has always been regarded as peculiarly within the sphere of the prerogative of the Crown, and that means, under our constitutional practice, within the discretion of the executive government. Instead of the view that this infringes in some way upon the rights and privileges of this House, I should like to point out to the hon. member for Quebec East, who is a constitutional student, that the exercise of such a prerogative in this way gives to the House of Commons a greater control of the whole question than it could get if legislation were introduced. Let me read to him the words of a great constitutional authority on that subject. Dicey, than whom no man stands higher in the discussion of constitutional questions, points out that:

> The survival of the prerogative, conferring as it does wide discretionary power on the Cabinet involves a consequence which constantly escapes attention. It immensely increases the authority of the House of Commons, and ultimately of the constituencies by which that House is returned. Ministers must in the exercise of all discretionary power inevitably obey the predominant authority in the State.

As the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has said, the Cabinet is only a committee of the House of Commons, and it can continue to act as such only as long as it has the support of a majority of that House. Then Dicey continues:

> Now that the House of Commons has become by far the most important part of the sovereign body, the ministry in all matters of discretion carry out, or tend to carry out, the will of the House. When, however, the Cabinet cannot act except by means of legislation other considerations come into play.

In the Mother Country the power of the House of Lords is sometimes interposed. In this country we sometimes find our benevolent efforts frustrated by the action of another body. A very good example which is given by Dicey is this: During Queen Victoria's reign the House of Commons passed a Bill for the abolition of purchase in the army. The Bill was rejected by the Lords. The object, however, was achieved by Royal Warrant under the prerogative. Dicey sums it up in this way:

> The prerogatives of the Crown have become the privileges of the people.

Now every one who is at all familiar with constitutional questions knows that the Sovereign has prerogatives in respect to foreign relations. Those prerogatives must be exercised upon the advice of the Sovereign's advisers. When, therefore, we undertook to deal with this matter we dealt with it as advisers of the Crown by confidential communication. When those communications had eventually reached an understanding, when matters were ripe both in the United Kingdom and in the United States for an announcement to be made to this Parliament, the announcement was made. So the Government accepts, as, of course it must accept, full responsibility for the course which it has taken, and that responsibility is one which we shall bear very lightly, because we believe that the time has long since been ripe when this great and growing nation should have its own direct representative at Washington. Instead of cavilling at the idea that a Canadian Minister sitting at Washington should represent the whole British Empire when the ambassador is absent, I am inclined to think that the people of Canada will be proud and glad that so important a duty and responsibility rest upon a Canadian sent to Washington by the Government of Canada.

Further than that, the intimate association between the people of the United States and Canada has led to a very perfect understanding between the peoples of the two countries. Perhaps there are no two nations in the world between whose peoples a more perfect comprehension exists at the present time than that which does exist between the people of Canada and the people of the United States. Thus, I venture to think, as my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) has well said, that this proposal to have a Canadian at Washington acting, not in opposition to, but in co-operation with the British ambassador, will tend not only to the good of this country but to a more perfect understanding and better relations between the Empire of which we form a part and the great republic of our kinsmen to the south.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first opportunity I have had in this House of addressing my right honourable friend as Prime Minister may I avail myself of the occasion to say that I am pleased to see my right honourable friend so restored in health as to be able again to resume the very onerous duties of his high position.

I am sure it will come somewhat as a surprise to the people of this Dominion when, on reading the debates of this House to-morrow, they discover that in this new and far-reaching step which the Government is about to take, if indeed, it has not already been taken, the only word the Government has to give to the people of Canada to all intents and purposes is:—this is not a matter on which we can give you any information one way or the other; this is not a matter on which you are entitled to know anything one way or the other; it is a matter so secret that the Government itself must deal and settle it without any knowledge on the part of the people or of the people's representatives in Parliament. That is the main point in the motion which is before the House this evening. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), have dwelt at considerable length on the reasons why Canada should have a permanent representative at Washington. There is nothing in the motion before the House to-night referring to the wisdom or unwisdom of having a permanent representative at Washington. My hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in introducing this resolution took particular care to point out to the House that that was a question which might well be discussed at another time or upon another occasion; that what he wished to do by this resolution was to bring concretely before this House and the country the question of the supremacy of Parliament or the autocracy of the Cabinet. That is all that is involved in the resolution before the House. Let me read the resolution:

> This House desires to record its opinion that before any arrangement respecting the permanent representation of Canada at Washington is consummated, the House should be fully informed concerning the negotiations between the Canadian, Imperial, and United States Governments, and all correspondence and Orders in Council on the subject should be submitted to the House.

Is there an hon. member of this House representing a constituency in this country who will say that that is not what his own constituents demand of him? I, for my part, cannot see how any member of this House can go before his constituents or before the people of this country and say he is prepared, in regard to any transaction, I do not care how small or how great, to defend any action of a ministry which cannot be openly disclosed before the people's representatives in this House.

When, a week ago, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), at that time the Acting Prime Minister, announced in the House the matter which we are discussing this evening, I asked my right hon. friend if he would at a very early date lay on the table of the House all the correspondence relating to this matter, and he replied in these words:

> I would merely say that all the available papers in connection with the negotiations will be brought down as quickly as possible and presented to the House.

That was the promise given to us a week ago, that all the available papers in connection with the matter would be brought down as quickly as possible and presented to the House. My right hon. friend at that time evidently anticipated that it was going to be possible to give the representatives of the people in Parliament at least some information in regard to this far-reaching matter. But to-night the Prime Minister says to us: I have had all the correspondence carefully gone over, I have examined the papers myself, and hon. members of the House of Commons shall not see one of them. That is what we are now told, that the file has been gone through by the Prime Minister himself, and that having been looked through, the people's representatives in Parliament are not to have any access to the papers or any of the correspondence. Well, Sir, all I can say is, it is a mighty bad beginning in a new departure if our foreign policy,—because this is a venture in foreign policy,—is to be bound up with secrecy from the start. We are driving right into the very vortex that created the whole situation in Europe, going against the very thing which the allied nations have been urging so strongly, namely —that diplomacy should not be secret but that it should be open and above board. Why, Sir, if in a matter which concerns the relations between the different parts of the Empire, between different nations, we start off by informing the people's representatives in Parliament that they cannot be told one word in regard to the conditions which have brought about such an all-important change, what may we expect as the result of such diplomacy?

Now, my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) said that this matter had been discussed in this country back and forth, and that there was no doubt about the voice of the press in regard to it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He spoke particularly of one paper, the Winnipeg

Free Press, and he said that we would all recognize that paper as the exponent of public opinion in the Middle West. Well, I have in my hand the latest editorial on this very subject in the Winnipeg Free Press, and I will read it to my hon. friend, and to the House, because apparently while the President of the Privy Council is not willing to listen to anything that may be said by the people's representatives here, he attaches great importance to the press generally, and to this organ in particular. What the Winnipeg Free Press says in its editorial is what my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has said in his motion. Under the heading, "Our Minister at Washington," the Winnipeg Free Press of May 12th has the following:

> The appointment of a Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington is an interesting innovation about which it will be possible to comment intelligently when more information is available than was supplied in the very guarded statement read to the House of Commons on Monday by Sir George Foster.

And that is all the information we have.

> Mr. King, the Opposition leader, expressed the view that before the arrangement—whatever it might prove to be—was made, Parliament should have been given the opportunity to discuss and consider it. However this may be, it is beyond dispute that it will be the duty of Parliament to submit the arrangement to very keen scrutiny to make sure that it is all that is being claimed for it. It will be within the right of Parliament to object, if it does not approve of what is being done; and any such recorded objection would bring the whole thing to the ground.
> Meanwhile the need is for full and explicit information.

Does the hon. President of the Privy Council hear that statement?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is exactly what my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), is asking, that before this matter is consummated we get full and explicit information.

> It is intimated that our Canadian minister will deal with all matters arising between Canada and the United States which are exclusively Canadian in character; the Imperial ambassador will participate in the negotiations only when Imperial interests are involved. Very well; but what happens if a disagreement should arise—which might easily happen—

Those are questions which any hon. gentleman sitting on the other side might reply to later in the evening, so that the country may get light on this subject as speedily as possible.

> —between the Canadian minister and the British ambassador as to whether a question is, or is not, exclusively Canadian? Even in the exclusively Canadian matters about which there is no dispute, will the Canadian minister carry negotiations through to the end; or will it be necessary, in the final resort, to call in the British minister to do the actual signing?
> Our representative is to be known as a minister. Will he be accepted as a minister by the State Department at Washington? Will he be a member of the diplomatic corps, having all the rights, powers, immunities and privileges enjoyed by the ministers of all other countries represented at Washington? Will he be the equal in diplomatic statute of, let us say, the minister from Venezuela? Or will his position at Washington be actually undefined with a mere courtesy status? Parliament and the country will need conclusive answer to these and similar questions; and not until this information is supplied will it be possible to say whether this is a step forward or backward.
> It is asserted in certain quarters that this marks an enlargement of Canadian powers and that it is another step forward on the road to nationhood. The Government at Ottawa no doubt believes that this will be the effect of the innovation. But we regard with some trepidation formal arrangements entered into three years after the adoption of a declared policy of equality of status between all the British nations by which it is possible that Canada may accept ratify, and confirm a status of admitted diplomatic inferiority, formally putting her name to documents that confirm this subordination. If the Canadian minister at Washington is only a camouflaged chief clerk or a commissiner it would be better to have no minister there.

Those are not the words of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, they are the words of the Winnipeg Free Press, which my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council so highly values.

Mr. MURPHY: A Government authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The article continues:

> If his position there is by courtesy, if Canada cannot endow her representative with all the powers which other ministers enjoy, then Canada should send no one to Washington until she can vest him with the true prerogatives of office.
> Information upon these extremely important points is lacking; until it is forthcoming any conclusive judgment upon the wisdom or otherwise of the Government's action is not possible. But the matter is of great importance and Parliament should regard it as one of its prime duties to see that the matter is fully discussed from all angles and in the light of full knowledge.

It is unnecessary to point out, Mr. Speaker, that that is exactly what we on this side of the House are asking should be done. In this resolution we are asking that Parliament should be informed in as much detail as possible in regard to this transaction before it is finally consummated.

But we have not only the views of our Canadian press. Since this announcement was made, there has been time for word to come from other parts of the Empire, and what do we find? In Great Britain, in Australia and in the other Dominions we find expressions of opinion questioning the wisdom of this arrangement without any light or information upon it. Let me read from another leading daily, an organ of the present Government—the Montreal Star. That paper has a well known correspondent in England whose cables, published under the name of "Windermere," are read with interest in all parts of this country. And I should mention to the House that those who know "Windermere" know him to be a member of the British House of Commons. If one looks at the Montreal Star of May 12, one will find a despatch relating to the announcement which was made in this House on this subject and to a similar announcement made in the British House on the evening of the same day. That despatch was cabled by "Windermere." Omitting a few preliminary remarks, it says:

There is, nevertheless, widespread sympathy among Parliamentarians—

Those are the members of the British Parliament.

—with the view recorded from Ottawa that so momentous a departure might well have been calmly and fully debated in Parliament, so that a momentous departure setting a precedent for a revolution in the whole machinery of British diplomacy in all countries could have been reviewed in all its aspects before the change was made. As it is, the change seems to the public as having been rushed.

Then referring to the Australian view "Windermere" says:

An Australian of high rank whom I consulted assures me that Australia is now certain to demand that she also have full rank with an Australian minister at Washington. New Zealand and South Africa should, he declared, follow suit, with the result that ultimately, not alone Washington, but every other great foreign capital, and certainly Paris, Rome, Berlin, Petrograd, and Tokio, will have its circle of fully accredited British Empire ministers among whom the British Ambassador will be first, perhaps, but first among equals. He added: "If the Canadian minister at Washington is to be the fully authorized British Ambassador in the absence of the British representative, we assume that the Australian minister will be singled out for the same distinction in some equally important European capital, or say, Japan.

"You Canadians claim that this is the national prayer and, indeed, the inevitable sequel to Canada's new natioinal status as accorded at the Peace Conference. Very well! we as Australians throw up our hats with you, but don't run away with the notion that you have not perhaps unwittingly taken on far-reaching new responsibilities which every Dominion within the Empire will wish to take too, and which carries the seed of vital changes in the whole structure of an Empire.

"There was some cheering in the British Commons when Bonar Law announced the change. Most English public men welcome every sign of increasing power and influence of England's younger partners overseas, but I can quite understand the feeling of many longsighted Englishmen and perhaps some Australians that before making this plunge into the unknown at the bidding of the Canadian ministers, who, perhaps, only half appreciate its ultimate significance, it would have been wiser to discuss the whole subject round the friendly family table of the Imperial Conference. We could have all had our say then."

Will any one, viewing the affairs of the British Empire from the point of view from which they are likely to be regarded by representatives of the British Isles and of the different Dominions, find anything unreasonable in a request of that kind? If our action in failing to discuss this matter openly and freely is going to create some unrest in Australia, South Africa and New Zealand, and some concern in England, surely we are not helping to bring about the closer relations between the different parts of the British Empire which it ought to be the object of every free Parliament within the Empire to bring about. There are very strong reasons why a transaction that is fraught with so many possibilities should not have been finally consummated until Parliament had had a full opportunity to discuss it in all its bearings.

When hon. members have referred to the debates that have taken place in this House they have spoken about a permanent representative at Washington. That is a subject upon which we might all be very much united, and it might well be that there might be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of having a permanent representative at Washington. If there were differences of opinion, surely it would be worth while having those differences discussed in Parliament and the case considered upon its merits. But what the Government have consummated in this transaction is something far different from a proposal to establish a permanent representative of Canada at Washington. It is not only a permanent representative that is proposed, but a Minister Plenipotentiary is to be appointed who, to all intents and purposes, is to be the British Ambassador at Washington during the time when the British Ambassador may be away from the country or absent from duty. No one can say how long a time that will be; no one can say what questions will come up while the Canadian plenipotentiary is acting as British Ambassador at Washington. Is there any one here who believes that a step of that kind is going to be free from all kinds of possible danger? What is it that has brought about the desire to have our own representative at Washington? It is that time and again we have taken exception to what British diplomatists at Washington have done on our behalf. Is our representative likely to be so perfect that he will always satisfy British opinion? Why not let British diplomatists manage British affairs and let us manage our own affairs? Then we will not get into those mix-ups and troubles which on occasions have given reason to doubt the wisdom of British diplomatists voicing Canadian interests in matters between the United States and ourselves. Is it to be supposed that the time will never come when the people of Great Britain will have reason to feel that their interests as watched by the Canadian plenipotentiary acting as British Ambassador have not been guarded in as satisfactory a way as they could have wished?

There are two extreme views that may be taken in regard to a matter of this kind. One is that the affairs of Canada should be managed exclusively by the British Embassy; the other that the Canadian representative should manage the British Embassy, for part of the time as is here proposed. What seems to be the more rational course is the middle one, that in matters between Canada and other countries Canada should manage her own affairs, and that in matters between Great Britain and other countries, Great Britain should manage her own affairs, always when necessary with co-operation and conference between the two. At the present time, when the British Ambassador is absent the British charge d'affaires is responsible for the business of the Embassy. My right hon. friend had something to say about responsibility. Let us go into this matter a little. Sometimes it is necessary to recall an ambassador. Let us assume that the British minister is away and that it happens that the Canadian plenipotentiary has been acting when, perchance, a mistake is made. Whom are the British Government going to recall? Are they going to recall the Canadian minister at Washington? They cannot do that; he does not belong there; he belongs here. Are they going to recall the British Ambassador? He is not responsible; he has had nothing to do with the transaction. These are complications which suggest themselves. Are these things not worth considering; are they of no concern to the future of the British Empire? They surely ought to be considered here as being matters intimately bound up with our relations with the Mother Country. We should have co-operative relations, relations by conference and discussion, but when it comes to so vital a matter as that of taking on the responsibilities that must come from the larger and vast considerations involved in this departure as proposed, I do not believe that, proud as the Canadian people are of their status as a nation, they would wish to have any representative of this country go to Washington and deal with questions that affect all parts of the British Empire in their relations with the United States, questions which may relate to the different countries of Europe, questions which may grow out of conflicting matters that come to the fore in connection with the League of Nations, of which the United States is as yet not a member and may not be a member for some time to come.

I do not believe the Canadian people wish to launch too deep into experiments in foreign policy at the present time. All matters of government, and particularly matters affecting diplomatic relations, are matters of constitutional evolution. If we are going to advance, by all means let us proceed along the line of evolution; but let us take one step at a time. Do not let us begin with the extreme step that is being taken in this arrangement without any reference to the views of the representatives of the people. I submit to my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) that at this of all times it would have been fitting and in accordance with the rights of this Parliament, as it was owing to the supremacy of parliament and its position as a great deliberative assembly, before concluding anything, to have brought before this House a resolution expressing the opinion of the Government that Canada should be represented at Washington by a Minister Plenipotentiary and to have given hon. members an opportunity of deciding upon that question here. If the Government wished to go a step further and to say they desired that the Canadian minister plenipotentiary should be also the British Ambassador at Washington, for the time being, they might well have presented that view also in the form of a resolution and have given us an opportunity of discussing it here. That would not be ignoring Parliament, that would be leaving it to the Canadian people through their representatives to say what they wished to have done, but the Government has not done that; the Government has brought forward no resolution. It has done all of its own volition.

The President of the Privy Council says: "We will give you a chance when it comes to voting the money." That is about the only time this Government ever comes to Parliament in regard to anything. We have had one measure after another during this session in regard to which we have been told: "No, the transaction is already settled, an Order in Council has been passed and all we want is that you should vote the money." That is all we have a chance to do. We have had Orders in Council and agreements placed on the Table and we have been told "we want you to ratify." Why? Because they cannot put these things into effect without money; money is needed, and they have to ask Parliament for it. But there is no chance for the people's representatives to discuss the merits of the transaction; everything is signed, sealed, and delivered; as it was with the Grand Trunk agreement, and as it is with this transaction. The only think left is to vote the money. The Government simply says to its supporters: "You vote the money, you support the agreement, or we will go the country and you will be out of your seats for good." The right hon. the Prime Minister smiles, but he knows perfectly well that he can go away for months and months and that when he comes back he will find his followers responding to every crack of the whip. The Government say: "You give us your support, or if not we will go to the country, and out you go." I think the time has come when the Government should recognize its responsibility to the people, and bring before this Parliament every transaction that has any bearing upon the future relations of Canada with other countries or that has to do with payments which our people will have to make.

Mr. Speaker, I might refer to many other points but I think that what I have said will, perhaps, be sufficient to indicate that all we are asking in this resolution is that the supremacy of Parliament in matters that pertain to the well-being of the people shall be recognized and that that is a wise request. It does not matter how far this transaction has gone at the present time; we still ask that this Parliament be given full information, and that it be given enough correspondence to let us see that at least there is something in writing about the matter. We do not know at the moment that the Government have even got a signed agreement as between the British Government and the Government of Canada, or as between the United States and this country. The Prime Minister says that we are to have nothing. Well, how this Parliament is to ratify or act upon nothing is a mystery that it is going to be difficult to explain; and until we get something that can be concretely seen and regarded not only by Parliament but by the people of the country we are justified, I think, in taking any course calculated to secure to the people their rights in this matter.

Now, in regard to the secrecy of this kind of diplomacy, the inability to bring down any correspondence, let me remind the House in regard to one subject that was mentioned here this evening—the Reciprocity agreement. My right hon. friend, referred, I think, to the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's as having negotiated that agreement, and he compared the action of the Minister going to Washington on that occasion with the kind of action which will be expected of this Canadian Minister permanently resident at Washington. But what position did the Government of the day take in regard to the reciprocity agreement? Did they come and say to this Parliament. "We have made an agreement with the United States. It is signed, sealed and delivered; there is nothing for the Canadian people to do but to accept it, and vote whatever money is necessary to carry it out?" I think my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) will bear me out when I say that the ink on that agreement was not dry before he brought into Parliament the agreement itself and all the correspondence that related to it—laid before Parliament all the documents necessary for free discussion—and from Parliament the issue was carried to the people for their consideration, and was settled by the vote of the people themselves. That is parliamentary government, under the British system: recognizing the rights of Parliament and the rights of the people; and all that we ask in regard to this particular measure—which may have consequences more far reaching and serious than any that have taken place in connection with any of the measures referred to this evening—is that upon the present occasion a similar course shall be adopted. As it is, we are establishing a new precedent, and surely, in so doing, we should have all the information that we can possibly obtain. This is a question that relates to inter-Imperial and international relations, matters of foreign policy; and on such questions—even more than on matters of home policy—we should have the fullest information. We are entitled for example, to know the status of the Minister in regard to all of these questions that have been raised in the editorial of the Winnipeg Free Press to which I have referred. The people, being called upon to pay the expense of this new office and position, are entitled to know how much it is going to cost and to what it is going to lead. Finally, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that we are entitled at this stage, of all times in the history of the world, in matters respecting our relations with other countries, to end secret diplomacy once and for all, and have our diplomacy open and above board or not have it at all.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Mr. Speaker, some time in the history, I believe, of every man it occurs that what seemed to him golden in the heated moment of discussion appears to him very much like lead when, an hour or two afterwards, he has cooled off. So, in the best of good spirit, I would suggest to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, that when he reads his speech to-morrow, after he has cooled off, and looks at it coldly as it appears on the printed page, I doubt if he will be very proud of that speech. And I might also carry that suggestion a little bit further, and apply it to those hon. gentlemen who so valiantly applauded him—as to whether, reading the speech over in cold blood, they will think of it in exactly the same enthusiastic way in which they have applauded the speaker to-night.

An hon. MEMBER: We shall be more enthusiastic.

Mr. McMASTER: It will warm the blood.

An hon. MEMBER: Much more so.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I can quite see that, and I will say it is no disadvantage to my hon. friends opposite, who have been so lethargic for so long a time, that they should have some warm blood pulsing their veins to let the country know they are really alive.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What about yourself?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is just by the way. I am not going to enter very lengthily into discussion of this matter to-night, but I will take up a few points that my hon. friend has made and see how much there really is in them.

In the first place, he made much of the statement, repeated over and over again, that the Government was denying information to the House and to the representatives of the people. That is always a favourite chord to touch when you want to arouse your followers—either in the House or out of it—on any particular subject; but how far was my hon. friend right in demanding the information which he demanded on this particular subject and at this particular time? After all my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding)—who has probably had one of the longest experiences in public life of any Canadian now in Parliament—knows that in all governments there are certain negotiations that take place, and it is impossible to make public the stages of those negotiations and their various phases whilst they are in progress; and a great deal of information—sometimes a very great deal—never is made public at all during the time when publicity might be harmful in many ways with reference to living statesmen in different countries who have been carrying the negotiations on, or with reference to the countries themselves whose interests have been under discussion. That is one of the things that every statesman and every Cabinet Minister of experience knows; it is simply a demand which is absolutely without good foundation, that certain things shall be known while negotiations are going on, or shall be made public, and that there shall be nothing secret, nothing confidential, nothing kept away from the view of the legislature or of the people—that everything shall be open—open diplomacy as my hon. friend said. Now that position is nullified by actual fact and by actual practice in the experience of every statesman and every member of a government. In no case where Governments carry on international negotiations, even in these days when open diplomacy is in far greater vogue than it was in previus times, is the course of the negotiations step by step and from hour to hour made known to parliaments, legislatures and the public of the different countries concerned. The events which have taken place during the last five years; the events which have taken place even since the Armistice have been one great proof of the impossibility of successfully carrying on negotiations of a delicate and complex nature, involving the prejudices, the policies, the national aspirations, of different countries, if every day the reporter puts before the public just what has taken place, what has been said and what has been concluded with reference thereto. You must draw a line somewhere; there must be a point beyond which you cannot go in publicity. After all, the chief thing is the conclusion that has been arrived at; the arrangement that has been actually made. If I buy a watch, the purpose which I had in mind is carried out when that watch keeps the correct time and enables me to ascertain the hour of the day by referring to it. But if I am curious to know how that watch is made up and I dig into its springs and its cogs and its general interior, I shall make impossible of achievement the very purpose and idea of the thing itself. As I say, the thing that has been actually come at as a conclusion is the thing that matters, and it is the gist of that which has been given to Parliament and which Parliament has a perfect right to know.

My hon. friend would raise this matter into a controversy between the autocracy of a Cabinet and the supremacy of Parliament. Now, that is an exaggerated method of expressing what is happening to-night with reference to the demand of our friends on the other side and the information which is being given by the Government. It is not a case of the autocracy of the Government against the supremacy of Parliament; it is a case of the proper co-ordination of the functions of Government and the functions of Parliament. My hon. friend says that we should have come down with a resolution affirming the principle that a trade commissioner should be sent to Washington—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not a trade commissioner; oh, no.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Or, if you want higher flights than that: a resolution that a Minister Plenipotentiary should be stationed at Washington. Then, he says, we should come down with another resolution stating that if it was considered best, that Minister Plenipotentiary sent to represent Canada at Washington should also be empowered to represent the British Government as its ambassador, if the British Government so desired. That was the way in which my hon. friend would approach the subject. Would he have got anywhere in approaching the subject in that way? Is it feasible? Is it practical? You must first proceed by way of negotiation, oral and otherwise, in order that the Governments concerned may test each other's views; in order to settle upon the modus operandi; what shall be the functions, what shall be the powers, what can be done in this respect and in that. Then, after you come to conclusions that are satisfactory to the two Governments you bring your conclusions to Parliament, and there it is that the supremacy of Parliament exerts itself. Parliament is then master of the situation. It can turn out the Government which has gone so far, if it considers it proper to do so. It can stop them at the point at which they give the information and not allow the proceeding to go further, if it considers it wise to do so. Parliament is, in the end, the supreme arbiter; nothing can be finally carried out without its approval. But my hon. friend would proceed in the way that he suggests. Did the party to which he belonged, and to which he still belongs, proceed in that way in respect to the reciprocity negotiations in 1911? Did they bring down to Parliament a resolution affirming that it would be a proper and right thing to send a delegation of ministers to Washington to undertake the negotiation of a treaty of reciprocity with the United States? I have no memory of a course like that having been adopted. And did they then come down with another resolution affirming that certain ministers should go down there as plenipotentiaries for the time being to work upon that principle, bring back an arrangement, and submit it to the House? Not at all. They did what was the practical thing; what was the customary thing, having regard to their prerogatives. They came to the conclusion that it would be a good thing to have a reciprocity treaty with the United States. They therefore sent their ministers to Washington to negotiate a treaty. We in the House of Commons knew nothing about it at that time—did not know what the terms of the treaty were; did not know how much they would give up; did not know how much they would get. The whole thing was done entirely behind our backs. While we were in perfect ignorance of what they were doing from hour to hour and day to day, they were proceeding to negotiate a binding commercial arrangement, a reciprocity treaty, which they would bring back and, if they could, put through the House; if they could not put it through the House they would, of course, take the responsibility and meet the fate which would attach to that responsibility. They went without the voice of Parliament or of the country behind them. They did their work; they brought back the result; and as soon as they asked the voice of Parliament and the voice of the country, they got their answer, as every Government will get theirs if their action is not in accordance with the wishes of the people.

When my hon. friend asserts that we should have proceeded as he suggests with reference to this negotiation, he did not back up what he said by pointing to like things that had been done by his own party. I do not find fault with his party for doing what they did in the case of the reciprocity negotiations. It was their prerogative; it was their right; they acted in a perfectly constitutional way. So in this matter, this Government have exercised their prerogative; they have proceeded with these negotiations; they have brought them to a point where finality has been reached in certain respects; they bring that arrangement back, and they submit it to Parliament. Parliament is supreme in this matter; Parliament is the arbiter of the whole thing.

The hon. gentleman stated that our position on this side of the House was: "When we demand information, you take the position that the representatives of the people in the House of Commons shall not see one whit of what passes, shall not know a thing of the negotiations that have taken place, shall not have all the papers or any of the papers placed before them for their information." That is not, as I stated, the main thing. The main thing is that the arrangement which has been up to this time concluded shall be in its essence and effect made known to the House of Commons, to the Parliament of Canada; and that is what has been done. My hon. friend had rather a grievance that I had stated that all available papers would be brought down. That is always the answer when demands are made for negotiable instruments of that kind. After negotiations have been carried on, when the papers are called for, you bring down the papers that it is in the public interest to bring down, and you are not obliged to bring down, neither is it understood that you shall bring down papers, the publicity of which would not be useful, which might, in fact, be disadvantageous to the general public interest, the international interest, the interest of the people of the countries involved. My hon. friend supported his demand by reading an extract from the Winnipeg Free Press, an organ of great power and intelligence, not by any means an organ of this Government, but an organ of public opinion which I, for my part, like to read and follow in so far as its suggestions are good. My hon. friend also read extracts from other papers. When he analyses really what these extracts from papers show as to the demand that is made and which is expressed in the extracts, it amounts to nothing more than this, that if an arrangement is made, before it is put into effect, Parliament and the country should know exactly what it is. But that is not at all a demand from the press or from those papers that every step of the negotiations, oral as well as written, shall be placed in print or in essence before Parliament. Any one knows that with delicate negotiations of this kind such a course would be neither advantageous or useful. Some one has made the statement—I think it was made in one of the extracts read by my hon. friend—that if we were to have under this arrangement nothing more at Washington than a glorified trade commissioner or a camouflaged chief clerk, the House and the country ought to know that. The House knows that, and the country knows it and will know it. It is not a glorified trade commissioner nor a camouflaged chief clerk who goes to Washington under this arrangement; it is a minister plenipotentiary, and the term itself designates the position and the power of the person who has that appointment. Therefore, the anxiety of my hon. friend that we shall have at Washington something more than a glorified trade commissioner or a camouflaged chief clerk may be set at rest entirely in respect to that.

He has read also expressions of opinion voiced by contributors to newspapers in the old country and in or on the part of Australia, and he has raised many doubts and fears as to what will happen in all this. His counsel would have been that nothing should be done in respect to this matter until all had got together at a general conference in the old country and the matter had been talked over and conclusions reached. He also asks the question: What will happen in Washington when the minister plenipotentiary goes there in his dual capacity of representatives of the interests of Canada and possibly of representative of the British Government in the absence of the British Ambassador? He also asks the question: What will happen and who will be responsible for him, for instance, when the minister plenipotentiary is carrying out his duties with reference to Canada and Canadian affairs, which, in so far as they relate to the two countries, will be within his power? The Dominion of Canada is responsible for him in that capacity; he receives his instructions from the Dominion Government, and he acts in conformity with those instructions. That is plain and evident from the premises. Then the hon. gentleman asks: When the British Ambassador is absent and the minister plenipotentiary is acting as British Ambassador and in his place, who will be responsible for what he does then—will it be Canada or will it be Great Britain? Equally in that case, if he is standing in the place of the ambassador in the absence of the regular incumbent, he is acting under instructions from the British Government, and he is responsnble under those instructions to the British Government.

Mr. McMASTER: Supposing the Prime Minister and the Government of this country gave him instructions diametrically opposed to the instructions given him by the Imperial or Home Government, what would happen?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is not much necessity of asking what will happen then, because that never could happen.

Mr. McMASTER: Such a thing is possible.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: In so far as he is the plenipotentiary for Canada and acting for Canada, he takes his instructions from the Canadian Government alone. In so far as he is acting as an ambassador for the British Government in the absence of the regular ambassador, he takes his instructions from the British Government, and he is responsible to that Government for the way in which he carries them out. That is as plain as it can be, so that what my hon. friend conjures up in his mind is an impossibility, a thing which cannot happen. But the alternative which was hinted at by my hon. friend has something appalling in it from another point of view. My hon. friend said: Let Canada manage her affairs with reference to the United States, and let Great Britain manage her affairs alone with reference to the United States, in so far as they touch the interests of Great Britain. If that is pushed to its extremity, is that co-operation? Does it not, when pressed to its logical conclusion, have in it the elements of danger in the future as to co-operation and continued unity and the solidarity of the Empire? It seems to me, and I think it will commend itself to my hon. friend, that if that is his alternative to the principle which has been adopted in the arrangement which has been made and laid before this Parliament, there are greater dangers to be apprehended in the future along that line than along the present line where in co-operation the two countries work together in unity, each having its special work to do under its special instructions from its own government, and co-operating, as they can co-operate, in a spirit of unity and of good fellowship.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will recall that I coupled what I said in that connection with the remark that there should always be co-operation and conference and discussion.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is that exactly. There is first, a clear definition of the powers. In matters of purely Canadian concern the plenipotentiary takes his instructions from Canada, and he works under those instructions and is not instructed by the British Ambassador. Co-operation, counsels of wisdom and of experience, should, and I suppose always will be perfectly common between the two, but the British Ambassador does not interfere in respect to matters purely Canadian, and the Canadian plenipotentiary does not interfere in matters purely of Imperial concern. At the same time, there may be the closest intimacy and unity of thought and of effort between the two. So I think there is no more danger in an arrangement based on conditions as they have been outlined to Parliament than there would be in following out my hon. friend's line.

My hon. friend made a very fine appeal to the sympathies of his friends on the other side of the House, when he made the rather unwarranted assertion that the Government of Canada, the present Government particularly, never came down to the House except when it wanted money, and that then it came. My hon. friend knows that that is an exaggerated statement. He also knows that there are few things which can be carried out in the way of public policy or public enterprise, initiated or aided by a government, which do not require for their carrying out to have money placed at the disposal of the Government. That is the privilege which Parliament holds. It holds the power of the money vote; and of course it is always necessary to come to Parliament for money in order to carry out the policies and the enterprises initiated through the Government and by the Government. But does not my hon. friend think that he made rather a catch-penny argument when he so strongly and so enthusiastically put it as a point of disadvantage to the Government that they never came to Parliament unless they wanted money? As Parliament holds the purse-strings it is absolutely impossible for any government in connection with any governmental policy, or any governmental enterprise, begun, initiated and brought to a certain point by the Government as the committee of Parliament, not to come ultimately to Parliament and the House of Commons for the wherewithal to carry those policies and those enterprises through. My hon. friend need only look at the history and the experience of his own party to know that governments do act in that way, and to take that responsibility. Take the project of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, for instance. Read its history, let your memory stray over the initiatory processes of that undertaking, the effects of which still remain with us, and will for many a generation. I suppose any one might have made the same statement with regard to the government of that day, that they only came to Parliament in respect to this great transaction, involving almost unlimited expenditure, after they had negotiated, signed, and practically sealed the arrangement with the companies with whom they made the bargain. Governments do act that way. They take that responsibility, and they carry out their measures through that medium. They must in the end always come to Parliament for its sanction before any of these enterprises can be carried through to completion.

My hon. friend in the end, as an argument often addressed and an appeal often made, says that in this age we should have no more secret diplomacy. Now what does he really mean by that? When he as the leader of a government carries on the affairs of this country, will he undertake to live by that rule of policy, that there shall be nothing undertaken by the Government in its transactions with Japan, in its transactions with China, in its transactions with France, in its transactions with any other country in the world with which it comes into contact daily, and where delicate questions arise involving negotiation and careful and wise counsels —will he abide by his rule that before he undertakes to write a communication to a foreign government he will come down to Parliament and make plain to Parliament and the country just what he is going to write and get the approval of Parliament and the country before he undertakes to do it? Will everything be open, no secrecy, nothing kept back, but from the very start every transaction made public to the legislature of the country and to the people of the country and to the world? I venture to say that my hon. friend will never lead a government along those lines, or if he attempts it, he will never lead a government successfully. Under the constitution of things as they are in the world, that cannot be done, and it will never be possible for it to be done so long as there are conflicting and opposing interests between different countries of the world.

My hon. friend, I hope, will not be altogether too unquiet with reference to this matter. Has he not conjured up possibilities which have very little foundation in fact? You could, with reference to any policy, at any time within the last eighty years, and with reference to every advance that has taken place in the constitutional development of Great Britain and of her Overseas Dominions and dependencies—you could have conjured up the same difficulties, made the same suppositions in order to prejudice or to oppose or to baulk, the development along certain lines of progress. You could have always done that, and it has always been done. But the supreme fact in the constitutional progress and growth of the British Empire and of its outlying parts has been that these successive steps have been taken, each one adding liberty, power and importance to the outlying portions, each step also adding strength, unity and solidarity to the Empire fabric as a whole, and that the fears of the timid fortunately did not outweigh the strong inspiration and hope of the courageous ones who took the part that progress seemed to indicate and trusted to the good sense, the strength and the capacity of the people of the Empire to guide in ways that would be advantageous and to avoid results that would be hurtful. And so the whole history of British diplomacy and of British constitutional development has passed on from step to step. I for one can see that in any new arrangement bearing within it responsibilities such as this arrangement bears, there may be about it eventualities that may well give us pause, but it is for the good sense, the wise counsel, the steady and cool judgment of the British people—qualities which have been such distinctive features of their progress in the past—to maintain their sway in the future and to guide along proper and safe lines for every one of these opening developments towards greater power, greater importance, greater liberty and consequently greater happiness for the Empire as a whole and for its constituent parts.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I have felt a great deal of interest in the official explanation given by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) and by his colleagues on the treasury benches, Mr. Speaker, as regards the appointment of a Minister at Washington. It seems to me that this question is a very simple one. We have discussed this evening the merits of the case, while the whole point is a question of procedure. And I believe, Sir, that the amendment which has been offered by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) asserts the only principle which ought to be adhered to by both parties in this House,—because long ago the battle for responsible government was won in this country. After carefully reading the amendment, whose words are well weighed, I wondered why there should be any division of opinion in this House as regards its merits. Because, I repeat, it asserts a principle which embodies a golden rule for the government of Canada.

I do not understand the objections which have been made by my right hon. friend, the last speaker (Sir George Foster), to this amendment, unless the right hon. gentleman has still the notions of fifty years ago. Those of us who are students of Canadian history—and we are all students of the history of our country—know that in the early forties and before as the fight was carried on by the friends of responsible government, they were denounced at every turn by the members of the Family Compact. The members of the Family Compast in those days spoke against Baldwin and William Lyon Mackenzie, as my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke this evening against the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie (Mr. Mackenzie King) and against the member for Shelburne and Queen's. In those days, as to-night, the friends of responsible government wanted to exact from the government of the day the correspondence, the information, the whys and the wherefores of the policies of the Government, but the governor of the day, who in himself constituted the whole government, Sir Francis Bond Head, speaking of his critics said, "They think they are the friends of responsible government, whilst at heart they are only disloyal." But he lived long enough to see responsible government firmly rooted in Canadian soil, and I am somewhat surprised that seventy-five years afterward we find a Canadian minister and a Canadian government reviving the same old reactionary policy as was advocated by Sir Francis Bond Head in those far-off days.

The Government, Sir, do not seem to be very free with information; on the contrary, they seem to be very secretive indeed. But they live in a fool's paradise, if they think, because during the five strenuous years of the war the people of Canada and the Parliament of this Dominion in a very generous, yes, in a chivalrous way, gave them a mandate to carry on, that they can continue the war system now that the glamour of war has gone. I repeat, they are living in a fool's paradise, because if there is one principle which has triumphed as a result of the great world conflict, it is that a people must be represented by its elected representatives, and that the people should be trusted.

My friend, who is fond of a little story at times, will remember that in the old days of the kingdom of Poland there was a king named Auguste. He had, as my hon. friend had some years ago, his "moments of weakness"—his being different from those of my hon. friend in that they resulted from a fondness for spirits. King Auguste, when he was particularly drunk, would say, "All Poland is now intoxicated." Well, when my hon. friend has the information served to him in council by the Prime Minister as to the whys and wherefores of the appointment of a semi-ambassador at Washington, he thinks that all Canada is informed and ought to be satisfied.

The right hon. gentleman told us that he had many very serious conversations with the Secretary of State for the Colonies in London regarding impending changes in our national status. I accept his word, Sir; I do not doubt that he had many very serious conversations with Lord Milner. But let me say, with all due respect to Lord Milner's great ability as an Imperial statesman, that if the status of Canada was altered as a result of the conversations of our Prime Minister with Lord Milner, that status was not altered on the maximum line but on the minimum.

Indeed the ministers of the Crown during the last five years have so often been away from Canada, have so often approached the round table clubs, and the Imperial conferences, have kept so near Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Balfour and the great Imperial statesmen that they have come to believe that they are no more responsible to that little country, to that little dominion, to that little colony, Canada, but that they are only responsible to the Imperialistic junta over in England.

My hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) said that he had given all the information last year and that we on this side of the House had been perfectly satisfied with his answers. As regards my humble self, let me correct my hon. friend. When the item for a representative at Washington came up for discussion before the House, speaking of Sir Charles Gordon who, is a respected citizen of Montreal and one of its great capitains of industry, I said that he had been during the war an excellent trade commissioner for Canada, had advertised our country, had built up financial and other friendships with the United States and that if a trade commissioner were to be appointed in Washington I would like to see him continue in the performance of these functions. But I spoke of a trade commissioner, not of a semi-ambassador—a semi-ready ambassador—or a minister plenipotentiary. My hon. friend stated that he had accepted his explanation. My hon. friend who sits at my right (Mr. McKenzie) expressed then, the views of His Majesty's loyal Opposition. He said:

> Is the establishment of new relations between this country and a foreign country, although that foreign country is a neighbour, not of such importance that it should be dealt with by Parliament, and that the will of the people as represented by Parliament should be ascertained upon such a question?

Further,

> These relations are of such an important character that the whole policy of the Government should be embodied in concrete legislation and thoroughly threshed out before being put into force.

In these wise words my hon. friend put the gist of the amendment which is being offered to the House this evening by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. But we are told that this is not merely a trade commissioner, that we are not going to appoint at Washington a High Commissioner such as we have in London, and such as we have in a modified form in Paris, but that we will have in the future a Minister Plenipotentiary. I have nothing to teach my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) in international law; I cannot give him any lesson in the English language because he is a perfect master of language, but will he tell me in all seriousness that Canada, as a Dominion, has the right to appoint in a foreign country a minister plenipotentiary? Does he not know that in international law only independent people and independent countries can appoint ministers plenipotentiary and ambassadors? You cannot appoint a consul. I dare say that the British consul in Washington will have more power and influence than the Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary. Why, Sir, I have been in Europe of late and heaven knows what troubles we have with passports in moving from one country to another. Could I get my passport vised by the High Commissioner in London? Could I get my passport vised by the Canadian Agent in Paris? No, Mr. Speaker, I had to go to the British consul and so it will be at Washington; Canadians will have to go to the British consul.

What is the use of camouflaging this whole question before the Canadian people? The full import of this is that hon. gentlemen during five years of war have carried on in the name, and on behalf, of the Canadian people. The name of Canada has loomed great on the horizon. The name of Canada was never greater than it is to-day as a result of the war but the status of Canada was not changed on account of the war. These hon. gentlemen, in order to justify the extravagance of the Government during these five years, are preparing another balloon for the Canadian people: "We have secured recognition as an international power; we have obtained a new status; we now have a Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington; hail, hail, the people of Canada, come ye brave electors unto the polls and vote once more for the progressive Tory party!" That is the full import of this question; nothing else.

True,—and I make the statement in perfect good faith—there are already forebodings, there are tidings which are teaching my hon. friends that it is not wise to play with fire and you are only playing with fire on this issue. You are not sincere, you are not serious, but the people of Canada, who are sincere, who realize what their status is, who apprehend the dangers they are running in playing at diplomacy—the people of Canada are already telling you that you are doing wrong in this matter.

When I was in London the other day we had what I believe is the opinion of the people of Ontario, at least of the great city of Toronto. It was in the form of a long letter written, no doubt, by Sir John Willison criticising bitterly his friends of the present Government for playing at diplomacy because, as the London Times said through its correspondent, this whole question has been treated very mysteriously. The status of Canada has not changed. We maintain the best of relations with the United States. What the people of Canada are in need of to-day in Washington is a trade commissioner, looking for wider markets in the United States. We are anxious to do business with the United States and we want an alert commissioner to stir up business between the two countries and to open new channels.

The Times of London, printed that in substance, and I can send the warning to my hon. friend, if he wishes to read it. No, Mr. Speaker, the Government is not sincere, and it ought to know—at least the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has had a long and honourable career in the Canadian ministry ought to know—that by the appointment of that semi-ambassador. of that so-called Minister Plenipotentiary, Canada sooner or later may be involved in grave international problems.

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, you may not ask. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend, but he will please put his question a little later on when I am through with this, my argument. My hon. friend thinks that everything will be very smooth; the British Ambassador will look after Great Britain's affairs, and the Canadian minister will look after Canadian affairs and will receive instructions from Ottawa, and Ottawa only; but at times during the absence of Sir Auckland Geddes, the Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary may sit at the desk of Sir Auckland, and may then carry on the affairs of Great Britain. Sir, is it not possible, does it not strike my hon. friend's mind, that conflicts of interests are likely to happen and to arise between even the Mother Country and Canada? Have they not arisen in the past, Mr. Speaker? I have here the life of Sir John A. Macdonald and I will not weary the House by reading the chapter concerning the Fisheries Treaty. My hon. friend probably knows by heart that famous despatch of Sir John A. Macdonald, when he told the Canadian people about his impressions of the British representatives who sat with him at the conference at Washington. They were very anxious to sign a treaty even though the interests of Canada were discarded. My hon. friend should remember the gloom that one morning descended over the halls of the Canadian Parliament when the Alaskan boundary award was known. On that commission the Canadian representatives were associated with a British representative appointed by the British Government. Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, that morning when the award was made known to Parliament? If we ever regretted an occasion and an association to discuss interests which were dear to the heart of Canada, it was that occasion and that association. We all know that Lord Alverston, who at first committed himself in favour of Canada, soon took another course and joined the American majority. No, Mr. Speaker, if you read the history of our difficulties, of our interests—as between Canada and the United States—you come to this conclusion that the best way to settle them is to settle them ourselves and not be associated with others.

Mr. BURNHAM: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the point at issue?

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has risen to a point of order, will he please state the point?

Mr. BURNHAM: My point of order is that no debate can take place or no amendment be moved on an item in the Estimates.

Mr. SPEAKER: I know there is a rule of the House to the effect that there can be no debate upon an item in the Estimates, but I do not think the present amendment can properly be brought within the sphere of that rule. The debate, it is true, involves the principle of representation at Washington, in a measure; but the amendment calls for the production of papers and generally asks for delay. It is possible that there may be a certain amount of discussion which would infringe the rule referred to, but it does not seem to me that the substance and in the main, the purport of the amendment comes within the rule that the hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, this is not an amendment to an item in the Estimates, it is an amendment before going into Committee of Supply.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, I think that Canada is liable to be involved in this game of pseudo-diplomacy. What will happen? My hon. friend says that the Canadian representative and the British representative, living possibly under the same roof in the same Embassy, will replace each other at different times. My hon. friend very well knows that cases like the one which occurred in the eighties are liable to happen at any time. My hon. friend will remember that the British Ambassador to the United States in the eighties, when Mr. Cleveland was a candidate in the presidential election, expressed his views about that election in a letter written to a friend. It created quite a hubbub in the United States. The incident occurred on the eve of a presidential election when, as my hon. friend knows, some Americans are very fond of twisting the Lion's tail. The British Ambassador was recalled, and had to retire to Great Britain, and there was a state of excitement for a while. In such a case as that would the Canadian minister be also told to go back to his own country? My hon. friend can see that living together—the one acting for the other as he described this evening—Canada is liable to come to grief on many and many questions, some indifferent, some insignificant by themselves. My hon. friend asks what are we doing otherwise than the hon. gentleman himself —the mover of the amendment—did, when he went to Washington in 1911 and discussed not a treaty but a pact which was liable to be recalled at any time by the notice of either of the parties to it.

My hon. friend said, speaking of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, "You went to Washington." Yes, the hon. gentleman went to Washington, and ten years afterwards my hon. friend can smile over the campaign which took place over that visit. You remember, Mr. Speaker, how the hon. gentleman, with his late colleague, Mr. Paterson, was represented as being an old and feeble minister, who had lost all strength and could not carry the burden, the immense burden he had on his shoulders on that occasion. Well, ten years have elapsed and, judging from the speech which he delivered here this evening, the member for Shelburne and Queen's is still hale and hearty, Mr. Speaker. And what is most interesting is that those who made these foolish appeals against "truck and trade" with the United States; those who for a while played with fire, have since practically adopted that very policy. The policies advocated by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) under the head of reciprocity have been carried out by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You were not in the Chair, Mr. Speaker, when reciprocity was first mentioned in this debate. Had you been in the Chair, I am sure that, knowing as you do by long experience that a word is sometimes as magic and may give rise to a long debate, you would have stopped my hon. friend who sits opposite. We have, my right hon. friend says, by secret correspondence and secret pour parlers settled the status of Canada. We have appointed a Minister Plenipotentiary, but we have no information to give to the House; the people's representatives are not entitled to full information. Then, turning to the mover of the amendment, he says: You did the same with the reciprocity treaty—which, Mr. Speaker, was not a treaty. I say to my hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no objection to referring to the manner in which the reciprocity agreement was negotiated. That is one thing, but it is quite a different thing to discuss the merits of reciprocity itself and its effect.

Mr. LEMIEUX: To be sure, Mr. Speaker, I will avoid that rock; I will not resurrect the issue of 1911. But my hon. friend says that all was secret in the proceedings with regard to reciprocity. If I remember well, we discussed it openly in the House of Commons. The agreement was laid on the Table; the House was dissolved in the old Liberal fashion and the people were called upon to pass upon the proposal. Moreover, the question was not a new one; it was as old as Confederation. My right hon. friend was not in the House in 1879, but he knows that Sir John A. Macdonald inserted in his famous tariff resolutions of 1879 a standing offer in the name of the Canadian people to the United States respecting reciprocity —an offer, you will note, made by the Tory party. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will leave reciprocity alone.

With regard to any item of expenditure, whether it be for a thousand dollars or a million dollars, the humblest member of this House has the right to move for a return asking that the correspondence, the statistics, the information, be laid on the table of the House. It can be made the subject of debate and under our Parliamentary procedure the ministers responsible are obliged to lay on the Table a return giving the whole of that information. But apparently the hon. gentleman has been so much accustomed during the last five years to govern in the old Tory fashion, at his own sweet will, without any regard for the people, that he thinks that the appointment of an ambassador to Washington, a change in the status of Canada, can be made without regard to the representatives of the Canadian people. Mr. Speaker, we hear so much about our relations with the Mother Country having been so greatly changed during the war; about a new status having been given to Canada, when still ringing in our ears we have the words of that master mind, perhaps the most marvellous student of parliamentary government, Mr. Asquith, who, answering the Prime Minister of New Zealand in 1911, stated in his own blunt English way that as regards foreign affairs the responsibilities of Great Britain could not be shared with the dominions. Why, that is the A B C of international law. And, Mr. Speaker, lest my language should appear severe; lest my language should appear, perhaps, disloyal, let me once more read to my hon. friend the advice which was tendered to the Canadian people by one of the greatest men Canada ever produced; by that old statesman who during his last election uttered those remarkable words which carried him through to success: "A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die" —Sir John A. Macdonald. Speaking one day of all those imperialist apostles; of all those framers of new constitutions for Canada, he said in his own cynical and witty way:

> I am, so far as that question goes, up to the handle a home-ruler. We will govern our own country. We will put on the taxes ourselves. If we choose to misgovern ourselves—
> As we do now, unfortunately.
> —we will do so, and we do not desire England, Ireland or Scotland to tell us we are fools. We will say: If we are fools we will keep our folly to ourselves; you will not be the worse for it and we will not be the worse for any folly of yours.

Mr. Speaker, those words bristle with wisdom and with common sense. Do not meddle in the affairs of the Mother Country, and the Mother Country will let us govern ourselves. We have governed ourselves during the last seventy-five years according to British traditions; according to the best constitutional usages. Do not accustom the people to unwise words. Do not accustom the people to think that the ministers of the Canadian Government are viewing with a light heart the loosening of the moorings which bind us to the Mother Country. Speaking for myself, Sir, and for my electors in the old province of Quebec, I am satisfied with my lot; I do not care for any change brought about by the policy of Lord Milner and by a Tory Government. Let Providence shape our destiny; let us not get into entanglements for the pleasure of having, supposedly, a Canadian Minister Plenipotentiary, but which, as that Unionist paper, the Winnipeg Free Press, so well said, will be nothing more or less than a camouflaged chief clerk.

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to take part in this debate, I frankly admit, because it seems to me that at this stage anything further need be said to make quite clear the futility of the proposed amendment and to make not only the members of this House but the people of Canada realize how hon. gentlemen opposite, failing entirely to find a basis for this amendment in any matter of fact, have been reduced one after another to struggling with their imagination in an endeavour to conjure up untold evils that we are to apprehend, because though there has been laid before the House in full the result of what this Government has done in co-operation with the Government of the United Kingdom and with the acceptance of the Government of the United States there is some failure to furnish needed information In this competition of imaginative powers I am sure the speakers opposite who have preceded me will find no fault nor complain that I am doing them an injustice, great as their achievements in the exercise of their imaginative powers have been when I award the palm to my very good friend the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). To lay the foundation of this edifice of terror which he has been at such pains to build up, the hon. gentleman had to carry us back—he is very fond of carrying us back—to the time in 1847—or 1848, was it?—when we had in this country a struggle for responsible government. That struggle for responsible government seems to haunt the hon. member's waking hours, and I often wonder whether it breaks in even upon his slumbers. He is so constantly in a state of terror, beholding this country on the brink of an abyss to which nothing is comparable but the condition and the danger to which it was exposed in 1847. He is living still away back in 1847, surrounded with the dangers of 1847, living in the Canada of 1847, the Canada that must have been so horrible a place to live in since it was perpetually haunted by that most awful of spooks, the Family Compact. The hon. gentleman is still in dread and terror of the Family Compact that went to its rest so very many years ago and that has long ceased to trouble the waking thoughts or the sleeping dreams of ordinary, sane Canadians who have grown up with their country and who have been conscious of their country's growth. The hon. gentleman says: Responsible Government is in peril. Why? Because the responsible Government of Canada, having advised His Majesty, as it is the proper function of responsible ministers to do, that the time had come when Canada might very properly transact herself by her own minister her business with her next-door neighbour, and having found that His Majesty's Government said: "Why, certainly that is perfectly obvious; everybody recognizes that;" and that the Government of the United States said: "Why, certainly, your representative will be most welcome" —the Government, as I say, having given that advice and having met with that reception, has come back to this Parliament and told this Parliament the totality of what it has done. Therefore, he says, the constitution is in danger. Why, here is this responsible Government right before this Parliament, the representatives of the people. If, in doing that, this Government has done anything which the people's representatives do not approve, let the hon. gentleman calm his fears, we are here in the hands of Parliament which the people of Canada elected, and if the people's representatives do not approve this thing, clear and plain as it is on its face, of which they have been fully informed, let them exercise their constitutional authority, and neither the Parliament nor the people of Canada will be for one moment bound by anything that has been done. Where is the danger to constitutional Government?

The leader of the Opposition Mr. Mackenzie King) said that the great question involved was the supremacy of Parliament on the one hand or the autocracy of the Cabinet on the other. In that expression he ran the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) a very close second in evidence of powers of imagination. The autocracy of the Cabinet that stands here before Parliament to accept its judgment! Where is the supremacy? To-night the supremacy is in the hands of this Parliament to which we have told what we have done. If this Parliament thinks we have done right, well and good. If this Parliament thinks we have done wrong, it is in its hands to correct the wrong. Let me point this out. Hon. gentlemen have told us that they keep for another occasion their objectoins to what we have done; they will not to-night even question the wisdom of what we have done; they are satisfied to question the amount of information that they have received. It is a fair inference that on the information they have received they find no ground to question the wisdom of what we have done. It is true that while they have professed not to be questioning the wisdom of what we have done, they have wandered away—I think my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) was a particularly great sinner in that regard—from the subject of this sparsity of information and have indulged in some condemnation of the action itself.

But the amendment—they are quite right in that regard—does not raise the question of the wisdom of the action itself; it does not attack it; it does not question it; and I do not think it will be unfair if I suggest that they do not question the wisdom of that action, because they, like us, are absolutely satisfied that it will meet with the approval of the Canadian people. The hon. gentleman is worried about the whys and the wherefores. If the hon. gentleman does not know the whys and the wherefores which justify Canada attending to her own business, the people of Canada know all about them, and do not need to be told them over again. There are some things so obvious, there are some things so much a matter of common knowledge, that they do not call for repetition, and I am telling no secrets if I say that in the correspondence that did take place there is no discussion of why and wherefores. The thing itself in principle nobody disputes, and the Canadian people will not dispute it.

Now the hon. gentleman—and I should like to relieve his mind in this regard, because I would be sorry that he should lose his sleep to-night—is much perturbed by a ghost that walks often in his imagination, the ghost of somebody's mysterious efforts to create a system of imperialism that in some way or other is going to deprive us of our Canadian autonomy. He is so subject to the visits of that troublesome ghost that it comes between him and every step that goes to confirm and extend the outonomous powers of this country. Every time a step of that kind is taken, this ghost passes across the line of vision that intervenes between my hon. friend and his advancing country, and he sees imperialism; he sees something that is going to deprive us of our right to our own self-government, something that is going to involve us in freightful responsibilities, and then he winds it all up by seeing in the very same thing something that is going to loosen the bonds that bind this country to the Mother Country and hold together the great commonwealth of nations that we call the British Empire. Now I would, if I could, do something to allay his apprehensions in this regard. I would ask him if he were not making a speech, if he did not feel called upon to find words of condemnation of some action of this Government, but were engaged in the ordinary application of his common sense—I would ask him how he sees in the fact that Canada is going to provide a Canadian appointed by His Majesty upon the advice of the Canadian Government to be the channel of communication between Canada and the United States, a danger to Canada's autonomy?

He has told us that this proposal is all camouflage, that Canada could not appoint a minister plenipotentiary, that none but an independent country could appoint a minister plenipotentiary. Well, now, Canada is not going to appoint a minister plenipotentiary, but His Majesty the King, who is the King of Canada just as much as he is the King of the United Kingdom, upon the advice of his constitutional Canadian advisers is going to appoint a minister plenipotentiary to be his representative at Washington, his delegate to the United States, so far as Canadian matters are concerned; and with all respect to the hon. gentleman's profound knowledge of international law, and the readiness with which he tells us that upon this side of the House we do not know the A. B. C. of international law I venture to say to him that he will find no competent international lawyer who will question the power of His Majesty the King to appoint a minister plenipotentiary in the right of his Dominion of Canada. May I also tell him, since he seems to be singularly oblivious of the things that have been happening under all our eyes, that at the Peace Conference His Majesty exercised that power and did the thing that the hon. gentleman says that anybody who knows the A. B. C. of international law would know he could not do. He did it, and those Canadian plenipotentiaries, in that quality of minister plenipotentiary, walked into the gathering of ministers plenipotentiary representing the states of the civilized world and were received and seated there on a footing of equality with His Majesty's ministers plenipotentiary representing the United Kingdom, with the ministers plenipotentiary representing the United States, with the ministers plenipotentiary representing France, Belgium, and all the nations of the earth. Yet the hon. gentleman says that if we knew the A. B. C. of international law we would know that Canada could not have a minister plenipotentiary. Now Canada has had ministers plenipotentiary. His Majesty named them upon the advice of his Canadian ministers, and His Majesty will name a minister plenipotentiary to go to Washington to be his representative there for the direction of purely Canadian affairs, and that minister plenipotentiary will be Canada's minister plenipotentiary, the hon. gentleman's profound knowledge of international law to the contrary notwithstanding. The A. B. C. of international law is away back in that past in which the hon. gentleman lives. It is prior to 1847, where dwell the spooks that trouble his days and his nights. It is very far back. Might I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he cast his eye on what I might describe as the X. Y. Z. of international law, on the latest developments, and then he will find to his great gratification that his country stands to-day in a position in which it is quite possible for her to have a minister plenipotentiary standing side by side with other ministers plenipotentiary on a footing of equality. I might say to my hon. friend, as he talks to us about the A. B. C. of international law, that this is not the only known case. When the German Empire was at the height of its power, Bavaria and several other countries had their distinct ministers. It is not at all an impossible thing that within one state, within one great international empire, you may have a number of nations, all capable of figuring in the society of nations.

The hon. gentleman is very apprehensive of what is going to happen, when there comes to be a conflict of interests, as he says there may be, and he imagines it may come at a time when the British Ambassador has gone home to England. During his absence there comes to be a conflict of interest between Canada and the Mother Country or some other portion of the Empire, and the hon. gentleman is appalled as to what is going to happen.

Why, I think he would give the Canadian representative, or the British Ambassador if he should be acting alone, credit for a little common sense; and most assuredly, if the hon. gentleman himself were representing Canada under those circumstances, I would have the most implicit trust in him that he would realize that in a conflict of interests it would be the duty of both ambassadors to refer the matter to their respective Governments. Then it would be for the Governments of the self-governing nations of the Empire to get together and give instructions to their respective representatives, and above all to give to the representative of the British Empire, the instructions that rest upon the conclusions coming from the consultation of all the nations of the British Empire. The hon. gentleman need not be anxious, I think, upon that ground.

Now, the hon. gentleman gave us grave warning about playing with fire. He is so anxious that we should attend to our own affairs and do our own governing, and he has a horror of the old Tory days of the Family Compact and, I suppose of government from Downing Street. But what does he quote as a warning? What the London Times says.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Canadian correspondent.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, the Canadian correspondent of the London Times. He thought that we were playing with fire and that there were grave dangers—I do not remember the exact words—involved in playing at diplomacy. With all respect to Sir John Willison, we are not playing with diplomacy; and with all respect to the hon. gentleman who is now evidently so devout a follower of Sir John Willison—seeing that he hangs on the words of wisdom dropping from the knight's mouth—we are not playing at diplomacy at all; we are getting back to the very simple position that I mentioned at the outset where Canadian business with the American people, our next-door neighbours, will be transacted—in all the forms of diplomacy if you will, as it must be—through a Canadian appointed by His Majesty upon the advice of the Canadian Government. If that be anything else than a rounding out of our powers of self-government, I am at a loss to imagine what it can be.

The hon. gentleman sees us involved in grave international troubles. There once was a British Ambassador at Washington who wrote a letter about their elections that the American people did not like, and the British Government recalled him. Now, on the hon. gentleman's advice, because we run that frightful risk, we should drop this project at once, because perhaps at some time our Canadian representative may write a letter that the American people may not like! And notwithstanding, if I accept his own view, that he was at such pains to point out to us the different occasions upon which our interests suffered because they were in the hands of exclusively British representatives, we must be on our guard not to have any representative of our own. The hon. gentleman was at pains to recall the Alaskan arbitration board, and pointed out the change of view on the part of the British member on that board. To what end? To warn us to have no representative of our own. After pointing out that if we had not had two representatives of our own upon that tribunal we would have had no one to support our view, he says: You se, the British representative turned against Canada; the conclusion is, be careful never to be represented by any Canadian, always be represented by exclusively British representatives, because there have been British representatives who have abandoned Canada's interests. I am not going to discuss whether there have been such British representatives, but out of the hon. gentleman's own mouth, if his statement be correct, comes the most conclusive argument why we ought to see to it that we have representatives of our own.

The hon. gentleman made a great contrast between what happened on the reciprocity treaty and on this matter, how openly they acted upon that treaty—just as openly as we are here to-night discussing this agreement—after it was made they brought it in and submitted it to Parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And the correspondence.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, they brought in the correspondence, and if there had been correspondence here of a nature to be useful in connection with this discussion, it might very well have been produced. But there is the question: How is the correspondence going to affect the question whether what has been done was the right thing to do or the wrong thing to do. The thing we did, is here for the fullest and freest discussion by hon. members and the people of Canada, and that is the thing for which we are proud to be responsible and for which we are proud to be responsible, and for which we fear neither the verdict of this House nor the verdict of the people of this Dominion.

Now, the hon. gentleman is very much excited about what he calls the "hollow farce" of our status. No one has claimed that this particular arrangement has changed our status; it is the evidence of a change of status that has come as the result of a gradual growth. With regard to what happened during the war, I would say this—that the magnificent achievements of our soldiers, and the magnificent achievements of the Canadian people, did not change our status, but made manifest to the world, and commanded on the part of the world recognition of the fact, that we had attained a real national status. That is what has come: that recognition and the responsibility which accompanies it. This arrangement is another evidence of it. And yet the hon. gentleman talks about it as a hollow farce!

Why is it that hon. gentlemen are so frightened that the country should ever leave the maternal apron-strings? I presume they must be glad to see her growth, yet they do not want her to have the privileges and the responsibilities that come from growth; they are in a corner frightened at shadows, seeing on every side impending dangers, and shrinking back from the manhood—if I may change the sex of our country for the moment—to which this country has attained.

What would any man think of his son who, having reached the status of manhood, would say: "It is true I am a man, with the developed force and reasoning power of a man, with the right of being consulted about matters in which I have an interest common with others that belong to the status of a man; but no, Mother, please let me keep a good strong hold of your apron-strings; because, you see, if I acknowledge manhood I might have to carry the responsibilities of manhood; there might even come a day when I might be responsible for some foolish letter that somebody wrote!" The hon. gentleman knows his country too well and loves her better than to believe that. He did not hesitate to tell us that we were not serious, that we were not sincere. He may from his point of view think that we are neither serious nor sincere, but I for my part will not throw that back at him. I do not doubt his sincerity, nor do I doubt his seriousness; but, knowing as I do the intelligence and the capacity of the hon. gentleman, it is a puzzle to me how he justifies that cowering attitude on the part of his country, that he is so frightened at her assuming the responsibilities of nationhood, that he is so frightened of it that he is even willing to forego the status and the privileges of nationhood for fear that we might be called upon to carry the proper responsibilities associated with that nationhood. What he fears is that somebody is plotting to carry this country into something he calls Imperialism. Upon this side of the House there is no less desire and no less firm purpose that there is on the part of my hon. friend that there shall be preserved to Canada for all time the untrammeled rights that she enjoys to-day and to ensure that she shall continue to be entitled to the recognition of her status as an equal nation within this Empire. That determination is as strong on this side of the House as it can be in his breast and nothing is being done here, or by this Government, otherwise than that which is in the direction of consolidating and confirming that autonomous status of our country. We have gone further because we are advancing farther than those who have preceded us. I do not say that they were not looking in the same direction but there is just as earnest determination to hold together this aggregation of nations, of which Canada is one—not an inferior one, not a dependency, but a nation standing on that footing of equality that fits her just as well to furnish the British Ambassador as representing the entire Empire as the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom is not herself alone the Empire. There is nothing incongruous in a Canadian minister being the representative from time to time, if not permanently for the matter of that, of the British Empire, if it be thought wise by the other component parts of the British Empire. It is only an additional evidence of the recognition of the equality of our status within the Empire but here we are as determined to stand by Canada's rights to her position as an autonomous nation within the Empire as the hon. gentleman can be and that she shall maintain and hold her place in the great aggregation, the great commonwealth, of equal nations that go to make up the British Empire. My hon. friend need have no fear that we are wandering away from the example of that great statesman Sir John Macdonald whose words he read to us.

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Beauce): Before the minister sits down may I ask him a question? I see by the declaration that was made by the right hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir George Foster) that the Minister Plenipotentiary is going to be appointed by His Majesty on the recommendation of the Canadian Government. Do I understand that this recommendation will go direct to His Majesty without first being submitted to the British Government. In other words, is the appointment to be made by His Majesty the King on the recommendation of the Canadian Government without the question being referred at all to the English, or Imperial Government?

Mr. DOHERTY: We have no doubt that His Majesty will not withhold from his British ministers his action in connection with the matter, but the statement is perfectly clear that the person to be appointed is to be appointed on the advice of his Canadian minister just as the Ministers Plenipotentiary at the Peace Conference were. I am not suggesting, and I do not know that there is occasion to suggest, that it is impossible, that, if the ministers of the United Kingdom see some reason why they should offer an objection, or possibly the ministers of other dominions see some reason for opposition, they can suggest it. I am not going into that. The proposed channel by which the advice gets to His Majesty does not alter the fact that it will be the advice of His Majesty's Canadian ministers.

Mr. BELAND: In other words according to the Government's understanding of the appointment of the minister at Washington the Canadian Government is not supreme as the adviser of His Majesty?

Mr. DOHERTY: As far as I understand it the Canadian Government is supreme as the adviser of His Majesty:

Accordingly, it has been agreed that His Majesty, on advice of his Canadian ministers, shall appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary who will have charge of Canadian affairs and will at all times be the ordinary channel of communication with the United States Government in matters of purely Canadian concern, acting upon instructions from and reporting direct to the Canadian Government.

I can see no room for suggesting even a doubt that the advice of the Canadian ministers is to be supreme as to who shall be the Canadian minister or Plenipotentiary.

Mr. BELAND: So that the recommendation will go direct to His Majesty?

Mr. DOHERTY: Whatever is the regular channel by which communications reach His Majesty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear; that is very diplomatic.

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) I did not intend to speak on this amendment and I would not have risen were it not for the fact that the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) referred to Hansard of last year. I have found a few lines which my hon. friend has not read, to which he has not referred, and which might be of great interest to the House. When my hon. friend stated that the matter of the appointment of a Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington was fully discussed and approved by the Opposition last year he did not state really what happened. I am sure he did not wish to deceive the House, but if he did not wish to deceive, what has become of his usual power of observation?

Mr. ROWELL: My hon. friend has not quoted what I said to-night.. I said to-night that the question of the Canadian representative at Washington had been discussed in the House on the occasions I mentioned and that there had been no objection to the principle of that appointment.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Exactly. At page 1077 of Hansard of May 5, 1919—and if I remember well my hon. friend cited May 5—I find the following:

Mr. E. Lapointe: Has the Government brought down any legislation as regards this representation at Washington? I suppose the order in Council business is going to be closed up.

Mr. Rowell: The voting of the Estimate by the House would be all that would be necessary to appoint a representative at Washington. Next session, when the matter is more fully understood, and we know exactly the relations, it may be considered desirable to introduce legislation.

Do I understand that my hon. friend by legislation means Orders in Council? Or a resolution? What kind of legislation has been introduced in the House this session? Is it not a fact that it was an Order in Council, and that the Acting Prime Minister made an announcement to the House stating that a minister plenipotentiary was going to be appointed at Washington. Is that the kind of "legislation" my hon. friend referred to last year? But let me resume the quotation:

Mr. Archambault: Have we as a nation the right to appoint a diplomatic agent at Washington?

Mr. Rowell: We have no right, except with the concurrence of the Imperial Government, to appoint a diplomatic agent, but the question of the status of this representative is now a matter of conference between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Imperial Government.

Mr. Archambault: We should not pass this Estimate before having power from the Imperial Government.

Mr. Rowell: My hon. friend need not worry. We shall have an understanding with the Imperial Government, and we shall have a Canadian representative at Washington.

A question by Mr. McMaster and a reply by the President of the Privy Council follow. Then comes another question from myself:

Mr. Archambault: Have the Imperial authorities agreed to that?

Mr. Rowell: They have agreed that we should have representation at Washington.

Mr. Archambault: Is there any correspondence to that effect?

Mr. Rowell: There are certain confidential communications between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Imperial Government. Negotiations are not yet closed. As soon as they are closed I am sure the Prime Minister will lay the whole matter before the House, but he is conducting negotiations personally in Great Britain.

I was under the impression that negotiations were closed now. If they are closed, what becomes of the statement made by my hon. friend last year that when the subject would be closed the Prime Minister would lay the whole matter before the House? The Prime Minister spoke to-night, and he stated emphatically that he would not lay anything before the House, that no publication would be allowed. May I ask what are the reasons for not divulging the communications which have been exchanged? Are my hon. friends opposite afraid that these negotiations will bring criticism from this side of the House? If they are not, why not disclose the facts? However, it is not the first time that we have been refused information here. When we asked very reasonable questions about the expense of the Canadian National railways we met with a point-blank refusal from the minister. I believe, Sir, that in pursuing this course we are departing from responsible government, and in my opinion the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's should be adopted.

Tuesday, May 18, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPARATION BY GERMANY—ALLIES CONFERENCE AT OSTEND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. P. R. DuTREMBLAY (Laurier-Outremont): I see in the Montreal Gazette of this morning a despatch stating that it is rumoured that, following the conference held at Hythe, the Government of Germany will be called upon to pay to the Allies as an indemnity the sum of about £6,000,000,000. Would the Government tell us what portion of this sum is to be allocated to Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to put that question on the Order Paper. It is one which requires notice and with respect to which there is no urgency.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: It is a question which requires the attention of the Government. The despatch further states that a special conference of the Allies will be held shortly at Ostend to consider financial questions among the Allies. I should like to know if the Government have been invited to attend this conference and if they will have a representative at it.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): The answer to my hon. friend's question is in the affirmative.

THE BUDGET.

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT DELIVERED BY SIR HENRY DRAYTON, MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that on the present occasion I shall have to ask the indulgence of the House as I shall have to address the House at considerable length. The fault is not mine; the financial position of the country at the present requires, I think, to be dealt with in considerable detail.

The conditions not only in Canada to-day, but the world conditions obtaining, are very different from the conditions which did obtain while the war was in progress. During this period the compelling necessity of the moment, the winning of the war, required raising large sums of money in the easiest possible way and with the least interference with the public or with business methods. It was absolutely imperative that there should be no check in production, no questions raised which might hinder that production or hinder the war effort. It was no time for the consideration of domestic politics, which in any way might distract the nation from a united effort towards the supreme end.

These conditions to-day are changed; the war is won; expenses are great; the cost of Government operations as well as the carrying on of every business of every character in the country has increased enormously, and over and above this the country, with other countries which took their part in the titanic struggle, is faced with a pyramid of debt. The task to-day is to aid the return to ordinary economic conditions to the extent that such return is at this time possible.

The duty to-day is not only to carry on the Government of the country without any additions to the debt, but on the other hand to promote measures which will reduce the nation's obligations. The task while heavy is nevertheless not as severe and difficult as the obstacles and difficulties which the country has gloriously overcome in the five years of war and stress. Indeed, were it possible for the country to again become as united and earnest as it was during the war period, if it were possible for each and all of us to sink all differences, class and sectional interests and jealousies into an effort towards re-establishing Canada as united and co-ordinated as that which won the war, the task would indeed be easy and simple.

Canada's soldiers during that period won for themselves and our country imperishable fame. "Their name liveth for evermore." But the productive efforts of Canada during that period were second only to their glorious record. For the five fiscal years ended on March 31, 1915, the excess of the country's imports over exports amounted to $825,521,490. For the next succeeding five years, ended on March 31 last, this excess of imports was not only overtaken, but our exports exceeded our imports by a sum of $1,803,442,233. It is plain in view of such a tremendous productive and industrial exploit, that if anything like the same effort is made to overcome debts, and by overcoming debts to bring about a proper deflation of prices, credits, and circulation, the task will prove well within our powers. Canada's trade while, as in the case of all countries, subject to periodical depression has steadily advanced, as the following figures will show:

Fiscal Year.	Total Trade.
1879	$ 149,489,188
1889	196,309,107
1899	304,227,339
1909	548,139,881
1919	2,185,194,620
1920 (unrevised)	2,351,174,886

The increase thus recorded is one which is contributed to practically by all of our productive agencies and is spread over a wide field. An increase in the basic industry of agriculture may be illustrated by the country's wheat production which has been as follows:

Year.	Bushels.
1880	32,350,269
1890	42,232,372
1900	55,572,368
1910	132,077,547
1919	193,260,400

As indicating the development which has taken place in the production of our agriculture, forests, mines, and fisheries, and the growth of our manufacturing establishments, I desire to place on record the following statistics:

If the progress of the past be but a fair indication of the future, the problems of to-day and to-morrow may be faced without doubt of a successful issue.

During the period covered by the above statistics an immense railway system has been built. In 1879 the mileage of steam railways in Canada was 6,484, and in 1919, 38,896.

A great canal system has also been constructed from tide water to the head of the Lakes at a capital cost of $110,823,237.42 to the country. Large and commodious public buildings have also been erected, with the result that an investment has been made in Government capital accounts of $766,912,802.71, while the Dominion ledger shows Government investments amounting to $1,078,537,461.27.

National Debt.

The ledger as of March 31, 1920, shows the country's gross debt to be $3,014,483,774.12. The capital accounts referred to are not deducted from this debt but the ledger, treating investments as active, deducts them from the gross debt and discloses a net debt of $1,935,946,312.85. Beyond all question it is a matter of importance that the exact position of the country's debt should be clear. While the books are correctly kept and the entries properly made, in my opinion some of the investments cannot be characterized as active investments. They are shown as follows:

It is obvious that the advances to the Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk Pacific, and Grand Trunk Railway Companies cannot be treated as active assets. They are not at the moment realizable; further, no interest is being paid, and in some cases the principal as well as interest is overdue. As is well known, Canada is now the owner of the Canadian Northern, receiver for the Grand Trunk Pacific, and steps have been taken for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. While the railways have potential value, at the present time the fact is that the country itself owns the Canadian Northern and is responsible for the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific, with resultant heavy cost to the taxpayer.

Assets which are not readily convertible, as the specie reserve is, or are not interest producing, are not such assets as ought to be deducted from the gross debt. They are inactive, they are items of such a character as might well be placed in a suspense account. At any rate, whatever may be their future value, however great it may be, they are not assets of such a character as to directly reduce the gross debt any more than the other capital accounts of the country ought to be deducted from it.

I would therefore reduce the deductions made from the gross debt by the railway items already referred to, and on the same grounds after making a study of the amounts making up the $39,000,000 odd charged to miscellaneous investments, I would reduce that item by $11,015,951.20, and the item, miscellaneous and banking accounts, of $175,000,000 odd by the sum of $56,592,463.12. While the charge against the Imperial Government is correctly stated as of the above date, beyond all question there are further contra accounts of the Imperial Government which will approximately reduce this credit item by some $33,033,333.34. The result of providing for this contra account and of treating the inactive items as items that ought to go in suspense or capital account is to reduce the investments included in calculating the net debt by $337,359,124.07, and to increase the net debt as shown from $1,935,946,312.85 to $2,273,305,436.92.

Inflation.

There undoubtedly is in Canada as everywhere else inflation in the price of commodities, inflation in currency, and inflation in credits. Our total issue of Dominion notes on March 31, 1914, was $117,795,718. It reached a peak of $337,319,309 in November 1918 and on the 31st March last it amounted to $311,-932,791. Of this amount $128,366,066 is issued against gold. The amount of gold required under the Dominion Notes Act, as amended, to secure an issue of this amount is $90,866,066. Gold to the extent of $100,-286,280 is available. $26,000,000 of the remainder of the currency was issued for national purposes under the authority of the Dominion Notes Act 1915, and secured as therein provided. $50,000,000 was issued for the purpose of making advances to the Imperial Treasury and is secured by the pledge of approved securities, and $107,-566,725 was issued to the banks secured by approved securities largely consisting of Imperial Treasury Bills and our own Treasury Bills. As a result there has been an increase since March 31, 1914, in the circulation issued by the Dominion of $194,137,-073.

The banks' circulation on 31st March, 1914, was $96,848,384. In November of the preceding year a high point of $126,839,-620 was reached. On the 31st March last it amounted to $225,769,628. As against this increase, in the same period the holdings of the banks in cash reserves (gold and subsidiary coin) rose from $45,661,913 to $79,-990,836, and the deposit of Dominion notes and gold in the Central Gold Reserves, earmarked for the redemption of the bank note circulation, rose from $3,500,000 to $108,-200,000. In addition, the bank holdings in Dominion notes for general reserve purposes rose from $96,227,321 to $184,152,673.

Tabulating for purposes of comparison the combined circulation of the country as of March 31st, 1914, and the 31st March last, the result is as follows:—

	March 31st, 1914.	March 31st, 1920.

As the statement shows, the combined circulation of the country amounted on March 31st last to $440,002,420 as against $211,144,102 on March 31st, 1914, a percentage increase of 108 per cent.

Comparing these increases with those of other countries, the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna recently stated that the circulation of Great Britain had increased 207 per cent between 1914 and the end of 1919, while the circulation of the United States, as given in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, shows an increase of 70 per cent from June 30, 1914, to the corresponding date in 1919. The circulation of other countries taking a prominent part in the war has increased to far greater percentages.

Unquestionably, the currency in light of former gold reserves is inflated. The fact, however, is that the world over currency to an ever-increasing degree is related to movement of commodities, secured by a national guarantee supported by approved securities. This trend was apparent before the war. The best illustration is perhaps afforded by the Federal Reserve legislation of the United States. Under that legislation, currency issued by Federal Reserve Banks requires a gold reserve of 40 per cent and no currency stands higher.

Under all the circumstances, bearing in mind that Canada before the war had to borrow abroad to finance her own requirements, bearing in mind that during the war and since the Armistice she has not only financed herself but has also extended credits to other nations, the situation of the country's currency is very remarkably good. The percentage of the gold reserves to the Dominion and bank note circulation is 43 per cent. The percentage of gold to the total circulation of Great Britain based on 1919 figures is 26 per cent and of the United States approximately 55 per cent.

The circulation, large as it is, is all required. The greatest demand that actual circulation has to meet is the pay-envelope. In view of to-day's conditions the world over on a greatly increased wage scale, much more circulation is now required for this purpose. The increased prices of commodities mean that more money must be kept in the tens of thousands of shop-tills all over the country. The constantly increasing demands on the Mint tell their own story. In 1914, 11,770,108 pieces of coinage were turned out; in 1919, 35,906,003 pieces, and for last march, 2,677,874 pieces were coined as against 806,646 pieces in March, 1914.

Increased credits have contributed and contributed largely in the first instance to the abnormal increase in the cost of commodities, and to a lesser extent increased circulation contributed to the same result. The cost of commodities under new high standards once having been arrived at, however, if business is to continue in Canada under existing world conditions, both the inflated currencies and inflated credits are at the moment necessary to support it. The high prices in Canada could not be and were not made by Canadian action alone. They are the result of the general trend in the prices of commodities the world over, and to-day were it possible to suddenly deflate Canadian credits and circulation, with the general demand for commodities that to-day exists, the influence on the general situation would be negligible. Prices would continue high and the only result to the Canadian public consequent on the withdrawal of purchasing power would be stagnation of business, unemployment, and loss of production.

As stated, inflation of credit has more to do with increased buying power and therefore, with that increased buying power, has more to do with affecting the cost of commodities than circulation. It is true that in part these credits are increased by an inflated circulation, but the circulation deposited in banks from time to time plays but a small part of the total deposits. Every credit transaction, every advance made by a bank to a customer inevitably produces a corresponding deposit in the banks of that customer's creditor or creditors. The net result is to increase bank deposits by the extent of the credit and to increase the liabilities of the bank granting the credit without any corresponding increase in its cash assets. Obviously, if the money advanced is to be applied in a productive agency which would be carried on with a profit and result in a large gain of commodities to the country, there is no inflation. On the other hand, the business situation has been improved.

The credit basis which is more vicious than any other basis is that which is given for Government expenditure on non-productive objects and which does not result in any addition to the national production. Every loan for an unproductive purpose that the Government makes, no matter how successful it be, to some extent at any rate increases the credit inflation of the country. It either does it directly, as in cases where money is loaned to loan subscribers by the banks for the purpose of enabling them to take up the Government's securities, or indirectly by taking away from the productive agencies of the country savings which otherwise would be available for them, rendering it necessary for the banks to enlarge credits for essential purposes of production which otherwise would have been met by the savings of the nation. Government borrowing, in other words, has the effect of removing capital, the tool of industry, from its ordinary and legitimate purpose of industry and production. It ought to be noted that in Canada the loan situation is extremely satisfactory. Not only has the great bulk of our loans been subscribed to by our own people but in connection with all our large popular issues not one single bond has been subscribed to by the banks. Canadian banks are not loaded with governmental securities.

The increase in bank deposits which has been brought about in Canada is in a very similar ratio to that which has happened in other countries. Our total deposits on 31st March, 1914, amounted to $991,734,246, and on the 31st March last amounted to $1,855,131,598, an increase of 87 per cent. In England, according to Rt. Hon. Mr. McKenna, bank deposits increased 115 per cent from 1914 to 1919, while in the United States an increase of 80 per cent in total deposits occurred between 1914 and 1919.

In Canada it may be noted that the Government's war borrowings amounted in round numbers to $2,000,000,000 as against an increase in deposits amounting to $863,397,352. As a result, the increase in pub lic purchasing power gauged by the total currency in circulation and total bank deposits in Canada increased 91 per cent in 1919 over the figures of 1914. In England the increase was 125 per cent and in United States 78 per cent.

The commerce of the country still requires ample credits. On the 31st March, 1914, the total of loans made by the Canadian banks amounted to $928,184,060, and on the 31st March last the loans amounted to $1,527,078,232, an increase of 65 per cent. This large sum does not include any advance to the Government. Although the business men of the country and those requiring accommodation are now enjoying this great increase in credits, the fact is that from available resources the banks in Canada as well as in all other countries ought not to meet the full requests made for further credits, apart entirely from the injurious effect credits still further increased would have on the general economic situation.

The situation is therefore one in which it is impossible by any direct Government action to bring about deflation either in circulation or in credits without great danger of economic disaster. Inflation can only safely be cured in this as in other countries, by the Government and Provincial Governments stopping further loans, and by all governmental institutions, including municipalities and indeed every individual whose circumstances permit it, reducing expenditure whenever possible and by an increased production in all our forms of productive industry.

While the trade figures of the country show advances in the value of our production and exports, and while these figures correctly show our standing and growth as compared with those of other nations, the fact must not be lost sight of that these figures are based on the inflated values today obtaining and that expressed in quantities the production of the country instead of increasing has actually decreased. Without wearying the House with statistics, it is sufficient to merely point to the best indicator of trade activities, that is, the amount of tonnage handled by the country's railroad system.

Those statistics show that in 1918 our railways handled 127,543,687 tons of freight. This indicates a remarkable activity particularly in view of the fact that many of the country's best workers were overseas and that relatively a very large proportion of our population was withdrawn from agriculture and industry. It is specially significant in view of the fact that in the year 1914, with our men at home, the freight handled only amounted to 101,393,989 tons. The tonnage handled last year, however, only amounted to 116,699,572 tons. Instead of decreasing our production the imperative necessities of the country required that it should be largely increased, not only to assist in financing and carrying on the country's operations but also to assist in bringing about that reduction of the present high cost of living which is so much desired.

Trade.

I have already referred to the aggregate trade for the past year and the favourable balance that has developed over the past five years. The results of the past year require a greater detail. Canada's external trade in 1919-20 resulted in a favourable balance of $220,000,000. The chaotic condition of foreign exchange during the year was not without its influence on our business abroad and tended to complicate the readjustment of international trade. In the United Kingdom—our largest selling market—the Canadian dollar was at a premium ranging from 1 to 22 per cent, while in the United States, where some 75 per cent of the national purchases are made, our dollar has been at a discount of from 2⅜ per cent to 17⅛ per cent.

The rate of exchange thus worked against Canada in her chief selling market as well as in her chief purchasing market. An appreciated currency assists national buying in any market, in which it is at a premium, while purchases are made proportionately the more onerous when made in a market where the currency is at a discount.

Our total imports from United Kingdom amounted to $126,274,000, which is $53,000,000 greater than in 1919 and very nearly, as expressed in dollars, equalled our pre-war trade with the Mother Country. Her purchases from us totalled $489,000,000, a decrease of $51,000,000 from 1919, the balance of trade being $363,000,000 in Canada's favour. While our exports to Great Britain have fallen off, it should be noted that the 1919 figures included about $170,000,000 for munitions and war materials. To the extent of $120,000,000, therefore, this transient trade has been replaced by trade of a more permanent character. The increase in imports from Great Britain has been very marked in recent months. They rose from a low point of $5,204,979 in April to $25,555,386 in March, the latter figure constituting not only a record but an extraordinary increase. Figures for the last six months have been as follows:—

October	$ 8,655,848
November	10,919,282
December	9,888,075

January	16,414,503
February	14,953,730
March	25,555,386

The increase in imports from the Mother Country is very gratifying and is very significant. The greatest previous volume of her monthly exports to Canada prior to the war was $14,395,740 in March, 1913. It is to be noted that the good old Mother Country very nearly doubled March last, the greatest amount of exports she has ever sent to this country.

Exports to the United States amounted to $464,000,000, increasing by $9,000,000, while imports from that country reached the unprecedented figure of $802,000,000 exceeding 1919 imports by $55,000,000. The year's trading, therefore, resulted in an unfavourable trade balance of $338,000,000. The volume of imports from the United States is all the more remarkable owing to the fact that for a considerable period of the year the adverse exchange rate which has obtained has added to the extent of the depreciation of our money in New York an additional cost to the Canadian purchaser. It is apparent that the mere question of cost has not weighed very much upon the Canadian buyer. Undoubtedly, the exchange rate is against the interests of our national buying from the United States. If practicable it ought to be remedied but it cannot be properly remedied by any artificial means. It will be remedied and can only be permanently relieved when sterling advances to its normal position and Canada's interchange of commodities with United States is reduced to a more reasonable ratio.

The following compilations indicate the trend of our trade both as to imports, exports, and total trade: (1) with all countries; (2) with the United Kingdom; and (3) with the United States, for the last three years and for the pre-war years of 1913 and 1914:—

Revenue, 1919-20.

The revenue for the fiscal year ended 31st March last will when the accounts are finally closed reach approximately $388,000,000. This is the largest revenue that the country has ever collected. Instead of lessened receipts, as conditions at the time the last Budget was prepared seemed to indicate, the revenue of the preceding year has been exceeded by $75,000,000, and the country's revenue for 1920 was no less than $255,000,000 greater than that of the first year of the war. The chief sources of revenue were as follows:

Customs	$169,000,000
Excise	43,000,000
Post Office	22,000,000
Business Profits War Tax	44,000,000
Income Tax	20,000,000
Other war taxation	17,000,000

Expenditure, 1919-20.

The consolidated fund ordinary expenditure will be approximately $349,000,000. This sum of $349,000,000 includes $108,500,000 interest on public debt, $26,000,000 for pensions, and $49,000,000 for Soldiers' Re-establishment.

For investment and capital outlays, beyond the ordinary current expenditure of $349,000,000, an expenditure of $187,856,991 is estimated. The resultant total is $536,741,110 and represents the outlay of Canada for all purposes apart from war during the past year.

With a total revenue of $388,000,000 and an ordinary expenditure of $349,000,000, it will be seen that during the fiscal year 1919-20 the Government, after meeting all ordinary expenditure, including an increased amount for interest account and pensions over the previous year totalling nearly $39,000,000, has a surplus of approximately $39,000,000 over ordinary expenditure, to apply to capital expenditure.

The demobilization expenditures for 1919-20 will amount to $350,000,000, making a total outlay for the year of $886,741,110. Our total expenditure for the war, up to and including the 31st March, 1920, now amounts to $1,674,000,000, apart altogether from such expenses resulting from the war, as Pensions, Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, Soldiers' Land Settlement, and interest on war debt.

Debt.

During the year just passed the country paid off a floating debt of $247,000,000 out of the proceeds of the Victory Loan issue of 1919. The floating or short date indebtedness of the country at the close of the year amounted to only $88,956,000. The addition to the debt during the year amounted to $395,000,000 and the position of the net debt has already been referred to.

Expenditures for 1920-21.

The Main Estimates for 1920-21 total $537,149,428 and Supplementary Estimates for $12,500,000 for bonus purposes have been tabled, with the question of Main Supplementary Estimates still standing.

In the above-mentioned Estimates already brought down certain considerable amounts classified as investments are included as follows:

Soldiers' Land Settlement Loans	$50,000,000
Loans to Canadian Northern Railway Company	48,600,000
For Railway Equipment purposes	17,000,000
Loans to provinces for Better Housing purposes	13,300,000 to which ought to be added $20,000,000 for shipbuilding programme included in the above Estimates as "Public Works (Marine Department), Capital."

The estimated expenditure on ordinary account for the present year is: Main Estimates, $328,500,000 and Civil Service bonus, $12,500,000. Of this, $140,000,000 represents interest on public debt, an increase over 1919-20 of $31,500,000. An estimated expenditure on capital account of $41,000,000 is also included in the total of $549,649,428. There will be no separate Act providing for demobilization expenses this year. The Main Estimates contain provision for $38,463,400 for this purpose and also cover distributed items to the amount of $1,745,624 for services paid out of the demobilization appropriation last year. In order to compare the expenditure proposed for all purposes apart from the war with that of the past year the amount then of $40,209,024 must be deducted from this year's Estimates. As these Estimates are also enlarged by an unescapable increase of $31,500,000 in debt interest, it will be found that for comparable expenditures, notwithstanding increased costs of service, a saving of $71,709,024 is indicated.

Probable income for the present Fiscal Year, 1920-21.

The revenue for the year ending the 31st March, 1921, estimated on the basis of existing fiscal legislation, and assuming that values of importations for customs purposes remain practically the same as for 1919-20, should amount to $381,000,000 as follows:

Customs	$167,000,000
Excise	43,000,000
Post Office	22,000,000
Government railways for 9 months	28,000,000
Business Profits War Tax	40,000,000
Income Tax	35,000,000
Other War Taxation	17,000,000
All other revenues	29,000,000

The revenue from the Government railways for 1919-20 is put at $42,500,000. For 1920-21 only $28,000,000 is taken into account on the assumption that at the end of this calendar year the revenue from Government railways will be under the control of the Canadian National Railways, and applied directly against the working expenses of such railways, which will be correspondingly reduced in our estimate of ordinary expenditures for the year.

Including the estimated revenue of $381,000,000, cash on hand and outstanding counts including balances due from Great Britain make a whole total of $720,441,752.88. In all probability the whole of these accounts will not be collected within the year and $571,000,000 will more accurately represent the actual cash resources for the year. No further loan, as already pointed out, ought to be made. In addition to the commitments already mentioned, certain floating obligations mature during the year. They are as follows:

Treasury Bills, Oct. 1st, 1920	$24,605,000
Treasury Bills, Oct. 15th, 1920	49,215,000
Debenture Stock, June 1st, 1920.	238,400
Total	$74,058,400

The revenue of the year and cash assets available should at least not only carry current expenditure but retire this debt.

Grand Trunk Acquisition.

The current expenditure, however, will be greater this year than that already indicated. Deficits on the railway system have been reported in the Main Estimates. These deficits during the readjustment period will be materially increased by the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. The primary object of the acquisition of the Grand Trunk was to render efficient and properly complete the National system. The country had a large railway investment with proper terminal facilities in the West, but, speaking generally, lacking them in the East. The railway burden was also largely increased by the failure of the Grand Trunk Pacific promoted and owned by the Grand Trunk. The country was faced with the necessity either of providing new terminals at great cost in eastern centres, leading to a still greater railroad duplication, or of acquiring the Grand Trunk system. The traffic centres of the East had to be opened to the National system if that system was to be put upon a proper basis and enabled to properly compete in all through-traffic. Over and above this, the Grand Trunk was acquired for the purpose of reducing existing duplication and enabling extensive operating economies to be made.

Over and above these considerations, the acquisition of the Grand Trunk was highly desirable in order to prevent the insolvency of the line and the consequent breakdown of railroad facilities in the districts served by that system. Railway receiverships in some instances do not carry with them serious consequences, but in the case of the Grand Trunk a receivership would be exceedingly objectionable owing to the fact that the company's system is composed of many separate railway corporations having in instances separate obligations and different creditors, rendering a re-organization as of a completed system very difficult. Such re-organization would be attended with still greater difficulty owing to the fact that part of it would take place under the direction of United States courts and part under the direction of Canadian courts. The dislocation of business would have been exceedingly great and the inconvenience and loss to Canadian shippers and consignees and to Canadian business heavy.

Some economies ought to be effected in the near future, but with the arbitration pending it is improbable that full benefit of the Grand Trunk acquisition can be expected in the current year. It will be necessary to make advances to the company to cover past due operating obligations. These advances will constitute obligations of the company and as such must be taken into account in the arbitration. In addition to this, advances of necessity will be made to provide for this year's operations, including the acquisition of necessary rolling stock.

The abstract of the company's cash book as of February 21 last shows obligations overdue or shortly payable amounting to $18,710,588, made up in large part of unpaid vouchers, bank overdrafts, drafts held for acceptance and short date notes given for supplies. As against these debts the Grand Trunk has supplies on hand and certain capital accounts as against which no capital issue has been made. They are, however, not of a character which can be relied upon for the purpose of supplying cash to meet these liabilities.

The approximate amount to cover advances for the purposes above mentioned is $28,000,000.

Railway difficulties and overdrafts ought now to be at their peak. Proper co-ordination and economies will, just as soon as the Grand Trunk arbitration is over, be practicable and will be put into effect. The balance sheet, however, inevitably depends on the cost of carrying on business, which has been very greatly increased, and the general rate schedule. The serious drain made by the railways on the country's finances ought to be materially lessened.

As a matter of common justice to Canada it should be stated that the charges of unfairness levied against Canada by different shareholders at Grand Trunk meetings, are unfounded. The simple fact remains that if the Grand Trunk had not been taken over the shareholders in all human probability would have lost their whole investment. It is entirely untrue that the Government forced the company to pay a highly increased wage scale and at the same time prevented it from raising its rates either directly or through the Board of Railway Commissioners. The chairman of the Grand Trunk is reported to have made the following statements at the special general meeting of the company:

> I knew there were influential men in Canada who thought the policy the Government should pursue was to let us alone, and that the weaker we became the easier we could be dealt with —(hear, hear)—they knew we were being forced by the Government to carry on under impossible conditions—conditions over which we had absolutely no control. What were those conditions? That we should meet every order issued by the Canadian Railway War Board to increase wages by immediate compliance, notwithstanding that no increase of rates to meet the increased expenses was allowed.....
> In 1918 an increase of freight rates was granted on a great portion of the freight carried, something under 15 per cent in March and something under 25 per cent in August. Notwithstanding this, owing to a further serious increase of wages being ordered by the Canadian Railway War Board, without any corresponding increase in rates, there was an actual decrease in net profit for 1918. The gross traffic for 1918 amounted to £12,600,000, as compared with £9,800,000 in 1917, or a gross increase of £2,700,000, but the working expenses increased by £2,900,000, or a net loss of £200,000 for 1918.
> In 1919, the accounts of which are not yet complete, the gross earnings are estimated at £14,000,000, as against £12,600,000 in 1918, or an increase of £1,400,000. Owing, however, to another large increase in wages being ordered by the Canadian Railway War Board—again without any increase in rates—it is not expected there will be any increase in net profit, and consequently the company will only be able to meet its fixed charges. Thus, in each of the three years—1917, 1918, and 1919—in consequence of being compelled, by order of the Canadian Railway War Board, to grant increased wages without sufficiently increased rates, the shareholders lost on the average at least between £1,250,000 and £1,500,000 in each of those three years, which they ought to have received in dividends.

The direct imputation conveyed to the shareholders was that the Railway War Board was a governmental institution to whose orders railways were subject. It was not. That board was not a statutory body but was an organization formed by the railway companies (including the operators of the Intercolonial) for the express purpose of more perfectly co-ordinating their activities and for the purpose of dealing with large railway questions. The board was organized in 1917. The Grand Trunk's representation was as follows: Mr. Howard G. Kelley, a president, and Mr. W. E. Gillen, chairman of the Administrative Committee. Mr. Gillen subsequently retired and Mr. W. D. Robb, a vice-president of the Grand Trunk, was elected a member of the Administrative Committee. In 1919 the board was reorganized as The Railway Association of Canada with Mr. Kelley this time as sole president and with Grand Trunk representation on every committee. The organization was entirely a railway organization. It was not a Government organization. The organization had, however, no control over railroad rates. The Grand Trunk has American lines as well as Canadian lines. It has traffic originating at American points for Canadian destinations. The rate for the shorter haul in Canadian territory cannot obviously be greater than the rates on the longer haul for Canadian destinations from American territory. Subject to this consideration, and just as soon as action was taken by the American Commission, every application made by the company for a general increased tariff during the whole of the war period was given effect to, and I am informed by the Board of Railway Commissioners that there is no general application for an increase of rates by the Grand Trunk Railway Company pending or refused, nor was any application of that character pending at the time the meeting was held. The highest dividend distribution of the Grand Trunk amounted to $4,736,241.22. The average dividend payments are much lower without deductions being made for deficits of the Grand Trunk Pacific (the subsidiary of the Grand Trunk and organized by it) which were met by advances made by the Parliament of Canada to an amount in excess of $50,000,000.

Luxury Taxes.

Not only is more revenue necessary but extravagant and luxurious expenditure ought to be checked. Just so long as expenditure on non-essentials and extravagant expenditure continues, just so much longer will the drop in the value of essentials be postponed. On those having income more than necessary for properly maintaining themselves and families, there rests a special duty of saving whenever possible and in this manner adding to the available financial resources for development and for industrial undertakings. Extravagant buying should stop. With this end in view, as well as for necessary revenue, it is proposed to levy on certain specified articles excise taxes which are to be paid by the purchaser to the vendor at the time of sale for consumption or use, or on importation for consumption or use other than resale. Upon certain articles of wearing apparel, such as boots, shoes, etc., in excess of $9 a pair, men's and boys' suits in excess of $45 each, fur coats and robes in excess of $100 each, women's dresses in excess of $45 each, women's suits in excess of $60 each, men's and women's overcoats in excess of $50 each; hats, hose, neckwear, shirts, purses, and gloves bought above specified prices, and on fans and opera cloaks, it is proposed to levy a tax of 10 per cent of the total purchase price. The women are given a little preference over the men because men's suits in excess of $45 will be taxed, whereas women's suits up to $60 will be exempt from taxation.

Mr. BUREAU: Where does the influence come from?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:: The same rate of tax is to apply to trunks in excess of $40 each, valises, suitcases, etc., in excess of $25 each; ivory handled cutlery, cut glass ware, velvet and silk fabrics, lace, ribbons, silk embroideries, and sporting goods.

Under the terms of the French Treaty silks, velvets, lace, and silk embroideries were given a preferential treatment. Not only was France interested in the Treaty but other countries making like importations received full benefits of the Treaty. These countries amounted to eleven in number, including Japan and Switzerland. The operation of the French Treaty ceases on the 19th June next and thereafter, subject to what further action may be taken when the tariff is revised, these articles will take rates from 30 to 35 per cent instead of the present rates ranging from 20 to 27½ per cent.

In addition to this, these luxuries will be subject to the above excise tax of 10 per cent on the whole of their purchase price.

A similar tax of 20 per cent of the total purchase price is to be levied upon such articles as cigar and cigarette holders and pipes in excess of $2.50 each, humidors and other equipment for smokers, hunting, shooting, and riding garments, fancy pocket knives, gold, silver, ebony and ivory toilet-ware, articles of silver adapted for household or office use, jewellery, fur wearing apparel (except as provided above), liveries, oriental rugs, expensive carpets and curtains, and chandeliers.

An excise tax of 10 per cent will also be payable at the time of sale by the Canadian manufacturer or when imported on boats, yachts, canoes, and motor boats (when used for commercial purposes refund of tax is provided for), cameras, candy and confectionery, firearms, shells or cartridges, pianos, organs, musical instruments, and plated ware adapted for household use.

A like tax of 20 per cent will be imposed upon mechanical player pianos, graphophones and mechanical musical instruments and records used therewith. Articles of gold adapted for household or office use will be taxed to 50 per cent of the selling prices. A specific tax on playing cards is also provided for. On all cards selling at wholesale rates not over $25 per gross packs, the tax will be 25 cents a pack and in excess of $25, 50 cents a pack.

Excise Tax on Motor Cars.

A large revenue was received during the year from taxation on motors which totalled $12,962,365, of this amount $6,378,171 being from customs duties and $6,584,194 from excise. The taxation of motors would seem to be a reasonable and proper source of revenue. The field, however, has been always occupied by the provinces, and instead of taxing motors generally, it has been determined to increase the excise tax, which is chargeable both on Canadian and imported cars, from 10 to 15 per cent.

Beer, Wine, and Spirit Duties.

It is also proposed to increase the duties on beer, wine, and spirits.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is cruelty.

Mr. BUREAU: There is no more beer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hasten to reassure my hon. friend that we do not class 2 per cent as beer, and it is therefore not subject to the tax. The proposals call for an increase in the duties on beer of 30 cents a gallon, on non-sparkling wines, 30 cents a gallon; on spirits, $2 a gallon, and on sparkling wines, $3 a gallon. These are in excess of the present duties both customs and excise.

Mr. BUREAU: That is the best prohibition law passed yet.

Sales Tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In view of the necessities of increased revenues, a tax of one per cent on the sales of all manufacturers, wholesale dealers, jobbers and importers is proposed. The tax will not include retailers as such but will include the goods manufactured or imported by any retailer although manufactured or imported by such retailer for r tail sale by himself. Consideration must also be given to the cost of essentials and on this account it has been determined that the tax will not apply to sales of meats, fresh, salted or pickled; butter, cheese; oleomargarine, margarine, butterine, or any other substitute for butter; lard, eggs, vegetables, fruits; grains and seeds in their natural state; buckwheat meal or flour; pot, pearl, rolled, roasted or ground barley; cornmeal, oatmeal, or rolled oats, rye flour, wheat flour; coffee, green, roasted or ground; tea, salt, cattle foods, hay and straw, nursery stock; fish, fresh, pickled, salted, smoked, dried or boneless; sugar, syrups and molasses; anthracite or bituminous coal; artificial limbs and parts thereof, or to goods exported.

The sales tax ought not to be used as a basis of further profits and must not, therefore, be included in the manufacturer's or wholesaler's costs on which profit is calculated. The tax when not absorbed by the vendor must then be included in his invoice as a separate item.

Stamp Taxes.

The existing tax on cheques will be continued, but the rate increased on bills of exchange and promissory notes so as to provide a 2 cent tax on all bills or notes of $100 or less and for every additional $100 or fractional part thereof 2 cents more. A tax of 2 cents for each share of stock transferred is also proposed.

The method of collecting stamp duties on patent and proprietary medicines and perfumery will be changed by having the stamps affixed by the manufacturer or importer instead of the retailer at the time of sale. The stamps are not to be included in the costs of the manufacturer or importer but if not absorbed by the seller are to be added in the invoice as a separate item.

Removal of Tax on Moving Picture Films.

Under existing legislation a special tax is collected on films used in moving picture theatres. The tax provided is a charge of 15 cents per film for each day upon which such film is used. It has been found that this duty has worked a hardship on small movie theatres. Many complaints have been received and it has become apparent that the tax in the case of the small theatres sometimes represents a charge of as high as 6 or 7 per cent of its total receipts, already subject to municipal and provincial taxation, while in the case of large theatres the tax amounts to less than 1 per cent of receipts. Undoubtedly the present tax is unfair in its incidence and it has been decided to remove it. Movie theatres and other forms of amusement would appear in the first instance proper subjects of taxation, but it is felt that if these theatres are to be subject to further taxation, it ought to be done by an increase in the existing forms of taxation imposed by the provincial and municipal authorities, rather than by a new federal tax.

Income Tax.

The income tax rate was substantially increased last year, so as to bring it up to the increased United States rates. The increase was material as the following examples indicate:

On incomes of	$	5,000	from	$ 100	to	$ 120	an increase of $ 20
"		10,000	from	392	to	590	" 198
"		20,000	from	1,382	to	1,990	" 608
"		30,000	from	2,702	to	3,890	" 1,188
"		50,000	from	5,782	to	9,190	" 3,408
"		100,000	from	17,607	to	31,190	" 13,583
"		200,000	from	50,957	to	93,190	" 42,233
"		1,000,000	from	499,157	to	663,190	" 164,033

The corporation tax was in like manner increased from 6 to 10 per cent.

These large increases will be payable this year for the first time. It is anticipated that they will yield approximately an additional $15,000,000. That our measures of taxation must in view of our geographical situation have regard to United States legislation is a principle that has found general acceptance. I do not desire to question it. But revenue is urgently required and a difference of 5 per cent in these individual and corporation taxes will not deter immigration and the investment of outside capital so essential to our national development and growth. It is therefore proposed to increase these taxes on incomes of $5,000 and upwards by 5 per cent. The increase will be made effective this year. As a result the tax on a personal income of $5,000 will be $126 as against a levy of $100 last year, and on an income of $50,000, $9,649.50 as against $5,782 last year. In the case of a corporation with an income of $100,000, the rate this year will be $10,500 as against $6,000 last year.

Collection of Income and Profits Taxes.

These taxes are not collected with desirable despatch and under the existing Acts there is reason for vexatious delays. An assessment once made by the department stands. As a result any zealous officer makes no assessment until satisfied that he has made every possible check and has exhausted all avenues of information bearing on the taxpayer's income. In addition to this, the business profits tax requires an exhaustive inquiry into the company affected—an inquiry which covers the question of the true amount at which capital stock should be valued, often resulting in shares being valued considerably below their actual selling market value, and also covers the liquid and other debts and obligations, liquid and other assets, depreciation and maintenance. In many cases personal incomes depend on the ascertainment of business profits taxes. The result is delay, loss of interest, and added difficulties in finally collecting the tax. Delay is inseparable from the business profits tax. The situation can, however, be materially improved in so far as the ordinary income tax is concerned.

A Bill will be introduced making each taxpayer in the first instance his own assessor. For the guidance of the taxpayer a plain table will be either attached to or included in the form of return showing exactly what taxes are payable on incomes of various amounts. The taxpayer will with his return include his cheque, either for the taxes properly payable by him or for an amount not less than 25 per cent of that sum—the remaining 75 per cent to be paid in three equal bi-monthly instalments, the first of such bi-monthly instalments to be paid at the expiration of two months after the return is made, and so that the whole amount of the tax will be paid in six months after the return is made. Interest will be charged at the rate of 6 per cent on all payments made on instalments. The returns will be carefully checked by the department and in all cases where it is discovered that overpayment has been made by the ratepayer, a refund for the amount must be immediately made to him or applied on any instalment due or becoming due. If investigation shows that the taxpayer has misstated his income, penalties will be provided. A mistake of 10 per cent in income might well arise from bona fide error and no penalty is proposed, except that the further payment found to be due will carry interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. Where the actual income exceeds 10 per cent and does not exceed 20 per cent of the amount shown by the taxpayer's return, a penalty of 50 per cent will be provided, and where the deficiency is greater than 20 per cent a penalty of 100 per cent will be provided. These penalties will be calculated on the amount the returns are deficient. The proper tax with interest at 10 per cent must also be paid.

Business Profits War Tax.

Many representations have been made against the continuance of the Business Profits War Tax. The tax is charged with being largely responsible for the high cost of living. It is held that it is impossible to fairly collect and administer the tax owing to the different characteristics of different businesses and to the fact that what is a fair profit in one class of business is entirely inadequate in another, and further that the capitalization of companies differs very very widely in proportion to their activities and to their resultant profits, so that some companies are taxed on the same amount of income, derived from the same class of business, very much more heavily than others. It is attacked on the ground that it directly contributes to extravagance and places a premium on inefficiency, that in many instances companies in providing for the tax have advanced their costs in far greater proportion than was at all necessary to provide for these payments and still keep their business in a flourishing condition. It is further contended that much of the profits are represented by necessary plant extensions and by stocks of commodities on hand which have been bought and are valued at current high prices, so that 100 per cent of profits shown by the books are rarely if ever represented by cash.

Much undoubtedly can be said against the Business Profits War Tax. Under normal conditions it would indeed be hard to find any argument which would justify its continuance. We are not yet, however, under normal conditions. Supply has not yet caught up to demand, and in some lines of business activity, at any rate, the salutary effects of competition are, as a result, not in play, and whatever can be said against the Business Profits Tax, it at least has meant that a substantial sum of money has been recovered for the country out of large profits.

Business in 1919 was carried on under the existing Business Profits Tax and to the full extent that it was possible for companies to avoid the tax and pass the full incidence to others, that will already have been done. During the current fiscal year our business profits revenues will come from 1919 profits, the tax being levied under last year's Act at the maximum rates. It may possibly be that with another year, business will be more normal and that no Business Profits Tax ought to be levied. It undoubtedly is probable that some measure of deflation and retrenchment will have occurred, that there will be some decrease in the inflated prices of commodities, and it is in the interest of the country that business concerns should be able to make some provision for shrinking price lists and decreased buying power of their customers. Our Business Profits Tax is at a high rate. It makes no allowance for pre-war profits, however large they may have been, but fixes an arbitrary return of 7 per cent on the capital employed before the tax commences to operate. Unquestionably, with the higher return money to-day commands, 7 per cent is not a reasonable reward for commercial ventures. It has been determined that it is impossible to stop immediately the imposition of the Business Profits Tax, and a resolution will be introduced which will provide for the continuance of a tax of this character, but on a reduced scale, on the profits derived during the year 1920, the tax being payable in 1921. The present exemption will be extended from 7 to 10 per cent, the schedule of taxation to be as follows:

	Tax.
On profits in excess of 10% but not exceeding 15%	20%
On profits in excess of 15% but not exceeding 20%	30%
On profits in excess of 20% but not exceeding 30%	50%
On profits over 30%	60%

The present Act provides a different scale of taxation for the profits of businesses with capital of not less than $25,000 and under $50,000, being one-quarter of all profits exceeding 10 per cent on the amount of the capital employed. It is proposed to reduce this tax from 25 to 20 per cent.

It has been felt that the concessions made in the proposed amendments are sufficient for the purpose of enabling firms to set aside more of their profits to reserves or plant extensions and to put their businesses in a better position to meet the deflation period, while at the same time a check will still be held on abnormal profits.

Removal of Customs War Duty.

The general war customs duty of 7½ per cent was repealed last year in so far as articles of food, clothing, agricultural implements, and fertilizers, as well as some other items are concerned. It, however, still obtains on a large part of our importations, approximately thirty million dollars of revenue accruing from this source last year. It is a tax which has been blamed, perhaps as much as any tax, with the exception of the business profits war tax, as a reason for the high cost of living. Notwithstanding the need for revenue, in view of the fact that it is impossible at the present time to intelligently revise the tariff and the further fact that the incidence of this tax, placed as it is in a general blanket way, works and maintains inconsistencies, it is proposed to abolish entirely this 7½ per cent war duty.

Minor Tariff Changes.

A very apparent anomaly exists in the present tariff which ought to be corrected and the correction of which can do no possible harm to any Canadian trade or industry. That anomaly consists in the tariff items which allow the importation free of duty of novels and other books (other than scientific works), when printed in languages other than English or French. It is proposed to remove the discrimination in favour of foreign publications by placing them in the same category as those published in English or French.

Owing to the fact that the blind population of Canada has been increased by the war, it is deemed a small measure of justice to remove the duty on books and other essentials for the blind which are not manufactured in Canada or which are only of special use and advantage to blind people.

Tariff Revision.

The following statement was issued on December 15 last on the subject of tariff revision:—

Since the signing of the Armistice a little over a year ago the Government and Parliament have been devoting attention to peace and reconstruction problems. Among the many questions that have received consideration is that relating to a general revision of the tariff. Dealing with this subject my predecessor Sir Thomas White, in his last Budget Speech is reported in Hansard, June 5 last, as follows:—

"It would not be practicable at this time to make a sound general revision of the tariff. International trade is most unsettled, still hampered by war restrictions and prohibitions and by exchange conditions, which are and may long continue to be subject to violent fluctuations. Prices are unstable, and labour conditions, internationally speaking, most uncertain. Until peace is restored and the world is upon a more stable basis with respect to capital, labour, prices, markets, and exchange, the tariff cannot be revised intelligently.

"It is my hope that within a year conditions will have become so stabilized as to permit of a general revision of the tariff, which is long, but, owing to the war, unavoidably overdue. Preceding such revision there should be a thorough inquiry conducted by the Minister of Finance and two or more of his colleagues representing the different geographical sections of Canada. Such inquiry should afford all interests, agricultural, industrial, fishing, lumbering, mining, commercial, and financial, producers and consumers alike, an opportunity of expressing their views and opinions and urging their particular needs and requirements. The result of such inquiry should be a body of information which will enable the Government to effect a general revision of the tariff fair to all parts of the community and effectually promoting the national welfare of Canada. This inquiry should proceed with its work just as soon as conditions are sufficiently stabilized to permit. My own view is that it might well be commenced about autumn of this year."

Unfortunately, international and economic conditions are not only far from normal but in many respects are worse than they were six months ago or at any time during the entire war period. International exchanges in particular are not only unstable but erratic. Tariff considerations of necessity have largely to be based on international and economic conditions and the result is that the different countries of the world are still refraining from any general tariff rearrangement, waiting until some appreciation may be possible of the future conditions, under which their tariffs will operate. Inasmuch, however, as any general tariff revision must be based upon as complete a knowledge as possible of the conditions and relations one to another of our various national industries and productive agencies, and as it is also desirable to obtain the views of as many persons as possible whose practical knowledge and experience would be most valuable, it is considered advisable to begin the collection of information relative thereto.

In order to obtain proper results from public hearings and in order to give all those interested the best opportunity of presenting their cases, it has been decided that the inquiry shall be started by written statements, which should cover each particular issue as each interested claimant for relief sees it. These statements ought to show the particular complaint in each instance, a full statement of the grounds on which that complaint is based, the remedy proposed, and a statement of the grounds leading to the conclusion that such remedy proposed is effective. The issue is really of course not merely a tariff issue from the standpoint of protection or otherwise but is also a revenue issue, and in like manner the submissions of those desiring reductions in tariff should at the same time show methods by which compensating revenues can be obtained from taxation or other sources. The preparation of these statements will necessarily require much careful consideration. Those desiring to make representations as to the problems involved are therefore asked to undertake the preparation of the same without delay and forward their statements addressed to the Minister of Finance at Ottawa. Upon receipt of the statements they will be systematically analysed and classified for the purpose of making them a basis of the general public inquiry to be held throughout the country as indicated by Sir Thomas White.

While unfortunately trade and economic conditions are yet unstable, the tariff investigation has commenced and public sittings will be held throughout Canada after prorogation. The investigation will be conducted by the Department of Finance with the assistance of such expert and other advisers as will be necessary to conduct a thorough inquiry. I am further of the opinion that not only should the investigation proceed but that information should now be given of the principles and policies of the Government in the light of which effect will be given in the tariff revision to follow to the evidence and facts developed in the inquiry.

Our policy calls for a thorough revision of the tariff with a view to the adoption of such reasonable measures as are necessary —(a) to assist in providing adequate revenues, (b) to stabilize legitimate industries and to encourage the establishment of new industries essential to the proper economic development of the nation—to the end that a proper and ever increasing field of useful and remunerative employment be available for the nation's workers, (c) to develop to the fullest extent our natural resources, (d) to specially promote and increase trade with the Mother Country, the sister dominions and colonies and Crown dependencies, (e) to prevent the abuse of the tariff for the exploitation of the consumer——

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some change.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —and, (f) to safeguard the interests of the Canadian people in the existing world struggle for commercial and industrial supremacy.

As a means of raising revenue, the tariff should be so adjusted as to place the chief burden upon those best able to bear it. Articles of luxury should be heavily taxed through the imposition of customs and excise rates. Food commodities and other necessaries of life, not produced or manufactured in Canada, should, if taxed at all, bear only such imposts as are necessary for revenue purposes. Those produced in Canada should be subjected to such customs duties only as may be necessary in the general national interest to be determined after strict investigation from time to time.

Apart from the question of revenue, the tariff should have regard to the maintenance, stability and prosperity of Canadian enterprise in the development of all our natural resources in lands, forests, mines, fisheries, as well as our agricultural and manufacturing industries. Consideration must also be given to the importance of creating and maintaining conditions that will afford to Canadian industrial workers opportunities for steady and remunerative employment. It is undoubtedly in the true interests of Canada as a whole that Canadian workers should not be forced to seek in foreign countries employment and opportunity denied them at home by reason of the export of the natural resources, primary products, and raw materials with which the Dominion is so amply endowed.

For the purpose of encouraging the fullest development of our natural resources the tariff should be so adjusted as to permit machinery and the implements of production to be purchased at prices that will compare equitably with those paid in other countries for similar articles. The revised tariff law should be so framed and administered as to effectively prevent any customs duty being used to facilitate the formation or maintenance of any combine, trust, association or agreement among manufacturers, dealers, or producers for the purpose, at the expense of the general public, of restraining trade, preventing competition, or unduly enhancing the selling price of any article of commerce. The principle of trade preference between the different members of the Britannic Commonwealth should be maintained and extended from time to time to such degree as may be found practicable and consistent with Canadian interests.

While a general revision of the Canadian tariff based upon the foregoing considerations is due, it must be recognized that, owing to the war, economic and commercial conditions the world round have been profoundly disturbed and that, as a consequence it is neither practicable nor possible in the national or public interest to undertake such revision until a thorough inquiry is made to ascertain the essential facts upon which tariff provisions must necessarily be based.

All the financial difficulties of the moment can be, and I have no doubt will be, readily met. I am confident that every hon. gentleman has the firmest belief and confidence in Canada—and that belief is well justified. Immigration and a reasonable investment of outside capital rendering our illimitable national resources available, but above all the national characteristics and strength of character of the citizens of Canada, will easily surmount the past. And Canada's situation to-day is indeed an enviable one. There is no country in the world that can offer greater inducements to the immigrant and greater inducements to foreign capital than Canada can. Prosperity is entirely relative. Our position relatively has enhanced. We have finished borrowing, and notwithstanding the great increase in our debt, Canada's securities to-day stand as high, or higher, than those of any foreign country in what is to-day the great market for foreign securities—New York. Canada's world status is far greater to-day notwithstanding her losses and war debts than it was in 1914.

I crave the indulgence of the House, Mr. Speaker, for the length of time I have spoken before introducing these resolutions. I wonder if before reading them I might not say just one or two words more. You know, some people to-day think, and apparently believe, that the country is in a bad state; I do not. Some people to-day think, and apparently believe, that the job ahead of Canada is a bigger job than Canada can look after; I do not. I wonder if we are not altogether too prone to forget what Canada has done; I wonder if we are not entirely too prone to forget the amount of hard work, of sacrifice and of devotion that the Canadian people showed themselves capable of sustaining during the war period.

Are we not a little too apt to forget that it was the soldiers of Canada who formed just a few short months ago the spearhead of the forces of righteousness? Are we not a little too apt to forget that we have got the same spirit and the same blood in Canada yet? Are we not a little too apt to forget that their magnificent achievements never could have been and never would have been possible had not the men behind and, indeed, the women, too, seen to it that the soldiers were supported, that reinforcements were sent? Yes, the war record is a glorious record; but there were other war activities. Why, there is no better record than the record of the Canadian Medical Staff; no better record than the record of Canada's production; no better record than the record of Canada's transportation facilities, which remained at a higher point than did those of any other country engaged in the war.

Does it not seem rather ridiculous for any one to seriously think that a nation that has done so much will not now be able to look after its own business; that a nation that has done so much for Europe and the world is not going to do something for Canada—something for that Canada which is so dear to every Canadian, something for that Canada which is to-day so infinitely more precious and glorious by reason of the sacrifices made by her fighting men than she ever was before, something for that country which the very best of us in consecrating his services to her is compensated by the thought that it is impossible for any Canadian to do too much for Canada?

RESOLUTIONS.

I beg to give notice that upon the House resolving itself into committee I shall move the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and to provide:—

1. That the following excise taxes be imposed, levied and collected on the total purchase price of the articles hereinafter specified, and on articles of clothing the said tax may be imposed upon the combined selling price of materials and cost of manufacture when sold separately:—

On champagne and all other sparkling wines.

(i) A tax of fifty cents per gallon:—

On lime juice and fruit juices, fortified with or containing not more than twenty-five per cent of proof spirits not otherwise provided for in this resolution.

4. That the excise taxes as imposed by the preceding resolution shall be payable in addition to the present duties of excise and customs at the time of sale by the Canadian manufacturer or when imported, but shall not apply to such articles when exported, and shall be accounted for to His Majesty in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed.

5. That every person selling or dealing in the articles upon which taxes are imposed as prescribed by the foregoing resolutions, may be required by the minister to take out an annual license therefor, for which license a fee not exceeding $2 shall be paid.

6. That the provisions of the said foregoing Resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the 19th day of May, 1920, and to have applied to all goods mentioned therein imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

7. (a) That a tax of one per cent in addition to the present duties of excise and customs be imposed, levied and collected on sales by manufacturers, wholesalers, or on importations;

that the purchaser shall be furnished with a written invoice of any sale, which invoice shall state separately the amount of such tax, when not included in the purchase price; that such tax must not be included in the manufacturer's or wholesaler's costs on which profit is calculated; and the tax shall be paid by the purchaser to the wholesaler or manufacturer at the time of such sale, and by the wholesaler or manufacturer to His Majesty in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed, and such wholesaler or manufacturer shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500, if such payments are not made, and in addition shall be liable to a penalty equal to double the amount of the excise duties unpaid.

(b) That the minister may require every manufacturer and wholesaler to take out an annual license for the purposes aforesaid, and may prescribe a fee therefor, not exceeding $5, and the penalty for neglect or refusal shall be a sum not exceeding $1,000.

(c) That any such tax, costs or penalties may, at the option of the minister, be recovered and imposed in the Exchequer Court of Canada or in any other court of competent jurisdiction, in the name of His Majesty.

(d) That this tax on sales shall not apply to sales or importations of meats, fresh, salted or pickled; butter; cheese; oleomargarine, margarine, butterine or any other substitute for butter; lard; eggs; vegetables; fruits; grains and seeds in their natural state; buckwheat meal or flour; pot, pearl, rolled, roasted or ground barley; corn meal; oatmeal or rolled oats; rye flour; wheat flour; coffee, green, roasted or ground; tea; salt; cattle foods; hay and straw; nursery stock; fish, fresh, pickled, salted, smoked, dried or boneless; sugar, syrups and molasses; anthracite or bituminous coal; artificial limbs and parts thereof or to goods exported.

(e) That the provisions of this Resolution respecting a tax on sales shall be deemed to have come into force on the 19th day of May, 1920, and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouses for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

8. That a stamp tax of two cents be imposed, levied and collected on promissory notes and bills of exchange of the value of one hundred dollars or less, and that a tax of two cents additional be imposed on every one hundred dollars or fractional part thereof in eexcss of one hundred dollars.

9. That a stamp tax of two cents be imposed, levied and collected on each share of stock transferred.

10. That the provisions of the said Act relating to stamp duties on bottles and packages containing a proprietary or patent medicine or perfumery requiring that an adhesive stamp be affixed to such articles by the person selling the same, or by the importer, the manufacturer or producer, be amended to provide that the said provision shall remain in force as regards the stock of such articles in retail stores remaining unstamped on the 31st July, 1920, and such stock may be sold in accordance with such provisions until the 31st day of December, 1920, but on and after such last mentioned date every such article must be stamped before being exhibited or offered for sale. The stamps shall be affixed to all such articles on or after 1st August, 1920, by the manufacturer or importer thereof, or by such person as the minister may prescribe.

11. That respecting bottles or packages containing wines, sparkling and non-sparkling, manufactured or imported previous to the nineteenth day of May, 1920, stamps as set forth in the said Act shall be affixed thereto under regulations made by the minister.

12. That the provisions of the said Act relating to moving picture films, and all the other provisions of the said Act inconsistent with these Resolutions, be repealed.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917, and the amendments thereto, and to provide:

1. That the taxes and surtaxes, including the tax upon corporations and joint stock companies, leviable and payable under the provisions of section four of the said Act as enacted by chapter fifty-five of the statutes of 1919 shall each be increased by five per centum on incomes of five thousand dollars and upwards, such increases to apply to all taxes and surtax leviable for any income received during the calendar year nineteen hundred and nineteen or the income of any accounting period ending in nineteen hundred and nineteen, as the case may be, and for each calendar year or accounting period thereafter;

2. That each person liable to taxation under the said Act and the amendments thereto for the calendar year nineteen hundred and twenty or any accounting period ending in the year nineteen hundred and tweny and for each calendar year or accounting period thereafter shall deliver to the Minister of Finance, with each annual return of his income prescribed by section seven of the said Act as amended, an amount equal to at least one-fourth of the amount of the tax and surtax, if any, payable by such person according to such return, and shall pay the balance, if any, of such tax and surtax in not more than three bimonthly instalments theretafter, together with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum from the date prescribed for making such return up to the time of the payment of such instalment;

3. That any person making a return of income less than the correct amount shall pay the additional amount of tax and surtax due and in addition interest at the rate of ten per centum upon such amount until the same is paid.

If such deficiency exceeds ten per centum but is under twenty per centum, such person shall also pay an amount equal to one-half of the amount of such deficiency in addition, and if such deficiency amounts to twenty per centum or more such person shall pay an amount equal to the amount of such deficiency in addition.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and the amendments thereto, and to provide:

1. That the profits earned in any business during any accounting period ending in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty which do not exceed ten per cent per annum upon the capital employed in such business shall be exempt from the tax prescribed by the Act;

That upon any such profits exceeding ten per cent per annum and not exceeding fifteen per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to twenty per cent of such profits;

That upon any such profits exceeding fifteen per cent per annum and not exceeding twenty per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to thirty per cent of such profits;

That upon any such profits exceeding twenty per cent per annum and not exceeding thirty per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to fifty per cent of such profits;

That upon any such profits exceeding thirty per cent per annum there shall be paid a tax equal to sixty per cent of such profits;

That in the case of a business owned by an incorporated company with a capital of not less than twenty-five thousand dollars and under fifty thousand dollars employed in such business, there shall be paid a tax of twenty per cent of the amount by which the profits earned in such business during any accounting period ending in the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty exceeded ten per cent per annum;

2. That in respect to any business liable to taxation under the said Act having a capital of less than fifty thousand dollars the rates of taxation set forth in section three of the said Act as amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1917 shall apply in respect of the 1917 and 1918 accounting periods, if twenty per cent or more of such profits have been derived from the manufacture or dealing in munitions of war or materials or supplies of any kind for war purposes;

3. That the period during which the said Act is to be in operation be extended for one year, and that section twenty-six of the said Act be amended by substituting the word "twenty" for the word "nineteen" in the third line thereof, and by substituting the word "seventy-two" for the word "sixty" in the fourth line of the proviso in the said section.

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, 1907, and to strike thereout tariff items 172 and 483, the several enumerations of goods respectively, and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and to provide that the following items, enumerations and rates of duties be inserted in said Schedule A:

Tariff Items	—	British Preferential Tariff.	Intermediate Tariff.	General Tariff.
172	Books, viz.:—Books on the application of science to industries of all kinds, including books on agriculture, horticulture, forestry, fish and fishing, mining, metallurgy, architecture, electric and other engineering, carpentry, shipbuilding, mechanism, dyeing, bleaching, tanning, weaving and other mechanic arts, and similar industrial books; bibles, prayer-books, psalm and hymn-books, religious tracts, and Sunday school lesson pictures.	Free.	Free.	Free.
483	Stereotypes, electrotypes and celluloids of books, and bases and matrices and copper shells for the same, whether composed wholly or in part of metal or celluloid.....	Free.	Free.	Free.
698a	Typewriters and writing appliances specially adapted for use only by the blind, under regulations prescribed by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.....	Free.	Free.	Free.

2. Resolved, that it is expedient to amend Chapter 3 of the Acts of 1915 and Chapter 47 of the Acts of 1919, and to strike thereout Section 3 of Chapter 3 of the Acts of 1915 and Sections 3 and 4 of Chapter 47 of the Acts of 1919.

3. Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the provision of the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into operation on the nineteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, and to apply and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day, and to have also applied to such goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, while we can hardly be expected to agree with all that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) has said, I am sure that I can speak for my friends on this side of the House as well as for myself when I offer him my very sincere congratulations upon the manner in which he has performed, coming to him as it does for the first time, the duty of presenting that annual statement of our financial affairs which we call the Budget Speech.

At all times the preparation of the Budget is a matter calling for painstaking labour. It is a matter of large responsibility which any Minister of Finance must necessarily take very seriously, and that responsibility has fallen on my hon. friend at this time under circumstances of more than usual difficulty. There is a notion in some minds that the Government during the war had a hard time, and I am not sure but that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), may have had the idea that he particularly had a hard time. That is all a mistake. The Government did not have a hard time during the war. The burden of carrying a load is not to be measured merely by the weight of the load; one has to have regard to the condition of the highway over which it has to be carried. A light load may be heavy where the road is rough and the grade hard. In the case of a heavy load, if the road is smooth and the grade not steep, the yoke is easy and the burden light. So it was with the Government during war time. There was a condition of the country unusual, it is true. My hon. friends opposite had to deal with some new and unusual problems, but if they had to deal with new problems they found a new spirit abroad in the land to meet those problems. The patriotic spirit of the country, stirred as it should have been, and was, by the war, stood behind the Government during the whole period of the war. The Government had the support of Parliament to an extraordinary degree. Did they want appropriations? Tens and hundreds of millions of dollars were voted to them promptly, unanimously, and with less inquiry than will be made to-day on a $1,000 appropriation. Did they want men? Until a little unpleasantness occurred towards the end of the war, they had the men almost tumbling over each other in their desire to volunteer and participate in the war. Did they want loans?—The hon. Minister of Finance had only to issue his proclamation, and the people responded with an enormous sum of the public money. In all these things the way was easy. The Prime Minister and his colleagues had only to ride on the crest of the wave. But now is the time of trouble. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance of to-day has the heavy end of the load. The difficulties are coming to-day and there have been no such difficulties in the past, as some persons have too hurriedly imagined.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has taken hold of the Government's enterprise at the present time under certain circumstances of difficulty, but in one respect he has been highly favoured, and he is to be congratulated. The hon. gentleman came into office just about the time it became necessary to float another loan, and the response that was made to his demand in that respect, I am sure, must have been gratifying to him, as it was to the country generally. It is very gratifying to know that the Canadian people responded so liberally to that demand, and I think that perhaps my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) may look on the situation with a little of envy, because the present Minister of Finance received his $670,000,000 without offering the bait of tax exemption. So I am inclined to think my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance may look on the Finance Minister of to-day with a little of envy, and perhaps feel that if he had had more courage he might have had a similar experience. It is, of course, gratifying to know that this money has been obtained, and yet there is a thought which we cannot put aside when we are reminded that of about two billions of dollars of these loans floated, $1,380,000,000 are exempt from taxation. A bargain is a bargain. The Government of the day agreed that these should be exempt, but I have never concealed from myself the fact that that exemption is going to be a continuous source of trouble. I am afraid it will be one of the things which will tend to increase the discontent which unhappily prevails. But the contract was made, and there is no use complaining of it. I know there were some reasons which tempted my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) of that day to offer the loan in that way, and I am not saying that he was wrong. But looking back over it, I think he will agree that it is a pity he did not have more courage and ask the people of Canada to present this money to the Treasury without offering the bait of tax exemption.

I remember meeting a distinguished visitor to Canada several years ago who had been here in former years, had gone away and returned. He was noting the many things in which Canada had made progress and when somebody said, "Yes, Canada has become known to the world," "Ah, yes," he replied, "not only has the world discovered Canada, but Canada has discovered herself," and that he thought was a good thing. Well, in the matter of finance, surely we will all say that Canada has discovered herself to a surprising and a gratifying degree.

I think I am right in saying that the largest loan ever offered by the Dominion of Canada before the war was a loan of $30,000,000, or six million pounds sterling. It was offered in England, and I remember it was with fear and trembling that we asked so large a sum; and when it was suggested to the financiers of London that perhaps it might be expedient to increase the amount to $50,000,000 instead of $30,000,000 they gravely shook their heads and said, "Oh dear, no; that is too much." So that $30,000,000 was all we dared then ask from the financiers of London. Yet, here in this country, our own Canadian people were prepared to put their hands into their own pockets and in so brief a time to bring out $2,000,000,000 to meet the demands made upon them. And at one fell swoop the Minister of Finance found them offering him $670,000,000, the amount of the last loan. All that is very gratifying in some respects; but there is no rose without its thorn, and there are some things in connection with that loan which we may as well frankly recognize.

There is one feature which, while well known to the inside circle of finance, has not been made known in any marked way to the Canadian public at large, and I think it is time that the Canadian people knew something about it. If you take up the last volume of the public accounts, for the year ending March 31, 1919, you will find a couple of interesting items. There is a later volume than that but we have not got it. For that period, however, any hon. member will discover in the statement of receipts and expenditures an item called "Bank of Montreal Loan Trading Account,"—a very interesting account. Hon. members will read the item therein contained and will discover that the Government paid out on that account the sum of $7,450,000 and got back $5,177,904, so that on that account, whatever it means, the Government of Canada—in other words, the people of Canada—lost $2,272,000. Now, what does that mean? It means, to put the matter plainly, that the Government have been trading on the stock exchange with the money of the people of Canada. That is the plain way to put it. I know what will be said by hon. gentlemen opposite; I anticipate the explanation and will give it voluntarily myself. We have no returns for the year just closed. But I venture to say that in all human probability the loss on that trading account during the last twelve months was even much greater than it was in the previous year. Now, it will be said on behalf of the Government that this has been done to stabilize the loan. The Government will say—reasonably and with some force—that they were looking forward to putting other loans on the market, and were concerned with keeping up the price, and therefore made this arrangement with the banks for them to buy bonds in order to prevent depreciation. That, I think, was the object in view.

Mr. CURRIE: You are all wrong.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will pardon an interruption, I should like to point out that he is entirely wrong on the so-called trading account. In the year 1918 the Government not only did not lose money but made money. The stabilization did not cost the Dominion Government one cent.

Mr. FIELDING: I am exceedingly glad to hear that statement from my hon. friend, but the public accounts show——

Mr. CURRIE: You are wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FIELDING: I give the items as they appear in the public accounts: "Bank of Montreal Loan Trading account." This item shows that the bank received $7,450,000 and that there was paid back into the Treasury, credited on the other side, $5,177,-904, so that there is apparently, between the receipts and the expenditures, a difference, roughly, of $2,272,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Represented in bonds which were taken in—cancelled.

Mr. FIELDING: The item is charged up on one side as expenditure and on the other side as receipt, and I cannot see any other explanation than that I have given. I recognize, of course, that the object of the Government was to stabilize the loan in order to prevent depreciation, and there is this to be said, that war time conditions must necessitate war time methods, during and even after war. I am not saying that there was absolutely no justification for the ground which the Government took; on the contrary, I admit the force of the argument that may be advanced. I can understand that the minister, anxious to have the support of the financial houses, would offer them a guarantee and assurance that if they would invest their money in the bonds they would be protected against loss. I can understand that there would be a temptation to do that, and I think I am stating fairly the reason which the Government had in view. All I desire to say, however, is that if you want to understand that transaction completely you must apply to a private corporation the principle which it involves. An individual owner of shares, —a director owning shares,—would be justified in spending his own money to support stock in the market; but if a corporation had issued a block of securities at a certain price and sold them to the public, and if, with a view to keeping up the price, they then took the money of the company and went out to buy the shares in order to keep up the market, that would not be considered a very sound financial transaction. Indeed, I think that would be a transaction which, if it occurred in connection with a private corporation, would be very severely criticised. Well, what is sound business in the case of a private corporation may, to say the very least, be usefully applied to the operations of a government. I quite appreciate the object which the Government have had in view, and I am not sure that any other Minister of Finance would not have been tempted to do the same thing. At the same time, however, I regard this as a financial measure which is open to grave question, and at all events it would be wise on our part to advise the Minister of Finance not to do the same thing again if he can help it. If he has given assurances to the financial houses he must keep faith with them, but it would be well that he should avoid in the future a method such as this. I find that the same question has arisen in the United States. Various efforts are being made there to give an artificial and fictitious value to United States bonds, and a measure was introduced in the United States Congress for the purpose of attaining this end by exchanging one form of bond into another, issuing a new bond which was of a more attractive character, the probable result being that prices would be kept up. The matter came before the Secretary of the United States Treasury who was asked to give his opinion thereon, and Secretary Houston wrote a letter, of which I shall read only a part:

> As the Treasury views it, the present depreciation is due chiefly to the fact that of the 20,000,000 Americans who patriotically subscribed during the war large numbers have not been willing or able to exercise such control over their personal expenditures as would enable them to retain their bonds after the cessation of hostilities.
> Many patriotic people who bought Liberty bonds under the impulse of patriotism have been unwilling since the war was over to continue to lend their money to the Government and have forced their holdings on the market more rapidly than others could save funds to invest, with consequent depreciation in market prices. The remedy is for the people to work and save, to keep their holdings of Liberty bonds as investments and to purchase additional Government securities with their savings.
> The present prices of Liberty bonds are causing no loss to real investors, who are holding their bonds as permanent investment; they are not suffering because others see fit to sell their bonds now for less than they are worth, and neither these investors nor those who wish to sell their bonds have any ground for expecting a donation from the United States in the form of additional tax exemptions or other privileges.

I think that opinion of the United States Secretary of the Treasury might usefully be applied in Canada. If it has been necessary to do these things in order to stabilize bonds and to give them an artificial value it is a policy that we should get rid of at the earliest possible moment consistent with the obligations that have already been assumed.

There is another feature in relation to the loans which we must present, not by way of complaining, but merely that the public may see all sides of the question. It is, as I have said, a very gratifying thing to find that the people of Canada are able to subscribe so handsomely to these loans It is a grand thing to know that we have this immense sum of money in Canada, and I warmly congratulate the Minister of Finance on his success in obtaining it; but at the same time there is an old, homely proverb that you cannot eat your cake and have it. This vast sum of money which has been absorbed for the purposes of the Government has been withdrawn from the ordinary fields of industrial and other activities in Canada. It is money which, if the Government had not taken it, would have remained in the pockets of the people until they could find a convenient investment for it in some of the forms of industrial or commercial activitiy. If you take that vast sum away from the people you diminish to that extent their ability to carry on the ordinary business of the country—that is clear enough.

There was no immediate effect and for the reason that at the first stage of these operations no actual money passed. The man who subscribed for bonds gave a cheque on his account in the bank and handed it over to the credit of the Minister of Finance. It went to the credit of the Minister of Finance and there was really no actual passing of money. It was only as time passed and when the Government began to absorb this money that we began to feel the effect of it. What is the effect of it? We are beginning to see to-day that in consequence of the withdrawal of these large sums of money the banks are finding themselves a little harder up. The usual story put forward in the public and financial press is that the banks are contracting their credits. They will have to contract their credits because as fast as money is paid or used for the purposes of these loans it passes away and the banks do not have it any longer. It will be seen that we are beginning to feel now some of the effects of the withdrawal of this vast sum of money from the ordinary fields of activity.

We feel it too in another way. There is the housing problem all over Canada to-day. Certainly, housing is one of the chief needs in all big cities and towns. It is partly because during the war there was less activity than usual in mortgage and building operations, partly because building materials are high in price, but it is largely because there is no longer money available to lend to people who want to buy property and build houses. When the Government are offering 5½ per cent on a gilt edged security, the finest security that exists in the world perhaps except British consols—when the Government are offering 7 per cent for money in New York, when they are borrowing money to-day under the guise of the National railway in New York at 7 per cent; when the Government are offering these large rates of interest to the public, what is more natural than that the funds of the people shall flow into the treasury of the Government and that they shall not be available for various other purposes? I believe that the housing difficulty to-day is to some extent—to a considerable extent—the result of that policy. Mind, I am not complaining; the Government had to have money and they got the money which it was absolutely necessary they should get, but we should remember that in getting it for the purposes of the Government it is not available for other purposes.

The lesson that I would draw is this: It is a great thing to be able to get our capital in Canada when you have to get it. It was a great thing to be able to get money in Canada when the money markets of London and New York were closed against us. It was a great thing that in a condition of emergency we could get the money. But it is just as well to remember that Canada is a comparatively young and a compartively undeveloped country. Canada is a country which will need capital and therefore it is exceedingly desirable that the Government should gradually get its finances into a condition which will enable it to go when new loans are needed—let us hope they will not be needed right away—to the money markets of the world. If they need new loans it is most desirable that the Government, if possible in the financing of Canada, should appeal for those loans to the ordinary money markets of the world. In order that local capital may be made available for the development of local interests, housing enterprises and other activities I trust that when the moment comes for another loan the conditions will be such that the Minister of Finance will not have to raise it at home but will get it somewhere abroad.

The Minister of Finance certainly has, as I have said, an exceedingly difficult task. I wonder if the public really understand it. I do not think they do. If you strike a man a little blow he knows what hit him and he perhaps measures the pain. Hit him a little harder blow and you simply knock him speechless and he does not know what happened. I think that the man in the street has had such a hard blow in regard to these big questions of debt that we talk so much about, that he is knocked out. The figures are so large that they are rather beyond his comprehension.

I wonder if the public really understand the financial position of Canada to-day. The Minister of Finance has very fairly put it before the public and I am anxious only to help him in the matter. I am anxious that the people should appreciate the situation to-day, I do not speak of this matter in any complaining spirit, or in any party spirit, but I am anxious that they should actually understand the tremendous burden that they are taking upon themselves and the share of the burden that they must carry in order that the finances of Canada may be made sound and that the credit of Canada may be upheld. I want to offer a few comparisons, not as between the administration of on Government and another, not as between the period of one party and another, but as between a year before the war and a year after the war. I cannot expect to offer anything that is new but I will merely to put one or two things in striking contrast—

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: If my hon. friend does not wish to commence a new subject at this time we might call it six o'clock.

Mr. FIELDING: Very good; thank you.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING (resuming): The Minister of Finance, in his speech which we had the pleasure of listening to this afternoon, very properly gave us a mass of statistics on the business of the country which we shall have the pleasure of seeing in Hansard. The figures can be better examined then, and I presume they will be found useful for the purposes of reference.

My hon. friend in very general terms expressed a note of hope and wholesome optimism, and desired it to be understood that he had great faith, great hope and great confidence in Canada. I sympathize with all those sentiments and I am glad to be able to say that I also have not less confidence than has my hon. friend in the ultimate judgment, success and prosperity of the Canadian people. I think they are about the sanest people on earth; I know of the people of no other nation who are more sane and very few that I would say to-day are as sane as the Canadian people. I feel confident that when they fully understand things they will appreciate the difficulties which the Government, and every man in public life, has to face; that they will make all due allowances for those difficulties and that they will be actuated by the desire to assist the minister and the Government to bring about satisfactory results. That will be accomplished all the quicker, and all the more certainly, if we endeavour to give them a clear appreciation of what the situation is.

I mentioned before you left the Chair at six o'clock, Sir, that I was afraid the ordinary individual—as we say, the man in the street: the man who makes no special study of public affairs and yet is an interested and patriotic citizen—I expressed the fear that he has failed to appreciate the seriousness of the position. I do not say that in any party sense. No matter what Government might be in power it would be a very serious position, and I am anxious that the people generally shall come to understand it fairly and well.

When a Minister of Railways, a few years ago, came into this House with a deficit on the operation of the Government railways of perhaps six, or seven, or eight hundred thousand dollars, there was a keen appreciation of what that meant. There was keen questioning, there was sharp criticism, there was wide inquiry; the people understood, and could appreciate a deficit of such an amount in the Government railway operations. But this year the Minister of Railways comes in and frankly acknowledges that the deficit on the operation of the Government railways during the last year was $47,000,0000. Well, that is an illustration of what I described before as the "knock-out" argument; the thing is really so big as to be beyond the comprehension of the ordinary man.

I was about to make a few comparisons, not as between party and party, or as between government and government, but merely between a year before the war and a year afterwards, in order that by some simple and sharp contrasts I might help the Minister of Finance to have the public clearly understand the great change that has taken place. Now, let us take the year 1914. The year ended 31st of March, 1914, was a year before the war, and the year 1920, ended a few days ago, was a year after the war. With respect to the first period the public accounts, of course, are available. With respect to the second period the volume of public accounts is not out—the year only closed a few days ago. But the minister has, both in his speech and elsewhere, furnished us with information which gives us a general idea of the operations of the year 1920. Now the revenue for the year 1914 was $163,174,394.56. I come now, for the purposes of comparison, to the estimate for the year 1920, and here I find a little difficulty. The minister to-day, I think, stated that his estimate of the revenue for the year 1920 was $388,000,000. Well, there have no doubt been reasons for a very recent revision of my hon. friend's figures, because only a few days ago, before the end of the year, in answer to a motion for returns, my hon. friend's department issued a statement showing that in their judgment the revenue for 1920 would be $325,000,000. If, in the few days that have elapsed, my hon. friend has had reason to enlarge his estimate of the revenue I am very glad of it; but I shall have to make the comparison which I am about to make on the basis of the figures which he supplied a short time ago. According to those figures, in 1914 we received a revenue of $163,174,394.56 and for the year 1920, $325,000,000—which the Minister of Finance has now enlarged to $388,000,000. Well, if there were nothing but the revenue statement to look at, that would be a very gratifying situation. According to my hon. friend's latest figures the revenue has more than doubled. Let us convert it into revenue per head of population for convenience of comprehension. In 1914 the revenue per head was $21.12; in 1920, according to the first figures given to me by my hon. friend—which would have to be enlarged a little now—the revenue per head was $36.11.

As I said, if we had only the revenue side to look at, that would indicate great progress and flourishing finance; but when we turn to the expenditure side we find a pretty serious state of affairs. The total expenditure in 1914 was $186,241,047.63. When I speak of total expenditure, I am disregarding the question of the consolidated fund or capital expenditure or anything of that sort. It is what Mr. Mantalini calls the "demnition" total, and that is what we have to provide for. So I am merely presenting the total. As I say, the total expenditure in 1914 was $186,241,047.63. When I come to the total expenditure for 1920 I have another difficulty. My hon. friend to-day said, I think, that his estimate of the total expenditure for 1920 was $556,000,000. Could my hon. friend tell me from memory whether that is correct?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid I cannot.

Mr. FIELDING: I took the figures down at the time. But I am now confronted with this difficulty, that the previous statement which my hon. friend was kind enough to furnish me, in connection with a return I asked for, placed the total expenditure for 1920 at $675,125,000. That is the amount contained in a return presented by the hon. minister, and which he gave as the estimated total expenditure for 1920. My hon. friend's statement to-day shows a large reduction in this amount. While I was glad to find from his figures that there has been a great increase of revenue, I should be equally glad to find that he has a diminished expenditure, but again I have had to make a few calculations based on the figures he gave before. So $675,125,000 I take as the total expenditure for 1920. Converting that into expenditure per head for simplicity of understanding, we have this result, that in 1914 the total expenditure per head was $24.11; in 1920 the total expenditure per head, according to the figures previously given to me, would be $75.01.

Now, that is a contrast which should make our people think for a moment. If we had in 1914 before the war what we thought a large expenditure of $24.11 per head, and to-day we are expending $75 per head, that is a very striking comparison which should suggest to every Canadian the gravity of the situation.

Let us turn now to the extent of the debt. I take the gross debt of 1914 as stated, at $554,391,368.86. The population, as estimated at that time, was 7,725,000. So that works out the gross debt of 1914 at $71.75 per head. We have no absolute close estimate of the population to-day, but I understand for all practical purposes the officials of the Government are treating it as around 9,000,000; and we shall all be delighted to find that is correct. Taking that as correct, the gross debt of 1920, the year just closed, according to the figures supplied to me in the return I have referred to, was $3,014,483,774.12, which works out per head at $334.90. Again I ask the House, but still more I ask the country, to note those figures,—that in the year before the war our gross debt per head was $71.75, while it is now $334.90. That is an immense debt, and surely reflection on these figures will make us all realize the gravity of the situation.

I come now to the net debt. In 1914, with a population of 7,725,000, our net debt stood at $335,996,850.14, or $43.49 per head; turning now to 1920, and taking our population at 9,000,000, we find that the net debt is placed at a little less than two billion dollars—$1,935,946,312.85, or $215 per head.

Let us reflect a moment on those figures. In the year 1914 we had a net debt of $43.49 per head. What did that represent? How did it come about? We had the accumulations of debt from the older provinces before Confederation; we had all of the various public works that were carried on through the fifty odd years of Confederation; we had built three transcontinental railways; we had immense outlays in connection with our canals and other public works; we had built extensive terminal facilities, for we had been carrying on down to 1914 what was regarded as a big progressive policy; and as the total of it all we found that we had rolled up what was considered the large net debt of $43.49 per head. But if we make a comparison of it with the net debt now, we find it has advanced to $215 per head.

Again, I say my only purpose in making these comparisons is merely to awaken, if I can, in the public mind a keen sense of the real seriousness of the situation. I do not use these comparisons for any party purpose or for any alarmist purpose; I use them simply to help my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to bring the country to realize the seriousness of our financial position.

When we talked of our debt in days gone by and up to a recent period we usually spoke of our net debt as the real measure of the obligations of Canada. We ascertained that net debt by taking the gross debt—all obligations of every sort, deducting what we called our "assets," and striking a balance, which balance was called our net debt, and that term has been generally used by all our public men to represent the real debt of Canada. I was glad to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Finance frankly point out to-day that we cannot rely on that statement of net debt as telling the whole story. Our assets have at all times contained some items to which, on careful examination, exception may be taken; but while our assets did not bulk very largely that perhaps was not of so much importance. However, our assets, according to the latest returns, have gone from about $77,000,000 in 1899, or about twenty years ago, to the immense total of over a billion dollars to-day, and when they run into such big figures it becomes necessary to give them a more critical examination.

I am glad the Minister of Finance looked at the matter frankly to-day. I had a statement made as to the earning power of those assets for a series of years, and the interesting fact was disclosed that the earning power last year was higher than before. That struck me as rather remarkable, and naturally I made some further inquiries. The explanation is that at present there is a large item in the shape of the debt due from the British Government, which is actually a sound asset, and on which the interest is computed. But that is an entirely temporary affair and will be closed out in a short time, when we shall have before us what may be called our statement of assets. But that ordinary statement of assets is becoming weaker now by certain factors to which attention was called to-day by the Minister of Finance. These assets, so called, include the obligations of railway companies which have paid no interest, and from which we can expect no interest. Indeed, here is a specimen. When my hon. friend dealt with the same point to-day I think he quoted from different data. I find among interesting specimens of our valuable assets what are described as Grand Trunk Pacific loan account, $51,000,000; and my hon. friend gave as of a later date a larger sum; then there is another item, the Canadian Northern railway, $108,000,000, and I think again my hon. friend gave the figures as of a later date and a larger sum. These are not assets that we can count upon getting much from. I have heard of a man who gave a note of hand and when he had signed it, he said: "Thank God, that debt is paid." We are doing a little better than that in this statement. We are giving our note of hand, for that is what the Canadian Northern Railway Company is doing and we are the Canadian Northern Railway, and we are not only saying "Thank God, that debt is paid," but we are putting this amount in a statement of assets and saying that it goes to reduce our obligations. I am glad to know there is no difference between the Minister of Finance and us in that regard. One of these days there will have to be a revision of that balance sheet and we shall probably not differ as to what will have to be done. I mention these things merely to show by sharp contrast the tremendous change that has taken place in the short period between 1914 and 1920.

With all the economy that the minister can manifest, with all that he has manifested in his present estimate, and with all that he is likely to manifest in the future, a very serious financial situation will still confront us, and it is well that we should understand it, face it, grapple with it courageously, with a conviction that the mass of the people in some shape or form have to provide the vast sums of money necessary for the carrying on of this increased burden.

My hon. friend has presented estimates for the coming year, which estimates are certainly very large. As he has pointed out to-day, they show a considerable reduction from the estimates of the previous year, and I am sure that if he makes a comparison between the sum which he is asking for and the sum which he was asked for by the various departments, he would be able to show a very much larger diminution, but, he has made an effort in the right direction. I think there is one thing we could do to help the minister in this matter. We ought to stand between the minister and our constituencies in these demands that are made upon him. Economy is a fine word to apply to your neighbour's constituency; it is not a very pleasant word to apply to your province or district. I read in a newspaper the other day a long article which was piously calling on the Minister of Finance to exercise the widest, the most careful economy, and in another part of that paper I found an article which demanded the immediate construction in that community of public works which would cost many millions of dollars. We are all prone to do that sort of thing; we are all apt to be advocates of expenditure with respect to the district from which we come, and I want to say frankly that every member of the House, in face of this situation should help the minister by telling his constituents plainly that many of the things they ask for, good, useful though they may be, are not of the most urgent character and ought not to be pressed upon the attention of the Government at this time. We all owe that to the minister and we should give him that help. But we must ask him to be fair; if modest applications in one region are refused and those who are interested in them and who are refused, discover that very lavish expenditures are going on in some other direction, there will naturally be discontent. The minister, his colleagues, supporters and friends should be willing to adopt what I may call a self-denying ordnance in these matters and see that we practice a real policy of economy, so far as such is possible.

Canada cannot stand still, we are living in a progressive age; there are urgent things which will come before the Government; there are public services which must be rendered; but I want to ask the minister to see that in the various demands that are made upon him only those that are necessary and that are not only meritorious in themselves, but of the most urgent character, shall receive the benefit of his approval. There is no other way by which we can better the unhappy condition which exists; there is no royal road out of this present trouble. The solution is national economy and individual economy and only by those means can we hope to meet the difficulty, and I trust my hon. friend will be supported in every legitimate effort he makes to that end.

The minister stated to-day—and I was glad to hear him state it—that his hope and expectation is that during the coming year he will be able from his revenue not only to provide for the ordinary expenditures, but to take a substantial step towards paying off the public debt. We should make such an effort even though that involves heavy taxation; we should endeavour to grapple with the question as it was grappled with the other day by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England who said that they were preparing immediately to make a long step towards paying off the public debt.

The tariff question is always with us; it figured in the discussion to-day, being mentioned by the minister towards the close of his address. While it is true that at all times for many years all our tariff discussions have been more or less tinged with the question of free trade, there has of late been a revival of what I may call the free trade movement, and the free trade question is now thrust to the front of our tariff discussions in a larger way than it has been in recent years. That, I take it for granted, is because our farmer friends attach so much importance to the matter and have pushed it into their platform. With all due respect to them, I take the view that free trade is not a practical question in our tariff discussions of to-day. There are some things that we should do well to remember. In the first place, it may be well simply to remember that there never has been in the Dominion of Canada such a thing as free trade. There is not anything of the kind now, and with all due respect to those who may be described as extreme free traders, I think it is no wild guess to assert that there will be no absolute free trade in Canada within the lifetime of any man who sits in this House to-day. It is not practicable, and that is not to say that free trade principles are not sound.

If I had to engage in an academic discussion on the question of free trade versus protection, I would hold up my hands for free trade. I think free trade—I say this reverently—is part of the divine order of things; at all events, it is part of the law of nature. I say this reverently. In all parts of the universe, an all-wise Creator has given the capacity to produce something which, properly understood and developed and handled, will minister to the comfort of the rest of the world. The ice-bound region of the North has its mission no less than the warmer lands of the sunny south. In every section of this world, there is some wealth; it may be hidden, but it is there. No land was ever created by an all-wise Providence without having some purpose. I believe it is part of nature's intention that man shall discover, develop and utilize this wealth in every section of the country for the carrying out of the great work of civilizing the world. That is free trade. But it is quite possible that the best of principles may be carried too far; it is quite possible that men who believe in the general principle of free trade must recognize that there are conditions under which it cannot be applied. There is great merit in that statement, hackneyed, you may call it if you will, which is often credited to Grover Cleveland: "It is a condition and not a theory which confronts us." If we were the men of the Mayflower just landing at Plymouth, or the men of the grand army of Champlain pitching their tents at Annapolis Royal and Quebec, we might be able to have free trade. But three centuries have passed since then and many things have occurred which restrict the freedom of those days, which make it difficult if not impossible for us to-day to carry out to the full extent the principles which we may cherish.

I am going to ask my farmer friends and my free trade friends—because I know I have been criticised sometimes during my tenure of office as a minister for not following out as rigidly as they would desire the principles of free trade—to let me take a couple of cases by way of illustration of what I may call exceptions to the free trade rule. I am going to take a couple of cases within the experience of the Government of which I was a member, cases for which I am largely individually responsible, cases for which I know I have from time to time been criticised by many friends who pressed the doctrine of free trade further than I would. Let me take first the question of the anti-dumping law, which is a radical departure from free trade principles. What is the anti-dumping law? It is a special duty to be applied in certain circumstances with a view of keeping goods out of the country, and that is certainly not free trade. Manufacturers would come to the Government asking for an increase in the tariff, and we would ask them to show us reasons, and very often they would say: "Well, we could do very well under the tariff, you know, but our American neighbours have a dumping system; they will at certain times send over their surplus goods and sell them here at any sacrifice price and destroy our business." The thorough going free trader, the man who is more thorough going than I am on that question, would say: "All right, send the goods along; the more the merrier; if they are willing to send in goods for less than cost, thank them for that and tell them to send along some more; cheapness is everything." That is the view of many of my free trade friends. I pointed out to the manufacturers that this dumping condition was after all not a continuing condition but one which, according to their statement, would arise from time to time. I pointed out to one of them: "Don't you see that when you ask us to give a large increase in duty you are creating a machine which is to be of a permanent character in order to deal with an evil— if it be an evil—which is of but a temporary nature? From our point of view, you are going to penalize the people of Canada twelve months of the year to meet a difficulty that may arise once or twice, or perhaps thrice, in the course of a year." I thought that that was a fair stand to take in objecting to the manufacturer's attitude. I had a call one day from a manufacturer who informed me that he had no complaint in regard to the tariff. He said he was satisfied with it and as a matter of fact was doing fairly well in his business. Indeed, he said, he was contemplating an expansion of his business, and he felt that in view of the large trade he was then doing and the larger business he was planning to do in the future he could afford to sell to the ulti mate consumer at a little lower price, and so he had scaled down the price of one article of importance in which he was dealing. I remarked that that was gratifying, but he said: "Wait a moment, I want to show you a letter I have;" and thereupon he placed on my desk a letter written by an agent of an American manufacturing concern which engaged in making in the United States a similar commodity to his and shipping it into Canada. This agent wrote to the man of whom I am speaking: "Why do you cut the price? You can just as well get the larger price and there is no reason why you should not. If you reduce your price we will have to reduce too. We will meet your reduction and we will do more than that; if you are going to start reducing prices we will meet you and keep on reducing, and no matter what price you name we will cut below you." Ah! that was a new light upon the question of dumping. Again, I suppose my free trade friends would say, "All right, let him send his goods in; let them come in; so much the better." Well, if we could have got a bond from those manufacturers in the United States that would compel them to send their goods forever at sacrifice prices it would have been an excellent thing to have adopted the course suggested in this hypothetical quotation. We could afford to close our Canadian factories and buy American goods if we could have got a bond from across the border guaranteeing us their goods for all time at a sacrifice price. But who imagines that the American had any intention of doing that indefinitely? His avowed intention was to cut prices and sell at a sacrifice just long enough to close the other man's business. That was the clearest thing in the world. My manufacturing friend visiting me asked me what he was to do. I said to him: "'What do you think of the situation yourself?" He replied: "Well, I suppose I have to go back to the old price or shut up shop;" and I told him that I could not blame him; I said we would have to think the matter over. We did consider the matter and the conclusion we came to was embodied in the dumping duty. We came to the conclusion that if big manufacturing concerns in the United States could come here and close up Canadian manufactring interests it was right that there should be a special duty to meet that condition. It was considered by some as a piece of freak legislation, but I am glad to know that it has been copied in other countries, and the present Government have paid us the compliment of continuing it on the statute book. It is the law to-day.

And if my extreme free trade friends ever came into power I think on due reflection, they would make up their minds that it was the part of wisdom to keep the dumping duty to apply to special circumstances whenever the evil was found that called for its application. Now, I do not believe that my free trade friends will be persuaded even now that I am entirely in the right, but it is only fair that we should ask them to consider some exceptional circumstances, in which men who believe in the general principle of free trade may very possibly agree that some departure is necessary from the broad doctrine they hold. Take another case in which I know our Government have been criticised—a case in which I know I have been criticised. I am going to consider the question of iron and steel bounties, and I shall do so without the slightest reference to any present question which may be in contemplation. If any one has any bounty claim afloat now I know nothing about it and I have no desire whatever that anything I say now shall be construed as being intended to bear upon any question of bounty, current now, or hereafter to be raised. Bounties on iron and steel originated with the Conservative Government in the days of Sir Charles Tupper. The operations under them were not large. There was a small operation in the province of Quebec and another in the province of Nova Scotia. I have not the figures but I think no very large sum was paid out until after our Government took up the question. When I was Premier of Nova Scotia a question arose regarding the operation of the coal mines of the province; there was a feeling that the coal mines, which were natural resources, should contribute largely to the revenue. The Government informed the managers of the companies that the royalties would be increased, and the managers complained, alleging that business would not stand it and that mining could not be carried on. They said we would ruin their business. No doubt they were sincere. We were able to come in contact with an American gentleman of great business enterprise, Mr. Henry M. Whitney, of Boston, whom I regard as a benefactor of Nova Scotia, and we were able to induce him to take up the enterprise of consolidating a number of these companies. That is a merger, I imagine some one to say; and mergers, I know, are not popular. But there may be good, and there may be bad, mergers. In this case we were able to induce that enterprising American gentleman to arrange to consolidate a number of mines. We made some changes in the mining law, costing the Government nothing, and gave that gentleman facilities to carry on his work; and in consideration of those facilities we required that he should pay not only the royalty then imposed, which the other men could not pay, but even a higher rate. The other men complained of a royalty raised from 7½ cents per ton to 10 cents. We required Mr. Whitney to pay 12½ cents. That arrangement was the means of starting the development of the coal business down there. Soon after that business got established it was my lot to come to Ottawa, and shortly aftrward, Mr. Whitney came to Ottawa to interview our Government. He made representations as to what he had done to organize the coal industry of Nova Scotia, and he said that he could build up a steel industry on top of that if he had assistance. He stated that he had great faith in that enterprise, but he represented that if he had to obtain capital he must have inducements to bring in other men. In short, he wanted some help from the Government; he wanted a bounty. At that time—and even before and since—there was a good deal of talk about assisting infant industries. Now, I would be always willing to help an infant industry if I were sure that when the infant grew up it would accept the full responsibility of manhood; but when it grows up and begins to knock the old man around the house and feels that it controls the whole thing I think the case is different. I repeat, I would willingly help an infant industry, and as between protection and bounties, I think I would prefer the bounties. Why? When you give a bounty you know what you are giving; every one sees it, and if you don't like it you can stop it.

But if you increase a duty there is often great dispute as to what is its effect. At all events, we were willing to aid Mr. Whitney, with this proviso: We said that we would not help him if he insisted on bounties as a permanent thing, but if he was prepared to accept them for a short or a moderate period, with a distinct understanding that they should be gradually reduced, and wipe themselves out, there would be reasonable ground for considering his proposition. He acquiesced in this view. thereupon the bounty scheme was adopted on a sliding scale for a period of years. After several years we checked the slide and gave them a year or so longer. At all events the time came when the bounties automatically ceased, and to-day no bounties are paid. What was the result of that? Was there anything in the result which would justify that departure from free trade principles? I am afraid my farmer friends will not agree, but I believe it is susceptible of proof that every dollar that was paid out by way of bounties on iron and steel, and millions were paid out, came back to the Dominion treasury in the form of excise and customs duties on the new business created as the outcome of that policy. I think that can be established as a pure financial question, but there is more than that. There has been the making over of Eastern Nova Scotia. What happened? Let me take first the statistics of the coal trade. In the twenty years up to 1893, before these transactions to which I refer began, the increase of the coal output in Nova Scotia—not the total output—was 604,000 tons. That was before the days of Mr. Whitney's operation in coal, iron and steel. In the twenty years which followed, from 1893 to 1913, the increase was not 604,000 tons, but within a few tons of 5,000,000 tons. That was the increase in the coal trade under the operation of the scheme to which I have referred. If there were nothing more, surely that is some vindication of what I considered an exceptional circumstance. But there was more than that. Small villages down there developed into towns, and towns developed, shall I say, into cities. Nova Scotia is no longer a province of one city. Where the little town of Sydney of 2,000 or 3,000 population existed, there is to-day the splendid city of Sydney with 25,000 people, and in the neighbouring towns and villages the same story is told. There is the town of Glace Bay, big enough to be a city. On the other side of Sydney harbour, you have the towns of North Sydney and Sydney Mines, both flourishing towns. The whole eastern part of Nova Scotia was virtually made over under these new conditions. And not Nova Scotia only. The benefits of that transaction extended to the neighbouring province of Prince Edward Island, to New Brunswick, and even to some parts of the province of Quebec, and possibly to some parts even farther away. I do not want to insist that these departures from free trade are absolutely right, but I put them before my friends who are extreme free traders, as facts which I believe can be sustained. I believe they justify a departure from free trade principles under certain conditions. If those conditions can be limited, if we can get anybody to start any new industry under the circumstances under which these were started, then I think myself that would justify a departure from the abstract principle of free trade.

The tariff question continues to be a large one. It is going to be the biggest question, I suppose, in the next campaign. What, then, is a sound and sane and sensible and safe tariff policy for Canada? To what quarter shall we look for such a policy? Not, I am afraid, to the Conservative party, even when they state their case in a camouflaged way, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance did at the conclusion of his speech to-day. He gave, if I may say so without offence, what seemed to me to be a fine example of steering north by south. At all events, we know that the historic policy of the Conservative party is a policy of protection, and protection for protection's sake—a policy of high tariff for the sake of the tariff. Without arguing on the merits, though I know that a great many of our best citizens believe that that is a sound policy, I am going to be content with saying that the trend of public opinion is not that way, and I do not believe it is any use to look to my Conservative friends for a sound tariff policy. Where, then, shall we find it? Not from my Conservative friends, not even from that section which my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) represents. He has on several occasions lately spoken of a moderate tariff. Moderation is always a good thing. In nearly all things it is wise to be moderate, but the meaning of the word "moderate" depends largely on the viewpoint of the man using it, and I am afraid that if my hon. friend were permitted to frame a tariff which he would call moderate, it would be deemed very immoderate by some of my hon. friends who sit further down the House. So I do not expect we can get a sound and safe tariff from him.

Where, then, are we going to get it? Shall we get it from the platform of our farmer friends? Sir, I do not think their platform if carried out would give us the sound policy which I desire, and I hope to be able to show them—at all events I hope they will find that it is wise to modify some of their views. Much in their platform is entirely in harmony with the views I am prepared to support, but I rather think they press the doctrine a little too far. I am less alarmed than many are about a farmer government. I do not think the country would suffer dreadfully if my farmer friends were to come in and form a government in this country. I know that if some of their views were pressed, they would make some trouble, but the farmer is not a dangerous man. His associations with the soil, whether it be as owner or as land-worker, create, shall I call it, a natural conservatism—with a small "c." He is naturally a conservative in all business matters. He is going to stand for law and order. Now, responsibility generally sobers men, and I think if our farmer friends came into power in all probability they would modify their views a good deal and would probably be able to carry on government with fair satisfaction. But is there any likelihood of that? My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) made a speech the other day at one of the outlying towns, I forget where, in which he said that the farmers had no expectation that they would come into power at the next election, but they did think they would have an increased body in the House. I think that is a fair guess; I think he was right. If we had a general election right now, some things are not clear, but I am afraid if there is anything clear, it is that my hon. friends on the Treasury benches would be soundly beaten, and I rather think they believe it themselves. But it is not quite so clear to me, as to some of my hon, friends around me, that the Liberals would be in a position to control the House. There will be a large farmer party. I think the Liberals would be the largest group in the House. They might even have a majority, but I am troubled by the thought that they would not have a large enough majority to carry on the Government. Our farmer friends say they do not expect to win, but that they do expect to come here in increasing numbers. What for? Two years ago in a discussion in the House of Commons I ventured to suggest—I do not presume to offer advice—to my farmer friends, that so long as they pursued a policy of isolation they could not expect to accomplish much. Well, much water has gone under the bridge in two years. The Farmers' party is larger and stronger than ever, and it naturally feels less willing, I suppose, to look at things outside of its own political platform. Nevertheless, I am going to suggest to my hon. friends that if they want to do any constructive work they cannot do it by a policy of isolation. They can be a strong party, a critical party. They can make an opposition, but there will be no need of their opposition. If I am mistaken in my view and hon. gentlemen opposite come back to power there will be a strong opposition over here, you can make up your mind about that; and if hon. gentlemen on this side of the House move across, I am willing to admit that there will also be a strong opposition in the House by my hon. friends opposite. Therefore, it will not be necessary for the farmers to create an opposition; there will undoubtedly be one. The farmers want to be constructive. I do not believe the farmers of this country, earnest and sincere as I know they are, want men in the House merely for the purposes of faction. They have ideas and they want to do things, but so long as they stand alone they cannot accomplish their aims. I therefore hope that events will so shape themselves that these gentlemen will find it their duty to associate themselves with some other men in the House who, though they may not go all the way with them, will go quite a long way with them.

While I would not fear dangers from a Farmer Government, I do not think myself, as things are going now, that we can look to that party for a sound tariff policy so long as they stand alone. What then? I do not even think we can expect to get a sound and safe tariff policy by a too rigid adherence to every line and every letter of the Liberal tariff platform. I think myself that we will find that we are all prone in framing platforms to put things perhaps a little more strongly than is wise and we all find when we come to the responsibilities of office that we may have to modify our views. If we are to get a sound and sane tariff policy where shall we look for it? Where shall we find the guide posts which shall direct the people into right lines at this time of trial?

Turn back to the policy of 1911, the policy of the Liberal party, the tariff as it stood at that day, with the amendments that were contemplated when they went out of power, and in this you will find the elements of a sound and sane tariff policy; not the finished edifice but the ground work and the frame work of a sound tariff policy. Some conditions have been changed since and we will have to meet them, but I believe that if men will look back to the policy of 1911 as it stood at that time, and to the tariff of that day plus the proposals that were then being put forward, they will see that they can accept it as a basis, as the ground work, the frame work, of a fair tariff, although not the finished edifice.

But some people will say: "That is the National Policy." My Conservative friends are much given to the practice of saying that the Liberal policy isthe National policy, and once in a while an unthinking Liberal is found who will listen in silence to that retort. The Liberal policy of 1897 was not the old National Policy. If you want evidence of it turn to the records and you will find that the Conservative leaders and the Conservative press denounced the Liberal policy of 1897. It was not the old National Policy. They said it was going to tear down and destroy the old National Policy. But as the years rolled on and as they found that policy was winning success and the country was prospering, they swung around and said: "That is our policy."

Let me picture the situation as seen on a race course, say, at the hospitable city of Toronto, when the Ontario Jockey Club is preparing for one of the great events such as the King's plate on the 24th May. There are two horses entered, a Liberal and a Conservative. The bell rings and the horses come to the stand. The owner of the Conservative horse says: "Judge, you are not going to make my horse run against that animal; he is not in our class; take him out; I will not permit my horse to run a race against a poor, miserable, spavined, knocked up thing like that." But the judge says: "This horse is entered for the race and you have to run against him." They start the horses and in twenty seconds time there is a considerable space between them. The Liberal horse pulls out in front and as they speed down the back of the course is seen to be far ahead. He increases the lead and as they come around the track he is found to have left the other far behind. Finally the Liberal horse crosses the line a winner and the other is left away back in the distance. What does the owner of the Conservative horse do? He rushes out and says: "Do not give the prize to that fellow; that is my horse that he is riding; that is a splendid horse!"

That is about the attitude of our Conservative friends when they talk about the Liberal policy of 1897 being the old Conservative National Policy. You can prove that it was not the old National Policy by taking the facts and figures during the period of the Liberal Government. Taking into account the actual savings in customs duties and comparing the duties paid then with what would have been paid if the old tariff had been in force, and taking into consideration the savings that were made by the reduction in the prices of home manufactures, you will find that the change made represented hundreds of millions of dollars in the pockets of the people of Canada. It was not the old National Policy. It was the policy which made this country grow and prosper. For many years we were able to look back with pride and satisfaction to the results which followed the adoption of that policy. What were those results? I do not want to dwell too long upon this point because I want to hasten to a conclusion, but I am going to call a witness to testify as to the fruits of that policy, and as to the situation that we turned over to the Minister of Finance of that day, now the hon. the member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White). We left him in the happy position that he could bring down to Parliament the last volume of the Public Accounts that were not ready when we went out of power, showing a surplus for 1911 of $30,000,000. We left him an overflowing treasury and a fiscal system which, being allowed to continue for another year, placed him in the happy position of coming down to Parliament with a surplus of $38,000,000. We left him, I repeat, with an overflowing treasury. What was his testimony as to the condition of the country generally? I am going to ask you to listen for a moment to a statement made by my hon. friend which appeared in his Budget Speech of May, 1912. My hon. friend had the pleasant duty of describing the condition of the country then as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance of to-day (Sir Henry Drayton) has had the duty of describing to-day. He was talking not merely of incidents of Government but he was describing the condition of the country as it was at that time when the Liberal Government had just gone out of power. What was the condition of Canada? I quote from the Budget Speech of Sir Thomas White in 1912:

It will, as I have said before, be gratifying to all that the material prosperity with which we have been so highly favoured still continues to be our portion. Despite the serious vicissitudes through which the western wheat crops has passed and the unusual heat experienced in the province of Ontario during the past summer, the field crops of Canada show a bountiful yield and with the high prices prevailing for practically all its products the great basic industry of agriculture continues in a flourishing condition. Almost every department of trade and commerce shows expansion. Our mines are wonderfully productive. Our coast fisheries, notably the Atlantic, have enjoyed a good catch and high prices. Our manufacturers are thriving and new industries are springing up throughout the whole Dominion. Railway construction, especially in the west, proceeds apace, preparing a way for settlement in districts not yet opened up and for trade with other markets than we now enjoy. Our increased bank deposits, clearings and circulation, the amount of public and private building evidenced in municipal and business structures, extensions to manufacturing plants and residences in almost every part of the country, all attest that the general prosperity of Canada at the present time is very great.

Our Dominion continues to be the land of hope and promise to the home seeker. During the last year, as before shown, our immigration from Europe and the United States reached an average of nearly a thousand a day, bringing their capital, their intelligence and their energy to assist in the great task of developing the resources of Canada and building up her nationality. Much has been said in the past with which I am in accord as to the selection of immigration as far as possible with an eye to the quality and character of our future citizenship. Notwithstanding the large stream of immigration, labour conditions are good and extreme poverty, from any reason other than incapacity or direct misfortune, is hardly known.

Under the favourable conditions which I have described, and with every prospect for their continuance, the future of Canada looks bright indeed. In the enjoyment of peace, plenty and prosperity her energetic, loyal and patriotic people look forward with hope and expectation to an ever great and greater future.

That, Sir, is the story of fifteen years of Liberal fiscal policy as described by my hon. friend: fifteen years of peace and plenty, fifteen years of blessed peace, fifteen years of joyous plenty, fifteen years of splendid progress, fifteen years of wonderful prosperity! Let us frame and glaze this statement; let us post it on the walls of the country; let us frame and glaze it and put it into every household, and office and factory, so that men may look upon it and say, "Ah, yes, that is the story of the good old days. Pray Heaven that it may come back again."

An hon. MEMBER: And come back pretty soon.

Mr. FIELDING: The Minister of Finance to-day gave us some tariff changes which we shall be better able to understand when we read them in detail in Hansard. Let me say, however, that I am sure there must be deep disappointment on the part of a great many members of the House who were, or are, supporters of the Government, to find that the tariff reform which they are getting—if you call it tariff reform—is of such a moderate character. We must not forget that the Government have for the last two years been, shall I say, coquetting with this tariff question, jollying their friends along and promising that something was going to be done. If I might use a quotation:

> "They promise, prepare, propose, postpone,
> And end by letting things alone."

Last year the Minister of Finance gave us a very positive assurance that there would be a tariff inquiry in the interim, and a tariff reform measure at the present session—a measure of general tariff revision. If the Minister of Finance is not able to make that tariff revision he is, of course, disappointing his friends; but I think there is another reason why we should have a larger measure of tariff reform than we are getting. There is unrest in this country to a degree which must be disturbing to us all. There are various causes for that. Part of it is world-wide; some of it probably might be dealt with in a better manner. There is a widespread opinion in the country—with that portion of the community which is easily susceptible to, shall I say, the movement of unrest—that the Government and Parliament—we may as well count ourselves in—are not doing much to meet the situation. The high cost of living is pressing upon people severely. It presses on all classes. Those whom we for convenience call the working class—although we are all members of the working class in Canada—those whom we speak of sometimes as the working class have been able to protect themselves in some degree by the increase in wages which they have obtained, although I think there are few cases in which the increase in wages has been equal to the increase in the cost of living. But there is a very large class of unorganized working people in Canada who are feeling this pressure very keenly. The clergymen, the public school teacher, the college professor, the clerk in an office —who is paid a fixed yearly salary and not wages by the day—a large class of people—and the Civil Service may be included in the number, although they have received some little aid—but there is a large unorganized class of people in Canada who feel the situation to-day regarding the cost of living very, very keenly, and they do not say much about it. They are the class of people who bear their burdens and say nothing about it. For the sake of these people, and for the sake of others, I think it is a pity that we do not make some effort to show them that we are doing something—or at all events trying to do something—to meet the difficulty. What have we done? We have appointed a Board of Commerce. We had a committee last session to inquire into the high cost of living. That committee worked hard, and I am quite sure had every intention of doing something; and in the end the committee, in part, and certainly the Government, got to be panicky, and suddenly they resolved that they would pass this Board of Commerce Act. They were warned that a measure of such importance, rushed through in that way, would probably get them into trouble. However, they felt that something must be done and so they rushed the legislation through. What has happened? They appointed three able men to the board, and I have no doubt these gentlemen sincerely desired to do the best they could. But what has happened? The board has been paralyzed almost from the beginning. I think at the start the fact that such a board was in existence had a tendency to check profiteering,—if there ever was a tendency of that character—but before the board got very far it found itself paralyzed. Doubts arose as to whether it had the power to do anything. In the most important step it ever took it was immediately vetoed by the Supreme Court of Canada; and today a case is before that court asking the court to tell the board what their powers are. The chairman of the board resigned some time ago, and the members of the Government are permitting the paralysis to continue. They are afraid to appoint another chairman, and the board is doing next thing to nothing. I am sure the members of the board desire to help all they can, but whatever the cause may be the public at large do not feel that relief has come. Now we think that something should be done—some effort should be made even though it be not very successful. I think that something should now be done in the way of reducing the tariff upon the necessaries and the comforts of life—some of the things which the average man requires from day to day. I do not overestimate the value of tariff reductions in affording relief from the high cost of living, and the people may expect too much therefrom. There is a curious thing about tariff taxes. Increased taxes always reach the consumer the next morning. If my hon. friend were to-day to add five cents a pound to the taxation on sugar every shop-keeper in Canada who gets a newspaper would tomorrow morning add not five but six cents to the price. That would reach the consumer instantly. But when tariff reductions are made it is a slower process. Then the shop-keeper says, "You see I had to buy these goods under the old tariff, and I cannot reduce the price." The process of reduction is slow; the process of increase is rapid. Therefore I grant if you make tariff reductions now you may not get as much relief from them as perhaps is desirable. I do not overestimate their value, but I think it would be desirable that an effort should be made; and in doing so, at all events, we must give to the country some assurance that we are trying to meet the difficulty. I think we are doing less in this direction than has been done in Great Britain, and less than has been done in the United States.

I therefore conclude my remarks by moving, seconded by Mr. King:

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be omitted, and the following inserted instead thereof:

"the Minister of Finance, in the Budget Speech, in the session of 1919, gave assurance to the House that during the ensuing parliamentary recess there would be a public inquiry by the minister and one or more of his colleagues into the operation of the customs tariff, with a view to a general revision of the tariff at the following session.

"That the promised public inquiry has not taken place, and the expected proposals for tariff revision at this session have not been submitted to the House.

"That in view of the continued increase in the high cost of living, of the greatly increased burden of taxation, of the hardship which many of the people suffer from these causes, and the unrest naturally arising therefrom; and in view of the desirability of adopting measures to increase production and effect such relief to consumers and producers as may be within the power of Parliament, the House is of opinion that, pending a wider revision of the tariff, substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation should be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance; first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country."

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, before going into the subject matter of the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) who has just taken his seat, I may be allowed a personal allusion. It gave to me personally, and I am sure to hon. members on this side of the House, a peculiar and particular pleasure when on the rising of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's he was received with such evident marks of goodwill and approbation by the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him. I allude to this because personally I feel something of the same pleasure which I imagine my hon. friend felt when he received that acclamation from his own side of the House and evidence of goodwill from this side as well. It is a pleasing thing to the elder brethren in political life who are at a stage a little before their hair completely whitens and the westering skies have closed over their journey that the younger and more vigorous and ambitious elements on both sides of the House seem to have a feeling of fairly deep respect and—shall I say—of friendship towards those who have long borne the burden and heat of the day. And I reciprocate and join in the kindly demonstrations that were made to my hon. friend by both sides of the House when he rose to speak.

I am also greatly pleased with the speech which my hon. friend has made. But before saying very much with reference to that I wish to add to the note which was struck by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) in one portion of his speech this afternoon, and which I would like to emphasize, and if possible, to prolong. It was that note in which he vindicated the fine effort made by Canada during the five years of the war we waged and upheld in unity and co-operation on both sides of the House in defence of justice, and of right—principles which have long animated the British Empire. He called upon that same spirit of co-operation and sacrificial effort to prolong its action and so to unite us in the common duty—not simply the duty of one party or another of the various parties which have their being at this time in Canada—of healing the wounds and repairing the waste of war.

The work which is upon us to-day is preeminently the work of Parliament and of the country and not of party or faction. It is the extension and consequential entailment of a war which was our common war and which was upheld by this country in co-operation and with a large spirit of unity in all its parts. The very same spirit, the very same qualities, the very same efforts, ought to be projected into the co-operation necessary, as I have said, to repair the wastage and heal the wounds of war. What my hon. friend has done in this Budget presentation to-day ought not, I think, to be lost sight of in its general and broad lines.

Before we get into the discussion of details and travel off into individual paths where we may lose sight of the principles which have been the ground bases, so to speak, of the presentment, it will be well to tabulate them for a moment so as to keep them clearly in mind during the subsequent discussion. And may I say that if we can maintain throughout the debate the spirit which has animated the speeches which have been already made, if we can forget the individual in the general, and forget a portion of the partisan in the patriotic, we will make this discussion memorable in itself in this Parliament and of very great benefit to the cause which weighs so heavily upon us for a fair and speedy adjustment of conditions following the war. That spirit has been eminently well displayed to-day.

Now, what are the guiding principles or points, so to speak, in the presentment which has been made by my hon. friend in his speech this afternoon? There is first a laying bare, down to the very bone and marrow of the truth, just what the condition of Canada is to-day, financially and economically, in its domestic relations and its relations with other countries. I look upon it as a fine contribution to the discussion which has now been begun—that there was no attempt on the part of the Minister of Finance to camouflage the position. He was frank, open and truthful in his presentation of our financial and economic condition, and he well merited the compliment which was paid to him by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding).

There was no concealment of the amount of debt that this country is now bearing upon its shoulders; there was no attempt to minimize that burden by counting in assets which were not properly to be considered as live assets; and a distinction was made with a corresponding addition to the net debt that we carry by a diminution of those assets which could not be looked upon as being live assets. We might collect our assets, say under three headings—the quick, the dead and the purgatorial. The quick assets we can very easily pick out, and there are many of them. The dead asset we have picked out and laid aside; we respect it for its memories and for the associations which it had in the past; but we have laid it away, and we do not propose to unseal the tomb. The quick assets we have defined; the dead we have cast aside. And we have taken cognizance of those assets which are neither quick nor dead, but which still remain in optimistic and, maybe, joyful hope of a resurrection by-and-by to a future of great usefulness and profit. That very fairly designates the three kinds of assets which we have. Do not let us disparage the first. The quick assets of Canada are grand assets; no other country in the world has better—assets more capable of development, more illimitable and inexhaustible in their quantity or of better quality than those of Canada. We can stand here with that burden of debt upon us and all those economic and business difficulties that face us and yet we can feel that we have a background of quick, living and developable assets which inject optimism into our minds and stimulate us to enterprise and action for the future, to work out, under difficulties and through long periods, the burden which is upon us, into a future where the burden will be laid aside. And as churches sometimes have festivals to burn the mortgages which have long weighed upon them, some time a day will come in Canada when we shall have a great national festival; we shall burn the old mortgages and we shall emerge into the new life of a country vastly more developed than it is at the present time. There is hope; there is optimism; there is stimulus to effort and to enterprise in the splendid background of our quick and developable assets in this country.

Do not let us disparage, either, those assets which to-day are not revenue producers. If we are serious and honest in our statements with regard to our country's possibilities, these assets, which to-day are burdensome in several ways, in the burden of interest that they place upon us, in the deficit that they call upon us to fill with appropriations of ready money, lie in and through the very heart of the country, about the future of whose developable resources we have the optimism, hope and sincere trust that we have over and over again declared and which we stand to declare during future years. If that be so, as development takes place and grows; as production pours in from the bases not now developed but which are going to be developed; as our mines pour forth those treasures which are concealed within them; as our cultivable areas, rich beyond possibility of calculation and but a fringe of which at this moment is under productive use, are brought under cultivation; as our fisheries develop; as our water-powers add their forces to aid the forces of man power and so work out their splendid part in the development of the future, and as productivity blossoms and brings its fruit along all those lines of rich endeavour in the future, these assets which to-day are burdensome, will become, if you take our railroad transport system through and through, not burdensome but in the main utilizable and of great advantage. And in the end, if we are true to ourselves and wise in our administration they will become assets which will pour their treasures into the coffers of Canada and make more certain the burning of that old mortgage some day and the emergence of a time when we shall be less crippled with burdens of debt and when our future will therefore be more open and free.

I like the tone of the speech of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) for another reason. He not only frankly stated the position: There were the burdens; here was the background of realizable assets and there was our work as a united people to put our best efforts forth to bring about an adjustment of present difficulties and to develop all these rich resources. These he emphasized.

But he emphasized another thing which I should like to mention, viz.: the distinct and decided trend towards economy of administration which was a distinguishing feature of the address made and the policy propounded by my hon. friend to-day. I wish just at this moment to thank my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Fielding), as one of the trusted leaders of the party opposite and one who, I believe, speaks the mind of that party in this respect, for having not only promised his support, but put in a very efficient impulse towards its fulfilment in the concluding part of his speech, to help forward the idea of national economy of expenditure as regards the Government and the public service. That thought is to-day in the minds of members on both sides of the House. Hon. members on both sides, and particularly hon. members on the Government side, always have been and will be subject to pressure from their constituents. Yet it is not always to be declared that it is an improper thing that pressure should come from constituents, because constituents lie back yonder amongs those developable and rich resources of our country; they see needs for improvements and aid in different portions; they go to their members, and the members come to the Government. That is a fair thing to do, and it ought not to be frowned upon in the least. If I may be allowed just a simple piece of counsel, might I suggest that it is for the member himself not to be simply the open medium through which every demand that is made upon him from his constituency is pitched into the lap of the Government with his backing behind it? It is for the member, in the exercise of his good sense, wisdom and knowledge, to act first as a sort of sieve through which these demands may be sorted out; and when he comes to press upon the Government for what he thinks ought to be done for the different parts of his constituency, it is for him to give a reasoned and modified translation of the broad, general and very generous demands which are made upon him by his constituents. That is just a word of counsel from the elder brother to the younger members of the House.

That should be the watchword. Now we can aid that in two ways. May I be allowed to suggest how my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's and his friends behind him may assist in carrying out the programme in that respect? When they go back and talk over with their constituents what this Government has done, it will be a great help to the Government in the line of economy if they will take the ground that economy is a necessary thing, and that it must be practised by the Government and upheld by Parliament. Let them not say to their constituents: "You did not get this thing and that thing because there is a Union Government in power,"—leading them to think that if the Union Government had not been in power, but in its place that improvisation of a coming government so beautifully portrayed by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's they would have had their wharves and their docks and other public works constructed. That is just the wrong way to encourage economy in the Government or in Parliament.

Let my hon. friends, when they go back to their constituents, tell the people plainly: "It is time for economy, and the Government is right in exercising reasonable and even rigid economy, and we must support them so far as that is concerned."

Then, members on both sides of the House can help the Government in another way, and that way is to ponder very carefully what the Government after looking very carefully into the condition of things here on the Hill and outside in the country in its different services consider might be done without any diminution of the efficiency of the public service but with a distinct gain in lessened expenditure on that service, and let hon. gentlemen back up the Government in its measures of efficiency and economy in the Civil Service all through this country. When I speak of economy in the Civil Service I do not simply mean that we should have regard to the personal emoluments and salaries of a certain number—about forty thousand or fifty thousand—of men and women. The Civil Service is a great organism through which the Government carries out its measures of enterprise and administration, and millions of dollars can be wasted and spent uselessly through an inefficient Civil Service system through the country, which millions can equally well be saved through efficiency, economy, organization and thorough co-operation of the members of the Civil Service. That duty has not all been done. That work has not all been accomplished by any manner of means, on the Hill or outside of Ottawa in great lines of Civil Service administration, and I who say so now know it. Business organization goes forward with a bound, but administrations make changes slowly. They have the accretions of years around them. They are like ill-built cities, which have grown up on no plan at all, but simply a house here, then an adjoining house, then a hut, then another building, and with crooked streets and no lookout. So the Civil Service system and the administration of Governments grows up by little and little, and you wake up some day to find out that while the great business houses which are putting themselves forward in the great race of enterprise and work are organized on business and scientific principles, the Civil Service of many, nay of almost all countries in the world, have yet to make adequate and efficient organization, and have yet to adapt efficiency and economy and scientific principles to the work which they are carrying on. We have something to do in Canada in that respect, whereby millions and millions of dollars may be saved. So that economy which is a distinct plank in the utterance of my hon. friend to-day, and in which he is backed by the Government, is something to the commendation of the Minister of Finance.

The Finance Minister has make another notable declaration, a declaration on the line of the best business thought of Canada to-day. What is it? Though the burdens are heavy, though the country has untold unexpected liabilities and obligations which have to be met,—and we intend to meet them, though those liabilities are very pressing and very onerous,—the Finance Minister has stated, what business people believe to be right, and what we around these benches believe to be right,—that for this year, and if possible next year and the years after, Canada shall not incur further debt. We may be obliged to carry for years the debt which we have at the present time, but that we should from this time on, so far as we can, balance our accounts and make our revenues tally with our expenditure. Taking that into account, the other fact must also be taken into account, that it is not possible to do everything we would like to do because of the heavy burden of carrying the war debt of the country,—that $2,250,000,000 of net debt that we have to carry. At the same time, the promulgation of the principle that no loans are to be made at the present time, but that we must out of our own resources meet our own liabilities year after year, is a great step forward; and if Parliament and the country will stand behind the Government in that declaration and in trying to have it fulfilled, we will come all the sooner to the time when inflation and big debt charges, and all the discomforts and disorganization resulting therefrom, will be mitigated, and gradually we will emerge from the mists into the sunshine of liberty and prosperity so far as economic and financial considerations are concerned. I think that is a healthy principle to instil, and a healthy determination to make, both here in Parliament and outside in the country. Let us pay our own way.

Another thing that has been done by the Finance Minister is this: He has made a courageous attempt to devise and to impose methods of taxation which shall help to square our accounts and bring us up to the position to which I have just alluded. I say that is a courageous attempt, and it deserves our support here in this House. It is not popular. As I was passing out to-night I heard a member who does not belong to this side of the House express a view which I am quite sure will be often expressed. Speaking of the taxation schemes of the Minister of Finance he said, "It is going to make the Government very unpopular. There are women voters now, and the Government is not going to gain many of their votes by taxing women's dress and women's jewellery." There, again might I be allowed to suggest how my hon. friends on the other side of the House can help mightily towards the readjustment of things financial and economic? It is in this way. When you visit your constituents do not go back on your promises and principles of to-night and do not say to the electors, as you meet them: "Are you going to keep that Government in power?" Do not say to the woman voter: "What is this you have around your neck—a fur? The Government put 20 per cent on that fur. Have you a vote? Then, when the next time for voting comes around don't you vote for that Government or a representative of it." Be careful and not stultify yourselves by saying that you will take the duty off if you get in, though you may make that promise with impunity for the prospect is far in advance. But if you do not do that you will greatly assist in bringing about the payment of those dues which are absolutely necessary if we are going to pay our way and reconstruct and readjust our economic and financial affairs. I know it is a courageous thing for the Minister of Finance or the Government to put on new forms of taxation, but there are some blessed and good features in the direct form of taxation; and one lesson which cannot be taught too quickly and which cannot be brought home to the people too strongly is that the burdens of the country are to be borne by the country itself and that the people must stiffen their backs and strengthen their courage and double their endeavours in order to bring the country out of the position in which it is to-day to a better economic and financial basis.

Every one must realize the fact that there is a duty to be done, and that it is not by the indirect method, only that it shall be done. We have had two systems of taxation, one almost entirely predominating up to the present time, and that is the method of indirect taxation, by which the people paid heavily and did not know when they were doing so. All sorts of assertions have been made as to the amounts they paid,—assertions which of course would partake of the particular power of imagination of the man who made them and of his boldness of speech. All kinds of assertions have been made, many of them grotesquely exaggerated; but nevertheless one of the features of indirect taxation is that you pay out not knowing how much you do pay. I doubt if that system of taxation, altogether imposed upon a country, is a good school teacher to that country and does finally eventuate in what is best for the interests of the people. I think that a judicious mixture of the two, by practice made necessary and by practice gradually worked out without too great a wrench, is a mixture that the body politic should be asked to take, and if they will do it we shall place no stamp or excise duty upon the administration of that mixture. So that now we are working up along the line of direct taxation every year a little further, and yet not by too violent advances that would produce—I was about to say a revolution, but that word does not convey my meaning—but a reaction against that principle of taxation. We have now a judicious mixture, I think, of the two kinds of taxation. In our business profits tax, in our income tax, we have examples of the direct method. We add to these now our sales tax on luxuries and other articles. By the methods of taxation adopted we bring it to the mind of the purchaser that this is a tax which is paid by the person himself or herself, and which is not added to by the profits of the middleman, the man between the manufacturer and the retail counter. By bringing this fact home to the purchaser at the time of the purchase, we adopt, I think, a practical way of inculcating in the body politic a real interest in and solicitude for the good government and economic administration of the country.

I shall not follow that line of thought any longer. These are just some of the views I place before the House with its kind permission. Now I desire to come to the speech delivered by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and I hope he will not think, if I disagree with him in certain particulars, that I am at all detracting from my general admiration of his speech. Just on that point let me say that it has been to an eminent degree non-partisan in character. The hon. gentleman drew a line of comparison between 1914 and 1920, and he did that with his long experience behind him, not for the purpose of a partisan appeal, but rather to inform the country itself, as a man of his experience and length of public service could well do, to put before them the duties of the present as compared with the duties of the past, the obligations of the present as compared with the obligations of the past, and to show the sacrifice and effort which would be necessary on their part in the future as compared with the standard of necessity in these respects that existed in the past. That is a good thing to have done, and I congratulate my hon. friend on having done it. He paid a compliment to the Minister of Finance, but it was rather left-handed, in that in paying a compliment to one minister he somewhat took away from a complimentary reference to another minister. He said that it was easy in war time for Finance Minister No. 1, but it was hard in peace time for Finance Minister No. 2; and he thought that if Finance Minister No. 1 had had a little more foresight and a little more courage he might not have done some of the things which he did do. Ah! those afterthoughts! How they plague us, and pursue us, and chastise us; but they never remedy the thing that was done before the second thoughts came. They have no power of salvation for an error or an act committed before they were brought out from the misty depths of thought or imagination and applied in their sober secondary condition. Now, you have to put yourselves in the position the man was in when the thing under consideration was done, and if my hon. friend will put himself in that position I think he will revise his opinion and say that during the five-year period of the war the task of the ex-Minister of Finance No. 1 was a hard one.. He may well say that in peace times finance minister No. 2 will have a hard task. I have collaborated with both and I think I have a pretty good idea of what has been done by the former Finance Minister and what so far has been done by the present Finance Minister. I do not envy them the work they had to do but I give my tribute, and I give it most willingly and unreservedly, to the able management of the finances of the country by Finance Minister No. 1 during the trying period of the war. There were difficulties which had to be surmounted. Some things were made easy because of the buoyancy of the feeling of patriotism and service which was then at its height. But there were other things that were awfully hard, tremendously grinding, and that worked into the very vital sap of the man who had to bear the responsibility of it and work out in practice and in administrative system what there was to be worked out. But let us give due credit to each.

Afterthoughts! Yes, my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's has had afterthoughts. But they did not rectify the errors of the past; his primary action which probably would not have been taken if he had taken time for the afterthoughts. There was a time when my hon. friend—lest he think too highly of himself I just want to suggest it to him—prophesied that the Grand Trunk Pacific could be built at a cost to the country of only $15,000,000. After thoughts would have told him that it would cost $200,000,000. It would have relieved him and relieved the shoulders of the present Minister of Finance if my hon. friend had only had after thoughts before he took the action itself. It is just one sample. You can go through the list of all governments, all ministries and even all individuals, and you will find this brooding nightmare of after thoughts coming to plague and pursue them.

What was the position of my hon. friend on loans? I followed him with a great deal of interest and, really, I could not quite follow him. Although years have passed over him, as they have passed over myself, he is yet agile in body and agile in mind and in spirit. And he did skate most scientifically around that business of the loan domestic or the loan foreign. What his idea was it is difficult to say, but I analysed his position like this: Glad in a way that we received a lot of money in our own country when we could not raise it in any other because there was no other country we could go to that would give us a dollar, outside of the United States and they would give us very little. In fact, we had to loan to outside countries instead of borrowing from them. Glad, then, that Canada showed that she possessed such resources that she was able to raise a billion dollars to prosecute the war; yet finding when we come to the readjustment that the money which has been wasted in war is not available in the banks or in the pockets of the people to go into the business and industry of the country, and he moans and bemoans that fact. But there you are; the money was there, the money had to be raised. We raised it and if it was blown away on the battlefield it is not in the banks to-10 p.m. day nor in the pockets of the people to put into business enterprises. We must dig up other money, and the way to dig it up is to stop strikes, stop holidaying, stop doing half work, stop wasting, and set ourselves to the business of honest toil and honest production. That is the only way we can replace the money so spent. I wish my voice could penatrate to the heart of every man and woman in this country and impress upon every heart this message and keep it there like the message on a film: "Stop wasting; go to work; produce; stop grouching and grumbling; and we will soon get back to an atmosphere that is bright and happy and hopeful.

My hon. friend had something to say about a stock transaction. I am sure he would not have said what he did if he had had the facts before him. I propose to place just the bare facts before him, and these facts are amply proved by the documents and accounts. What did my hon. friend say?

> There is one feature which, while well known to the inside circle of finance, has not been made known in any marked way to the Canadian public at large, and I think it is time that the Canadian people knew something about it.

Here we have a mystery. The hon. gentleman's words go out to-morrow morning in the papers and the public will scent a mystery. Something has taken place. The public ought to know it because the ex-Minister of Finance says it is so. What is this thing? Some more rascality of the Union Government! He goes on to say:

> If you take up the last volume of the Public Accounts for the year ending March 31, 1919, you will find a couple of interesting items.

Interesting! The public cocks up its ears again! A mystery; an interesting mystery! The ex-Minister of Finance says so! He had thirty years' experience; he had that solemn oracle, the Public Accounts, in his hand, and he backed up his statement with the Public Accounts! What is this interesting mystery?

> If you take up the last volume of the Public Accounts for the year ending March 31, 1919, you will find a couple of interesting items. There is a later volume than that, but we have not got it.

More of a mystery, more interesting facts to come out in volume 2! For the time being my hon. friend contents himself with volume 1:

> For that year, however, any hon. member will discover in the statement of receipts and expenditures an item called "Bank of Montreal Trading Account"—a very interesting account. Hon. members will read the items therein contained and will discover that the Government paid out on that account the sum of $7,450,000 and got back $5,177,904. So on that account—whatever it means—the Government of Canada—in other words, the people of Canada—lost $2,272,000.

Now that is the statement. I am sorry to say, on his own account, that my hon. friend is altogether mistaken in coming to that conclusionô and I take the occasion to put the proof before the House so that it may, come out on the wings of the same press which takes that interesting mystery propounded by my hon. friend on its plumage to carry abroad to the reading public. Now, what are the facts of the case? In brief, they are these: That the Government expended $10,950,000 for the whole completed transaction. It got back out of that transaction $11,074,088, and instead of losing $2,272,000 it made a gain of $124,088 for that whole period on the bonds of the Victory Loan of 1917. This transaction was closed on September 7th, 1918.

Mr. FIELDING: Will my hon. friend allow me to ask from what public record he is quoting? Where does it appear in the Public Accounts?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It will be found in an Order in Council which I propose to lay on the Table.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TRAHAN: An Order in Council!

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Well, now some hon. gentleman, as I should judge, has expressed a bit of dissent—a little bit of dissent. What do my hon. friends want? Will they take the Auditor General's authority? Will they take the report of the Auditor General? My hon. friend holds up a book, and he reads from that book two sets of figures, but he makes his own deductions. That book does not show that $2,272,000 was a loss accruing to the country; it simply gives a statement of an expenditure and an income in an unfinished account. My hon. friend's fault was that he did not state what was in that book when he told the people of Canada that this Government has been trafficking and has lost $2,272,000. The latter statement was an inference of his own and it was absolutely incorrect.

An hon. MEMBER: Another dark secret exploded.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Now my hon. friend went on to the tariff question, and there I sat in blissful amazement. Looking over the thirty years that have passed and the controversies that have taken place between my hon. friend and myself, and between his party and the party on this side of the House I felt almost like saying, when he had finished, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace;" and the question forced itself upon me. "Has the tariff millennium come?" The whole party behind my hon. friend never voiced opposition to what he said; they could not; they dared not. They do not like to admit, what in their hearts they know to be the truth—that is repugnant to them; yet if they were all as honest as the ex-Minister of Finance they would get up and say the very same thing. Now, after these confessions—not of an opium eater, but of a virile, experienced public man—after this candid confession, let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite: "Do not let us hear anything more of camouflaged assertions from that side as to free trade being the doctrine which is dear to your hearts and embodied in your policies. You cannot put it into your policy now. I do not think you ever meant to put it into your policy to carry out as a reality when you got into power. That was done once before in the history of this country, and the lesson is to be read in the records of Canada. O, don't I know all about it? Didn't I go through all those campaigns preceding 1911 when from the highest authority down to the lowest there was this universal declamation against the principle of protection; that it should be eliminated from the tariff—not be allowed to lurk in corners and by-places, but to be eliminated. To-day what have we? We have the ex-Finance Minister standing for an anti-dumping clause—when circumstances require it; standing for a substantial aid to industries—when circumstances require it; standing for mergers—when circumstances require it; aye, and even more, standing for the protected infant industry while it was an infant industry, until it had attained years of maturity; standing for all these—when the circumstances of the case seemed to require it. Where is the free trade doctrine, and where is the difference in principle between myself as a moderate protectionist and my hon. friend as a now avowed protectionist, the principle to be adapted and adopted—as circumstances require it? That was always the doctrine on this side of the House. We never worshipped protection as a fetish; can the same be said by hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to free trade? We have always believed that the circumstances of the time should dictate the financial and tariff policy of the time. And my hon. friend's confession to-night has amply justified the policy advocated during thirty years by Liberal-Conservatives in all parts of Canada.

Now, what is to be said hereafter to our friends who compose the Farmers' party? Oh, my friend from Shelburne and Queen's is a youthful wooer yet; was there ever such a Romeo? Was there ever such a Juliet, looking out of a window embowered in vines and flowers, for a Romeo that attuned so sweet a note, so persuasive a love ditty, as my hon. friend has sung to-night? It did my old heart good, and I felt almost like making love to something myself. I know I never before could have done it as well, and with this example before me I may try yet again. But, alas, for the Juliet, when it came to that prosaic allegory of the horse race! My hon. friend then forgot the party that he wooed so ardently. The only two horses allowed on the track are the Liberal and Conservative. The Progressives are counted out. My hon. friend says to them in effect; you may be good for some purposes, but when it comes to the real race you are out, you are scratched, there is no chance for you.

Then my hon. friend starts off on a quest of his own, it is like the quest of Japhet in search of a father. Where shall we find the proper policy? We cannot find it in the Liberal-Unionists; we cannot find it in Meighen's vocabulary; we cannot find it in Crerar's vocabulary; cannot find it in Clark's vocabulary. Where shall we find it? And the answer to the weary seeker comes from the member for Queen and Shelburne. "Here is the embodiment of the plan leading to proper tariff policy. I have just repudiated the errors of the past. Come with me, and I will take you to the Promised Land." Jordan and the desert may be between, it is true, but to-night he forgot Jordan and the desert, and was almost in the Promised Land, with the Farmers tagging behind him as beneficiaries of all the grapes of Escol and the other fruits of that delectable country.

I will not continue further and will now resume my seat.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. member proceeds, I desire to state that the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was submitted in my momentary absence from the Chair. A strict application of the rules of debate would demand that the discussion be confined to the amendment before the Chair; but I think it would be most undesirable that we should have a debate upon the amendment, to be followed by a debate upon the main question. I therefore suggest that it would suit the purpose of the House better to have a discussion general in terms upon the whole question, as would be the case if the amendment were not submitted.

Mr. FIELDING: If you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I was quite aware of the point, but I understand it has always been the practice in the case of the Budget debate that though an amendment was moved the whole question remained open. It was because of that understanding I made my motion.

[Sir George Foster.]

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is my recollection, too.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been so in practice, but the rule I have stated remains, and it was to avoid any question arising on the point that I mentioned the circumstance.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker, I intend to make some rather extended remarks upon the subject under discussion, but as the hour is now late and the evening has been full of enjoyment, I beg to throw myself upon the fraternal atmosphere engendered by the remarks of the last speaker (Sir George Foster) and, with the consent of all, to propose the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If my hon. friend is very earnest in his desire I suppose we should not object, although we should like very much to make progress. Perhaps he will be content to go on for twenty minutes or half an hour. But I will not press him to proceed.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Speaker, there are a great number of resolutions which I think it would be wise for us to look over carefully, and I am going to take advantage of the kind offer of the Prime Minister.

Motion agreed to and the debate adjourned.

SENATE BILL—SECOND READING.

Bill No. 134 for the relief of Albert Graham Elson.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

On motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Wednesday, May 19, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

MOTION RESPECTING PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (Strathcona) moved:

That Bill No. 133 (from the Senate), for the relief of Edith Sarah Bell, be placed on the Order Paper among private Bills for second reading on Friday next.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

Mr. FOSTER (York):

1. Is it the intention of the Government to take action in the near future upon the report made by the commission which has held an investigation on technical education?

2. Is it contemplated to give any assistance to the Toronto Technical School which is now being used by the Government as a base for the retraining of returned soldiers?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. Action has already been taken by the passing of the Technical Education Act on July 7, 1919.

2. For the year ending March 31, 1920, the sum of $36,100 was granted by the Ontario Government to the above school, one-half of which amount will be paid by the Dominion Government out of the funds provided under the said Act.

BRANT MILITARY HOSPITAL, BURLINGTON.

Mr. ANDERSON:

1. Has the Government completed the purchase of the Brant Military Hospital at Burlington, Ontario?

2. If so, what amount of real estate is included with the building, and what was the price paid?

3. How much was paid for the furniture to the owner?

4. What was the cost of remodelling and repairs to the building?

5. How many soldiers have been treated in it?

6. What is the cost of maintenance per annum?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. No.

2. (a) Approximately 6½ acres expropriated; (b) award not yet made by the court but an advance of $120,000 was paid pending the decision.

3. $11,465.86.

4. $349,933.54.

5. The Brant Military Hospital was taken over from the Invalided Soldiers' Commission on March 25, 1918, and transferred to the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment on the 31st October, 1919. Between these two dates, 2,562 patients were treated.

Up to March 31, 1920, 572 ex-members of the Forces had been provided with treatment in the Brant House Hospital as patients of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. There are at present 246 patients of the department undergoing treatment in that institution.

6. Incidental repairs from 25-3-18 to 15-9-19, $6,636.44; water, fuel, light and telephone from 25-3-18 to 15-9-19, $20,207.52; total $26,843.96. Rate per annum approximately $18,000. This hospital was placed under the control of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment on the 15th October, 1919, since which date expenditure on account of maintenance has amounted to $14,791,82.

SEED GRAIN ADVANCES.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

How much was overdue and owing to the Government on account of advances made to purchase seed grain for use in the Prairie Provinces on the 31st of December, 1919?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE: $1,493,121.11.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. WIGMORE:

1. What are the names and respective salaries of the employees of the Parliamentary Library?

2. How many are graduates of any college in Arts or Library Science?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to make any more appointments to the said Library of persons who have not taken a library science course in some recognized college?

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Who are the publishers of the Montreal Gazette?

2. What amounts have been paid to the Montreal Gazette Publishing Company for each of the last five fiscal years by the Dominion Government for (a) advertising, and (b) job printing?

Mr. STEVENS:

1. What is the total amount of sick mariners dues collected from shipping entering Canadian Ports for each of the years 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919?

2. What amount has been expended by the Government in assistance to sick or distressed mariners during each of said years?

3. How many officials of the Marine Department in Ottawa have been engaged exclusively on duties connected with collection, distribution and administration of sick mariners dues?

4. How many officials of Marine Department have been transferred to Health Department in connection with sick mariners dues?

VICTORY LOANS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): May I ask my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) if he will be kind enough to lay on the table of the House a copy of the Order in Council which he read in the course of the discussion yesterday, touching the question of Victory Loan transactions?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I certainly will. I thought that had already been done.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 18, the debate on the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. ANDREW ROSS McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be those of thanks to the Prime Minister for having kindly consented to adjourn this debate in order to give myself and other members of the House an opportunity to examine the very important matters contained in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) delivered yesterday.

Before considering the speech of the Minister of Finance, there is another speech which might perhaps be dealt with. As we listened last night to the two ex-Ministers of Finance, one who adorns the Conservative, and the other, no less adorns the Liberal side of the House, we were reminded of that ancient saying, "Old books to read, old wood to burn, old wine to drink, and old politicians to listen to," because nothing could have been more agreeable than to listen to the remarks of these two gentlemen (Hon. Mr. Fielding and Sir George Foster), whether one agreed entirely with them or not.

Now, let me take up the remarks that, after all, were of a somewhat light nature which were made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday. I cannot attempt to follow him into his figurative or imaginative finance. I am an unworthy member of a church, Mr. Speaker, that does not believe in purgatory, and I have got an idea that our claims or assets are either good or bad, and I am afraid that our bad assets do not give room for any doubt as to their worthlessness. The minister (Sir George Foster) mentioned the trend towards economy. After all, it is delightful to know that a man who is approaching the milestone of four score can see in the Estimates of this year any trend towards economy. My eyes have not served me for so many years, but I have discovered no trend towards economy at all, and I am afraid that my hon. friend was then simply calling upon his poetic imagination, as he did later on in the discussion.

Then there was his criticism of the Civil Service. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, the Civil Service has many aspects in which it might be better. But does any severe criticism of it lie in the mouth of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? He has been associated with the public life of this country for very many years. Under him for many years the Civil Service grew up, to a certain extent at any rate; and if the Civil Service is badly organized it appears to me that a leading member of a government that has been in power for the last eight years—too long a time—and for eighteen far too long years some time ago has got to share to a very considerable degree the responsibility. Then we had the Minister of Trade and Commerce acting as a sort of Greek chorus to whatever the Minister of Finance said. "We must have no more loans," says the Minister of Finance; echoes the Minister of Trade and Commerce: "No more loans." What a splendid policy! No more loans. "We must pay our way," the Minister of Finance tells us; the refrain is taken up by his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce: "We must pay our way." Of course, we must pay our way; of course we must have no more loans. But is not that sort of preaching rather the preaching of an apostle of the obvious? There was one point to which I listened with a certain amount of amusement, and that was the credit and praise which my hon. friend (Sir George Foster) bestowed upon the Minister of Finance for his being truthful. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance belongs to the profession to which I belong—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McMASTER: And we do not have to be praised for telling the truth. We are truthful: Cela va sans dire. Then we had some talk about the methods of taxation; there was direct taxation and indirect taxation; and, if I may without impropriety attempt to do so, I may suggest that we had Dr. Foster's judicious compound of taxation, both direct and indirect. We shall examine that mixture later on, but for the time being I merely direct attention to that part of the right hon. gentleman's speech. I will not attempt to follow my venerable, learned and honourable friend into the realms of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet or into the more prosaic field of horse racing at the Woodbine track, Toronto.

But I purpose now to take up what I might call the more serious part of the mental pabulum afforded the country and the House by the Government yesterday. The Minister of Finance, at the outset of his discourse, pointed out that there were two objectives to which this country should bend its energies: first, the resumption of ordinary economic conditions—the economic conditions which prevailed, I presume, before the war;—and, second the endeavour to reduce the debt. Now, what did he mean by ordinary economic conditions? If he meant conditions which obtained before the war, then I say that those conditions are such that we should not try to resume them, because before the war mankind was suffering through the conglomeration of great quantities of wealth in the hands of the few, and a great deal of the hardest, the most unpleasant and the most essential work of the world was badly paid for. We certainly do not wish to continue, but rather to correct as far as possible, such conditions if they have persisted. As to the reduction of the debt, we all agree with the Minister of Finance that it should be reduced; but when he asks us to sink all our differences, I suppose he can only mean that we should all adopt his view as to what is best, and that is something which I believe we cannot, should not, and will not do. We cannot all agree upon the economic problems which confront this country, but what we can do is to discuss fairly the questions which are before us, to listen to the debate with an open mind, and to put the matter to the vote at as early a date as possible and abide by the verdict of the majority.

I am somewhat at a loss, Sir, to understand completely the import of the very large mass of statistics which the Minister of Finance placed before us yesterday. They were of interest no doubt. But when he compared figures of years ago with figures of to-day his old professional habit of mind reasserted itself and he was compelled to tell us that, of course, comparisons should not be made because currency had become so inflated that comparisons of to-day with ten years ago in dollars were not worth much; and he was frank enough to tell us that when you examine the other criteria of comparisons, such as the amount of tonnage moved on the railways and matters of a similar character, you would find that production had not increased but had rather decreased in this country. I was very much interested in listening to the minister's remarks in regard to the inflation of our dollar bill. I had been at some pains a year ago to stress this fact somewhat in the remarks which I made upon the Budget. It seems to me, not only from the experience of this country, of the United States, and of Great Britain, but also from the experience of the rest of the civilized world, that the increase of paper currency as compared to the backing of gold guaranteeing that currency has a tremendous amount to do with the inflation of prices. I think that the House will bear with me when I quote some figures, which are really extending those given by the Minister of Finance.

The world's paper currency, since the beginning of the war, has increased no less than 600 per cent, while the gold reserves back of that paper has increased by only 40 per cent. The four central powers, Germany, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey, in 1914 had $1,200,000,000 of paper money outstanding. That had increased about tenfold by 1918,—some $12,300,000,000; and by 1919 it had increased to $18,770,000,000, while the ratio of gold to notes had dropped from 49.7 per cent in 1914 down to 5½ per cent in 1918 and down to 1.7 per cent in 1919, thus explaining in a very large measure the depreciation of the German mark and the Austrian kroner. The eighteen allied countries suffered in the same way, though not to the same extent. In 1914 the Allied Countries including Russia had issued $4,900,000,000 of notes, and the ratio of gold to notes was 76.6 per cent. They had increased by 1918 to $25,000,000, with a ratio of 20.9, and in 1919 there had been a jump to $30,000,000,000, and the ratio of gold to notes had fallen to 17.1 per cent.

Before the war, with one dollar you could go into the bank and get about five francs. If you go into the bank to-day I think you can get almost twelve francs for your dollar. If you went into the bank before the war with a dollar bill they would give you 5.18 lire; now they will give you 14 or 15. If you went into the bank with a dollar bill before the war and asked that that bill be changed into marks, they would give you 4.19 marks; now they will give you over 60 marks. While the Swiss franc has kept its place, the pound sterling which, before the war was worth about $4.86 is now worth —I do not know the exact rate to-day—but I think it is in the neighbourhood of $4. For the purposes of my argument I will take it at $4.

Now I come to what I started out with, the practical application of the information, known of course to most of the members of the House, which I have just given. The Government has aggravated the exchange situation and it has done it in this way: When a merchant imports, let us say, from France, a bill of goods amounting to $100, the customs house authorities first change that $100 into francs, or rather the francs into dollars, not at the present rate of exchange, but at the rate of exchange prevailing before the war. What does that mean? It means that the rate of duty on goods coming in from France has been raised between three and four times; whereas, if a bill of goods comes in from the United States, where our currency is at a discount, the American dollar is taken as of the same value as our Canadian dollar and the duty is imposed on that basis. The effect of this is that we discourage imports from those countries in which our dollar is worth more than their denominations of currency. Imports are discouraged from France, Great Britain and other European nations and they are encouraged from the United States. How does it work out? Goods similar to those of typically French production are manufactured in this country and that means that the manufacturer of these goods is given a protection three or four times as much as he previously enjoyed. The same thing applies to goods which usually come from Italy or goods which came from former enemy countries. But more than that, and overshadowing all these other considerations, this system penalizes goods coming from Great Britain because goods coming from Great Britain, in view of the exchange situation and the manner in which it is handled by this Government, pay far more duty than they should pay and far more duty than was intended when the tariff schedules were prepared.

What is the object of all this? There are only two explanations for this conduct—either that the Government does not understand what it is doing or that it is giving to its protectionist manufacturing friends a double dose of protection. It is either one thing or the other. The Government is on the horns of a dilemma; it may choose whichever horn it wishes to sit upon but neither will be comfortable. The United States do not do that sort of thing. The United States, when they come to levy duties on goods coming from Europe and elsewhere, take the current rate of exchange, taking the basis upon which their currency is being accepted with the Italian, French or Belgian currency and levy duties accordingly. The fact of the matter is that our foreign trade, our chance of doing business with these people, is being seriously affected by the action of the Government. Not only that but before we can have a satisfactory world to live in, before we can have normal trade conditions, Europe must resume its pre-war conditions in so far as trade is concerned. Imports from these countries ought rather to be encouraged than discouraged because so long as Europe cannot sell to us, as long as we have to buy from the United States, we are likely to see our dollar bill reduced in value as compared to the American currency because the rate of exchange is not governed merely by the relations of trade between the United States and Canada but between Canada and the rest of the world, and European business has an effect on the rate of exchange with the United States. The net result is that trade with the United States is being artificially encouraged and trade with Great Britain, France, and the rest of Europe is being artificially discouraged.

The minister went on to speak about the deficit with which this country is faced for the year to come. There are three ways of making both ends meet. The first is to increase one's revenue, not always possible; the second is to decrease one's expenditure, generally possible though often very unpleasant, and the third is to do something along both lines; that is to increase one's revenue and to decrease one's expenditure. I have examined with care the Estimates for the coming year for the purpose of discovering that trend towards economy so eloquently spoken of by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce last night. Running over the Estimates—and, Mr. Speaker I do not wish to weary the House with a mass of figures—I find that there are a number of services which I think it would be difficult to reduce—I do not say impossible, but suggestions for their reduction could only come after the most careful examination and after one had full information which I believe only those in charge of tthe departmeent, or who had made a special investigation of the department, would be able to give. I do not propose to criticise at this time the expenditure on civil government, administration of justice, penitentiaries, legislation, agriculture, immigration, pensions or superannuation, but when I come to the question of Militia and Defence, when I see that we have a proposal to expend at the close of a war which was to end war, $12,498,506, an increase of over $4,000,000, I must ask again: Are the people of Canada sane folk or are they continuing the mad race which has been carried on in Europe when we see Poland spending about six times her national income on her army and when we see France spending as much on her army as she did before the war and when it would seem as though the lesson of the war had not been learned.

What was the lesson of the war? The lesson of the war was that what was known as preparedness or military expenditure was no security for the countries which incurred that expenditure. During the years before the war, Mr. Speaker, those responsible for the military and naval expenditure in different countries went to the taxpayers and said: What you are paying for these services is merely by way of insurance. Give us another army corps, give us some more dreadnoughts, and you will be safe. I know it was difficult when one great nation had set the pace for other great nations to refrain from keeping step —I realize that. But that nation that set the pace has suffered for the setting of the pace—it lies prostrate to-day. What reason is there, unless other nations are imbued with the same miserable, proud, arrogant, selfish, aggrandizing militarisms which cursed Germany—what right is there for a continuation of that policy to-day? And are we to follow in its footsteps? Canada was one of the most unmilitary nations of the world. I suppose our expenditure on military and naval services before the war, compared to our size, was as small as that of any other nation in the world. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, was there a nation when it got into the struggle that did better? Did our young men who came from the farms, and the counting-house, the warehouse—did they do as well or did they do better than men who had spent three or four years of their life as conscript soldiers? I ask the House to agree with me that we can save at least $4,000,000 on our expenditure on military services this year. Let the boys who fought for four years overseas enjoy their summer holiday this year in some other way than in camp. I am sure that often when they were overseas they thought of the happy times they had spent in Canada on lake and on river, or in the woods. If the need arises again—please God it will not—they will do their duty once more; but let us lead the way in peace—as we led the way on this continent in war—towards reasonable retrenchment and a stopping of this mad race of armament, this mad race of militarism. I say in all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, that the great standing armies which were supposed to be the bulwark of the safety of the different nations which supported them were sources of danger rather than sources of protection. I say this: That if one-tenth of the expenditures which Europe devoted to military armament and military services had been expended for the purpose of trying to organize international friendship and peace the war would never have come. I say that militarism has shown that it is a ghastly failure and a stupid mistake, and I ask the people of this, my country, to show the way to cut down that expenditure and to save the money of the people—aye, and perhaps save the future of Canada.

[Mr. McMaster.]

When I spoke like this some months ago the then Minister of Militia and Defence said: We do not fear another war but we have internal unrest in the country. That is one reason why we propose doubling the permanent force in Canada. To that I made reply then, and I make reply now: That is not the way to keep peace in Canada. Restore free speech; restore a free press; let the people know that the destinies of this country are to be decided by votes—by ballots and not by bullets. If there is unrest in the country give the people an opportunity to select the governors that they wish to have govern them, and you will have no necessity to increase the permanent force.

Now we come to another phase of the question. I find that Railways and Canals, chargeable to capital are responsible for a very large sum of money. My advice to the Government would be that we should save on everything; we should refuse to take on any expenditures except those that are absolutely necessary. Mr. Speaker, you are connected with a large business. If you had a deficit staring you in the face of something like half your ordinary revenue, would you propose to enlarge your plant? No one would do it in private life; no one should do it in public life. I find that the Hudson Bay railway is responsible for $100,000. The Hudson Bay railway I know is dear to the hearts of some of my Western friends, but I would be recreant in my duty if I allowed that fact to weigh with what I have to say. I think that perhaps we are over-built with railways in Canada just at the present moment, and I can see no harm in postponing the expenditure of that money. We propose to expend five and a half million dollars on the Welland ship canal. Well, surely the present canal system can take care of the business that is offering this coming summer, with this tremendous increase in the debt of the country. The Trent canal is responsible for $400,000. Surely that can also be postponed. It has been suggested that men who represent counties in this House are always willing to suggest economies for the neighbouring counties. Well, "Let the galled jade wince, my withers are unwrung." I have not been very long a member of this House, but I have never asked for the expenditure of one dollar in my county, unnecessarily—not one dollar for a public work—and I doubt if I have asked for the expenditure of one dollar for any purpose, in the constituency. I would raise my voice in unison with the voice of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I would ask him to go even further and see whether he cannot cut out some of these trade commissioners whose reports, when they are read, show that they must spend a good deal of their time holding down their chairs.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: That is not the right representation of their work.

Mr. McMASTER: Well, that is what one would gather from some of their reports. At any rate, my hon. friend can look into the matter; he can promise consideration in his usual considerate manner.

We now come to Railways and Canals, chargeable to income, $50,000,000. Surely there is something to be saved there. Oh, that I could revivify in the soul of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that passion for economy which he showed between 1896 and 1911!

We now come to Public Works, chargeable to capital $6,400,000. We find Esquimalt dry dock, $500,000; Port Arthur and something else, $600,000; Quebec harbour, $150,000; St. John harbour, $1,250,000; Toronto harbour—and oh, it would be gratifying to have the amount of tonnage which clears from that interesing place year by year—$1,700,000; while the breakwater on the Island—that pleasant place dear to the hearts of Torontonians—calls for an expenditure of $200,000. Then we have Public Works chargeable to income; and here Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to the fact, that the Amherst drill hall calls for $25,000. Surely this expenditure on the Amherst drill hall might very well be postponed. Then there is a public building in Granby, which calls for an expenditure of $18,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is Granby?

Mr. McMASTER: I trust, Mr. Speaker, that for this offence I shall not be called to order too often. The Toronto Postal Station calls for an expenditure of $425,000. Portage la Prairie has not been forgotten, although the Laprairie motor road may have been neglected many years, and that calls for an expenditure of $25,000.

Then comes an expenditure to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. For years past in the Northwest Territories we had a magnificent police force—a police force of great prestige and the finest in the world. To-day we find it merged into the Royal Dominion Police Force; and that merging means $500,000. Surely the Royal Northwest Mounted Police might well have been left in the Northwest Territories, and the administration of order in this part of the Dominion left, as hitherto, to the provincial authorities. Was Eastern Canada such a desperately dangerous place to live in prior to the bringing east of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police? Is it necessary for us to see on the streets of this city the splendid figures of those strapping young men in their red coats and spurs? When I visited Europe I never liked to see the armed gendarmerie in the streets of Paris or elsewhere, and I do not like to see them in the streets of Ottawa or elsewhere in this country.

It is said of the late Sir Richard Cartwright, after he had examined the Estimates for wharves in Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that he ejaculated: "Is there a cove forgot?" And when I look at the provisions made for wharves and breakwaters throughout Eastern Canada, I have this suggestion to make to any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who are responsible for the present administration of our affairs: That they should along with the Estimates print statistics of the number of vessels and the tonnage of those vessels which cleared from these various wharves during the last year of navigation. I cannot tell whether all these wharves are necessary; they may be; if they are, we will have to go on paying for them, but surely something could be saved along this line.

Now let us look at the next item to which I would draw the attention of the House: Mail subsidies and steamship subventions, $1,250,000. If there is one class of people who have been making money during the last two years, it is steamship owners. They have been making money to such an extent that even a single voyage would pay for the cost of the ship. Under those circumstances, surely there would be room for cutting out these annual subventions that have to be voted year by year. I find an item of $340,666.66 for a steamship service between Canada and the West Indies or South America. But the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) has just placed a large number of boats in commission, at a very heavy cost to the country. It is true that, according to his statement, interest has been earned upon that outlay; but nevertheless the capital expenditure has been very large. Now, he cannot expect to be allowed to build ships and operate them, and at the same time to pay other people for building ships and operating them; it is not reasonable. There certainly is room for economy there. Our steamship subsidies should, in the light of present conditions, be very carefully scritinized.

I see on the other side of the House the member for Lambton East (Mr. Armstrong). I trust that I will have his support, as his eloquent voice has been raised in this Chamber on many occasions to show us the extortionate profits that the steamship companies have been making, and to be consistent he ought to support my demand in regard to these maritime subventions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will he?

Mr. McMASTER: I find there are also subsidies to wrecking plants to the amount of $35,000. Surely that industry might stand on its own legs, or rather sail on its own ship's bottom.

Then I come to Public Works, $20,000,000 for the Government shipbuilding programme. Well I have already said all I have to say in that connection on another occasion, and I do not wish to delay the House by repeating it.

But there are two other items in the Estimates to which I wish to draw attention, they are the subventions paid by the Government to two press associations, the first being to the Canadian Press Association to the amount of $50,000. I say that that is a very vicious subvention.—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: —I say it is a vicious practice for a government to subsidize a press. The other item is $20,000 for the Associated Press. I do not believe that the Government is now printing the Official Record. I think that that interesting periodical has disappeared—to the regret of none,—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is too bad.

Mr. McMASTER: —from the periodical lists of this country.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Puffery.

Mr. McMASTER: You know, Mr. Speaker, years ago when a person wanted to clinch an argument, he would say, "I saw it in print." Now if one wants to discredit an argument in a friendly manner, one says, "Oh, that is just newspaper talk." That signalizes the depreciation which the press has suffered in public opinion. And the press for their own sake, as well as the Government for its own sake and for the sake of the pockets of the people should put a stop to these payments; there should be a free press.

I believe that the journalists of this country are high-minded men, I believe that they want to say the right thing—whether they are always at liberty to say the right thing is another matter.

Now, I have endeavoured to show and perhaps at greater length than I should have attempted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. McMASTER: —the economies, which should be practised. As a matter of fact I would like to trace out the footsteps that the Government may follow in continuing their trend towards economy.

The new tax proposals I will now deal with. And just let me say here, how delightful it was last night to listen to the Minister of Trade and Commerce talk, not about Union party—he had forgotten all about the Union party—but about the Liberal-Conservative party, about which he talked with enthusiasm. I understand that a political club in Ottawa is now waiting to know what the Government is going to do so that it may be in a position to style itself either a Union or a Liberal-Conservative club. But, after all, it must be difficult to make these changes. One man in his time plays many parts, and my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) used last night one of the various titles of his party —the Unionist party, the Liberal-Conservative party, the Conservative party and the Tory party—mais, pour moi, toujours la même chose! But for me, Mr. Speaker, always the same thing.

Before attempting to consider the duties which the minister has brought down, may I make this preliminary observation: That these taxes should not have been brought down before the minister had informed us that he had exhausted other and more direct means of taxation. During the last five years, there has been in this country a great deal of money heaped up in a comparatively few hands. During the war there were those who called, with all sincerity, "for the last man and the last dollar." But some others there were who crying the most loudly meant the last dollar they could get out of the situation—and they got it.

Now, in Great Britain, to which I like to go for examples in sound finance, a Committee of the Treasury has reported that a levy on war wealth is perfectly feasible and would bring into the coffers of the State a very large sum of money.

Now, I will say this for the very wealthy people in the part of the country from which I come: That their sons and the young men among them left their luxurious homes and went to the front as gallantly and as gladly as those in humbler circumstances. I believe that there are many among the rich men of Canada who would have no objection to giving up a very large portion of the wealth which they made during the war, provided that the tax strikes everybody equally; that all are treated alike. I think that the Minister of Finance has been somewhat negligent, if I may dare to use the word, in not sounding to the bottom that proposal and either bringing it in or explaining to us why it cannot be brought in.

Mr. CURRIE: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to put a question to him, now that he is on that very interesting subject? I would like to know his own view; would he favour a direct levy on wealth in this country?

Mr. McMASTER: I would certainly advocate a direct levy on war wealth; that is to say, wealth which was accumulated because of the war. It seems to me that that is an absolutely proper subject of taxation. Whether a levy on all wealth would be required is another matter; I would like to exhaust the possibilities of the levy on war wealth before I went into the question of a levy on all wealth. But I may point out to the hon. member that we have to find money; we have to pay back a large part of the debt, while the level of prices is high. To-day with a bushel of wheat you can pay off, I suppose, three dollars of the national debt, but if we wait for ten years until foodstuffs resume their normal price level, we may find that it will require three bushels of wheat to pay off three dollars of the debt.

Let me make also this preliminary observation. Excise duties which have been brought down are open to the objection which pertains to all duties on consumption; that is to say, they are unequal in their incidence. Take a man who has "his quiver full"; let us say that he has six children. The man who lives next door, with an equal income, has perhaps only one child. Any tax founded on consumption is bound to strike much more heavily the man with the six children than the man who has only one child.

4 p.m. These excise taxes are open to this objection; a tariff, even a tariff for revenue, is open to the same objection.

I should also like to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the excise duties now proposed are superimposed on the tariff, and that they should rather be countervailing to the tariff. Let me illustrate. Suppose I have some money which I can invest in a motor car,—a somewhat unwarranted suggestion, but let us make it for the purpose of argument. If I go to Detroit, buy a car for $1,000, and bring it into Canada, I will pay, under the new duty of 35 per cent, the 7½ per cent having been taken off, $350 by way of customs duty, and then I will pay a 15 per cent excise tax or $225, a total payment to the Government of $575. But suppose instead of going as far as Detroit I stop at Toronto and buy a car there; I will find that I can purchase a car equivalent to the car that would cost me $1,000 in Detroit, for just about $1,500. But how much will the Government get out of my purchase? $225 instead of $575. What we have to do in this country is to deflect into the treasury a great deal of the money which is going into the pockets of the privileged classes, the manufacturers. The ex-Minister of Finance, the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), whose moderation in statement is known and appreciated by all members of this House, last year said that he believed that for every dollar that went into the treasury of the country through the operations of the tariff, at least two dollars went into the pockets of private interests. What we have to do is to take some portion of that two dollars and deflect it into the treasury, not leave it in the pockets of the protected manufacturers.

Now, let us see how this would work out. Suppose instead of superimposing a tax of 15 per cent on motor cars we impose an excise tax of 10 per cent on imported motor cars and of 20 per cent on home produced motor cars. What would the result be? The profits of manufacturers of motor cars would be somewhat reduced, and I do not think that would hurt the country. The trasury would benefit by a very large amount and the consumer would not pay any more than he is paying now. Surely that should appeal to the Government, if it wants to get on the road to economy.

In all other countries—perhaps I should not say in all other countries, but certainly in Great Britain—the principle of a countervailing excise tax has been admitted and has been operated. For instance, into India there is imported year by year a vast quantity of cotton. A tax of 10 per cent, I think, is collected by the Indian authorities upon the cotton which comes into the country, but a countervailing duty of 10 per cent is placed upon the cotton manufactured in India in order that no private interest in that country may enjoy the benefit of special privilege and in order that the Government may reap the full benefit of the tax. I think that that point will appeal very strongly to the people of Canada.

There is another point which I wish to make in connection with the excise proposal. An excise tax should bear not on necessities but primarily on goods the consumption of which is to be discouraged rather than encouraged, such as an excise on beer and whisky. These are to be discouraged—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. McMASTER: I say so frankly; they are to be discouraged; an excise tax on these commodities is perfectly proper. When required, an excise tax is quite proper on luxuries. But if the Minister of Finance were in his seat I would ask him if he thinks that boots at $9 a pair are a luxury? If he goes into any store in the city to-day and asks for a pair of boots that will last him any time, he will pay a great deal more than $9 for them. The same with men's suits and women's dresses, where $45 is the limit; you cannot buy for $45 a suit that will wear. If there is any class of the community which deserves the sympathy and the care of the Government to-day it is the black-coated proletariat, the people who have retired on small incomes; the rentier; the annuitant; the clergyman; the clerk; the salaried class; the civil servant,—they all deserve the protection, the care and the thought of the Government. They have to wear clothes such as their employees wear. Their womenkind, who move in the same circle as their employers' wives, have to be respectably and properly dressed; and by placing a luxury tax on boots over $9 and on a suit or dress over $45 you are taxing the people of this country who of all others should not be taxed, because of all others they have suffered the most from the high cost of living. I see one of my farmer friends smiling. It is true that the farmer too, has to pay a great deal more for what he buys, but I am very glad to say he also is getting very much more for what he has to sell.

Most of the economic ideas of this Tory or Conservative or Liberal-Conservative or Unionist Government come from the United States. They have a luxury tax in the United States, and no doubt the Minister of Finance got his idea of the luxury tax from there. But in the United States the tax is only applied on the excess over the price up to which the article is exempt. For instance, if in the United States they had a luxury tax of 10 per cent on a pair of shoes over $9 the man who bought a pair of shoes for $10 would only have to pay 10 per cent on the difference between $9 and $10, but here, if I understand the example given by the Commissioner of Taxation, Mr. Breadner, if you buy a pair of shoes over $9 you have to pay 10 per cent on the whole purchase price. I see my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Currie) shaking his head. That is the explanation given in the Ottawa Citizen this morning.

Mr. CURRIE: I have been in the United States and I ought to know. The tax is payable on the whole purchase price there, just the same as it is here.

Mr. McMASTER: My information is to the contrary.

Mr. LALOR: Like the hon. member for Simcoe, I know something about this matter, and he is absolutely right in his statement.

Mr. McMASTER: Am I wrong in my statement?

Mr. LALOR: Yes, there is no question about it.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not buy as much in the United States as my Tory friends on the other side, but I understood that my explanation was correct, and I gave it to the House in good faith.

Mr. LALOR: I am sure the hon. member does not want to make a mis-statement. I can tell him that he is absolutely wrong.

Mr. McMASTER: I am quite willing to admit that my friends from Ontario know more about buying things from Buffalo and Detroit than I do, because I buy at home in Montreal, where I live. As the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) points out, with his usual logic, it is a very ridiculous tax if it is imposed in that way.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) is absolutely correct in his statement that in the United States the tax is paid only on the excess over a certain amount. I know that from personal experience.

Mr. McMASTER: My explanation of this difference of opinion is that when a Liberal goes into an American store they size him up and know they cannot put anything over on him, but when my hon. friends opposite go in, they charge them 10 per cent on the whole amount. Perhaps another explanation is that they have more money to pay the tax with.

Mr. LALOR: If the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Euler) will come to Buffalo with me, and his statement is correct, I will buy him a new hat.

Mr. MURPHY: He is too young for that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind hon. members that the House is not in committee, and that the hon. member for Brome has the floor.

Mr. McMASTER: I only wish the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) would make his offer of a hat one of a complete outfit, pay the expenses both ways, and extend the invitation to me. I think we have had a pleasant little interlude, Mr. Speaker, but the point I want to make is that this is a very serious matter for the class of people I have spoken of, many of whom are doing some of the most valuable of the nation's work for very slender remuneration. I say that this luxury tax is only a pseudo-luxury tax; it is really a tax on necessities.

There is another matter I wish to bring before the House, and that is the tax on sporting goods. It strikes me as a pretty poor picayune sort of thing to tax the boys' skates and the girls' skis and the youngster's baseball. I do not believe that a great deal of revenue will be obtained from this tax. I think it is a poor return for the splendid services the youth have rendered this country in the last few years to tax the implements of their innocent pleasure. Why, I find in the Estimates, that mine of information, that this Government is giving $5,000 to the Boy Scouts and $3,000 to the Girl Guides to encourage them, no doubt, in outdoor sport, and then they take that help away with the other hand by taxing their staves and the bowie knives they wear and things of that sort.

I have no objection to the raising of the rate of taxation on large incomes. We have to find the money, and a man with an income of $50,000 or $60,000, even if the Government take $20,000 from him, can struggle along, no doubt, on what is left. But let me say this: The Government, having imposed a direct tax on the necessities of life, must give some relief under their income tax proposals to men with large families. The present relief amounts to nothing; it is a bagatelle. In my own case I think it amounted to $48 last year. That will buy about four pairs of shoes; it amounts to nothing. The exemption should be very substantially raised in view of these new excise taxes.

Now I come to what I trust will be an interesting part of my remarks; it was certainly an interesting part of the remarks made by the Minister of Finance. He referred us to a statement which he issued, I presume to the press, on the 15th of December last, in which he referred to a promise made by the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) when occupying the position of Finance Minister, to the effect that during the coming year there would be an investigation into trade conditions which would determine the action of the Government in regard to the tariff. The legal training of the Minister of Finance came out when he asked the people to put their suggestions and complaints in writing. The Minister of Finance told us yesterday that after this had been done, he would go out and investigate matters. But what was even more interesting was the way in which he laid down the tariff platform of the Unionist party. He said:

> Our policy calls for a thorough revision of the tariff—

He does not say whether up or down.

> —with a view to the adoption of such reasonable measures as are necessary (a) to assist in providing adequate revenues.

There is no objection to be taken to that proposal;

> (b) to stabilize legitimate industries and to encourage the establishment of new industries essential to the proper economic development of the nation.

I have some questions to ask in this connection. What does my hon. friend mean by stabilizing industries? When the Government had bonds upon the market and they were going down below par the Government stabilized those bonds by expending the people's money and buying them in. Does stabilizing industries mean that when an industry in this country goes below par, when it is not effectively managed, when it needs support, the Government shall stabilize it by giving it more tariff protection? Is that the meaning of stabilizing industry? If it is I take very sharp issue with the minister on that ground. He speaks of legitimate industries. What are legitimate industries in this country? I will answer that. Legitimate industries are those which can stand on their own feet, and pay their own way, and which do not require to be bonused by the taxpayers of this country.

Then the Minister of Finance added:

—to the end that a proper and ever-increasing field of useful and remunerative employment be available for the nation's workers.

Oh, how old that sort of language is! We heard it when the National Policy was preached in 1878. I am quite sure that the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke words similar to those in 1878 when the Conservative party got in, and from 1878 to 1896 the trails from Canada to the United States were thick with people who were pulling up their stakes in this country and crossing the line. There was no real turn in the tide until 1896 when the Liberal Government did reduce the tariff. It is true that the Minister of Trade and Commerce may try to make fun of that statement, but it cannot be gainsaid that there was a reduction. It did not go as far as I should have liked, nor was it persisted in to the extent that I should have liked; but there was a reduction and it redounded to the advantage of the country. Further, the minister said:

—to develop to the fullest extent our natural resources.

Well, we all desire that; it is a question as to means.

—to specially promote and increase trade with the Mother Country, the sister dominions and colonies and Crown dependencies.

I have pointed out the manner in which this Government has developed trade with the United Kingdom by the way in which it handles exchange, which discourages imports from the United Kingdom and encourages imports from the United States. I see nothing in this statement as to trade with the great neighbour to the south of us, and I cannot understand the mentality of the man who looks for trade in the West Indies before he looks for it in the United States of America.

—to prevent the abuse of the tariff for the exploitation of the consumer, and to safeguard the interests of the Canadian people in the existing world struggle for commercial and industrial supremacy.

Why will these protectionists always talk about commerce as if it were war? Commerce is not war, but mutual service, and the interdependence of peoples, fostered and brought about by commerce, is one of the surest guarantees of world peace. I will not weary the House with reading any further from the speech.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. McMASTER: If hon. members desire that I should go on I shall comply with their request?

As a means of raising revenue the tariff should be so adjusted as to place the chief burden upon those best able to bear it. Articles of luxury should be heavily taxed through the imposition of customs and excise rates. Food commodities and other necessaries of life, not produced or manufactured in Canada, should, if taxed at all,—

Note the subjunctive, Mr. Speaker.

—if taxed at all, bear only such imposts as are necessary for revenue purposes. Those produced in Canada should be subjected to such customs duties only as may be necessary in the general national interest to be determined after strict investigation from time to time.

The minister continues in that strain. Now, I have some remarks to make upon this pronouncement of policy. First, it is indefinite; and, secondly, I say that in so far as it possesses anything of a definite character at all, it is a re-statement of the old National Policy, the old protectionist National Policy. And I for one should be glad if the Minister of Finance, as soon as the Franchise Bill is passed, would ask for a mandate from the people upon this old National Policy. We would meet him, and if fair argument appeals to the Canadian people, and if the Canadian people are, as I have no doubt whatever they are, intelligent folks, when the election was over we would be sitting on that side of the House and hon. gentlemen who are sitting there now would be on this side?

An hon. MEMBER: Which of them would be here?

Mr. McMASTER: I am speaking of those who might happen to come back. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me contrast these generalities that I have quoted with what is the policy of the Liberal party on the trade question,—a policy laid down by one of the most representative conventions of the progressive forces of Canada, one of the most intelligent and well-informed conventions that ever sat in this or any other country, a convention which was representative of the thought not only of Eastern Canada but of Western Canada as well. That convention arrived at this resolution with practical unanimity. Mark, Mr. Speaker, the following plain, straight and easily understood statement which requires no explanation at all:

That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people: second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resourres of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat, the principal articles of food, farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery—

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance broached this question in some of his remarks. He said that for the purpose of encouraging the fullest development of our natural resources the tariff should be so adjusted as to permit machinery and implements of production to be purchased at prices which would compare equitably with those paid in other countries for similar articles. Now, I would almost think—

Mr. LALOR: May I interrupt the hon. member to ask if he has read the whole resolution?

Mr. McMASTER: I am going to read it. I shall read the whole of it; I am commenting on it as I go along. I would almost think that the Minister of Finance had been reading this resolution and had been struck by its wisdom, that he had been about to indite something similar to it when his hand was stayed by the more experienced hand of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said, "What are you going to do? Are you putting into our platform a part of the Liberal party's platform? Don't forget that you belong to the Liberal-Conservative party. You must not do anything like that." The resolution continues:

—and repair parts thereof, rough and partly dressed lumber, gasolene, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, nets, net twines and fishermen's equipments, cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

That a revision downwards—

You know, Mr. Speaker, the promise of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance just calls for a thorough revision, but he does not tell us in what direction that revision is to go.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

There is a specific proposal. Compare it for a moment with the vague generality of my learned and hon. friend the Minister of Finance:

—to specially promote and increase trade with the Mother Country, the sister dominions and colonies and Crown dependencies.

Is there any statement made there that there is going to be so much in their favour? No, that is left for the future to disclose. If I remember aright, the old Conservative party, in the days gone by, abused in unsparing measure my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's when he introduced the British preference. But now a change has come over the spirit of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and he proposes, but not in any definite language, to foster trade relations with the Old Land:

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

That is the tariff plank of the Liberal party. It closely approximates, although it is not in all respects precisely similar to the tariff policy of that other great progressive force in this country, the Farmers' party.

Let us see for a moment why we think this is the proper time to adopt this policy. I believe that protection is an evil thing, I believe it brings evil and not good to the people, the manufacturers and the Government of Canada, and that its influence throughout the world has been for harm. I believe with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, that in the beneficent wisdom of Providence He intended each part of His footstool to supply out of its surplus the other parts and that all should form one whole. I believe that by an adherence to this policy we shall find peace for the world as well as increased wealth for ourselves.

There are two great causes which have made for international jealousy. Chauvinism, or Imperialism, is one, and Protection is the other. The great protectionist nations in Europe were anxious to increase the ambit of their power for what reason? That they might exploit the peoples and the resources of the uncivilized nations that might come under the power of their governments. I believe that few things have made so much for international discord as the principle of protection.

We have reached a time in the history of this country when every ounce of national energy and every dollar of national capital have to be put into those channels which will produce the greatest economic return, not only in this country but all the world over. In a book written by Mr. Keynes, an authority who is admired all over the English-speaking world, he proposes a remedy for the ills of the war, and what is that remedy? That Europe shall become a free trade territory—a free trade entity. We have a tremendous amount of wastage to make good. The world has five years of wastage to make good and that we can only do with reasonable celerity by each nation devoting its energy and capital to those lines of activity in which it has the greatest advantage and then by a free interchange among them all. That is the policy which the Liberal party aim at in the future. That is the policy which I wish to see adopted in this country. I do not propose that it shall be adopted to-morrow. I am willing to give every reasonable opportunity for men who have developed their industries under a false economic system to adjust themselves to the new conditions, but we have to move forward and we have to move forward with sufficient speed not only to show in what direction we are going, but also to show that real progress has been made.

There has been in years gone by in the mouth of my protectionist friends an argument which has appealed to me as not being sound, but as being arguable. It is this: We would be prepared to do away with the tariff or at least accept freer trade provided we had a market to enable us to carry on production upon a large scale, because when you have production on a large scale you are as a rule able to reduce the cost of the unit. For many years the United States maintained a high tariff against the importation of Canadian goods. But the United States has turned from being a highly protected nation, from a nation which collected most of its revenue through a tariff, to a nation which collects 95 per cent of its revenues through direct taxation. Where as in the last fiscal year the United States, with a population fourteen times or thereabouts greater than ours, collected through its tariff about $189,000,000, we collected through our tariff $169,000,000, the United States collecting less than $20-000,000 more than we collected. The United States has a free list much more extensive than the free list we have. The United States has become much freer in regard to trade than it was before. We cannot expect to exist on the northern half of this continent as an independent political power unless we are able to have a fiscal policy as economically sound as that of our neighbours to the South. We cannot expect to attract and hold people in this country unless we are prepared to give them as good living conditions as they will find on the plains of Dakota or of the Argentine Republic. It is not merely a question of economic theory; it is a condition as well as a theory which confronts us, and that condition is that we have spent vast sums of public money to develop our western lands which are largely empty, and until these western lands are filled up the great capital expenditures that this country has incurred will not carry themselves. We cannot fill up these great lands of the West unless we are prepared to give to the newcomers and to give to those who are already there conditions which will enable them to meet the competition which they have to meet when they export their products to the markets of the world.

In order that the fact of the United States has now a very large free list may be borne in on the minds of the people of this country I have arranged their free list in a series which I call "Reduction Rimes." This is very low grade poetry, and I would not have dared to place it on Hansard if I had not been encouraged by the action of the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who last night made an incursion into Shakespeare and referred us to the grapes of Escol. Even if this is an inferior brand of poetry it is original. We have no assurance that Shakespeare is original; some people say that it was Bacon who wrote the works that are attributed to Shakespeare. This is a list of the things which are on the American free list:

Reduction Rimes.

Setting out the many articles now upon the U.S. free list.

Agricultural implements, first on our list,
Next animals for breeding must not be missed.
Bread, biscuits and buckwheat are next in the line,
While flour of the latter makes pancakes so fine,
Cash registers, machines for setting up type,
Show that for trade progress the U.S. is ripe,
While sewing machines, the housewife's delight,
Keep company good with the typewriter bright.
Machinery for shoes and Portland cement
Join the procession of nothing per cent.
Coal, coffee and cocoa come next in a row,
Cotton and corn from where warm breezes blow;
Eggs, fish, fats and berries march next in the line,
With furs, skins and gloves to withstand a cold clime,
Grease, fats and oils which do similar work,
While lard and lard compounds their duty don't shirk;
To warm up the feet they use duty free boots,
While harness on horse helps get in the roots;

Free beef, veal and mutton they greatly enjoy,
While hams, lamb and bacon no duties annoy.
Nails, staples and horseshoes are on the free list,
Tacks, needles and oilcake must never be missed.
Oils for eating, for lighting, of all sorts, are found,
While rye, sago and salt are not to be bound.
Seeds to increase their production so great
Are found with the haddock, the cod and the skate.
Swine, cattle and sheep, the boundary cross,
Join wheat, tea and tallow without fiscal loss;
Barbed wire as in Canada now pays no tax,
Nor do logs, planks or clapboards to cover the cracks.
Wool of sheep, camels' hair are the last on my list;
I need not declare there are many I've missed.

Mr. Speaker, protection as a policy for this country is not only dead, but, after the next election, it will, as Disraeli said, be damned.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, in rising to reply to my poetical and free trade friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) I wish first of all to compliment him upon the very kindly manner in which he has treated the able Budget speech which was yesterday delivered by my colleague, the Minister of Finance. During the long speech to which we have just had the pleasure of listening, the hon. member (Mr. McMaster) has not uttered one word relating to a policy of a constructive character. He has reiterated once more his fealty to free trade principles; he has once more condemned the policy of protection for Canada; he has, in a general way, referred to the Budget, but he has not enlightened the House as to the ways and means of raising revenue that he would adopt if he were occupying a seat on the treasury benches. Later on I shall deal in greater detail with my hon. friend's remarks. Let me first take notice of his observations with respect to the Main Estimates. The gist of his argument amounted simply to this: he wants this fair, progressive and enterprising Canada of ours to fold her arms, to sit still, to put the shutters up, to let the grass grow on the steps. My hon. friend does not want any money spent on the deepening of the Welland canal, he does not want any money spent on building ships, he does not want any money spent on maintaining the militia force of Canada. In a word, he does not want any money whatever spent; he is satisfied—and I take it from the applause of the hon. gentlemen sitting around him, that they are satisfied also—to sit still and not endeavour to take advantage of, and develop, the wonderful possibilities of Canada notwithstanding the large war debt that we have to struggle with at the present time. My hon. friend made only one suggestion this afternoon, if I followed him correctly. He said that a committee of the Imperial House had considered the advisability of levying some special form—

Mr. McMASTER: May I correct my hon. friend? What I said was that a committee of the Treasury Department, not of the House—a committee of civil servants—were to examine into the matter.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am quite willing to accept the correction of my hon. friend, but it does not alter his argument. He informed this House that a proposal was under consideration in Great Britain at the present time to levy a special tax on what he is pleased to call, "war wealth." I wish to state that Great Britain has not adopted such a proposal. True, the proposal has been made, but it has not yet been adopted.

With reference to the Budget presented by the Minister of Finance yesterday, I am satisfied that it will be favourably received throughout the country, and that under the circumstances it is the very best that it was possible for any government to prepare. A close study of the Budget will reveal a few salient points worthy of notice. First of all, the luxury tax is placed on those best able to pay it; it does not apply to eatables, nor to articles of wear that are of moderate price. I am sure that the country will be perfectly satisfied that the luxury tax shall apply to those people who have money to buy boots and shoes costing over $9 a pair, or a suit of clothes that will cost over $45. It is not only fair, but it is most reasonable, that they that have the money should be those to come under this special luxury tax. It is clear to everybody except the hon. member for Brome, that this tax does not apply to persons of moderate means. I heard some reference in the House last night to the possibility that our brave and courageous women might make some objection to this luxury tax. I, for one, have no such fear. During the recent war the women of Canada showed where their hearts were; they stood loyally behind the government of the day, and our soldiers at the Front, from the very beginning of the war until its victorious conclusion. The heavy burden of taxation that now must necessarily fall upon the people is only an aftermath of that war, and I am satisfied that the women of Canada are willing to bear their fair share of that burden. They will cheerfully do so because of the recollection of their beloved ones who will no longer return to them, for the sake of the wounded and those who will be blind forever; and for the sake of the national welfare as well.

A very important point in connection with the Budget is that it will give Canada sufficient revenue not only to take care of the ordinary expenditures, but also to pay off part of our national debt.

I wish to refer briefly to the business war profits tax. I know that there is a general feeling throughout Canada among the business men that this tax should have been dropped. I realize and appreciate the many objectionable features that pertain to it; but when we know that Great Britain is not only maintaining a similar tax, but has raised it from forty to sixty per cent, and that the United States is also retaining on her statute books a similar method of collecting money, in view of the very great necessity for Canada to obtain the necessary revenue, the Government could not see their way clear to entirely eliminate the business war profits tax.

I am sure it will be gratifying to the business men of Canada to know that there have been made certain reductions to which I need not refer in detail, as my colleague the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) dealt with them yesterday in his Budget Speech. Our Income Tax has been raised. It is not only as high as the Income Tax of our neighbour to the south, but it is still higher as a result of the five per cent added yesterday. The Government have also placed a tax on sales. It will, I think, be manifest to every one in this House and outside of it, that the burden of taxation now falls, as it properly should, on those best able to bear it.

My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) has stated that the Government have made no effort to reduce the high cost of living. I must take issue with him there, because as the Minister of Finance explained yesterday, the Government have eliminated the special war tax of 7½ per cent, thereby losing a revenue of $30,000,000. I am satisfied, and so will be every reasonable man, that that reduction of 7½ per cent must of necessity reduce the cost of living. The Government fully appreciate the urgent necessity of more revenue to take care of our war debt and our heavy expenditure, but in an honest endeavour to bring down the cost of living they made that reduction.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, it might be of interest to know what our sister overseas dominion of Australia is doing in regar to tariff matters. I do not know whether she possesses as a member of her Parliament such an ardent free trader as my hon. friend from Brome, but judging from the article which I am about to refer to I should not think there are many free traders in the Parliament of the Australian Commonwealth. It will be seen from this article that the Government of Australia have revised their tariff, not downwards but upwards. I will read the article:

The Australian Tariff.

An important revision of the tariff of Australia recently made imbeds more firmly the principle of protection to native industry, increases rates of duty for revenue purposes, and provides contingently for reciprocal tariffs with British countries. A cablegram from the Canadian Trade Commissioner at Melbourne runs as follows:

"Tariff Bill introduced Parliament, March 24, and becoming operative March 25, has three schedules similar to Canadian. All embargoes and restrictions hitherto imposed upon importations such as confectionery, motor car bodies, etc., absolutely cease on May 19. Excluding existing limited African agreement, no preference has been granted any dominion, but minister stated that bill provides for reciprocal arrangements with any dominion on the basis of British preferential tariff or intermediate schedules whole or partly and to foreign countries under intermediate only but subject to approval of Parliament. Tariff strongly protective with increased British preference. Marked increase duties iron steel products, motor car chassis, and bodies."

The consequence of this legislation can scarcely be other than the contraction of the somewhat limited market Canada has hitherto found in Australia. There is a preference given Great Britain, according to one despatch, of from ten to twenty per cent, but other advices indicate a much greater preference. The tariff on manufactures of iron, for example, is said to be:

	From United Kingdom.	From Canada.
Pig iron	20s	40s
Billets	32s	65s
Wire rods	44s	80s
Black and galvanized sheets after June 1, 1922	65s	100s
At present	Free	10%
Plates and sheets heavier than 1-16, after June 1, 1922	48s	85s
At present	Free	10%
Barbed wire	68s	105s
Bolts and nuts	27½%	40%
Wood screws	Free	10%
Tacks and spikes	5½s	8s
Or, whichever is higher.	32½%	45%

If the foregoing schedule of duties is retained, there will be small chance of Canadian manufacturers obtaining a footing in the Australian market in competition with Great Britain. Of the preferential feature of the tariff no complaint can be made, and it is the business of the Australian Parliament to legislate as seems to it in the best interest of that country, but when the avowed object of the tariff is to promote British trade, Canadians may with reason contend that as a member of the Imperial family they should not be excluded from opportunity to trade on equal grounds with the United Kingdom. There is not now, nor ever has been, a reciprocal tariff between Canada and Australia. New Zealand, South Africa, and some other British countries do enjoy the preferential tariff in respect of their exports to Canada, but Australia has hitherto declined an arrangement for reciprocal commerce. The Canadian Government should without delay open negotiations for the extension of the Australian preferential tariff to this country. The time is opportune, the need urgent. The Australian legislation opens the door, and with mutual goodwill existing, with a desire on the part of both dominions to promote Imperial trade, the hope may be entertained of more family and friendly treatment being extended to Canada than being placed on a parity with foreign nations. It has always seemed an anomaly that Canada's preferential tariff should extend to New Zealand, and not to Australia, though the fault is not that of this dominion. In any event if our trade with the Antipodes is to grow, the Government should hasten to conclude a reciprocal tariff arrangement.

That will serve to show what our sister dominion is doing. Australia evidently believes in the policy of moderate protection. Canada believes in the policy of moderate protection, I believe in that policy, and so does the Government and the party to which I have the honour to belong. I do not believe in free trade. And, Sir, there are many hon. members on the other side of the House who do not believe in free trade any more than I do.

I was rather amused to hear the hon. member for Brome this afternoon citing the tariff policy of the Liberal party as enunciated in the resolution adopted at its convention held in this city last August. I am sure the House will bear with me if I read that resolution once more, because it is well worth while to keep it very plainly before not only the members of this House but before the people of the country. It reads as follows:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the cost of instruments of production—

That is a very vague expression, and I hope that when the hon. leader of the Opposition addresses the House he will explain what the Liberal party means when they refer to the "instruments of production." In my judgment, that would refer to everything that is made in this country.

> —in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.
> That, to these ends,——

And here is the important part:

> —wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.
>
> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.
>
> That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.
> And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

During the short time I have been in public life I have thought that when a great party, after having given serious consideration to the question of what their fiscal policy should be, published at a convention its deliberate policy in that regard, that policy would receive the unanimous approval of the members of the party and would be adhered to by them when speaking on the floor of this House and on public platforms. But, Mr. Speaker, the ink was hardly dry on this famous resolution before the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) delivered a speech at St. John, New Brunswick. The newspaper report which I have of the hon. gentleman's speech is headed in large type, "Mackenzie King for Free Trade." Then follows the hon. gentleman's speech, which I will now quote:

> The Liberal leader favoured the abolishment of all tariff duties,—

I cannot find that in the tariff resolution of the Liberal party. Let me quote the report in this newspaper:

> The Liberal leader favoured the abolishment of all tariff duties, all instruments of production in industries based upon the natural resources of the Dominion, such as mines, fishing, lumbering and agriculture, the development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of the country.

Well, the leader of the Opposition had scarcely delivered that speech when one of his followers, the member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) made a speech before the Liberal Reform Club in Montreal. He said nothing about the policy of free trade as enunciated by the leader of the Opposition in his St. John speech, and he carefully avoided any reference to the Liberal tariff policy as adopted at the Liberal Convention held in Ottawa during last August. But I must say that I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for West Lambton on that occasion. He said that he was a protectionist; aye, he even went so far as to say how he would fix the tariff. He said that in his opinion a tariff should not bear a lower ad valorem duty than 25 per cent. It seems strange to me that shortly after the adoption of this tariff policy at the convention in August the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) should make the strong protectionist speech that he did before the members of the Reform Club of my city. I will say this for the wisdom of my hon. friend: He knew the city that he was speaking in; he knew the proper policy to enunciate there.

Now, a by-election was held in St. James division in Montreal. If there is any constituency in Canada which does not want to listen to free trade talk or any suggestion about slaughtering the tariff so as to crush our industries, it is the constituency of St. James, Montreal. My genial and astute friend the member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) who was doing all he could to elect the hon. member who now represents that great division in this House (Mr. Rinfret), also made a very strong protectionist speech. But that is not all. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the expressions of very strong protectionist sentiment that have come from the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). He and I do not always agree, but when it comes to tariff matters I think we do. The hon. member holds good, strong, protectionist views, and how he could have swallowed the policy that was adopted at the Liberal convention last August, how he could have stood for that platform, is more than I am able to comprehend.

But I understand also, Mr. Speaker, that all was not milk and honey at that convention. By the little birds who chirped on that occasion and who were not in the know—that is, in the inner circle—I have been informed that many good and true Liberal protectionists strongly objected to the proposed tariff resolution when it was being considered by a committee, and that they were absolutely opposed to it on the floor of the convention. Not only that; the Liberal Premier of British Columbia also made a speech during the course of the convention in which he expressed himself as being opposed to the Liberal policy as I have just given it. Moreover, Sir Lomer Gouin, the greatest French Canadian Liberal that we have in the province of Quebec, made a speech in the city of Quebec at a meeting which was attended also by my colleague, the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen). The Minister of the Interior and Sir Lomer Gouin both made protectionist speeches on that occasion, and notwithstanding the eloquence and convincing logic of the Minister of the Interior—and he never was in better form than he was at that banquet—the Premier of Quebec excelled him—and made a much stronger protectionist speech than did even my colleague. The papers did not publish the speech of the Premier of Quebec, but I have it here and I will read what Sir Lomer Gouin said on that occasion:

> I understand that you feel anxious on a certain question of public policy with regard to the future of your industry.

Referring to the boot and shoe industry.

> I mean the tariff. This was the theme of the speech I read this morning. I would not like to be excommunicated—

Listen to this:

> I would not like to be excommunicated for what I will say now, but I would like to speak my mind very candidly.
>
> I remember the day when many, too many, of our people, labourmen, farmers and merchants, had to leave the province of Quebec and emigrate to the United States. At that time I know there were very few manufacturers in the province of Quebec. I could not say why so many left Quebec, but they had to go for one reason or another.
>
> We now have manufacturers in Montreal, Quebec, Trois Rivières, Sherbrooke, and all our centres of a certain importance, and I cannot help but think that these manufacturers have contributed to bring back many of those who had gone and to keep with us many who would have had to go were it not for such industries.
>
> What we want in Quebec is a tariff that will keep our industries going—

A little different from the tariff policy of my friend, the leader of the Opposition.

> —our labourmen working for good wages, and the most deserving of all our citizens—our good farmers—content and prosperous.
>
> I am not asking for a tariff of 15 per cent, 25 per cent, 30 per cent, or 40 per cent; give us a fair tariff that will keep alive honest industry on our good soil of Canada.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the wise words of one of the ablest statesmen in Canada, a man whose utterances and policies carry far more weight in the commercial metropolis of Canada, the city of Montreal, than do any words of my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster).

Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to live in the province of Quebec since my boyhood days,—and it is indeed a great privilege to live in that province and to mingle with our French-Canadian friends. So far as I know their views on fiscal questions they are not free traders; they are protectionists. But I am afraid that the new Liberal party of to-day is in the hands of reactionaries and young bloods and that the old policy that was carried out for fifteen years by the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is no longer the policy of the Liberal party. Last night that veteran statesman the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) rose in his place and made statements like this: "I have been criticized by my party for believing in the policy of protection, but I still believe in it. I have been criticized by certain members of my party because I was willing when I was Minister of Finance to assist infant industries; I have no regrets or apologies to offer now. I thought that was the right policy then, and I think it the right policy now." Again, he said that during his term of office—and he certainly was a most excellent Minister of Finance—he gave certain bonuses to the steel industry in this country. He was criticized at the time, he said but he believed in bonuses then, and he believes in bonuses now. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask hon. members of this House and I ask the people of the country how they can judge; how they can form any opinion as to the policy of hon. members opposite? True they did draw up this policy, but the leader of the Opposition, as I have said, deviated from it, because he said in the city of St. John that he was in favour of free trade.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not here when my hon. friend read the particular despatch from a paper, but two or three times he has mentioned in my presence that in the speech which I made at St. John I departed from what is laid down in the platform of the Liberal party. In the speech I made at St. John I was reading from the platform of the Liberal party as laid down at the convention. I said that I stood by that platform, and I repeat that statement now.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Of course, I must accept the explanation of my hon. friend, but as he was not in the House at that time I shall read what the press reported him to say on that occasion:

> The Liberal leader favoured the abolishment of all tariff duties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That clearly is a statement by a reporter in a general way. While speaking on that occasion I had in my hand a copy of the platform of the Liberal party and I read what is contained there, as I shall read it to this House again when I have the privilege of speaking in this debate.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Do I understand that the leader of the Opposition is not in favour of the abolition of duties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not in favour of the abolition of all duties; certainly not.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I must accept the hon. member's explanation that the press incorrectly reported his speech.

Inasmuch as my hon. friend has given us to understand that he is not a free trader and would be in favour I judge, of a certain form of protection, and as the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has reiterated in this House this afternoon that he is an absolute free trader, if our friends opposite should come into power it is quite likely the hon. member for Brome, who has been the financial critic of the Opposition for the last two or three years, would take the portfolio of Minister of Finance. And in that event it is clear that the leader of the Opposition would have lots of trouble trying to reconcile his Finance Minister's free trade ideas with the protectionist ideas that have been given expression to by several hon. gentlemen sitting with him to the left of the Speaker.

The hon. member for Brome in his whole two hours' speech did not indicate in any way how he would raise the revenue. He dealt only in generalities, and therefore I am at a loss to know how my hon. friends opposite, if they came into power, would propose to raise the necessary revenues. I trust that the leader of the Opposition when he speaks in this debate will not only let us know whether he adheres to the tariff policy adopted at the Liberal convention in August last, but that he will also enlighten this House and the country as to how he would raise the revenue if he and his party came into power.

I notice that the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) some time ago made a speech before the Montreal Reform Club in which he differed considerably from the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), both of whom had made protectionist speeches before the members of that club. The hon. member for Lunenburg did not do so. In his speech on that occasion he made the rather remarkable statement that there was no difference between the underlying principles of the present Liberal policy and those of the United Farmers party. So there, again, we have a very marked difference of opinion among hon. gentlemen opposite as to what should be the tariff policy of the Liberal party.

The hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) referring some time ago to the speech delivered at Quebec by the Minister of the Interior, to which I alluded a moment ago, said: "What a calamity it would be if a record of that speech was played on a gramophone at Calgary, what a commotion it would create out there." I would ask my hon. friend what kind of a commotion and impression it would create if a record of the speech of Sir Lomer Gouin to which I have referred was played in the city of Calgary.

The hon. member for Brome, who I am sorry is not in his seat, felt very jubilant this afternoon. He challenged the Government to go to the country and was very confident that in such an event the Government would be defeated and that he and his friends would move over to the Treasury benches. I am afraid it was simply a case of the wish being father to the thought. He would indeed be a courageous man if he really wanted a general election now. Speaking for the Government—it has been said before, but I will state it again now—there is no reason why we should go to the country until the full term of this Parliament has expired. During my election campaign I never said anything about being elected only for the duration of the war, or that my service would end with the war. When the election comes, in due time, in the fall of 1922 or 1923—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Make it 1925.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: —the issue is going to be a clear-cut one. The issue by which parties are going to stand or fall will be: Moderate protection versus free trade. I, for one, while I have no political ambitions whatever, have no fear what the verdict of the people will be on that issue when a general election comes. In all former general elections that have been held in this country, any party that proposed to interfere seriously with the well-established fiscal policy of Canada met defeat at the polls, and if my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, thinks he can carry the country on the tariff resolution adopted at the Liberal convention, I can only say he misjudges the intelligence of the electorate of Canada. With the necessary publicity that will be given, I am satisfied when the people from one end of this country to the other come to decide between the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite and the policy which this Government stands for, namely, a policy of moderate protection, with favour to none and justice to all, framed for the diversified interests of Canada, a policy that is equally good for the farmer, the lumberman, the workingman, the fisherman and the manufacturer, I have no doubt, and this Government has no doubt, what the verdict of the people of Canada will be. The Minister of Finance yesterday clearly set forth the Government's policy, and I desire to have the privilege of placing it on Hansard. He said:

> Our policy calls for a thorough revision of the tariff with a view to the adoption of such reasonable measures as are necessary: (a) to assist in providing adequate revenues, (b) to stabilize legitimate industries and to encourage the establishment of new industries essential to the proper economic development of the nation—to the end that a proper and ever-increasing field of useful and remunerative employment be available for the nation's workers, (c) to develop to the fullest extent our natural resources, (d) to specially promote and increase trade with the Mother Country, the sister dominions and colonies and Crown dependencies, (e) to prevent the abuse of the tariff for the exploitation of the consumer—

That is the policy of the Government, and it has my full and unstinted support both in this House and outside of it.

Just a word with reference to our friends of the Agrarian group, sitting across the way. I am sorry my good friend the leader of that party, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), is not in his seat. There is one thing on which I can compliment the Agrarian group, the U. F. O., or whatever name the party is known by, and that is the very clear way in which they have given expression to their policy on many occasions during this session of the House.

The hon. member for Marquette and those who sit behind him are out and out free traders; they make no bones about that point and I think they deserve our thanks and appreciation for the very clear exposition which they have given us of their policy. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) when speaking in this House a few weeks ago was asked whether he believed in the policy of protection and he replied that he had never believed in protection, he did not believe in it then, and he never would believe in it. What could be clearer than that, Mr. Speaker? We know exactly where the members of the Farmers' party stand. I find no fault with them because this is a free country and we are assembled in a free parliament. Every one in this country has a right to think as he pleases and to vote as he pleases, and it is every man's prerogative to stand by whatever policy he considers is best conducive to the welfare of the country. But I rather differ from my hon. farmer friends when they say that this free trade policy of theirs, this new progressive policy, so-called, is a sound policy for Canada. If they said it was a policy for the three Prairie Provinces and one peculiarly framed for their own interests, then I could agree with them; but when they assert that the free trade policy which they advocate is a good one for all of Canada's diversified interests, I confess I cannot follow them in their logic. How could a free trade policy maintain our great manufacturing industries that exist from one end of Canada to the other? How could it afford employment for hundreds of thousands of workmen throughout the length and breadth of this country.

And what good would a free trade policy be even to the farmers? If any policy in this country is framed to suit any one particular interest and that interest alone, it is a wrong policy and can have only one result. If the farmers are to be prosperous in this country, then the manufacturers, the business men, the workingmen and all other classes must live under a policy that grants special favours to none, and which is framed in the national interests and for the benefit of the whole people. The moderate protection policy that has prevailed in this country since 1867 has proved just such a policy. Suppose for a moment that we had a free trade policy in this country. Suppose our friends of the prairies produced vastly more grain than ever they did, but other interests in Canada were not prosperous; the people did not have money; the railways did not have freight to carry eastbound and westbound; and our grain growers found a lack of demand for the enormous amount of wheat they were growing, and found prices low—for all that would follow a free trade policy—what would be the effect? The farmers would suffer with the rest. With all deference to my hon. friends, I am at a loss to know why, in a country like this, those gentlemen could purpose to put such a policy into effect if they had the opportunity to do so. The hon. member for Marquette, I will admit, modifies his policy very much according to the locality in which he happens to be speaking. He made a speech in this House a year ago and I have it here in Hansard. He said that the policy of protection was economically an unsound one, and he went on to say that he had recently travelled through the fair province of Ontario and had seen hundreds of farms, many of which were vacant, and this fact he attributed to the policy of protection. How he could come to such a conclusion is beyond my comprehension. Then later, when he was making a speech in the city of Toronto—a very strong protectionist city—he naturally modified his views. The leader of the Farmers' group on that occasion said, if I remember rightly: "I would not with one fell swoop demolish the fiscal policy and all the industries of this country. I would prefer to let them die a slow lingering death. I would therefore bring about this end slowly, gradually, but surely." Well, if such a policy as that is ever to be put into practice, I for one should prefer the former manner of fiscal decease, so as to let the industries of the country be put out of existence with quick despatch.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the House any longer. Once more I express my pleasure, as a member of the Government, at the Budget which has been presented, and if I may be permitted to do so, I extend my heartiest congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) for the splendid, comprehensive, fair and logical statement which he submitted to the House yesterday, and which is meeting with the general approval of the people of Canada.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, in the Budget Speech which the Minister of Finance delivered yesterday afternoon I observed that it was his intention not to get all the national milk, so to speak, from the same old cow. He has taxed the unnecessary things of life, he has taxed the slaves of fashion and the molly-coddles of the country, and in that respect I have no complaint to offer. There is one particular, however, in which I would have been very much interested had the minister taken very drastic measures.

I should have liked to see an enormous tax on American automobiles or automobiles coming from any other country. The automobile, in my opinion, has been the means of more injury in this country than any other invention of civilization. It has destroyed homes, and the worries which expensive automobiles have created have sent many a man to his last resting place, because he was nagged and harassed to such an extent, and his business pride was such, that he preferred to die physically rather than face financial death. No one but an acrobat is safe in crossing the streets now. You go to any garage in the country and you will find automobiles galore; and in many of them in the small towns you will find anywhere from twenty-five to seventy-five secondhand automobiles for sale. There is a perfect craze on the part of people to-day to go riding through the streets in burnished, shining vehicles. It is an appalling fact, Sir, and I hope our Finance Minister will consider this phase of the subject and see to it that no more expensive cars are brought into the country. There is a craze among the people to go running around in these glaring, death-dealing instruments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALDWIN: I see there is unanimity on that point, and there is no question about the truth of it. It is but too well known that people, even wise people, have a mania to spend their money foolishly, and the automobile is one of the chief sources of their extravagance.

I noticed that last night the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce went so far as to say that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was inconsistent, comparing his present policy with his old time policy. Probably I am not quite as old as the two ex-Ministers of Finance but they isplayed a fellowship towards each other last evening which did my heart good. I believe that in a few years a new era will dawn on this country. But when the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce claims that my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's is inconsistent I might remind him that he himself went to Washington in the eighties and the nineties to try to effect a treaty of reciprocity with the United States. On several occasions he went down there and was unsuccessful. On the last occasion that he and his colleagues went to Washington the Canadian delegates found that the people who were to meet them had their bags packed and they offered them the excuse that they were going on a southern trip. I think that what I say is exactly correct. And so, the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues came home disheartened.

The question of reciprocity was not brought up again for a considerable time because the United States ignored all overtures until the time of President Taft. Then the United States had a vast population, they needed free natural products and free food. Naturally they had their eye on this half of the North American continent and they wanted free raw material. They made several overtures to Canada and my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's was very properly sent to Washington to have a conference with the Americans. An agreement was prepared and the Canadian delegates came home. Instead of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the great leader of the then Government of Canada putting that treaty into force at once he delayed in order to consult Parliament and in the meantime false representations, were put before the people by the press which declared that such a policy was disloyal and unpatriotic and that reciprocity with the United States would prove a dismal failure. But the present right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, as well as all the principal members of Sir John Macdonald's Government proclaimed throughout the wide country their feeling for reciprocity after that principle had been abrogated in the early sixties following the war of the rebellion in the United States. In the county that I represent, Sir John Macdonald spoke in favour of reciprocity in natural products and the Hon. C. C. Colby, who represented that county for about a quarter of a century always had as one of the planks of his platform reciprocity in natural products. Throughout the country they proclaimed that policy. I am sorry that the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not in his seat because if he were I would point out to him how inconsistent he was in fighting the very policy which he had tried to consummate for many long years. It was the policy of the party that he followed, and which he continued to follow, except for the short interval when he was out of the House.

The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Ballantyne) says that we on this side of the House are willing to do nothing but sit around and that we have no policy. I have never known in all the years of the Liberal party that a free trade policy was advocated. Alexander Mackenzie, Edward Blake and Sir Wilfrid Laurier never proclaimed themselves in favour of an absolutely free trade policy. These leaders advocated a tariff for revenue. The right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce last night stated plainly that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's had championed a free trade policy. That is something new in Canada. It seems to me that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's said that no member of this House is willing to acknowledge that Canada has yet reached the stage when she could have free trade.

We must remember that Canada has a vast heritage to develop. She has great wealth in water-powers which are better than the black coal of the United States. At present tens of millions of capital are coming into the province of Quebec, towns are rapidly growing up, manufacturers are coming in large numbers and they are building plants now that will cost millions for the bricks and motar alone without taking into consideration the working capital. We have a vast country here and as true Canadians we believe in its development. We know that under the present policy of the Government we cannot develop it without immigrants coming here to help us. This may be a suggestion to the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). He talks about a hand picked people only being allowed to come in. I disagree with him decidedly. I know, as other hon. members know, that approximately a million emigrants annually went into the United States for many years. They went forth, engaged in different spheres of activity and helped to develop the country. I believe that immigrants should be allowed to come to this country regardless of colour and that we should make such laws as would give them to understand before they come that we have no place for any who are not law abiding and do not wish to work. I have said before and I say it again that all crooks, shysters and loafers should be kept out of Canada. People who come to this country should be made to understand that they cannot loaf around, commit crimes, and play crooked games on the people. If that is made plain to all who may contemplate coming to Canada people of that class will not come and we will get a better type of settlers. We have tremendous resources. There has been no boosting in Canada. We are not boosters. Why is it that we have not a larger population? The House was yesterday reminded that the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. White) said during his first Budget that about a thousand people a day were coming into Canada. If the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had been continued this country would now have had eleven or twelve million people. We know that the tide had turned before the war and that tens of thousands of people were leaving Canada in 1912-13. Then there came this horrible war that has given such a staggering blow to this country. But it has brought Canada to its senses and enabled here to see herself Canada played a part in the war that at one time we never thought she was capable of; she demonstrates the ingenuity, the sagacity and the strength of other people. Canada to-day stands at the point where we should all get together and, regardless of party politics, work for the good of the country. The time has gone by when members on one side should picture those on the other as being either manikins or brass monkeys. We should get together and develop this wonderful country. Take for instance the Georgian Bay Canal. There is enough water power on that system of canals and waterways to pay for the completion of the enterprise within a period of fifty, or possibly seventy-five years. The cost of developing hydro-electric works now is enormous, but before this stage was reached there was ample time for the Government of Canada to let contracts for the development of the Georgian Bay Canal by granting for a term of years the use of the water-power that might be developed. Does any one imagine that these contracts could now be awarded at the present time for anything like a reasonable figure? The same may be said of the project for the deepening of the St. Lawrence canals. These works, in view of the present enormous debt, would be a tremendous undertaking to-day. The way to cope with our obligations, as well as to develop our great natural resources, is not by working eight hours a day; we must take off our coats and work for ten hours a day or more. I happen to be one of the unorganized labour party that takes pleasure in working fifteen hours a day. That does not kill people; it is far more healthful than indulging in nonsense and all sorts of extravagant pleasures. I repeat that our great need to-day is to develop this wonderful country. In so saying I only wish that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine were in their seats.

Hon. Mr. REID: I am here.

Mr. BALDWIN: I am sorry, but as the minister is not occupying his own seat he escaped my notice. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that we have not a mile too many railways in Canada, nor a steamboat too many for the development of the country, if the rates on those railways were only raised to make them self-sustaining, and thus prevent the present and coming generations from being burdened with an enormous debt to make up the deficits.

Hon. Mr. REID: If the hon. member would address the farmers at the other end of the Chamber and convert them to his idea it would make my task easier.

Mr. BALDWIN: I believe in the system of bonusing as to which we heard expressions of opinion last night from the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir George Foster) and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding); it would doubtless bring about better results than some other policies that have been advocated. It is ridiculous that a country of the tremendous extent and resources of Canada should only be mining five per cent of its deposits of iron ore. Can it be expected that we shall make a success of the development of this country if we do not use its great natural resources to the best advantage? Then there are vast areas of agricultural land which cannot be developed without labour, and how are we to get that labour unless we adopt a progressive immigration policy? True we are building up a great military machine to take care of those people in some of the provinces who are considered disloyal. In the province of Quebec we have no such elements in our population. The people there are willing to work ten hours a day. They are quite satisfied and have no use for travelling labour agitators; such men have no influence upon the people of that province or upon organized labour there. That is why immense capital for investment is flowing into the province of Quebec from Ontario, and from the United States and from other countries. Down there in the province of Quebec the people worship God and honour the King. Labour troubles are non-existent, and strikes are practically nil, but how different is the condition in other countries, for example in the United States, where strikes seem to be almost continuous.

With respect to the development of our railways we need money to link up the existing system, but the Minister of Railways seems afraid to make advances in the railway rates for fear the Canadian Pacific will enjoy the advantage of the increase. The Canadian Pacific got through its operations last year with the closest escape from a deficit, and surely it is a picayune idea that we should retard the development of our National railways, and expose the country to a loss of many millions of dollars, because of the fear that the Canadian Pacific would benefit from any advance in rates that might be ordered.

The admission of Newfoundland to this Confederation would be a decidedly forward step. There was a possibility of Newfoundland entering Confederation when Sir Mackenzie Bowell was Premier of Canada, but it seemed likely to involve an additional expenditure of $8,000,000—which in those days was regarded as a great sum of money—and the project fell through. What has the United States done in the last fifty years? They have doubled their territory by diplomacy, by dollars, and by war. Would the Republic to the south part with any portion of its territory even if it were offered a million times more than it cost to acquire it? Possibly it might in the case of the Phillipine Islands, but not with respect to another inch of its territory. In Canada unfortunately our people are not of a boasting type. We are losing our young men and our young women. We are not increasing in population at the rate we should in view of the fact that Canada is one of the greatest countries on the face of the earth and in area comprises half a continent. The people are becoming despondent, discouraged, and dissatisfied, and it is about time we became boosters for our country. One hon. gentleman raised the question of our doing business with the West Indian Islands. For my part, I think we should trade not only with the Mother Country, but with every other Dominion and Crown Colony in the British Empire in preference to any other part of the world. In order to avoid the rigours of the Canadian climate many of our people go to British Honduras, British Guiana, the Leeward Islands, Barbados, or the Bahamas. We could trade with the West Indies with advantage to ourselves, and I believe that trade would greatly develop with the progress of the years. I am of opinion that if we could win the admiration of the people of those islands we could win their trade, and if the West Indies were more closely united with Canada, both would benefit to a surprising degree. The Government should send to the West Indies to promote trade relations men endowed with boundless enthusiasm. I understand that delegates are coming here from the West Indies about the last of this month. Let us show these delegates that it would be a good thing for them to become more closely acquainted with this great country and its wonderful possibilities. I hope the time will come when commercial union between Canada and the West Indies will be something more than a dream. I hope that we can win the admiration of the West Indies. I do not believe in war, but as one of the results of the war England has acquired a German colony of nearly as extensive an area as Canada, and, therefore, I think that this country deserves some consideration as well. I believe that a mutual agreement with the Imperial Government and the Crown colony of the great Caribbean sea might bring about a rounding out of this great Dominion. "Procrastination is the thief of time," and to-day when the United States are advocating that Great Britain sell those islands to the United States, it is about time for us to wake up. Even one of the prospective presidential candidates, Mr. McAdoo, has brought that subject before the people of the United States. If those islands were sold by England to liquidate her indebtedness to the United States, where would Canada be?

I am not a believer in sentiment, on the contrary, I am a believer in hard and fast business principles; but sometimes sentiment is a prevailing factor, and we should cultivate in our sons and daughters the sentiment that Canada is one of the best located countries on the face of the earth, with natural wealth beyond all comprehension, and so stimulate that patriotic pride which means so much in the development of any country. And with that sentiment properly cultivated, I believe that our future is assured.

If we succeed in bringing the West Indies into this great Confederation, the resultant advantages will be great indeed. Instead of depending on our neighbours to the South for the products of those islands our own mercantile marine will bring them direct to our Atlantic ports, and by means of our great inland waterways we shall be able to reach the markets not only of our own provinces but the markets to the South and be able to compete with the Americans in their home cities of Buffalo, Erie, Cincinnati, Toledo, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee and Duluth. But if we continue to procrastinate I am afraid that this Parliament instead of being praised by our people will be cursed.

I feel assured that the people of the West India Islands would be proud to belong to a nation of such vast resources as we possess. They need our products, and we need theirs, and there would be a constant interchange of traffic. They will never be manufacturing centres, but we are certain to become one of the greatest workshops of the world—although our development along that line has so far been slow. However, I think the dawn of a new day is awaiting us, and I sincerely hope that party politics will stop for a while until the people of Canada come to a realization of what vast possibilities are within their reach.

I claim that every product of a tropical character that we need here can be raised in the West Indies, and that emphasizes the importance of a mutually satisfactory arrangement being reached for their becoming part and parcel of this wonderful Confederation. From cotton down to the smallest tropical fruits would it not be a glorious thought for the householders of this country if they could send their children to get Canadian tropical products at the stores? Under our present trade relations with the United States that country holds Canada in one hand and the islands in the other; she discounts their money 41 per cent, she discounts ours from 10 to 15 per cent, and as a result she gains $30,000,000 in handling the products of the West Indies and selling them to Canada. Is it not ridiculous?

With this condition of affairs, is it not time that we ceased fighting over things that should not excite controversy? Because, as I said in my opening remarks, when two great finance ministers of experience get together in kindly fellowship there is a future for Canada that will make this one of the greatest countries upon this earth.

Our country is so vast that we have lost ourselves. There was a time when we used to hear about patriotism—people were proud of tne fact that they belonged to a country on which the sun never set. Love of country? We hear nothing more of it. We have gone far astray, and, like the lost tribes of Israel, we are wandering aimlessly. But it is time that we drew ourselves together. The people in the northern part of the United States are like ourselves, strong and vigorous, and their country is connected with the West Indies by a shipping service which gives her a predominant advantage. Already the United States owns Porto Rico; she has a protectorate over Cuba; she now has her customs officers in San Domingo.

What I am proposing would be a perfectly safe proceeding. It would not have the uncertainty of reaching out into the Orient; it is a solid, straightforward business proposition. Our people should visit the West Indies and learn the requirements of their inhabitants instead of spending their money in the United States. Some years ago in the United States they started the slogan: "Look around your own country"; and since the war they have supplemented that with actually learning that they have a wonderful country. Do Canadians know their own country? I would advise the people of this city if they want a real holiday this summer to go right up into the woods, and they will discover that we have bench lands along the rivers—I am speakmore particularly of the province of Quebec —where millions of people could get their livelihood. I have seen thousands of acres red with wild berries—literally thousands of tons of them, which if they could be gathered would return sufficient to pay the interest on our national debt. We have a wonderful country. Too many think that in Canada there are vast ice-bound regions incapable of production, but those who entertain that view are vastly mistaken. Canada is a country which is capable of producing a strong and vigorous race. Yet we find that hundreds of people have left our country and gone to the United States. Just so soon as Canada does the things it should do; just so soon as this House takes steps towards the progressive development of our country, these persons who have left our shores will return to us. It is a crying shame that such a vast country as Canada should stand where it stands to-day for want of patriotism, for want of love of country, for want of boosting. I do urge the people of Canada; I do urge those who are in authority, to make a move toward the development of this wonderful country, with its possibilities—shall I say for I believe it—of maintaining hundreds of millions of people.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. ROBERT JAMES MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to deal at any length at all with the remarks of the previous speakers on the Opposition side who have taken part in this debate. One of the reasons is that it would take, I fear, a tariff acrobat to deal with them all, for the reason that in the first place the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) this afternoon took an absolute free trade stand, though I think he soft-pedalled slightly compared with previous orations. Then the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) took a moderate protectionist stand, and I understand my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin) to take a protectionist stand. I find myself wondering, after thinking that over, if the Agrarian members of the House decide to accept the invitation of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, which of those three constituencies they would come in through. I thought the criticisms of the Opposition speakers were tempered with mercy. In fact, I thought the criticisms of the hon. member for Stanstead were so tempered with mercy that they were almost a paeon of praise to the Minister of Finance. There is one statement the hon. member for Brome made—and I do not say this in any unkind way —with which I thoroughly agree, and that was his statement that the verses which he quoted were rather of an ordinary type. I do not use the word he used, because he might misconstrue it; I think he said of a low type. I think they were at least of an ordinary type.

So far as the three speakers thus far on the Opposition side are concerned, I found myself agreeing to a great extent with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. I feel after having listened for a long time, during four sessions, in this House to debates on the tariff question that no subject in Canada to-day is of more importance than the tariff question. It is not only a question upon which political parties are dividing, but a question in which everybody in this country is taking an interest. It is a question the solution of which is very important to the best interests of Canada. I am not of the farmers, on the one side, or of the manufacturers on the other. I am of that large body of Canadian citizens who belong to neither class, and it might be interesting to place on Hansard the figures as to how many people there are in each of the different classes. According to the census of 1911 the total number of people employed in the different occupations in Canada was 2,723,000 in round figures, and I shall deal only in round figures for the reason that extended figures are rather dreary reading. Of this number the agricultural employees amounted to 933,000, or 34 per cent; manufacturing employees, 491,000, or 18 per cent. All the rest, 1,294,000, or 48 per cent, were of the working population of this country. That 48 per cent includes building trades, domestic servants, civil servants, professional men, fisheries and forestry, trade and transportation. That 48 per cent, or nearly one-half of the working population of this country, are in danger of being ground between the upper and nether millstones of free trade and protection and that is my reason for speaking here to-day more or less on behalf of that 48 per cent of which I am a member. Belonging to that class, I feel I can look at the question dispassionately, as I have no direct interest in the matter, the only interest I possess being a desire to get the best policy for the betterment and advancement of Canada. I do not want to be misunderstood as trying to prove that free trade as a theory or as a principle is wrong. In that I believe I can fully agree with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's when he said that in theory he was a free trader, but in practice, as I understood him—certainly he implied that—he did not believe in it. To the free traders of this country I presume that is a little bit like what doctors say occasionally "Though the operation was a success, the patient died." Sometimes, no doubt, the patient would prefer the operation to have been not quite so successful.

It would appear to me that Canada must take into consideration not theories, not principles, but actual conditions and facts as they are, and two of these important facts which must be taken into consideration are these: First, just to the South of us we have that immense American republic, the United States, which has a very high industrial development, and with the industries of which our industries must compete. Even if we had free trade in Canada, it would not necessarily mean that they would have free trade in the United States; in other words, our industries would have to compete in a free trade market with the industries of the United States in a protected market. Secondly, we are to the East of the teeming millions of Asia, with low wages and low living conditions, both wages and living conditions being on a very much lower scale than we believe in. So while we might desire the ideal of free trade, while we might desire to lay aside what some people might call the selfish national policy of tariffs, should we be so altruistic as to desire the progress and prosperity of other nations as much as we desire the progress and prosperity of our own? In addition to that, free traders both in this House and outside have been in the habit of making comparisons with conditions in free trade countries, particularly England. They have been making promises to Canada based, no doubt—in fact, it must be—upon the conditions in free trade England. I feel that a clear statement of the facts and a clear statement of comparisons, not with the object in view of disproving the theory of free trade, but of paving the way for a fair consideration of this subject on behalf of Canada, would be apropos here to-day, and that is what I intend to attempt; because after careful thought and consideration it appears to me that the moderate tariff course is the wise course for this country to follow. We should go neither to the extreme of free traders, knocking down all tariff walls, or to the protectionist extreme of placing a Chinese wall around this country which would bar out the goods of all other countries. It is not sufficient today to merely state one's conclusions. It is necessary to offer reasons for the faith that is in one. It has appeared to me that too often those who take the same stand as I do, and I think the vast majority of the members of this House have taken that stand, have taken it, some of us, at least, in an apologetic way. We have allowed free traders to try and prove their theories with theories and their facts with theories, and have not often enough insisted that they prove their theories with facts. I admit that the academic question of the tariff is more easily upheld on the free trade side, but facts are stubborn things, and it is facts I intend to deal with.

In the first place, if free trade is a panacea for all the ills that nations are heir to, how is it that England which adopted it in 1846 is the only great nation of the world that has adopted it? Italy, Spain, Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, the United States—none of these great nations have considered free trade worth while adopting. Even the overseas Dominions of the Empire, with one small exception, have not considered it worth while to copy the methods of the Mother Country. Cobden's prophesy that if England adopted free trade, in ten years free trade would be universal, is a long distance from being fulfilled. In England itself there is a large body of protection opinion. The other day I made it my business to look over three shelves of books in the Library dealing with tariff questions, and of forty distinct works by English writers twelve were in favour of protection. So I think I am correct in saying that there is a large body of opinion in England—and we know there is even amongst politicians in England—favourable to protection, and who believe that free trade has caused England to deteriorate. If we look over the prominent figures in the political life of nations there are very good examples on both sides. On the free trade side we have such examples as Cobden, Bright, Peel late in life, and Lloyd George in England; in the United States, President Cleveland; and among former statesmen in this country Sir Richard Cartwright, and of the present day, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). On the protectionist side we have Peel early in life, Joseph Chamberlain, Balfour has made speeches more or less in favour of protection, Bismarck in Germany, President Lincoln and President McKinley in the United States, Premier Hughes of Australia, the late Sir John A. Macdonald and the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier among the late premiers of this country, and in this House of Commons the leader of the Government and all his lieutenants, and on the other side of this House I take it that we have the leader of the Opposition and most of his lieutenants, with the exception of the hon. member for Brome. So it seems to me that a man may take either side of this question and find himself in good company. Is it necessary, then, to apologize for taking the position that a moderate tariff policy is good for Canada? I am not disputing that a free trade policy may be, and perhaps is, the best policy for England. I am not dealing with her policy at all, except in a comparative way. In order to decide which is the best policy for this country we must make comparisons of that kind. Free traders make comparisons so I am going to make comparisons also.

In the first place, the United Kingdom consists of two islands in the North Sea with an area of 121,000 square miles, with powerful manufacturing plants, large accumulated wealth, practically no raw materials except coal and iron, and almost wholly dependent for her raw materials and for food on the outside world. Of wheat alone she imports 80 per cent of her needs. On the other hand, Canada is a country of 3,500,000 square miles, thirty times the size of Great Britain, and twice the size of Europe, leaving out Russia, and greater in area than the United States. We have little accumulated wealth, but almost unlimited natural resources, and practically all varieties of climatic conditions. We are a food-exporting country. Canada could practically live within herself if absolutely necessary, while the United Kingdom depends for her very lifeblood on her foreign commerce. She must import cheaply foodstuffs and raw materials, so that she can export manufactured articles in order to get food and raw materials for her people. So that principle which might apply with force to the United Kingdom might not apply at all to Canada.

A hundred and fifty years ago Edmund Burke made a statement to the effect that "on any moral or political subject nothing universal could be rationally affirmed," and I notice that Lloyd George expressed the same thought in speaking with reference to Ireland the other day. He said that there must be a limitation to the application of any principle. England demonstrates this in the principle which is dear to the heart of every Englishman, the principle of freedom, the principle of the absolute right of a people to govern themselves. Has England applied this principle to India, Egypt, or Ireland? She has not. And yet free traders claim that the lesser principle of free trade should be applied universally. After all, free trade is only a theory except in England, and history shows us many theories which were accepted by the whole world and which were afterwards exploded and proven to be inefficient when put to the test of facts. Galileo was confronted with the inquisition for exploding theories which were accepted by the whole world; and Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, took years to convince the other members of his profession that his theory was correct. For nearly two thousand years previous to the time of Harvey a false theory of circulation was accepted. False theories are therefore nothing new, and though they may be strongly held and forcibly proclaimed they are often found quite inefficient when brought face to face with the test of facts. In Canada free trade and protection are sectional cries, the free traders being some of the farmers, not all of them by any means, and the high protectionists being some of the manufacturers. Both sides have a right to their opinions, and we may admit that both are sincere in desiring the best interests of the country. But is it not time, Sir, for Canada to act as one whole nation and not as a group of nations? Both the free trader and the protectionist argue that their respective interests are the most important. I admitted in the beginning of my remarks that in numbers the farmers had the advantage, but in production, according to the figures of the Minister of Finance the other day, it would seem to be the other way. In 1917, including field crops, animals, butter, cheese, fruits, milk, etc., the agricultural production amounted to $1,600,000,0000, while the manufactured production in the same year amounted to $3,000,000,000, or nearly twice as much. Therefore, in production, the manufacturers I think have the advantage, but I mention this fact merely in order to clear the ground; because manufactured production cannot be divorced from agricultural production, nor can the reverse condition prevail. The prosperity of the country as a whole depends on both. This appears to be still another reason why a middle course is most desirable for the country.

Then there is the question of markets. Which market would appear to be most profitable for the farmers? Unquestionably, a reasonable farmer would say that the home market is more profitable than a market three thousand or six thousand miles away. Well, if that is correct—and I think it is hardly disputable—the building up of an industrial population obviously supplies the home market for the farmer, and therefore does indirectly benefit him. The United States wheat growers export only ten per cent of their wheat and sell ninety per cent in the home market, but the Canadian wheat grower must export seventy-five to eighty per cent of his product. Surely the building up of a home market is eminently desirable, especially when one considers the uncertainties and doubts and dangers that surround the foreign market. England buys her wheat in the open markets of the world. She plays no favourites. In 1896 she imported wheat to the extent of £31,000,000 sterling, and only 8 per cent of this came from the colonies. In 1913, one year before the war, she imported 105,000,000 hundred weight, of which quantity Canada exported 21,000,000 hundred weight or 20 per cent. The United States shipped 32 per cent of the total, and the balance of 48 per cent came from India, Argentine, Australia and Russia. So that Canada supplied one-fifth of England's wheat. In other words, Canada must compete with the whole world in the market so far as wheat is concerned. Undoubtedly the home market would be preferable, because it gives to the farmer the privilege of growing a greater variety of crops, which is a great advantage, and being independent of the foreign market he does not place all his eggs, or rather wheat, in one basket. Then there is another point. The extreme farmers claim that only the manufacturers are benefitted by State assistance. Now, Sir, is not the farmer also benefited by direct State assistance? In the Estimates which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) had before the House the other day there was an item of over $5,000,000 for experimental farms, the Seed Act, health of animals, the livestock industry, and agricultural instruction. Surely that is direct assistance to the farmer of the country as well. Steel bounties between 1896 and 1915 amounted to only $17,000,000, and those bounties are much discussed and frequently are subject to grave condemnation by free traders. Yet I agree with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that those bounties, in the results which they attained, were a blessing to the country. Undoubtedly this $5,000,000 of which I have just spoken is direct assistance to the farming population of this country, and I do not think that any farmer will be disposed to dispute that point. And what about railways and harbours and roads? The farmer certainly benefits indirectly by the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been spent on railways and the hundreds of millions that have been spent on harbours; I think he benefits indirectly from them as much as the manufacturer does. Now, Sir, I do not wish to be understood as in any way condemning that vote of $5,000,000 when I describe it as a direct aid to the farmers of the country. By no means. In fact, I absolutely approve of it. But I believe that therein lies one of the reasons why in our statements we should be more moderate than the extreme farmers are inclined to be. Mind, Sir, I am speaking only of the extreme farmers and not of the ordinary moderate farmers. My constituency is not by any means entirely an urban constituency. I think that probably 25 per cent of it is rural, and I am just as anxious for the welfare of the farmers of my constituency as I am for the interests of the urban community. I believe, however, that moderation in national life is just as important as it is in private life.

Within the last few weeks we have heard a debate in which two hon. members proved that England does not live up entirely to her alleged free trade policy. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) read a letter from Sir Auckland Geddes in which it was admitted that England paid bounties on shipbuilding during the war; and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Burrell) gave facts to show that England imposed heavy duties on automobiles,—and many farmers in Canada to-day insist that these vehicles must be classed among the necessaries of life—on tea, sugar, coffee, clocks, cinema films, matches, gasoline, tobacco and various other articles, many of which would be regarded here as necessaries of life. And the embargo against Canadian cattle entering the United Kingdom, is thinly disguised as a health measure, but it is as a matter of fact nothing more nor less than a protection for the cattle growers of the United Kingdom. The steamship subsidies which are paid by England for mail carrying are also claimed to be in the shape of a subsidy for the home trade, for the foreign steamship companies claim they have no chance of getting the subsidies even if they tender lowest. In other words, England insists on giving the contracts to her own people even if they are higher than the tenders offered by foreign companies. In 1917-18 the customs and excise in England brought in a revenue of $550,000,000; in 1918-19 the estimated revenue was $740,000,000; and this year, according to the speech of Mr. Austin Chamberlain reported in the London Times, the figure is $1,500,000,000. I admit that in that figure there are included in excise some duties which we do not impose here, but if you subtract even a great deal from that, you would have a greater income per capita for customs and excise in the United Kingdom than in Canada. So that England is not entirely free trade.

But in Canada, when any one takes the stand I am taking in favour of a moderate tariff policy, some free trader demands that the position should be carried to its "logical conclusion" and suggestions are made about barriers between one province and another and between one district and another, and between one city and another.

That is a favourite argument of free traders. You find it in all the books on the subject. Even that grand old man of British politics, Mr. Gladstone, used it in a debate with an American. It would be rather strange if we could not answer that question because the answer is very easy. The answer is that to carry protection to such a conclusion would be to carry it to an illogical conclusion. It would be like saying that if a slice of old English beef is good for your dinner, you should eat a whole ox; or if a thirtieth of a grain of strychnine or an ounce of brandy is good for a failing heart, why do you not give a pound of strychnine or a keg of brandy?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I assume from the applause that the keg of brandy might be popular. Let us turn that logical conclusion argument about and see how it works the other way. If free trade is the proper policy why not carry it to its logical conclusion? Why put restrictions on anything? Why should you restrict the slave trade, or the white slave trade, or the whisky traffic? They are all money makers. In fact, it is the southern party in the United States, which was the slave party, and is now the free trade party. I am not saying that with the idea of casting any reflection on free traders any more than it would be a reflection to remind the Conservatives that free trade was brought about in England by the Conservative party in 1846 when Sir Robert Peel, the Conservative leader, brought in his Bill. I am simply pointing out that it is not an argument on one side more than the other, to demand this so-called logical conclusion. It is just as unreasonable on one side as on the other. But we are always being reminded of the great foreign commerce of the United Kingdom. But it should be remembered that protectionists claim that the foundations of the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom were built up previous to 1846 while Great Britain was a protectionist country and when she insisted upon imposing very great restrictions on the colonies with respect to trade matters. John Morley has made the statement that the American Revolution was caused by restrictions imposed on the thirteen colonies in America in trade matters by England and that the final incident was the last straw that broke the camel's back. Protectionists claim that improvements in industry, invention and science, such as the steam engine and the steamship, played an immense part in building up the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom. That foreign commerce argument is so often used that one might think that foreign commerce was the only thing for which we were put on earth. I might point out that if we had a little less foreign commerce with the United States than we have had in the last two or three years our dollar would not have been discounted ten or fifteen per cent. Certainly if we had had free trade and a corresponding increase in imports from the United States our dollar would have been discounted still more.

Let us look into this question of foreign commerce. The United Kingdom has been a free trade country since 1846. The United States has been a protectionist country since 1861 and Germany a protectionist country since, I think, 1879, so that we can compare the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom a free trade country on the one hand with that of the United States and Germany, protectionist countries on the other. The reason I do not take the United States alone is that if I did it would be said that with the large area, population and resources of the United States the comparison would not be fair. This claim cannot be made in the case of Germany. I saw in the Toronto Globe of April 12, I think, a statement made by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), when speaking in Toronto, that the United States was a comparatively free trade country at the present time. I noticed that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) this afternoon made practically the same statement. Let us consider that statement for a moment. The hon. member for Brome did not go into details, but the hon. member for Red Deer based his statement upon the fact that of all the imports into the United States only thirty per cent are dutiable. How can any one claim on a statement of that kind, that a country which puts a duty on thirty per cent of its imports, is a free trade country? But these figures are correct, and if you go back five years to 1912 you find that instead of 30 per cent the dutiable imports were 47 per cent and that in 1907 they were 55 per cent. That is only twelve years ago. Let us make a comparison with the dutiable imports into Canada. They were as follows:

1914	33

If the claim can be made on those figures that the United States is practically a free trade country you might as well, and with as much justice, claim that Canada is a free trade country. Of completely manufactured goods ready for home consumption the United States imported between 1909 and 1918, 26 per cent to 37 per cent. Canada's imports of manufactured goods ready for home consumption amounted to 57 per cent from 1899-1909 demonstrating that the United States manufactures are very much more highly developed than ours and that is one of the reasons why the hon. member for Brome could point out that the customs duties in the United States are down to such a low figure. The protective policy of the United States has so built up their manufactures, their industrial life and their agricultural life that they do not need to import very much from abroad. That is the reason for the condition which we find in the United States.

Let us look a little further into the claim that the United States is a free trade country. I made it my business, when I saw those statements, to write to the Department of Customs in the United States for some information. I find that the United States has duties on the necessaries of life as follows:

	Per cent.
Cotton clothing	30	ad valorem.
Cotton underwear	20-30	"
Woollen goods	25-40	"
Carpets	20-50	"
Soaps	5-30	"
Cheese	20	"
Tobacco	35c. to $2.50 per pound.

	Per cent.
Automobiles below $2,000.	30	ad valorem.
Automobiles above $2,000.	45	"
Hats	45	"
Cutlery	25-55	"
Linen manufactures	10-35	"
Oilcloth	20-30	"
Matches	3c. per gross of boxes of 100
Linoleum	30	per cent

These are some of the items that are on the dutiable list in the United States, necessaries of life or, if not actual necessaries of life, necessary to comfort. While there are many goods free in the United States you can hardly claim that it is a free trade country.

Mr. J. F. REID: Would the hon. gentleman give us a few of the items on the free list in the United States? It will be very interesting to the House.

Mr. MANION: Yes, I will be pleased to. I only asked for a certain list of goods and out of the list I received I can give a great many more dutiable items, but I do not wish to clutter up Hansard. Amongst the goods admitted free into the United States are eggs, poultry, boots and shoes, meats, cement, coal, tea, coffee, leather goods, agricultural implements, lumber and films. These are the goods I asked about. I am pointing out that in the United States there are many necessaries of life that are dutiable. I am not in any way trying to disagree with anybody and my only object in quoting these figures is to prove that the United States is not a free trade country.

Now, let us look a little further into the question of the foreign commerce of the United States, Germany and the United Kingdom. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that before the war the United States and Germany were rapidly gaining, under a protective tariff, on the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom. I am going to give figures to show that in that assumption I am correct. In the twenty-three years from 1890 to 1913 the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom increased from £748,000,000 to £1,403,000,000, or 87 per cent. The foreign commerce of Germany increased from £419,000,000 to £1,070,000,000 or 155 per cent. The foreign commerce of the United States grew from 1,647 million dollars to 4,278 million dollars, or 160 per cent, twice as rapidly. Now I will take the period from 1875 to 1905, and during that period of thirty years the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom increased from 655 million pounds to 972 million pounds, or 48 per cent. The United States' foreign commerce increased from 1,046 million dollars to 2,636 million dollars, or 152 per cent, three times as rapidly as did the foreign commerce of the United Kingdom. I do not give the figures of German commerce because I could not get the German statistics back beyond 1890. To be absolutely fair—and I have no intention of being anything but fair because I have no personal interest in the matter except the desire of trying to have this question dealt with in a reasonable and fair manner with the best interests of Canada in view—before the war the United Kingdom surpassed either Germany or the United States in foreign commerce; but since the war the United States has completely overtaken the United Kingdom. The claim is advanced by free traders that the percentage argument is weak, and the hon. member for Brome when I gave figures of a similar character on another occasion made the statement that percentage arguments were no use anyhow, and he proved that as usual to his own satisfaction by taking a hypothetical case. He said: Suppose Nova Scotia has one hundred boats and New Brunswick two boats. A percentage increase of one hundred would mean that Nova Scotia would have two hundred boats and New Brunswick would have four boats. It was only a hypothetical case which the hon. gentleman cited, and certainly the figure of two boats in the case of the province of New Brunswick, which he mentioned, is hardly analagous to the billion dollar foreign commerce of the United States in 1875, or the billion and a half in 1890. As a further proof that the commerce of the United States and of Germany were gaining very rapidly upon that of the United Kingdom before the war I may quote from a writer whom the hon. member for Brome quoted this afternoon, Mr. J. M. Keynes. The hon. member quoted that gentleman in some of his remarks, and I shall also give him as my authority. Mr. Keynes wrote a book entitled, "Economic Aspects of the Peace Treaty" which to-day is very much in vogue in the United States. He said that before the war Germany was the chief seller to Russia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Switzerland, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Roumania and Bulgaria. Mr. Speaker, if free trade put England in such an advanced position, why did she permit Germany to undersell her in the markets of those countries which are neighbours of both nations? It simply shows that Germany was rapidly gaining upon the United Kingdom in international commerce before the war.

But, Sir, foreign commerce is not the only test of the prosperity, happiness and progress of a state; in fact, internal commerce might more reasonably be used as a test; and enjoyment of an average amount of the good things of life and the general well-being of the people may be regarded as a better criterion. Taking the national debt of each of these three countries just before the war, that of the United Kingdom was 678 million pounds, or $76 per capita; the national debt of Germany was one thousand million pounds, or $73 per capita. In addition to a lower per capita national debt than the United Kingdom, Germany has immense railway facilities and a canal system, which the country owns, and an English writer stated that Germany could sell both the railway system and the canal system and not only pay off her complete national debt before the war but have a good surplus on the side. To recapitulate: The per capita national debt of the United Kingdom before the war was $76; the per capita national debt of Germany $73. The total debt of the United States was 2,912 million dollars, or a per capita debt of $27. But if we add the State debts, and subtract the cash in the Treasury it gives the United States a per capita debt of $11, whilst the per capita debt of Canada is $40. So, according to these figures, and they are authentic, the per capita national debt of the United Kingdom —of free trade England—was greater than the per capita national debt of either the United States or Germany.

But, Sir, the rate of earnings and the general welfare of the people constitute a better way still of judging of the general progress and prosperity of a country and, it is unlikely that any one will deny that the general well-being of the people of the United States and Canada are superior to the general well-being of the people of the United Kingdom. I did hear one hon. gentleman make the statement not long ago in this House that the conditions of the working classes in England were better, or as good, as the condition of the working class in the United States. I do not know on what data the hon. gentleman is question bases his statement, but I think it is absolutely disproven by the fact that the continual stream of immigration to the United States and Canada comes from England, and if the conditions there were better, or even equal, to those in Canada or United States, the migration would be in the other direction. It is stated, Sir, by free traders that in continental countries, which are protectionist, the conditions are not so good as in England. As to Germany I may quote from a work written by Mr. J. Ellis Barker entitled, "Modern Germany in 1912." According to his conclusion, after thorough investigation of unemployment statistics, savings bank deposits and emigration, the workers of Germany are considerably better off than the workers in England that is before the war. I might also quote the opinion of an American writer who wrote a book which doubtless a great many members of this House have read. I refer to Mr. Price Collier, who wrote a book entitled, "Germany and the Germans from the American Point of View." He says at page 231:

> Whatever figures say, the German working population are better clothed, better fed, and cared for, and have more enjoyment than either the English or American.

So that, according to these two writers --one English and the other American, and therefore not likely to be prejudiced in favour of Germany—the conditions in Germany were better for the working class than the conditions in England. Mr. J Ellis Barker takes up this question in particular, and proves to his own satisfaction that before the war conditions were better in Germany than they were in the United Kingdom.

Now, as to Ireland. In the period from 1841 to 1911 the population of Ireland declined from eight million to four million but I do not cite that as a proof that free trade is bad for Ireland or for any part of the United Kingdom. Other reasons existed. The other day Mr. Tom Moore, a Canada labour leader, made a statement in the press of this country, in which he said that recently conditions had improved in England to equal the conditions in this country, therefore implying,—as we in this country also thought—that the conditions in England before the war were not as good as those of the United States or Canada. Some people go so far as to say that the fact that conditions have improved in England may interfere with England's international commerce. I will go so far as to say that in my opinion from reading and observation, wealth, money and lands are divided better in protectionist France than in free trade England; and, it has been stated on good authority that the lands of England are in fewer hands than the lands in any other European country.

I will now leave that branch of my argument, and take up the railway question. There is no question of more importance to every man, woman and child in this country than the railway question, because transportation rates enter into the lives of all of us. To no class in the community is the railway transportation question of more importance than to the farmer. Well, Sir, we would expect that the railways in England having been built under free trade —and when I say free trade, I mean that the larger part of her railways were built under free trade—would be in a better condition than the railways of the United States, Germany, Austria and France built under protection. What are the facts?

The capitalization of those railways—I am quoting from a book written by James J. Hill in 1912, and I do not believe that any better authority on railway matters existed in the English-speaking world at the time—he said that the railway capitalization per mile in the United Kingdom was $272,000; in Germany, $107,000—a good deal less than one-half; France $126,000—a good deal less than one-half; in the United States $58,000 or less than one-quarter.

However, capitalization, per mile is not, perhaps, so important except as to its bearing upon transportation charges; the real point is the average rate per ton per mile. In England the average rate per ton per mile in 1907 was 2.31 cents; in Germany 1.41 cents—a little more than one-half; in France 1.46 cents—a little more than one-half; in Austria-Hungary 1.49 cents—a little more than one-half; in the United States 0.80 cents, or four-fifths of one cent—or one-third that of the rate in the United Kingdom. And, Mr. Speaker, let me remark that the rates in Canada are practically the same as the rates in the United States.

So according to that comparison free trade England shows up very badly so far as freight rates are concerned. The United States, according to those figures, had the lowest cost per mile, the lowest freight rates, and the highest wages of any country in the world; and Mr. Hill said that even the railway wages in Germany were higher than those in Great Britain.

Let us make another comparison, this time in regard to pauperism or abject poverty. In 1914, 761,000 paupers were relieved in England and Wales under the Poor Laws; in 1910—I could not get the same year, but I do not think it makes any material difference—84,000 paupers were relieved in the United States, or one-tenth the number with two and one-half times the population of England and Wales. In 1913 in the United Kingdom $89,000,000 was spent on poor relief; I have no records for Germany since 1885, but J. Ellis Barker, whom I have already quoted, in his "Modern Germany" says that there is much more pauperism in England than in Germany.

It has been suggested that comparison between the United Kingdom and the United States are unfair, because of the larger area, greater population, and immense natural resources of the United States. I admit that there is a good deal of truth in that criticism. But, Sir, if after a fair examination we find that the people of England following sixty years of free trade are not on an equal plane with the people of the United States under protection, then Canada being so much similar to the United States in area, in natural resources,—in minerals, fisheries, lumber and all those things, almost in climate except tropically, might it not be much wiser to copy the methods of the United States—probably that will be an unpopular expression—to consider the methods of the United States rather than those of some European country absolutely unlike Canada. At any rate, free trade exists only in England, therefore comparisons cannot be made with any other free trade country of importance.

Let us take other comparisons, for instance, agriculture. How has it stood the test of free trade in England? All hon. members know that the free traders of England are the manufacturers, and that the protectionists are the farmers; the reverse of what obtains in Canada. The reason is that the farmers have seen agriculture deteriorating so rapidly in England. And I am not going to let it go at that; I am going to give my proofs. England imports most of her foodstuffs. In 1913 she imported 215,000,000 bushels of wheat and grew only 57,000,000 bushels, or only one-fifth of her needs. It might be argued that the size of the United Kingom is the reason for the small amount of acreage there under wheat; but the fact is, Sir, that France, Italy, Germany, Austria, and even Spain greatly surpassed her in wheat production. Taking the wheat production of the world in 1913, I find these figures given—and I am leaving out any Asiatic countries, because it is not important to my argument to consider their production; Russia grew 814,000,000 bushels; the United States, 763,000,000 bushels; France, 319,000,000 bushels; Canada, 232,000,000 bushels; Austria-Hungary, 230,000,000 bushels; Italy, 214,000,000 bushels; Germany, 171,000,000 bushels; Spain, 112,000,000 bushels; United Kingdom, 57,000,000 bushels, or half that of Spain, exactly one third that of Germany, a quarter that of Italy, and about one-sixth that of France. I may say, Sir, that those figures are given from the Blue Books of our Department of Trade and Commerce so they are authoritative. So far as oats and barley are concerned, while the figures are not so strongly against England, they are nearly in the same ratio.

England imports 50 per cent of her foodstuffs, and is almost wholly dependent on the outside world in that respect; but before the war Germany raised 90 per cent of her foods, and France 100,000,000 bushels more wheat than we did in this immense country. Therefore England suffers by comparison in agriculture with practically all the European countries.

What a contrast, Mr. Speaker, in the United States, where under protection since 1861—I say under protection, not because of protection—the agricultural states of the west have grown rich, prosperous and populous, selling 90 per cent of their crops in their home market. The production of the wealth of the farms in the United States—and this statement is from the statistics published by the United States Government—including crops and livestock was in 1880, $2,000,000,000; in 1900, $5,000,000,000; in 1910, $9,000,000,000; in 1918, $21,000,000,000. The value of farm property in the United States, including land, buildings, stock and so on, increased 150 per cent in the twenty years from 1890 to 1910—from $16,000,000,000 to $41,000,000,000.

It seems to me, Sir, that the extreme farmer might well ponder over those figures before demanding a change in the fiscal policy of this country.

Rather strangely the argument has been advanced that protection is immoral, but anybody who has visited these various countries will not claim, I think, that free trade has had any particularly elevating effect on England; I do not imagine that any one will claim that England is more moral than for example the countries on this side of the water.

Then, Sir, will a free trade policy develop our natural resources? Undoubtedly we need their development very much. What about our pulp wood, for instance? Under free trade there would be none of these provincial restrictions which exist to-day, and the raw pulp wood would go out to feed the pulp and paper mills of the United States, and our pulp wood resources would soon be exhausted.

Mr. VIEN: Will my learned friend allow me a question? A federal policy of free trade or of protection has, to my mind, nothing to do with the export duties imposed by the provincial authorities; and I would like to hear my hon. friend inform us how a change in policy from protection to free trade would affect those export duties.

Mr. MANION: I know what my hon. friend's point is as well as he does, that the restrictions imposed by the provinces are not restrictions imposed by the Dominion, and therefore can hardly be taken into account in discussing our tariff policy. But I ask my hon. friend can he prove that they are not restrictions just the same? The only point I am making is that under free trade you would not have restrictions. I admit my hon. friend's point; I think he will admit mine.

Mr. STEVENS: Export duties imposed by Liberal Provincial Governments.

Mr. MANION: Yes, my hon. friend from Vancouver reminds me that those export restrictions are imposed by Liberal Provincial Governments. I am going to say further that the Globe of Toronto, which can hardly be regarded as an intimate friend of the present Government, contained an editorial last Saturday very strongly condemning Senator Underwood who, before a Committee of Congress, threatened a heavy club over Canada's head if we did not take off those restrictions, his club being in the shape of refusing us coal, and iron ore. It has no effect on my argument, for the two questions are not at all analagous. But just to offer an opinion: Coal is a finished product; we do not do anything with it except to convert a portion of it into coke. So when we embargo coal we embargo practically the finished product; but when we export pulpwood to the United States we are not exporting a finished product. We are not putting any restrictions on the export of paper and pulp to the United States. What we are demanding is a demand the justice of which I think Senator Underwood must admit that before our pulpwood is exported it should be manufactured in this country.

Sir, a free trade policy, I submit, if carried out to a proper conclusion—I was nearly going to lay myself open to my own criticism by saying "logical conclusion"—would not put these restrictions upon the export of raw pulpwood to the United States, and surely, any free trader will admit that that condition of exhausting our pulpwood reserves would not be as good for Canada as the present condition, which has brought tens of millions of dollars of American money into this country to build pulp mills. To-day a gentleman waited upon me in my room in regard to dealing with this Government for pulpwood areas granted the Grand Trunk Pacific, and he is prepared to build an immense pulp mill in my city of Fort William. That is one of the results of these restrictions which to my mind are just and fair.

Then what of the iron, coal and oil which we import from the United States at the present time. Most Canadians admit that the development of these natural resources would improve our commercial position, give markets for our agricultural products, produce freight for our over-developed railway system, to say nothing of making us independent of Senator Underwood's threatened action of putting an embargo on the export of coal and iron ore to this country. In this connection the following figures are rather startling—they are to me at any rate. I am going to give figures showing the immense development of the natural resources in the United States under protection—not because of protection, although I think it might be truthfully stated in the latter form—for the period from 1880 to 1917, exactly the period of my lifetime, and I am not quite as old as Methusaleh. During those thirty-seven years the increase in production in the United States was for:

	Gallons.	Gallons.
Petroleum	1,000,000,000 to	14,000,000,000
	Tons.	Tons.
Iron ore	7,000,000 to	75,000,000
Pig iron..	3,000,000 to	38,000,000
Steel	1,000,000 to	45,000,000
Coal	63,000,000 to	640,000,000

The total mineral production in the United States increased in that period from $364,000,000 to $3,000,000,000. The exports of iron and steel and their manufactures increased from $14,000,000 to $1,133,000,000.

Are not those figures to conjure with, Mr. Speaker?

I can go a little further, and although I do not like to tire the House with figures, I cannot refrain from citing these statistics with regard to tin-plate imports into the United States in 1890 before restrictions were imposed. The importation of tin plates to the United States in 1890 amounted to 680,000,000 pounds, and twenty years later, in 1913, that was reduced to 28,000,000 pounds, due to protective policy. Tin-plate manufacturing in the United States amounted in 1890 to 2,000,000 pounds, and twenty-three years later, in 1913, had increased to 2,000,000,000 pounds. From 1880 to 1917 the production of natural gas in the United States increased from $215,000 to $140,000,000; of lead from 100,000 tons to 600,000 tons; of copper from 27,000 tons to 840,000 tons; of cement, from 2,000,000 barrels to 91,000,000 barrels. The production of corn increased from 1,700,000,000 bushels in 1880 to 3,000,000,000 bushels in 1917; of cotton, from 6,000,000 bales to 11,000,000 bales; cotton manufactures from $192,000,000 in 1880 to $701,000,000 in 1914; production of phosphate rock from 200,000 tons to 2,500,000 tons; of zinc, from 23,000 tons to 584,000 tons. The export of manufactured cotton increased from $10,000,000 in 1880 to $136,000,000 in 1917. The production of wheat nearly doubled in the same period, and the national wealth increased from $43,000,000,000 in 1880 to $187,000,000,000 in 1912. These figures may be of use on another occasion.

I might also point out—I am not going to put details of these figures on Hansard—that in the production of coal, iron ore, pig-iron and steel, the United States and Germany in some cases surpassed the United Kingdom, though they started away behind her. For example, in the production of coal the United Kingdom, starting with 186,000,000 tons in 1890, increased to 270,000,000 tons in 1911, while the United States starting with 148,000,000 tons, increased in the same period to 427,000,000 tons; that is, it started behind, but almost doubled the production in the United Kingdom in 1911. Germany, starting with a lower production than the United Kingdom in 1890, almost reached the same point as England in 1911. In the production of iron ore the United States and Germany surpassed the production of the United Kingdom in 1911, though they started equal in 1890, the United States producing in 1911 three times as much as the United Kingdom, and Germany nearly twice as much. France was about equal in iron ore production to the United Kingdom, although it started behind in 1890. In the production of pig-iron the United States and Germany surpassed the United Kingdom in 1911, though they started about equal (Germany behind) in 1890. France also gained more rapidly than England in the same period. In the production of steel the United States was producing over three times as much as the United Kingdom in 1911, and Germany twice as much, though they started equally in 1890. France also gained very rapidly. The reason I mention those four materials is that they are the basic elements of commercial progress. In the production of these four different materials the United States and Germany surpassed the United Kingdom in many instances, and in others were gaining very rapidly.

Then there is this argument: that a moderate tariff brings about a more diversified national life, because it produces greater opportunities to the youth of our land and prevents their exodus to the United States. There is no class of our people in the Dominion who profit more by that fact than the ambitious sons of the farmers of this country, and even if on occasions internal competition does not cut down the prices of materials quite so low as we might wish, is not a complete national development worth something? Do we wish to be simply producers of food and raw materials, simply hewers of wood and drawers of water to the other nations of the world?

We have immense taxes, due to the war, and it is doubtful if we can raise them by the direct method. History shows that every country after a great war has increased its customs to a certain extent.

I have not used the argument that we have to compete with cheap Japanese and Chinese labour, nor the quite logical argument as to the specialization in manufacturing in the United States. In other words, if Canadian manufacturers are forced to compete in an open market with American manufacturers in a protected market, and Canadians cannot specialize so greatly, they will be driven out of business in this country. They would no longer manufacture to a population of 8,000,000 or 9,000,000, but would go to the United States and manufacture to a population of 110,000,000. I think I have touched most of the important aspects of the life of a people. I have touched on home and foreign markets, agriculture, transportation rates, general taxes, pauperism, foreign commerce, development of our national resources, a diversified national life, and the general well-being of the people; and I have shown that the people of England are not on an equal plane in most of them with the people of the United States, and in some of them are not on an equal plane with the people of Germany and France. I do not state that protection is the cause of all this. No one cause can be assigned for the progress, or the reverse, of any nation. Contributing circumstances must be taken into account. But if in sixty years free trade England has not succeeded in improving the condition of her people as much as has the United States in the same period, why should we adopt a free trade policy? Certainly the facts in the situation are against free trade. Then why should Canada embark on such a policy? Is it merely because it is claimed by some to be a panacea for all the ills that nations are heir to? Or is it merely to try out the theories of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster)? Suppose we admit that the conditions of the masses of the people did improve very much in England after 1846; that statement can be made truthfully of every other civilized country. Through invention and science alone much was accomplished. But despite its great population the United States leads the world. Protection in United States began in 1861, when that country had a population of 31,000,000. Now its population is 110,000,000, and in general prosperity, developed natural resources, real wages, social condition of her people, general comfort and opportunities in life, the United States is ahead of any other country. Can a parallel be found in the history of the world? I think that an answer may unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly be made in the negative. United States has two and a half times the population of the United Kingdom, twice the national income and two or three times the accumulated national wealth;—I believe that these figures are too conservative. The argument is sometimes put forward by free traders that the United States would be better off under free trade. But, Sir, that is only a speculation, and a very unlikely speculation. One would be just as fully justified in saying that the United States would have failed miserably under free trade. It is not necessary to say that now with her great amassed wealth and with her developed industries, it might be wise for the United States gradually to adopt free trade. In fact, one might easily conclude so. But her early commercial history may be looked upon, it seems to me, as a perfectly good model for Canada. Our progress has been slow in comparison; but should we experiment on account of that? Mr. Blaine during the course of a controversy with Mr. Gladstone, made a statement in 1896 which was published in the North American Review and which is in the library of Parliament in book form, in which he said that between 1812 and 1861 the United States tried free trade three times, and the result was recurring panics and depression; but that since 1861 the progress and prosperity of the country had been rapid and continuous. Therefore, Sir, we have the strongest arguments against experiments in the history and commercial conditions of United States which, I repeat, in area, resources and minerals is more like Canada than is any European country. Is it not desirable for us to profit by the example of the early commercial history of the United States?

Let us take all these things into account, and also the fact that forty-eight per cent of the people of this country are neither farmers nor manufacturers, and wish only the adoption of a policy which will be the best for Canada's development. I believe you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of the people of this country, of whatever political party, favour a moderate tariff policy, neither going to free trade extreme on the one hand nor the too high protectionist extreme on the other, by which too high protectionist extreme a group of men may exploit the people and subject them to overcharges. Of course, that is not to say that the present tariff policy must not be maintained as it is. The Minister of Finance has promised a scientific revision of the tariff, as was promised last year. It is not so difficult to understand that the revision that was promised last year was a little difficult to accomplish. Anyway, the Minister of Finance has promised this revision, and I think the House may certainly expect a revision by next year. I believe that tariff revision is very badly needed, but to say that is far from saying that free trade would be the proper policy for this country. The members of this House are fairly representative, I think, of the people of this country, and certainly the representatives on either side of the House are not leaning towards the free trade extreme. Neither of the old parties has shown any tendency toward that extreme. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's who is, I think, a pretty fair spokesman for the party opposite, does not show any inclination to take to it at the present time. If divisions in parties are based alone upon the tariff, then I think the supposed difference between the present Liberal Opposition and the present Unionist party is a very artificial difference. Therefore, as a dispassionate observer I believe that the just and proper course would be co-operation between the moderate people of the three great groups, farmers, manufacturers and labourites, the latter including the forty-eight per cent outside of the farmers and manufacturers. I believe that if these groups work together along moderate tariff lines fixing as low duties as possible on the necessaries of life, on raw materials, and on the instruments of production, the result will be the bringing about of the greatest good to the greatest number and the building up in the Northern half of this continent of a great, prosperous, united, freedom-loving people.

Mr. THEODORE GERVAIS (Berthier): (Translation). Mr. Speaker, allow me, at the very outset of the few remarks I am about to make, to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) upon the clear and precise manner in which he delivered yesterday, what it is agreed to call, in parliamentary language, the Budget Speech. Conscious of the responsibility devolving upon me as one of the mandatories of this country, I wish to express my opinion freely, according to the dictates of my own conscience, while remaining a loyal subject of the loyal opposition of His Majesty. In the course of a protracted debate which took place last year under similar circumstances, I had heard the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) state that, though he did not intend to prolong the debate, still he thought it was in the interest of the country that the discussion should be continued, as this was a means of finding out the opinions of each of the members representing the different parts of the Dominion. I do not wish to protract this debate either, but I do wish to explain my position, to express my opinion on the Government's policy, as well as on the Liberal platform laid down at the convention which took place in August last, and on the amendment now submitted to the House.

The country has passed through a terrible crisis; the war brought the Government face to face with many new problems, but this land never experienced social unrest in the same degree to which we are witnessing it to-day, in practically no part of the world was there ever seen such a social upheaval as that which has followed in the wake of the economic disturbance brought about by the war and which instead of lessening seems to gain in strength as time goes on.

What are the causes of this social unrest which finds expression in numerous and ever recurrent strikes, in popular movements which, at times, border on sedition, giving rise to popular clamour of every description and apprising us of the existence in the different classes of society of a ferment which threatens to destroy not alone the social equilibrium of this country but the economic equilibrium as well?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these causes are both deep-rooted and remote; I hold that the economic system which has been established for years in this country is one of the main causes of this social unrest we are witnessing to-day and about which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) asked us yesterday to remain silent while knuckling down to the task of production. Furthermore I hold that these causes are remote. As I said a moment ago the war saw colossal fortunes piled up in this country; but even before the advent of war certain classes of our citizens enjoyed special privileges and that was, I believe, one of the conditions responsible for social unrest. The main cause of the trouble is found, it appears to me, in the fact that instead of recognizing agriculture as the basic industry of this country we have been too considerate of our manufacturing interests, afforded them too much protection.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat gave us a wonderful description of the situation that obtains in this country to-day. He gave us some very interesting statistics but he forgot, I fear, to acquaint the House —and I regret that he does not understand what I am saying—with one of the chief facts of the case. When the hon. member for Fort William was explaining his attitude and revealing himself in the colours of a moderate protectionist he forgot, in his comparisons between Germany, England and United States, to mention the respective populations of these countries.

Mr. Speaker, the United States are almost a world unto themselves, compared to England; Germany also has a much larger territory than England. The United States have a poulation of 110,000,000, Germany, 70,000,000 and the population of England, so far as I know, does not reach 50,000,000. I haven't the statistics here and I make no claim to infallibility, but before the war I was a close student of the commercial activity of these countries and, as a British subject I was proud of the fact that England, the smallest in respect of population, the smallest in respect of territory, surpassed, in volume of trade, such countries as the United States and Germany; England's trade was greater than that of the United States despite the fact that the United States had two and a half times the population and four or five the territorial expanse of England.

In my youth whenever I used to hear public men speaking of free trade and protection, I was rather inclined to be an unreserved free trader since I was enamoured of big ideas; I considered that protection penalized trade. Having had occasion, later on, to become better acquainted with public affairs, I realize today that the economic system of this country should be grounded on free trade while at the same time granting to every industry the measure of protection necessary for the fostering of that industry.

I am astonished that the hon. member for Fort William should proclaim himself a moderate protectionist and should then express approval of the Budget brought down by the Finance Minister yesterday when that Budget puts a tax as high as 50 per cent on some articles. I wonder just how stiff a tax would be necessary to convince the hon. member that the tariff was rather high. In his opinion this Budget gives moderate protection. I might tell my hon. friend and colleague that since he changed parties, since he entered the Unionist fold, his views have perhaps undergone a change.

The question of protection and free trade is an old question. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I have practically grown up in the study of this question. This Canada of ours enjoyed prosperity from 1854 to 1866. At that time we had a reciprocity agreement with the United States, but the United States, dissatisfied with our attitude during the Civil War, withdrew from the agreement. In 1878 Sir John Macdonald inaugurated the National Policy. Our country had just entered upon its development; Confederation was in its early stages and the country's industries were just beginning to get a foothold. Elected to office the Liberal party in 1897, made a substantial reduction in the tariff the following year and relieved the people to that extent. With what regret Mr. Speaker, the people of this country recall the days of peace and plenty which blessed Canada under the Liberal Administration, which lasted from 1896 to 1911, fifteen years of peace, of social well-being and of material prosperity without precedent in the annals not only of this, but of any other country.

In 1911 things took a new turn in Canada; the Liberal party, consistent with the doctrine it had always held, sought to give a new impetus to agriculutre, realizing that the greatness and prosperity of this country can only be brought about by the development of agriculture. In a treaty negotiated at Washington by the Finance Minister, the Government of the day made certain concessions, took a step in the direction of free trade. But you are as well aware as I of the turn affairs took in Canada at that time. A powerful association sprung up wielding its influence throughout the country. The voters, it seemed, were not entitled to concern themselves with what the Manufacturers' Association considered its own particular affair. The association waged a war to the death against reciprocity with the result that the former Government went down to defeat and the affairs of the country passed into the hands of a party which, up to that time had espoused the doctrine of protection rather than free trade. What was the consequence of this change, Mr. Speaker? On reading to-day the speech delivered yesterday by the hon. Minister of Finance, I find the practical confirmation of what I said: the total agricultural production in 1910 (page 2555 of the unrevised debates for the 18th May, in the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance) amounted to $663,000,000 in round figures; in 1919 it reached $1,975,000,000, an increase in twelve years of $1,312,000,000, an average gain of $145,000,000 per year. So much for our farm produce. Now let us consult the figures for our manufactured products. In the statistics he gave the House yesterday the Finance Minister did not choose, for his comparison, the same years as in the case of agriculture.

In 1906 our manufactured products were valued at $718,000,000; eleven years later, in 1917, they had attained $3,015,000,000 in value, an increase of $2,297,000,000 in eleven years, a yearly average of $208,000,000. So we find that agricultural products increased, on an average, $145,000,000 in value each year while our manufactured products jumped in value $208,000,000 every twelve months.

I believe the present Government has failed to take sufficient interest in the mainspring of this country's development; that it has been too lavish in its favour to a certain class and too niggardly in this respect towards agriculture. The building of tremendous fortunes both during the war and even prior to the war, thanks to our high tariff wall, is probably one of the causes of the social unrest I was referring to a moment ago.

I would ask each and every member in this House who enjoys the advantage of being conversant with the language in which I have chosen to express my opinions on this matter, even my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) whom the hon. member for Fort William classed as a free trader, to make the following comparison: take a farmer in your district whose holding is valued at $10,000 and who tills his soil with the assistance of his son; after ten years of hard work, when this man has raised his family, what will his investment of $10,000 be worth? The answer is easy; it will still represent $10,000. Take $10,000 to-day and invest it in a factory; in ten years your factory will be worth $100,000. Agriculture has not kept pace with the manufacturing industry of this country.

We hear the complaint, Mr. Speaker, that our country districts are becoming depopulated; but everything has been done to draw people to the cities. The farmers are asked to increase production—for, after all, the law of supply and demand is responsible for the high cost of living—the farmers are asked to increase production but in order to do that they must have more help; besides up to these last few years agriculture was far from being remunerative in this country.

In my opening remarks—and I was sincere—I had the pleasure of congratulating the hon. Minister of Finance; last year and up to the present time I had an opportunity of admiring his predecessor. When I first came into the House I listened with pleasure to the Budget Speech delivered by the Hon. Sir Thomas White and each year it was with renewed pleasure that I listened to him when he made his address to the House.

With our prosperity tumbling and millions being thrown away I used to admire the former minister, and I admire the present minister; however, I recall the ancient myth of the Danaïdes who by their father's order, were condemned to go on forever pouring water into a broken cistern. The present hon. Minister of Finance seems like his predecessor, condemned to constantly fill the public treasury vaults while his colleagues as constantly go on spending in the most thoughtless way. A deficit of $47,000,000 from our railroads; the building of a merchant marine, the profitable operation of which is open to question; millions spent right and left; an overburdened Budget. The member of former days will not recognize the Parliament of Canada for 1920; all the more reason for admiring the efforts of the hon. Minister of Finance while he strives to fill up the treasury, a reproduction of the broken cistern of the Danaïdes.

Mr. Speaker, it was in 1918 that I first came into this House; everything was new to me then. At that time I listened to rather inflamed speeches—we were so to speak on the top of a volcano—however I believe the intentions of my hon. friend's have changed for the better; they have realized I believe, that to promote peace and harmony in this country they should make their appeal to the spirit of good-will, to the spirit of tolerance. The war which was ranging then has come to an end. The post-war problems, however, did not dampen the enthusiasm of the association I alluded to a moment ago; here amongst my papers I discovered a gigantic advertisement that the Manufacturers' Association had published in the Montreal newspaper La Presse on the 17th of March, 1919. In this advertisement the Manufacturers' Association asks: Where are you going to get the revenue? Where are you going to find the $400,000,000 you need? In the pockets of the people of course, by burdening them with further taxes. I do not think the hon. Minister of Finance found his inspiration in this advertisement of last year; however, the same spirit is predominant in the Cabinet, the same spirit which was evident some years ago and is still evident to-day.

Not content with publishing advertisements broadcast in the newspapers this association appealed to manufacturers to enroll in its membership and showed them the advantages of such action. Fortunately the manufacturers of Berthier county recognize the merits of a free trade policy and I take pleasure in reading to the House the answer sent by one of our Berthier manufacturers to Mr. Howard Smith, chairman of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association:

BERTHIERVILLE, P.Q., April 22nd, 1919.

Mr. HOWARD SMITH,
Pres. Canadian Mfg. Assn.,
Montreal, Que.

Dear Sir:—

Referring to your communication regarding a petition to the Government at Ottawa to maintain the present high tariff on raw or finished products now manufactured in Canada, would say that our experience is that we would much prefer a reduction in tariff on our lines.

In fact, if you will remove the tariff on our raw material we are certain we would be in a position to compete with the United States very favorably and if the United States would remove their tariff on our finished product, we could and would go into the United States market to a very great advantage, since we would have 100 million more people to sell to.

We are therefore very much in favor of lower tariff on all of our lines finished or for the raw material at least.

In fact I am quite sure you are of my opinion in case we can so exchange with the United States.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) GEORGE A. SAVOY,
Managing Director.

(Translation.) Mr. Speaker, everybody is not in favour of a high tariff; I believe the great majority of our people desire a revision downwards. Since, as the statistics quoted by the hon. member for Fort William show, the middle classes comprise the major portion of our population, I feel sure that an increase in import duties will bear most heavily on this class of the community. I am almost through, Mr. Speaker. Let me say that I highly appreciate the nice regard shown us by our friends on the Government side in the course of the last, and of the present, session. I am happy to see that the sentiment which sprang up during the war is fast disappearing. I used to wonder if the members from the province of Quebec, who speak the French tongue, who represent the pioneers of this country, those ancestors of ours, who at one time preserved Canada to the British flag, I used to wonder, I say, whether those citizens had the same rights as are granted to other citizens. I believe that the effervescence stirred up by the war has subsided; I believe that all men of good-will are going to work for the cause of union and forbearance and that the energy of each and every one of our citizens will be pledged to the common task of leading our beloved Canada to the promised land of her glorious future.

Mr. S. E. ELKIN (St. John City and counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks this evening I desire in the first place to congratulate the Minister of Finance on the very able way in which he presented his Budget Speech yesterday. I think he is to be highly commended for the frankness with which he placed the country's present position, and particularly the financial situation, before the people. The people for some time have been waiting to know just what the conditions were following this terrible period of five years through which we have just passed. Naturally, with such large expenditures as the Government had to face during those years, it was to be expected that it would take some time to balance the accounts. I am sure that the situation, now that we know the truth, was not so serious as many of us had expected it would be. I think also that the country is to be congratulated on having a Minister of Finance with courage and boldness enough to bring into effect such a Budget as was introduced yesterday. It must have taken considerable courage to go from the beaten track of years into practically a new sphere of taxation, but the minister and his colleagues were convinced, no doubt, that the time had come when the people of Canada should bear the burden imposed by the war and that we should no longer borrow money for the immense revenue we have to raise. In this connection the minister, I think, has brought down a Budget which in every way will make for economy and production. Those who have studied the situation of this country during the last year have realized that if Canada is to take her place in the export markets of the world, if our people are to be prosperous, if posterity is not to be burdened with an enormous debt for years and years to come, then those of us who are directing or helping to direct the policy of the country should immediately get down to business as other countries are doing. Apropos of this, I may quote a little sketch I read the other day:

In popular parlance the "come-back" of John Bull & Sons proved something of a boomerang. It was as if John Bull was saying to the world, with the man who was called upon to deny his published obituary notice, "the report is grossly exaggerated."

American manufacturers have quickly realized that an insistance upon discounting our dollar to the limit was in truth the very killing of the goose that laid the golden egg. That is why many of them accepted Canadian funds, banking their balances within the Dominion until the situation clears.

I am sure that when our financial friends in the United States have had time to digest the Budget Speech of the Minister of Finance they will realize that so far as gold reserves and general trade are concerned, with the courage of the people of Canada there will be no need further to discount the Canadian dollar.

I am glad to hear the Minister of Finance say that if it is possible the business profits tax will be taken off next year. At the present time that tax seems to be about the only thing in the system of taxation that is vexatious to the people. It cannot be denied that the business profits tax is unfair in many ways. We were the only country that put on a profits tax on business without making it retroactive. Every other country that adopted it permitted a company, when it had lost money in one year, to make up the deficit the next year. That scheme was not adopted here. A careful examination of results will show that a great many concerns did not make money during all the war period. Some concerns, particularly those engaged in staple lines, in the early part of 1914 and 1915 incurred losses and they were not permitted in 1916 and 1917 to make them up; they had to pay the full war profits tax on their business as it stood when the tax was levied. During the year 1917, and until the close of that year, prices of all commodities rose anywhere from 125 per cent to 250 per cent, and in some cases 300 per cent, and to a large extent the merchant or manufacturer paying this war profits tax was not able to keep up with the increasing cost of articles which he put into his store or his factory. The result is that to-day a large number of manufacturing houses, wholesale and retail, are borrowing from the banks far more money than they did before. The reason is obvious: a dozen eggs cost to-day two and three times what they did before, and the same thing applies to all commodities which are in stock. I am glad therefore that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues realize this situation and that we have their assurance that if possible the tax may be removed next year.

I have been very much interested in the discussion of the Budget, so far as the debate has gone. As I listened to the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), bearing in mind at the same time what I intended to say, I could not help thinking that we seemed to be in the position of two men who had had an enemy in their home town, and returning from a trip abroad expecting that they should have to do battle with this foe, found him dead. For I cannot see that at the present time there is any one in this House on either side, but particularly in the Opposition benches, who is prepared to voice his long-cherished love of free trade. I believed in free trade once myself, but conditions have changed, and I think we are approaching that stage where men should face things as they are. Even the Western free trader of the past does not exist to-day. We have an immense nation to the south of us, whose manufacturing industries, natural resources, and every phase of commercial life, have been developed to the highest point. This country to the south of us is immensely wealthy. It has been built up under a protectionist policy. How are we going to face competition with these people? The one thing that is bothering us at the present moment is the problem of correcting our balance of trade. There is an indication that the tariff between this country and the United States should be higher and not lower. If we are going to build up a nation within the Empire we must keep out these American goods.

Let me say right here, without attempting to be an alarmist, that I think the people of this country will do well to consider the situation existing between Canada and the United States. We had a sample the other day when Senator Underwood, before a committee of Congress in Washington, uttered what was almost tantamount to a threat when he said that unless certain commodities exported from this country to the United States were made more accessible to those people the United States would shut down on Canada's imports of coal and other things which we take to a large extent from that country. That situation is serious. It is more serious than would appear from casual observation. It is time that the people of Canada were self-sustaining; it is time that we developed our natural resources so that we can be a nation within ourselves and be not dependent on our neighbours to the south for anything but possibly the luxuries which, in time of stress, we could get along without.

I am interested in a comparison which shows the resources and the courage of this country. The revenue of Canada from 1899-1900 to 1918-1919 has increased in the following way:

	Revenue.
1899-100	$ 51,000,000
1909-1910	101,000,000
1918-1919	313,000,000

This year we expect to raise, through the resourcefulness of the Canadian people, $720,000,000. Surely this is an indication to the world of the courage and reserve powers of the Canadian people.

Passing now to the only advocates of free trade that exist in the House at the present moment—because, after listening to the words which have fallen from the Opposition or Liberal benches, there apparently is no one, other than the hon. member for Brome, who is willing to take the responsibility of absolute free trade—we come to the Western Grain Growers, who want to make immediate and sweeping reductions in the tariff, are fond of picturing Canadian manufacturers as a small group of selfish men who support the tariff policy solely in their own interests. These grain growers ask, "why should this privileged class be permitted to levy toll on all other people in the country?" I would like to make reply that the following benefit by a protective tariff just as much as the manufacturers:

1. 600,000 men and women who work in Canadian factories.

2. The wholesalers, retailers, and their employees who distribute the products of Canadian factories.

3. The farmers, who find a market in Canada for 80 per cent of everything they produce.

4. The railways and steamship companies, and their employees who carry Canadian goods.

5. The bankers, brokers, and commission agents, and their employees who help to finance Canadian industries.

6. The innumerable investors who own stock in Canadian manufacturing concerns but who are in no sense manufacturers.

7. The professional classes (doctors, lawyers, dentists, teachers, clergymen), insurance agents, the publishers, and all others who make their living directly or indirectly from industrial concerns and the industrial population.

Canada does not have a protective tariff because a few manufacturers want it, Canada has a protective tariff because the nation wants it. The nation has so expressed itself at the polls time after time under both Conservative and Liberal Governments, during the last forty years. Is the policy of this country to be determined by the majority, or by the farmers and politicians who have little at stake but unwholesome notoriety.

Protection! Could there be any more flagrant abuse of the word than by the farmers themselves. They demanded the Canadian Wheat Board, practically pooled their interests to prevent competition and at a crisis in foodstuffs demanded a price from Canada and the world. What about $3 wheat? Granted it cost more to produce. So do manufactured goods. The farmer knows there is more than a tariff form of protection. Pooling in a world shortage is one other way, and he took it.

In passing I wish to make reference to the fact that we have a member, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), who came to the House under what is known as the referendum and recall. I think that form of election to the House of Commons is based on a very dangerous and retrograde principle. Why should a man come to this House elected with the idea of doing what he thinks best for the country all the way down till he reaches his own constituents, to be at the beck and call of five, ten or sixteen men who may constitute the committee which asked him to agree to the referendum and recall? That form of election is a part of the policy of the Farmers' party and it will be put into force if they get into power. It is well that the people of this country should consider that fact very carefully before the next election, for the reason that we cannot expect to have independent thought and action on the part of our law makers if they are to be at the beck and call of a few party politicians at home.

At a time like this when there are already a number of people in Canada out of work, it is the obvious duty of every man who can hand out a job to do so. The man who can but won't is not playing the game. He is not half so bad, however, as the man who deliberately hires workmen in some other country to do a job that could be done just as well by Canadian workmen.

There is a company operating in the Canadian West which is an amalgamation of farmers. It boasts of 36,000 shareholders, all western farmers. It owns 300 interior elevators, and operates a 2,500,000-bushel terminal elevator at Fort William. It owns a timber limit, runs its own sawmill to supply its shareholders with lumber, and prints its own journal. It undertakes to purchase for its shareholders on the co-operative plan practically everything that is used on the farm. In all this it is to be commended for the enterprise it is displaying, but it certainly gave Canadian workpeople a raw deal when picking out the goods it decided to advertise in its mail order catalogue. The catalogue of the United Grain Growers, Limited, is a well printed book of over one hundred pages covering everything from binder twine to sewing machines. It is barely possible that some of the goods shown therein are made in Canada, but if so their origin is carefully concealed; every single article whose origin is made clear by the illustrations in the catalogue is shown to be made in the United States. The ploughs, harrows and cultivators, all come from La Crosse, Wisconsin;

the mowers, rakes, tedders, stackers, and wrenches, come from Peoria, Ill.; the portable elevators and washing machines come from Pontiac, Ill.; the wagons, from Nashua, Ind.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. ELKIN: Certainly.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Does he know why the implements sold by the Canadian Grain Growers' Association come from the United States? I don't suppose the hon. member is aware, so I will tell him.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that what he proposes to do would not be submitting a question.

Mr. ELKIN: I do not know the authority for the statement, but it has been rumoured that the Canadian Grain Growers' are interested in some of these factories in the United States. I cannot say whether that is the case or not.

Th practice of the western farmer, when buying an implement from a Canadian manufacturer, is to ask for credit which may vary from six months to three years according to the kind of implement bought. When he buys through the United Grain Growers Limited, he sends in cash with the order and the United Grain Growers Limited then sends the cash out of the country. This point should be borne carefully in mind when western farmers complain of the high prices they have to pay for Canadian implements as compared with imported implements.

If every shareholder in the United Grain Growers, Limited, is the head of a family and the family purchases its supplies as far as it can from the United Grain Growers, Limited, then that company must do a business comparable to what would be done by a departmental store that enjoyed a monopoly of the retail trade in a city of 125,000. These Grain Growers have it in their power, therefore, to help very materially in solving the unemployment problem by handling only Canadian-made goods. But when they deliberately handle nothing but imported goods it forces one to the conclusion, taking the most charitable view of it, that the troubles of their fellow-Canadians give them no concern. Every dollar they send out of Canada for goods that could just as well be made here represents at least fifty cents taken off our Canadian factory pay-roll to be added to the factory pay-roll of the United States. And these are the people who are insisting that in the redress of grievances they shall have priority.

The farmers are not the only people in Canada with a grievance. What of the artisan classes temporarily out of employment as the result of the cessation of all war industries? What of the wage-earners and salaried people in general who are struggling with the problem of increased cost of living? What of organized labour with its demand for a shorter working day? Are the grievances of the farmers so pressing that they must be remedied before we deal with the grievances of other classes? Are Canadian farmers, as a class, so badly up against it that returned soldiers and unemployed work people must stand aside until the tariff is adjusted? Have prices of agricultural products been held down to that point where farmers have barely been able to make a living? Have farmers been taxed more heavily than other people? Have they been called to contribute more generously to the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross, than people living in our towns and cities? Are they struggling under the load of Victory Bonds they are carrying—or income taxes?

It should be the aim of Parliament to remedy every legitimate grievance, giving attention first to those that are most pressing. If the case of the farmers is to be given priority, then let the farmers show some cause more convincing than the loudness of the howl they are putting up. What taxes do they pay to swell the federal revenues other than those levied by means of the tariff? When other people are paying taxes under the tariff, and income and profit taxes besides, how do the farmers justify their demand that they be relieved of taxes altogether? If their grievance is a real one how do they account for the fact that there is such a brisk demand for western farm land, with advancing prices? If there were a movement away from the land there would be some colour to their argument, but the movement is all the other way. The Grain Growers' Guide, in soliciting advertising from manufacturers, represents western farmers as being more prosperous than ever they were before. In justification of that statement it instances the fact that in one year 17,000 new motor cars were sold to the farmers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Advocates of free trade or one-sided trade are prone to refer to manufacturers as a "privileged class". They repudiate the idea that the tariff is of any benefit to the farmers; according to them, the "beneficiaries" of the tariff are all to be found among those who dwell in towns and cities. In tariff matters, they claim, the policy of the Government is dictated by our industrial centres, and they issue solemn warning that some day a long suffering public will arise in its might and sweep the pernicious principle of protection into the discard.

As a matter of fact, the long suffering public is made up of those city dwellers who have tolerated a system whereby the farmer has two votes to their one. The farmer always has dominated in Parliament and in our provincial legislatures, a fact which may explain why it is that, in all our plans of taxation, he escapes with an easier load than that which the townsman is called upon to carry. If the farmer persists in an attempt to get from under altogether, and leave the whole load to be carried by the townsman, it is not unlikely that the latter will arise in his might and sweep aside the pernicious principle whereby he has been deprived of his just representation and voting power.

The following comparative tables are illuminating. The figures are the official estimates of population given for each constituency after the last redistribution.

Manitoba.

Winnipeg Centre	58,903
Winnipeg North	45,682
Winnipeg South	35,525
	140,110
Dauphin	23,371
Lisgar	25,978
Macdonald	20,802
Neepawa	23,913
Portage	22,059
Provencher	23,996
	140,119

It will thus be seen that there are three members for 140,000 city people and six members for 140,000 country people. Now let me cite the figures for the Province of Ontario:

Ontario.

Parkdale	59,609
Toronto Centre	54,762
Toronto East	53,712
Toronto North	51,318
Toronto South	43,956
Toronto West	57,804
	321,161

Ontario South	23,865
Oxford South	22,294
Peel	22,102
Perth South	18,947
Peterborough East	15,499
Prince Edward	17,150
Wellington North	22,292
	319,373

According to the Ontario figures we find that six city members represent a population greater than the population represented by sixteen rural members.

Now let me take the Province of Quebec:

Quebec.

Here, there are 24 members for a population of 487,440, and only 11 members for a population of 490,818. Why should it be a case of one man two votes in the country and one man one vote in the city? Which is the privileged class?

The hon. member from Brome (Mr. McMaster) said this afternoon that protection was an iniquitous form of taxation; that it had not dóne any good to the country; that we should abolish it as soon as possible, and that if his party came into power he would be prepared to act on that principle. I want to point out as a matter of record that by means of the tariff—I do not say under the tariff, but directly as a result of its having been so effective in this country—over 616 manufacturing concerns in United States have crossed the border and established branches in Canada. If there had been no tariff against the United States, it would not have been necessary for the manufacturers of that country to come to Canada; for they could have supplied the requirements of our market from the idle capacity of their parent plants. These 616 branch factories employ about 90,000 people in Canada, to whom they pay annually in wages about $90,000,000. If each employee, on an average, has three dependents, it means that over one-quarter of a million people are supported by factories that owe their existence entirely to the tariff. Some are demanding that the tariff wall be broken down, and that Canada commence to work towards the ultimate establishment of free trade with the United States. If these demands are granted, will any more branches of American factories be established in Canada? Will all those which are now here remain?

I would like to place on Hansard a few figures in connection with this migration of American factories to Canada and in doing so, I shall have regard to the statistics for the years 1905, 1915 and 1917:

American factories with branches in Canada for the years 1905, 1915, 1917.

Establishments	15,796
Capital	$846,585,023
Employees on salaries	36,496
Salaries	$ 30,224,086
Employees on wages	356,034
Wages	$134,375,925
Value of products	$718,352,603
1915—
Establishments	21,303
Capital	$1,994,103,272
Employees on salaries	52,683
Salaries	$ 60,308,293
Employees on wages	462,200
Wages	$ 229,456,210
Value of products	$1,407,137,140
1917—
Establishments	34,380
Capital	$2,772,517,680
Employees on salaries	73,598
Salaries	$ 95,983,506
Employees on wages	619,473
Wages	$ 457,245,456
Value of products	$3,015,506,869

These figures must be conclusive evidence that a protective tariff, a protective policy, a policy which protects the infant industry, has been well worth while for Canada.

Having regard to the fact that this Government and possibly some other governments have not been unmindful of the consideration that a moderate protective tariff is an advisable tariff and that they have realized that conditions have so changed from time to time in this country as to warrant a reduction in tariff, I wish to place on Hansard a record of some of the tariff reductions which have been made since 1911. In doing so, I direct attention to the fact that there has been no reduction in the United States tariff since the introduction of the Underwood tariff in 1913. But at present there are pending in the United States a large number of Bills which will change the situation there. The figures are as follows:

REDUCTIONS IN THE CANADIAN CUSTOMS TARIFF SINCE THE YEAR 1911.
Since Underwood Tariff became effective 1913 no reductions U.S. tariff dues.

Tariff Item.	—	Old General Tariff.	New General Tariff.

Is Canada to be the only free trade country with free trade a misnomer as it is at the present time? Free trade, as we understand it to-day, or as it might be possible under our Farmer and Liberal friends, would be a one-sided trade.

In view of the demands which western farmers are making that our Government make an immediate and substantial all-round reduction in the customs tariff, it is only proper that we should consider what our Allies are doing!

The importation of manufactured goods into Great Britain is subject to restrictions which constitute very high protection.

France is not lowering her tariff; on the contrary she is shutting out the goods of other countries by a system of import licenses.

Italy, like Great Britain and France, is restricting imports.

The Premier of South Africa has announced that the tariff of that country, heretofore designed for revenue only, will be increased to protect home industries.

Nothing has been heard to warrant the belief that any lowering of the tariff is even under consideration by Australia, New Zealand, Newfoundland, Japan, Brazil or Portugal.

In the United States the Republican party has now a majority in both the Senate and Congress and it has always supported a high tariff. The National Industrial Conference Board of the United States reported —"That a more highly protective tariff will be advocated . . . . is practically certain," and twenty-six Bills now before Congress increasing the tariff.

The farmer, or one-sided trader might well be challenged to point to a single country in the world to-day which is proposing to lower its tariff at this critical time. And why is this? Because the above-mentioned countries are determined to reconstruct their industries on a peace basis, to manufacture for themselves what they need, and to provide employment for their soldiers and war workers.

Is Canada to be the only country in the world to throw down its safeguards? Is she going to ignore the great lesson taught by the war, that a nation must maintain within its own boundaries all the elements of self-protection and self-support? Are we to build a nation within the Empire—a Canadian nation, not a dependent; a nation self-sustaining in days of need as well as plenty. Our policy with our immense natural resources and people of initiative should be national, not class.

Referring for a moment to the latest Budget brought in by the Finance Minister of Australia, the new tariff, it is said for the first time follows the Canadian precedent in having three distinct schedules of duties —British Preferential, Intermediate and General Tariff columns. The British Preferential rates came immediately into operation in so far as goods and products manufactured in the United Kingdom are concerned.

The Finance Minister of Australia states:

> While it is admitted that no Parliament can bind the succeeding Parliament to any prospective customs duties, yet the new principle of a "deferred scale of duties" to become operative at fixed dates (mainly on January 1, 1921, and the same date in 1922) has been introduced into the Tariff Bill. The deferred duty proposals comprise twenty-two items, and their incidence bears chiefly upon iron and steel products, vessels trading in Australian waters, and certain lines of fuse and explosives. The minister explained that the deferred duty principle was to give definite encouragement to investors to establish industries within Australia, and quoted instances of the probable establishment of industrial plants when sufficient protection was to some extent assured.

I might point out a few features as to the Australian tariff. Pig iron was free until the new tariff came in; to-day the general tariff is forty shillings per ton. Pipes cast and wrought per ton, forty-eight shillings before this tariff came down; the Finance Minister of Australia has raised the duty to eighty shillings. Rails and other items in that category which were thirty-five shillings per ton have been raised to seventy-five shillings, eighty-five shillings and ninety-five shillings. And so on throughout this whole tariff. The Australian Government,—and a more or less Labour Government at that,—have at last realized that if Australia is to be a big industrial country these new industries must be protected, and they have gone at it in a wholesale way. Further than that, the value for duty is to be taken as the fair market value of the goods in the principal markets of the country whence the same were exported in the usual and ordinary commercial acceptation of the term and free on board at the port of export in such country, with a further addition of ten per cent on such market value.

Dealing with free trade as it concerns our transportation problem, transportation was a large issue in the Reciprocity campaign of 1911. It is a bigger issue to-day, because since then Canada has begun the operation of the Canadian National railways, a great transcontinental system. She has already spent hundreds of millions upon these enterprises, and may have to spend many millions more. Her only chance to prevent that investment becoming a dead loss is to keep a steady flow of traffic moving from east to west, and from west to east. If ever it becomes diverted to a north and south direction, her transportation plant might as well be scrapped.

Under reciprocity or free trade that is what would inevitably happen. In fact western farmers are quite frank in the expression of their desire to market their grain in Minneapolis and Chicago, and to buy their requirements in manufactured goods from the Middle and Western States. Their whole effort at present is to encourage the buying of United States goods in preference to Canadian. Inferentially, therefore, their whole effort is to make it difficult or impossible to operate our transcontinental railways at a profit. These railways were built with the money of the people of Canada, in order that there might be opened up for settlement a territory whose population are now enjoying marked prosperity. Without the railways there would have been no West. Without the taxes cheerfully paid year after year by Canadians in the East there would have been no railways. Is the partnership arrangement, that has proven so mutually profitable, now to be terminated simply because of the unwillingness of the West to pay its share of the operating expenses? And must the whole investment be wiped out in consequence?

It is essential that Canadian credit should be maintained at the high standard at which it now is. It may be necessary at some day in the future for public works or for other capital account to borrow money. When Canada goes to her banker, fortunately the Canadian people at the present time, and asks for a loan they will want to know two things: First, what is she going to do with the money she is asking for, and second, what sources of income has she that will justify the belief that she will be able to repay? Canada can hardly borrow money when she has to admit that she is going to give it away, or is going to use it in meeting interest charges on what she already owes. Her chances of success would be better if she could show that she was going to employ it in useful public works, but even then she would have to be in a position to prove that her revenue would be equal to the task of carrying all existing obligations, plus interest and sinking fund on the new loan she was trying to negotiate. Faced with the direct question "What is your estimated revenue for the year ending March, 1921, or 1922, and from what sources?" how would she answer were she at this juncture to enact any measure of free trade? She could show that under her present tariff, with the addition of the special war tariff and taxes, after meeting all claims for drawbacks, she was able to meet all her obligations for the year. But what guarantee would there be that she could do as well under free trade? At the very time when she absolutely must maintain her credit, is she deliberately to invite refusal, if need be, by adopting fiscal changes that will make it impossible for her to give any satisfactory assurances as to what her revenues will amount to? If she cannot borrow money for public works, and if, in consequence, there ensues a long period of widespread unemployment, what is the effect going to be on Victory Bonds? With business depressed and people out of work, the bonds will undoubtedly come onto the market in large volume, and that in turn will depreciate their value. Is Canada to be a party to an arrangement that will double-cross her own people who have come so nobly to her assistance in financing the war? I think sometimes governments find it a difficult lesson to learn that future governmental revenues are based entirely on the present development of the nation's resources, and development can only be attained through the attraction of capital into enterprise by the inducement of satisfactory and reasonable returns on the capital invested.

I think it would be advisable for the Minister of Finance, if he can see his way clear, to impose a more moderate rate of income tax next year. It seems to me that the difficulty of collecting the small tax hardly makes it worth while, and the other tax is so heavy as to be almost exorbitant, and at times defeats its purpose.

I am sorry it has been necessary for me to take up so much time this evening, but I felt that, not having declared myself before, I should take a stand before this Parliament and before the country and my constituents. It seems to me that this is a time when all members of Parliament must shoulder the responsibility which rests upon them. After all the country looks to some extent to its law-makers sitting in this House to lead the way. We have a long journey before us in Canada, but it is a journey on which we can see our way. We have great resources. We have a courageous people. We are not so old but that the courage and the faith of our forefathers still remain in us. We are not so old but that we can remember many of the large developments that have taken place in this country. We have before us always the record of the past five years. Surely in Canada we have nothing to be ashamed of. We can look forward with a great deal of confidence to the mastering of the problems that face us financially, and in nation-building; and I do hope that this debate will be characterized by its high national tone.

After all, there is nothing so important at the present time in this country as that Canada shall stand higher than she has ever stood before. There is no real difference between the two sides of this House. The difference is purely imaginery, because while we have one side talking protection, the other side is talking partial free trade but means protection. This is a time in our history for us to forget to a large extent our party differences. The Government have many problems to face, and it behooves all of us who are in the fortunate position to represent constituencies in this Parliament at this critical time to maintain the general interest, not the interest of a class.

Mr. J. F. JOHNSTON: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the farmers of Western Canada wish to market their wheat at Minneapolis and also to purchase their machinery there. If I heard him correctly, he is absolutely wrong in his statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Hon. members should not abuse the privilege which they have of asking a question by rising presumably for that purpose and taking advantage of the opportunity to interject a statement or expression of opinion. By a strict interpretation of the rules of debate these hon. members should be considered as having exhausted their right to speak.

Mr. D'ANJOU (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House this evening I have no intention of setting forth a definition of protection or free trade. I merely wish to say that I, personally, am in favour of whatever tariff changes may benefit the country and that I abide by the resolution passed at the great Liberal convention of August, 1919. Therefore, since the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) contains a miniature likeness of that resolution I shall take pleasure in voting for the amendment. The hon. member from St. John, N.B. stated, amongst other things, that once upon a time he had been a free trader; he forgot to mention, however, that at one time he had been a Liberal also and that while he had altered his mind he had changed parties too, which explains how our former free trader has become converted to the doctrine of protection. A goodly portion of his speech was devoted to attacks against the farming community. Like many another hon. member on the Government side the hon. gentleman from St. John, N.B. seems to fear the farmers' movement; no doubt he despairs of ever being re-elected to a seat in this House, a lot which will assuredly befall the great majority of the hon. gentlemen on your right, Mr. Speaker.

I myself am not a farmer; I have no brief for the farmers; the important Farmer party in this House is well able to take care of its own interests. However, as the representative of a riding which is distinctly agricultural in character, I deem it my duty to challenge the statements of any hon. member who starts, hammer and tongs, after the farmers of this country.

The hon. gentleman from St. John, N.B. said that the farmers paid no taxes on their profits, that their profits were exempt. The hon. member, no doubt, is interested in a few mighty corporations and he is not very keen on sharing his profits with the Government. Of course he is perfectly willing to share all honour with the Government, but he would rather keep his profits to himself. He resembles all those profiteers who, during the war, amassed fortunes with the help of this Government. During the war while our people were bowed down in pain and suffering, while so many of our boys were shedding their blood on the battlefields of old Europe, these gentlemen —we have several of them in this House— at the head of powerful corporations were taking in millions; at that time, I repeat, blood was flowing in torrents on the fields of Flanders and other battle grounds. So it seems to me the hon. member for St. John, N.B., has no right to complain of the farmers.

During the present session it has been insinuated that the farmers were the worst of war profiteers, that the war had enriched them tremendously. Like every other mere mortal the farmer has suffered from the rise in the cost of commodities; he has had to pay more for labour and for agricultural machinery; consequently he is entitled to dispose of his wares at a little higher price. It was brought out in a recent debate, particularly by my hon. friend, the member for L'Islet (Mr. Fafard) that profiteering is not to be found amongst the farmers, but amongst the middlemen; it is the middleman who goes from farm to farm buying up all the produce at ridiculously low prices and later sells this same produce in the public markets at a fabulous figure. As the hon. member for l'Islet explained, potatoes bought last fall for between 90 cents and $1.10 a bag were later sold at $5 and $6 a bag. Did that money go into the farmer's pocket? No, it went into the pockets of the middlemen who hoarded this produce in cold storage plants; the middlemen that this Government wants to shield—there you have your profiteers. They are the men who deserve the Government's wrath; not only should they be thrown into prison, they should be hanged. That is the treatment meted out to profiteers in certain countries of Europe.

According to the statement of the Minister of Finance himself the country is confronted with a pyramid of debt. The people of Canada will be astounded to hear this statement from the lips of the minister. However, there is nothing surprising about it after all the guilty extravagance indulged in by this Government during the last five years. Truly the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) must feel satisfied; at last his dream has come true; the country is bankrupt; we are down to our last farthing.

On March 31st, 1920, our national debt was $3,014,483,774.12. I repeat, there is no room here for surprise. For my part, during the last and preceding sessions I stated that, although not absolutely opposed to our participation in the war, I decidedly was opposed to this country taking an unreasonable and irrational part in the hostilities; that is my position still. We see to-day the result of this irrational participation in the war. Whatever may be said, this war was not fought for the defence of civilization and liberty; even now that the League of Nations has become a reality, we can very well see that the last war, like most others, was fought for commercial supremacy and world domination.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) declared that the paternal Government of which he is such an ardent supporter had striven with every means at its disposal to promote agriculture in this country; indeed, he said, the Estimates for the present year give $5,000,000 to agriculture—however the Estimates include $12,000,000 for military purposes. Apparently the member for Fort William is satisfied with this vote of $12,000,000 for military purposes since he finds $5,000,000 sufficient for agriculture. Well, I would like to see those $12,000,000 added to the $5,000,000 already voted; thus agriculture would have $17,000,000 and the army nothing. The war we have just been through cost us enough in blood and treasure. While the war was perhaps not fought for the defence of freedom and civilization it was fought for the destruction of Prussian militarism, and I maintain that when, at the cost of untold sacrifices we have succeeded in crushing militarism in Germany, is no time to introduce militarism into this country. I do not know what opinions the hon. member for Fort William may hold. I say that instead of voting $12,000,000 for military purposes the Government should have given the money to agriculture, should have used it, as I have often asked, for the establishment of new experimental farms, for schools of agriculture and not for military schools, for an army of tillers of the soil and not for an army of soldiers. I have not changed my attitude and even if some hon. member on the Government side should accuse me of disloyalty I would not care one whit; I have the courage of my convictions and no one will deter me from taking my stand openly.

When I asked the hon. minister for an experimental farm in Rimouski county he told me that he could not grant my request because the Government lacked the necessary funds. Under cover of the policy of economy the Government is doing things which are neither to the advantage of the country nor in the country's interests. Among other things I was promised nearly $30,000 for the completion of the port at Rimouski. This undertaking was in the interest not only of Rimouski county alone, but of a very important district of the province of Quebec; it would have been equally advantageous to the neighbouring county represented by my hon. friend from Matane (Mr. Pelletier). Well, on the plea of economy, I was refused $16,800, and now the Government is going to spend $12,000,000, perhaps $20,000,000, to establish military encampments all through the country. I do not countenance this policy; I am in favour of economy, but economy well understood. I have said before in the course of the present session and I repeat here to-day, that the Government can never spend too much money for the promotion of agriculture; since agriculture is the principal industry of this country and will help us, more than any other thing, to overcome the difficulties which beset our country to-day.

The spirit of unrest is stalking through this country, unrest caused in great part by the high cost of living; still the Budget reveals no attempt on the part of the Government to bring relief to the people.

If I am in favour of the amendment presented by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, it is because I am convinced that the adoption of this amendment and the carrying out of the policy therein enunciated would bring about an improvement in the present situation and the lowering of the cost of living.

Over production is certainly one of the best ways of doing this, for with us as in many other countries, consumption has increased enormously and production has decreased. There should at least be equilibrium between the two, and in order to bring that about, production and over-production should be encouraged by all possible means. You hear much said in blame of the farmers, but during the war we were very well pleased to see them bend all their energies towards intensified production, so as to feed not only the Canadian soldier at the front but our people at home. The most rational and most efficient way of encouraging agriculture and over-production is to put the farmer in the way of obtaining more cheaply farming implements among other things, by removing the customs duty from them, and also, as asked for in the amendments, from certain necessaries of life.

But the present Government are not in power for the benefit of the agricultural class any more than of other classes in the country save one. The present Government are in power for their own advantage and that of their supporters. This Government have the support of the profiteers, of those who were enriched by the war, of the namby-pamby young fellows who paraded the streets of Ottawa, Montreal and elsewhere during the war on a $10, $12 or $15 a day pay, while the workmen's sons were having their backs broken in the trenches of Flanders.

I would like to say a word as to the railway policy. Like all the hon. members who sit on this side of the House, I have always been, and am still, opposed to the operating of the railways by the Government, and the events have proved that we were right. Before the Government came to the conclusion of finally adopting this policy, we had the examples of England and the United States, which in trying to apply this policy had met with monumental failure. Consequently, when the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) came to tell this House that, after a period of nine months, his administration of the Government railways showed a deficit of $45,000,000, the hon. members on this side of the House were not surprised. For my part, I still hold that such a policy is not calculated to benefit the country, but rather to benefit certain railway magnates, close friends of the Government, and who share their advantages, perhaps, with certain members of this House who advocated this policy and supported it in Parliament.

I do not intend to occupy much of the time of the House. I would like though to say a few words as to the general course followed by the Government. There is no doubt but that we are governed somewhat according to the Russian or Prussian system. Autocracy reigns supreme in this country, and as was so truly observed by the hon. leader of the Opposition in the magnificent speech which he delivered the other evening, we have come to the point of using secret diplomacy. Such is the new ill-use of power which this Government has added to their guilt. They decided, without consulting Parliament, that is, without consulting the Canadian people through their representatives, to send an emissary to Washington; and when everything was done, they came and said to Parliament, "Without your authorization, without consulting you as representatives of the people, we have decided this, and to-day, whether you are willing or not, the thing is done, and has to be abided by." A fine way forsooth of governing a democratic country; a fine way of respecting the rights of the people! I for one have already had occasion to protest against such ill-use of power on the part of the Government. I find the Canadian nation a long-suffering people. It seems to me that had such abuse of power taken place in some other country, its government would long have ceased to exist. The Canadian people are good, they are patient, but their hour shall come before long, and whatever be the government then sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, be they a Liberal Government—as I am convinced they will be—or be they a Farmers' Government, they will be a vast improvement upon what we have to-day.

We already knew that the Government was no longer trusted by the people, but we had further evidence of the fact the other evening when the vote was taken upon the motion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's protesting against the appointment of a Canadian representative at Washington.

Then how could this Government have the confidence of the people, seeing the iniquitous way in which they won the election and the fraudulent methods they used to get into power? No wonder that, from the start, the people had no confidence in them and the Government did not act in such a way as to win their confidence. There remains only one thing for them to do, i.e., to pack up their trunks and to appear before the electorate. The people are anxious to look upon the congenial faces of these hon. gentlemen opposite when they seek re-election; anxious to stare at these renegades who sit at your right, Mr. Speaker, and who betrayed them. I am sure that the answer of the people will be a condemnation of this Government who usurped the executive power and who committed all the abuses of which an autocratic Government might be guilty. It does not matter what Government will be formed at that time: either a good Liberal administration having at its head the eminent and able leader of the Liberal Opposition or a Government composed of our friends the Farmers who have a very distinguished leader in the person of the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar). What we, of the Opposition want is that the Government come and ask the people for a new mandate. We are sure that the verdict will be one of reprobation and condemnation, because the people who were deceived and shocked in their most intimate feelings, want to take their revenge and the revenge will be unsparing. I am sure, there might not remain ten of the present members sitting now at your right, Mr. Speaker. The people will elect representatives not like some hon. members of the present parliament who owe their election to the extorting of soldier votes, but who shall have been chosen freely and sincerely through a better franchise Act than that which the Government wishes to impose upon the House now. I am positive that the people will grant their confidence to hon. members of this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, for they have always worked hard in the interest of the country and this they will continue to do until the Government decide to appeal to the people.

On motion of Mr. F. R. Lalor (Haldimand) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Thursday, May 20, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS TABLED.

Annual Report of the Department of Railways and Canals.—Hon. J. D. Reid.

Reports of the Proceedings of the Canadian War Records Office, covering the period from 1916 to 1919, and including the Report of the Executive Committee of the Canadian War Memorial Fund.—Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden.

CRIMINAL CODE (FRENCH VERSION) AMENDMENT.

Rt. Hon. C. J. DOHERTY moved that Bill No. 131 (Letter C of the Senate) to amend the Criminal Code (French Version) be read the first time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister please explain the purpose of this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill is intended to correct a number of errors in translation that have been discovered in the Criminal Code; errors dating back practically to the time of the passing of the Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

EX-SENATOR P. A. CHOQUETTE.

Mr. FRIPP:

1. At what date was the resignation of ex-Senator P. A. Choquette placed in the hands of the Government?
2. What were the reasons given by ex-Senator Choquette for sending in his resignation?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to No. 1: in the month of December last; in reply to No. 2: no reasons were assigned.

SIR WILLIAM MACKENZIE.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

How many times has the private car of Sir William Mackenzie travelled on the Canadian National Railway system within the last two years?

Hon. Mr. REID: The Government have no information as to the details of operation of each individual car on Canadian National railways.

FREIGHT BOATS ON INLAND WATERS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton):

1. Does the Government intend to place freight boats built and owned by them on our inland waters during the present season?
2. If so, how many of said vessels will be so placed?
3. If the National Merchant Marine Organization has the handling of the Government-owned boats, what reason, if any, do they give for not using some of the vessels under their control in the carrying trade on our Great Lakes?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. Boats owned by the Government through its Government Merchant Marine are being operated by that organization in connection with the Canadian National railways as will appear in the public interest. Cannot say at present time what steamers may operate on the Inland Waters during present season.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

BIOLOGICAL BOARD.

Mr. TURGEON:

1. Who are the members of the Biological Board of Canada?
2. How are they appointed and by whom?
3. What salaries are they paid for their services?
4. Who is chairman and who is secretary of the board?
5. Has the Commissioner of Fisheries any connection with the board?
6. Where are biological investigations carried on under the board?
7. What scientific staff did they employ last year, and where?
8. Does the Fisheries Branch of the Naval Service give the board any fishery or other problems to investigate?
9. If so, what are some of these fishery problems?
10. Are the services of the Biological Branch of any value to the Fisheries Branch, and to the fishing industry?
11. What reports are issued on the work of the Biological Board and its staff?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Professor E. E. Prince, Commissioner of Fisheries, Chairman; Dr. A. P. Knight, Representative of the Department of Naval Service; Professor L. W. Bailey, Representative of the University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, N.B.; Professor A. H. R. Buller, Representative of the University of Manitoba, Winnipeg; Reverend Canon V. A. Huard, Representative of the Laval University, Museum of Public Instruction, Quebec, P.Q.; Professor J. P. McMurrich, Representative of the University of Toronto, Toronto; Dr. A. H. MacKay, Representative of the Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S.; Professor R. F. Ruttan, President of the Royal Society and representative of McGill University, Montreal.

2. Two members are nominated and appointed by the minister and represent the Department of the Naval Service on the board. The remaining six members are nominated by the several universities in the different provinces, and represent such provincial universities on the board.

3. None of the members of the Biological Board are paid any salary or honorarium for their services.

4. Professor Edward E. Prince is chairman and acts are secretary.

5. Answered by No. 1.

6. The Biological investigations are mainly carried on on the Atlantic coast at the Marine Biological Station, St. Andrews, N. B., and on the Pacific coast at the Marine Biological Station, Departure Bay near Nanaimo, B.C., but investigatons are also carried on at various points on both coasts and the Great Lakes by members of the scientific staff told off for special work. Oyster investigations are being carried on in Richmond Bay and other P.E.I. oyster grounds. Lobster investigations have been carried on at points extending from Gaspé to the Bay of Fundy. Shad investigations have been carried on in various Nova Scotia rivers and special researches have been conducted in Miramichi Bay and off Cape Breton shores, while on the Great Lakes investigations have been carried on upon the supply of pearl mussels for the button industry, also on the whitefish fisheries and other cognate subjects.

7. The Scientific Staff consists of seventeen (17) trained scientific workers at St. Andrews and 15 scientific workers at the Pacific Station at Nanaimo. Their names are: Dr. A. P. Knight, Kingston, Ont.; Dr. A. G. Huntsman, Toronto, Ont.; Prof. L. W. Bailey, Fredericton, N.B.; Prof. Phil Cox, Fredericton, N.B.; Prof. C. J. Connolly, Antigonish, N.S.; Prof. J. W. Mavor, Toronto (now of Union College, N.Y); Prof. Alexander Vachon, Laval University, Quebec, P.Q.; Dr. F. S. Jackson, Montreal, P. Q.; Miss E. Shanley, Montreal, P.Q.; Miss B. K. Mossop, London, Ont.; Dr. Louis Cross, Montreal, P.Q.; Miss J. McFarlane, Toronto, Ont.; Mr. A. H. Leim, Toronto, Ont.; Miss M. Anderson, Fredericton, N.B.; Dr. W. G. Savage, England; Mr. D. A. MacKay, Ottawa, Ontario;Professor Perry, Wolfville, N.S.

The Scientific Staff at Nanaimo, B.C., include fifteen (15) trained scientists:—Professor McLean Fraser, Nanaimo, B.C.; Mrs. Fraser, Nanaimo, B.C.; Mr. Cyril Berkley, Nanaimo, B.C.; Mrs. Berkley, Nanaimo, B.C.; Prof. C. H. O'Donoghue, Winnipeg, Man; Mrs. O'Donoghue, Winnipeg, Man.; Dr. A. H. Hutchinson, Vancouver, B.C.; Miss I. Mounce, Vancouver, B.C.; Prof. J. J. R. McLeod, Toronto, Ont.; Mr. T. S. Oldroyd, Stanford, Cal.; Mrs. Oldroyd, Stanfard, Cal.; Prof. F. J. Lewis, Edmonton, Alta.;Miss G. Tuttle, Edmonton, Alta.; Mr. George Henderson, Duncans, B.C.; Mrs. Henderson, Duncans, B.C.

Of these scientific workers Dr. Huntman and Dr. Fraser receive an annual salary from the board and certain other members are paid a small honorarium.

8. Yes.

9. During the past year, amongst questions referred to the Biological Board for investigation and report, by the Fisheries Branch, are epidemics of disease at some of the whitefish and salmon hatcheries of the department; also causes of death of spawning salmon in reserve ponds. The problem of the deterioration of oyster beds; protection of cod in British Columbia waters; the life-history of the sardine in B.C.; sea-water densities at certain Atlantic ports for use in the navigation of vessels; the bacteriology of canned lobsters, clams and various cured fishes especially finnan haddie, also the age and growth of food fishes, and the utilization of new kinds of fishes; also the growth and migrations of important commercial fish.

10. Yes.

11. Numerous reports have been issued by the Biological Board and its staff chiefly as follows:—

(a) Volumes of "Biological Contributions" covering a large series of subjects and issued at intervals.

(b) Biological Bulletins especially on the marketing of new food fishes; these being in popular form and widely distributed.

(c) Biological Leaflets dealing with bait—supplied for fishermen, introduction of new food fishes and other important matters.

(c) Special studies on life in the sea and in the inland waters, chiefly dealing with important fishes and forms of life.

SHIPBUILDING CONTRACTS.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. Referring to an item of expenditure described as steel for shipbuilding to be refunded by contractors, $3,283,965.05, found on page ZZ42 of the 4th volume of the Auditor General's report, has all this money been refunded?

2. If so, when?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Not all, because the department has not finally settled with the builders for the ships for which the steel was purchased. The balance outstanding is $289,252.10.

2. By deductions from progress payments during 1918-19, $861,430.80; 1919-20, $2,133,282.15.

CONSERVATION COMMISSION.

Mr. ETHIER:

1. Who is the deputy assistant to the Chairman of the Conservation Commission?

2. How old is he?

3. At what salary rate was he paid for the fiscal year 1919-20?

4. What are the limits of the salary it is proposed to give him under the re-classification?

5. What office, business, engineering or other experience did he have between leaving college and taking his present position?

6. Has the Government satisfied itself that the increase in salary proposed for him is in the interests of economy and justified by the nature of his duties?

Hon. Mr. TOLMIE:

1. James White.

2. 57.

3. $6,000.

4. Mr. White's classification is the same as other deputy heads, namely "$4,200 and up," the "Rate to be determined by the Governor in Council."

5. Mr. White has had a very wide experience in professional work extending over some 36 years.

When writing the Premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, under date October 27, 1909, the Chairman of the Commission of Conservation requested the appointment of Mr. White as chief officer of the commission and added "I really do not know where we could look for another man who would be satisfactory."

1884 to 1894, Mr. White was engaged upon topographical and geological work on the staff of the Geological Survey of Canada;

1896-99, Geographer and Chief Draughtsman to the Geological Survey;

1899, appointed Chief Geographer of the Department of the Interior;

1901, compiled report on " Altitudes in Canada" which has saved many thousands of dollars during the railway construction;

1903, on Alaska Boundary Convention;

1906, completed Economic Atlas of Canada—the first comprehensive compilation of the resources of Canada ever undertaken;

1906, elected full Member of the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers;

1907, assisted in investigations respecting fast trans-Atlantic passenger steamships ("All-Red" Steamship Line);

From 1899 to 1909, Chief Geographer of the Department of the Interior and engaged in study of the resources of Canada and economic methods of the development of same;

1909, Mr. White was appointed Chief Officer of the Commission of Conservation;

1913, was given the rank of Deputy Minister.

6. So far as known, no such increase has been proposed.

SASKATCHEWAN PENITENTIARY.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria):

1. What was the total number of prisoners serving time in the Saskatchewan penitentiary on January 1, 1920?

2. How many officials are employed, and what was the cost of maintenance for the last fiscal year?

Rt. Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Prisoners January 1, 1920, 112.

2. Permanent officers employed, March 31, 1920, 31.

Expenditure for maintenance of convicts, 1918-19 (last completed year), $10,807.77.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

MANITOBA PENITENTIARY.

Mr. WHITE (Victoria):

1. What was the total number of prisoners serving time in the Manitoba penitentiary on January 1, 1920?

2. How many officials are employed, and what was the cost of maintenance for the last fiscal year?

Rt. Hon. Mr. DOHERTY:

1. Prisoners January 1, 1920, 108.

2. Permanent officers employed, March 31, 1920, 33.

Expenditure for maintenance of convicts, 1918-19 (last completed year), $10,534.62.

REPARATION BY GERMANY—ALLIES CONFERENCE AT OSTEND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the 18th instant the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. du Tremblay) asked me a question with regard to a special conference of the Allies to be held shortly at Ostend to consider the financial question affecting the Allies. The hon. gentleman desired to know if the Government had been invited to attend that conference and if Canada would have a representative at it, to which question I gave an answer in the affirmative. I find on looking at the official records, however, that we have no official notification of any conference at Ostend. The conference which I had in mind at the time of the hon. gentleman's question is one which is to be held at Spa of which we have been notified, and to which we have been asked to appoint a representative. In response to that request we have appointed Sir George Perley.

EMPIRE DAY ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. C. W. PECK (Skeena): Before the Orders of the Day are called may I inquire of the Government whether we are to have a holiday on Monday next, Empire Day, Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): It is proposed that we shall sit on May 24. We think that we could not better honour the day than to engage in our usual duties.

Mr. PECK: I should like to say that we who come from the West have travelled a considerable distance and are kept constantly at Ottawa, but we are asked to adjourn on many occasions to celebrate Holy days. Now I think we should at least adjourn over Monday to honour the festival that is dedicated to our Empire.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The reason I had reached the conclusion which I have just stated to the House was that a great many hon. members, particularly those from the West, had expressed to me their intense desire that the work of the House should be proceeded with as rapidly as possible. Some hon. gentlemen have been urging me recently even to sit in the forenoons and on Saturdays, and I thought that in line with that strongly expressed desire we perhaps would be sufficiently honouring this highly important anniversary if we proceeded with our usual work on that day. If, however, it is the desire of the majority of hon. members that we should not sit on Monday, I can only say that I am just as ready as any one else to take a holiday and will offer no personal objection.

Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: At all events, I am prepared to leave the matter to the judgment of the House.

Mr. BELAND: Question.

Hon. W. F. FIELDING: I think that the 24th of May is an almost ancient holiday with us. Those of us who are no longer young will remember the 24th of May as a great holiday of the year, and I certainly trust that we are still going to have duly observed the Queen's birthday, as the day is known to us.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Rt. Hon. Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Since my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) appeals on the ground of age I am afraid I will have to back him up.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear, and we stand by you.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In view of the opinion expressed by these hon. gentlemen, who have had a much longer experience than I in public life, I will move:

That when this House adjourns on Friday, the 21st, it stands adjourned until the Tuesday following at Three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that in the absence of the customary notice, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hear a "No." That being the case, notice of motion will have to be given. Do I understand that any hon. gentleman objects to the motion?

Mr. GAUVREAU: Yes, I object to it.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): I desire to protest against any protracted holiday. On Friday afternoon every week the House is left empty by members from Quebec and Ontario who go to their homes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): The session has been taken up largely with the useless discussion of unimportant matters. There are a number of us who are anxious to get back to our homes and who desire to proceed with the business as fast as possible.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would suggest that we meet on Saturday and take a holiday on Monday. I entirely agree with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that as this is a traditional holiday in the Dominion of Canada it ought to be observed by Parliament as an example to the rest of the country. It seems to me that we have wasted too many days upon which we might have worked, and it would be better, if we cannot afford to take Monday, to sit on Saturday and make up for it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must again point out that unless objection is withdrawn the motion cannot be put to the House. In the absence of notice unanimous consent is required.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): I do not care to be the solitary voice in protest against this proposed holiday. If this holiday is going to be taken I will withdraw my protest, but I would like to see the House sit on Saturday and let us get ahead with the business.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. GAUVREAU: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It can stand as a notice of motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands as a notice of motion.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

On the order for resuming, from Wednesday, May 19, the debate on the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the House that Rule 17C states that on Thursdays and Fridays when the Order of the Day is called for the House to resolve itself into Committee of Supply or of Ways and Means the Speaker shall leave the Chair without the question being put. I know that notwithstanding this rule, it is the desire of hon. members that the debate on the Budget should proceed. In order to facilitate public business it is desirable that the debate should be carried on over Thursday and Friday, and I simply point out that our continuing to-day without the Speaker leaving the Chair is not to be construed as a precedent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, if a lawyer and, worse than that, a lawyer without a brief, or not much of a brief, may venture upon a domain which really should be reserved to those members who make or who sells things, if that be the case, I should like to offer a very few remarks in this very interesting debate. I naturally at the beginning would like to add a respectful word of praise to those which have been uttered with respect to the manner in which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) delivered his speech on the financial affairs of the country. The Budget Speech was characterized particularly by two features. The first was courage and the second completeness. There were some who had doubt as to the capacity of the hon. gentleman to be the Minister of Finance, he not having had financial experience, to carry out the duties of his office but we who know him for many years in our home town—as His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales might call it—knew that there would be no mistake made in his choice for that position because we knew his natural ability, his capacity for hard work and his never failing capacity for taking pains. It does not surprise us, and the country as a whole will approve the method and material of his speech.

In discussing tariff matters it seems to me that the country, and those who take an interest in public business are much in the same position as that ascribed by Julius Caesar to France, "Gallia est omnis divisa in partes tres"—our country may be said to have three divisions in respect to its people; first, sensible business people, who want to see good business and as little dislocation as possible; second, free traders in theory and, third, political propagandists and partisans who do not care much one way or the other about the business of the country provided things can be steered in the direction of their own political preferences.

I believe that in the last two or three years we have not been able to understand tariff requirements for the reason that our country is so diversified and the business of one part differs so much from that in the other. There is no man probably in the country who is versed in all the requirements of the tariff. I was forcibly impressed with this when, last year or perhaps the year before, the battle raged a bit in the corridors and smoking rooms in regard to tariff changes. I was impressed with this fact very much and on behalf of those who honestly felt that they did not understand all the features of the question or the contentions which were made by the respective parties and contestants, I suggested that we should choose two or three from each side who were well versed in the matter, one from the standpoint of the manufacturer and business man, another from that class of business men who are farmers and another from those who are consumers. The suggestion that this little debate should take place, not in Parliament but elsewhere was received very agreeably, but I found that the interest flagged in what might have been a very interesting debate and which would have given us a much better understanding of the question at issue. I had come to the conclusion that a number of men on each side had not themselves made up their minds very clearly as to just what was needed by the country. It was forced upon my mind in regard to this debate and the stating of the case that one party was afraid and the other daren't.

Then again I learned at that time of some facts which made me still more doubtful as to the general knowledge of the people, and of members of Parliament on the subject. There is in my constituency a class who form the vast majority of the employees of the great works of the Massey-Harris Company, manufacturers of agricultural and other implements. Last year I was told by one of these employees that the Massey-Harris binder could be, and was sold in the Northwest Provinces at lower prices than the American machines were sold for. Well, this I confess was news to me because it had been continually dinned into my ears, as well as the ears of others, that we were permitting the exploitation of the Agrarian class by keeping up the price of these machines. However, I found there was no dispute as to this fact. The gentleman that I spoke to said, "Yes, that is true to some extent"; and the extent he meant was that the Massey-Harris machines were sold cheaper than American machines—considerably cheaper in some cases—in the Northwest as far west as Medicine Hat. At that time, and at that place, on account of the longer railway haul, the prices naturally became greater; but the prices mentioned were the prices to distributing points in the case of the American machines, but the price of the Canadian machines was the price of the machine actually delivered at a man's own station nearby. This, of course, was an important fact which, if true, would change the opinion of many upon this question because the ordinary man in Canada does not want to see an injustice done to any class simply because another class happens to have the predominant voice in public affairs. If it is a fact it should be stated, and should be known by the people. Then, on the other hand I was told in the city of Toronto of a manufacturer—the man himself did not speak to me but a friend of his to whom he had just spoken did—who turns out a very large output of a certain kind of machinery and this manufacturer said that day—it was but a very few months ago—that if he had five per cent protection on his business it would be sufficient for him to carry on and prevent dumping from other countries at certain times. But the duty on the goods he manufactured was not five, but thirty-two and a half per cent. Now I was convinced from what I learned that this manufacturer did not increase the price of his goods by the extra twenty-seven and a half per cent, because he was an honest, respectable individual, and he shrank from charging the people a price which would more than repay him for his investment and industry. But there you are: We do not know how many of that well disposed class of manufacturers there are, or how many take advantage of an unnecessarily excessive tariff to exploit the business for themselves. I am quite sure that when the 32½ per cent duty was imposed it was necessary for that particular manufacturer, but now just as in the case of the Massey-Harris Company, it is not necessary. Therefore it is essential that the tariff should be revised by competent persons, possessing a knowledge of the wants of the whole country and not merely the wants of the people in a particular section. Accordingly, I hail with gladness the statement by the Minister of Finance, which seems to me of the most definite kind, that in August the board chosen to revise the tariff would commence its sittings. I believe that policy will be carried out, and I am strongly in favour of it being done before we undertake to tinker with the tariff, or cut down or raise duties, when we have not sufficient knowledge as to what the effect of such action will be.

The Massey-Harris people—at least the gentleman who spoke to me,—said that the reason the company now required the tariff was because at certain times of the year—according to the harvest period in different sections of the United States—the concerns in the adjoining republic would throw over their machines into this country and, at a sacrifice, undersell the Canadian manufacturers, because it would not pay the former to take those machines back to the places from which they were originally shipped, owing to the cost of the long haul that would be involved. Now, of course, that is something that our manufacturers certainly need to be protected against. If that is just a whimsical, selfish action on the part of our rivals in another country to undersell our manufacturers even at a loss, it is obvious to everybody possessing ordinary business sense, it seems to me, that we should protect our own people by some tariff restrictions. As the harvest moves eastward, or northward—on account of climatic changes—from Tennessee and the southern states, I was told there was a vast difference in the price of machines; and it would be very unfair to allow the exigencies of trade and manufacture in one country to interfere with the legitimate profits of manufacturers in another.

Again, I am glad that there is no present reduction, or dislocation, of the tariff by reason of the fact that I have a local interest in the matter, namely, that in the last dozen or score of years there have been established in the constituency that I represent hundreds of manufacturing concerns from the United States who have come here necessarily in order to carry on their business. They have brought thousands of employees of the very best kind; they have invested in these manufactures in Canada millions of dollars; and a sudden dislocation of the tariff, such as might he supposed to result from the adoption of the amendment of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) would certainly disarrange business to a very large extent. In addition to that if tariff reductions were made suddenly it is not at all likely that the employees who are engaged in these hundreds of manufactures although they have become friendly to the country, and have their homes here at the present time, would prefer to stay in Canada. The strong cords of home affection would doubtless lead them back to the land from which they came if there was no reason for the further maintenance of the business with which they are at present associated here. For that reason I do not want to see a sudden closing up of this vast number of industrial concerns, and the sudden departure of so many employees. Therefore it will be understood by the members of the House, and it is perfectly natural, that I, at least, should object to an unthought-out lowering of the tariff or a cutting off of duties just to suit a theory.

The political aspect of this question is interesting because it is so dramatic. The other night the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) stated his political creed on this matter, and I must say that to me it was surprising. For many years I was accustomed to follow that hon. gentleman, and to agree that what he did in the public interest was right; and during that time any changes in the tariff from the old national policy of our Conservative opponents did not seem to us to be very shocking. I was rather surprised at the confession that was made by my hon. friend. Perhaps because I was brougnt up in such a strict political school I thought it was very bad politics to admit anything which might be taken advantage of by one's opponents; but the confession having been made that the Liberal party of those days was really not a free trade party but a protectionist party, frees me from the secrecy that I would otherwise maintain, and permits me to say that I concur with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) who made this confession that the Liberals of those days did not, among themselves anyway, claim that they had materially reduced the protective policy of the country.

I suppose the reason was that they saw everything was going well and they did not want to make a change. But I am told, although I have not analysed the figures myself, that the net reduction in tariff from the time the Liberal party came into power in 1896 until their defeat in 1911 was only about two and one-half per cent. So it cannot be charged against me that I am very much of a "change-about" if in sitting on this side of the House on account of other reasons I feel very little sense of guilt when I hear my leaders of those days now confess that their views on fiscal matters are very similar to those held by my colleagues on this side of the House.

But another interesting feature in the debate last night will be taken notice of by the country at large—the speech made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), who I wish was in his seat now. That was a distressing incident. The hon. member on account of his abilities had been chosen to lead the attack from the financial standpoint, and in many respects he did it very ably. But he has been dispossessed —I will not use such a word as discarded which I hear some hon. members suggest to me— he has been changed, no doubt as the result of consultation, because it was felt that something else had to be done than support the very strong views expressed by the hon. gentleman in former years in favour of free trade. So his speech last night was really in the nature of a swan song. He seemed to think that the times were out of joint—anyway his nose was out of joint—and the lack of that enthusiasm which formerly characterized his speeches on tariff matters was most noticeable. He did not repeat the methods of former years, which he then thought would be popular in certain sections of the country, by moving for the reduction of duties on certain specific articles. Consequently we must conclude that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have discarded his arguments of last year, which they then supported very reluctantly, and have decided to take their cue from those whom they have set up as their champions in the present debate.

Last year we all remember my hon. friend took a supposed "consumer" into an upper chamber and proceeded to undress him. First he took off the consumer's boots and told us the duty on them; then his sox, his braces, his shirt—really it got to be such a delicate subject that had not the hon, gentleman noticed there were ladies in the gallery I am afraid he would have gone to the extremity of completely disrobing this poor consumer in order to tell us what duties he had had to pay upon his habiliments. But there is no disrobing scene this year, no attention is called to any particular article of wearing apparel, and although my hon. friend made an able speech he did not talk with the vim that characterized him last year.

So we are left in this position: That the Government promises scientific revision of the tariff based upon information gathered from all over the country; while the amendment asks for an immediate cutting down of certain duties. In other words, there is a difference of only two months between the two propositions before the House, and for my part I prefer a scientific revision rather than an arbitrary and immediate reduction, which, it seems to me, is proposed simply as a foundation for political speeches and appeals to the avarice of certain classes of the community.

Before I close, I think it is proper that I should say something in reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Brome in relation to the Militia Estimates. He suggested that they should be cut down to the extent of $4,000,000. He did not know what those Estimates were for, what sort of training the money was to provide, or in what other way the money was to be utilized, but he desired to have that wholesale reduction made so that he could emphasize his view that pacificism is the proper belief for the people of this country.

I am quite sure that my hon. friend is not without a certain amount of political ambition, and in spite of the fact that his views are highly unpopular in many quarters, he does apparently hope to attract a class of people who will put the crown of leadership upon his brow. Well, there does not seem to be any one to dispute with him that leadership. If my hon. friend desires by making those strong statements, which are based purely on the theory about the sinfulness and wickedness of preparing to defend one's country he will undoubtedly attract to his banner—if there is such a thing as a banner among people of that sort—all those who were deterrents to our war efforts, all those who funked in that time of national crisis, all those who were of no use to the country when she most needed their services. Well, if he desires to become the leader of that class and of all the "sissies" in the country, he is welcome to the honour and I think no one will be anxious to become his rival.

My hon. friend referred to the splendid war record of our soldiers. Undoubtedly they did well, and there were times when they were the spearhead of the Allied forces. But how much less mourning there would be in Canada to-day if the men who "carried on" at the front had had sufficient military training to give them the skill and caution which is so essential in warfare to save the lives of our fighters and to make their gallantry completely effective. They would have been entitled to just as much in the way of credit, just as much in the way of thanks from our people, but they would have been trained to protect themselves, as unfortunately they actually were not, and as a result there would have been fewer mourning homes in Canada than there are at this day. I hope that the mothers of Canada will not be led away by any such arguments as those put forward by my hon. friends who seem to think that simply because they desire to maintain a pacific attitude we shall be exempt from the attacks of others who are stronger and more aggressive. History shows that that is not a sound way of looking at it. My friends on the other side who come from French Canada applaud such sentiments to some extent, but they must remember that their forebears were not of that kind.

Mr. BUREAU: Where is French Canada?

Mr. MOWAT: I leave the geographical question to my hon. friend. History will tell them that in the early days Canada was preserved to their ancestors by the fact that they were always ready for defence; when the conflict came the French-Canadians were always better prepared than their English-speaking fellow colonists to ward off the attack and to attain victory. Even though hon. members may applaud these sentiments to which I refer, I know that that feeling does not exist in Lower Canada, in the province of Quebec. I know perfectly well that if hostile ships should sail up the St. Lawrence and the people of that province realized that they must protect themselves in order to avoid slavery for perhaps one hundred years, they would be just as keen upon the adoption of compulsory service as would the people of any other province.

My hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) spoke also with a certain kind of sneer about Imperialism, which he linked with Chauvinism. He evidently feels that when a man thinks that it is wise to stay within the Empire; wise to keep on good terms with the Mother Country and with the sister dominions, that that involves a certain vice, a wrong state of mind which ill effects the condition of Canada. Well, many of us do not agree with that. We think that our future and our happiness consist in the continued growth of the British Empire; and if it is called Imperialism to try to keep on friendly terms with the Mother Country and the sister dominions, then we are not at all ashamed of being Imperialists. But I do not know why the word "Imperialism" should have been used in the same sentence with the word

"Chauvinism," which means exaggerated nationalism. But we find that feeling existing; we see it in my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) who is supposed to lead in that respect. I regret to have to allude to this, but I feel that it ought to be protested against; if it were allowed to go uncontradicted it would be a sort of admission that an improper kind of Imperialism really existed. The greatest Imperialist we ever had in Canada was the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He was a sane Imperialist; he did not believe in subjecting Canada to the control of any other country, but he always endeavoured to maintain good relations between the component parts of the Empire Sir Wilfrid Laurier more than any other person gave a start to the good feeling between the Mother Country and Canada, which resulted not only in friendship but in material prosperity, by the granting of the Imperial preference, despite the protests of strong protectionists, and despite a strong national feeling in some quarters. In doing that he did the greatest thing for Canada, in my opinion, that was ever done. Sir Wilfrid Laurier remained in power a long time, as undisputed head of the country, but it must be remembered that at times he was not able to appreciate or to understand the sentiment of the country. When he was in favour of maintaining good relations between Canada and the Mother Country and the sister dominions; when he was in favour of those ideas which we Imperialists say we have, he was successful; but when on two occasions he failed to appreciate what was felt by Canada as a whole on these subjects, he was disastrously defeated. If this misrepresentation is to go on, why, we cannot help it; for my part, I desire to state unequivocally where I stand, and if that will help anybody else in the protest against the sneering at Imperialism, then I believe I have at least done something in favour of my country.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow at any great length the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat). He seems to me to be of the Bourbon type, one who never forgets anything and never learns anything. Some forty-five years ago the same sentiments to which my hon. friend has given utterance to-day were expressed in the Parliament of Canada by a distinguished predecessor of his, the Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper. That hon. gentleman thought that if there was any revision of the tariff in those days, the doors of commerce would be closed and general ruin would prevail throughout the land. My hon. friend has evidently been reading that ancient doctrine lately, for he seems to fear that that is going to happen to Parkdale. Let me assure him that I have greater confidence in the people who borrowed him than he has. He was inclined to be sarcastic with regard to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). He set up a class of sissies, whatever kind of people they are; he evidently saw an aggregation of them lined up before him and they were going to choose a leader. Now, if these sissies had to choose a leader and their choice was between the hon. member for Brome and the hon. member for Parkdale, I think they would at once see a striking suitability in the choice of the member for Parkdale. I do not like sneering references and sneering remarks of that kind. I do not think it is necessary for the hon. member to be everlastingly talking about his loyalty and his Imperialism. I do not know anybody in this House who is not an Imperialist so far as proper connection between ourselves and the Mother Country is concerned and as respects our loyalty and allegiance to Great Britain and the King. It is absolutely preposterous for sane men who are of age to be keeping up that kind of talk in the House from day to day and from year to year. I hope that we have heard even from Parkdale for the last time this hackneyed, worn-out assertion of glorified Imperialism, which exists largely, if not altogether, in the city of Toronto.

I notice that with all his adherence to old things, he crowns his faith by stating that he still looks forward to the time when there shall be a reduction of the tariff. He feels satisfied that there is nothing that he can now expect in that direction; he must wait for a scientific revision. Might I remind my hon. friend that on the 29th day of November, 1911, which is quite a little while ago, an hon. member asked this question in the House:

> Will the Government appoint a permanent tariff commission? If so, will the labour and the farming interests be allowed to nominate a majority of the representatives on such commission?

The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) answered:

> Authority from Parliament will be necessary, and a measure to that effect will be introduced.

That is eight years, five months and twenty-one days ago to the day. Every year since then the Government has been going to appoint this commission, to take this legislative authority and scientifically to revise the tariff. My good friend, who is a close student of history and of parliamentary procedure, must have known that for the last eight years this bait has been held out to hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, and yet up to this very day no steps have been taken to obtain that authority to appoint a commission, and the revision of the tariff is just as far away as it ever was. Still, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) is happy, contented and full of hope and faith that this scientific revision is some day going to take place. So far nothing is in sight or has been done, and I do not think, in view of the fact that eight years, five months and twenty-one days have passed by without anything being done in this regard. I am too bold when I say that the Government have no intention of doing anything along that line, and particularly as regards revising the tariff downwards, because their masters and bosses will not permit them to do it. The hon. member for Parkdale brings them notice from his part of the country that such a revision downwards is not to be made, as so many important factories would be closed down if that were done. Let me assure my hon. friend that he need have no fear of a revision downward or of anything progressive, as long as he himself and the Government that is now in power will keep together and stay behind the ramparts of the inability of the people to get at them. That is about as far as I purpose following the speech of my hon. friend.

Let me now take up the question of the Budget. It is a good rule of responsible government that once in the year the Government of the day must bring down to Parliament a statement, showing the financial condition of the country. As regards the present Budget, that should have been done long ago, and I have only to say, not only to the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), if he were here, but to the right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster), who has been leading the Government from the commencement of this session and who is practically leading the Government now, that the latter has told us on several occasions that we should hurry on and bring the session to a close; that the business of the country should be facilitated as much as possible so that hon. members may be able to go home and attend to their private affairs. We were all agreed as to that; but days, weeks, months passed by, and this most important part of this year's session was not brought down. What were my hon. friends waiting for? When the Budget did come down, what was it but an array of old figures that the most ordinary clerk in any department of the Government could put together in less than a day? When that could be done, and there was nothing new about the Budget, surely the Government will admit that anybody could have stood up in the House and read it, as was done. What were they waiting for? A school boy in half an hour could produce and tabulate all that was new in connection with this Budget. Nevertheless, we have been held here from day to day and from month to month until the 18th day of May without this important part of the business of the session being brought down to Parliament. When hon. members ought to be home about their private business, they are kept here, the session is prolonged and the country involved in greater expense because the Government did not do what they should in bringing the business of the House expeditiously before us. There was on this side of the House no evidence of any kind of any idea, knowledge or desire, other than to facilitate the business of the House and to get along as rapidly as possible. The responsibility for the delay, the increasing of the expense and the keeping here of hon. members when they ought to be elsewhere, is entirely upon the heads of the Government, and they must bear the responsibility for that.

What is the object of the Budget? It should be and is to give the people of this country to understand how the country stands financially, how their ledger account stands. I am sorry to say that, although we had a Budget Speech lasting about two hours, the financial condition of the country was not made very plain; it was not submitted in that concise manner that would enable the ordinary man to get a quick grasp of it. The minister says that if we took only ordinary revenue and ordinary expenditure, there was a surplus. He arrived at that conclusion by taking the extraordinary course of confining his ordinary expenditure to what is really ordinary expenditure and taking the extraordinary revenue and placing it with the ordinary revenue. He forgets to tell this country that there are ordinary and extraordinary expenditures, and ordinary and extraordinary revenues. The ordinary revenues of this country are revenues similar to those which we used to receive before the war. Every new tax that has been collected since the 4th day of August, 1914, is a war tax, and from those war taxes the minister collected last year something like $118,000,000. If he will subtract $118,000,000 from what he calls ordinary revenue, which was $388,000,000, he will find that last year we had an ordinary revenue of only $270,000,000. The ordinary expenditure, so he told us—and we have reason to believe that is correct—was $349,000,000. Therefore, if you subtract the ordinary revenue of $270,000,000 from the ordinary expenditure of $349,000,000, you have the extraordinary sum of $79,000,000 of a deficit even on the ordinary expenditure and ordinary revenue. That is an absolute fact and it is made up in this way. It is admitted by the Government themselves that they collected $30,000,000 from the 7½ per cent extra war tax. As a letter which used to be carried for two cents is now carried for three cents, we are correct in saying that one-third of the revenue of the post office, or $7,000,000, comes from war tax. The business profits tax, amounting to $44,000,000 is entirely a war tax; the income tax, amounting to $20,000,000 is also entirely a war tax, and other war taxes, as set forth in the minister's speech, amounted to $17,000,000. Thus, you get the sum of $118,000,000 which is extraordinary revenue, but which the minister takes as proper and natural income and charges against it only the general expenditure of the country which is largely statutory, and then he says that he has a surplus. That is absolutely incorrect, and if the minister intended to present a statement which was nearly what it ought to be, that should not be done, because the purpose of the Budget Speech is to give the people an absolutely straightforward and honest statement of the financial condition of the country. The result is that, with a total expenditure in 1919-20 of $886,741,110 and a total revenue of $388,000,000, we have a deficit of about $498,000,000 confronting us. That is the statement which would have made the matter clear to the people of this country, instead of a statement mixing up the figures and the minister saying: If such and such were the case and something else the other way, we would have had a surplus. The fact is that the people have to face a deficit of $498,000,000 on the operations of last year.

I think it is only fair to compare that condition of things with the condition in which the country was when hon. gentlemen opposite took office. Undoubtedly, every allowance must be made for war conditions and all that has transpired during the years of the war. But apart from all that there is a vast field for criticism and there is abundant reason for the Canadian people to look carefully into the operations of this Government. In the year in which hon. gentlemen opposite took office, in 1911, I think I am safe in saying that the revenue of this country was about $100,000,000; it might have been a little one way or the other, but I think I have given approximately the correct figure. After meeting all the necessities and claims of the country for that year we had a surplus of $30,000,000. What is the condition of affairs now? Let me repeat, in 1911 we taxed the people of the country $100,000,000 and after having paid all necessary expenditures we had $30,000,000 to the good. Last year this Government taxed the people $388,000,000 and yet they are now behind $498,000,000. That is just the difference between the two. To put it succinctly: We collected $100,000,000 and had $30,000,000 over; they collected $388,000,000 and have a deficit of $498,000,000. And even on ordinary expenditure they have a deficit as large as was the whole expenditure of the country in the last year of Liberal administration. On their own showing, they have a deficit of $79,000,000 on ordinary expenditure, and that was the total expenditure of the Liberal Government in 1910. That, Sir, is the condition of this country at the present time. We have been borrowing money from time to time, and the hon. gentleman who resigned the office of Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) the able predecessor of the present minister, last year gave evidence before the Pensions Committee, when he stated that we had to borrow $300,000,000 then and would have to borrow $300,000,000 more this year; and unless we borrow, Mr. Speaker, not only $300,000,000 but this $498,000,000 that we are behind, it is nothing short of a mystery to an ordinary man like myself where the money is going to come from. The situation is serious, but there it is. We are taxing every green spot in the country; we are gathering all the money we can; and yet, withal, we have this enormous deficit staring us in the face. We have borrowed until the interest to-day is something like $120,000,000 as compared to $13,000,000 formerly.

Now, the only touch that was given to the tariff—and it is put forward as a sort of remedy for the ills of the poor man—was this extra tax that was put on things luxurious. The poor people of the country are given to understand that the idea underlying this tax is to lighten the burden which lies on their shoulders and to transfer the great weight of it to the more sturdy shoulders of the wealthy who are better able to bear financial strain. I take this opportunity to tell the House and the country generally that as a matter of fact all this tax means—if it means anything—is an attempt to get more money. There is not one particle of relief to any one by reason of this tax. The poor man pays just the same money as he did before for his groceries and his clothing and everything he requires. The real idea behind the tax has nothing to do with any benevolent purpose of relief; the tax is simply for the purpose of drawing the line of demarkation more strongly between the millionaires and the profiteers of the country, and the poorer classes, who now get fairly decent clothes. The idea is that they shall not be permitted to get purple and fine linen such as is worn by the millionaires. The millionaire says: "What is the good of my millions if this poor Mordecai can come up to my gate every day and tantalize me by wearing the same sort of hat and the same sort of coat as I wear, and if his wife can appear in the same elegant attire as my wife wears? What is the good of my millions under those circumstances? Something must be done to stop this iniquitous transgression." And that is what this thing is for, Mr. Speaker. It is not for the purpose of relieving the poor people of the country. When the Estimates were being prepared, I can imagine the following colloquy having taken place between the Minister of Finance and his colleagues. The Minister of Finance was approached by a group of these millionaires and was told that something had to be done to prevent this contamination of their temple by these poor lower class and second class people who were daring to profane the high places of the mighty. The minister was told by these millionaires: "Why should those G ntiles of the lower and middle classes be permitted to be clothed in purple and fine linen, a distinction which by divine right belongs to us and to our wives and successors alone? Why should these Mordecais continue to defile our temple? Right you are, says the gallant knight of the treasury. More than right you are, say the Minister of Labour and the Minister of the Interior in chorus; Winnipeg is burned on our hearts in large letters and we will never forget the fact. Hear, hear, says the Minister of Trade and Commerce; I have an old speech on peace, order and good government that will put Napoleonic grape shot into the Crerar bunch should they dare to squeak. Go on; we stand with you, Sir Henry; put up your breastworks, strengthen your outposts and keep those fellows out so that not one of this gang shall even touch the hem of the garment of any of us." "What do you think of it, Sir Robert?" They turn around to the Prime Minister. "Well, gentlemen, your conduct strikes me as partaking strongly of that headlong course of the famous and historic Gadarenes, which ended so disastrously to pigs and devils. For myself, I have not yet fully made up my mind in that regard. You are of age, your sins will be on your own heads. Like Pilate of old these hands are clean."

"That is somewhat beyond my manuscript," said the Minister of Finance, "but the duties come in, and the Gentiles go out, and they, poor fellows, will think we are out to help them."'

That is the way in which the poor people of this country are made to believe that this Budget is for their help and assistance. That is the way the change came about in the formation of this new tariff. The idea of this Government doing anything to relieve the poor people or to reduce prices is absolutely absurd in view of their history. When you ask this Government to do something with regard to a commercial port of commerce, or something else, to cut down the high prices, you are told: "Let trade, in its proper course, regulate itself; let supply and demand govern the condition of things, and if trade is left to work out its own destiny the poor people of this country will get the benefit." There is a great deal in that argument, but is that what they do?

When the war was over we had a right to suppose that we would come back gradually to pre-war prices, and that competition between traders would have the effect of giving the people lower prices. Instead of allowing the ordinary law of trade and commerce to do its work, what was done by this Tory Government? The manufacturers and the millionaires, their masters, came to them and said: "We have been doing splendidly with these prices for the last five years; it would be sad indeed if we had to go back to the hum-drum, ordinary prices of pre-war days. We must do something to keep up prices. If nobody else will buy our goods you must buy them yourself. You must buy our cheese, our wheat, our butter, our manufactured goods and everything else in order to keep up prices." What did they do? They passed through this Parliament a vote of $276,000,000 against the persistent opposition of this side of the House and they used that money in buying goods in this country and sending them out of the country to destroy competition and to keep up prices against the poor people whom they were professing to help. What happened? Proof of what I am saying appears in the evidence of the hon. member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) given before a commission and reported in the blue-book. That blue-book was passed around and I received a copy of it. The evidence of the hon. gentleman begins at page 84 and continues to page 106. In the evidence the hon. gentleman states that this money was furnished by this House and the country and was expended in buying goods for the following countries:

Great Britain	$170,000,000
Belgium	25,000,000
France	25,000,000
Roumania	25,000,000
Greece	25,000,000
Italy	6,000,000

In all $276,000,000 was extracted from the pockets of the poor people of this country in order to keep up prices against themselves. I know of nothing that is more iniquitous or less consistent with the idea that we are being given from day to day that this Government is sweating blood in order to help these poor men. Nothing of the kind is being done to-day.

Is it to be expected that the working classes, the ordinary rank and file, will have confidence in any Government which, will because they have the power, come down to the Houses of Parliament and take from the pockets of these poor people, who are depending on us to protect them, this enormous sum of money?

If the Government had kept control of it themselves it would not have been so bad, but what has happened? They appointed a commission of their Tory friends and those who are manufacturers and producers in this country. They called them together and said: "Go to it; divide this $276,000,000 between yourselves; there will be no competition." Nothing could be more in contravention of the principles of responsible government than to step in and spend this money for no other purpose than to keep up high prices and to make it impossible for poor people to get the benefit of that competition in trade which would otherwise have been given to them.

In the further observations that I wish to make, it comes to me now to say something about the subject of Government ownership and Government management. In the line of Government management or expenditure we have this $276,000,000 for which we have no substantial return. I do not think it was even mentioned as an asset by the Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech. It may have been; I have not been able to read it all but I followed the hon. gentleman very closely while he was speaking the other day and I do not recall that anything was said about this $276,000,000 which we have so lavishly expended on these foreign countries—foreign to us, all except Great Britain—and for which we have nothing of a substantial character to show in return. I was going on to say, Sir, that we should cease from this idea of monopolizing everything in the hands of the Government. As we do put that monopoly in the hands of the Government we decrease and break down the ambition of ordinary people, having the right, the ambition and the power, to do things for themselves and who should not be interfered with by the monopolistic operations of Government. I do not know but that I had occasion before to quote in this House a philosophic statement made by Lord Macaulay a long time ago. I think this statement was made by him in 1830:

> "Our rulers will best promote the improvement of the nation by strictly confining themselves to their own legitimate duties, by leaving capital to find its most lucrative course, commodities their fair price, industry and intelligence their natural reward, idleness and folly their natural punishment, by maintaining peace, by defending property, by diminishing the price of law, and by observing strict economy in every department of the State. Let the Government do this; the people will assuredly do the rest."

That, Sir, was the advice given to the British people so long ago as the year 1830. I find, Sir, that that idea is not dead; I believe that it is a British idea. I find that recently Sir Archibald Williamson, P.C., was addressing a gathering of business men in London, and I have here his views as reported in one of the newspapers. It was put up to him that the Government should cease from interfering with business in England, that they should give a free hand to the people to look after their own affairs, and his answer to that statement was as follows:

> At the earliest possible moment that that emergency legislation could be brought to an end, it must be brought to an end, and at the earliest possible moment they could finish with Government control they must do so. He would only remind them that when the Government brought about certain restrictions it was not through folly or lack of consideration. They did not do that without going into the deepest consideration and argument of the matter. Those who condemned them were not aware of all the details of the case before the Government. He made bold to say that there was not one member of the Government who did not desire to get rid of the control which had been necessary owing to the war at the first opportunity. They could not spend five years in such a war with a complete interruption of all commercial life and economic processes and then find themselves able to resume at once pre-war life. If they looked through the Government restrictions in the recent Parliamentary Bill carefully they would see there was not one which any of the members of that association would not think necessary and useful. He observed with pleasure that the chief articles of their association stood for the value of individual enterprise.

The whole history of their country, which had been the greatest country commercially in the history of the world, but whose commercial successes had not weakened its idealism for high effort, had built up its achievements on the knowledge that exceptional individual enterprise and ability deserved exceptional individual reward. They must sweep away the crazy doctrines and muddy philosophers which told them that the best way to achieve the best results was to work on the aggregate of all the citizens, where the reward of the thrifty man and the idle man would be the same. Ever since civilization raised its head there had never been a community in the world which had prospered on that system, but greatness had always been achieved by following the exactly opposite system. Speaking for the Government, he could say they had definitely set their faces against these doctrines.

It was the view of the Government that the great businesses and commercial enterprises of this country could better be carried on by private individuals for the good of the whole in the manner which had been customary in the past. When the Government was met by threats from any body of men, that they would adopt the course of action which could only recommend itself to them because they were in a minority, the Government would never give way to them —never. That was the touchstone of their ability to apply democratic doctrines as they understood them. The nation was going to govern itself through a Parliament chosen by itself; and it was for the nation alone to decide those great business questions and array themselves against all those who threatened to impose the coercion of a privileged class.

That, Sir, is the idea given by this distinguished member of the British Government, Sir Archibald Williamson He carries out, although not perhaps familiar with the doctrine established and enunciated by Lord Macaulay, the idea that runs through the minds of the British people; and to-day in England they are getting clear, as rapidly as possible, of the notion that there should be any governmental interference with the enterprise of the British people. If it is good enough for the people in that country it should be good enough in Canada, and this Government should give way at the earliest possible moment and carry out what is suggested here by Sir Archibald Williamson—that the people of Great Britain shall select their own men for their own purposes, and that a Parliament shall be established in Great Britain at the earliest possible moment that shall properly represent the interests of the country as expressed by the freewill of the people. Let me remind this Government that they are not on very stable ground. Let me remind them that the position they occupy is not a very proud one. From the Atlantic to the Pacific they have received notice to quit, and still they are not quitting. They are over-holding tenants, and they are determined to sit until the sheriff or the bailiff turns them out. Let me remind my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) of the many notices to quit that he has received. He received one from Prince county, in Prince Edward Island. He read it and put it away, no doubt marking the date on the back of it. He received notice from Carleton and Victoria, in the province of New Brunswick. In that case also the same process was gone through and the notice was pigeon-holed. From Kamouraska in the province of Quebec he received a very emphatic notice to quit. From the division of St. James in the great city of Montreal he received notice to quit; and, no doubt, instructed his clerk to put it in the same pigeon-hole. Then, Quebec East has most emphatically sent notice, in the person of my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) that this Government—as far as the people of that constituency were concerned—had reached far past the end of their tether, and the sooner they left the better. Then we come to Timiskaming, and we have the distinguished stalwart from that county here as a notice to quit which has been already served upon the Government. I had the distinction of being up in that constituency myself. I was not trying to help my hon. friend (Mr. McDonald) who is now a member, I was trying to help in the election of another man, but one thing I did tell the people was this: The Government—not by any will or wish of their own but sadly enough owing to death—had given them the opportunity to speak their mind, and to state whether they approved of the Government or not. If they were not satisfied with the administration of the present Government it was their duty to elect a member who would pronounce definitely along the lines of that dissatisfaction, and although they did not send my man to Parliament——

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend got notice to quit.

Mr. McKENZIE: —I was simply preaching this doctrine: I was talking to a free people in a free country, and I said, "Whatever you do, do not send any one down to Ottawa who will support this Government." They took my advice on this score, and served notice to quit upon the Government. Then we go farther West and find in the county of Assiniboia——

An hon. MEMBER: You forget North Ontario.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will come back to North Ontario. I am taking the by-elections in the order in which they occured, and I think the election in Assiniboia occurred before the election in North Ontario. Then from that beautiful province of the West notice to quit was served upon my right hon. friend, which he now has in his possession. Then the good old Scotch county of Glengarry and Stormont rose in their might. That good, strong philosophy which is found in Scottish countries was here mixed with a strong French sentiment, and the two nationalities made up their minds and said to the Government: "You go. You are no longer fit for our confidence, and as far as we are concerned we will give you the most emphatically emblazoned notice to quit," and the right hon. gentleman has that notice also in his possession. But, saddest of all, in the good old province of Ontario the Government has perhaps had the most emphatic notes served upon them that the people desire a change. Prince (P.E.I.) Victoria and Carleton, N.B., Kamouraska, Que., the St. James Division (Montreal), Quebec East, North Ontario, Timiskaming, Assiniboia, and Glengarry and Stormont—altogether nine constituencies have served notice upon the Government; and I wish to remind my right hon. friend who has been so ably and patiently leading the Government for the last few months (Sir George Foster) that he should realize that his Government has lost the confidence of the people. Every constituency that has had an opportunity has spoken with one voice: "Whatever else may happen, whether we choose a Labour man, a Farmer man, or a Liberal, one thing is certain, we will not choose a Tory or a man who will support this Government."

The other night the Minister of Trade and Commerce got a good deal of satisfaction out of the fact that there were, as he said, two parties on this side of the House, and that as the opponents of the Government were somewhat divided no greater disaster would befall him and his friends. I am afraid that the right hon. gentleman, and the Government itself, is something like the little boy who asked his school mate, "Jack, if you were lost in the woods which would you rather be eaten by, a bear or a tiger?" The selection was not a very delightful one. And the Government must decide whether they prefer to be eaten by the Liberal party or by the Farmer party, for eaten they will be, and they may as well understand that at once.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Does my hon. friend's history teach him whether or not the boy was actually eaten in the end? I think he escaped.

Mr. McKENZIE: Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss the tariff, a subject which my hon. friends on the other side of the House say we are not dealing with in that careful and logical manner which its importance demands. All I have to say to those hon. gentlemen is that as far back as 1893 the Liberal party established a tariff policy, they have been following it ever since, and during the fifteen years that they had the opportunity to put it in actual operation they brought such an era of prosperity to our people as was never enjoyed before and has never been enjoyed since. We were placed in power in 1896 on our tariff policy; we have not changed that policy since.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I hear some hon. gentleman say "hear, hear." But that is the fact. We came into power in 1896 with the avowed purpose of giving the best possible fiscal conditions to this country, making goods free wherever we could do so, and giving help to industries where help was required. In that way, and without erecting a high Chinese tariff wall, we succeeded under the leadership of our great chief, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, supported by the Hon. Mr. Fielding and others, in giving the country an entirely satisfactory government. What we are saying to the people to-day is "You had a trial of us for fifteen years and you know what we are. We have a good many of the same men yet in our party, including the hon. gentleman who was our financial leader during those fifteen years. If you are satisfied with the way in which we handled the affairs of this country for the fifteen years we were in power, we ask you to give us another trial, and we assure you that the good faith, the ability and the integrity that characterized our former administration will be continued in our efforts to bring back this country to the same prosperous condition which it enjoyed during our fifteen years in office."

I submit, Sir, that no person who cares for the development of this country will ever lay down any hard and fast rule to continue any policy, however good, without change no matter what the conditions may be. We have no intention of erecting a high tariff wall. We are prepared to carry on as we did before, to deal with circumstances as they arise, and, we hope, with the same successful results which attended our administration in days gone by.

Can it be said for the edification of those who think that we still adhere to the old National Policy that we stole the clothes off the Tory party in 1896, and that we were only adjusting those clothes to suit ourselves year by year? I imagine, Sir, that in 1896 no man in the House of Commons of that day understood the National Policy better than the late Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, who was then the leader of the Opposition. Undoubtedly he would recognize the National Policy just as well as any of his contemporaries, and if the Fielding policy which Mr. Fielding introduced in his Budget Speech in 1897 was the same old National Policy, no person would have been more ready to take advantage of the situation than the right hon. leader of the Opposition of that day, and point out that while Mr. Laurier--as he then was—and his friends were promising tariff changes, yet their Budget proposals failed to give effect to that promise and merely constituted an adoption of the tariff policy of the Tory party. But what did he say? I invite hon. gentlemen to look at page 1258 of Hansard for the year 1897, where they will find that the Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper speaking on the Budget that was then introduced by Mr. Fielding, said:

> I confess, sir, that I listened with the most profound astonishment to the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding. I did not suppose it possible, whether in one section of the Empire or another, for a great Parliament such as that which the Dominion of Canada possesses to have presented for its consideration a Bill of such entirely illegal and unconstitutional character. I have no hesitation in saying that you will search the history of Parliamentary Government throughout the British Empire in vain to find any parallel for the position in which we find ourselves in relation to the Budget speech of the hon. Minister of Finance.

Again, at page 1262, in the same volume of Hansard, on the same date, the same right hon. gentleman is reported as follows:

> Now I listened to this most remarkable address with the most profound astonishment because it violates the most plain, clearly-understood, and well-known laws governing the Parliament of Canada. It was in antagonism with the constitution of the country, and in violation of everything that hon. gentlemen on either side of the House had a right to expect from a Minister of Finance.

At page 1291 of the same volume he is reported as saying:

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

That, Sir, is the pronouncement of the gentleman who was leading the Tory Opposition, who was at one time Minister of Finance and at another time Prime Minister of this country. He understood the National Policy; if he was not its father, he was certainly posing as its godfather. I must ask hon. gentlemen, therefore, to believe that the National Policy to which he referred was not the National Policy which was introduced by my good friend (Mr. Fielding) on that occasion.

Now, Sir, what has happened? We had the application of that policy for fifteen years. I wish to repeat and to bring to the touchstone of Toryism at its best the judgment which they passed upon the application of that Bill which Hon. Mr. Fielding introduced at that time, and also the results which that Bill, when enacted into law brought to this country. The new Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in the Tory administration which came into power in 1911 looked over the scene, looked over the results, anxious to find fault, if he could; anxious to show that the financing of the Liberals had been bad; anxious to show that they had not kept faith with the people. He was brought here to curse the Grits; he was forced to bless them. This is what he said:

> Our Dominion continues to be the land of hope and promise to the homeseeker. During the last year, as before shown, our immigration from Europe and the United States reached an average of nearly a thousand a day, bringing their capital, their intelligence, and their energy to assist in the great task of developing the resources of Canada, and building up her nationality.

Much has been said in the past with which I am in accord as to the selection of immigration as far as possible with an eye to the quality and character of our future citizenship. Notwithstanding the large stream of immigration, labour conditions are good, and extreme poverty from any reason other than incapacity or direct misfortune is hardly known.

Under the favourable conditions which I have described, and with every prospect for their continuance, the future of Canada looks bright indeed. In the enjoyment of peace, plenty, and prosperity, her energetic, loyal and patriotic people look forward with hope and expectation to an ever great and greater future.

That, Sir, is the testimony of the leading finance authority of the Tory party when they came to pass judgment upon our handling of the Fielding tariff for fifteen years under Liberal administration. That is their testimony, and we are prepared to place that before the people of this country and say to them: that is absolutely true; perhaps it is not the whole truth, because the Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) could have gone much further in showing the grandeur, the immensity of the growth of Canada during those fifteen years. But he said enough to justify the administration of the country's affairs during that period. We say to the people: To-day we hold the same policy; we have the same ideas; we act in the same good faith; put us back in power and the same good conditions will come to you that were brought to you before. That, Sir, is the position which we occupy, that is what we say to the Canadian people.

As to our policy generally, we have standard ideas for the good of the people as set forth at the convention held in Ottawa last year. We stand by the resolutions adopted at that convention. That is our policy; that is our standard. We are willing that our opponents shall criticise us in respect to our living up to these high standards that we have set for ourselves; that they shall measure us by what we have done on former occasions.

I do not think, Sir, that it is necessary for me to put on record any of the resolutions that were adopted at that convention. The resolution respecting the tariff was put on record yesterday; it has been read in the press of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and I shall not detain the House by putting it on Hansard now. But I wish to read the tariff portion of the Farmers' platform to show the striking similarity between our own policy as enunciated at the convention and the policy as put forward in this booklet which I received a few days ago. I quote:

Whereas Canada is now confronted with a huge national war debt and other greatly increased financial obligations, which can be most readily and effectively reduced by the development of our natural resources, chief of which is agricultural lands;

And whereas it is desirable that an agricultural career should be made attractive to our returned soldiers and the large anticipated immigration, and owing to the fact that this can best be accomplished by the development of a national policy which will reduce to a minimum the cost of living and the cost of production;

And whereas the war has revealed the amazing financial strength of Great Britain, which has enabled her to finance, not only her own part in the struggle, but also to assist in financing her Allies to the extent of hundreds of millions of pounds, this enviable position being due to the free trade policy which has enabled her to draw her supplies freely from every quarter of the globe and consequently to undersell her competitors on the world's market, and because this policy has not only been profitable to Great Britain, but has greatly strengthened the bonds of Empire by facilitating trade between the Motherland and her Overseas Dominions—we believe that the best interests of the Empire and of Canada would be served by reciprocal action on the part of Canada through gradual reductions of the tariff on British imports, having for its objects closer union and a better understanding between Canada and the Motherland and at the same time bring about a great reduction in the cost of living to our Canadian people.

That is practically word for word the policy of the Liberal party; and I was pleased to find that the Farmers' party, the Labour party and the Liberal party are almost, if not altogether, unanimous on the idea of making Canada a good country to live in, a free country, letting nobody have any special privileges, but keeping all on an equal footing, and saying that while we are anxious to assist the manufacturers just the same as every other Canadian who is a good honest man trying to make an honest living, it is our intention to let nobody take shelter behind an unduly high stone wall, behind which he can defy competition from the outside and sell shoddy goods at high prices to the people of Canada. Our intention is to give every honest man in this country a square deal and an opportunity of making a success, but at the same time, he must produce the goods and sell them to the people at reasonable prices and to the best advantage of those who live in the country. That is the idea which we entertain and which we intend to carry out, and the people of this country will, I am sure, hear with delight that before long this Government will make up their minds to be manly and strong and will come to the conclusion at long last that their tenure of office has been too long and that the proper thing for them to do is to give the people of this country an opportunity either to confirm them in their seats, if the people so desire, or on the other hand, to send here men who will have the absolute confidence of the nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Budget debate is one of those valued institutions which all countries under the British form of Government prize very highly as giving opportunity to the representatives of the people to discuss fairly and frankly the various problems in which the country at large is interested and which affects the welfare of the country as a whole. The particular matter before the House is the discussion of the Finance Minister's proposals of ways and means to carry on the affairs of the country, and it is the privilege and duty of hon. members to discuss these proposals from every standpoint. It is my intention to do so within a limited time and without, I trust, boring the House too long with matters that are not directly germane to the subject.

Before, however, continuing my observations with regard to the Budget, I should like to refer to the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie). Hon. members who have been acquainted with him for many years always look forward to his speeches. Usually, he has a very happy vein of humour and is entertaining and vigorous; but I think we are all struck today with the fact that my hon. friend lacked his usual manner and that he laboured somewhat to justify the course which apparently he intends to follow, namely, that of voting for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). At the very outset of his remarks he made a most extraordinary reference to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton)—and may I pause to say that from the comments I have heard outside of the House, with which comments I concur, the Minister of Finance has given to the House a Budget of which he may justly be proud, and which the country at large will, I think, receive with favour. Referring to that Budget, my hon. friend said that the Minister of Finance brought down to the House an array of figures which could have been put together in a day and which any schoolboy could have compiled in an hour. That was rather an extraordinary statement, and the hon. member, by the way, dismissed the Budget with that statement and then proceeded with his particular pet line of argument. I would, however, call his attention to the words of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, whose opinion is, I think, highly regarded in the House, certainly by hon. gentlemen opposite. That hon. member said:

> At all times the preparation of the Budget is a matter calling for painstaking labour. It is a matter of large responsibility which any Minister of Finance must necessarily take very seriously, and that responsibility has fallen on my hon. friend at this time under circumstances of more than usual difficulty.

Later on he congratulated, in a gentlemanly, courteous, and I think, very proper manner, the work accomplished by the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, another illustrious gentleman on the other side, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) confessed—I use that word advisedly—that he was at a loss to understand the import of the very large mass of statistics brought down by the minister, which statistics, my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) says, could have been compiled in an hour by any school boy. If we are to measure the sincerity and logic of my hon. friend's subsequent arguments by this, it would be a simple matter to dispose of them.

The hon. member made another very extraordinary statement which, although I do not think he did it intentionally, was—I use the word kindly—grossly misleading. He said that the Minister of Finance had produced a Budget showing a deficit of about $70,000,000 on ordinary expenditure. What are the facts? The facts are these. Last year the revenue was $388,000,000, and the expenditure under the Consolidated Fund amounted to $349,000,000, leaving a surplus of $39,000,000. But the unfairness and the utter abandon of my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) will be realized when I say to the House that, included in this ordinary expenditure which the Minister of Finance brought down in his speech the other day, is $108,000,000 for interest on war debt, $26,000,000 for pensions and $49,000,000 for loans to soldiers under the Land Settlement Act. Thus, you have included in ordinary expenditure an item of $175,000,000 which, in normal times, would not have been called for at all. In spite of that enormous sum included in ordinary expenditure, the Minister of Finance was able to apply $39,000,000 or $40,000,000 to the reduction of the debt of the country. It is true that last year we had to borrow a large sum of money, but the House, in one direct vote, appropriated the sum of $350,000,000 for war expenditure. My hon. friend dismissed that; he tried to impress the House and the country with the idea that there was a deficit of about $400,000,000, and that is a most unfair, unreasonable and inaccurate application of the figures.

Then, he made some criticisms of another expenditure. He said that the Minister of Finance and this Government had given to foreign countries credits amounting to $226,000,000; or, to use his own words, that the Government said to the manufacturers: "Here is $226,000,000; divide it amongst you," and that the Government was dipping down into the pockets of the people of Canada to keep up the high prices. Can the House imagine a more unjust, unfair statement than that? What are the facts? The facts are these. The Government, realizing the necessity of maintaining exchange abroad and the importance of supporting the starving population of Europe, found it necessary to supply some credits in this country in order to ship out the foodstuffs required in Europe for the starving populations, and, in addition to that, to stimulate our foreign trade by sending manufactured articles abroad. My hon. friend stated that this item was not shown in the figures brought down by the Minister of Finance the other day; that there was evidently no record of this amount of $226,000,000. He said: It does not show as an asset. In the figures brought down by the Minister of Finance and placed on Hansard the day before yesterday, not ancient history—if he had read the Budget they could not have escaped his attention—are the following:

Imperial Government..	$171,710,168.19
Other governments..	34,336,117.75

Then there is a miscellaneous item after said: It does not show as an asset. In the record, included in the statement of the assets of the country, this enormous sum he speaks of. Now, I turn briefly for a moment to the wisdom or otherwise of these advances. Here we are in Canada with a large quantity of goods that we are able to sell to the world. What is the condition of affairs throughout the world to-day? Mr. Speaker, the subject has been gone over so often that one hesitates even to refer to it for fear of wearying one's hearers, but in the face of the extravagant statements of the hon. gentleman, who was himself a leader for a year of a large party, it is necessary sometimes to harp back to facts that are known, to use his own words, to every school boy in the country. There is Europe, devastated and largely incapable of producing, while its credits are generally destroyed. We in Canada have goods to sell and desire to open up new markets and get a share of foreign trade. What is more wise than that, so far as we are able to do so, we should supply credits to such countries as may be reasonably safe in the matter of repayment? To whom did we extend credits?—to Great Britain, Belgium, Greece and a few other countries, and in every case it was a wise and judicious provision on the part of the Minister of Finance. There is only one matter for regret in connection with this question, and that is that it is difficult for Canada to extend further credits to these countries. I think it is unfortunate that we are unable to do so. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) also, apparently with much pleasure to himself, read what he called the death warrant of the Government, calling upon them to resign and go to the country, and serving upon them a series of notices. If the hon. gentleman will remember, he referred to one trip he made to the constituency of Timiskaming. He said: "I made a speech up there and I told the people there that whatever they did they should vote against the Government candidate. They might vote for a Farmer or for a Liberal, but whatever they did they should not vote for this pernicious Government." I presume that is the only speech he made there, but he took a great deal of credit to himself in the matter. Now, what was the result on polling day? In the town in which he delivered that address we find that the Government candidate received a vote of practically two to one against his opponent; and I think that if we desired to be at all selfish, we might express the regret that we did not invite the hon. gentleman to speak at other places in that constituency. If my hon. friend can take any solace out of the results let him.

Last year the hon. member was in the position of leader of the Opposition, and how well we remember, in the Victoria Museum, his standing in his place and holding out the light in the window to the Liberal-Unionists on this side. The latch string was hanging out through the door, and the hon. gentleman drew a homely picture inviting the Liberal-Unionists to come back. He has no word this year for those gentlemen; he turns to my hon. friends the farmers from the prairies and holds out a winsome invitation to them to come in and join his ranks. Why, he says, "there is no difference between our policies; our policy is just the same as yours; we are all out for a reduction in the tariff;" but he says, "we must stand pat where we were in 1896." How my hon. friend will justify himself before the country in standing pat as he was in 1896 I do not know. I notice when he said that, that his chest expanded and his voice increased in volume, but when he was talking to my hon. friends opposite his brow clouded and his voice was tremulous and I could scarcely catch what he said. He was not so sure of himself on that occasion, but he followed the lead given by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and decided that he must hand out some sort of invitation, and therefore he gave the invitation to his farmer friends to come in and join in his policy.

Now, I should like to proceed to review briefly the attitude of my hon. friends opposite as given to the House and the country in speeches delivered by the leading critics of the Opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). I think it is proper and desirable that we should know how hon. gentlemen opposite stand on this subject, because after all the way we judge as to the value of our hon. friends' criticisms is to measure them up and see whether or not the opinions expressed by their side all agree. If they do not agree then these hon. gentlemen can hardly expect us to accept them. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's, who for fifteen years was Minister of Finance of this country and who speaks with a great deal of experience and authority, yesterday I think spoke with intense sincerity; and out of his years of wisdom, out of that fifteen years of ripe experience in the position of Minister of Finance, and from his life long experience as a Liberal, he gave his verdict on free trade. We cannot doubt for a moment that he had studied the question. He is an intelligent man; he is a learned man, the editor of a large financial journal which speaks for the financial interests of the country to a large extent; and his words are worthy of consideration. Speaking of free trade, he said, after stating what it was:

> That is free trade, but it is quite possible that the best of principles may be carried too far; it is quite possible that men who believe in the general principle of free trade must recognize that there are conditions under which it cannot be applied.

My hon. friend from Brome has something else to say in the same debate, and on the same issue. Speaking from the same benches as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, he cites a book written by Mr. Keynese on why Europe may become free trade territory, and says:

> That is the policy which the Liberal party aim at in the future. That is the policy which I wish to see adopted in this country.

On the one hand you have a learned and experienced leader on the other side declaring that it is impracticable and unwise to apply the principles of an abstract theory in practice; and on the other hand you have a pseudo-leader declaring that it is his intention to stand four square on the great principles of free trade, of which by the way I shall have something to say later on.

Then we have my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's enunciating some other doctrines which certainly are in absolute contradiction of the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite as expressed in this and in every preceding similar debate in recent years. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) took the full credit and responsibility of the dumping clause, an arbitrary, definite, protective measure and a measure that I do not for one moment criticise. We ought to bear in mind that hon. gentlemen who pretend to a certain element in the country that they are the friends and the advocates of the policy of free trade have no right to stand upon this doctrine which has been enunciated by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's.

But that is not all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) takes a step forward and he makes another rather extraordinary statement, a statement that I, with all my Toryism, such as it is, would hesitate to make in this House. He says that not only is he in favour of a measure of protection but that the peculiar brand of protection he is in favour of is the bonus rather than the customs tariff. Bonuses and bounties are classified by all economists as constituting the most extreme measure of protection. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's to quote his words, says:

> I would willingly help an infant industry, and as between protection and bounties—

Mark his words!

> I think I would prefer the bounties.

That is from the lips of the leading financial critic of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman who himself moved the amendment to the resolution which I shall deal with later. Again I invite the attention of the House to a strange contradiction in the attitude of his colleague who followed him a few hours afterwards and who referred to the statement of the Minister of Finance dealing with infant industries and the necessity of not killing or annihilating them by careless or reckless legislation. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) goes on to say:

> He speaks of legitimate industries. What are legitimate industries in this country?

Bearing in mind the attitude of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, this is what he says:

> I will answer that. Legitimate industries are those which can stand on their own feet, and pay their own way, and which do not require to be bonused by the taxpayers of this country.

On the one hand you have one leader (Mr. Fielding) stating that he prefers bounties and bonuses in protecting infant industries and on the other hand you have his colleague, (Mr. McMaster) ousted temporarily I believe, from the position of chief financial critic, saying that he is absolutely opposed to bonuses and bounties.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's not only was in favour of bonuses and bounties but he was in favour of mergers as well. Again I am not differing from him. I would pause to say that in my estimation, and this has been my opinion for a great many years, so called mergers, combines or whatever terms you like, or large combinations of capital as applied to industry, constitute a wise and economical method of handling industry provided there is reasonable governmental restrictions on their operations so that they cannot impose their power upon the country in an oppressive manner. In so far as the operation is concerned I believe it is a sound and economical method of industrial control. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's comes out flat-footed for the merger. Can we not hear the former member for Edmonton, the Hon. Frank Oliver, from his place in this House, year after year, as I and many hon. members have heard him, hounding the Government because he said that it was, supporting trusts, mergers and combines? To-day, here is his colleague (Hon. Mr. Fielding) who sat with him for fifteen years in the same Cabinet chamber standing foursquare for trusts, mergers and combines. That is the condition that we see amongst hon. gentlemen opposite. In the light of that attitude of mind, in the light of these statements made by these hon. gentlemen, what construction are we to put upon the amendment which is before the House?

The hon. member for Brome made the statement that he delighted to take Great Britain as an example and lead in his financial policy. In view of the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in moving this amendment, I am going to invite the attention of the House for a moment to the last British Budget delivered only a few weeks ago by the Right Hon. Austen Chamberlain whom my hon. friend delights to follow. What was done in that Budget in the way of taxes? Compare Mr. Austen Chamberlain's action with that of our Minister of Finance. The British Government brought down their Budget and increased the taxes in connection with the postal service—we have a Bill on the table of this House to increase the charges in connection with the postal service. The British Government increased the taxes in connection with telegraphs and telephones. That is a Government institution over there and we as a government are not so deeply interested here in telegraphs and telephones. They increased the charge for motor licenses, which service is controlled by the Imperial Government—we are imposing a new and enlarged tax upon motors in this country. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is not in his seat but I invite the attention of his colleagues, because this is included in their platform, to the fact that the British Government repealed the land values tax. They increased the taxes on spirits, beer, wine and cigars. One would think that they had been reading the proposals of the Minister of Finance of Canada. They enlarged the stamp taxes increasing the tax on cheques, notes, share transfers, receipts, etc. They made no increase in the income tax. We have made an increase in the income tax. They also have a business profits tax, as we have. They have imposed a new tax on corporations in Great Britain. We last year put a tax on corporations, which has been in operation for a year and is being continued. These are new methods of taxation in Great Britain practically every one of which is included in the Budget before us to-day. Will my hon. friends opposite, in the few days to come, stand up in their places and advocate the complete wiping out of these proposals?

The hon. member for Brome made a proposal also that I think should be reviewed very briefly because it should not pass without being taken notice of. He stated yesterday that there certainly should be a direct levy on war wealth. He means a direct levy against capital. Is he justified in standing on this ground? He told the House that a Royal Commission in Great Britain had passed upon the question and that a Bill is about to be brought in. As a matter of fact Mr. Speaker, he is a long way ahead of the pace set in Great Britain in that regard. A commission, or a committee of the House, is, or has been, sitting on this question. They have not yet reported, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated in his Budget Speech that he was not yet certain whether or not the matter would be taken up in the way of legislation. But there is a vast difference between a levy on capital in Great Britain and a levy on capital in Canada. The difference, which is fundamental, is this: Capital in Great Britain is very largely of a liquid character. Great Britain has been for centuries the banker of the world, and there is concentrated in that country a great deal of liquid capital. During the war many individuals, for their firms, corporations and so forth, made huge profits, which came to them in the form of what I call liquid wealth. What is the condition of Canada? Nearly every firm, nearly every individual, that made money to any degree out of the war, have invested their profits in the enlargement of their plants. Investment was made by placing all their profits back in their business, enlarging their plants; and in very few cases —as far as I have been able to discover, and I have given the matter a great deal of thought—has there been any very large increase in what you might call liquid wealth. Now let us see? How would you assess or take this wealth? My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) was very silent on the question—he did not discuss it. He gave no indication that he had given it a moment's thought; he simply propounded it as a thing that would appeal to the popular ear. The taking of the war wealth! How would you take the war wealth? Let us get down to something concrete! Here is, we will say, a large factory like the Polson Iron Works in Toronto, or one of the large packing concerns. These people made money, a certain amount of money during the war. But what occurred? Those who were engaged, for instance, in the manufacture of munitions, in almost every case put that money into new machinery, or extensions of plant, and there it is to-day. If we were to assess their wealth, so called, the only way we could secure any portion of it would be by taking a portion of the plant, or forcing a liquidation of the plant. I will give a concrete illustration. I know of a firm—a saw-mill, a lumber company—with a capital of $100,000. They borrowed from the bank, $200,000 which made their invested and operating capital $300,000. Now when aeroplane spruce was being cut in large quantities this firm made a net profit of $100,000. You might say that was 100 per cent profit on the capital, and that they should pay a large sum into the treasury of the country. As a matter of fact, under the existing law, that firm is assessed at $64,000. Now, what is the result? The firm is faced with this condition: They have borrowed from the bank the last dollar of credit they could secure, $200,000. They are asked to pay $64,000 into the exchequer. They have not got it. Where is the $100,000? It is in extended plant, a new wharf, an increase of their machinery, the extension of buildings, and an increase of stock being carried in their yard. In order to pay the tax levy, or the assessment on their wealth direct, they would be compelled to close down and liquidate by the selling of a portion of their plant. I merely state that to indicate the difficulties facing those who take any stock in the proposal so lightly suggested by my hon. friend from Brome.

Now let me turn for a moment or two to the amendment, moved by my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), and I think hon. gentlemen on both sides should give it the closest attention. What is the significance of this amendment, what does it mean? My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has moved that "all the words after, that (in the resolution) be struck out." Now what does that mean? It means this: That all the schedules, that all the proposed taxes, will be cut off supposing the amendment carries. There will be no such taxation imposed, and this revenue will not be raised—it will be abandoned. The amendment condemns the action of the Government in proposing this taxation, and repudiates the whole resolution submitted by the Minister of Finance. In other words, to make the amendment more direct and practical, hon. gentlemen opposite propose to strike out the ten per cent tax on luxuries, the fifteen per cent tax on automobiles, the twenty per cent tax on gramophones, etc., the twenty per cent tax on playing cards, the thirty per cent tax on patent medicines, etc., the $2 a gallon on liquors, the thirty cents a gallon on ale and beer, the $3 on champagne

They propose to strike out the provision for one per cent on sales; to strike out the increased tax on bills of exchange and promissory notes, and the tax on the transfer of shares. They go even further—they prevent the imposition of an increased income tax. They stop the repeal of the seven and a half per cent customs war tax, and they prevent the putting on the free list of books and appliances for the blind. That is what the amendment means—it means a complete and absolute repudiation of the total proposals of the Government for the raising of revenue in this country during the coming year.

Now, what do my hon. friends opposite offer in place of that? This I submit, Sir, is a logical and proper question to ask. Not one single word has dropped from the lips of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, the hon. member for Brome, or the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria, to say what they propose to put in place of the Government's taxation proposals. My hon. friends repudiate and reject all the proposals of the Government, and this is what they propose to adopt in their place: They express a pious wish in the amendment that substantial reductions of the burden of customs taxation may be brought about. Now let us consider that for a moment. Here we are in Canada faced by an enormous expenditure. What does that expenditure consist of? An enormous sum for interest on our war debt; a huge sum for pensions; large amounts of money for land settlement; and then there is the cost of carrying on the ordinary business of the country. These are the purposes for which the Government is asking money from Parliament. We must get the money, and hon. gentlemen opposite know that themselves. The Finance Minister shows that he will be able to raise a large portion of this money—what he proposes will meet almost the total of the ordinary expenditures—but he points out that in the fall there is accruing due some $70,000,000 of short term loans, and those of us who have given the matter any consideration at all know that next year, and the following year, 1922-3, there are other sums coming due. Is it not only wise but prudent on our part to make adequate provision to meet these short term loans? We must do so, or else go into the market and borrow with the result of enlarging our debt, increasing our burdens, and following a line of action that is not being adopted, I am glad to say, by any other country in the world of the standing of Canada. So, Sir, my hon. friends opposite, by their amendment—and I wish to make this absolutely clear; they know it, I presume, but apparently are ignoring it—repudiate every proposal that has been submitted for the raising of this money. If my hon. friends opposite vote for that amendment, as possibly they will, then they repudiate the very measures that they advocate in their own platform, a direct tax of one kind or another, and I shall deal with that a moment later. They not only do that, but they fail to submit one single suggestion of a concrete character to take the place of these enormous reductions that must come about. Is that the whole story? It is not, for there is this much further: They propose a drastic and a definite reduction of customs duty. What does that mean? Can they reduce the customs duty without reducing the revenue? Our revenue from that source is in the neighbourhood of $150,000,000. If they make any tariff reduction that is worth while—30 per cent would not be an unreasonable guess at what they are aiming at—it would mean $50,000,000 additional reduction. And not a single word as to what source of revenue is to take its place.

I invite hon. gentleman opposite to give consideration to this amendment, I invite them to give consideration to the absolute and imperative necessity of carrying on during this year and meeting some of the obligations to which I have referred. Surely we can fight out the points of differences on methods without absolutely abandoning the needs of the country; surely, Sir, we could produce to this House some suggestions which might be different from these proposals without rejecting the latter in toto; surely there is some merit in the proposals of the Government. I hold that those proposals, as far as we have been able to judge, have been received throughout the country with general approval, and I doubt if my hon. friends will get very much credit from the people in their efforts—which will fail—to land the country into the lamentable position which their amendment would produce if adopted.

We have heard a great deal during this debate about the Government not keeping faith in connection with tariff reform. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am independent enough and radical enough to criticise the Government if I consider it is derelict in its duty—and I have done it when it has not perhaps resulted in any particular good to myself. But let us look at this thing fairly. Last year the right hon.

member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White), then Finance Minister, made a statement in his Budget Speech—a carefully prepared statement, in which he said, among other things:

> Within a year conditions will, I hope, have become stabilized so as to permit of a general revision of the tariff.

And he wound up by saying:

> My own view is that it might well commence in the fall.

My hon. friends opposite charge the ex-Finance Minister with having broken faith, with having made a promise which has not been carried out. But that statement of his was based on conditions becoming stabilized. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen seriously if ever there was a time in the history of the world when conditions were less stable than they are to-day—or than they were in January and February, because they have, I am glad to say, improved a little since? Was there ever a time in the history of this country, even during the Crimean War before Confederation, when the conditions were less stable than they were in the months of January and February? Exchange was so demoralized that the whole world was temporarily in a panic. The only thing that saved us from a serious panic in the United States and Canada was the fact that the Old Land, with its usual buoyancy, was able to ship to New York large quantities of gold in the last few months, somewhat temporarily, at least, stabilizing conditions.

But would any hon. gentleman suggest seriously that this was a time to reduce the tariff? How could we reduce it, looking at it from a practicable standpoint? Could we take up the schedules covering the imports from the United States under the present abnormal conditions with exchange against us; or the schedules which naturally cover importations from France, or from Belgium, or from any of the other European countries where the discount against them ranges from 60 to as high as 90 per cent? While I am strongly in favour of a revision of the tariff, I think the Government would have been derelict in its duty had it precipitated a revision under those conditions. Not only would it have been derelict in its duty, Sir, but it would have attempted an almost impossible task.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) quoted a statement made in 1911 in connection with a Bill then before the House to create a permanent tariff commission. That Bill was killed in the Senate,—not by supporters of this Government or of the Government to which this succeeded, it was killed by his Liberal friends in that Chamber at the instigation of his friends in this House. He referred to that, and then he said that we had gone for eight years since and no effort had been made to appoint a permanent tariff commission. I again invite the House to give that statement consideration. Has there been any day from the 4th of August, 1914, down to the present time when a revision of the tariff was a practical measure? What would my hon. friends have said if in the year 1918, or 1917, or 1916, or even last year, this Government had stated to the House, "We propose to revise the tariff," Why, they would have told the Government very plainly that it was out of its mind to attempt such a thing under the circumstances. There was not a day from the 4th of August, 1914, down to the present time when it was a reasonable proposition to attempt a revision of the tariff; and I very much doubt whether it will be possible within the next eight or ten months.

I am firmly of the opinion that the Government should surround itself with tariff experts. I know they have some already who are second to none, but I think they might perhaps enlarge this staff a little, and secure, as soon as conditions are reasonably stabilized, the fullest information. I think the Government could go this far: they could prepare the machinery which would undertake this investigation, so that when conditions become stabilized in the next five or six months this machinery could be put into motion and we might have some results later on. But for the Government to have undertaken this proposal at any time up to the present moment would have been unwise, impractical and injudicious.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself briefly to what is known as the Farmers' platform. I approach this question not with any desire to be hypercritical of my hon. friends, but rather to draw attention to some striking things in connection with this so-called platform. First, however, I wish to say a few words to the members of that party in this House, which I trust they will receive in the spirit in which I tender them. In that platform they make a rather extraordinary and sweeping statement, and I invite my hon. friends to consider this statement in the light of the additional experience, perhaps, which they now have. I am sorry the hon.

member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is not in his seat, because I shall direct my remarks more particularly to him than to his supporters.

In this platform, and also in public speeches made by the hon. gentleman we find this statement—a statement, Mr. Speaker, given to the country at large as a statement of fact, a statement which is supposed to have the careful and the thoughtful support of the hon. gentlemen who are members of the party which hands it out. The statement reads:

> The protective tariff has been and is a chief corrupting influence in our national life, because protected interests, in order to maintain their unjust privileges, have contributed lavishly to the campaign funds, thus encouraging both political parties to look to them for support, thereby lowering the standard of public morality.

I have also under my hand speeches made by the hon. member for Marquette in which similar statements are made. Now, that is a very serious charge—it is not merely a statement. The charge is that those engaged in manufactures which the tariff affects are the chief corrupting influence in this country. Most of my hon. friends have been in this House for two or more sessions. They know that there are in this House a large number of hon. gentlemen who represent, not in a political sense but in a personal way, the manufacturing interests; that is, there are manufacturers in this House just as there are farmers. Now, let me ask them this: Having in mind this charge; having in mind this serious statement, will they on their responsibility as members of this House say that the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne), the member for Toronto East (Sir Edward Kemp), the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), the member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea), the member for North Essex (Mr. W. C. Kennedy), the member for Waterloo South (Mr. Scott), the member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor), the member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) and others—will my hon. friends say that these men have been and are the chief corrupting influence in this country? All these hon. members are manufacturers. They are honourable members of this House; some of them have been here for a great many years; others for a shorter period. If these gentlemen have corrupted the country; if they have been guilty of corrupt practices, there is a way of penalizing them, a way of exposing them, and that is for an hon. member to stand in his place in the House and say that this hon. member or that hon. member has been guilty of these practices. They are here; they can be called before the bar of public opinion; those who make these charges have an opportunity of proving them. Mr. Speaker, I hold most tenaciously to the principle that no man has a right to make general sweeping statements about his colleagues or his fellow-citizens; to make general statements of condemnation or charges of corruption; to say that which, if not proved, may constitute defamation of character, unless he is prepared to show that the charges he makes are well founded. If a member of this House or any one outside of the House undertakes to make charges which are derogatory of the character of any fellow-citizen, he must either prove his charges or lay himself open to the charge of being unfair and unworthy of citizenship. I say that somewhat forcibly, perhaps, but I think the time has arrived when these sweeping charges should be abandoned.

If I have anything to say to my hon. friends as to their conduct, I will give them chapter and verse; I will tell them what I think of their actions. Let me say a few things in this connection to illustrate my point. My hon. friends opposite, every one of them practically, have stood four square for the control of the sale and handling of wheat in this country. They have insisted on the control exercised by the Canada Wheat Board. Now, what is the result? If the operations carried on by the Canada Wheat Board has been carried on by a board of manufacturers, the country would have heard of it from one end of the land to the other. The Wheat Board was supposed to be a medium that would eliminate all possibility of undue profit or unreasonable charges. That is the principle upon which it was based, but what do we find? We find that in the conveyance of the wheat from the farmer's wagon to the seaboard or to the European market, all those things in respect of which charges are usually made under so-called speculation, under private control, were carefully preserved in connection with the Wheat Board. There are hon. gentlemen in this House closely identified with the Wheat Board. There are here representatives of the Saskatchewan Co-operative Association, of which Mr. Riddell is the moving spirit; he himself controls three hundred or more elevators. Now, I am not making any charges; I am simply making a statement of fact. But what did the Wheat Board do? Instead of abolishing, as they might properly have done, the brokerage fee of one cent a bushel which was usually charged in connection with the commission business in Winnipeg, that fee was carefully preserved by a specific action of the board, and for what purpose? Because the largest beneficiaries of it were the large organizations or combinations such as the Grain Growers and the Saskatchewan Co-operative Association. Moreover, they very carefully provided for a spread of from five to ten cents a bushel for wheat bought in the country elevators. Five to ten cents a bushel is a mighty fine profit on wheat handled in large quantities. In connection with the commission wheat which moved forward to the head of the Lakes there were the storage charges. In Alberta and Saskatchewan elevators have been kept full of wheat all winter; there has not been any very great effort to move it, because the Canada Wheat Board pays the elevator a storage charge for every hour that that wheat is in the elevator. But that is not all. Last year I brought to the attention of the House the fact that the great elevators at the head of the Lakes had, in a period of between five and seven years, taken illegally, contrary to the Grain Act, $15,000,000 in overages out of the pockets of the people; and every one of my hon. friends opposite leaned to the support of that action. Not only that; they induced the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make an amendment to the Grain Act which legalized what had up to that time been an illegal act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the point I am making is this: My hon. friends may not have started out deliberately to do these things. The very basis of their organization was indignation at the operators in Winnipeg and at the head of the Lakes; indignation with regard to dockages; indignation with regard to the unfair seizing, taking or appropriation, whatever you like to call it, of the screenings. These were the cries upon which they inspired so many farmers to join their organization. But once they got into the business they did exactly what all other terminal elevators did. If the Government would appoint the Price, Waterhouse Company to make an investigation into the country elevators, (the so-called line elevators) similar to that which they made into the terminal elevators, they would expose to this country a surprising and startling condition. I have heard people say: Well, it is only a matter of a half cent here and a cent there and two or three per cent somewhere else. But I will guarantee that from the farmer to the head of the Lakes deductions to the extent of ten per cent are made that ought not to be made, representing amounts which, if these operations were carefully restricted and properly controlled and directed, would accrue very largely to the farmers. Take, for instance, this question of overages. Last year, a very poor year, at the head of the Lakes over $2,000,000 worth of grain were taken from the farmer, taken from the person who shipped it there, absolutely illegally—at any rate, the action was illegal prior to the adoption of last year's amendment making it legal—I will say, unjustly. Not only that; the Canada Grain Act shows that these screenings should be accounted for where there is a larger dockage than three per cent; but they never, if they can possibly avoid it, account for screenings. I am trying to point out to my hon. friends that there is an axiom in law that when a person comes into court to make charges against some one else he shall come with clean hands. I say also that if the manufacturers of this country could be exposed as having practised these things, it would be known from one end of the country to the other. I conclude this portion of my remarks by saying that as soon as my hon. friends got into the business they carried on the practices which they had previously condemned, even to the extent of gambling in futures, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the grain, for, in one year, my hon. friends' company lost in New York $250,000, and, at the head of the Lakes, other sums amounting in all to about $43,000, in a practice, as regards which some of them at least petitioned the Government of Canada about 1910 to amend the Criminal Code to make gambling in futures a criminal offence. Before these hon. gentlemen publish to the world that the manufacturing classes generally (including some hon. gentlemen whom I have named and who have been honoured members of the House for years) are the corrupting and immoral influence of the country, they want to be mighty sure that their own hands are just as clean as they were before they got into these large avenues of business.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS (Resuming): Mr. Chairman, I wish to go a step further in connection with this Farmers' platform. I find in it this clause:

That all corporations engaged in the manufacture of products protected by the customs tariff be obliged to publish annually comprehensive and accurate statements of their earnings.

I have no particular objection to a requirement of that kind. But what I do object to, and what I would impress upon my hon. friends who advance this platform, is this, that it is decidedly unfair, undemocratic and unjust to limit the publication of comprehensive and accurate statements of earnings to the manufacturers. Why the manufacturers more than any one else? Why should the manufacturers any more, for instance, than an operator of a grain elevator, or a large wholesale implement dealer, a coal dealer, a dealer in flour, in lumber or in other commodities commonly used by the people, be required to do this? Why should not these, as well as the manufacturers of the country, publish comprehensive and detailed statements of their earnings? In substantiation of this, and again to point out to my hon. friends that they are not coming before the House with clean hands in this regard, I wish to draw to the attention of the House some figures in connection with the operations of the United Grain Growers and subsidiary companies. There is a company, the stock of which is owned and controlled by the United Grain Growers, known as the Grain Export Company. It is a New York corporation and all of its stock is owned by the United Grain Growers' Company. This Grain Export Company has an authorized capital of $250,000, but its records show, and the sworn statement of Mr. Rice Jones, the secretary of the company, also shows, that the company had a paid-up capital of $100,000 and the balance of $150,000 was paid out of stock dividends. At this point I pause to bring to the attention of the House another clause in the platform of my friends, a clause which is very interesting in the light of this method of financial manipulation:

> That in levying and collecting the business profits tax the Dominion Government should insist that it be absolutely upon the basis of the actual cash invested in the business and that no considerations be allowed for what is popularly known as watered stock.

Mr. J. F. REID: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear," and I agree with him absolutely. But the point I am making is this: If those gentlemen are going to include in their platform a statement of that kind, if in all their speeches, in the speech of the president of the company on the occasion of its annual meeting, and in the public speeches of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), they are going to condemn the practice of creating capital which does not represent cash invested, then I say we are justified in reviewing the operations of some of their own companies. Now, I bring this particular company to the attention of the House. What is its financial history? Briefly this. It has an authorized capital of $250,000, of which $100,000 was paid up in cash and $150,000 was paid in the form of stock dividends. Had that been a concern in which, let us say, my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) or some other hon. member representing a manufacturing company was concerned, that would have been considered watered stock, and it would have been condemned as an unreasonable and unfair imposition on the public. It would be charged against the manufacturer as being an extortion from the people. But that is not all. I find in the sworn statement of the secretary the following:

> In addition to the stock dividend of $150,000 this company paid to the parent company $300,000 in cash.

That is pretty fair earning. As a matter of fact, in one year's operation this Grain Export Company, with an actual cash investment of $100,000, made $500,000 of profit. I repeat to you, Sir, and I draw the fact to the attention of hon. members, that if we were dealing now with a manufacturing company some hon. gentlemen would have ample ground for denouncing all manner of crookedness, extortion and exploitation. I am not laying this to the charge of my hon. friends, but I simply say that if they are going to attack the manufacturing interests of the country we will view their own operations and see whether or not the same general principles of finance are applied to their own business, and applied in a more successful manner than in the case of any manufacturing concern I know of. That being so, then I say to my hon. friends that they should withdraw the aspersions contained in their platform and in their speeches against the manufacturers.

I proceed a step further. I intimated this afternoon that my hon. friends opposite came to Ottawa—I think it was in 1910—and presented resolutions demanding that it be made a criminal offence to deal in futures on the grain exchange. We find this Grain Export Company, a subsidiary of the United Grain Growers, making a loss in one year of $245,000, a loss, according to the sworn statement of Mr. Rice Jones, due to the lack of sufficient margin in their gambling estimate of the matter. I am using their own words that are crystallized into resolutions by these very gentlemen, and not my words. But in spite of that loss they succeeded in turning over to the parent company $300,000, and in paying a stock dividend of $150,000, and in addition to that, a year ago, they had $150,000 or $300,000 in reserve—the secretary said he knew it was $150,000, and possibly it was $300,000. I say to hon. gentlemen who make charges of unreasonable profits against the whole world and particularly against the manufacturing interests, that we cannot find, in the wildest romance of manufacturing in this country, a more extreme type of profiteering than that.

Let us turn to another phase of their operations. I refer hon. members to a report laid on the table of the House last year to which I have already referred, namely, the report of Price, Waterhouse and Company, the auditors in connection with the elevators at the head of the Lakes. What do we find there? We find our friends, some of them in the House, operating a grain elevator leased from the Canadian Pacific Railway upon which they pay a rent equal to about six per cent, or seven per cent now, on cost of construction. On the operation of that elevator in one year they made a net profit of 211 per cent. Deducting from that profit of 211 per cent the losses they made on margins in speculating on grain that did not belong to them, it left 187 per cent. Why do I say speculating in grain that did not belong to them? This is a point which I wish the House to understand clearly. I could not emphasize it last year when I tried to place before the House the iniquitous character of this and other proceedings. It is contrary to an Act passed by this Parliament for any terminal elevator company at the head of the Lakes to deal in any grain overages in its care. The grain that is there is not their grain; they are not allowed to buy a bushel of grain; it is grain in transit; it is grain in trust. But the terminal elevators used to sell, in July or before the end of August, the anticipated overages. Once in a while they would get caught. One year the elevator of my hon. friends got caught and made one loss of, I think, $23,000 and another of a smaller amount. You may scrutinize with the utmost care the operations of my hon. friends in business and you will not find one single iota of deviation from the general methods of doing business by those whom they previously condemned. In issuing a pamphlet, and in subscribing to a platform of this kind, they have no right to condemn those other operators when they are themselves indulging, infinitely more successfully, in the same practices and the same methods.

Going on a step farther, and coming to the parent company. This is a co-operative company. It was the father of this whole movement and the parent of this platform. That company has paid ten per cent since 1911, and it has an accumulated surplus of $1,700,000. It may be said, and it will be said if anybody chooses to reply to my remarks to-night, that there is a premium on the stock. According again to the sworn evidence of Mr. Rice-Jones a large portion of this premium on stock amounting to $400,000 was paid out in commissions for the sale of stock. That might reduce the $1,700,000 by $200,000, but after that is done you still have $1,500,000 of a surplus. That is a very handsome surplus. But that is not all of the story. The balance of the story is that in addition to the main operations of this concern there are branches such as the Grain Growers' Guide, a perfectly legitimate enterprise, that make losses and have made losses for years and years. Those losses are hidden by and absorbed in the general prosperity of the company. The point in all this is that our hon. friends in advancing to this House and to the country this platform should delete all references carrying insinuations of corruption and insincerity on the part of their fellow-citizens, guilty as they are of exactly the same methods and practices but with enhanced success so far as results are concerned.

I find another plank in this platform; that in reference to the publication of election campaign fund contributions. I have no objection to that, I think it is perfectly proper. If I am not mistaken the Bill before the House is very clear on that point. It was introduced by this Government and we are supporting it. But let us examine this question of campaign funds. From one end of this country to the other speeches have been made. I have under my hand reports of speeches by the hon. the leader of the National Progressive party, the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in which he makes charges similar to those in the platform in referring to corruption in connection with campaign funds.

Let me carry my hon. friends back in history about fifty or sixty years. The first lieutenant of the hon. member for Marquette is the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who, I am exceedingly sorry to learn, is sick and in the hospital; I know we will all regret that fact. The hon. member for Red Deer traverses this ground so frequently that I think I may be permitted a passing reference. I am sure that I shall not be criticised for quoting Morley, John Bright and Cobden, because they are without any question the very gods of the party referred to in this platform. In the great campaign for free trade, commencing about 1841, or reaching the storm point about 1841, John Bright secured a campaign fund from the manufacturers of Manchester and Birmingham of £750,000 sterling, or nearly $5,000,000, at that time worth perhaps three times what it is worth to-day. He went into Bristol and London and got another £500,000. John Bright was the apostle of political purity, the man held up to this House as the ideal character for all of us to follow, whose doctrines were so unselfish and whose ideals so high that we are called upon year after year and almost month after month whenever the hon. member for Red Deer speaks, to follow in John Bright's footsteps. Yet £1,250,000 was raised by this gentleman for a campaign fund and it was used for the purpose of disseminating the views that he held. I am not criticising this action; I think a man has a perfect right to subscribe to a fund to support, spread, advocate and disseminate the doctrine which he thinks is right. My hon. friends opposite—and I am not saying anything that is hidden; it is well known—have an organized method of getting a large campaign fund. What for? For teaching the doctrines in which they believe. They have a perfect right to do that. They are asking—I was going to say "compelling" but I will not use that word, but there is a very strong pressure at least being brought—every one of their members to subscribe $7 to the campaign fund for promoting the political aspirations of the leaders of that movement. It is perfectly legitimate in so far as I know and I have no criticism to offer. But when our friends advocate a free trade policy, point to the manufacturing interests of the country as a corrupting and immoral influence, and declare that steps should be taken to suppress them, they should look over their own history and the history of their own movement and see what they themselves are doing. What difference does it make whether I subscribe $10, or $100, or $1,000? If I am legally entitled to subscribe $100 there is nothing to prevent me from subscribing $1,000, if I wish to, for the purpose of teaching, disseminating and spreading a doctrine in which I believe.

As long as a campaign fund is kept within the bounds of decency and honesty no man can criticise it. But if such a fund is used illegally for corrupting purposes and if that is known by our hon. friends, then the duty rests upon them to put their finger upon that corrupting individual, or influence, and expose him to the eyes of the world. There are laws in abundance to protect them. Therefore I say that these pious expressions from my hon. friends are scarcely warranted; they are not warranted in this platform. I bring to the attention of my hon. friends another matter which I think has a sentimental and, I was going to say, almost a moral bearing. It is this: The pioneer of the prairie— for I have been West, Sir, for twenty-seven years, and I know something about prairie life as well as about life on the Pacific coast—the pioneer on the prairie had a pretty hard time. In the outlying districts he has a pretty hard time to-day. It takes quite a bit of grit to get located and, Mr. Speaker, it takes a little grit to get a plough, a team of horses, a reaper, a mower and a few other implements. Will my hon. friends of the Co-operative Society give him credit? You, Mr. Speaker, or any person, go and locate on the prairies and see if they will sell you a binder, or a mower, or a plough, or a harrow, on credit. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) and my hon. friends from other parts of Ontario have millions of dollars out on credit on the prairie—millions of dollars. They carry the farmer out there for six months, a year, two years. I remember a few years ago seeing figures aggregating something like $8,000,000 around the prairies, some of which paper was three and four years old. Sometimes owing to a bad year there is no return in crop, and there being no possibility of payment the notes are renewed. The manufacturers, as I say, carry these farmers. But, Sir, this great corporation, this co-operative society—according to the sworn evidence of Mr. Rice-Jones last year—will not give one cent of credit: you must put your cash down and take your machine away or you do not get it. I say to them that in condemning the manufacturer, in making this schism through the country, creating a feeling of bitterness against the manufacturers and imputing to them corrupt purposes, they might as well scrutinize and view the moral character of their own transactions as regards assisting the man who is hard up, as compared with the extremely liberal credit given by these operators that I have mentioned.

Now, in further reference to this platform I shall very briefly refer to several items. My hon. friends have on their platform "A Graduated Income Tax." We have had that for two or three years, and a mighty steep one it is. "The Business Profits Tax." It is on, and bearing heavily, Mr. Speaker, upon the industries of the country. I would like to take time to discuss that question, but I shall not do so: The tax is there and there is no use now complaining—in fact, Sir, the business men of the country are not complaining very seriously. But it is a difficult tax. These things are very easy to advocate in the way of theory, but when you come to apply them, when you come to give an equitable and just application of them they become very difficult measures to apply. However, a business profits tax has been applied since 1916, and is still in existence, so my hon. friends cannot complain of that. Then they advocate "A Graduated Inheritance Tax." But, Mr. Speaker, that field is occupied by the several Provincial Governments. We cannot superimpose upon the inheritance tax of the Provincial Governments another inheritance tax. A serious error very frequently made in this House is to liken, or attempt to liken, the taxation of Great Britain with that of Canada, and in doing so it is always conveniently forgotten by the critics that in Great Britain the Government has the whole field of taxation to itself, while in Canada that field is shared by nine legislatures and the Federal Parliament. Very, very frequently the provincial authorities occupy a field of taxation and we cannot occupy it except with hardship. That is the situation in the case of the income tax; and I think that the Federal Government and the governments of the several provinces might well get together and review this Income Tax law with a view of making it equitable throughout the whole Dominion. Let the provinces abandon the field or the Dominion abandon the field, and if they both wish to have the tax let us have one overhead charge for collection, then collect the tax in the most economical manner, and divide the proceeds. In any case, Sir, it is a fair subject for investigation, and for study and thought.

Then my hon. friends have a plank in their platform referring to returned soldiers. E-ery suggestion made is already in operation, is already being carried out: Land settlement—the care of the sick and the crippled—vocational training—pensions, and so forth; and at this moment a pensions committee, composed of impartial members from both sides of the House, is sitting and will shortly, we hope, bring in a report dealing with this question in an up-to-date manner.

And so we go on through the whole platform. I find one very interesting plank to which I would like to make brief reference. It is a plank that is always seized upon when a party, or a group, have very little else to recommend them to the public. It is the "Reform of the Senate." It is a plank, Mr. Speaker, that one can always dilate upon in any place and under any circumstances. In regard to it I would like to say, Sir, that whatever criticisms may be offered of the organization of the Dominion Parliament as it is at the present time, I am not at all in favour of the abolition of the Senate. It may be, Sir, that the Senate—its organization, and the method of appointment of senators—might be improved, but it is a subject which calls for very great care and very serious thought before action is taken, in order that rash action may be avoided.

There are numerous other planks which are of minor importance. What I would say to my hon. friends, however, before I leave this platform is, that in our present Budget we are giving effect to direct taxation to an extent not suggested even in their platform. We have met nearly all the points that are there of a constructive character. We have made a substantial reduction in the customs tariff of approximately $30,000,000—that is what the removal of the seven and a half per cent customs duty will amount to approximately, I am told. Well, $30,000,000 is a pretty sweeping reduction for one year, and I would suggest to the leader of the Opposition that he should consider the amendment before the House in the light of that reduction. When you ask indefinitely, in a sort of pious manner, for a general reduction of the tariff, it may be well to see what this seven and a half per cent reduction really means. It is a serious reduction, Mr. Speaker, and one which I think, in the aggregate perhaps, will measure up well with any suggestion that could possibly come from hon. gentlemen opposite. It meets the platform of my hon. friends, because they say: "We do not intend to reduce the tariff all in one year." They realize, I think, that if they wiped out $160,000,000 of revenue they would be simply at sea—completely lost—they would find it impossible to replace that revenue from other sources. The other fields of taxation are pretty well occupied, and so they dare not tamper with the tariff carelessly from the purely revenue standpoint. And so my hon. friends will find that in this Budget we are pretty well meeting the whole of this platform.

Now I wish to say a few words in connection with the Wheat Board. One criticism I have to make of the Wheat Board is that it is duplicating another board already in existence, namely the Grain Commission. I am not suggesting that in time of war it was not wise to appoint the Wheat Board, because under war conditions, under the exigencies of war, you are bound to do things which perhaps upon maturer thought in times of peace would not be done. The Wheat Board was appointed in war time. And now the war is over. The function of the Wheat Board is to market the wheat of Canada. I hold that it is an expensive luxury. I hold that if you are going to market wheat through governmental agencies, the Grain Commission can perform that function. If they are unable to do it—if the personnel of the Grain Commission is such that they do not understand the business of marketing this grain, then the commission might be enlarged for that purpose. But in connection with the Wheat Board I find a situation that might well occupy the attention of the Government. For instance, the secretary, Mr. Young, is receiving $6,000 a year from the board. He is receiving an additional salary from the Lake Shippers' Clearance Association of $10,000. He is a pretty well paid official. I do not think, Sir, that he can successfully serve both masters; I do not think he can give to the country that impartial service which such a commission, almost of a sacred character in its functions and duties if properly conceived, should give. Therefore I think the Government might well at a very early date consider the abolition of this board. It is a costly experiment and has served its purpose. The test is this: Did the Wheat Board lower the cost of marketing our wheat? I have gone into the case with considerable care, and I submit that it has not done so. I believe it was the intention of the Government that it should effect an economy in that direction. What are the facts? The bank interest and exchange in connection with wheat transactions is exactly the same as it used to be; insurance—marine and fire—and storage, are still there under the Wheat Board as under private operation; freight by land and by water is exactly the same. Now in regard to wheat that is sold direct to a country elevator, mark you, the Wheat Board has provided that there shall be a margin allowed of from five to ten cents a bushel. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that these figures convey to hon. members an adequate idea of the magnitude of this margin. I am told by those who understand the business and are familiar with its every angle that it means an average of between seven and eight cents a bushel on all the wheat that is handled in the West and, in fact, in the East too, I believe. That margin is allowed where wheat is bought by the country elevators, and it is an extraordinary allowance. And, let it be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Riddell, the deputy chairman of the board, is the manager of three hundred of those country elevators, and that other interests represented on that board have under their direction another four or five hunderd. That board provides that the elevator carrying wheat through shall be paid from a certain period allowed by the Act—I think 15 days, which is covered by the first charge—until the wheat reaches its destination at the head of the Lakes.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): Might I ask the hon. member a question? Do I understand him to say that the company handling the wheat is allowed storage charges until the wheat is landed at the head of the Lakes.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, Mr. Speaker; and I am absolutely accurate in my statement. I might just point out to my hon. friend from Mackenzie that very rarely will he give place to a member who desires to ask a question, and I trust that he will appreciate the fact that I, and other members, have granted that favour. I would inform him that whenever he chooses to ask me any questions he will always find me willing to give him the floor, and I would suggest to him that that is a little item in the ethics of this House which it is always desirable to observe.

My statement, I reiterate, is absolutely accurate, and for the benefit of my hon. friend I will repeat it: That this Wheat Board, composed of gentlemen who largely control the line elevators of the prairies to the number of 800 or a thousand, provides a special storage charge, which is calculated from, I think, the 15-day allowance in the original charge for handling until the wheat is landed at its point of destination at the head of the Lakes or at the mill, wherever it may be. And let me say this, Sir, that that storage, including the 8 cents a bushel I have referred to, has resulted in enormous earnings to these line elevators. My hon. friends talk about protecting the interests of the farmers of the prairies. Why, Sir, they are to-day hoodwinking those farmers. The farmers of the prairies do not realize the extent to which they are paying for this Co-operative Association, but the time has about arrived when they should know the actual facts in dollars and cents.

Now, on consigned wheat, mark you, going direct to the Grain Board—a transaction in which no other persons are doing anything—that consigned wheat being shipped direct from the elevator to the Grain Board at the head of the Lakes, forsooth there comes in a one-cent brokerage charge, which goes to another party. Then we find that the brokers at Winnipeg are taken care of, they receive their fees just the same as if they were doing the business. We also find that the shippers and the exporters have their fees protected in the regulations of the Wheat Board—all at the expense of the farmer. I suppose my hon. friend will in a few minutes cite one of these items of $\frac{1}{32}$ of a cent a bushel as a small item. But when we add these $\frac{1}{32}$ and $\frac{1}{8}$ and 1 cent, and 2 cents and 8 cents, in the aggregate they soon mount to a very handsome sum; and then when we add to this 6 or 8 per cent which is deducted at the head of the Lakes and paid to the elevators of these gentlemen, the total amounts to a very considerable sum. Then they have provided for fees to the Lake Shippers' Clearance Association, of which forsooth this $6,000 and $10,000 secretary is an officer—one and the same individual—and is on this Wheat Board to see that the members of his association get their proper allowance. I do not say this in an unkind or critical spirit, but I suggest very seriously to the Government that it would be very desirable to have the audited statements and all other papers of the Wheat Board laid on the Table so that some of us, at any rate, might have an opportunity of examining them.

I find there is only one decrease—brokerage, reduced from $\frac{1}{16}$ of a cent to $\frac{1}{32}$ of a cent a bushel. I want to be perfectly frank, that is the only decrease that has been secured by the Wheat Export Board over private operation.

Now, I want to point out that the need of this Wheat Board passed with the signing of the Armistice. It never did lower the cost of handling our wheat; on the contrary, it enhanced that cost. I hold that after the term of this Wheat Board expires next August the marketing of our wheat should be left to the ordinary course of trade. There is where I believe in the freedom of trade. And I would just like to pause a moment to give my hon. friend opposite a short dissertation on free trade.

The name free trade is an utter misnomer. Free trade started with the efforts of individuals centuries ago to get rid of embarrassing trade control. It was in the Hanseatic League and the free cities of Europe that freedom of trade first saw the light of day. The manufacturers, and shippers, and importers of those free cities found they were interfered with by the petty restrictions of feudal barons and despotic governments, and they started a movement for the freedom of trade. In the early part of last century that movement developed in Great Britain into an attempt to free trade from the embarrassing restrictions which then hampered it. And so with regard to the Wheat Export Board, I would say to the House and to the Government, I believe absolutely in freeing our wheat business from this control. I believe absolutely in the freeing of our wheat business from control at this time. It may be said that I am giving voice to the opinion of an amateur. I refer the House to a recent report of one of the members of the Imperial Government who stated to the British House that after the most careful thought and study it was believed that the control of foodstuffs, the control of the purchase of wheat, had increased the cost of living, had increased the cost of food, and had in no way contributed to the welfare of the people at large.

Now, a word or two of a general character. This is a time when we should look facts in the face. There is no use in blinding our eyes to the fact that we have an enormous public debt. I think I can give the House a few figures which are somewhat startling. I was pleased when the Minister of Finance stated frankly to the House that it was useless to follow the custom that had been followed by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and by every other Finance Minister, that of giving the net debt. What we want to know is what our liabilities to the public are, and when we know that, we shall know what we are required to pay. As near as I can figure it from the statements which I have secured, we have a debt of $2,500,000,000. That is what we have to take care of. We may have assets in addition to those which I have deducted from the gross debt, but they are not convertible. In fact, Sir, to this figure ought to be added the circulation of the country, because, after all, the Dominion notes that we have in circulation are not available to pay or to be applied to the public debt. If we withdrew the Dominion notes from circulation, where would the business of the country go to? The Dominion notes we must keep in circulation; in other words, it is not an available asset. Therefore you ought to add another $125,000,000 or $130,000,000 counted as part of our public debt. But leaving that out, $2,500,000,000 is the debt that this country has to face.

But that is not all. I find that the provincial debts amount in the aggregate to $270,000,000. You may say that that does not concern us. But it does concern us, in this way: wherever we go for credit; wherever we look for taxes to pay our own debt, we are faced with Provincial Governments seeking the same thing for their debt. It is all one country, so what is the difference? So from the national viewpoint, and to look these problems in the face, we ought to add to our national debt the sum of $270,000,000, the total provincial debts. Then, I find that the net aggregate debt of twelve cities of Canada is $393,000,000. Wherever the Finance Minister goes for money he is faced with the fact that that enormous debt is being financed in New York, in Toronto, in Montreal, in other great financial centres. The point I am getting at is this: whether it is municipal, provincial or federal, this enormous debt is on the country and it must be faced.

Now, what we are called upon to do as a Parliament is to face this question and to devise ways and means of dealing with it. There are two problems before us, one the financing of the demands for the ensuing year; the other that of trying to provide finances for the future and to liquidate this enormous debt within a reasonable time. There is a school of finance, I know, which holds to the view that we should pay no attention to the debt; let it go on to posterity. That, I consider, would be an exceedingly unwise course to follow. For this reason: Canada is a growing country; its needs in the way of public works, in the way of expansion of facilities for handling trade and so on, will be enormous. As population increases trade increases, and the demand upon the exchequer increases accordingly. I hold that we will require to employ all the resources of this country to keep pace with the great development which, we are confident, will be our lot in the near future. So I say that we should make every effort to meet this accruing bonded indebtedness as from year to year it becomes due. That means that within a few years we should pay off about $300,000,000. An effort should be made to provide a fund out of which this money can be paid.

I have a suggestion to offer. It has been discouraged and rejected by some to whom I have talked about it; by others it has been approved. I know that it is easy, Sir, to talk; it is easy to suggest and sometimes very difficult to carry out. But during recent years an expression very commonly used is that our national debt must be taken care of out of our natural resources. In the abstract, Sir, that is perfectly true; it is a statement with which we can all agree. But it is of utterly no value unless some concrete and definite method of extracting that wealth from the natural resources is advanced. It is just as useless to point out that the coal in the ground is of certain value; in fact, it is of no value until capital is applied to it and it is extracted from the ground and put upon the market. So it is with our minerals; so it is with our oil, our fisheries, our forests. But throughout this country we have immense natural resources which are undeveloped. A man is supposed to be somewhat of a fool who will venture a prophecy to-day, but I will venture the opinion that in the next ten years Canada will see greater development of its natural resources than it has witnessed in the past fifty years. Now, what should we do? I hold, Sir, that we, this Parliament, the Government, are saddled with a grave responsibility in that we must see to it that out of these resources a fair share of any profit made goes to the State exchequer. Mr. Speaker, in making that statement I have not gone far enough; I have still left unsettled the modus operandi. I have a further suggestion to make,—not dogmatically, not as a final thing, simply as a contribution of thought, and if others have contributions to make I think that during the course of this debate would be a very suitable time to make them. I suggest that all concerned holding the privilege or operating directly on the public domain, such as those engaged in lumbering, fishing, mining, oil operations, electrical water power development, and so on, should be taxed a portion of their surplus earnings. My hon. friend behind me suggests that I am leaving the farmers out. I am speaking, Sir, of large operations. I am not rough on the farmer; I do not include his personal operation. I refer only to large operations which involve a direct application of capital to the public domain and its development. Where profit is made; where large earnings accrue, I hold that all above a reasonable sum should be divided with the Government.

That is not a new suggestion; it is embodied in the business profits tax. But an objection suggests itself. It is stated that if you take away the profit of those engaged in these operations, there is no inducement for them to go on; you prevent the company from expanding and applying its earnings to the extension of its plant. That is perfectly sound, and I meet that objection by saying that where you assess say forty per cent of surplus earnings of a given corporation, that amount shall remain in the company, if they so choose, and be capitalized, and upon that capital surplus the company shall pay a dividend to the State. This will perhaps not bring immediately a large revenue; but, in time, it will bring to Canada a large revenue, and where large profits are made, such as those which have been made by the nickel companies and by some of the steel, coal, iron and other companies, the State will get a share.

Another thought is this. In that great hinterland to the north of Edmonton in Northern Alberta, we are told upon the very best geological advice, we have oil fields equal to anything on this continent. If that be the case, the Government would be well advised to enter into partnership with any companies that may open up that country and engage in extracting from the ground the immense wealth contained in those oil fields. If oil be there, as our geologists say, in a few years immense fortunes will be made, and the State should share in those fortunes. There are other classes of business that I think Parliament might well consider as a legitimate field of operation. For instance, all concerns holding a special and exclusive franchise from the State, such as banks, insurance companies and so forth. These concerns have, in a sense, a monopoly; they have in a sense exclusive control over their particular field of operations, and at the same time they are of a quasi-public character. In so far as they earn surplus profits, the State should share in those profits. I am not going to pursue that thought any further; I simply make the suggestion that before the House at this time there is a dual duty; the first duty is to provide for this year; the second duty is to look into the future and to seek to provide a permanent source of income.

I conclude by again appealing to my hon. friends opposite and to hon. members forming the new group at this end of the Chamber, that if they vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), they shut out absolutely the taxation propcsals for the coming year and in their place the only thing they offer to the country is an old, bare bone, a sort of pious wish that the customs tariff might be reduced. At a time when we must have funds, not only do they stop us from getting the funds we are reaching out for, but at the same time, they reduce the existing revenue. I cannot conceive that this amendment has been seriously proposed; I cannot consider that an hon. gentleman of the experience of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and other hon. gentlemen around him can possibly seriously propose or think that this amendment should carry. It should be defeated; it should never go to a vote in this House, because if the thing is serious at all, it has not the hall-mark of commonsense upon it.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to have the honour of replying to the speech to which we have just listened, and which has been kept to the height of the high plane which this debate has maintained since its commencement. I will do my utmost not to lower that plane, and although I may differ from hon. gentlemen on the other side, I wish my remarks to be taken as they are offered, and in the same spirit which animates me in making them.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) has divided his remarks into three parts, one of which was a lecture that he thought it his duty to give to the Farmers' group. It is not my intention to interfere in that regard; I will let the representatives of the Farmers' group settle their differences with the hon. gentleman. But may I be permitted to state that I was amazed to hear the hon. gentleman stating that the United Farmers were profiteers, and that their association was, in the question of overages, committing an illegal act. If this be true, how is it that the Government supported by my hon. friend allows the United Farmers to be profiteers without taking them to task? And how is it that these United Farmers committing illegalities are permitted to continue committing illegalities and that the Government, which is responsible for those illegalities, still has the support of my hon.

friend? His position in this regard is not logical.

My hon. friend has taken a great deal of pains to show to the House and to the country that there was a contradiction between the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). Any man belonging to a party and speaking in his individual name has a right to give his individual opinion; but if he belongs to a party and if he wishes to remain in that party, he must adhere to the platform of that party. The Liberal party held a convention in August of last year; they propounded their policy, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the hon. member for Brome, when they speak for the Liberal party, must adhere to that party's platform as propounded at that convention. But it is strange to me that my hon. friends would go to such pains to find contradictions in the policy propounded by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, when he himself declared to the House and to the country that he is going to support this Government which has no policy at all. What is the policy of the Government? Last year they promised the House and the country that there would be a general investigation into the affairs of the country and that revision of the tariff would take place. The hon. gentleman replies by saying: It is very fortunate for this country that this investigation was not held, because in the month of January the affairs of the world were more unstable than they ever were before. But he adds that he is glad to see that actually the situation in world affairs is now on a sounder basis. This is a poor answer. The pledge was given by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) during the first session of last year, and if the investigation had been carried on according to that promise, there would have been no necessity for the Government to do anything at the present session—at a time when, in the judgment of my hon. friend, the affairs of the world are in a better condition—other than to bring down legislation based on that investigation. But if the Government have had no policy—and the proof that they have no policy is that the ex-Minister of Finance promised last year that an investigation would be held and that a revision of the tariff would take place—in what situation are we this year? We are in actually the same situation. The new Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) says to the House: We are going to hold an investigation. Why? Because every one admits that there is a feeling of unrest in this country as in the rest of the world; that something must be done. If my hon. friend is as pious and good as he wants us to be, I wonder why he supports a Government which, with their policy, have been unable to cure the unrest or to foster the best interests of this country? They have a policy of doing nothing; they have a policy of promising investigations, and all the while the unrest keeps on growing and growing every year. That is not extraordinary. Do you believe, Sir, that business men are going to put their money into undertakings when they do not know what the policy of this Government will be? If you wish to have stability in this country, you must give to the trade, to the industries of Canada the assurance that they will not be disturbed. Otherwise they will stand back and wait, and when they wait the workingmen of this country are suffering more and more every day under the high cost of living; the people are suffering by reason of the taxation which is being imposed upon them and which is increasing year by year, and the capitalists of the country are afraid of the Government because they realize that although the Government are making a great cry that they have the confidence of the people, they have not that confidence as a matter of fact, and furthermore they do not deserve to have it, as I shall try to prove in the course of my remarks.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) says that the Wheat Board ought to be abolished because it was created as a war measure. Well, Sir, if that argument can be properly applied to the Wheat Board it is eminently more fitting to apply to the Government. They were elected to win the war and they pretend that they won the war, but after having won it they cannot restore peace in this country; and I really believe that as the Wheat Board ought to be abolished, so too should the Government be put out of existence, or at least, they should have a renewal of their mandate only if the people are willing to renew it. I believe that one fact that will not be disputed by any thinking person is this, that confidence is one of the basic essentials of human life; if you want to succeed you must have confidence in yourself, you must have confidence in your associates. But confidence, to be worth anything, must be reciprocal in character. And when I hear ministers saying that they trust the people, that have confidence in the people, I know but too well that they cannot add that they know that the people have confidence in them.

What have this Government done to win the confidence of the people? What have they done in their legislation, in their administration, and in the official declarations of the ministers of the Crown, and of their partisans? I believe that on this question of confidence we can derive some good lessons from the late war. The Allies won the war because there was mutual confidence between the commanding officer and the common soldier, and this confidence, mutual and reciprocal, created a unity of action. So long as we were not united in action, so long as unity had not been secured by any confidence of the Allies in one another, we must admit, our cause met with no great successes. Sir, this war has been marvellous from more than one standpoint. There is not a man, there is not an army corps, there is not a country that can rightly boast that the winning of the war was due to any single individual or nation. It was due to the concerted action of all of the Allies. The Allies were so united that they secured unity of action, which came from the confidence they had in one another. If I were permitted, I could give a few examples to show what confidence did in the late war. When at the Battle of Mons the small "contemptible army" of Great Britain, as it was named by the German war lords, sustained the orders and carried the fight in that murderous and atrocious retreat, every one admitted that that army was composed of heroes. But there are other examples. These British soldiers, having the fullest confidence in their commanding officers, remained at their posts because they knew that their officers would not permit a single sacrifice that was not necessary for the glory of the British arms. Take the example of the Argonne. When the Germans decided to crush Verdun, with the hope that the defeat of Verdun would mean the defeat of France before Great Britain could put forth all her effort to help France and before the United States could come to the rescue, what saved the situation? When the forts of Douaimont and Vaux were crumbling under the raging fire of the German artillery the French soldiers offered themselves as a living barrier to stem the wave of the German army, and they won the day because they had confidence in their commanding officers. It is the same in every phase of life. Now that the war is over every country must look to its own salvation, and it is the duty of a government to come to the rescue and save the situation. What has this Government done in legislation and in administration, and what are the official declarations of its ministers?

Mr. McMASTER: They forbade bees to eat sugar.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Every nation of the world is now seriously grappling with the problems which have been created by the war. Everybody knows I am not supporting the Government, but although I am opposing them I will not charge them with every possible crime, I want to give them credit whenever they deserve it. I am not going to charge them with being responsible, as some say they are, for the inflation of the Canadian currency. The problem of the present hour is the question of inflation. Some economists claim that inflation of currency has created the high cost of living. I believe with the Rt. Hon. Reginald McKenna and Professor Nicholson, of Edinburgh university, that instead of the high cost of living being the result of the inflation of currency inflation of currency is the cause of the high cost of living. This Government has done, on the question of the inflation of currency, as Governments have done all over the world.

After war was declared, and when, during forty-two months, 20,000,000 people were called to the colours, the rest of the world had to produce the food for these 20,000,000 men and the population back of the battle front. The men who responded to the call were the flower of the world's manhood. During the long period of peace the world had accumulated an enormous reserve of goods of all kinds. When the soldiers went to the front they ceased to produce and they consumed ten, fifteen, or twenty times more than they were producing when they were at their work. We had to replace them by old men, young men, and women, all of whom have done their duty, but there was a loss of raw material, there was a loss of time, there was a higher cost of production. There was a higher cost of production also because the purchasing agents of Europe were coming to this country and buying at any price at all all kinds of goods that we could supply. All that we could produce was bought in advance at higher and higher prices. The consumer at home had to pay these new prices. Inflation of the cost of living brought about inflation of wages. The working men could not live on the wages they were earning before the war and wage scales had to be readjusted.

In the face of the enhancement of prices for foodstuffs, in the face of the higher cost of all commodities the governments of all countries had to have recourse to the inflation of currency, and instead of remaining on a sound gold basis they have had to issue what is called by the economists irredeemable currency. It has been issued to an immense amount. People are talking of inflation of currency and I believe it would be nothing but right if I should insert in Hansard the figures that have been quoted in the London Statist showing that up to the 31st December, 1919, the countries of the world had, in round figures, issued paper money to the amount of £2,000,000,000 more than the gold reserves that they had accumulated.

It goes without saying that we are on an unsound financial basis but we have had to do it; we have done it; and now that the war is over it is the duty of this Government to pass legislation first of all to lower the cost of living.

Who are responsible for the high cost of living? The profiteers. What kind of legislation did this Government enact against profiteering? The hon. gentlemen were very fond of issuing Orders in Council to replace the laws passed by Parliament, but where is the Order in Council that they have passed compelling cold storage warehouses to be opened and the produce that has accumulated there given away at a fair price to the consumers of this country? There is none, Sir. But that, I say, is legislation which a Gov rnment like this one should enact. They should pass laws to compel the profiteers to cease trade practices which have added to the miseries and sufferings of the whole population of Canada.

When we talk about profiteers the hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches do not even listen. They do not want to do anything against the profiteers, they have done nothing and will do nothing. They will not tackle the profiteers but they will go on piling the burden of taxation heavier and heavier upon the shoulders of the poor consumer in this country. One tax after another has been imposed but the profiteer is allowed to keep on at his nefarious trade. He can go along as he pleases; he should not be bothered by this Government! The common people, who do not want to be anything but good citizens, will carry the burden of heavier and still heavier taxation. The policy of the Government has been inadequate to deal with the unrest that is prevailing in this country. If their policy has been ineffective and inefficient it should be changed. But the Government do not want to change it. They say: "We are going to remain as we are and we will appoint a commission to investigate." The Opposition say to the Government: "You promised that an investigation would take place last fall; you did not carry out that promise, that pledge, and now that you have promised a new investigation, while that investigation is going on, you should reduce the cost of living by reducing the tariff." But, they will not accept that. They are determined to keep what they have. They do not want to tackle the profiteers; they do not want to help the consumers. They were elected to win the war; they won the war; but they keep power which they got under the pretence of winning the war and they still hold to their seats in the hope that something will happen and that the situation will take care of itself. The Government is in a position to enact legislation to help the suffering classes of this community but it does nothing and it is not doing its duty when it neglects to bring in this legislation.

When talking of profiteers I want to make myself understood. I admit that governments that have been at war for forty-two months that have exhausted their reserves and that have engaged their credit for fifty, sixty or a hundred years to come, must take means to reduce their debt. I admit that they must take the means to reduce their taxes and to keep their industries going. And are the governments of other countries—whether it be the government of Great Britain or the government of United States—to be classed as profiteers because they have taken control of all the hides, all the wool and all the cotton that was in sight? They have done this to stimulate production so that by selling their manufactured products they might at the same time provide work for their working people and write off a part of their debt. But the profiteers I condemn are the individual profiteers who, under the pretext of doing something good for the country, are piling up money, and, as the hon. gentleman who immediately preceded me stated, are able—after having taken care of all the needs of their business—to sell on credit, four, five and even six million dollars' worth of agricultural implements that are not paid for until five or six years have elapsed. These are the profiteers that the Government should get after. These are the profiteers that should be called to account.

If we look at the administration of public affairs by this Government what do we find. Take for instance the Canadian National Railway system. There is an undertaking in which immense amounts of money have been sunk and the operations of the past year have resulted in a deficit of $47,000,000. I say, Sir, that it is an injustice to charge that deficit to the whole of the community. If this deficit of $47,000,000 were divided among the population of Canada it would mean a charge upon every man, woman and child in the country of $5.25 or thereabouts. Look at the charge which will be imposed upon the riding which I have the honour to represent, a county with a population of forty thousand, but which gets no service from the Canadian National Railway system. In considering the matter from the viewpoint of the interests of one's constituency one may be accused of egotism; but I claim that to place the defict upon the country at large is not only an injustice to the community but is an injustice to a rival company, the Canadian Pacific. On this matter I speak with perfect freedom; I hold no brief for the Canadian Pacific; it is a company which can take care of itself; I do not own a share of stock in that company. But I ask, is it fair to them or to the people at large that this deficit of $47,000,000 on the operations of the Canadian National Railway system should be charged to the whole Canadian community? What does that deficit mean? We have been told time and time again that the Government were securing the best men available to place at the head of the management of this railway system. We are therefore forced to this conclusion: If with such "best management," and with the existing rates, the operation of the Canadian National Railway system has resulted in a deficit of $47,000,000, how can it be expected that the Canadian Pacific, which can have no better management or no higher rates than the Government system, can keep on maintaining and developing its system on the basis of the existing rates? What will be the result if such a policy is pursued? The result will be the ruin of the Canadian Pacific. Here is a company which during the war was more successfully operated than any railway on this continent. When the Government of the United States took over the railway lines in that country they could not afford to maintain the efficiency of those roads or to properly equip them on the existing rates, and they increased both the freight and passenger rates to the amount of $750,000,000 per year. Nevertheless there were deficits to the amount of $850,000,000 per annum; and when the Government restored those railways to their owners they gave them a bonus of $500,000,000 to compensate them for the deficiencies in the maintenance and for the equipment which should have been, but had not been, purchased during the period of government operation. Now, Sir, during all this crisis the Canadian Pacific was able to maintain its standard, to keep its equipment up to date and continue the high character of its service. Its service did not, during that trying period, fall back but rather went ahead. Yet, the Government of this country, in order not to offend a certain portion of the electorate, are going to throw the burden of the deficit accumulated by the Canadian National railways on the people as a whole. What will the Government intend to do with the other company? Is it their intention to ruin the best managed railway there is in the world? Will the Government compel the Canadian Pacific to operate their system on the basis of rates which resulted in a deficit of $47,000,000 for the Canadian National railways? Surely such a deficit is proof that the rates are not what they should be. If the rates are not adequate for the Government railways we must conclude they are not adequate for the Canadian Pacific. But here is the difference between the two systems: If the operation of the Canadian Pacific results in a deficit it cannot charge the burden upon the community as a whole, but that is what the Government propose doing in the case of the Canadian National railways. I say that this is an injustice. It means the beginning of the ruin of the Canadian Pacific, and such a policy ought not to be tolerated after all the company has done for the development and expansion of Canada. True, the country has been good to the Canadian Pacific, but the Canadian Pacific has also been good to Canada, and it is a matter of pride for this country to have such an efficient railway corporation within its borders. If the Government persist in their policy the company which has given this country a first class service —in fact no other system could do better— will be compelled to operate its lines at a disadvantage owing to governmental mismanagement.

Now I wish to join issue in a certain matter with the Minister of Finance. The disease, characterized as "inflation," has been applied to the high cost of living, to wages, to currency and to credit; but really the minister himself has exhibited the worst symptoms of that disease because he has given to the House and to the country in an official statement which can be found on page 2557 of unrevised edition of Hansard, what I would designate as the inflation of the gold reserve. I understood that wages could be inflated, that paper could be inflated, that credit could be inflated; but I never thought before that the gold reserve of Canada could be inflated.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who said it was?

Mr. GAUTHIER: The Minister of Finance.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is he?

Mr. GAUTHIER: I do not know. What brought this to my attention, Sir, was a statement on the financial page of the Montreal Gazette of Monday last, where it was shown that the gold holdings of Canada were in the proportion of approximately 32 per cent of its currency. The next day I was amazed to hear the Minister of Finance state to the House and to the country that our gold reserve was 43 per cent. I have much confidence in the Minister of Finance —and I have much confidence in the Montreal Gazette. That journal to my mind could not have printed that statement without the knowledge, officially or officiously, of the Government. I look again at the public documents, and here is what I find as stated by the Minister of Finance: That our Dominion note currency on the 31st of March, 1920, was $311,932,791; our gold holdings at the same date were $100,286,280. Therefore, according to his own figures, our gold holdings would be approximately as the Gazette states, 32 per cent. But by what operation did the Minister of Finance put the figure at 43 per cent? He calculated the gold reserve of the banks with the gold holdings in the central gold reserves. But, first of all, from the total circulation of the paper money of the Dominion and of the banks he had taken off $97,700,000, the statement reading, "Less Dominion notes held in Central Gold Reserves, $97,700,000." I admit, Sir, that according to financiers our gold reserve should be at least 40 per cent. But when we take in the whole issue of our paper currency, we must balance it with the total gold reserves held by the Government, and nothing else. Why should the Government compute the gold held by the banks as security for their own note issue so as to depreciate the difference between their circulation and their gold holdings? Furthermore, why should the Government be allowed to take out of its note issue $97,700,000 of paper money and deposit it in the Central Gold Reserves?

Well, Sir, if such a statement as that can be published broadcast by the Minister of Finance, I say that the Government do not trust the people. Why do they not state our financial position frankly? At the time of the war there was no secret made of it; every one knew what was the situation. Every time the Government appealed to the people, whether to secure men, whether to secure credit, or whether to secure endorsement of certain legislation, they got everything they asked for. The Government had received a mandate to win the war, and in execution of that mandate they could ask for anything they wanted, and they were sure to get it, for the people had confidence in them. Why not proceed in the same manner to-day and tell the people frankly what is our position? Every one knows that we have an inflated currency; every one knows that it will have to be deflated; and before assuming the heavy burden of taxation that the Government intend to put on the shoulders of the people the situation should be frankly stated to the country. And it is not good management on the part of the present Administration to curtail the gold deposits of our banks in an attempt to show that our inflated currency is less inflated than it really is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take up so much time, and I will conclude with these few words. I would say to the Government: Stop the profiteers and you will strike at the root of the high cost of living; there is no other way. You cannot instantly deflate your currency because it would mean ruin to the country; but strike at the very root of the evil and you will cure the unrest which that evil engenders. I say again: Reduce the tariff and you will help to reduce the cost of living. The policy followed by this Administration has had the result of creating an unrest which continues to grow every day and every week, and this policy is proved by its results to be wrong. Change it; reduce the tariff, and you will reduce the cost of living. Be prepared to recall your inflated currency according to a gradual and progressive method and come back as soon as you can to a sound gold basis. Trust the people, lead them wisely and firmly; enact legislation which will appeal to them; give to this country that management of national affairs which will appeal to the electors, and you will regain their confidence. It is the bounden duty of the Government to secure peace, and to command the confidence of the people, and this you cannot do if you continue your present policy of legislation and administration and of making official declarations which at sight do not correspond with the official figures that are given to the country.

Mr. JOHN H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking well of the Budget I should like also, before going on, to refer in as complimentary a way as possible to the speech of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville (Mr. Gauthier) and that of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). The member for St. Hyacinthe, on rising, expressed a desire to maintain the high plane reached by the member for Vancouver. I can assure him that before he sat down he had reached that high plane; he furnished us with as much argument as any man possibly could furnish hostile to this admirable Budget.

It must be remembered, in criticizing this Government for having no policy, that their policy for years has been that of war, and on the return of peace it was necessary for them to formulate a peace policy. This peace policy has been formulated and announced in the Budget, and it is the most admirable combination of protection and free trade that a man could possibly wish for. I do not think that any Budget that was ever announced in the Parliament of Canada has secured the commendation and praise from the people of Canada that this one has. Everybody was curious to know how in the face of the universal high cost of living and general taxation the Minister of Finance would secure the necessary revenue through taxes to carry on; but he has surprised us all, not only by securing the necessary taxes, but by doing it in such an easy, offhand manner that it is doubtful if it will be felt at all by the people. No more skilful handling of finances could, in my humble judgment, possibly be imagined, and every praise should be accorded to the minister for his most admirable work.

The hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville has told us that there is serious unrest in the country. He did not compare Canada with other countries; if he had done so he would have seen, and we all would have seen, that the unrest in Canada was as nothing in comparison with the unrest in other countries, Britain and the United States included. If we had had in proportion to population the fatal clashes between the people and the military that have occurred in the United States, there would have been calls and cries for special sessions and the very winds of Heaven would have been called to the aid of the Opposition, as has so frequently been the case in their denunciation of this Government. But in Canada there has been nothing worthy of the name, except, perhaps, a little centre of disturbance here and there. The unrest in this country is a minimum; certainly a minimum in comparison with the unrest in other countries. In all fairness, due allowance should be made for that, and observations and criticism should be tempered accordingly.

This Budget has the honour of giving birth to the newest and biggest party that ever arose in Canada, the People's party of Canada. We have the Liberal party, the Progressive party and the People's party. We do not wish in future that there should occur in the councils of Canada what has occurred in the legislature of Ontario, where a party 245,000 votes in the minority undertake to govern the province. The Liberal party are proud of their old record, and well they might be. The Liberal party, successor to the Whig party, was founded upon freedom and it has more or less maintained that tradition to the present day. It is the one great merit of the Liberal party that it stands for more or less of the great principles of freedom. But it has received a serious set-back. It has been divided, and out of its rib has been created the Farmers' party of Canada. At the next election the contest will be between the People's party and the Farmers' party. I appeal to the Liberals of Canada to join the People's party of Canada——

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nothing doing.

Mr. BURNHAM: —join the People's party of Canada in withstanding the assault of any class upon the centre of government.

Mr. BUREAU: You assume the paternity of that party?

Mr. BURNHAM: If I do, the hon. gentleman will assume the maternity of it. He comes nearer to being an old woman than anybody I know.

Mr. BUREAU: The only thing Parliament cannot do—change a man into a woman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BURNHAM: The high cost of living in Canada does not compare with the high cost of living in the United States. All the reciprocity and all the throwing open of the doors of the tariff would make no difference in that particular in favour of the United States. Articles in the United States have been vastly more expensive than corresponding articles in Canada. Let me direct the attention of the Farmers' party to a very singular thing. I do not propose to repeat any of the arguments so admirably made heretofore on either side, but in connection with the United States free list there is something well worthy of notice, and that is that on the list there are seven manufactured articles and twenty-one farm articles, that is, twenty-one articles of natural produce and only seven manufactured articles. Now, if we reverse that we will have seven farm articles and a corresponding number of manufactured articles on the free list in Canada, and we will let loose the whole world on the farming population of Canada. Manifestly that would be unfair, unreasonable and illogical. However, if the Farmers' party think not so, they will in the course of time, no doubt, explain that. But we have agricultural implements, barbed fence wire, leather belting, cement, leather of all kinds, sewing machines, twine—free on the American list. We have anthracite coal, bacon, beef, beans, bituminous coal, broom corn, buckwheat, copper, flax, flour and grain seed, hides of cattle, natural iron products, raw materials of all kinds, mutton, pork, potash, potatoes, pulpwood, rye, swine, tea and veal,—all free on the United States list. So that the American idea has been to make natural products free, but not to make manufactured products free. This must be borne in mind when we appeal to the United States free list. It seems to me that if some hon. gentlemen in the Farmers' party had proposed a resolution something like this, it would have gone a long way to meet the case. Of course, it is contrary to the rules and therefore could not be done, but if we assume that such a thing might have been done, it will serve the purposes of this discussion.

The Farmers' party and all free traders assert that taxation falls in the last analysis upon the land. Is that not so? The Farmers' party looking me squarely in the face do not deny that. We all admit that; it is an economic and natural law. They have criticised protection in the past because whilst an indirect method of collecting taxes, it was very expensive. Therefore, let the Farmers' party get up if they like and propose that all taxation should in the first instance fall upon the land. Let them say that:

Whereas, it is an economic law of taxation that taxation will fall ultimately upon that class of property which is unable to shift the burden elsewhere; and

Whereas, that class of property is natural property, the resources of the country, such as land, minerals, water-powers and so forth; and

Whereas, it is now desirable that this form of taxation should be levied, and—

To which proposition I would agree, but to which they would not.

Whereas, it is also desirable that employment should be secured to people developing their own country;

Therefore, be it resolved that all taxes be placed upon natural property in the first instance, and that other means should be taken as will secure employment to the people.

If these hon. gentlemen will follow out that suggestion practically, let them crystallize into an argument those things which they maintain, namely, that taxation falls in the last, and in the first instance as well, upon the land; let them propose that to the House and to the country and see what the country thinks of it, and above all, let them see what the farmer thinks of it. It may be an economic law, but it will never commend itself to the farmers of this country. But these gentlemen—and I say this with all due respect—dare not follow out logically the theories which they defend, the suggestions which they make from time to time. Those theories are too hazardous, they are unfair, they will not work out equitably; and while they do very well as basic theories to announce, they are wholly impracticable and unwise. I would, therefore, appeal to the Farmers' party not to oppose the People's party, but to join with us with one accord in universal political harmony and secure the best possible government for this country. There is going to be a great deal of strife. The unrest that has existed heretofore is going to be as nothing in comparison with the unrest in the future; and as a patriotic Canadian speaking to patriotic Canadians, I implore you all not to divide yourselves up further, not to promote further strife, but to join in one great party in going to the country for an expression of the opinions of the people. I agree with the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Rouville. If I were this Government I would print, at the public expense, this whole debate and send it to the people and let the people see what the Government side and the Opposition side, both Liberals and Farmers, think of the matter. Then I would go to the country, and I would ask the people to return members accordingly and see what they would do. Unquestionably, I would do that now, for the very simple reason that we owe that to the country. Here is a new and a great policy and a great party that has discarded for the nonce its old partisan name in order that it may embrace all forms of thought, in order that it may offend no one, but in order that it may secure, without any invidiousness, the support of every man who thinks well of the proposition laid before him. I do not think the Opposition would oppose that; I think the Opposition would agree that this debate might very well be printed at the public expense and scattered broadcast amongst the people. This is not a campaign document; it is a general expression of the thought of this House, and I think the people are entitled to know what we think, not simply through the medium of partisan speeches sent here and there or through the medium of partisan newspapers, but through the general official note which is taken by independent people for the benefit of the record, and from which the people themselves could get an accurate and proper idea. Then, I say, I would go to the country, and if the people want to return a lot of groups, so as to repeat what happened in Ontario,—and a group might be 500,000 votes short and yet presume to govern the country—if that is what they want, let them have it; but I doubt very much if the people will continue to endorse any such system.

I should like to call the attention of the free traders in this House, if there are any, to what is said by the Women's Journal,—and let me tell the House that the women are going to cut some figure in the next election.

Mr. McMASTER: They always have.

Mr. BURNHAM: They have not so far been referred to in the debate. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMaster) is hastening to interpose in this particular, but he has taken great care not to mention them hitherto, and no one else on his side has done so. As a humble individual I shall be the spokesman of the women in this debate. With their feminine subtlety they refer to one or two points, and I hope due note will be taken of them. The Woman's Century is the official organ of the Women's Council of Canada. The chief patronesses are Her Excellency and the wives of the Lieutenant Governors throughout Canada. The directorate itself is very large and general, and it is hardly necessary to state that this is the chief, indeed, the only really great official organ of the women of Canada. In the editorial comment of the issue of April, 1920, this is said:

What is probably one of the bitterest party fights in Canadian political history is now on, to last till its climax at the next Dominion election. On one side the farmers, with their money and brains, have perfected their party machine, which their opponents say is a giant plough, intended to plough up Canadian cities, and presumably sow the sites with salt, as the Romans did once to Jerusalem. In other words, the farmers are furious at the "trough feeding" of the Canadian manufacturers under the present policy of protection, and they intend to do away with the tariff "on all agricultural implements, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, lubricating oils, etc." However, they have not the least objection to the "trough fed," highly protected manufacturers of the States. Soothingly they tell the cities that the States must "soon become a food importing country," and if we only have free trade with her, look at the cheap food you will get, etc. They omit to say, however, that food prices are higher in New York than Ontario. It is a pity. There are so many good things in the Farmers' platform that many of us will have to vote against, because we cannot see the sense in hitting the Canadian "trust" and patronizing the American one.

To my mind, that appears to be a very sensible comment, and I would recommend it to the consideration of the Farmers' party.

I should like, lest I forget it, to refer now to something which one would think that nobody could forget, and that is the return that is due to our soldiers. I do not propose to repeat anything of what has gone before, but the great general, Sir Arthur Currie, said recently that the best memorial that Canada could raise to her fallen heroes was the care that she would take of the soldiers' dependents, of the widows and orphans of the dead. I think that this should be borne in upon the Government, that whatever sacrifice has to be made should be made, and that no dependent of any soldier, certainly no dependent of any dead soldier, should be allowed to go for one moment in want. We must see to it that no such case is permitted, and I am quite sure that neither the Government nor the Pensions Committee, nor any of those bodies having to do with the soldiers will forget what General Currie has said.

Now, so long as people insist upon conducting trade on the theory of profit, just so long will one man try to grab from another as much as he can get; and just so long will quarrel and strife continue in the world and hope of equilibrium in domestic affairs fade away. It is utterly and absolutely impossible to expect a system of trade and commerce, domestic and foreign, conducted on the principle of highway robbery ever to produce good results. There is no denying the fact that profit is the taking of that for which no return has been given. But few propose to give it up; and until such time as it is given up, in my humble opinion we are only crying peace, peace, when there is no hope of peace. The legacy left by the late war was the unfortunate one that in the last analysis force must and will prevail. Before the war people were inclined to think that the general cultivation of civilization, and the propagation of the doctrines of Christianity would have their ultimate effect. But when they saw the world drifting towards the great cataclysm which it ultimately reached, they said: "The rough-and-ready means for us is force. We will cultivate the civilization theory on the side as a by-product, an amusement, or entertainment or something of that description; but force is what appeals to us." Thereupon there arose a body in this country, as in the United States, founded upon the principle of force; and The Pioneer, which is the great organ of the force party in Canada, admits in its issue of May 7 that the day of individual liberty has gone. It says that it is not the assertion of individual rights, but the subordination of these to the rights of others, that represents the community of interests and the higher social untiy. Hitherto, wherever sacrifice was made it was made by the individual. It was pointed out to him what a noble thing it was for him to sacrifice for another. But since he did not observe that doctrine with the alacrity which some people desired, they reached out and seized him by the hair of his head and dragged him out of his boots, and sent the policeman, the detective and the informer after him, saying: "Since you will not voluntarily give up your individual liberty we will make you do so." And this is the foundation of the alarm and unrest which exists in Canada. It is the foundation also —and I say it most respectfully—of the Farmers' movement; because since they see that the great area of debate no longer presents to them the most easy and effectual means of attaining their ends they have imitated the prohibitionists and propose to take what before they could not get. This is the theory upon which Canada and the Western world are now moving, and it is of course a most serious one and one that will produce serious results. Before the war, the Eastern world, Great Britain included, took its theology from Germany, and though Germany was beaten, a great many people have continued to emulate the German idea of force. We have not gone back to where we were before; we have gone forward into the age of force. Faith has disappeared. All the ordinary indirect means which have been used heretofore from the foundation of the world, and the great principles exemplified in the sacrifice of Christ himself, have been discarded in order that people may be made to do what hitherto they would not be persuaded to do. A people which founds its civilization upon unfair profit, which is robbery, and upon force, can expect no good result, and we may rest assured that they will attain no good results.

In conclusion, let me say once more that I value Canada far and above all party, and though it may sound invidious, nevertheless I say, as a man who has been always a strong protectionist, and a strong Conservative, I am willing to give up that honoured name and join the Peoples' party, and let the Opposition, both Farmers and Liberals, give up something too, and let us all join the Peoples' party.

An hon. MEMBER: Then there would be no opposition.

Mr. BURNHAM: Let us join together not as Unionists, not as Conservatives, not as Liberals, not as Farmers, but as the Peoples' party, and when the representatives are sent back they will come here as the people's representatives. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it is to the honour of the Minister of Finance that he has not only given birth to the greatest Budget ever presented in Canada but he has given birth to the greatest idea that was ever conceived in this country. And I am quite sure that not only has he rescued the financial situation, but that he has saved the national and social situation as well.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I desire first of all to tender my congratulations to the Minister of Finance for the clear exposition which he gave in his Budget Speech. It was exceedingly satisfactory to have the position of the Government clearly placed before us, whether we agree with it or not. The minister is also to be commended, I think, for his clear realization of the great need that exists for raising more revenue. The Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) accuses the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) of having "afterthoughts" with regard to this need. One would suppose from his remarks in that respect that there had been no forethought shown by the members of the Opposition, while a reading of Hansard would show clearly that during the whole period of the war we urged over and over again the need of raising more revenue as we went along.

I urged that need as strongly as I was able and my remarks will be found in Hansard of May, 1917, page 978. I found fault with the Government for not raising more money as they went along and suggested that after the war it would be necessary to raise $150,000,000 yearly to provide for pensions and interest on war debt alone. My suggestion was laughed at on that occasion as extravagant, but it turns out that I am considerably under the mark.

The minister is also to be commended for providing that a portion of his additional taxes shall be levied upon luxuries. We have heard the cry about the high cost of living and the cost of high living. This tax may not reduce the cost of high living but it is to be hoped it will act as a check on high living. We have waited a long time for this Budget, some of us patiently and some impatiently. The period of incubation has been unusually long, but that long period has not altered the nature of the chicken. It is still a pure bread protectionist. The Government may have provided the incubator, but it is easy to know the maternal ancestor from the appearance of the chicken. It is much like the other chicks raised from Canadian Manufacturers' Association eggs. It does not grant any relief from the burdens of protection. It does not take anything from the favours enjoyed by the manufacturers at the expense of the consumers. It was suggested by many that we were to have a real excise tax in this Budget which would to a certain extent reduce the favours to the protected interests. It was suggested that an excise tax might be placed on all articles of home manufacture enjoying the benefits of the protective tariff equal to from 10 to 25 per cent of the protection afforded. Had this been done there would be a tremendous increase in our revenue but then there would be less coming in to the manufacturers' pocket and that, I suppose, would not be tolerated by our manufacturing friends.

Government supporters are very critical of the cross-benchers.

It must be a tremendous relief to our friends of the regular Opposition group that the abuse of the Government side has been taken away from them and hurled at us over here. I think the members of the regular Opposition should feel thankful to us for having drawn the fire of the Government and relieved them to the extent that we have. If it pleases the Government supporters it does not bother us. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) had a great many things to say about this group. I do not propose to refer at length to his remarks but I will just refer to one thing he said which I think is a fair sample of what he has given us to-night. He rears and rears, and shouts and tears, and gets up on his hind feet and abuses us most terribly, because of the assumed fact that we oppose campaign funds. I never heard of a campaign fund being opposed in this part of the House although I heard somebody on the hon. gentleman's own side saying that campaign funds should not be allowed at all. I never heard any man in this party say anything of the kind. What we have said is that there should be publicity of campaign funds. Therefore my hon. friend misses the mark entirely in his criticism. And that is a fair sample of his criticism of hon. members belonging to this party. Government supporters, I repeat, have been very critical of the cross-benchers. I do not propose to reply to this criticism further than to say that the platform we support is before the public. It is clear-cut and shows the specific articles we ask to have placed on the free list. We are not at present asking for free trade in any others and the party is committed to nothing further than this platform.

It is said by Government supporters that there is a difference in the opinions entertained by different members of the new party. That seems, in their opinion, to be a very unusual thing in this House. I do not think it is anything at all. I think there is a greater difference of opinion among the members of the old parties than there is among the members of this party. We have agreed at least upon a platform laid down, and that is all we need to deal with at present. When we come to deal with further reductions in the tariff we will have an opportunity to see what difference of opinion if any, there is. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Those criticisms I expect, will be dealt with by others before this debate closes.

The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) says that the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) is playing the part of Romeo with the cross-benchers for his Juliet. The right hon. member expresses surprise at some of the opinions he has heard from the Opposition side. I am sure that nothing he has heard from the Opposition side is more surprising than his comparison of the very guarded wooings of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's with the ardent protestations of Romeo. Who ever heard of Romeo warning Juliet of the necessity of subservience to others? Who ever heard of him cautioning Juliet not to ask for or expect too much? My recollection is that Romeo was much more ardent in his wooings than the leaders of either party. Government supporters are wooing us after a fashion. They would like a union of a sort with us but their wooing is somewhat after the fashion of the cave man who goes out after his bride with a club. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, while not possessing the ardor of a Romeo is rather more polite in his attentions than the Government supporters. It seems to me his wooing is more after the manner we would expect from a modern Turk. He seems willing to add this group to his political harem. Should he succeed, there will surely be a mixed political family—free traders, low tariff and revenue tariff advocates, moderate protectionists and immoderate protectionists. If my hon. friend expects much support from this group after he realizes his ambitions and finds the Liberals the strongest party in the House, he may as well make up his mind that he must drop some of his extreme protectionist friends and also that his pilgrimage toward the 1893 goal, "Free trade as it is in England", must be more rapid and consistent than during the fifteen years when he was in charge of the finances of this country.

Manufacturers profess a desire to come to an understanding with the farmers. That is quite simple. We ask for no favours. Let them do likewise and all would be well. We ask that there should be no protection on anything we produce. Will they do the same? If they do that, all will be happy as a marriage feast. The supporters of the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture ask that claims for tariff protection of any industry should be heard publicly before a special committee of Parliament. Surely that is a reasonable request, but will our manufacturing friends agree to it? They have hitherto asked us to assume that all manufacturers require protection. We deny that and say the onus is on them to prove their need and right to protection. Our platform has been promulgated by representatives of the farmers. Still the first and by far the most important item on our proposed free list is almost entirely produced by farmers. Surely in the face of that fact, nothing can be more absurd than the oft repeated statement that the farmers are asking for class legislation. There are many lines of manufactured goods on our proposed free list but we deny that it has ever been established that they need tariff protection in order to carry on their business. On the contrary Government returns abundantly establish the fact that most of them can thrive without such protection. The most extensively protected of all manufactured foodstuffs is wheat flour. During the ten years ending the 31st March, 1919 we exported from Canada flour to the value of $388,980,093. When the United States offered us free trade in wheat and flour providing we would give them the same, we were told that our flour millers would be ruined by such an arrangement. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on the 23rd April, 1914, insisted that placing flour on the free list would place the Canadian milling industry in great peril, and he spoke of the danger that such a step would obliterate the milling industry, though at that time millers were exporting enormous quantities of flour in open competition with the whole world, which seemed to us to show plainly that they were able to carry on without any protection. Finally, however, the Government did yield to the demand of the western members and agreed to free wheat and wheat products. Were the millers ruined? The returns show that during the last two of the ten years mentioned our flour exports were nearly $200,000,000. We exported a greater value of flour during those two years after flour was placed on the free list than we had exported during the preceding eight years combined. That was one of the terrible effects of free trade.

We are also large exporters of the following foodstuffs: butter, condensed milk, bacon, meals of different kinds, biscuits, bread and prepared cereals. When we can sell these largely to outsiders in open competition with the world, why cannot we afford to give our own home labourers the advantage of the same open competition in buying the food to supply their families. I know some farmers ask for protection in the things they produce. They are anxious to be placed in a position where they can charge the labourers more for their food than it can be procured at from outside producers were the tariff removed. But the supporters of the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture are not farmers of that kind. We are prepared to farm the land, but we don't ask for the privilege of farming the city labourer also.

We ask for free lumber. Surely no one can seriously claim that our manufacturers of lumber with their tremendous advantages are not able to compete with the world in supplying the consumers at their door. We exported farm machinery, carriages, wagons and parts thereof, fertilizers and cement to the extent of $5,361,726 in 1918 and $8,959,239 in 1919. If the manufacturers of these articles can successfully compete in open competition with the world where freight charges and national sentiment are against them who is going to believe that they are unable to compete at their own doors where freight rates and national sentiment are in their favour?

What right have Canadian manufacturers to legislation protecting them against competition at home when their own actions prove they can trade abroad without protection? Why should we favour the foreign consumer at the expense of the home consumer? That is what we are doing. The claim is sometimes made that the American manufacturers have wider markets and larger establishments than our Canadian manufacturers. There are probably a few American establishments that are larger than any of our Canadian establishments but we must also remember that the vast majority of American establishments are small. These small manufacturers in the United States have to compete with the large establishments. Why cannot our establishments do likewise?

Canadian census returns for 1911 show the number of manufacturing establishments in Canada in 1910, and the American census of 1910 shows the number of American establishments in the previous year. According to these returns we had in Canada 19,218 manufacturing establishments or one to every 375 of our population, while the United States had 268,491 establishments or one to every 347 persons. So the average Canadian manufacturer had more home customers than the American.

Now take the most extensive manufactured goods that we ask for on the free list. I find that the Canadian manufacturers of agricultural machinery and parts thereof had not so many home customers per establishment as the American, but they had a larger average output. In carriages, wagons and parts thereof, the Canadian had a wider home market and greater average output. In fertilizers the Canadian had a wider market, but turned out less per establishment. In cement the American had a wider home market and turned out more per establishment. In timber and lumber products the Canadian had a narrower home market but a larger average output. In flour and grist mill products the American had a wider home market and a greater average out turn but the difference was slight. These returns show pretty conclusively that the Canadian manufacturer does not suffer from the severe handicap he would have us believe in the matter of small establishments and limited home markets.

It is also worth while remembering that of the items we ask for on the free list the following are exempt from duty in the United States: agricultural implements, coal, fertilizers, cement, wheat and wheat flour, cattle, sheep, swine, etc., meat, corn, corn meal, rye and rye flour, fish, potatoes, milk, cream, eggs, lard, bread and biscuits, also most classes of oils. Our manufacturing friends tell us that they do not consider the tariff in fixing the prices and that free trade would not lessen prices. I notice however, that barbed wire, which is on the free list and which is extensively manufactured in Canada and also exported from Canada, is sold much more cheaply than woven fence wire which is not on the free list. A short time ago I inquired from a local dealer the price of various classes of wire fencing and got him to estimate the price per pound at which he sold the different kinds and found that woven wire fencing cost about 2 cents per pound more than barbed wire fencing. Woven wire fencing is dutiable; barbed wire is free. I asked him the reason and he could not tell me, but informed me that even the plain unwoven wire twisted like barbed wire but without barbs cost two cents per pound more than the barbed wire. What is the reason for that? Is there any other reason than that the manufacturers had considered the tariff when fixing the prices of fencing wire or other articles of the kind.

The claim that the manufacturers must close their doors if they get no protection is an old and oft-repeated cry, and here I must beg to repeat a portion of what has already been quoted by my hon. friend from Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie), as I am using it for a different purpose. When the so-called Fielding tariff was introduced Sir Charles Tupper (column 1291, Hansard, 1897), in speaking of that tariff is reported to have said:

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries in this country are already paralyzed in consequence, while the hon. members gloat—vindictively gloat, over the destruction of Canadian industries. I was reading the wail—the sorrowful wail—of these industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

The same sorrowful wail is repeated by our manufacturers whenever a reduction in tariff is suggested, but history has shown that there is no ground whatever for their fears. Many years ago in response to a popular demand cream separators were placed on the free list; still during the year ending 31st March, 1919, we exported cream separators to the value of $185,910. Binder-twine was placed on the free list, but we exported to the value of $2,574,734; of barbed wire, also on the free list, we exported during the same year to the value of $138,-857; and since we have placed flour on the free list our exports have been bounding almost out of sight. The 1897 tariff reduction, slight though it was, instead of injuring the manufacturer of Canada, made the country so prosperous that the sorrowful wail of the manufacturer was drowned out by the rolling waves of progress that overwhelmed him with a prosperity which he was unable to escape. The result of that tariff was that under it, from 1900 to 1910, the capital invested in Canadian manufactures increased by 179 per cent, the goods produced by 142 per cent, and the wages paid by 113 per cent. Not much to wail about, is it?—and I venture to predict that if the minister will adopt our financial platform—that is, the platform of this little group—the sad and sorrowful wails of our dismal-hearted manufacturers will be deluged in the same glad way.

Mr. F. B. STACEY (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, a year ago, during the debate on the Budget, I took occasion to state the attitude of four of the leading agricultural associations of Brtish Columbia toward the general question of the tariff. I do not purpose to repeat that statement further than to quote two sentences which I then read, and which are as follows:

Therefore, be it resolved that we farmers of British Columbia, as representing all the organizations named below, do not endorse or accept the tariff platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. That we protest against any tariff legislation in the interests of any one class or industry without due consideration of the welfare of others and the progress of the Dominion.

[Mr. Thomson.]

At that time, Sir, I stated that it was not my intention to discuss the tariff. I believed then, and still believe, that there were before the House issues paramount to those involved in the tariff, and I said nothing whatever regarding the resolutions from my province further than to read them. To-night, Sir, I endorse the resolutions which I then submitted from those four organizations, viz: The Fraser Valley Milk Producers Association, composed of something over 1,000 producers of milk; the Provincial Dairymen's Association; the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association; and the United Farmers of British Columbia.

Now, I do not forget that the U.F.A. have been persistently wooing the U.F.B. C. to accept their political platform. I do not think they have so far met with any success; of course, what the future may bring forth I do not know. But one thing I do know, Sir, that, should their wooing meet with a measure of success, to some of us who know the conditions under which the propoganda is being conducted, it will not be very difficult to explain what on its surface may possibly appear successful along the line I have indicated.

Permit me to say very briefly by way of introduction that in my earlier years I breathed a political atmosphere that was charged, if not, indeed, surcharged, with anti-protection gas. To-night I stand for the principle of protection, and in making that statement I can best illustrate my position and change of mental attitude by referring to my own province. British Columbia contains in itself practically all the essentials of true nationhood. Its population, I grant, is comparatively small—barely half a million. But, notwithstanding, British Columbia is a remarkable province, and I propose to try to show that what obtains with reference to that province obtains to a larger extent and to a greater degree with reference to the Dominion as a whole. I base my argument upon this fundamental mathematical axiom, that the whole is equal to the sum of all its parts; and I believe that what is true in mathematics is also true in economics—that what is true with regard to that physical axiom is also true in considering the nation's welfare and prosperity. I believe in the economic solidarity of the Canadian people, and that our true national prosperity can be secured only by having due regard to the prosperity of the component parts of this nation. In other words, we shall not reach the measure of success and national prosperity that is possible unless we take into consideration the conditions prevailing in and the circumstances surrounding the various provinces, the various sections which go to make up the Dominion.

Now, with regard to my own province, and carrying out that illustration, I may say that it has an area of some 390,000 square miles. It contains vast resources of minerals. We have gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc and iron, in virtually inexhaustible quantities. The resources of coal are estimated at 76,000,000,000 metric tons. The value of the lumber cut in 1918 was nearly $28,000,000, while there is at the present time an estimated stand of saw timber and pulpwood material amounting to about 366,000,000,000 board feet. With regard to water-power it is estimated that there are some three millions of horse-power, of which only about one-tenth at the present time has been utilized. In 1918 British Columbia contributed about forty-one per cent of the total value of the fisheries of Canada, valued at nearly $21,500,000, exceeding the value of the fisheries of Nova Scotia by over $7,000,000 and that of the rest of the provinces combined by over $11,000,000. Only last year the value of the salmon pack was estimated at $15,000,000. The estimated value of our agricultural production in 1918 was $42,000,000, while in 1919 the estimate is $99,000,000. We have some seven thousand miles of sea coast containing innumerable harbours, many of which rank among the finest in the world. Of course, it is well known that during the past three years shipbuilding has been carried on in British Columbia to a very large extent. It would appear that when a province has such extensive natural resources it is in the interests of all concerned that these resources should be developed to the greatest possible degree and that when and where necessary such protection should be afforded those who are seeking to develop industries as will best bring about the result desired. This does not mean any unnatural or forced protection when there is no reasonable prospect of ultimate success and development. It does not mean that because someone wants to start an industry for which the province and the district is not suited, any protection or assistance should be granted But if there are reasonable grounds to believe that such an industry would be successful; if the natural resources are there and if the outlook is at all hopeful and reasonably bright, I maintain, Sir, that it is in the interests of the people of the province concerned to encourage by fair and legitimate protection or help, whatever may be regarded as necessary to bring about the highest possible development in such an industry. That protection is not necessarily eternal, it is not necessarily unchangeable; but it should obtain if required in the early stages of the development of that industry. What is true of a province is true of a collection of provinces—in other words, is true of the entire Dominion. The prosperity of the Dominion is contingent upon the highest development of the resources of which each section of the country is possessed.

Mr. Speaker, I am a lover of clean, manly sport. The other day there returned to this country a famous hockey team which had won the world's championship in the continent of Europe, the Falcons of Winnipeg. I want to read to you, Sir, and to this House a remark made by one of the Winnipeg boys who was interviewed, as reported in the public press. Speaking of the French team, he said:

> The other fellows may have been as good as us individually, but when it comes to winning hockey games it's the old club spirit that counts. And the Falcons have the club spirit to the last man on the team.

What is true in hockey is true in every other legitimate, clean sport. Individuals may sometimes apparently succeed in getting off some fancy stunt that will put themselves in the limelight and secure headlines in the daily papers. But the team that wins in the long run—and it is the long run that we are all making—is the team that recognizes the club spirit, the team spirit; the success of the whole depends upon the combination play. And I want to say to my friends opposite that the success and the prosperity of Canada will depend upon the combination spirit. They may think that by making some grandstand home-run play they will win the game; but, Sir, they will strike out every time. We shall win in the long run as a Dominion when all the national players recognize the team combination spirit. That will secure to us the largest possible measure of success in every province, there being at the same time due recognition by all of the claims and possibilities of the other sections of this Dominion.

Now, I come back to my own province—and I do not propose to cover the whole ground of trade or commerce. My change of attitude towards this question is not the result of reading English history; it is the result of my contact with Canadian people; my knowledge of the conditions which obtain in the various provinces of Canada, especially of my having lived for ten years in the Pacific coast province. I said a little while ago that the agricultural production of British Columbia had doubled within the last twelve months. Allow me to say now, in a little more detail, that the agricultural industry of my province may be roughly divided into three sections: live stock, grain and vegetables, and fruit. Almost all the districts of British Columbia are suitable or may be made suitable for stock raising; some of them are more adapted to grain and vegetable growing; while some are specially adapted to fruit growing. My argument then is that the possibilities of that province—and what applies to that province, I have tried to show, applies to the Dominion—can be best attained when due regard is given to the promotion of those several industries as circumstances may seem to advise.

Let me now come a little closer to a question which for four years has been agitating the minds of hon. gentlemen who come from the Prairie Provinces. I will try to remember to-night that I have the honour of addressing not simply hon. members from the Prairie Provinces; I should like to take a hint from the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Burnham) and try to make myself believe that I am addressing all the women, the housekeepers, and also the farmers of the three Prairie Provinces who may or may not be represented in this House to-night. What I have to say now will be confined to this single phase of the development of our national life. Lest I be misunderstood by some one—not purposely, I presume—allow me to state that what I am about to say has no direct reference to the constituency which I have the honour to represent, because my constituency is not to any large extent, distinctively or specifically, an apple exporting district. I want thus to clear the ground so that no one can say that I am putting up a case for my constituency. I have now reference to what is known as the southern central portion of British Columbia, which is more commonly known throughout Canada as the Okanagan district. Possibly I should include the Salmon Arm and, at any rate, the West Kootenay district. These constitute the southern central portion of British Columbia which portion, in the main, is devoted to the apple industry. Forty years ago thousands of acres of that section of our province were covered by some hundreds or possibly thousands of cattle which were endeavouring to secure a bare sustenance from an unwilling soil. Some one fortunately discovered that if water could be put on that land it would produce fruit, and that was the beginning of the apple industry of British Columbia. Thirty years ago, or say, in 1890, there were in the entire province some 400 acres only devoted to the production of apples. Twenty years ago the number had increased, and in the entire province, there were some 8,000 acres devoted to the apple industry. Ten years ago that figure could be multiplied by four, or, say 32,000 acres. The value, roughly speaking, was, in 1900, $436,000, and ten years ago it had grown to something over $1,000,000. By 1914, the crop had increased another twenty-five per cent, but the value was reduced to less than $1,000,000. Five years ago the British Columbia Dparment of Agriculture estimated that the capital directly invested in the orchard industry amounted to over $20,000,000, while there were directly interested some 2,800 orchard owners. At the same time, large areas in both the Okanagan and the Kootenay valleys were being planted with trees with a view to the growing eastern business. As I said a moment ago, while the total output had increased, the total income, not relative but absolute, had decreased. The result of this was that a very serious situation was developing, and the fruit growers set about to discover the cause of that situation, and then if possible to ascertain the remedy. I shall not weary the House by citing the successive steps which were taken to secure the facts; I shall ,however, give the results, which after all I suppose the House is more interested in. It was assumed, when this investigation was undertaken, that the four western provinces of Canada constituted a natural and legitimate market for the apple crop, not ignoring or forgetting the fact that Manitoba had been and probably would be supplied in a measure for years to come by the Ontario crop. But in 1914—and I specify that year, because then the matter virtually came to a climax—the Ontario crop and the British Columbia crop were the largest on record. An enormous crop was the result of the harvest of that year. But what followed? Notwithstanding that fact and the fact that during that year prices were exceedingly low, we discovered that no less than 556 carloads of apples were shipped to the prairies by American growers. I ask hon. members to remember that, because therein lies the key to the whole situation; the solution of the whole apple problem of the far West is just at that specific point. The four northwestern Pacific States of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and possibly Montana, were some five years ahead of us in the apple industry; they had and have larger areas for apple production than we have. By 1914, it was estimated that they had planted about 500,000 acres, or more than enough to supply their natural market. The question may be asked, and I face it very fairly and squarely as I always want to do; it has been asked by hon. gentlemen opposite; I have met it privately scores of times; it has been put to me in this form: If British Columbia can compete with the Northwestern Pacific States in point of quality of the article, why seek protection?—if it cannot compete with the Northwestern States, what is the logic or reason of giving protection to an incompetent or second-rate industry? I accept the question fully. Can British Columbia compete with the northwestern Pacific States? Yes, she has done so. British Columbia apples have taken first place in competitions open to the world, noticeably in the Crystal Palace Exhibition, not once, but more than once, and, Sir, Washington was an entry in that race. Therefore, I say, without fear or hesitation, that if it comes to a question of legitimate, fair, open competition, British Columbia can beat the world; she has done it. Then, hon. members may ask me; In face of that, why did British Columbia ask a protection of thirty cents per box? And I shall be delighted to answer. I said a moment ago that the Northwestern States had a very large output and they had in prospect a very much larger output because of their immense acreage. I should like hon. members to follow me closely when I tell them that the two finest grades of northwestern fruit have been for years marketed in the great American cities of the Middle West and also in the cities of the Far East; the growers have sent their extra fancy and fancy grades to the great American cities with marked success, but that left on their hands the third grade which they could not ship to those cities and for which a market must be found nearer home. Where did they look for that market? To the Canadian prairies. And having secured their profit on their fancy and extra fancy grades, they launched upon the Canadian prairies their third grade article at any figure which could be secured for that product. I am prepared to prove that they sold hundreds of carloads at a net loss. It can be shown by their own figures that in the Northwestern states during that time it cost $1.06 to produce a box of apples, and it cost in British Columbia at the same time about $1.15. Why? One reason is that we paid labour higher than labour was paid across the line, and another reason is that we paid more for containers than they did in the United States; and if hon. gentlemen ask for an explanation of those facts, I can tell them it is because they had a better organization than we had and beat us at buying. But notwithstanding the fact that it cost the growers in the Northwestern states $1.06 —I am not speaking in millions but in something I can understand, a dollar and a few cents—they were willing to contract for hundreds of carloads at a loss of from 40 to 50 cents per box. Why? Because they wanted to do two things: to get rid of a surplus stock, and then to secure the market for the future. With what result to British Columbia? British Columbia had to compete with that abnormal, illegal price —I do not know that I should call it illegal, but at any rate I will say, unfair. She had to compete with that reduced price for Northwestern stock on the Canadian prairies. It cost us $1.15 to produce a box of apples, and we were forced to sell at under 90 cents a box in order to get any sale whatever. How long, think you, Mr. Speaker, would an industry survive that was carried on under those conditions, at a loss of 25 cents or thereabouts on every box that was put upon the open market? There was only one thing to do. The dumping regulations would not apply; that fruit was properly stamped and graded. The Fruit Growers' Association and the legislature of British Columbia appealed to this Government four years ago and asked for a reasonable protection. I am not now speaking of revenue; I do not believe the Government got much out of it in the line of revenue; I am speaking from the standpoint of protection. In order to protect, which meant to preserve the life of, the British Columbia apple industry, this Government very wisely, as we thought, granted, in the session of 1916, a protection of 30 cents per box upon imported American fruit, with the result that that year we sold our apples at a bare trifle above actual cost price.

Now, I hold in my hand a copy of this famous platform, but I do not propose to read it all. With very much of it I agree. On page 13 I read under the heading "Definite Tariff Demands" a proposal that the tariff laws be amended "by placing all foodstuffs on the free list." May I tell my hon. friends, for their future guidance, that there is certainly no better foodstuff than

British Columbia apples? Now, Sir, I have something else which I desire to read to the House. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who I regret is not in his place, is reported to have said in a speech delivered in the city of Regina on November 19, 1919:

> If the rich man wants to have grape fruit for breakfast he pays no duty. If you want to eat a baked apple for your morning meal you can have it in the face of a customs protection of somewhere around fifty cents per barrel. . . . The application of the principle of protection is unsound economically and retards the development of a country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STACEY: And hon. gentlemen applaud that! Think of it. The hon. member for Marquette says: "If you want to eat a baked apple you"—that is, the poor people—"can have it in the face of a customs protection of somewhere around fifty cents per barrel." By the way, I want to be perfectly candid and tell my hon. friend that he is wrong in his figures. The customs protection is 90 cents per barrel, or 30 cents per box. He should have said to them: "Gentlemen, if I had had my way, you poor people would not have got any apples at all." There would not have been a British Columbia apple on the prairies. The trees in British Columbia would all have been destroyed because the growers would have been producing at a loss. So soon as that had happened the American Northwestern States would have jumped the price up and would have controlled the importation because the Nash interests in the Northwestern States control the whole situation and there would have been apples on the prairie just according as it suited the Nash interest and in spite of everything else. Without that thirty cents a box, apples on the prairies would have been absolutely prohibitive. The people never would have looked at one. I am not talking poetry, and I have not the grace of oratory to make this go very far into your skulls, I am afraid; but what I am saying is solid truth, solid fact. The farmers, and indeed the entire population, of the Canadian prairies. may be profoundly thankful that the Government of Canada did four years ago grant this comparatively small protection of thirty cents per box, because it saved the industry to British Columbia and for the western prairies.

I want to emphasize that last word. There are 28,000 men who would have been put out of business in British Columbia. I suppose some of these hon. gentlemen regard that as a very insignificant matter. We believe in interprovincial trade. Our people, year by year, buy from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 worth of stuff especially from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. That may not be very much but it is a big thing for us especially under existing conditions. If those 28,000 growers had been put out of business what would have been the situation at the present time? They have in the Northwestern States a far greater acreage than we have, they have resources far beyond what we have and we could not imagine a better crop than we had in 1914. What would have been ahead of us? Nothing but absolute ruin. What saved the country, what saved the growers, what saved my own province, was that this Government, in 1916, did what we asked. The situation was saved and as a result the prairies had cheap fruit.

I do not forget while I speak that last year the price was high. But of all agricultural products fruit was the last one to respond to the general rise in prices as far as the producer was concerned. Our product last year was not as great as possibly it might have been. Shall I dare tell the House one reason why our product last year was smaller? I think I shall. Last May I went down through the Okanagan on some business. I saw ranch after ranch in the Okanagan that was growing up a waste—trees neglected and no crop worth speaking of. Why, I said at some of these ranches: "Where is the owner; and what is he doing?" Enlisted! I was told man after man deliberately got up and left his ranch, the whole proposition, and struck out across the seas. To give you one single illustration: I met an old hero; he was over sixty years of age, he had just got back and I took off my hat in his presence. He and his wife had gone overseas. She was a trained nurse. He had returned, being demobilized before she was, and he was expecting her in a few days. She had been promoted to the rank of captain. I looked into his face and said: "Ah, ha things will be different when she gets back; she is your superior officer." "Oh, no" he replied, "she will have to revert to private rank." My only object in mentioning that is to show that whole areas in the apple producing country were left to take care of themselves the best they could because the ranchers went overseas and hastened to get there at the earliest possible date. All honour to these men.

I am not talking politics. I am giving you facts and I am speaking to the populations of Alberta and Saskatchewan and, to some extent, of Manitoba. If there is one thing that the people of the prairies should be pleased over it is that the policy of this Government in 1916 saved them from an exorbitant increase in the prices of apples since that date. While I do not forget the fine quality of the apples in Ontario, Nova Scotia and Quebec, everybody knows that under normal conditions that product finds its market overseas. We are prepared to meet any honest Canadian competition; it matters not where it comes from. What we do object to, and what we have persistently objected to, is the unfair, unreasonable and unneighbourly policy of dumping third-rate stuff upon the poor prairie people and forcing the higher-quality fruit off the market.

How can we, in face of these plain facts, stand up in this House and say, as did my hon. friend who just sat down (Mr. Thomson): No protection on anything we produce is what we stand for? I claim that is a narrow policy. I claim that is not a team policy, I claim that is not a policy that will win in the long run for the Canadian people. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) in a speech made recently before this House said:

> What grown man should want protection anyhow? Our sons and brothers in the trenches did not want protection; it was the fellows they went up against that needed protection.

That was uttered, I presume in a burst of impassioned eloquence. But what is the fact to-day? Every steel helmet upon the head of a soldier on the continent of Europe is the refutation of that statement; and when a man foolishly, or otherwise, so disregarded the idea of protection that he stuck up his head a little too high he paid for his foolishness with his life. Protection! All civilization and all legislation is based upon protection. Strike out protection and we have anarchy. It is folly for a man to say that he denounces the idea of protection. The whole structure of our civilization, of constitutional government, and of everything we hold dear, rests upon some application of the fundamental principle of protection. It is legitimate, it is natural, it is necessary, and it is a proper application in the realm of economics.

With regard to the amendment, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) spoke of its destructive character. I shall not repeat what he said; but in looking at what it proposes to do I, too, Sir, was struck with its vein of common generalities—the old expressions of the high cost of living and of the need for a general reduction in the tariff,—and I thought of Tennyson's words in that connection:

> Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null.

With regard to the Budget, Sir, I can easily understand that any man with one eye on his pocket and the other on the Government's proposals could take his pen and draw a line through a great many of the clauses, and if three or four million other men did that we would have a beautiful Budget; the best men would be out of a job and the country would soon be a memory. We have an enormous debt, and as I—a plain, common working man—see it there is only one of two things to do; either borrow the money or pay it. I propose to do my part towards paying it. I believe, Sir, that while the people of this country may perhaps criticize some of the measures outlined in the Budget they will, on the whole accept it as the best possible solution of the great problem which confronts Canada to-day. If I might attempt to suggest for the consideration of the minister—one shall I say, amendment?—one thought, that might find a place in his mind overnight, it would be this: I would suggest to him to consider the advisability of making a provision whereby every citizen of Canada who reached the years of maturity should be compelled to pay a minimum Dominion Income Tax of, say, $2. I believe, Sir, that would link up with this country's financial interests every citizen from the Atlantic to the Pacific in a way in which they are not now linked up. There are hundreds and thousands who will not be called upon to pay an income tax directly. For their own sake, for the sake of the interest it will create in their own minds regarding the welfare and the development of this country and its future prosperity, I would have every man and woman over twenty-one years of age, without exception, asked to pay a small tax, or an income tax. That would identify them, continually and individually, with the economic and general welfare of the Dominion.

Mr. ARTHUR L. DESAULNIERS (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty to join my colleagues of the left who have taken part in this debate in protesting strongly against the administration which obtains at the present time. This protest, Mr. Speaker, I must utter in the name of more than fifty thousand citizens whom I have the honour to represent on the floor of this House, and particularly in the name of the many brave young men of my county who enlisted in the Canadian army for the defence of the Empire, and who now meet with so little recognition from the Government. I must voice it also in the name of the agricultural class and of the entire labouring class, who have worked and suffered through the great war, and who, to-day and to-morrow, will continue to work and suffer in order to meet the staggering debts heaped upon the country by extravagant expenditure and the awarding of profiteering contracts to favourites and supporters of the Government.

We might have believed, Mr. Speaker, that once the armistice was signed, which in reality meant the end of the war, the Government would have chosen economy for the first article of their programme. Thus, instead of assuming the pompous title of Government of Reconstruction, they should in all decency have called themselves an economic Government and have practiced economy in all things. But on the contrary, they increased expenditure in enormous proportions. They even were bound to have recourse to considerable loans under conditions most onerous and most unfavourable to the country. Instead of being reduced, the effectives of the Canadian militia were increased, even doubled; administrative commissions are created in all the departments; a course which doubles and trebles the cost of administration. The nationalization of the railways, the creation of a merchant fleet, when the country is already on the brink of bankruptcy, I hold to be national suicide. And that is why the Government had to face in its loans rates of interest higher than that which would be paid even by the unfortunate farmer forced to borrow a thousand dollars from his neighbour.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is not by borrowing money, nor by increasing the duties, nor by imposing taxes that we shall remove the unrest that prevails at present throughout the country. That is not the means of restoring the confidence and well-being which our people need, neither of reducing the high cost of living that is bearing so heavily on them.

I was surprised but delighted to hear, in the opening days of this session, that the navy was about to disappear; but, knowing the inclinations of this Government as I do, I am afraid it will come back stronger than ever after the Imperial Conference.

[Mr. Desaulniers.]

If we wish to restore peace, harmony, confidence and prosperity and to balance our finances, Mr. Speaker, we must put off this onerous scheme of a navy to fifty years hence; we must reduce the permanent forces of the Militia to the strength that is strictly necessary for maintaining order in the country; we must abolish all commissions that are more or less useful, such as the Board of Commerce which the people talk so nicely about and which threatens to become famous, the Railway Commission, the only one which might be of some little use, the Civil Service Commission, so much criticized even by the most faithful supporters of the Government, the Purchasing Commission, who have the power to buy more than the Government can afford to pay, the Tariff Commission, still in the embryonic stage, the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Board, which, judging by the many amendments brought at every session, has been badly conceived, and all other commissions the names of which I do not remember now but that are still less necessary and more useless. The population of our country has barely increased in the course of the last fifteen years; however, the number of civil servants was more than doubled, on account of these commissions, so that we have never enough buildings to accommodate them all.

To explain their policy of deficits, the Government stated that large works had been undertaken sooner than they wished, with a view to procuring work for the labourmen and the returned soldiers. We cannot accept that argument, Mr. Speaker, when we know that labour is scarce in the country and that in many places the soil is not producing what it should, because the farmers cannot secure the help they require; also when we know that the manufacturers, particularly the lumber men, have very much difficulty in getting the men they want for their factories and mills, notwithstanding the continuous and alarming increase of wages which are not yet sufficient to meet the high cost of living.

For all the reasons I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, I wish to appeal to the good sense of former Liberals sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, and I am asking them to endeavour to impress upon their Conservative friends who are in power, the necessity of dissolving Parliament immediately after this session, in order that the people may select their representatives, not for their purposes, but with the only object of assisting in the economic and social reconstruction of our country. Thus shall be sent back home those pretended patriots who, since their coming into power, confined themselves in tearing up our statutes to replace them by ever famous Orders in Council, that iniquitous legislation which sanctioned the utmost arbitrary and most autocratic measures.

Thus, the people would be able to elect representatives who, while in Parliament, would strive to create a real "entente cordiale" between the different nationalities in Canada and to eliminate racial disputes so often raised by hon. members opposite.

Thrift is a vain word on the lips of hon. members from the opposite side of this House and of hon. members of this Unionist Government. Why should they talk about economy, when they advocate measures entailing such heavy expenditure at a time when the country is on the verge of bankruptcy? Why should they speak of saving, when the present Government are encouraging the profiteers whom they let accumulate millions of pounds of foodstuffs, while the people groan under the burden of taxes and the exorbitant cost of essential commodities? Why should they advocate thrift, when the Government are making the ridiculous promise to lend 125 millions to foreign countries, while our finances are in such a bad condition; but that is another way of further enriching the Canadian manufacturers who made millions out of the war.

Now, if we look at Canada from a social standpoint, we regret to find that the country is seething with unrest and discontent; that this epidemic of strikes is reaching an acute state; that the troubles between capital and labour have brought hardships to the working people and even to the farming community who are no longer able to provide for their wants, owing to the high cost of living. What is the Government doing? What is the Minister of Labour doing? I think I am within the mark when I say that such a state of affairs was brought about, to a large extent, through the supineness of the Minister of Labour. In these times of stress, when all our energies should be bent towards securing that economic and social reconstruction I was referring to a moment ago, which is the first requirement for the prosperity of Canada, it is absolutely necessary that the electors of this country be called upon to choose representatives, having at heart its interests, men who are able to put our affairs on a sound financial basis, and to cause Canada to successfully hold its place among other countries, so that the dictum of Sir Wilfrid Laurier may prove true, when he said that the 20th century would be Canada's century.

On motion of Mr. McCoig the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

Friday, May 21, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

LETTER FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to communicate a letter from His Excellency the Governor General signed by his own hand and which is as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have received with great pleasure the Address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of Parliament and thank you for it sincerely.

Devonshire.

Government House, Ottawa,
May 17, 1920.

JOINT PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. CURRIE moved:

That the recommendations in the first report of the Joint Committee on Printing be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion will require unanimous consent in the absence of notice.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Return of the number of persons employed in the Department of Indian Affairs; copy of a letter signed by 21 members and senators; return in regard to the publishers of the Montreal Gazette and of the amounts paid to them; return showing the number of persons employed in the Department of Labour.—Hon. Mr. Sifton.

Return showing the number of persons employed in the Department of Marine at Ottawa; copy of Order in Council No. 1061, dated 15th May, 1920, with regard to the payment of gratuities.—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

EMPIRE DAY ADJOURNMENT.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I beg to move the motion of which I gave notice yesterday:

That when this House adjourns on Friday, the 21st instant, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 25th instant.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out, as I did yesterday, that this motion requires two days' notice and only one day's notice has been given. It can therefore only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether it is applicable or not, but my attention has been directed to the language of rule 40 which says that the rule requiring notice shall not apply to the times of meeting or adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the interpretation which has been given to the section under that rule is that it refers to the hour for meeting because in the French edition "heure" is used. That being so, as at present advised, I am still of the opinion that two days' notice would be required to be given.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I do not want to be the only dissenting voice in this House to the motion moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). We have no hope or expectation of an increase in the indemnity this session although the high cost of living is just as bad for members of Parliament as for anybody else.

An hon. MEMBER: Worse.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman—

Mr. GAUVREAU: I shall not make a speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him to point out that if this motion is to be entertained by unanimous consent there can be no debate. I assume that the hon. gentleman, in the few remarks which he has already addressed to the House, intends to withdraw the objection that he made yesterday.

Mr. GAUVREAU: No, but I want to give the reason why I took objection to it. It is in deference to those who joined hands with this side of the House to make Ascension day a holiday. I hope that the Prime Minister will see his way clear to starting Saturday and morning sittings as soon as possible, and the sooner the better, because every member wants to get home to attend to his private affairs—if we want to live up to our obligations and make a decent living.

Motion agreed to.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

COPIES OF BUDGET SPEECH FOR DISTRIBUTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I would like to ask the Government if it will be possible to print 25,000 copies of the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) for distribution among members. We have many requests from different parts of the country and it is impossible to get copies from the distribution office. I think that a copy of this speech should be in the hands of every person, or at least of every family, in Canada, and we ought to have at least a reasonable number for distribution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would not have any objection provided that the answer by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) is also published and distributed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We will take into consideration the suggestions which have been made. I think that arrangements are already under way to print a large number of copies of the resolutions.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Thursday, May 20, the debate on the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, representing in this House, as I have the privilege of doing, one of the largest urban and rural ridings, if not the largest, in the Dominion of Canada, I wish to give to the House a few reasons why I purpose supporting the amendment of my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) to the Budget which was presented to the House a few days ago by the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). I wish as well to offer a few objections to some of the arguments which were advanced by hon. gentlemen who addressed the House from the Government side and to give a few reasons why I take exception to the views which they presented. Mr. Speaker, with your long parliamentary experience and knowledge of the different members of this House personally you would have been amused as you sat in your place and listened to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) who spoke with a brief for the great Massey-Harris corporation, advocating their case and telling us why we should not allow agricultural implements to come into Canada in opposition to theirs.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have very great doubt as to whether the hon. gentleman is in order in imputing to another hon. gentleman the circumstance that he holds a brief for a manufacturing corporation. I have very grave doubt indeed as to whether the hon. gentleman would be in order in making an assertion of that kind unless he were to do so in a constitutional manner.

Mr. ROBB: That expression, as I understand, is only used as a figure of speech.

Mr. McCOIG: If it would be more in order that the word "brief" should be withdrawn I will withdraw it and say that he was advocating their case. With all due respect to that hon. gentleman, when he undertakes to interfere with any policy that may be advocated by any hon. gentleman in this House, which has for its object the admission of agricultural implements into this country in order to give us greater food supply, those who have the real cause of the plain people of this land at heart should object to the statement the hon. gentleman made, and should do their utmost to put an end to the great contribution that some manufacturers are securing from the people of Canada at the present time. In justification of this statement let me draw the attention of the House to a despatch in the Globe from the city of Washington which states that this year the wheat crop in the United States will be 483,000,000 bushels as against a crop of 731,000,000 bushels last year. This shows that we are going to be confronted with a great shortage of wheat on the part of the United States. We have an Associated Press despatch from old England which states that the British people will receive from the North American continent 4,000,000 tons less wheat than they received last year. I also want to draw the attention of Parliament and the country to the fact that we are face to face with scarcity, it may not be too much to say that we are possibly on the threshold of a wheat famine. This Parliament should do everything possible to assist the producers of this land in getting every bushel of grain so that they may reap as large a harvest as possible to assist the other nations of the world with what we do not need for home consumption.

Let me go further, Sir. We have the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) standing up and advocating protection to-day because he represents in this House one of the large cities in the province of Ontario. But it was only a few years ago, in 1911, that the same hon. gentleman was running in a rural riding on the reciprocity platform and advocating the very thing which he seems to be opposing to-day. May we not therefore say: "Oh, consistency thou art a jewel"? At a late hour last night we heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey). How he tickled the ears of the high protectionists, and the representatives of the corporations, or rather the stockholders of the corporations—I should rather put it in that form. How they applauded and pounded their desks when the hon. member complimented the Government because they had placed a duty of ninety cents a barrel on apples—a food, Sir, which the people require so badly and which in the old days so many families in humble circumstances could enjoy. The effect of this duty on apples was brought home to me in a convincing form last night when in company with another gentleman I took a walk down Sparks street. Then I understood the reason for the applause with which the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley were greeted. My friend and I dropped into a fruit store and what did we see there? A sign that apples were selling at the rate of three for 25 cents. Fancy, Sir, three apples for a quarter, and hon. gentlemen opposite were pounding their desks because of the fact that the apple growers were getting a protection of ninety cents a barrel! Fancy people in humble circumstances being forced to pay such a price for fruit which they so greatly need, instead of being able to obtain it at a reasonable figure. I am interested in fruit-growing to a limited extent. I set out some fruit trees in my orchard last year, and propose to do the same again this year; but I say, Sir, that if the customs duty compels the plain people of Canada to pay so much for fruit let that duty be removed in order that fruit—which after all is a food—may be available to them at the very lowest possible cost.

We had also yesterday a lengthy address from the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). We listened to him for an hour before dinner and then for another hour when the House resumed after recess. The hon. member attacked the United Farmers, and what did he say? He said to them: "You people have stores in the West. You supply agricultural implements to purchasers out there and demand the cash." Then the hon. member grew eloquent and he addressed compliments to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), whose face lighted up at the compliments that were paid to him. The hon. member for Brantford was held up as a public benefactor who supplied the farmer of the West with his wares and granted him six months, two years, and sometimes three years, to pay for them. Is it not a grand thing that we should have in this House a manufacturer who is so generous that he is willing to sell the machinery which he produces on lengthy payments? But did the hon. member for Vancouver Centre state that the hon. member for Brantford's firm—the International Harvester Company—and also the Massey-Harris Company, when they sell machinery to the farmers in the West or in other parts of the country, expect those farmers to pay at the rate of from eight to twelve per cent per annum for every day they give them on the goods which they supply. Furthermore, Sir, on some occasions, on some of the implements these firms supply, when the customer wants time, they advance the price from $50 to $75, and add interest to the price besides. Is it not significant that these gentlemen are united together and are all agreed upon the one great question of extracting from the people of this country every possible dollar they can, and likewise charging them for the time allowed in paying for the goods?

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre brought forward one question which is of vital importance to the people, and on which I agree with him to a very large extent, and that is the question of the Wheat Board. That board, I wish to assure the Government, does not meet with the approval of the farmers in that section of Ontario which I have the privilege of representing, and for reasons which I will furnish later. In the meantime let me say that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre certainly did pay his compliments to the United Farmers in this regard. He almost charged them with responsibility for the creation of the Wheat Board, but he omitted to state that it was the Government, and not the United Farmers that created the Wheat Board. Some time ago, in reply to a question, the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that the participation certificates would likely yield the wheat growers about forty cents a bushel. The Wheat Board in the first place exacted on every bushel of wheat that is sold in this country fifteen cents, in the second place twenty-five cents, and in the third instance forty cents, making a total of eighty cents. Thus, if the eighty cents a bushel is received on the wheat, and the participation certificates only amount to forty cents in the way of return to the producer, it is going to cost the Canadian farmer forty cents for every bushel of wheat that has been handled and sold by the Wheat Board in Canada. If this is true, then figuring on the basis of five bushels of wheat to every barrel of flour, if the consumers of Canada had got their wheat at what the farmers sold it for they would have been able to purchase their flour at $2 a barrel less than they have had to pay for it. This, Sir, I believe, is one of the reasons the people of Canada are opposed to the Wheat Board, and why they are to a very large extent agreed that it should be wiped out of existence at the earliest possible moment.

Let me go a step further in this matter. As far as regards the province of Ontario, the Wheat Board have been taking the wheat from that province and not allowing the millers to grind it, which has resulted in driving many of the stock raisers of Ontario out of the stock-raising business. Those stock raisers would have been able to obtain the offal from the wheat had the millers of Ontario only been allowed to operate and been permitted to sell the flour they could have made instead of shipping away the wheat to be ground in other countries. What does that mean? It means, Sir, that in the province of Ontario for months at a time, the wheels of the flour mills including many of the largest, have not been turning; in the different localities many men have been deprived of employment; and the stock raisers have been driven out of business to an extent that will be illustrated by some figures which I shall now quote.

These figures are taken from the stockyards report as set forth in the Toronto Globe, and they relate to stock that was placed in the Toronto stockyards for the first three months of the present year, and the corresponding months of last year. Of cattle there were 72,766 head in 1920. In the corresponding three months of last year there were 90,183 head, making a difference of nearly 18,000 less cattle sold in those stockyards this year than was the case in 1919. Of swine there were 95,285 for the first three months of the present year, and 139,969 for the corresponding period of last year, a difference of nearly 45,000 hogs. I ask you, what will that mean to the consumers of this country? Of sheep there were 14,083 this year, and 26,764 last year, a difference of 12,000 less sheep in the first three months of the present year. What does that mean, Sir? It means that on account of the wheat being shipped from this country instead of being ground here, stock raisers have been deprived of the offal to enable them to finish their stock and place it on the markets of Canada.

Now let me give figures to further show the extent to which these men are going out of the stock-raising business. Taking calves, there were 2,500 more calves sold in Toronto for the first three months this year than were sold for the corresponding period last year; whereas if the farmers of Ontario had the offal and had the feed which they should have been able to obtain they would have been able to finish a large proportion of these calves, and in placing them on the market been able to contribute materially to the available food supply of the country. I therefore feel on safe ground in advising the Government to hesitate before they permit the Wheat Board to remain any longer in charge of the supplies which are being produced by the farmers of Canada. Objection to the Wheat Board has been directed, so far as supporters of the Government are concerned, not only by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who has looked thoroughly into the question. We see that the representative of the Government to England and also to Washington, in the person of Mr. Lloyd Harris, is also attacking the board. At a dinner given in Hamilton the other day that gentleman is reported as follows:

> Mr. Harris alluded to the Board of Commerce being appointed to check profiteering, and stated that while it was at this duty, the Wheat Board was profiteering to "beat the band." If he were allowed to control the entire steel output of Canada he could make all kinds of money, and the situation regarding wheat was like this. The board made wheat prices that were a crime.

Now, Sir, if the trade representative of the Government to England says that the Wheat Board is profiteering to beat the band and that the prices they made for wheat are a crime, then am I not justified in appealing to the Government to give the matter a great deal more serious consideration than they have evidenced up to the present time? The statement is also made that the Board of Commerce is at present investigating the operations of the profiteers of the country. In this connection I would recall to the House the day the Board of Commerce was created. You will remember, Sir, that hon. members on this side of the House protested against the creation of the Board of Commerce, advancing the argument that we had too many commissions at the expense of the people of Canada. We protested against the Board of Commerce on the ground that we ought to have a public prosecutor in the country whose duty it would be to investigate all cases of profiteering and to bring before the county judges all persons against whom charges could be made. We contended that profiteers could be prosecuted in that manner with less expense to the people of Canada. That was our stand then, so far as I am concerned, I can say that it is my attitude yet in regard to this subject. The Department of Finance now have offenders in connection with the Income Tax or the Business Profits Tax brought before the county courts through the medium of their officers, thus obviating a great deal of unnecessary expenditure, and there is no reason why a similar procedure should not be followed in the case of profiteers. The Board of Commerce, Mr. Speaker, has issued a new circular which it would take too long a time for me to read. This circular is issued to every grocer of the country, and in warm weather like this I am afraid it will prove too laborious a task for the already hard-worked man behind the counter to read what is contained in it. There is a long list of requirements as to what these people shall and shall not do, what they pay for their goods, what they sell them for, what profits they receive, and all information as to whether they are profiteering or not. It is quite a voluminous document. Could you imagine a more ridculous letter sent out to the trade, Sir? Here is a list of articles, eighty in number, which has to be made out every month. Why, Sir, are the Government going to let this board run wild? Are they going to allow the board to inconvenience beyond all reason people who are transacting business honestly, requiring them to have special clerks to keep track of every article taken in and sold and every cent of profit which is made? If so, the expense of additional clerks which will have to be borne by the consumer will greatly enhance the price of goods. This body has been in existence for nearly a year investigating profiteering, but it has not yet succeeded in putting one profiteer in jail;

it has not extracted one dollar of unjust profit from any one in Canada. Yet the commissioners are going on upsetting the business and trade of the country and interfering to an undue extent with men who are trying to conduct a straight and honourable business. In this regard may I repeat a little story that was told me by a gentleman the other day by way of comparison with the Board of Commerce. Knowing that the board has been doing all sorts of investigating during the past year, being considerably in the limelight and being much written about in the press week in and week out, this gentleman told a story about a burglary that was committed in the city of Detroit. The Chief of Police was called up and was informed of the affair. Immediately he called up the police station and deputed a policeman to hurry as fast as he could up Spadina avenue where, he told the officer, an extensive burglary had been committed. The policeman went down and after the lapse of an hour the chief called him up on the telephone to ascertain what he had done in the matter. He asked the policeman: "Are you there?" The policeman replied that he was. "What are you doing?" asked the chief; "I am working hard," said the policeman. "Are you on the job?" says the chief. The policeman replied that he was; then the chief asked him what he had accomplished. Slowly the chief got the information that his assistant had discovered that a lot of jewellery and clothing had been stolen. "Well, hurry up and try to accomplish something definite" says the chief. To his satisfaction the policeman replied; "I have accomplished something." The chief asked him "What have you done?" and the policeman replied that he had got one of them. "Which one?" the chief wanted to know; and the policeman replied quite innocently: "I have the fellow who was robbed." Now, Sir, that is precisely the position in regard to the Board of Commerce. They have been investigating for a year, giving people all kinds of trouble and annoyance, and all they have discovered is the poor man who has been robbed, who has had all sorts of high prices extorted from him. Are the Government going to continue this extravagance? Are they going to continue the board, whose first act was one of profiteering so far as they themselves were concerned? They were appointed at first to receive salaries of $7,000 each, with $8,000 for the chairman, but before they would act they had to have these salaries increased to $8,000 apiece with $10,000 for the chairman. This is the only real profiteering that they have discovered up to the present time. Now, if we are going to keep commissions like the Board of Commerce, who raised their salaries not by ten cents on the dollar but by $2,000 at a jump, I want to say that the minister's proposals for taxing the plain people for the necessaries of life will be absolutely rejected when the people have an opportunity of expressing themselves. I want to protest on behalf of the people who have to buy shoes for large families. The minister is going to make it impossible for poor people to get shoes. You know, Sir, that you cannot buy a pair of shoes for $9. Any hon. gentleman who has bought a pair of shoes within the past month will agree with me that a very ordinary pair of footwear will cost at least $12 or $14. Are you going to make the man who can least afford it, pay ten cents on every dollar he pays for shoes? Are you going to tax the man who has to pay $45 for his suit? Who, Sir, will be most affected by this tax? I see my hon. friends opposite smiling; but the Minister of Finance and his colleagues are compelling the boys who went overseas, who saved this country to us and have made it possible for us to enjoy the privileges which we enjoy at the present time, to pay a large portion of this taxation. The soldiers who are returning to civil life will be the ones most affected. Their wardrobes were wiped out of existence when they went overseas; they now find it necessary, upon their return, to buy suits and other necessary articles of clothing, and they will be the first to dig down into their pockets and pay these taxes as a result of the sins and extravagances of the Government of the day. I appeal to the Minister of Finance to exempt thes soldiers of this country who have obtained their honourable discharge from payment of these ridiculous and unfair taxes that he is levying on the people. I make this appeal in all sincerity, and I believe that it will be backed up by members of Parliament and by every citizen of Canada.

Let me also appeal to the minister on behalf of the women, particularly the young women who have only themselves to depend upon for their support, and many of whom are to-day trying to save a little money for the purpose of buying a coat to keep them warm during next winter. Sir, you cannot buy a coat that is respectable for less than $50; not a member of this House can buy a coat for his wife at less than that amount. Why, then, should the Government compel those who are in humbler circumstances to appear on the streets clothed differently from those who are fortunate enough to have greater privileges, greater earning capacity? Let me say a word also on behalf of those women who are working in the shops, in the different department stores, possibly some in the kitchens, who have their troubles in getting along in this life. Is it not ridiculous that the Minister of Finance should extract from them a tax of ten per cent on a $50 garment while at the same time the profiteers are escaping any extraction from them of amounts that should go into the public treasury? If a returned man is married, he has to pay a greater bulk of these taxes, because he will have to buy clothes for his wife as well as to buy clothes befitting his own position. There are other ways of raising revenue to carry on the affairs of this country than this method which the minister has adopted. I saw in the press the other day an intimation to the effect that the minister intends to visit within a short time the old historic city of Kingston, which did him the honour of electing him by acclamation. In all likelihood, the minister will go there on the first of July, after Parliament prorogues, when all kinds of sports will be going on; when the school boys will be competing with one another in friendly games on the ball diamond. The minister will go around in his limousine or expensive motor car. He will drive up to the ball park, and how will he feel, Sir, when the boys look at him and say: "That fellow charged us ten per cent on the baseball that just went over the plate." Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that he will feel proud when the boys say that the broken bat could not be replaced; it had cost two dollars and, having no gate receipts or funds on hand, the boys could not get the $2.20 which, with the tax, a new bat would cost? Will it not be rather humiliating to the minister when he is faced with this condition in connection with legitimate sports throughout the country? Teams that are made up in the schools and in the factories for the purpose of engaging in innocent amusement, the members of which have no treasury to draw upon, no gate receipts with which to purchase supplies, will find this tax bear heavily upon them; the boys will have to go down into their little pants' pockets and pay out every cent they get in the purchase of balls and bats and gloves and the little uniforms that they require. I say, Sir, that it is small potatoes on the part of the Government, on the part of the Parliament of Canada, to extract from these children these small amounts, when legitimate sports are so badly needed and should be encouraged by every good citizen.

Let me read a brief quotation from a newspaper editorial before I resume my seat. I know that my hon. friends will not question any editorial appearing in the Toronto Globe, because no journal in this country fought behind them more strongly, more faithfully or more honourably at the time of the election which placed them in power. The Globe says, under the caption, "Bad News for Profiteers," referring to a despatch from England concerning a proposed special levy on war-created fortunes:

> A real shell exploded last week with the announcement that the committee—
> A committee of the British House of Commons
>
> —not only thinks the proposal practicable, but has devised a plan whereby $2,750,000,000 can be collected from 75,000 war profiteers.
> A nice tidy sum, that, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There will be no tears of compassion in his eyes at the thought of adding it to the credit side of his Budget. He is more likely to be smiling at the prospect.

What a splendid position our Minister of Finance would have been in had he had the courage to stand up in this Parliament and, instead of extracting from people in humble circumstances a ten and twenty per cent tax, provide for a levy on the war profiteers of Canada! Estimating the population of Canada as one-quarter of that of Great Britain, a tax of this kind would result in placing $500,000,000 in the treasury. That would put you on Easy street, and only a few would feel sore. Those affected might not contribute to the support of members of the House of Commons at an election, but those members would have the support of the masses of the people for all time to come.

Mr. HOCKEN: Has that policy been adopted in Britain?

Mr. McCOIG: Has the hon. member any reason to say that it has not?

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, I have.

Mr. McCOIG: I would like to have your proof.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hocken) would not be in order in speaking at this stage.

Mr. McCOIG: I do not know why the hon. member should dispute it. The statement appears in the editorial column of one of the most reputable newspapers of Canada, published in the city from which my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) comes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it again.

Mr. McCOIG: I will send the clipping over to my hon. friend.

Mr. HOCKEN: The British Governmnet has not acted.

Mr. McCOIG: I will read it again, in case the hon. member wants to copy it in the Orange Sentinel next week:

A real shell exploded last week with the announcement that the committee not only thinks—

An hon. MEMBER: "The Committee?"

Mr. McCOIG: A committee of the House of Commons appointed to investigate this matter.

Mr. CURRIE: No, a committee of the Treasury officials.

Mr. McCOIG: Does the hon. member (Mr. Hocken) wish me to read the article?

Mr. HOCKEN: Surely.

Mr. McCOIG: It continues:

—not only thinks the proposal practicable, but has devised a plan whereby $2,750,000,000 can be collected from 75,000 war profiteers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: Has that been adopted by the British Government?

Mr. McCOIG: Well, the hon. member will realize that I have not all the details, but it is quite evident that it has, because reputable newspapers all over the country have referred to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McCOIG: Then I put this question to the hon. member: Is he opposed to extracting from the war profiteers some of the profits that they made?

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is very clear that an hon. member who is speaking may, if he gives his consent thereto, be interrupted by another hon. member who wishes to put a question to him. But in no case can an hon. member who is speaking interrogate other hon. members who are in their seats.

Mr. CURRIE: I think the hon. member knows he is wrong now.

Mr. McCOIG: If the hon. member for Toronto West (Mr. Hocken) is satisfied with saying—and I saw him shake his head—that he is not in favour of collecting from the war-time profiteers—

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not say that.

Mr. McCOIG: Well, if he is in favour of collecting from the war-time profiteers, let him join with us on this side of the House in demanding that the Government impose a tax on these war-time profiteers and thus increase the revenues of this country.

These are, to a very large extent, the reasons why I am on this occasion assuring the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) that I will support his amendment and any other amendment brought in by any hon. member for the purpose of assisting in reducing the tariff on the necessaries of life, so as to give us every opportunity of producing as much as possible with a view to making the cost of living in this country as cheap as possible to the Canadian consumers.

Mr. JOHN A. MAHARG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, before entering into a discussion of the Budget, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) on his frankness in laying before Parliament and the people of Canada the exact situation in which we find ourselves from a financial point of view. I should also like to congratulate him on what appears to me to be a brave attempt in some respects to secure additional revenue. I cannot go so far as to congratulate him on all of the methods he proposes in order to secure this revenue; I only wish I could. No doubt, he is making an honest attempt to curtail extravagant expenditure; but as the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) has said, the relief he hopes to give to some and his belief that those more able to pay will be called upon to do so, will, I am afraid fall far short of the mark. His estimates of values of goods when they become luxuries or not real necessities, might apply to warmer climates; but they are, in the main, rather too low for a country with the temperatures we have. They may, however, be, in his opinion, the right values to put on these goods, and we shall leave the matter at that. He might have gone just a little further, and while he purposes making those pay who are able to do so, he might have made it a little easier for those to whom he wishes to afford relief to get along. His Budget makes no provision for lowering the daily or monthly cost of living of the average workingman, the average individual, be he a labourer in town or a labourer on the farms. This Budget will not make any reduction in the monthly bills of such a man; on the contrary, I believe it will increase them to a certain extent, and I do not think that is what the minister purposed doing. He might have gone a little further and substantially reduced, if not entirely wiped out the tariff on the necessaries of life, particularly as regards foodstuffs. We, as producers of food, which is practically our entire production, are quite prepared to give the consumer the entire world for his market in which to buy his necessaries of life so far as food is concerned. The Minister of Finance might also have gone a little further and made some reductions in the tariff on other necessaries of life. Taking into consideration the climatic conditions he might have made it easier for a man to keep his family warm during the long winter months we have in this country. I will not dwell on this matter any further than to draw attention to the fact that the Budget of the Minister of Finance is not going to accomplish what I think he intends it should do.

Another point that I wish to touch on, apart from the Budget entirely, is this, namely, that the discussion that has taken place and the sources that it has come from in this House must surely furnish food for thought for the average individual in Canada. We have heard the statement made that political expediency has largely governed the actions of Government as well as of individuals in this country; and when we see men who in former years were ardent supporters of tariff reductions taking, as the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) has just stated, a complete somersault and now advocating protection, there must be something worthy of consideration at the bottom of the matter. We have often heard it stated that a certain number of Liberals remain within the Liberal party in order that they may control that party. I am not going to say whether that is true or not. The year 1911 brough a number of that type of Liberals to the front and their position became clear, and I hope 1920 will bring the balance, if there are any, to the front, so that the people of Canada may know exactly where they stand. Such disclosures are being made from time to time, and the position of a number of such Liberals has been disclosed. There may be obvious reasons for this. We hear of large mergers taking place these days and of certain concerns represented by certain hon. gentlemen being interested in those mergers, and there may be something in that. We shall, however, leave the matter at that, and no doubt time will disclose just to what extent that condition of affairs exists.

I desire to touch briefly on the remarks of one or two hon. members who have taken part in this debate. In the first place, I want to deal briefly with a few of the remarks made by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) who, I am glad, is in his seat, although I can assure him I am not going to say anything that will be annoying to him. While addressing the House my hon. friend gave us a large number of comparisons of conditions, his remarks and his comparisons being almost entirely as regards the Mother Country, Germany and the United States. He held Germany and the United States up as models, England on the other hand being in every case at the bottom. He gave us figures and percentages without end, but his figures and percentages amount to absolutely nothing unless the full conditions are understood. He first dealt with the wheat production and importation of Great Britain in an endeavour to show that Great Britain did not compare with other European countries, of which he mentioned several, in the matter of production of wheat. He stated, if I understood him aright, that during the year previous to the war Great Britain imported 215,000,000 bushels of wheat and produced 57,000,000 bushels, making a total of 272,000,000 bushels. The House will readily see that Great Britain did not import all that wheat for her own consumption; otherwise, she would have been consuming per capita almost double as much wheat as any other country in the world. Canada is considered one of the largest consumers of wheat, and our consumption is in the neighbourhood of five bushels per capita. What did Great Britain do with that wheat? I want to tell the hon. gentleman that he has no doubt eaten some of that wheat that was imported into the Old Country, ground into flour, made into biscuits, and sold to him in his own city at a price equal to, if not less than, the Canadian-made article. That is one of Great Britain's ways of doing business. She thrives on this importation and exportation, and it is that which has made her what she is. I just give that illustration to show that unless you have all the figures and understand fully the conditions, such a huge array of percentages and figures as the hon. member gave count for nothing.

I might go a little further. The hon. gentleman—and I am very sorry he made this comparison—endeavoured to hold Great Britain up as a land almost of paupers. He mentioned the thousands and thousands of paupers there were in that country, and in his comparison he took the year 1914 for England and the year 1910 for the United States. Now we all recollect very well what hardships there were in our own country in 1914, and how in 1910 this country was flourishing as it had not done before for years. But in 1912 and 1913, which is about the period the hon. gentleman took for England, we find that in our own country municipalities and provinces were furnishing funds to give employment. I know of hundreds of thousands of tons of rock being crushed, even though it could not be used at the time, but was merely piled up, in order to give employment to our people. I think the hon. gentleman should have taken these conditions into consideration in making his comparison.

Mr. MANION: I explained when I gave those figures that the reason I took 1910 for the United States was that I could get no figures for 1914 for that country.

Mr. MAHARG: But the hon. gentleman said that it did not make any difference anyway, comparing 1910 in the United States with 1914 in Great Britain.

Mr. MANION: I do not think it would make very much difference.

Mr. MAHARG: There are paupers and paupers, and some countries do not worry very much about them until the paupers are amongst them, in the curb or some other similar place, when institutions have to be provided for them. Other countries let people shift for themselves and keep no records of their paupers. This should be borne in mind when studying the hon. gentleman's comparison.

The hon. gentleman also compared the railways of England with those of other countries, and here again, unless the actual conditions are understood, figures and percentages count for nothing. He instanced the capitalization per mile of railroads in England. Probably the hon. gentleman has travelled more miles in England than I have, and he must have observed that there is absolutely no comparison between the roadbed and facilities along the railroads in England, which he tried to show up in their worst light, and those in the United States or Canada. The roadbed of the railroads in England and the speed at which the trains go is absolutely different from the conditions that prevail in this country. Were the light trains that are used on the roads in England hurled across our roads at the speed at which they go there, they would be in the ditch before they had got up speed. He must also remember that it is service that counts. To give only one illustration, the roads running into the city of London bring in almost as many people to work each day as there are in the city itself. Millions of people are brought in to the city in the morning to work, and are taken out in the evening. The roads there are built for service and they give service, and where you get service, rates are a secondary consideration. The hon. gentleman also gave the cost per ton mile. Here again his comparison was entirely misleading, unless you are familiar with the conditions. Let me give just one illustration: Previous to the war it cost more to take a bushel or a carload of wheat across the province of Saskatchewan by short haul, similar to what they have in England, than it took to transport it from the province of Saskatchewan to the port of Liverpool. That shows that it is the length of haul that counts, and not the circumstances as the hon. gentleman gave them.

Mr. CURRIE: Is not the high cost of hauling a bushel or a carload of wheat across the Prairie Provinces due to the arrangement made by the Government with some of the provinces for a fixed price between Fort William and Winnipeg?

Mr. MAHARG: I presume the hon gentleman refers to the deal that the province of Manitoba made with one of the American lines. He will remember that that applied only to a portion of Manitoba, and also that this Parliament abrogated the agreement some two sessions ago. That agreement is not now in existence, if I understand the legislation that was passed, so it has no effect whatever on the rate for the short haul within the provinces, or on the long haul from any point in Saskatchewan either to Fort William or to Liverpool.

I think it would have been only fair if the hon. gentleman had made a few comparisons with what England had done after the war started. His comparisons related to the period previous to the war for the most part, and he made no comparisons with what England did after the war started, when the great morale which the hon. gentleman has spoken of in these protected countries was put to a very severe test. What do we find Great Britain did after the war started? The very first thing she did was to send over to the continent her "Contemptible Little Army"—as described by a German officer—of 300,000 men, which held back the Germans for days and weeks and months. It was only

4 p.m. a short time afterwards, that free-trade Britain was financing these high-tariff countries which the hon. gentleman referred to the other day. Great Britain kept on financing them out of her own resources, and loaned money to them to a far greater amount than her borrowings from the United States. Great Britain did more than that. She broke the back of Germany while that other country which the hon. gentleman used in his comparison stood looking on, almost to the finish. It reminds me of a little incident I happened to witness once in a home. A mouse had made its appearance in the kitchen, where a little girl of tender years and her father happened to be at the time. While the father undertook to catch the mouse the little girl safely perched herself on a chair, and after he had succeeded in catching and killing the mouse, the little girl at once called to her mother upstairs "we have got the mouse." That was very much the position that country which he was comparing to England was in at the close of the war. What is England doing to-day? England today is paying the freight on the food that the United States has been good enough to sell to the people in Europe to keep them from starving. I do not think we need to go much farther—

Mr MICHAEL CLARK: The loyal party.

Mr. MAHARG: We could give comparison after comparison with the little free trade country that was held up and which came out of the bottom of the list but which holds a very prominent position no matter in what respect you may wish to compare it. The hon. gentleman made comparisons as to the advancement of agriculture in Great Britain. What has Great Britain had to do since she adopted the free trade policy? She has had to break down and she has broken down to a certain extent, the greatest land monopoly that any country ever had to contend with. First of all she had to break down the system and get possession of the land. What did she do in connection with Ireland? She spends hundreds of millions of pounds for the purchase of land on behalf of the agriculturists of Ireland. England had to break down this system before she could start building up again. Great Britain is not recognized as a producer of cereals. She is a land of pasturage; it does not pay her to produce cereals and she only turned to the production of cereals owing to the necessities of war, and no country, not even Canada or the United States, has increased its production of food stuffs to a greater extent than did Great Britain during the years of the war. I do not think we need go any farther. It was not because she could not do it but because there were better lines of business for her to follow.

I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the House but there were one or two remarks of some other hon. gentlemen that I wish to refer to. The hon. gentleman who has just preceded me (Mr. McCoig) has relieved me of considerable trouble in this respect, but he did not go quite far enough in some lines. The hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) yesterday gave us very largely a repetition of what we got at our last regular session in regard to the farmers' movement. That was answered pretty fully, I think, at that time, and I am not going to detain the House with a repetition of what was said then. Once is surely enough. But he made further some statements that are not correct and which I intend to deal with. The hon. gentleman who has preceded me touched on one of these and that is the Wheat Board. We did not ask for the Wheat Board. The inference, if not the statement is to the effect that the farmers asked for the Wheat Board. One hon. member described it as the pooling of our wheat. While the hon. member from Kent (Mr. McCoig) stated that the Government appointed the Wheat Board I want to go further and say that the Government did it against the strong opposition of the farmers of this country. The farmers did not want it and they did not ask for it. But if the Government stepped in, took possession and broke down the lines which had been built up financially and otherwise, and if there is pooling in the buying of wheat overseas, we have no hesitation in saying that we consider it the proper course for our Government to carry out pooling in the selling of wheat, just so long at least as there was pooling in buying from us. We know where this comes from, we know whom the hon. gentleman from Vancouver Centre is speaking for. He is speaking for those who want to get back to the old speculative methods of dealing in wheat. We know who they are and to what lengths the ramifications of their influence extend. They have secured possession of a portion of the press of Western Canada, they have got their tentacles into almost every branch of western business. Behind this movement is a most powerful company, and what has been said by this hon. gentleman is only an echo of the editorials appearing in the press controlled by them, and it is about time the people of this country knew why this campaign was being carried on and why the hon. gentleman is knocking the farmers' movement. It is simply to make it possible for the speculators to get back into action and to mulct the consumers as well as the producers in connection with the marketing of grain. The present system is in the interest not only of the producer but of the consumer. Just so long as the pooling arrangement exists on the other side where our wheat is marketed, we must have a similar arrangement here; if governments are going to buy the governments will have to sell.

There was one other remark that was made yesterday to which I wish to refer. An hon. gentleman undertook to castigate the farmers rather severely and to say that they were dealing in American implements only. He is right to a certain extent. There is no doubt that they are dealing in American implements very largely, but there is a reason for it. Twelve or fourteen years ago we organized a company—not the company that was spoken of here yesterday but a local company—to handle necessaries in connection with our farms such as implements and so on, but not necessarily retail shelf goods. We organized and incorporated that company, but what did we find? We found that there was not a Canadian manufacturer who would sell us one agricultural implement of any kind. You could not even buy a hand cultivator. We had to go to the United States. We had to go as far south as Tennessee to buy a plough. And what did we find? We found that we could buy a three-furrow plough, pay freight and duty into our country and sell that plough at less than we had been paying for a two-furrow plough. That is the exact situation. If any gentleman wants to blame us for that, well and good; we are quite prepared to justify our action in doing what we did. We were the victims of circumstances, we had to do it and we did it. The manufacturers say that we must have a tariff to raise revenue. If that is a fact, how are you going to get your revenue if you do not go outside and buy a few of the articles that you require? It is absolutely inconsistent, because if you have to get a revenue in that way you have to import. However, that was not the reason in this case; we went out of the country simply because the manufacturers in this country absolutely refused to sell to us.

[Mr. Maharg.]

I cannot agree with the Budget now before the House in many respects. In some respects I believe it is along the right line but it does not go far enough to meet the conditions of the country at the present time. I hope the minister may see fit during the consideration of the resolutions in committee to make some changes. I have spoken to him about some changes that he agrees with me would be only fair and when the resolutions come into committee we will look into these matters. I am not going to touch upon them at this particular time as I have the assurance of the minister that if there is any unfairness it will be dealt with, and I am quite prepared to take the minister at his word.

As to the feeling in the country towards the Budget I have been travelling a little recently; I have been in some of the Ontario centres within the last day or two; and have been talking to a lot of people. They were not farmers, they were business and professional men, following different professions, some were labour men. I asked them for no information whatever; it was all volunteered to me. Both the professional man and the labouring man informed me that this Budget afforded no relief to them, not even to the labouring man, but that it was going to make it harder for them. I hope the minister will take into consideration the values that he has placed on some of these articles when we are in committee. I think that the minister's valuation is too low on some things. I do not care how hard he hits some articles that are really luxuries, and that are not indispensable to the community; but with respect to wearing apparel, boots and shoes, and similar articles, I am convinced that it is not economical buying at the present time to purchase below the figures which the minister has named.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be no response from hon. gentleman opposite, therefore we on this side will continue the debate, as the last word on this question has not yet been uttered. I listened with much interest on Tuesday last to the speech of the Minister of Finance dealing with the condition of the country and the financial proposals of the Government. In commencing my remarks I wish to congratulate the minister on his decision to stop borrowing and in future to pay his way. The financial methods in vogue in this country during the last four or five years, by which the public debt has been rolling up like a snowball, were a matter of grave concern to every man who cared about the future of the country. The task of my hon. friend at this period of our history is not an easy one. In addition to providing for the war debt, it falls to his lot to teach the rudiments of economy to an Administration that has always been accustomed to "dash away and spend the money." This habit of extravagance they contracted before my hon. friend became a member of the ministry. We on this side sympathize with the minister in the position in which he is placed, and would like to help him if we could. It must be a very uncomfortable experience to be seated on an empty chest by the side of bottomless deficits fishing for a Budget. The Government professes to stand for economy in theory, why not also stand for economy in practice? In the remarks that I am about to make regarding the expenditures of the Government it may appear as though I were attacking the Administration. This is not my purpose. My main object is to give my humble contribution in the direction of checking the prevailing extravagance and preventing waste. The real friends of the Government are the men who tell them the truth; the worst enemies they have are the people who flatter them. I see no good reason why this Government should be immune from criticisms. It is far from perfect. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell)—who comes nearer to being a saint than any of the rest of the ministers—does not claim perfection.

Mr. McMASTER: Pretty nearly, though.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He would be the first to admit that the Government is only human. They were human, and subject to the frailties of human nature before that distinguished group of Conservative-Liberals who are now supporting the Administration joined them and you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that no archangels have been added to the Cabinet since that date.

Now we are told that we have maintained a record of industrial and commercial prosperity in Canada during the year; but it is difficult to conceive of a country being really prosperous that is going in debt at the rate of one million dollars a day.

The Minister of Finance told us on Tuesday that the addition to the debt during the year was $395,000,000, which is more than a million dollars a day. I wish to tell my hon. friend that this kind of prosperity will soon come to an end. The prodigal son appeared to be very prosperous at the start. He left home with good clothes on his back, with good shoes on his feet, and his pockets full of money. He had not earned the money himself and he did not know its value. Like my hon. friends on the treasury benches opposite he spent his money in riotous living, it was soon exhausted, and he was forced to adjust his expenditure to his income as hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches are now also compelled to do. I presume the Finance Minister is familiar with the philosophy of Mr. Micawber:

> Income, £50. Expenditure, £49 19s. 6d. Result, happiness.
> Income, £50. Expenditure, £50 0s. 6d. Result, misery.

Permit me to call a witness on this question of expenditure. I am not now referring to war expenditure but to the ordinary expenditure of the Government apart from war. I presume there is no newspaper in Canada which is more friendly to this Government than the Montreal Gazette. That newspaper, however, is a candid friend, and when the Government turns aside on the broad road the Gazette does not hesitate to draw attention to the fact. The Montreal Gazette of January 15, in an editorial on the financial record of the Administration, after pointing out that the revenue for the year shows an increase, goes on to say:

> The record of the expenditure is less satisfactory. There are increases noted in every item of the ordinary outlays from consolidated fund, which include the cost of the administrative services and maintenance of ordinary public works and buildings, etc. Outside of war, it will be seen, the outlays in the nine months of 1919 were almost double those of the like period of 1918.

At a later date, on February 9, we find the following editorial pronouncement in the Gazette. Referring to the Union party the Gazette says:

> The Conservative party we know, and the Liberal party, and the Farmers' party, but who art thou, may be asked of the Union party. It is a party that has outlived its usefulness, a party that having accomplished its purpose is reverting electorally into its original elements. It is said of some species of beings, that the head being severed, the body still retains animation; in the case of the Union Government it may be that the head survives the body. The Government is about to meet Parliament and endeavour to prolong its life by adopting the line of least resistance, avoiding large controversial questions, and postponing to a more propitious season concurrence in a policy, and preparation for a campaign. The art of government is most difficult, under the best of auspices, but a leaderless ministry, destitute of policy, must be the despair of its friends. The public memory is short, and public gratitude an unknown quantity. The electorate requires a guide, a policy, an association with those who invite its confidence; and the Government offers neither guidance nor principles, nor familiarity with the people. The situation is not suddenly precipitated. It began with the conclusion of the war, since when futile efforts at permanent coalition have more than once been made, and minister after minister has dropped out with no successor to his place, until the situation has become difficult for the Government and despondent to its supporters.

Now, Sir, we have here a picture of a chicken with its head off, gasping and winking its eye to make believe it is still alive. That is an extraordinary picture to come from a friendly newspaper which had a great deal to do with bringing this Union Government into existence. The Gazette tells us that this is a leaderless ministry destitute of policy and the despair of its friends. That is strong language, but no one in Canada is in a better position to know the facts than the Montreal Gazette. Other newspapers have been even more emphatic than the Gazette, but the Government pay no attention. I have in my desk a very interesting little book which I found in the library. The title is, "Recreations of an Historian." It was written by George M. Trevellyan. He describes an after dinner discussion in London many years ago participated in by a number of eminent literary men, of whom Thomas Carlyle was one. The question was whether protests in the press and in books have any effect on public conduct. These philosophers decided among themselves that these public protests and criticisms had no effect whatever. They simply read them and then threw them into some thirty-two-dollar waste-paper basket and forget all about them. Carlyle who had been silent up to that moment, took his pipe out of his mouth and made the following remark:

> There was a man once named Rousseau who wrote a book on political questions. The nobles of that country laughed, but the next edition was bound in their skins.

It occurred to me that something like that, in a figurative sense might happen to the present Government. Now, Sir, the people have been asked to produce and save and many of them are honestly trying to do so. But what about the Government? War expenditure is inevitable, but what excuse can there be for increasing the ordinary expenditures of the Government by over $100,000,000 during the past year? Can there be any excuse for that enormous addition to our public expenditure? Now here are the figures. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance at page 2561 of Hansard the other day told us that the expenditure on ordinary account for the year ending March 31, 1920, was $336,741,110. Not one dollar of this is for war. When we turn to Public Accounts, page 9, for last year's expenditures, that is, for the year ending 31st March, 1919, we find the expenditure on ordinary account to be $232,731,282. Subtract the one from the other and you have an addition to our expenditure for the past year over the former year of $104,009,828. When the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) last year told us that any further cash advance to the soldiers would bankrupt the country, every one expected that the knife would be applied. But, Mr. Speaker, economy seems to be a despised and forgotten thing so far as this Administration is concerned. I have read to you a quotation from the Gazette. Now I want to call another friendly witness. The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McCurdy) in his New Year's message to the people of Nova Scotia used the following language:

> Whether rightly or wrongly, there exists a widespread opinion that due care is not exercised in Government expenditure. The feeling is daily growing stronger that the Government expenditure should be cut down and that the public estimates should be scrutinized and revised with a firmness never before exercised.

I submit that the hon. member for Colchester is right; expenditures must be cut down if we are to remain solvent, and in many cases they should be cut not with a blue pencil but with an axe. I submit, Sir, that up to this date there has been no sincere attempt on the part of the Government to carry out the views of my hon. friend the member for Colchester. You will find proof of this if you refer to the Estimates of the present year. Let me cite you one or two examples. The Government are proposing to vote for the Canadian Press, Limited, the sum of $50,000, and for the Canadian Associated Press $20,000, in all $70,000. I am opposed, Sir, to subsidizing the newspapers; I regard it as a vicious policy. The moment you begin to subsidize newspapers you strike a blow at their independence. There is the same objection to subsidizing the press as there is to subsidizing the church; both should be absolutely free. We are told that a similar amount will be contributed by the British Government. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, let me say distinctly that it is humiliating not only to the press of Canada but to the people as well to have the British taxpayers called upon to contribute money to the Canadian newspapers. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that Canada is a nation. Well, if so, let us act with becoming dignity, and let the Canadian press deal with this matter as a business venture. What does my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) expect to get for this $70,000 of the people's money? I have no doubt that he expects to get $70,000 worth of propaganda. His plan is to teach the toddling public in Canada what they are to think about Imperial matters. Now, Sir, what is propaganda? I am not sure that I can give you a definition, but to speak frankly, my idea is that in a general way propaganda is tainted news, and the less we have of it the better. Sir, one grain of truth is worth a ton of propaganda. If, on the other hand, the object of the President of the Council is to strengthen the tie that binds us to the Old Country, then I say it is unnecessary. Those ties are already strong and they had better be left alone, we do not make them any stronger by talking about them. This constant chatter about loyalty to the Old Land and the old flag becomes tiresome and reminds me of Mark Twain's domestic hero, who boasted that he never jumped on his mother. Then we have such items in the Estimates as the following: Trent Valley Canal, $400,000; Toronto Harbour and Toronto Breakwater, $1,900,000; Canadian representation at Washington, $80,000; and scores of others. Now, these expenditures may be popular in the localities interested, and with an overflowing revenue there might be some justification for them; but no Canadian business would suffer if they were delayed for some time to come. Then again, we are asked to vote $150,000 for salaries and expenses of the Board of Commerce. I put it to you, Sir: Is this a useful expenditure? Is this Board of Commerce worth $150,000 of the Canadian people's money? If it is not worth the money then let us dismiss the board and save that sum. Interest on war debt must be paid; our obligations to our soldiers and the dependents of the soldiers must be discharged; but who will say that the Trent Valley Canal must now be built or that a playground must immediately be provided for the good people of Toronto? The taxpayers of the country are always willing to back up any productive enterprise, but they are not anxious to go to the poorhouse in order to serve sectional interests. The people do not realize how their money is being spent. A gentleman talking to me the other day about this very point, said that if the Canadian taxpayer could come to Ottawa and see for himself how his money was being spent he would take an apoplectic fit. Now, Sir, I want to give a few more striking items. Here are one or two: Classification of the Civil Service, $108,173 57; New York News Agency, $30,000; one-half expense of Royal Commission relating to Indian Lands in British Columbia $317,797.68.

Mr. CAHILL: And no settlement.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend is quite correct. The whole proceedings were practically useless. Expense of Canadian Trade Mission to England—this was nothing more or less than a free gift to the Manufacturers' Association — $123,410.36. And if you turn to page 646 of Hansard you will find an item of $24,194,639.78 for Canada's Merchant Marine. This amount was spent between April 1, 1919, and March 1, 1920, eight or nine months after the war ended. No tenders were called for; contracts were given out to friends of the Government at a very high price,—straight Government patronage to friends and supporters. Or turn to page 1158, where reference is made to a payment of $60,775.38 to the Gazette newpaper company of Montreal, and $25,373.69 to La Patrie newspaper company, also of Montreal, at the very time when five hundred employees were doing nothing in the Printing Bureau at Ottawa,—employees who are now being dismissed because, I understand, there is nothing for them to do.

The Government are constantly devising new methods for spending money. My hon. friend, the President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), is an adept at this kind of invention. I believe that this is the first Government in the history of the world that has had the temerity to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money for the purpose of publishing flattering notices about themselves.

Mr. McMASTER: Shame.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Department of Public Information was organized for political purposes and for no other purpose. The President of the Council gave it a high-sounding name, but that deceived nobody. The department proved to be very expensive, but when the facts were exposed at the last session of Parliament he himself became ashamed of it and promised that he would discontinue it. It lasted from the 9th day of November, 1917, until the 31st day of December, 1919. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, the significant date on which it started,—the 9th day of November, 1917. During that period this Department cost the country $200,986.54. Now, whatever value it may have had as a political agency to assist the Union Government, he would be a bold man who would say that it was worth two hundred cents to the people of Canada. At the last session the President of the Council said that he would abolish it. Instead of abolishing it, as he said he would, he continued it under a new name. That fact is disclosed by the following questions and answers:

Is Mr. M. E. Nichols, formerly Director of Public Information, still in the employ of the Government?

Mr. Rowell: Yes.

If so, what is his position, what are his duties, and what salary is he being paid?

Mr. Rowell: Director of Information, Department of External Affairs. Salary, $5,000 per annum.

Last year he was "Director of Public Information"; this year he is "Director of Information." The man is the same; the master is the same; the salary is the same; the duties are the same; everything is the same, except the name; he is now "Director of Information."

But that is not all. The President of the Council not only kept the Department of Information alive under a new name; he started a new one in New York under Colonel John A. Cooper. A few weeks ago I asked for information about this new method of spending money and the minister in his reply referred me to an Order in Council dated July 17, 1919. I secured a copy of that Order in Council and it was disclosed, to my astonishment, that the money to pay the salary of this gentleman and his staff was improperly taken out of the money voted by Parliament for war purposes. Let me read the Order in Council:

P.C. 1480.

One thousand four hundred and eighty; I suppose that indicates the number of Orders in Council passed during the year up to that date.

Certified copy of a Report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 17th July, 1919.

The Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, advise that pursuant to paragraph 4 of the Order in Council of the 24th February, 1919, P.C. 265—Lieutenant-Colonel John A. Cooper, Toronto, Ontario, of the 198th Overseas Battalion, be appointed Director of Canadian News Service at New York, at a salary of five thousand ($5,000) dollars per annum.

The committee on the same recommendation further advise that the Director of Canadian News Service at New York shall be under the supervision of the Canadian War Mission at Washington or of such representative of the Canadian Government at Washington as shall hereafter be appointed.

The committee on the same recommendation also advise that the salaries and expenses—

[Mr. J. H. Sinclair.]

This is the point.

—of the office to be established for the purposes set forth in the said Order in Council of the 24th February, 1918, be paid out of the demobilization appropriation through the Department of External Affairs.

Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. McMASTER: What is the date of that?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: July 17, 1919. This money was voted for the defence and security of Canada and for the demobilization of our forces. Parliament was not told that any part of this vote would be used for the purpose of finding soft jobs for political favourites. This is a violation of a well-established principle, a principle that has prevailed in Great Britain since the days of Edward III, that money must be spent by the executive for the purpose for which that money was voted by Parliament and for no other. When I placed the question on the Order Paper I asked who this gentleman, Colonel John A. Cooper, was. I have since discovered that he is one of those vermiculating patriots who figured in the election of 1917. He was returning officer at Witley Camp, and when the ballot box over which he presided was opened it was discovered that it was stuffed with parcels of ballots that could not have possibly gone through the aperture. Over sixty per cent of the ballots in that box were illegally marked for constituencies in which the voters had no right to vote. You see, therefore, that it was necessary that something should be done to reward Colonel John A. Cooper. His job is to tell the American newspapers what smart men we have here in the Union Government. Here is a sample which appeared in a New York paper. I have no proof that this is from the pen of Colonel Cooper, but I suspect very strongly that it is. Anyway, this is how it reads:

That distinguished Canadian statesman, the Hon. N. W. Rowell, who is frequently mentioned as a probable successor to Sir Robert Borden, has arrived in the city en route to Washington, where he will represent Canada at the Labour Congress.

Now, this News Bureau is estimated to cost $30,000 per year, but as you can see, Mr. Speaker, a few items like that would show that the money was very well spent. These are merely sample bricks.

In regard to a large part of the public expenditure, hon. members can form no definite opinion, because they are denied reasonable information. When the Minister of Railways did not wish to tell his supporter from South Cape Breton (Mr. Douglas) what he was paying for coal for his ships in Halifax, he told the hon. member that the business was being carried on by a joint stock company and that the Department of Railways and Canals did not know anything about it. And even when information is given it is often of an uncertain and haphazard character; not only is it haphazard, but it sometimes looks extremely suspicious. Public money is spent without any account being given. Everybody remembers the case of DeWitt Foster, the man who got $72,000 to buy war horses in Nova Scotia. He is said to have purchased some old decrepit, spavined and blind horses in Nova Scotia, but the Government never got any account of the transactions. The point I want to make is that $72,000 was handed out to Mr. Foster and up to this date the Government do not know what he did with the money. After the investigation took place and that scandal was exposed, we had reason to hope that that system would be corrected, but that loose method of doing business seems to be still in vogue in the Militia Department. If proof is required of this, I would refer you to the fourth volume of the Auditor General's report which we were fortunate enough to get two or three days ago, at page ZZ-300. It would seem to be a common thing to peddle out money without asking the person who gets it what he is going to do with it. On page ZZ-300, these items are to be found:

Adams, H. A., Ste. Agathe: Advance unaccounted for	$ 50
Allen, James, Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	75

Then turning to page ZZ-301, the following items are to be found:

Boate, G. A., Ottawa: Advances to be accounted for in 1919-20	200
Campbell, Major R. G., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	150
Casey, J. F., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	50
Church, Lieut. G. W. F., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	200
Conrad, Lieut. F. B., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	$100
Donaldson, J. L., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	100
Dore, Ben, Ottawa: Advances unaccounted for	125

Then on page ZZ-302, these items are to be found:

Edwards, Lieut. T. F. R., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	150
Gilling, E. F., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	250
Haines, F. P., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	150
Harper, W. S., Ottawa: Advances unaccounted for	200

Then, turning to page ZZ-303:

Labbe, M. H., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	97
Lamrock, J. S., Hamilton: Advance unaccounted for	100
Layton, B. M., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	100
Lowe, Lieut. L., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	150
Mansbridge, A. S., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	100
Mesurier, A. L., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for in 1919-1920	200
Morris, Lieut. W. O., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	100
Munsey, W. S., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	100
McGinley, W. G., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	100
McNaughton, E. M., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	100

Turning to page ZZ-304:

Patterson, W. J., Ottawa: Advance unaccounted for	200

We have here no less than twenty-four cases on five pages of Volume IV of the Auditor General's report of men who received money nearly two years ago without its being accounted for.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Are there any expenses that are accounted for?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Certain expenses are accounted for, but these are items not accounted for. Although most of these men reside in Ottawa, nobody seems to have taken the trouble to call on them to find out what they did with this money, it would almost look as if any one could walk into the office of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and help himself and snap his fingers at the Auditor General. But that is not the worst. Enormous sums of money seem to have been sent overseas that are not accounted for. The Auditor General's reports for both last year and this year show that large sums of money have disappeared in London, no report of them having been given to Ottawa. Let us first look at the Auditor General's report of the 31st March, 1918, that is the one we got a year ago. On page ZZ-218, you will find an item of $119,546,597.93 for which no vouchers have been received, although the expenditure was apparently made in 1917. This year a similar item appears in the fourth volume of the Auditor General's report, page ZZ-228. The item this year is $129,308,233.14, less refunded—it appears that some of this came back to the treasury —$7,668,216.52, leaving a balance unaccounted for of $121,640,016.12. The only difference between the statement of a year ago and that of this year is that there is an increase of about $2,000,000. No one will contend that it requires three years to produce vouchers in the Militia Department. The Auditor General is not to blame. In 1917 the Auditor General appears to have discovered that large sums were expended of which no account was given, and the late Auditor General, John Fraser, urged the Militia Department to take action. The department in Ottawa appears to have done so, but the trouble was with the department overseas. This is the correspondence:

AUDITOR GENERAL'S OFFICE.

September 15, 1917.

Sir,—With reference to vouchers for expenditures in England, I have received no vouchers for 1917-18. It is necessary that these vouchers should be forwarded regularly to enable this office to properly check the accounts. Kindly let me know when I may receive vouchers covering expenditure for as late a date as possible.

I am sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. FRASER, A.G.

Deputy Minister for Militia and Defence.

DEPARTMENT OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE,

Ottawa, September 24, 1917.

Sir,—Replying to your letter of the 15th instant regarding vouchers for expenditures in England, this matter has been taken up repeatedly with the authorities overseas, by cable and letter, but without much success. A memorandum has lately been prepared for the information of the Honourable the Minister, with a view to his communicating with the Minister Overseas. I trust that this will have the desired effect.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

E. F. JARVIS,
Acting D.M.

The Auditor General.

The Auditor General demanded these vouchers in 1917; he demanded them in 1918; he demanded them in 1919; we are now living in 1920, and apparently he has not the vouchers yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the amount?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The amount that has disappeared without any account having been given is, roughly speaking, $121,000,000. And the question now is—what has become of this $121,000,000? The minister does not know; the deputy does not know; the department does not know; the Auditor General does not know; and Parliament does not know. There is apparently not a scrap of paper in the possession of the Government to show what has become of that $121,000,000.

If, Sir, you desire further evidence of the brand of economy that is practised by this Government, look at the record of appointments to the Civil Service. Certain hon. gentlemen about the opening of the present session were boasting about the number of Government jobs that had been given out, and I took advantage of my privilege to ask this question:

How many appointments have been made by the Board of Civil Service Commissioners since the date of the Armistice?

The answer I got was:

Permanent	4,176
Temporary	22,954
	27,130

That is to say, commencing on the day of the Armistice up to the date that this question was asked, the board of the Civil Service Commissioners appointed more than fifty civil servants every day, including Sundays.

Mr. M. CLARK: And then the Government expect a reduction.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: But do they? It is incredible to me to think that 27 regiments of 1,000 each have been appointed to the Civil Service since the Armistice; but if you wish, Sir, to verify that statement, you can look at the answer given me by the Secretary of State as reported on page 324 of Hansard. In that answer I was informed that some of the 22,954 temporary appoints were for short periods, and in order to get all the facts correctly, I asked this second question:

How many of the 22,954 temporary appointees are still on the payroll of the Government?

I got no reply to that question. It was made into an order for a return, and I shall probably not get the answer until next year. The first question was answered within three or four days of the time I asked it. I do not want to be suspicious, but I am sure that it would have been much easier to answer that second question than the first one I asked. Not having received an answer to it, I shall have to make an estimate myself. The dismissals, I understand, were few. I think we can assume that 25,000 of the 27,130 are still on the pay-roll. If they are, and we estimate that they receive $1,000 each per year, that would add $25,000,000 to the expenditure on civil government for the year. But $1,000 is too little. I estimate that they will get on an average $2,000 apiece, and in that case the addition to our public expenditure on that account for the year would be $50,000,000. Is it any wonder that the country is going into debt at the rate of a million dollars a day? And all this is in face of the fact that every department of the Government was overcrowded at the time that these appointments were being made.

With reference to the proposed tariff changes, all I have to say is that they are very meagre. The concessions to the consumer are very slight. There is not much in this Budget for the common man. His bread, his boots, his clothing, will not be any cheaper. The implements of production are still required to bear a very heavy burden. In camp-meeting parlance, which my hon. friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey) will understand, the concessions outlined in this Budget would be called "small mercies." I question very much if the farmer can be caught with that kind of chaff. Mr. Speaker, you have been brought up in town and are not as familiar with country life as I am, but no doubt you have been in the country sometimes on your holidays and you must have seen a farmer out in the pasture trying to catch a spirited horse with a handful of oats in his hat or in a tin basin. When he has caught the horse you must have seen him rub the horse's nose while he was getting the bit into his mouth and the throat strap securely buckled, and then pat him gently on the back preparatory to mounting him. I was just wondering if the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) could catch a low-tariff colt like my hon. friend from Strathcona (Mr. Douglas) or my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) with such a shabby dishful of oats as this. Take instead the Liberal tariff platform. Here it is:

That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance; First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; Second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

That, Sir, is the platform on which I stand, and the platform which I shall submit to my electors if I am a candidate at the next election. I regret that this platform does not meet the views of my hon. friend from Fraser Valley, although I understand he is a free trader in principle. The appeal he made last night on behalf of the British Columbia apple growers touched the hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite and he received a great deal of applause. I have been told that my hon. friend is a free trader in everything else excepting apples, but, as with our common ancestor while free trade is sound in principle, the temptation of the apple was too much for him. We fully recognize that the adoption of this tariff platform will result in a loss of revenue, but revenue must be secured and will be secured from some other source. This tariff platform is a great forward step and by taking this step at a time when revenue is so important the Liberal party have shown the courage of their convictions, and they have become to this extent the underwriters of progress and commercial freedom in this country.

But there is an even more important question than tariff reform, and that is the restoration of Parliamentary government in Canada. The election of 1917 was, to say the least, a very artificial affair. I do not believe the people of Canada had any idea at that time as to the kind of chicken they were hatching, and I believe they are now ready and anxious to rectify their mistake. Besides, Parliament, such as it is, is ignored, and the business of the country is carried on in secret conclave behind closed doors. The conclave itself has ceased to be a representative conclave. Our large French-speaking population is without representation in the Government, there being not a single cabinet minister, with the exception of the Prime Minister, from east of Montreal. It cannot be denied that this Government is hanging on to office without any mandate from the people. Unrest and distrust prevail to a greater degree than ever before. I submit that the remedy is a general election. Let the people decide. If the people are dissatisfied with this Government, as I think they are, let them have an opportunity to turn the Government out bag and baggage and replace them with a Government in which they will have confidence. Confidence always counts for more than police forces and criminal penalties. Would not every sane man in Canada welcome a return to the conditions that existed during that golden period in our country's history from 1896 to 1911—a period when the land was first reserved for the settler, instead of being granted to great railroad companies; a period in which were carved out and started on their splendid career the western provinces; a period when the stranger within our gates was made welcome and treated like a free man in a free country; a period of overflowing surpluses, instead of bottomless deficits; a period when we built railways out of revenue and tax-exempt bonds were unknown; a period when letters were carried for two cents and the Post Office Department showed a handsome surplus; a period when profiteering was rare and the workingman could eat bacon and eggs for breakfast and give his children butter instead of oleomargarine; a period when penal laws were few and the farmer's bee could stray into the sugar bowl without the farmer going to gaol for thirty days; a period when a man could blow his nose in his own way without asking the Secretary of State or the President of the Privy Council anything about it; a period when Parliament was consulted and Orders in Council were only resorted to in matters of routine; a period in which Canada first became known to the world as "daughter in her mother's house and mistress in her own." It was in short a period of fifteen years of good, clean, honest and progressive government. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that it is known as the golden period of Canada's history? Let us therefore ask the Canadian people whether they wish to perpetuate this present combination of decayed Conservatism and un-united Unionism, or whether they would prefer to place a new pilot in charge of the ship. Let the people decide, and we on this side of the House will cheerfully accept the verdict of the people, whatever that verdict may be.

Mr. W. C. KENNEDY (North Essex): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) upon his presentation of the financial affairs of this country. I think he should be congratulated also on the courage he displayed in accepting the post of Finance Minister because it did take great courage to take over the handling of the financial affairs of this Dominion at a time when the outstanding liabilities were in excess of $2,000,000,000 and there was a grave question as to whether the revenue would meet the growing expenditure. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has announced that he does not propose to emulate the example of his distinguished predecessor and go the public for a loan. Whatever he may think about it I have my doubts whether the public are in a mood to regard favourably such a proposition. As a matter of fact, I am of the opinion that the hon. gentleman would find the number of lenders in the country few and far between.

However, the hon. gentleman has two other fields of finance open to him; one is the proper imposition of taxation and the other is the collection of taxes so imposed, and I think the minister might with advantage give his attention to these two subjects. May I say in all fairness to my hon. friend that in so far as we on this side of the House are concerned, while the war was on, and indeed until such time as our soldiers returned, whether we approved of the expenditure of the Government or not, whether we believed that their expenditure was wise or judicious or whether we believed it was not, we felt it was our duty, until such time as our men came home, to support the Government in every way we could.

Now that the Government has declared its purpose to carry on, I feel that we on this side of the House would be inconsistent, to say the least, to oppose expenditures in this House as we have done in the past and then go to the country and ask the people to loan the Government money. Even if the men who loaned the Government money last fall, and who to-day would receive only $95 for the $100 which they invested in a bond, were disposed to invest in similar securities, I question if they would do it as I do not believe the Government has the confidence of the people. I think the evidence of that is in the recent by-elections. If it is necessary for the Government to obtain money, and they do not want to pay the high rates obtaining on the other side, there is only one source from which they can reasonably expect to obtain it and that is the bankers.

The Government have been pretty fair friends to the bankers in years past. In a return which has been brought down I find that, during the period of the war and up to the 31st March last, no less a sum than $4,994,619.57 was paid by the Government as commissions to banks in this country. In addition to that the Government permitted the bankers to retain without interest any balances they might have on hand to the credit of the Government from payments made on account of Victory loans. There is another privilege which the banks possess, and which I think hon. gentlemen are all familiar with, and that is that notwithstanding the fact that this Government, the Provincial Governments and the municipalities are paying more for money, the banks are paying the same rate of interest on deposits as formerly, namely, three per cent. I believe the time has come when there should be an increase in so far as public deposits are concerned. The banks have been piling up profits faster than they have ever done before. This year many of the banks, in addition to their regular annual dividends, have paid dividends as bonuses, and in addition to that, within the last two months, no less than three of our principal banking institutions have been offering stock to their shareholders at a price that will net them a bonus of 40 to 50 points on the present market value of the stock. In view of these facts the people feel that the time has about arrived when the Government should control the banks and not the banks the Government. The Government should immediately insist that the rate of interest on deposits be increased.

I said, Sir, that it might be a question whether men who had invested in Victory bonds a few short months ago, paid $100 for them and would have to take $95 for them to-day, would make a further investment in that class of security. There is just one thing in connection with this Victory bond business that should be aired in this House, and that is the attitude of the committee on management appointed to handle the buying and selling of these bonds. I do not know if the public are thoroughly aware of the situation. There has been very little information given out on the subject. As a matter of fact, the Government invited people to loan their money and they did loan it. The Government then appointed a managing committee, and if you desire to purchase bonds this managing committee fixes the price you have to pay; if you desire to sell, fixes the price they shall be sold for; but gives no information as to how the prices are arrived at, and do not inform us why we have to accept $95 for bonds we paid $100 for a few months ago, why we should not take $90 for them, or why they should not be worth $100. A number of Toronto and Montreal brokers were appointed by the Government and given the complete handling of these transactions. It is not a question of whether they are handling them with a profit to the country or not; the point is that the people should be entitled to know what their bonds are worth on the open market.

Hon. gentlemen opposite spoke the other night of the stabilizing committee. That is what they called it. I do not know how much of the people's money is being used to stabilize the bond market to-day. There is no information as to what use is being made of this money or how much money is being used. There is no information as to how much money was used to stabilize the market last fall when an appeal was made to the people to buy bonds, and when all Dominion securities bearing a rate of 5½ per cent were quoted at a premium on the stock exchanges. When the Finance Minister went through the country asking the people to buy Government bonds, and pointing with pride to where these bonds stood on the public market, there was nothing said about the stabilizing committee, as far as I remember. The only public information I have seen in connection with this matter is a statement made by the former Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) before the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Committee last year. He told that committee that during the year $60,000,000 had been used for the purpose of stabilizing Government bonds. How that money was used is information that the public ought to have. They ought to know daily what bonds are offered for sale, how many are sold and how many are on hand. It is only in this way they can obtain an idea of the value of their securities.

This is the only country as far as I know that is handling securities in this manner. In Great Britain a weekly statement is published by the British Government showing the amount of Treasury Bills sold, the amount of Treasury Bills retired, and the amount of Treasury Bills outstanding.

In the United States the gold reserve of the federal banks is published whether it falls below the legal limit or not. But apparently in Canada investors are such infants that all information must be withheld from them and a few hand-picked brokers are permitted to do as they will with the securities of the people. It is simply another evidence of the desire of hon. gentlemen opposite to give us in this country a paternal form of government, which is as exasperating as it is absurd.

I said, Sir, there was a field open to the Government in the collection of taxation and I congratulate the Finance Minister that he has at last consented to adopt the American system. Two years ago when speaking during the Budget debate I urged the adoption of this system but apparently there was no desire to make collections promptly and to-day we find it is only applied, if I followed the minister correctly, to the income tax. The business profits tax will be collected, in the same old way. I appreciate these profits may be very difficult to arrive at, but there should be clearly defined rulings governing depreciation, etc., printed and circulated, and whenever a ruling is made by the department publicity should be given to it through the press. The firm or corporation need not necessarily be named, but there should be uniformity, and then we would not have, as we have to-day, a feeling in the country that some firms are more generously treated than others. If this is done it will not be difficult for corporations to send in their cheques for 25 per cent of what they think they owe, and surely the account may be adjusted just as readily under these conditions as if no money accompanies the return.

Let me mention this year's experience in the First Michigan District—The Collector of Customs at Detroit is in charge of income tax returns for this district, and the deputy collector informed me that by the 15th March this year they had filed with them 130,000 returns, covering incomes up to $5,000 per annum and 25,000 returns covering corporation taxes and amounts in excess of $5,000, and he further informed me that of 130,000 returns of sums less than $5,000, 95 per cent of the tax payers paid the full yearly payment. Hon. gentlemen will appreciate what this means—the large amount of money that is immediately available to the Government of the country and the great saving effected in interest on money borrowed by the Government in order to carry on. In this country it did not matter that the man had the money to pay, he had to wait until he received his tax return. In the meantime his money was lying at the local bank perhaps without interest, and if interest were allowed, at most 3 per cent and the Government were paying the banks an increased rate for the money actually theirs but not available owing to the method of collection.

If the Minister of Finance is sincere and his department are actually trying to collect Business Profits and Income Taxes I would strongly urge a change in the proposed system to include business profits tax. As far as a reduction in the business profits tax is concerned I think it is a move in the right way. I believe the business profits tax contributes in no small degree to the high cost of living. It encourages extravagance upon the part of the manufacturer and adds unnessarily to the cost of output. Tax the income derived from manufacturing as high as you like. In the way I have suggested you will obtain revenue without interfering with the necessary growth and expansion of business.

In addition to imposing and collecting taxation it is equally the duty of the Government to carefully guard revenues and, wherever possible to eliminate unnecessary expense. What excuse is there for carrying on, say, the Board of Commerce? Here is a commission floating round the country at the public expense and, as far as the results go, practically useless. It was absolutely absurd to appoint that board with a view of controlling prices. They could not hope to do that. Prices cannot be regulated artificially with any degree of success. The only way prices can be lowered is by production, and by the people recognizing that extravagance is a large factor in keeping them high. The Government should set the example. They should practice the greatest economy and cut out all unnecessary expense. No Board of Commerce can arbitrarily affect the situation, and I believe that board should be discharged at once. They are absolutely of no more use than a fifth wheel to a coach.

Take the Wheat Board, nobody knows what that has cost the country. It is true that hon. gentleman opposite say the Government are not paying the expense, but the people have to pay it in the long run and it makes no difference who issues the pay cheques. I do not know what is the attitude of our western friends with reference to this board, but I can say as far as the producers in our section are concerned they want none of it. We had rather a sad experience with the board in my constituency. Let me relate the circumstances: This year, after the United States Government lifted its embargo against Canadian wheat, I made an application on behalf of some of our farmers for permission to export about 3,000 bushels of wheat to the United States. After waiting approximately a month and getting two or three answers that were rather contradictory, the reply finally came: No, we cannot permit you to export wheat. Now what were the conditions? There is no mill on the Canadian side within fifty miles of where these men live, and the Commercial Milling Company of Detroit were willing to buy. They had a paved road from their farms less than eight miles from Detroit—the price being paid by the Wheat Board was $1.90 and a participation certificate. The American mill offered to pay them from $2.35 to $2.59, which, with the exchange as it then stood, was as good as $2.90 per bushel, but the Wheat Board would not issue a permit. They took this attitude notwithstanding that our money was at a discount in the United States and we should have been glad of the opportunity of getting all the good American money we could. The Wheat Board insisted that the wheat would have to be shipped by rail and then exported in all probability to Greece or Roumania to be paid for in the sweet by and by.

Is it any wonder the people of this country are dissatisfied and discontented? To-day the price of Ontario wheat is, say, $1.95 with participation certificate. The Americans are paying $3 at Detroit with exchange, making the price $3.33.

Let me read you a letter on this subject which I received from one of our prominent farmers. It is as follows:

TECUMSEH, May 11, 1920.

Dear Sir,—You will no doubt remember the efforts I have made to the Wheat Board to sell my wheat in Detroit and have so far been turned down.

It is not necessary for me here to give my opinion of the unjust treatment of the Wheat Board, especially this western part of Ontario, knowing that you are fully conversant with the conditions here and what we are up against. I am told on good authority that a large number of farmers have sold their Government wheat certificates to speculators for 10 cents per bushel, and this only nets them $2 per bushel. I noticed in our paper some time ago that the Board would pay around 40 cents per bushel for the wheat certificates. Even at that it would give us $2.30 per bushel for any wheat, which would be by far the cheapest hog feed we could get, with corn selling at $2 per bushel and oats at $1.20.

I am still holding up my wheat in hopes I may be able to sell at a market price. Wheat last Saturday was worth in Detroit $3 per bushel, with 11 cents exchange, which would make our wheat worth to us $3.33.

We farmers are asked to produce in order to even up the balance of trade. If speculators, Wheat Boards, etc., are going to take the profits of our production they will soon have to do the producing too.

Not wishing to take up your valuable time, I will state the object of this note to you, and that is the following questions:

Can you tell if the Wheat Board releases their control of wheat in Ontario on the 1st of July next, and if not, can the balance unsold in farmers' hands of the 1919 wheat be sold with this year's crop and prices?

If I do not get an open market or a market price for my wheat I shall feed it to my stock.

If you can give me any information on the above questions I would be greatly obliged.

That is the way the Wheat Board stands in the estimation of the farmers in our district, and the Government would be well advised if they resolved to discontinue its operation. There is another board to which reference was made this afternoon by my good friend from Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), and that is the publicity board that now exists in the city of New York. I understand from the Order in Council that it costs approximately $30,000 a year, and I could suggest to the Minister of Finance a better way of spending that money, by which he would obtain far better results than keeping a bureau in the United States merely for the purpose of telling the people there what a great people we are. As I understand it, the duties of that board or commission consist in attending social gatherings and business meetings and telling people what the possibilities commercially and industrially of Canada are. Well, I can say, living close to the American border as I do, that generally speaking the American people, especially the business men, know pretty well what things are like in Canada, and particularly there is nothing that affects our credit which they do not know. With that in view I am going to suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that he take that $30,000 and buy New York exchange with it and make good the promise of this country in so far as outstanding bonds are concerned. I am taking this matter up at the request of the bondholders of Detroit and also of bond salesmen of Windsor, who feel that something should be done. I would suggest to the minister that this is not a matter in connection with which one can adopt any ostrich-like policy. What the bankers of Detroit know to-day the bankers of New York know to-morrow, and what the bankers of New York know the investors of the United States know the day following. If we are going to hold up our credit in the United States and throughout the world, then the Government must handle this matter boldly, courageously and in a proper manner. Last fall we placed a loan of $300,000,000 and I have here a prospectus stating definitely and clearly that both principal and interest will be paid in gold. At the urgent solicitation of the Central Selling Committee, we in the city of Windsor went across to Detroit and sold over $1,000,000 worth of bonds. We represented the bonds as they were represented to us, as gold bonds; we said that the interest and principal would be payable in gold. Instalments of interest have come due and we find that when the coupons are presented for payment the holders of them are told that by reason of an Order in Council which existed no gold can be exported. These men were depending on the word of this Government; they were relying upon the good faith of this Dominion; and in all fairness, they say that if there was an Order in Council providing that payments should not be made in gold it should have appeared on the face of the bond. They ask: "Why did you not tell us what we were purchasing?" I have a letter from one of our bond salesmen, a prominent citizen in Windsor, and this is what he says:

WINDSOR, May 14th, 1920.

W. C. KENNEDY, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Kennedy:

This Canadian Government of ours seems determined to keep me in hot water. You may recall that last Fall I wrote you relative to some unpleasantness that had arisen as a result of the sale of Canadian War Bonds to the President of one of the Savings Banks of Detroit.

When I approached this gentleman on the matter of purchasing these bonds he said, in effect: "Why, I don't want to buy bonds payable in depreciated currency." But, I countered glibly, "these bonds are payable in gold, both interest and principal. See, it says so right on the bonds, and my Government never violates or repudiates its pledges. The interest is payable in gold in any branch of any chartered bank in Canada, so all you'll have to do is to send your coupons to Windsor to be cashed." I made the sale, several thousand dollars.

When the interest fell due last November the Imperial Bank in Windsor promptly refused payment in gold, but after some delay and correspondence with the Finance Department in Ottawa payment was finally made. And now, on the next interest date, the bank again refuses payment and here's what the Banker said to me; "So your Government never repudiates its pledges, eh! Well, we in the United States thought we entered the War to help hammer the Hun into a realization that the solemn undertakings of the Governments were not scraps of paper. We hadn't any idea that Canada was in this class, but the very first time I have business with your Government, instead of meeting its obligations without evasion, equivocation or question, I am forced to chase it around and dun it, much as we bankers have to do in the case of the maker of a bad note. If your Government can't pay or wont pay, let it say so and I'll charge it off to profit and loss, but the next time you peddle any of your so-called securities please choose some other victim."

Now, you know with my six feet and 185 pounds I easily qualify for the heavyweight class and could make almost any Yankee eat those words, but I haven't the heart to tackle the job in this case because I believe he is right. Perhaps, though, you or the Minister of Finance or Mackenzie King, or Lloyd George, or somebody, can suggest a less heroic method of keeping our honour untarnished. Will you try, please? In the meantime as a bond salesman for the Canadian Government (without commission) I'm through. I seem to have misrepresented the goods. In my innocence I thought that when the Government said it would pay in gold it meant exactly what it said. From now on I'll fight shy of governments and do more business with institutions and individuals who don't welch when the time comes to pay.

Now, I would again call the attention of the minister to the fact that if he values as I do, and as I believe every man here does, the credit of the Dominion, the first thing he must do is to take charge of this affair boldly and with courage and pay those people as they should be paid. There is no better way of retaining our credit. I have protest after protest, in this matter, and I hope the hon. minister will find some way of redeeming the promise which his Government made.

There is another matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the House for a moment, one that is engaging some public attention to-day—the question of subsidies. Most of us in Canada who knew something of the financial condition of the country and who knew that this country was being loaded with bankrupt railroads felt that at least so far as subsidies were concerned we should not hear any more about them for some time. But they seem to have broken out in a new place; we hear a good deal now of subsidies to shipbuilding companies. There seems to be an organized plan to raid the public treasury. Now, Canada has done pretty well for the shipbuilding industry, at all events so far as helping them to get started is concerned. I have here a prospectus issued by a bond house dealing with the St. John Drydock and Shipbuilding Company Limited, showing that the Government of Canada have agreed under certain conditions to assist this company to the extent of $247,500 per annum for a period of thirty-five years. I have no doubt the Government have been equally generous to other shipbuilding concerns. In addition to that we have given contracts to the shipbuilding companies aggregating $75,000,000, certainly at fairly good prices, because they are all back for more. On top of that we are asked to provide a subsidy or bonus for tonnage. I am very much surprised that this request has come so soon—I see, by the number of deputations arriving, that it is on its way. So far as deputations are concerned we all know how these are arranged for; we know a good deal about what has resulted in the past. Many deputations came here in days gone by for subsidies for railroads —these very railroads we own to-day—and shortly after the subsidy was granted it turned out the greater portion of it went into the pockets of the gentlemen who promoted the enterprise and who at that particular time were being featured as Empire builders. I noticed in the Ottawa Citizen the other day this very illuminating despatch:

> Sydney, N.S. May 13th.—A resolution calling upon the Dominion Government to subsidize a shipbuilding industry in Eastern Canada was passed at a meeting of the Board of Trade held to-day at the request of the Canada Steamship Lines, one of the companies entering the steel shipping merger.

I am very much surprised at that, because I understood from the announcements that were made in the public press that this new merger did not propose to ask Canada for any financial aid. We were told that there were three great fundamentals which entered into the building up of commerce; natural resources which we had, capital, and the benefit of the experience of the Old Land,—all three would bind together the Empire in the golden chains of commerce. Well, Sir, that was most appealing, but if the people of this country are going to be asked by way of subsidy to supply the gold for the chains, then I am very much opposed to it. The sooner the gentlemen who are promoting these subsidies understand just where we stand on that question; the sooner they realize that the people are in no mood to create a new group of millionaires, even if they be in the shipbuilding business, and that the financial position of this country is not such as to warrant the granting of the aid they are seeking, the better it will be for all concerned.

So far as the tariff is concerned, I regret, as the resolution of the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) stated, that the Government did not, as they promised last year, have an investigation into tariff conditions and bring about a revision of the tariff. I represent a manufacturing constituency, but I have no hesitation in saying that the time has come when the tariff should be revised, and as far as I know there is only one way that the tariff can be revised with satisfaction to the people of this country, and that is downwards. If there are manufacturers in this country who are taking advantage of the tariff to extract the last five-cent piece from the consumer, then the Government should act and act quickly. This is one way to restore the public confidence so essential at the present time to carry on successfully the Government of this country.

I would also suggest that hon. gentlemen opposite take seriously into consideration the desirability of cutting down the expenditure in connection with these boards and commissions that we have been talking about this afternoon. Until we remove restrictions on trade and allow the business of this country to take its natural course and follow the usual channel of supply and demand, there will be no relief from the abnormal conditions that prevail.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in rising to express my views on the Budget which is now before the House I wish at the outset to tender my sincere congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) upon the honest and lucid statement he has given to the House of the country's financial condition at the present time and of the taxation which the people will have to bear this year. He has given us statements which have not been given in previous Budget speeches. In this matter he has shown that honesty of purpose which always characterized the more judicial statements which he made while chairman of the Railway Commission. While acting in that capacity he made a reputation for himself for honesty and clear judgment, and these same qualities were displayed in the speech he made when introducing the Budget. With the facts and figures he gave, some of which must be amazing to the people of Canada, he mingled patriotic expressions, and in noble language he expressed his gratitude to the returned soldiers, whom we must never forget now nor in the years to come. It was their courage and virtue which gave to Canada the fame she now enjoys among the nations of the world, and which contributed more than anything else to the great status apparently accorded this country by all the great nations. We owe our soldiers all possible gratitude. We shall never forget their energy, their valour, their heroism. We shall never forget Langemarck, where in the early days of the war the Canadian soldiers were left without reinforcements, but using the bodies of their comrades as a rampart withstood the attacks of the enemy until reinforcements came, and saved the day for Canada and the Empire. There are many other deeds of theirs which we might recall, but this is the battle we should never forget, because but for the Canadian soldiers on that occasion the war would have been lost, not only to Canada and the Empire, but to Belgium and France, and to humanity. I was pleased, therefore, that te Minister of Finance did not forget to give expression to the sentiments of gratitude which we entertain towards our returned soldiers as well as towards the women of Canada who worked marvellously in every possible direction for their sons, brothers and husbands at the front with a spirit not only of loyalty and generosity but of Christianity, to help preserve the liberty and freedom we enjoy to-day.

There is one statement of the Minister of Finance to which I wish to call particular attention, and which I give him credit for having made, and that is his explanation of the discrepancy that exists between our net debt and our gross debt. That discrepancy amounts to $1,078,537,461.27, and the thinking people of Canada have been asking themselves for some time how it came to be so large, and whether it was really a fact or only imaginary. The Finance Minister has given the House to understand that a great portion of this discrepancy between our net and our gross debt is made up of investments which may not be realizable for many years to come, and some of them perhaps never, as he expressed it himself. He has shown that the net debt was $2,273,305,435, and the gross debt $3,014,483,774.12, the discrepancy being made up of loans and investments, a great many of which cannot be relied on as realizable.

I now turn to some of the details of the Budget, more particularly the taxes which the people of Canada will have to bear this year. No doubt the Minister of Finance has exercised his best efforts and best judgment to endeavour to relieve, if possible, the situation existing in the mind of the people of Canada. Of course, he has not been able to do all he would have wished to do. That would be impossible for any man in Canada in bringing down a Budget under the present conditions due to the terrible war. I had, however, expected more generous treatment from the Minister of Finance for those who are less able to carry the burden of taxation. No doubt he has done the best he could, but I am afraid that just before passing the threshold of the Council chamber when he was going in with his proposals he was told "Abandon hope," and consequently he has not been able to accomplish all he would like to do. He has given us, I think, the best perfected Tory Budget we have had in this country yet,—for this is a Tory Budget, more particularly as regards the taxes it imposes on the common people. We know that of the people of Canada, ninety-five per cent have to struggle for their living as against the five per cent who have in plenty the goods of this world.

There is one new tax which the minister has imposed to help to pay the debt of the country and the annual interest upon it, which struck me more particularly, and that is the sales tax. That tax hits, apparently, the manufacturer, the wholesaler and the dealer. One per cent has been added to the manufacturer's price. But the manufacturer and the wholesale dealer will add that tax of one per cent to the retailer's price, and the retailer will add that one per cent again to his price and he will take his profit on it. This will clean up everything and in the end it will be the consumer who will have to pay the tax of one per cent. Nobody else but the consumer will pay, whether the article be worth $1 or $10 or $100. The consumer has to pay the tax on everything that he buys. The soldier has had to pay the extra prices caused by profiteering in the textile and woollen business particularly since the war by being charged excessive prices for the suits of clothes that he has had to buy since he came back from the field of battle. The minister has imposed a new tax on goods supposed to be needed by the common people, or by the people who are not endowed with the goods of this world, commencing with boots and shoes above $9. We know that $9 is a terrible price to pay for a pair of ordinary boots and shoes. It was a terribe price some years ago, but to-day we are confronted with the position that a pair of boots at $9 is only equivalent to a pair of boots that was selling at $3, $4 or $5 a few years ago. If the workingman wants to buy a pair of boots that will save his feet from the wet, the dust and the stones for a month or two, he will not do that by buying a pair of boots at $9. We know that a woman who wants to buy a pair of boots to wear while she is doing her work in the house, or while she is travelling on the streets or the roads in the country will have to pay more than $9. Therefore, the shoes which she will have to buy, being above $9, will be subject to the tax; if she buys a pair at $4 or $5 they will only last a week or two because they are made of paper instead of leather. She is obliged to buy a pair of boots at $9 or over in order to economize as much as possible. Therefore, this is a new tax that will fall more particularly on the mass of the people. The same may be said in regard to the tax on clothing. No suit of clothes that, from the point of view of economy, is worth buying or wearing, is sold to-day under $45. This condition also applies to many other articles of clothing. This new tax which my hon. friend has imposed falls more particularly upon those who have the least means to pay it.

The tax on luxuries is certainly one which commends itself to my judgment. I have advocated it myself. The only doubtful thing about it is that we may make it so high that people will not purchase or import luxuries. I beg to congratulate my hon. friend upon his decision in this matter and to say that I approve of the tax on luxuries. The tax on imported liquors, wines and spirits may bring in a revenue for a year or so, but if Canada realizes our hope, as I trust it will, of becoming a temperance country, this tax will not bring in any great amount of revenue in the years to come.

Before proceeding to a general consideration of the Budget and of the fiscal question as it affects Canada to-day and will affect her in the future, I wish to say that I was amazed this afternoon at the statements given by my hon. friend from Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). The facts and figures which he gave constituted an indictment against the Government, and it was certainly amazing that no one on the other side of the House, not one of the ministers, not one of their supporters, rose to contradict, if a contradiction were possible at all, the indictment that will be carried by the wires throughout this country and outside of it. Certainly when these facts were so amazing I would have thought that some of the ministers would have got up and shown at least some resentment at their having been placed before the House. Although the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Sifton) was present, he listened to the indictment apparently with complacency notwithstanding that many of these statements were directed at his own department in connection with its management of the Printing Bureau. However, I am not familiar enough with the charges and figures brought forward by my hon. friend to discuss them at length and I only wish to express my disappointment at having heard no contradiction of the statements which he placed before the House.

Coming to the great question which occupies the minds of the people of Canada, the question as to the future, I wish to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I express a view that I have already expressed in this House and which I hold as firmly to-day as ever I did. I know it will not meet with the approval of my hon. friends on the other side of the House, and especially my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) if we are to judge him by the Budget which he has brought down. Meanwhile I wish to repeat on this occasion that, notwithstanding the adverse reports which strike our ears to-day, I am as much a free trader as ever I was. I am a free trader in principle, a free trader in theory and in practice. When I speak of free trade, permit me to say that I do not give expression to a mere opinion nor to a cherished idea; I speak the convictions which have grown firmer and firmer in my mind as a result of prolonged study of the question of protection and free trade as it has been developed from time to time in the different countries of the world. I have arrived at my convictions as the result of a study of Adam Smith, Cobden, and Gladstone, and I am fortified in them by the views so strongly and courageously expressed by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) whom I am pleased to see just now in his seat. That hon. gentleman has always been consistent, notwithstanding the conditions under which he at times has had to speak, in his advocacy of a free trade policy for Canada. In order to dispel any suspicions that might exist as to my adherence to that party let me say that it was my lot, whether for good or ill, to have lived for some seven or eight years in the city of New York in the eighties and the early nineties, at a time when Henry George, that great exponent of free trade, was exciting the admiration and the interest of the people of the United States, and particularly those of the great city to which I have referred. It was my lot at that time to be able to follow his principle as personally expounded by him and to study them closely. I had the good fortune to hear Henry George address great audiences in the Cooper Institute. I have always borne in mind the expressions which I heard him utter at that time, and though his doctrines were slow in making their way in the minds of the American people yet to-day they seem to be achieving the effect which was hoped for many years ago, and we now see a re-action in the public mind in the United States in favour of free trade. Sometimes doctrines may be enunciated ahead of their time, as one might say, and only with the passage of years do we see those ideas come to fruition. Henry George, as well as Cobden and Gladstone, in their respective periods, may have advocated principles that were then looked upon as too advanced; but free trade came to be accepted in England, and I hope that before long the same doctrine will conquer both in the United States and in Canada. It may be said that as yet free trade has not made much progress in Canada, not even in the ranks of the Liberal party. I admit that progress has been slow but a tree is of slow growth, even where the conditions are favourable, and the same may be said of free trade in this country. And then there is this also to be said. In the world of nature tornadoes and storms occur which often uproot trees from the soil. We had such a disturbance in the political life of this country in 1911, when an explosion of prejudice, for which the Conservative party were responsible, defeated the reciprocity agreement with the United States which the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier arranged after years of consideration and with the expectation of contributing greatly to the prosperity of the Canadian people. The defeat of the Reciprocity Act was a setback for the free trade idea. Reciprocity was worsted, with the result that ever since the people of Canada have been lamenting the fact. In the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta the sentiment in favour of reciprocity was very pronounced, and this policy, which embodied the principle of free trade, would undoubtedly have been a great boon to them, as well as to the rest of Canada had it gone into effect. In the West a period of stagnation followed. In the city of Edmonton, when I was there in 1914, arrangements were put into effect to give employment to those who were in need. Works such as paving streets and constructing sidewalks in the outskirts of the city were undertaken in advance of the time when they would actually be required in order to give employment to workingmen who would otherwise have been objects of charity. Then take the matter of exchange between the United States and Canada. The adoption of the reciprocity pact would have given our farmers, more particularly those in the West, a market for their wheat and other cereals, as well as for their live stock, and when any additions to that live stock were needed they could have been obtained from the other side without any difficulty. The trade that would have resulted between the two nations as a result of the reciprocity agreement would have been such as to have afforded an equilibrium in the matter of exchange, and we should not have suffered the loss in that regard which has taken place during the last year.

It has been said that the Liberal party have done very little to promote the adoption of free trade. I do not say that the Liberal Government, under the guidance of Sir Wilfrid Laurier promised when they came to office in 1896 to establish free trade as it is in England immediately, but their aim was in that direction. Almost at the very first session of Parliament after their return to office their steps were turned in that direction, and as my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) so lucidly explained yesterday, a great measure of relief was put into operation in 1897 which effected a saving to the people of $100,000,000 every year, and which to-day, bearing in mind the growth of population which has since taken place, would have represented something like $200,000,000 of relief from taxes yearly, a relief that would have been experienced more particularly by the labouring classes and the farming community. During all the intervening years, prosperity, contentment and happiness prevailed in Canada. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier was all the time contemplating measures having for their object to relieve the people of further burdens. Finally he conceived that the best possible thing would be the inauguration of reciprocity with United States, and the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) my esteemed friend from Shelburne and Queen's spent an entire year in discussions with the American authorities and ultimately effected an agreement which commanded the admiration of everybody who has had the opportunity of studying it and who was conversant with the natural conditions as between Canada and the United States.

Let me now for a moment or two consider some statements which have been published in the press of Canada, more particularly the Government press. The effort is being made to make all possible capital out of exaggerated reports of a so-called cleavage in policy between two sections of the Liberal party. Under scare heads some of the newspapers hold up to the public eye the so-called spectacle of a party divided into moderate protectionists and moderate free traders. These journals allege that the speeches made in Parliament and out of it indicate that there has been a departure from the tariff plank as laid down in the Liberal platform, and that the ideal of free trade is being forsaken. The truth may seem funny to lips that have been tasting gall and wormwood, but these journals greatly deceive themselves. We still keep the ideal in our mind, but, as I have already explained, conditions are not always favourable for carrying an ideal into effect. So it is with the Liberal party. Actual circumstances make concessions imperative, and events are gradually leading up to a demonstration of the fact that in the last analysis free trade must solve the problems that confront us. It is my intention to support the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), and I shall do so with pleasure. I see in it a sincere expression of a desire to alleviate the burdens which bear so heavily upon the shoulders of the poor consumers of this country. The amendment of the hon. gentleman proposes a step in the right direction and I shall therefore willingly support it. I need not read to this House the resolutions which were passed by the Liberal party at its convention in August last, but I think I can safely say that the amendment moved by the hon. member is in harmony with the proposals contained in those resolutions. I have no doubt whatever that the public will view the amendment as a wise one, and I know that when the Liberal party comes into power, whether it be in three months' or three years' time, one of their first considerations will be the affording of some real relief for the poor people of this country.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that our friends in the Farmers' party cannot find any considerable difference between their platform and ours, for if I read their programme aright, it is contained in the policy of the Liberal party. But, whatever differences there may be between us, we are at any rate, in accord in this, that we have a common desire to free the masses of the people of Canada from the burden which has been imposed upon them for so long by the protectionist policy that has been in vogue in this country; and I think it is also, our common desire that that relief shall soon be given to the people.

With regard to our home industries, I may say just a word or two. Some years ago when the National Policy was being launched by Sir John A. Macdonald, that statesman said that we should look after native industry in its infancy. Well, the native industries of Canada are now forty-five years old. I think that the Conservative leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, intended that they should be propped up only so long as they were incapable of taking care of themselves, and I think that if he could return to earth now and see what progress Canada has made since he departed this life, if he could see some of our so-called infant industries, he would tell his friends on the other side that if these industries still need to be propped up, then they had better remove such cripples from the highway and let the chariots of prosperity and liberty pass on their way. The Conservatives or the Protectionists, Mr. Speaker, have changed the description which they have all along applied to their protégé; it is now "home" industry, not "native" industry; they think that home industry appeals more to the imagination of the people. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is a poor country that restricts its efforts in any direction, industrially, commercially or agriculturally, and looks only to the home market. I say that the manufacturers and all others engaged in business should not be satisfied with the home market alone; they must look to foreign markets which are now open to them but which they may lose to the more vigilant American producer or the more alert German trader who is now preparing to take full advantage of all the markets which the world can offer. These highly efficient business men are invading the field while Canada is marking time and, if I may say so, execrating the term "free trade." I think, Sir, that the conditions which are prevailing at the present time are conducive to free trade. I may be in error, but I think that the people of this country, and indeed of all countries, have never been in a better position to adopt a free trade policy in the exchange of products than they are to-day. What are we called upon to do at the present moment? We hear on every hand that the increased production of foodstuffs is imperative for the safety of the world. As most of you probably know, Dr. J. W. Robertson has travelled extensively in Europe since the conclusion of the war. He appeals to the people of Canada to produce and to export in order to afford some relief to the present distressing conditions under which the people of many European countries are living. When I think of the lack of food, the lack of proper clothing, the lack of many of the essentials of life which the people of these European countries are suffering, I feel that I should ask our farmers, in the West and elsewhere, to produce, to stay on the farm, to keep their sons and their daughters on the farm. I would have them free from taxes, municipal, provincial, federal, in order that we may be able to do our part in bringing about the salvation of suffering European countries. The condition there is almost as sad as it was when the world was in the midst of war, because millions of children are dying from the effects of starvation, an indirect result of the war. Therefore I say to every farmer and to every man of industry: take away all tariff from these implements of industry; take away all tariff or encumbrance upon what the farmer needs in his work of production. I do not ask that in the interests of the farmer alone; I want him to be able to produce, and the cheaper you make his production the more he will produce and the more of our products will go across the ocean.

It was with sadness that I listened the other night to my genial friend from St. John City (Mr. Elkin) in his reference to what the farmers had done and what cause they had for complaint. The farmer who gave his son whom he could spare from the farm and who kept another son at home in order that he might be able to assist in production of the necessities of life to maintain our soldier companions in the field did more than my hon. friend, with all the thousands of dollars which he may have given and which I am sure he did give—his sacrifice was not as great as that of the farmer who gave his son and himself remained on the farm to engage in the great work of production.

My hon. friend talked also of protection. He was a free trader, he said; now he is a protectionist. Of course, I do not know his motives, but his conversion has been very rapid. Three years ago he was elected to this House as a Liberal joining the Liberal-Unionists as a sacrifice for the time being, as a matter of conscience. With his attitude on that occasion I do not quarrel. But he says he is a protectionist because Canada is not in a position to adopt free trade. He tells the farmers of his province to be satisfied with the conditions that he and the industrial people of his city or of other cities impose upon them. He would give them no say in the making of the future of Canada; he would have them come very modestly into the streets and market squares of St. John with their products and be satisfied with what the industrial people give them. They should listen only to my hon. friend and his fellow protectionists; hand over their products; and wait for the future. But, Sir, the farmers have been as generous as any other class of people, according to their means. To-day, I say, is the time more than ever when the industries of Canada can go in the direction of free trade, because their products are sought, as are the products of Canadian farms, in every part of the world. Every financier who looks into the matter dispassionately encourages the industries of Canada to produce and to take advantage of the market that offers for their products, just as it offers for the products of the farm. Last April the directors of the Bank of Montreal announced an issue of $2,000,000 new capital stock to be offered to their shareholders of record as at the close of business on May 20, 1920, at 150 per share in the ratio of one in ten in order that the manufacturers of Canada might be able to take advantage of the trade that offers to them in the West Indies, British Guiana and West Africa. This bank with other important banks has announced the policy of forming close connection with permanent institutions firmly established rather than that of opening branches in foreign countries with all the resulting expense and difficulty. The banks are prepared to offer to the manufacturer further credit in order that they may take advantage of these markets which are offering to them.

A few days ago a lady who was the guest of the Ottawa Kiwanis Club at the Chateau Laurier, Miss Jill Crossley-Batt, told her hearers that Australia is in need of the products of Canada and is desirous of establishing trade communications in order to receive those products. She said also that Australia has products to offer to us which we greatly need, such as wool, leather, and raw materials in connection therewith, through the lack of which the people of Canada have had to pay excessive prices for clothing and shoes. It is urged by some that because we are a small country; because our population is only eight millions, we are not in a position to attend to the demands of the foreign market. But if there is a country that is suited to the adoption of free trade at the present time it is Canada. We have immense resources. We can produce more pulp and paper than any other country in the world. We have vast water-powers awaiting only the hand of the engineer in order to produce every day millions of dollars' worth of articles which the Old World needs. We have many other kinds of resources. We have to the south of us the wealthiest nation in the world, the United States, able alone to absorb all the products of Canada for years to come. Our seacoasts, east and west, virtually face the markets of the Orient and the Occident; the markets of Europe and of England.

We have our deep open harbours of Halifax, St. John and Quebec on the Atlantic coast, and Vancouver, Prince Rupert and Victoria on the Pacific coast, and dozens of others on either coast are waiting patiently for the developments which the people of Canada may make of them. Canada is more conveniently situated as regards Australia than Great Britain or the countries of continental Europe are; we have convenient access to Japan and China, which is bound to develop amazingly during the next few years; we are more conveniently situated as regards South America than any European nation. And yet we are told that we are not in a position to have free trade and to expand our commerce under that policy! We want to produce and export, but we want also to import, and I was amazed the other night to hear one of the hon. members for St. John, who lives in one of the great maritime ports of Canada saying: We do not want free trade. Strong appeals are being made every day for the development of the port of St. John, and I am one of those who appeal for that, not as a citizen of St. John, but as a Canadian, knowing the facilities which that port commands for the transportation of grain and other products of the West as well as for the products of the East. That port seems to have been placed there by Providence for the benefit of the people, not merely of St. John, but of Canada as a whole. The hon. member seems to be satisfied with the markets of Canada; or if he wants goods to be exported through the port of St. John, does he think that a seaport can develop merely by exportation without importation, and that the vessels which carry away cargoes from St. John or Halifax or Quebec will have no cargoes to bring back to those ports? In order to be able to carry cargoes both ways a vessel will have to go to the United States instead of returning to one of those Canadian ports. Free trade means the free commerce of the ocean. You cannot expect to export if you are not willing to import; you must keep the channels open, coming just as much as going, and it is only by free trade that that can be effected.

While I am on that topic, I might perhaps refer to what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy), who spoke about the bonus for shipbuilding. If we develop the resources of Canada, as we are urging that they be developed and as everyone wants them to be developed, and if they are developed by the free trade policy which I advocate, thus creating trade, not only going, but more particularly, coming, the shipbuilding industry of Canada will require no bonus. During the last year the Government of Canada has given the shipbuilding industry of this country as much bonus as is required for building ships. All I regret is that before and during the war they procrastinated in regard to this policy as they did in regard to other policies. Every session during the war I seconded the efforts of the then member for St. John, who advocated a policy of shipbuilding. We were all told to wait. My hon. friends opposite wanted to win the war. But they did not seem to understand that ships were the best instruments by means of which to win the war. This has been proved, because without the British navy and mercantile marine the war would not have been won. But the Government procrastinated until the war was over. However, better late than never. They have now given to that industry a sufficient impetus, and the steel industry of Canada, at Sydney or at any other Canadian centre where it is established, is in a splendid condition of prosperity and can supply the steel required better than any other country. This is more particularly the case with Sydney, because it has the iron ore of Newfoundland within a few miles of its shores and it has coal right at the door of the industry. Under those conditions, those industries being so prosperous, we might say, under the bonus given some years ago, now that they are established, now that they have been making millions of dollars, they certainly do not require any further bonus. Truly those interested in such bonus profiteering are using every possible means at their disposal to draw the attention of the people of Canada and the Government to the matter. They gather around them some soldiers whom they have, as a matter of course, working in their institutions, and they tell them: We will give you work providing that the Canadian people will give us a bonus. I say to the people of Canada and to the Government to-day, as I would say to my own children: If Canada is to give a bonus at all, let it be given directly to the soldier and not to the shipbuilder. Under present conditions the only interest in Canada for which a bonus is justified would be the soldier, and we are told every day by the Government that they cannot grant the soldier a bonus. Therefore, let us speak no more of bonusing an industry which can prosper so well by the exercise of free trade in Canada, keeping its ships loaded coming as well as going.

Certain Canadian manufacturers might consider I was out of my place if I were to offer them advice in regard to taking advantage of opportunities which I see ahead for them. No doubt the only excuse given in years gone by for the establishment of the protectionist policy by Sir John A. Macdonald, of offering every possible bonus or protection by way of tariff to the manufacturers, was that the manufacturers would come one after another to him, as they came later to Sir Leonard Tilley, to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) when he was Minister of Finance, and also, no doubt, to the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and say: My industry is in such a position that I cannot continue manufacturing unless I get so much protection. The Minister of Finance asks, "How much do you want?" "Oh," they reply "Thirty-five"—or it may be forty or forty-two—"per cent." "You shall have it," says the Minister of Finance;—go on manufacturing." To-day the manufacturers are coming again to those in authority, saying: "We cannot do without the tariff; if we are not protected, the United States manufacturers will dump their products into Canada." I say that if our manufacturers would be satisfied with one profit, if they could sell at prices charged for similar goods from the United States the people of this country would buy their products. We must not forget that the Canadian manufacturer has the advantage of not having to pay the transportation charges which the American manufacturer has to pay on his goods coming to this country. It is the fault of the manufacturers themselves, if they do not expand their industries and introduce all possible improvements. If the Canadian manufacturer will take advantage of all the improvements the American manufacturer takes advantage of and will introduce into his business all the mechanical and business developments which the Americans have done, he would be in a position to compete with the manufacturers of the United States not only in this market but in theirs.

Notwithstanding all this, we do not speak against the Canadian manufacturer. If he is deficient our patriotism goes to him as our charity goes to the sinner, but we ask him to take a new stand and make every effort to compete with manufacturers outside this country. When the war came on, our Canadian manufacturers knew nothing about producing munitions; they hardly knew what shells meant; and they had no plants adapted for turning them out. But under the inspiration of true patriotism, and with big profits in prospect, in the course of a few months plants were erected all over this country, and our manufacturers were able to turn out as good a product as the munition makers in other countries who had been practically brought up in the manufacture of munitions. In many lines of munitions our manufacturers took the lead and supplied their product not only to our own army but to the armies of the Allies. I say to them to-day: Put the same patriotism and the same vim into your work as you did when turning out munitions! Improve your plants and make them as productive as those of the United States; then you will be able to command the markets of the world and need no longer be afraid of the products of the United States, because you will be able to compete successfully against them.

It might be objected that if radical changes are made in the tariff, we would not be able to raise sufficient revenue. I only want the taxes removed from the classes who have to work for their living, from the farmers and the working men who are producing. I am not asking the people of Canada to go into free trade blindfold. I want to see the debt of this country paid and not left to posterity to discharge. I say it belongs to us, it is our duty, not only to pay the interest charges on the war debt, but to decrease that debt itself and wipe it out in as few years as we possibly can, and it is only by production that we can do so. Let not the manufacturer be uneasy. My hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) may be satisfied with the home market. He may make more profit on one plough in the home market than the American manufacturer, but if he sold two ploughs in an outside market his profits would be greater, and the bigger his sales the more prosperous he would be at the end of the year. There are other sources of revenue to which we can turn to relieve the burden on the workingman and the farmer and the clerk. The increase of wages that workingmen are getting is of no benefit to them, because you increase their wages one day and the next day the prices of commodities go up, and so they are no better off. We must devise some permanent means for raising revenue from those best able to pay, instead of taxing those who are engaged from morning till night in production. What I have in mind, in order to hasten the adoption of free trade in Canada, is a tax on land values. I hear some one rapping on the other side. Let me tell him, whoever he be, that thousands and thousands of people in this country who have studied the taxation of land values will admit that I am right. In the East as well as in the West thousands and thousands of people are looking forward to the introduction of a tax on land values in order to relieve from the heavy burden of taxation the workingman in industry and those who toil on land or on the sea.

What would be the effect of the introduction of the taxation of land values? The first effect would be to make the holders of of Canadian lands who are now living in the United States, or France, or England, or were living in Germany before the war, sell their land to the people who would produce on it, or else they would have to pay the taxes. We have millions of acres of land in this country, more particularly in the western provinces, held in that way, and in our towns and cities and suburbs we have vacant lots that are being held for a bigger price than they are worth. A tax of one per cent on unused land which is being held up for a bigger price would make the owner sell it, or build on it, or cultivate it to make his land profitable and escape further taxtion. My hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) the leader of what is called—and I say this with all due respect—the Progressive party in this House, stated that such a tax in Canada would easily bring in a revenue of $75,000,000. Now $75,000,000 would largely do away with the need for the tariff which rests so heavily on the working classes and consumers of Canada. Another hon. member spoke from this side of the House in 1917, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Cruise). Speaking in this House on May 15, 1917, a few days after I had made some similar assertions, he made a statement in reference to the raising of revenue by taxation of land values. He is reported in Hansard of that date as saying:

> Again, certain calculations have shown that a tax of one per cent on land values in Canada would yield large revenues. Mr. Henry Timmis, of Montreal, in a speech reported in the Montreal Herald and Daily Telegraph of March 28, 1917, estimated that the land values of Canada total $8,000,000,000—five billions in the towns and cities and three billions in the rural districts. A tax of one per cent on this valuation would bring revenue to the amount of $80,000,000 per annum.

I am sorry that my hon. friend is not in the House at the present time. I hope that he stands by the same convictions as those which he expressed when he spoke two or three years ago. If we take $80,000,000 as being the estimated revenue which might be raised by a one per cent tax on land values we might be able to wipe out the tariff which weighs so heavily upon the people of Canada. What has the Minister of Finance done in his Budget? What relief has he given to the people? He has given relief to the people by abolishing the so-called war tariff tax of 7½ per cent on all importations and 5 per cent on all importations from Great Britain. Last year they relieved the people only of a part of this impost and this year they have decided to relieve them of the rest of this tax which was inaugurated at the beginning of the war. Imagine at the beginning of the war levying a 5 per cent tax on the products of the Mother Country! And they did it in the name of loyalty and of patriotism! I remember my hon. friend from Red Deer, eloquent as he always is, made an appeal against such an impost. I seconded him in my feeble way and all on this side of the House made a protest against it. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Loggie). whom I see sitting opposite to me now, made one of the strongest appeals against that impost. But, he has been satisfied for the last three years to see his neighbour burdened with that tax. Now that tax is gone and that is all the Government have done in the way of relieving the burdens of the people since the war has been over. Not an additional dollar of relief has been given to the taxpayer or consumer in Canada.

We might raise more than one per cent from a land tax for a few years in order to reduce the capital of the war debt which we must reduce during our lifetime. Under this system of taxation it would be impossible or unprofitable for any one to hold land without putting it to use and the temptation to speculate in natural opportunities would be gone. This is a perfect tax. It does not tax capital. It does not tax improvements, it does not interfere with production, exchange or exportation, and it does not fall upon the consumer. It affects the possession of property but it does not affect the table of a man with a large family any more than the table of the rich man. Every time you tax production you raise the selling price and increase the cost of living. This sales tax of one per cent will have to be paid by the consumer; it has to be paid, as I have already said, by ninety-five per cent of the population of the country who are least able to support it. I repeat, every time you tax production you raise the selling price and increase the cost of living. It is not so with a tax on land. We therefore change a burden into a benefit to the people. By taxing land values the owner finds his land unused and he will sell it cheaper than under the present system. Under the present system those who use land in a productive manner are taxed more heavily and their improvements are taxed. The more they improve their property and extend their field of production the more they are taxed. But we are asking to tax land on the value given it by the community. The community would judge that a farm, or a piece of land on the outskirts of a city, was worth so much to-day. The tax would be imposed on that value, and whatever improvements were made would be free. It would encourage the owner to improve his property or, if he does not improve his property, to sell. That system would bring immigration, it would bring settlers to those immense tracts of vacant land which we have in the West and to many abandoned farms in the East, and to areas in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, which have been left uncultivated. Under this system these farms would immediately become productive. It would bring in capital and create a demand for labour both of which are now debarred because of the excessive prices asked by speculators. Our farmers in the country and our homesteaders in the West have everything to gain by this tax on land values.

During the war the very thing which should have been taxed was not taxed and everything which was taxed should not have been taxed. To-day we have a heavier debt to pay and more annual interest. The income tax has also been delayed. I cannot hold my hon. friend the Minister of Finance responsible for that because he was not in the House or a member of the Government. But I remember an eloquent appeal made in favour of the income tax at a special session of the House, which only lasted about five days after the declaration of war, when the hon. member for Red Deer rose and called upon the Government of Canada immediately to impose an income tax upon the people in order to form an asset against the expenditure on account of the war. We, on this side of the House, all joined him, but for two or three long sessions the then Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) smiled away our efforts for the taxation of incomes. At last, late in the session of 1917, after having said at the beginning of the session the collection of the tax would not pay the expenses of collecting it, the income tax was adopted. I demonstrated at the time that even amongst his colleagues in the Cabinet there were a sufficient number of millionaires to be able to guarantee the expense of the collection of the tax throughout Canada, and therefore he need not be uneasy as to the cost of making that collection. At last, in 1917, the Government acceded to our request. But it took us a long time to obtain the concession.

The Government may also set up the claim that they have adopted other measures calculated to promote the welfare of the country. They may say that in 1917 they gave free wheat also. But an election was anticipated shortly and such was the feeling that had been aroused among the people who were bemoaning and lamenting the defeat of the reciprocity pact, that some western ministers who had been paying a visit to the West got alarmed, and returned to Ottawa and said, "We must have free wheat." But free wheat, as well as the concession in regard to income tax of which I have spoken, are measures which were really due to the exertions of the Liberal party.

I wish again to urge the adoption of a policy of taxing land values. The inauguration of this system may take some time—perhaps that is to be expected in the case of every new system of taxation—but it is only a few days since we were informed by Mr. Breadner, the Commissioner of Taxation that even after three years the methods of collecting the income tax were not perfect, and that two or more years might yet elapse before the system was adjusted to a nicety, so that collections might be promptly made and at a great lessening of expense. The same perhaps would be true if a system of taxing land values were adopted. But, notwithstanding any difficulties which might have to be overcome at its inception, we would within a very few years derive a revenue from it of $100,000,000, and even $200,000,000, which would wipe out a considerable portion of the war debt, and compel future generations to admit that we had lifted from their shoulders some of the burdens imposed. May I not appeal to my generous friend, the new Minister of Finance, and ask him in the most amiable manner that I can, to take into consideration this question of taxing land values, and see if he cannot give effect to it before this vote is taken, or at a later stage when we go into committee. It is doubtless unnecessary to inform the Minister of Finance—who follows these matters perhaps more closely than I do—as to what happened in England with respect to this policy. In the British Parliament, owing to a snap verdict the movement for the taxation of land values received a temporary set back, but this fact did not discourage Mr. Asquith. That right hon. gentleman expressed no despair over what had happened. It was, he said, not an occasion to write the epitaph "Requiescat," but rather "Resurgam"—"I shall rise again." And when that takes place a better day will dawn for the mass of workers in Great Britain. The temporary defeat of this policy is no doubt attributable to the peers of England who are great land owners and have taken the opportunity to rid themselves of this taxation and have the burden placed on the industries of Great Britain.

Last year a tariff inquiry was promised by the Minister of Finance, but no inquiry has yet taken place. To-day we again have the promise of such an inquiry. I have all belief in the sincerity of the present Minister of Finance and I hope his anticipation will be realized. But he will need to be on his guard against the manufacturers and the other protectionists who will come to him with a demand not for additional duties perhaps, but for "moderate protection" the idea of which was so eloquently set forth by my genial and good-hearted friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne). The same idea of a "moderate" tariff was expounded in the West sometime ago by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). "A moderate tariff," what a vague expression it is! You might erect a Chinese wall around the confines of Canada and yet the protectionist would tell you it was "moderate" protection. The promise of "moderate protection" is not satisfactory, we want something more definite. People will tell you, "What we want is a scientific tariff," and this term is freely used in the public journals of Canada. We are not given any figures to show what a "scientific" tariff means; it is capable of almost any interpretation. I hope therefore that when the Minister of Finance comes to sit down at the table and deal with the so-called "scientific tariff" he will display the same courage that animated him in presenting his Budget which could not have been in conformity with his hopes or expectations. As a matter of fact science is opposed to a tariff. Science in its operation works for the good of humanity and contributes to the welfare and comfort of the community. In this instance the community consists of ninety-five per cent of the community who toil for a living. They are the persons in whose behalf science should be invoked and the protectionist should be told plainly, "We will took after the mass of the people first." The tariff, Mr. Speaker, is only a creation of the convenience of the privileged classes, and I must protest against any further impositions on the people.

Now, I feel that I have taken up too much time and have encroached on your patience, Mr. Speaker, and the patience of the House. But I could not let this occasion pass without expressing my view of conditions as they are to-day. We are living under abnormal conditions; abnormal conditions prevail throughout the world; and it is for that very reason that we must courageously face the situation and adopt the best possible means at our disposal for restoring the happiness and prosperity of this country and helping, as far as lies within our power, to restore the happiness and prosperity of those countries in Europe which are appealing to Canada and to the United States for sustenance. Now, exclusive attention to home markets cannot possibly meet those conditions. We must have an expansion of trade if we are not only to develop our own resources but help those countries that are suffering as a result of the war.

I have spoken at great length, Mr. Speaker, but what I have said has come from the heart. I have given utterance to what I hold to be truths and not mere pet ideas. I trust therefore that what I have said will have some weight with the Minister of Finance, and that that hon. gentleman will not regard my remarks as mere idle talk to keep this House occupied for the time being. I have expressed my convictions and I feel that I am right. I believe, Sir, that the truths I have stated will appeal not only to my own constituency but to all the people who do not believe in privilege.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): I am not going to speak at any great length. Perhaps I have not as much to say as my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Turgeon), and at all events I will try to express my views in very much shorter time. I should like to add my congratulations to those that have been already expressed to the Minister of Finance for the very able Budget he has presented and the clear manner in which he has presented it. I do this, Sir, with a great deal of pleasure, because I can look back thirty years to a time when the present Finance Minister and myself were associated in another form of public service. I think it was his first position in the public service as a young man just entering his profession. He made good in that position, Sir, and it has been my pleasure to see him advance from one post to another, each more important than the last, until to-day he occupies one of the highest places in the Dominion of Canada. My thirty years of friendship and acquaintance with the minister therefore makes that fact a very gratifying one to me. The minister displayed in his speech the characteristics he has always exhibited since I have known him—caution in preparing his case and courage in presenting it. Evidently he learned a good while ago that old maxim: Be sure you are right, then go ahead; and the result is that in this Budget he has shown, as I think, a more courageous course than any Minister of Finance that we have had in the Dominion of Canada. Of course, he and the Government face to-day the most difficult conditions that any Government or any Finance Minister ever had to face in the history of Canada. There have been times in the past when a large amount of money had to be raised; but never has there been a time when such a tremendous volume of revenue was demanded, never was there a time when circumstances called for such large expenditures; never were we compelled to impose such drastic taxation, taxation so new and to which the people are so unaccustomed.

Taxation that, in my judgment, it required a great deal of courage for the Government to impose. The minister has told us the truth and the whole truth about our national assets, and I think he is to be commended on that score. He has resisted the temptation to make our balance sheet appear better than it is, and that is not always done by public men when they are trying to put the best face possible upon the case they are presenting to the country. I believe that the frankness displayed by the minister in that respect will be received with admiration by the people of Canada. I think that the people like their public men to be frank and straightforward. They can see through any camouflage that is put on just as easily as those who are behind the scenes; and my short experience in public life leads me to believe that if a man has a case which he can defend the people are ready to listen to him. They are reasonable in meeting their obligations and will respond to courageous leadership. But to my mind, the confidence which the Minister of Finance displays in the Canadian people all through his speech is the best and truest note he has sounded, and I venture to predict that the nation will respond and be prepared for any necessary sacrifice. He has added burdens of taxation as undreamt of in the past as they are imperative for the present and for the immediate future, and he has called for united effort to meet the obligations of to-day and reduce the liabilities of to-morrow. This should, and I believe it will, inspire our citizens to give him the support he needs to begin the process of restoring the finances of this country to their pre-war solidity.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the Budget shows high regard for the masses. It may bear somewhat heavily upon wealth, upon those large incomes, but in my judgment that is the right kind of Budget to bring down in any country, particularly in these times of stress. What I was particularly interested in was his declaration that the Government will adhere to the principles of the National Policy. I am confident that that will appeal to the judgment of the great mass of the people of Canada. I desire especially to emphasize his pledge that the tariff shall not be used to exploit the consumer. I will not take the time, Mr. Speaker, to read all that he said on this subject; I shall simply quote a few words from page 2569 of unrevised Hansard. The Finance Minister said:

> Apart from the question of revenue, the tariff should have regard to the maintenance, stability and prosperity of Canadian enterprise in the development of all our natural resources in lands, forests, mines, fisheries, as well as our agricultural and manufacturing industries.

That, as I understand, is the principle of the National Policy. He goes on to say:

> Consideration must also be given to the importance of creating and maintaining conditions that will afford to Canadian industrial workers opportunities for steady and remunerative employment. It is undoubtedly in the true interests of Canada as a whole that Canadian workers should not be forced to seek in foreign countries employment and opportunity denied them at home by reason of the export of the natural resources, primary products, and raw materials with which the Dominion is amply endowed.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that seventy-five per cent of the people of Canada are in favour of the protection of our industries. An intensive propaganda has been carried on for years to convince them that the manufacturers systematically exploit them to accumulate huge fortunes. In a few instances huge fortunes may have been piled up as the result of taking advantage of the tariff. But I venture to say that that has happened only in isolated cases; that the men who work in factories as well as those who manage these enterprises have equally been beneficiaries of the protection that has been given to our industries.

Mr. Speaker I am a protectionist by conviction. I am not like some men in public life; I did not inherit my politics. My father was an intimate personal friend of and sympathizer with the grandfather of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the late William Lyon Mackenzie.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: He was a Baldwin reformer, and he instructed me in the doctrines of Liberalism of that day and until I grew up to be a young man. He was not satisfied to call himself a reformer; he was a Clear Grit, a follower of Brown and Mackenzie. You will readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that growing up beside a man holding such political views, I was somewhat thoroughly instructed.

Mr. PROULX: And the son went astray.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, I am just coming to that. I grew to manhood cherishing a very high regard for Brown, Mackenzie, Blake and Mowat. But about the time I was called upon to cast my first ballot in a Federal election the late Sir John A. Macdonald introduced the National Policy and affirmed the principle of the protection of our industries. I had grown up, Sir with conditions surrounding me that upset all my preconceived theories about the tariff. As a boy and a young man I saw my schoolmates, as they grew to manhood and learned their trade or profession, forced to go across to the United States to get employment. I saw the largest furniture factory in Canada at that time, located in Toronto, forced to close its doors and throw two thousand men out of employment. I saw trade sales of American-made furniture put on every week in Toronto the effect of which was to drive out the furniture factories we had in that city and close down one of our great industries. There were more Canadians in Chicago then than there were in Toronto or in Montreal. The very best blood of Canada, our young enterprising men, unable to find opportunities in our own country, were obliged to go across the border in order to earn their livelihood. I sav. Mr. Speaker, that any young man of observant mind growing up in those days could not help being impressed with such a spectacle as that which I am trying to describe. So, when I was called upon to cast my first vote in a federal election I decided that nothing could be worse than what we had and that I was willing to give the new policy a trial. I voted for the National Policy, and I have voted for the party that supported the National Policy and protection ever since because my subsequent observation and experience confirmed me in the belief that protection of our industries is absolutely necessary for the further development of Canada. I suppose I am like one of those whom the member for West Kent (Mr. McCoig) spoke of this afternoon. He complained that the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) had a short time ago advocated free trade and reciprocity. Well, I never was quite guilty of that, but I was wondering while the member for West Kent was referring to the member for Parkdale why he did not couple the name of that hon. gentleman with that of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), who has changed his views in regard to the tariff quite as much and in quite as striking a way as has the member for Parkdale.

Now, the tariff is necessary for our urban communities;—I think many free traders will acknowledge that—and it is equally necessary for rural communities, for the farmers and their sons and daughters. If this country is ever to be great it can only be by the establishment of diversified industries. If a farmer in Ontario has six sons, only one will stay on the farm; the others will want to go elsewhere, to be doctors, lawyers, mechanics or business men. If we have not large urban communities such as are developed and maintained by large industries, there are no opportunities for men who want to leave the farm and engage in other professions; and that is one of the primary reasons why the farmers of Ontario are protectionists. They have always voted for a protectionist policy, and my judgment is that they are as soundly convinced as they ever have been that that is the best policy for Canada. It has brought hundreds of millions of dollars of American capital into this country; it has kept hundreds of thousands of Canadians at home. We need our young men, Mr. Speaker, to develop our national life. We want our young men and our young women to build up their homes in this country and to give their work and their service to the building up of the nation.

There are some things which have not been done in Canada in which, I think, we might have made greater advances. In passing, I should like to say that we are not proceeding fast enough with the development of our fuel resources. The time is coming, and indeed is not far distant, when the question will be, not how much we have to pay for coal, but whether we can get coal at all, and the primary duty of the Government is to develop not only our coal resources but our peat resources and any other fuel resources we have, and to establish such means of transportation as will make it possible for us to bring coal from the extremes of the country into the central provinces. I might talk at length upon that subject, but I want to keep my promise to you, Sir, that I would not be long, and I have something else to say.

I appreciate very much, as I think the people of Canada will, the desire of the Government to economize in every possible way. I have not yet seen many signs of economy. One action has been taken which effects a considerable saving, and my suggestion is that it should be carried out to a much larger degree than it has been already. I listened with great interest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), when he spoke of the Civil Service of this country. He said that it was necessary that the expenditure on that service should be lessened. He told us that there were forty or fifty thousand men and women in the service; that it was a great organization through which the Government carried out its enterprises and its administration, and that millions of dollars could be wasted and spent uselessly through an inefficient Civil Service throughout the country, which millions could equally well be saved through efficient organization and thorough co-operation amongst the members of the Civil Service. I am not sure that that declaration by the Minister of Trade and Commerce received the attention that it deserves, and I am going to propose to him, to the Prime Minister, and to the Government, a way by which they can effect a saving of $20,000,000 a year.

My first suggestion would be that the Government declare a holiday of one year in the making of new appointments to the public service of this Dominion. If there are positions to fill, let the Government promote some of the superfluous members of the service in the various departments and place them where it is supposed that new officials are required. In that way, I believe (with the exception of the few experts that might be required) the Dominion service could run for a year without one additional appointment. This is what has been done in one department. At long last, as some hon. member said, we got a Secretary of State who had the courage to go into the Printing Bureau, the condition of which branch of the service had been a disgrace for years. There was not a printer in Canada who did not know how grossly that department was overloaded; that hundreds of thousands of dollars were being wasted every year. And yet it seemed to be impossible to find a man who would assume the position of minister of that department and clean it up as it ought to be cleaned up. This House knows that it has been decided to cut off three or four hundred men, and three hundred men have already been cut off from the Printing Bureau. At the present rate of wages in the allied printing trades, I would estimate that that would mean a saving of between $500,000 and $600,000 a year. With three hundred men cut off and $500,000 saved a year, as much work is being got out of that department to-day as was got out of it when there were thre hundred more men on the staff. And the same thing can be done in practically every other department of the Government of Canada. But courage is required for measures of that kind, and I am going to credit every minister of the Government with having courage to do this, and say to him: You can save $20,000,000 if you will collectively go through every department of Government in Canada as the former Secretary of State went through the Printing Bureau, and I believe that by transferring unnecessary officials in one department to necessary positions in another department, we can get along for a year without making any new appointments, except such technical and expert officials as may be required. That is the way to get efficiency. Make it possible for industrious men and women to work for promotion. Why is it that in the Printing Bureau a staff of men and women, three hundred less than it was a month or so ago, is turning out as much work as before? It is because those who remain know that they must work in order to hold their jobs. Let that idea go all through the service of Canada, and two men would do the work that three men are doing now. But some person must take the matter in hand and do it with a spirit of courage that is not always manifested in the administration of departments. It is not necessary that I should state to the House that the service of Canada is overloaded. There is not a member of Parliament, nor a person working in the Civil Service, nor a minister of the Crown, who does not know that. I say: Take the overload and distribute it around; instead of making new appointments, promote those who are now in the service, and if they are not fully qualified, give them an opportunity to qualify so that they can go up from one position to another. Form a board of deputy ministers for the promotion of efficiency in the Civil Service, and let them collaborate in regard to every position that falls vacant or every appointment that is to be made, instead of, as at present, if an official is superannuated or dies, putting a new man in his place although there may be in the department a dozen or fifty persons more than are necessary to carry on the work. A good deal more would have been accomplished if instead of the cumbersome system that has been adopted, some kind of instruction had been provided for those who are now in the service, so that a man or a woman could qualify for the position higher up, thus, having always ready those who could take their promotion for any positions that became vacant. If you could inspire the deputy ministers and the assistant deputy ministers with the idea that they were going to make the public service of Canada the most efficient public service in the world, there would be competition from the bottom to the top and from the top down to the bottom amongst those who are now in the service in order that they might render better service, earn a better reward and get a better position. What inducement is there now for a man or a woman who is in the service to show extraordinary ability or industry? There is no inducement whatever; too many of them simply put in their time, and many of them who do that could be turned into good officials if some incentive were put before them to inspire them to give better service.

There is another feature of this case that deserves attention. Why not readjust the hours of the officials of this Government? Why not require them to work eight instead of six and a half hours a day? Why not add 20 per cent to the working time and reduce the staff 20 per cent? Manifestly, if you increase the time that is put in by the employees in the public service in Ottawa by 20 per cent, you can do with 20 per cent fewer employees. There should be no objection to any person who works for this Government putting in eight hours a day. Why should not a clerk or a messenger work eight hours as well as a bricklayer, printer, moulder or any other man? That is one way in which practically 20 per cent more of service could be given to this country by these employees, and a saving of 20 per cent on about $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 would be an enormous sum left in the treasury of this country. It would mean both better officials for the service and a great many more million dollars to the country.

But this is a task that calls for the best brains you have in the administration. It calls for the best brains you have in the service, for men who have been long in the service, who understand its needs, and who would enter into the idea sympathetically and apply themselves to give their very best to working out this plan for the benefit of the people of Canada. I do not think it is a task for a group of glib-tongued young theorists who come into a country they have never lived in, of whose system of Government they are entirely ignorant, and who bring in some theories that may be applicable elsewhere and, in effect, put those theories over and above the experience of deputy ministers and chief officials who have been in the service of this country for thirty or forty years. If you had such a plan as that in operation, you would not have a spectacle such as that which was presented in the Senate a few days ago, when a debate took place on the appointment or dismissal of a translator who had been appointed by the present Commission and who was found after two and a half months to be absolutely unable to translate two or three pages of the debates in the Senate. He received higher marks in the written examination than anybody else, but when put down to do the job he could not translate two or three pages of Hansard properly in two and a half months. That is the kind of thing you are getting now, and it is not making for efficiency in the service. I think the present plan takes the heart out of responsible deputy ministers. My idea would be to inspire them to give their very best to this country, to go through their departments, and to go through them collectively and discuss with each other: Where is a man to fill this position and that position? It would also put heart in the officials in minor positions, who, I am sure, with the hope of promotion, would be willing not only to work eight hours a day, but to work harder and more efficiently while they are working. The Government is calling on the people of Canada to practice economy, "Produce and Save" is the watchword. Well, I submit that here is a plan that will effect economy, and I submit it with all due deference. I am not submitting it with any complaint against the Government; I know the extraordinary labours the ministers have had to perform during the years of the war, and in fact up to the present time; they have been worked to death. I am not complaining, but I am afraid they have not thought of this plan, and I have thought of it; so I am just putting it before them for their consideration, and am wondering whether they will themselves do through the Government and through this House what they are calling on the people of Canada to do, namely, to practise the closest economy in our expenditures.

There is reason to congratulate the Government upon its Budget. It shows great courage to impose these new taxes. I think those taxes are going to bring in more than enough money to meet all the expenditures of this country during this fiscal year, and I think there will be a substantial sum besides to apply in reducing the debt. It is not an easy thing to impose new taxes, but I want the Government to go a little further now that they have imposed them. Let them get to work and, after the most careful thought, devise a plan somewhat on the lines I have suggested for reducing the service by 20 per cent and saving $20,000,000 additional to apply to the reduction of the public debt.

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to one remark which was made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hocken), in respect to emigration from this country previous to the adoption by the Government of Canada of the National Policy. I was a boy some years, I expect, after the hon. gentleman was, and for many years after the old National Policy had been given what I would consider a fair trial in this country, and I would point out to him that there was great emigration from this country even in those days. Many of our young people were leaving the farms of Canada and going to the United States. Right at the present time people are leaving the farms in the province of Ontario in hundreds. You have fewer farmers on the land in Ontario to-day by many thousands than you had ten years ago. Now, if protection as we had it under the old National Policy was such a good thing for the farmers of this province, it seems to me that instead of having fewer farmers we would have more farmers on the land.

Mr. LALOR: May I ask a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. gentleman may ask a question after I have finished. As a farmer in this House, Mr. Speaker, and speaking from the cross benches, I would like to bring to the attention of the House a resolution that was passed at a round table conference of Conservatives of this Dominion in the city of Toronto a few days ago. I do not know all that was considered at that conference, but there were men there representative of the Conservative party from one end of this Dominion to the other, and they passed this resolution:

> That agriculture in the broadest and best sense is Canada's greatest field for enterprise, and no handicap of any kind must be allowed to impede the progress of our farmers.

This resolution was passed by a body of men, if not representative of all classes, were certainly representative of all parts of this Dominion, and called together for the purpose of discussing party affairs. Whether or not we have confidence in these men or feel like entrusting them with the destinies of this country, I am sure we can give them credit for sincerity in expressing their opinion as to what should be done in the best interests of this country, and this is what they say with respect to agriculture,—"that no handicap of any kind must be allowed to impede the progress of our farmers." We have heard from every leader of public thought in this country during the past few months that if there was one thing needed more than another in Canada at the present time it is increased production.

I wish at this point to offer my sincere thanks and appreciation to the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), first of all for making an honest endeavour through the imposition of these new taxes—and by the way, in levying these taxes he has adopted the principle of direct taxation as proposed in the platform of the Council of Agriculture—to make our revenue equal our expenditure. Secondly, I wish to thank the minister for making the bonds that he floated last fall taxable. His predecessor had been asked by members of this House, and by representative people from all over this Dominion, to make the income from the bonds sold in 1918 taxable, but he did not see fit to do that. I am sure it must be a matter of great pride to the present Minister of Finance, after coming into office as he did late last year confronted with the responsibility of getting together the machinery for floating this new loan, that he was able, even with a taxable bond, to get more money than his predecessor ever got. I am sure it was a matter of great satisfaction to the Canadian people to know that our people would, when necessity demanded, put up the money even if the interest accruing from those bonds was subject to taxation.

There are those in this country who think that the ex-Minister of Finance stepped from under when he saw the clouds gathering in Canada's financial sky. In connection with that I think it is only proper to say, in justice to the present minister, that the ex-Minister of Finance has left to him, and any who may follow him in the next few years, a great legacy of debt, a large part of which in my opinion could and should have been paid during the war period if the ex-Minister of Finance had been brave enough to impose taxes when money was plentiful in this country. When the people found themselves with more money than they had ever had in their lives, if the ex-Minister of Finance had been the genius he would have the country believe he is, and if he had had the best interests of Canada and of the great mass of the people at heart, he could have paid a large part of the war cost during the war period. But instead of that I charge, Mr. Speaker, that he pandered to the interest of his friends. If the ex-Minister of Finance had lived up to his opportunity, the present Minister of Finance would not have found it necessary to impose these new taxes at all. In addition to that, our interest charge would not have amounted to the colossal sum that it does.

I wish to thank the Minister of Finance for something else, and that is for investing the fund held in trust by this Government and known as the School Lands Trust Fund. He has invested it so that it will return to the province of Saskatchewan five per cent instead of three. I brought this matter to the attention of the House last year and pointed out at that time that while the ex-Minister of Finance had invested a part of this fund to return to the province five per cent instead of three, he had promised to invest the balance. This promise he never carried out. It would be well perhaps if I gave the exact words of the treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan as contained in his Budget speech of last year. This is what the provincial treasurer said in respect to the School Lands Trust Fund:

> It will be remembered by the House that two years ago when making our usual representation to the Dominion authorities in this matter we urged that even if the control of the lands and funds could not be vested in the province the Dominion should in any event pay a higher rate of interest than three per cent. Under the law three per cent is set as the rate. There was no question in the mind of any member of this House that when the Dominion Government was paying 5½ per cent for war loans that our money in their hands was certainly worth more than 3 per cent, and we made representations accordingly. Sir Thomas White, at that time, promised to invest the funds in Dominion Government stocks and bonds which the Act gave him authority to do with a view to a higher earning for the province than 3 per cent.
> Let us see how that promise was carried out. Of the $6,185,000 in the trust fund $3,891,000 have been invested. On that amount the province receives interest at the rate of five per cent at the present time, but the other $2,294,000 the Dominion still keeps for its own use at 3 per cent. Efforts have been made to secure the investment of a larger portion of the fund with no result to date.

This was the condition of this fund when the present Minister of Finance took office. When the matter was brought to his attention, he immediately invested the full amount of this fund so that it would return to the Provincial Government five per cent instead of three. I wish to take this opportunity of extending to the Minister of Finance the thanks of the people of Saskatchewan, not for having conferred a favour but for having done the right thing and for having done it at once when convinced of the justice of the request.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: Does the hon. gentleman pretend to speak for the province of Saskatchewan?

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Very different was the action of the minister's predecessor who, though convinced of the justice of our claim, made promises which he did not live up to. If I have erred in taking upon myself something that I should not have done, I must say that I am only following in the footsteps of the hon. gentleman (Mr. H. A. Mackie) who undertakes to speak not only for the province of Alberta but for the whole Dominion of Canada when he gets a chance.

Now I wish to pay some attention to the speech of the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Elkin). That hon. member came to this House as a Liberal and an avowed free trader. When, in the discussions around the corridors, the question came up as to who among the Liberals would stick to the Government forces, the hon. member for St. John city was one who was always counted out because, as I have said, he came to this House as an avowed free trader. What then was the surprise of hon. members on this side—in fact I think of hon. members on both sides—when the hon. member rose in his place a few evenings ago and delivered one of the strongest protectionist speeches I have heard here.

Mr. LALOR: Honest conviction.

Mr. JOHNSTON: There is always a reason for such a quick conversion, and looking for the reason in the case of the hon. member for St. John one is reminded, Sir, that in private life he is a manufacturer and that his manufacturing business is one that is listed to be included in the great merger that is now in the process of consummation in this country. We have often heard, Sir, that the monied men of Canada—and, I think, of every other country—carry their politics in their pocket. Would it be that there was a money consideration in connection with this quick change of heart as exemplified by the hon. member for St. John? We have proof that men in the financial life of this country do change their politics in a hurry when they think there is a chance of their pocket being touched. I point you to the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) who with a number of other wealthy men of the city of Toronto—many of them reputed to be millionaires—repudiated their old party and its policy in 1911 because they, in their short-sightedness, feared to pit their ability against that of the Yankees in a fair, open, and above-board business transaction. No matter what the cause we have in the hon. member for St. John a living example of one who, in the twinkling of an eye, has been transformed from an avowed free trader into an ardent protectionist. One might understand how a moderate protectionist could extend, or stretch his moderate views so that he would get into the class that might be termed protectionist for protection's sake, or stand for the principle of protection, but how a man can go to bed at night an avowed free trader and wake up in the morning a real high protectionist is beyond my limited powers of comprehension.

An hon. MEMBER: You did it for fifteen years.

Mr. JOHNSTON: As I said the hon. member for St. John was an avowed free trader because he used these words in his address to the House the other evening:

> I believed in free trade once myself.

Those were the hon. gentleman's words. It would be interesting for the House to know just when the hon. member experienced his change of heart. He says he was once a free trader but does not enlighten the House as to when he was converted. Is it not a fact that the hon. member, as I have already said, has been engaged in manufacturing for a considerable time and that when so engaged he was a free trader? But now that his business is being absorbed in the gigantic merger to which I have alluded his fear of American competition is such that he has changed from a free trader to a protectionist. When the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Richardson) a few days ago moved the adjournment of the House so that we might consider this merger many felt that something should be done by way of investigating the reasons for that combination and its effect, if consummated, upon the commercial life of this country. I think there is something in connection with this matter that would stand a thorough investigation. You will notice that the hon. member said the western free trader does not exist to-day, but he drew attention in those words to the demands of the western grain growers:

> The western grain growers who want to make immediate and sweeping reductions in the tariff are fond of picturing Canadian manufacturers as a small group of selfish men, who support the tariff policy solely in their own interests. These grain growers ask: why should this privileged class be permitted to levy toll on all other classes in this country?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the grain growers do picture the supporters of high protection as a selfish class. It has been proved times without number that the Canadian manufacturer can and does compete in the foreign market, where he has no protection against the products from other countries. Why then are the Canadian people penalized when our manufacturers can compete outside of Canada without protection? Is it not a reasonable question to ask, and logical to claim that they can compete in Canada? The grain growers not only claim that the manufacturers are selfish in asking for protection that they do not need, but they also claim that the manufacturers are standing in the way of the advancement and development of the agricultural resources of this country. Again I would remind the House of the resolution adopted by the Conservatives at the Toronto meeting in which they said that no handicap of any kind should be allowed to impede the progress of our farmers. Is there an honourable member in this House who will argue that you are not retarding the progress and development of agriculture in this country by imposing a tariff on the importation of agricultural machinery and thereby enabling the Canadian manufacturers to exact the amount of that duty from the farmers? Is this not a restriction on production? Any one who has given the matter of Canadian finances any serious thought must realize that the one big thing needed in Canada to-day is increased production so that the heavy taxes incurred through our war effort will not bear too heavily on the producer. If this Government would adopt the resolution as passed by the Conservatives at Toronto their first consideration should be to remove all duties on agricultural implements and machinery necessary to production. The honourable member for St. John then gives to the House his unsupported word that the protective tariff not only benefits the manufacturer but almost every other class in the country and then goes on to enumerate a long list. In this connection let me say that I am quite willing to leave this matter in the hands of the residents of the urban centres for them to decide upon at the next general election. Regarding taxes and the farmers the hon. member has this to say:

> It should be the aim of Parliament to remedy every legitimate grievance, giving attention first to those that are most pressing. If the case of the farmers is to be given priority, then let the farmers show some cause more convincing than the loudness of the howl they are putting up. What taxes do they pay to swell the federal revenues other than those levied by means of the tariff? When other people are paying taxes under the tariff, and income and profit taxes besides, how do the farmers justify their demand that they be relieved of taxes altogether? If their grievance is a real one, how do they account for the fact that there is such a brisk demand for western farm land, with advancing prices? If there were a movement away from the land there would be some colour to their argument.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first intimation that I have ever had that the farmers of this country were trying to evade paying their taxes. The farmer pays the general taxation of this country the same as every other person, and he pays the income when his income comes within the taxable amount. It is true that he has not been taxed for excessive profits because he never gets into that class. Regarding the other matter of a brisk demand for western farm lands, and a movement towards the land, I admit that there is a great cry of "Back to the land," but I fail to see any evidence of the urban dwellers of this country making any move towards the land. Any farm lands that are being taken up in Western Canada to-day are being taken principally by Americans from across the line, or by farmers in that country enlarging their holdings. In this connection I would like to say that in the province of Saskatchewan, from which I come, there are fewer actual farmers on the land to-day than there have been homesteads entered for.

As a fitting climax to the other mis-statements of the hon. member for St. John he winds up in this fashion: in respect to the representation in this Parliament:

> If the farmer persists in an attempt to get from under altogether, and leave the whole load to be carried by the townsman, it is not unlikely that the latter will arise in his might and sweep aside the pernicious principle whereby he has been deprived of his just representation and voting power.

The hon. gentlemen proceeds to give some comparative tables in respect to this matter, which tables I shall not quote. If the farmer dominates in this Parliament, Mr. Speaker, it is not by force of numbers. It is a well-known fact that according to the last census taken in this country 54.5 of our population were found to be rural, and the farmers in this Parliament represent much less than twenty per cent of the total membership. I think, therefore, that this statement of the hon. member for St. John is on a par with many other statements he has made. The hon. gentleman makes the threat that if the farmers continue to raise what he is pleased to term "a howl," the urban dwellers may rise in their might and demand that they be given representation in this Parliament in strict accordance with population. I do not think that any farmer in this Parliament has ever suggested that the farmers should be represented in this House other than by population. If some of the rural ridings do not contain as many electors as some of the urban constituencies, I believe that the reason is that in re-distributing the country some consideration was given to area. But if my hon. friend and those new-found friends of his see fit to make a re-distribution of the country and adhere strictly to population they will hear no complaints from the farmers.

Again, we as western farmers are charged with wishing to market our grain in Minneapolis and Chicago, and to buy our machinery from the United States. The only reason for this is that the western farmer wants to market his grain in Minneapolis and Chicago at times when it will bring him more money. There is no matter of sentiment in connection with the question at all. And the same applies to the purchasing of machinery. If any man needs a piece of machinery and he can buy it for less money in the United States he naturally buys it there, and I think that a large portion of the machinery used in the factories of this country by people who support a protective tariff will be found to have been purchased in the United States. Yet no one would think of claiming that the owners of the factories are less Canadian because they use American machinery. There are those people in this country, Mr. Speaker, who consider that in buying American made machinery they are really doing a service to Canada, for the amount of the tariff levied on the machinery they get goes directly into the public treasury and not into the pockets of the manufacturers.

I come now to the last of the statements made by the hon. member for St. John, and this is in respect to our railways. He says:

> These railways were built with the money of the people of Canada in order that there might be opened up for settlement a territory whose population are now enjoying marked prosperity. Without the railways there would have been no West. Without the taxes cheerfully paid year after year by Canadians in the East there would have been no railways. Is the partnership arrangement that has proven so mutually profitable now to be terminated simply because of the unwillingness of the West to pay its share of the operating expenses?

Did you ever hear a more ridiculous statement made in this House, that the farmers, residents of this country, taxpayers in this country, with everything they own subject to the advancement and development of this country, were out to cripple the great transportation system that we as a people now own and are operating? No argument can be adduced to combat a statement of this kind for it is foundationless and absurd. In respect to this railway problem, let me say, the people of Western Canada are prepared to pay their full share of the deficit on these roads, but they are not willing that the whole deficit should be borne by those who use the roads, and they will not submit to an increase of freight rates for this purpose. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that this Parliament as representative of all parts of this Dominion and all the people of this Dominion, is responsible for the sad muddle in connection with our railways and we Western Canadians hold that it is not just or fair that those who happen to use these lines should be penalized for the mistakes of this Parliament as representative of all the people. I am forced to think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member could not have heard the hon.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) when he gave these words to the House last session. They will be found at page 69, Vol. 1:

> As a western representative, and particularly as a representative of the province of Saskatchewan, I feel I should say one word more. I refer to the conditions existing in Western Canada, where all the elements of disunion exists—A pretty big and serious problem. I am referring now to the tariff cleavage between East and West. You know, we might as well look that squarely in the face and recognize the situation as it exists; there is no use dodging it, that situation is there. What are the people of Canada going to do? Can it be settled in some way or another? Is there a possibility of a settlement? There is no doubt as to the feeling out West. There is no division among the people. All parties are practically united. What is to be done? You will have an opportunity later in the session to consider the question. In the meantime, I simply wish to point out to this House, and to the people of this country, that that is one of the other questions on the horizon that in many ways looks dangerous; at any rate it divides the people of this country and puts them in two hostile camps, fighting against each other all the time. If Canada is to be what we hope it shall be, then an honest and earnest attempt must be made to solve that problem which stares us squarely in the face.

These were serious words coming from one who should know conditions in Western Canada, and yet we have an hon. member going out of his way, I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, at the request of some western politician, to make statements in this House that can serve no good purpose but will have, if taken seriously, a disrupting effect. I have taken considerable time in dealing with the remarks of the hon. member for St. John, and I now wish to say to him and to the House that the people of Western Canada are just as loyal to Canada, her institutions and the grand Empire of which we form a part, as the hon. member from St. John, or any of those new friends whom he has so lately adopted.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, most of us who are now on these cross benches were called upon to make a decision in respect to the proposals of the Government in its Budget. The proposals did not suit some of us, and the promise of the ex-Minister of Finance for a revision of the tariff was not taken seriously. We had little hope, even with a commission appointed, that the tariff would be revised downward to such an extent that our views would be met. We voted against the Government on that occasion, and I think that in view of the result as we have it before the House to-day, our judgment was sound. My own reasoning was that there was no chance of the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) agreeing to a reduction that would suit me, and even if he did, I had little hope of its getting by a party caucus when the great majority of those present would be opposed. That was my opinion and in consequence, I have since been a cross-bencher in this House.

I would like to state my position in respect to the policy that we cross-benchers have adopted. It has been the aim of many hon. members of this House to make it appear that this movement is simply a class movement. Many of them have taken occasion to look over the policy as laid down by the Canadian Council of Agriculture and have tried to make the people believe that this policy is purely of a class nature. I may say that in 1916, shortly after this policy had been adopted by the Canadian Council of Agriculture, every candidate in the federal field in Saskatchewan was circularized by the secretary of the Grain Growers' Association there and asked whether if elected, he would be prepared to support the policy as laid down by the Canadian Council of Agriculture. My reply was in the affirmative, and prior to the consummation of Union Government in the fall of 1917 I issued a manifesto to the electors of Last Mountain in which I stated that I was a supporter of that policy in respect of tariff matters. I stated my position in this House in the Budget debate of last session. In view of these facts and the stand I had taken ever since I first became interested in public affairs, I could do nothing less than vote against the Government proposals as contained in last year's Budget. There are those who took a different view. It is for them to say whether the Government has fulfilled its pledges and whether the proposals of the Government as contained in this year's Budget are in the interests of Western Canada.

I am not going to make any appeals to the Government, Mr. Speaker; I believe it would avail me very little to do so. But I wish to point out to them that to have a solid, a lasting prosperity in this country, it must be founded upon the accomplishments and life of the agriculturist. Make prosperous the condition and happy the home life of the farmers in this country and all else will be well. There need be no worry about paying our national debt. Canada has the resources; her people have the conquering spirit. Change the fiscal policy so that no handicap shall be placed upon the real producers of wealth in this country. But to do that, Mr. Speaker, to bring about that change, we must, in my opinion, have a change of government.

There are many other matters to which reference might be made, but the hour is late and I do not wish to tire hon. gentlemen. I may say here that in respect to the matter of an early election I voted for the resolution of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the beginning of this session, and I did so believing that I was carrying out the wishes of my constituents. I believe that the great majority of the electors of this country have lost confidence in the Government. It matters not whether it is a good government or a bad government, the people who are rseponsible for the election of members to this House are dissatisfied, and I believe that they have every reason to be dissatisfied. This Government was elected for a specific purpose and for a definite period. The purpose was to win the war; the period was for the length of time that it would take to accomplish that purpose. That has all been accomplished, and the people are demanding that there should be an appeal to them. There are other reasons. This Government came into being as a Union Government. The promise was made to the people and to the Liberals who joined with the Conservatives under a Conservative leader that there should be a fifty-fifty split as respects the personnel of the Cabinet. That pledge or promise has never been fulfilled; and to-day we have a Government dominated by high protectionists. For this reason, I believe it is up to this Government to conclude the business of this session and then to appeal to the country for a new mandate.

On motion of Mr. M. Clark (Red Deer) the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill No. 72, to incorporate The North-West Route, Limited.—Mr. Boys.

Bill No. 118 from the Senate, for the relief of James Lewis Price.—Mr. MacNutt.

Bill No. 119 from the Senate, for the relief of Frederick Tristram Clarke.—Mr. Burnham.

Bill No. 113 from the Senate, for the relief of Jessie Elizabeth Hudgin.—Mr. Mowat.

Bill No. 115 from the Senate, for the relief of Caroline Ewing Gudewill.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 117 from the Senate, for the relief of Charles Lindsay Keys.—Mr. Casselman.

Bill No. 125 from the Senate, for the relief of Irene Martin Chapman.—Mr. Hocken.

Bill No. 52, to incorporate The Western Canadian Union Corporation on Seventh-Day Adventists.—Mr. Mackie (Edmonton).

Bill No. 105 from the Senate, to incorporate United Canada Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Blake.

Tuesday, May 25, 1920.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I would like to bring to the attention of the Government a matter of great public importance There appears to be a state of unrest among certain of the postal employees with threats of a strike. I understand that the Government have introduced a Bill, which has been given its first reading, providing for increased remuneration to the postal employees dating back to April 1 of last year, but so much time has elapsed in bringing this legislation into effect that the men concerned are very much dissatisfied. I would therefore ask the Government what is being done in the matter, and whether they can make any pronouncement as to when the added pay, if any, will reach the men.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): As my hon. friend has stated, a Bill is now before the House which, when passed, will authorize the payment of the moneys which the Post Office employees desire to secure. That Bill would have been proceeded with before this had not so much time been taken up with the Franchise Bill which had the right of way. As soon as that measure is disposed of the Bill in question will be proceeded with The matter can then be dealt with.

[M. Johnston.]

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Friday, May 21, the debate on the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance), that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to detain the House for what I hope will be no very great length of time, considering that it is a Budget debate, I feel that it is my duty to voice what is a very general sentiment, and that is a sentiment of gratification that I once more speak in the presence of my right hon friend the Prime Minister of Canada. Sir, those of us who in an intimate degree shared the heavy load which the country placed upon his shoulders followed his search for health with the utmost sympathy, and in my own case I can say truly that my mind and heart were continually with him. I have had the honour of being his colleague in this House for twelve years. We have differed politically—we never differed otherwise,—we never differed except in opinion. His tenacity during the whole of the great struggle, and especially his statesmanlike patience in hanging on to the tough job of forming Union Government, have made it certain that when the heedless blast of time has swept away the passion and the prejudices of the present the name of Borden will occupy no lowly place on the list of those who, in the Great War, kept the standard floating in high places of the field. I feel sure the House joins with me in offering my right hon. friend the warmest congratulations that our hearts can conceive on his return to work and our best wishes for a long and useful public service in the future.

I turn to another matter when I compliment my old friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) on the personal aspects of his financial statement. I think every one I have heard speak of his speech has admitted that the preparation and presentation of his case was somewhat in the nature of a personal triumph. For the case itself, Sir, I perhaps cannot say quite so much—that will develop as I go along Meantime I must remember that we are dealing with an Amendment as well as with a Budget Speech. There are considerable disadvantages attaching to the practice of moving amendments to a complicated Budget on the part of the chief critic in one's having to plan before having seen the Budget itself. I cannot help thinking that if my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) had heard the Budget Speech and studied it for a day or two he would have produced a rather different amendment than that which he presented to the House. I should have hoped it would have contained more milk and less water under those circumstances, and would have been less a shilly-shally, temporizing, and opportunist piece of print. Nevertheless it has one virtue—it calls for a downward revision of the tariff.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. M. CLARK: It calls for a considerable reduction of the tariff. Well that is at least one virtue. I do not know that I am unfortunate with the preambles of the amendments that come from my hon. friends of the Official Opposition. I do not quite sympathize with the preamble of this amendment. It is quite true that my right hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) promised a revision of the tariff downward, after an examination last fall. But my right hon. friend is no longer a member of the Government. He unfortunately, and with the sympathy of all of us, felt that his health did not enable him further to carry on the business of that position,—the Government was not to blame for that. Then we had a fall session and I do not know that any one on this side of the House was much more opposed to a fall session than honourable members on the other side. Anyway we had to come here and do our duty, and I think, common fairness would lead the Opposition to recognize that these were almost insuperable obstacles in the way of a thorough examination all over the country in the fall of last year followed by a revision of the tariff. And we are further in this strange position, that the amendment calls for a revision from the Government which in its Budget Speech is promising this very thing. It is a most peculiar position from a parliamentary point of view. A revision is promised by the Government and a revision is asked for by the Official Opposition, and thus we of the Independent party have to make a choice between the two positions. However, as I have said, the amendment calls for a downward division of the tariff. The fact that both parties are pledged to revision is a strange comment upon the position which was taken by my right hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Finance, in a speech which he made, I think in reply to some remarks of mine, in the debate on the Address. I regret very much that my right hon. friend is not paying one of his somewhat infrequent visits to the House of Commons to-day. However, I am not going to say anything very savage about my right hon. friend; and I do not think any one will imagine I have treated him very badly.

My right hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) put up the argument that what the country needed at the present time was stability, and he seemed to argue that that stability was to be arrived at under a tariff. Well, that position would scarcely be supported by the faet that on both sides of the House at this moment it is recognized that the tariff is not stable, because we all want to revise it. I do not know whether we all want to revise it downward —I know that on this side we want to revise it downward. They have had a tariff in Germany for a great many years. Germany is not in a very stable condition to-day. Germany's tariff policy was entirely mixed up with her militarist policy; the two together produced a top heavy bureaucracy, and instead of stability we have absolute chaos, confusion, and the products of an unstable condition. If one looks at the United States they had in that country within my recollection, a Wilson tariff—not President Wilson but a former Minister of Finance—a McKinley tariff, a Dingley tariff, an Underwood tariff, and what the next one will be will depend upon the name of the next Secretary of the Treasury.

We have had in Canada, first the propagation of the National Policy; then the Fielding tariff; then the White tariff—now there is a double demand for a revision and the question comes to all of us what are we going to do with the blessed thing? Yet my right hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance brings that before us as the emblem of stability. The fact is that once you seed the bad of protection you sow a crop of vested interests; you may be lowering the tariff, you may be raising it, you are always tinkering and pottering with it, but it is never stable. Nothing is ever settled in this world unless it is settled right, and the only way you can settle the tariff right is to cut its head off just in front of its tail.

Now I have had this much to say in answer to my right hon. friend (Sir Thomas White) on the question of the stable nature of the tariff. It would appear that the unstability of the creed communicates itself also to the apostle. I do not know that my right hon. friend's career on this tariff question has been an example of very great stability. For fifteen years he supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Government of that day in a policy which was always proclaimed—while they were in power anyhow —as a policy of tariff for revenue. But he went down to Toronto a few weeks ago and put himself at the head of the protectionist forces of this country as far as a proclamation could put him at the head. He said: "We must have a tariff not only for the production of revenue but we must have a tariff also for the building up of our industries. He proclaimed himself then and there a high protectionist. There has been a great evolution because last year in this House he was promising a revision of the tariff and, we understood, a revision downwards. He was at that time hobnobbing to a considerable extent with western members and promising a revision of the tariff which we understood was to be in a downward direction. He now proclaims that a tariff is needed not only for revenue but for protection, overlooking that he is making a tariff that should perform two completely hostile operations. If the tariff is to build up our industries it must keep goods out of the country. If it is to give us revenue it must bring goods in. There is a stable performance for you! It has to bring goods in and to keep them out, at the same time conducting two completely different operations.

My right hon. friend has given some other examples on instability in regard to the tariff. He and the Government of which he was a member came into power in 1911 pledged against free wheat. We were told that free wheat would ruin the country, break up the British Empire and turn the traffic on our railways north and south instead of east and west. They were pledged against free wheat. I remember his maiden speech in which he said that the great province of Ontario had spoken and was it not the part of wisdom to listen to it? But my right hon. and stable friend gave us free wheat which he said would ruin the Empire.

For three and a half years after the war began he told us that the Income Tax was the most impossible consideration for Canada that could enter the mind of any Finance Minister, and that it could not be thought of. He talked against the imposition of the Income Tax but he imposed it himself. It was imposed by my stable friend the ex-Minister of Finance. He was still the Minister of Finance at the time that tax was imposed. This criticism applies as much to the Government as to himself except that there was this difference: that some of them had not a past Liberal record as being in favour of a tariff for revenue only. I understood that an outstanding figure in that regard is to be seen in the person of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). No reed which ever shook its slender tip in the summer wind could compare with the ex-Minister of Finance as an emblem of instability.

I revert for a moment to the question of tariff revision, and I want to say, and say it with the utmost seriousness, that in my opinion the immediate future prosperity—yes, the immediate future financial solidarity, honesty and stability of this country, depend upon a revision of the tariff downward and that very speedily. At this point in my remarks I would say that the basis for that very strong and emphatic statement is the opinion—not my own opinion—but the opinion of everybody who is worth listening to in Canada upon this subject. We must increase the commerce of this country—export and import. We must increase the commerce of this country in the years immediately in front of us—export and import. What does Mr. Lloyd Harris who has had a remarkable chance of forming an opinion upon this subject, say? What do our great financial leaders say? What do Sir Vincent Meredith, Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor and Sir Edmund Walker say? Every one of these authorities says just what I have proclaimed though I admit they attach more importance than I do to an excess of exports over imports, although I will show you presently why we must have an excess of exports over imports. The commerce of the country must be increased and my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) put the matter in a way which cannot be disputed when he said the other night that ships do not sail loaded one way to come empty the other. The only way you can carry on foreign commerce is to import—to sell exports in exchange for your imports. I mention the same authorities, Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor and Sir Edmund Walker, as concurring substantially in the statement that in the years immediately before us we need to export $200,000,000 worth of produce, roughly, to pay the foreign liabilities of our people—to pay the interest on money that Canadians in various capacities have borrowed from abroad we need to export every year $200,000,000 worth of produce, because that is the only form in which you can pay that interest. Mr. Speaker, that is a very serious liability for any country, but it is a tremendous liability for a young country like this, loaded, as we are, with our own internal troubles as well. Now, I want to proceed to another position: that for the payment of that liability; for the payment of that interest; for the procuring of that excessive export, you must depend largely upon your agricultural produce. Agriculture and kindred industries must carry the load. The immediate future of Canada depends to a demonstration—and I am trying to be as logical as I can—on the extent to which you promote the free production of your fields, the free production of your cattle ranches, the free production of your forest, the free production of your mines, because it is demonstrable to absolute proof that that is the way you must get the goods to pay your external liabilities.

I do not often burden the House with a large number of figures, but I want to give, in round numbers, some figures which, I think, will carry home pretty substantial proof of the position which I have just taken. I have here the figures of our total export and also the figures for the exports of our agricultural produce,—that is, the produce of the farm and the ranch—for the last five years. If the House will allow me I will cut out the thousands and the hundreds and give the figures in millions. In 1916 the total exports of Canada amounted to $741,000,000, and the exports of the farm and the ranch were $352,000,000. Even at that time, when we were in the middle of the war and our exports were inflated by munitions, note the tremendous proportion of our exports that consisted of the produce of our agriculture alone. In 1917, our total exports were $1,151,000,000, and our total exports of agricultural produce were $501,000,000. In 1918 our total exports were $1,540,000,000, and our total export of agricultural produce, $739,000,000. In 1919 our total exports were $1,216,000,000, of which $469,000,000 were produce of the farm and the ranch. But here is the most significant figure of all: for the first nine months of the fiscal year 1920, when munitions had gone out, the total exports amounted to $941,000,000 and the produce of the farm and ranch, $545,000,000,—much more than half our entire exports. Add to that the produce of the mine, the forest and the fisheries and have I not gone far, Sir, to prove my case when I state that you must depend upon the produce of your agriculture for the discharge of your foreign obligations?

We have to remember something further at this point: that the figures I have just given all apply to the war and the demobilization period, and, therefore, to a period during which there was enormous inflation of prices. There will be a decrease of prices, and we shall still have our $200,000,000 to pay in the shape of interest. What does that teach us? Surely that nothing will meet our case except an enormous increase in the volume of that very produce or otherwise we shall not be able to meet our financial liabilities as a nation. No other conclusion is derivable from the figures I have given,—and here I am talking no party politics; I am talking the best I know for the good of the nation to which we all belong and of which we are all proud. I hope that hon. gentlemen on all sides of the House will look into this matter carefully and receive my argument in the spirit in which it is given. It is an urgent national situation; yet we tax agricultural implements and place obstacles in the way of our foreign trade in the shape of a tariff wall, and a high tariff wall at that.

There is another matter to remember in this connection. The nations of Europe will get into their industrial stride, I think, faster than into their agricultural stride. In Germany and Austria you have very large industrial skill and manufacturing ability. The war has taught us that each nation needs the co-operation of all the other nations of the world; so these nations are looking all over the world for a market in which they can place their products. They are looking to the Argentine, where there is a nominal duty only on agricultural implements,—five per cent I think—with a view to selling their manufactured products there. With what results? That ships crossing the Atlantic from these countries which are rebuilding their business will sail to South America instead of to the northern portions of North America. That is the inevitable result if we keep the duty on implements as we have it and if we continue to keep up a high tariff war against international commerce.

While on this matter I recall that something has been said about key industries in the Old Country. There was for a time a belief in some quarters that the Old Country would desert her traditional free trade faith, and there was talk of some key industries,—I am not sure that my hon.

friend the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) did not give an address to the Ottawa Board of Trade in which he mentioned that the Old Country was looking after her key industries. Well, it is amusing in that connection to recall that Lord Selborne's committee which sat for the purpose of finding out what was the best way of promoting the good of agriculture in the Old Country, advocated the production of all the food in Great Britain that the British people needed to eat. That was one of the findings of that agricultural committee,—and, Mr. Speaker, the Old Country could do it. If she devoted herself to agriculture of as intensive a kind as is followed in Denmark and Holland, she could produce far more food than her people require. But she has more sense. What is the use of her breaking her neck to produce wheat when she can buy far better stuff from us at a far cheaper rate, selling us in turn, her manufactured goods,—better than we can make—if we have the sense to let her? Our Canadian wheat cannot be beaten anywhere; we can sell it in exchange for the beautiful cotton goods of Lancashire, which equally cannot be beaten anywhere,—that is the way to expand your trade. But I should like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), if he is touching on key industries at all, what would happen to us in Western Canada if the suggestion of Lord Selborne's committee with regard to what it looked upon as the cardinal, key industry of Britain was carried out and Britain produced all the food that she required? What would the farmers of Portage la Prairie and Red Deer think of that state of affairs? It would be rather awkward; we should lose all our market. I mention this just as an illustration of what, after all, appears to be the silliness of protection.

I have very much pleasure in agreeing with many of the praises bestowed on my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). I think he did an extremely brave and wise thing, and the only defensible thing, when he put the actual condition of the finances of the country before the people and Parliament. The removal of the seven and a half per cent duty was good as far as it went. The cessation of borrowing is an absolute necessity for the good of the State. Economy, which he promises to practise—in that he will have difficulty with some of his colleagues —is all important. Just on that head I may observe that there are two ways of improving a bad financial position, whether it be on the part of the individual or on the part of the State. You can raise more income. That will improve your condition, but that is a much safer thing than in the case of an individual than in the case of a State. As regards some ministries, I do not think it is safe for them to have too big incomes, as they are custodians of the people's money—and that is true in the case of this Ministry. There are also some human beings who would be better off if they had less to spend. Still, I would, on the whole, rather trust an individual than the Government of any country with a big income. It is better for Governments if they have just sufficient income to carry on, except of course, when they have a large debt to take care of, as is the case in Canada at the present time, and I do not think we are at present in a position to form a sinking fund for the extinction of our debt. One way to reduce the debt of a State is to raise more income, but a far more salutory method is to spend less, and the latter operation is a vitally important step in what is all important as regards the finances of this country at the present moment. That is, a determined effort should be made to bring our daily expenditure within the limits of our daily income, and as far as I can see there is plenty of room for this Government to make large strides along the road of public economy, which Cobden describes as public virtue.

Like the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon), I listened very carefully to the most important and startling speech made the other day by the hon. member for Guysborough and Antigonish (Mr. J. H. Sinclair), in a small House, there being certainly not more than two ministers and very few members on the Government side present. I venture to take what is perhaps an unusual parliamentary course of procedure in quoting three of the statements that my hon. friend made in that speech. He stated on his authority—and he is a pretty careful man—that in a volume recently issued of the Auditor General's Report there was an item of $119,000,000 which was unaccounted for. The minister does not know where that money has gone; the deputy minister does not know where it has gone, and the Auditor General has it marked down "unaccounted for." That is a very startling statement. My hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) further stated that on four or five pages of the same volume of the Auditor General's Report there are twenty-four cases of individuals whose names are mentioned, going to some department or subdepartment or another—we have so many of these things that you do not know where you end—and getting sums ranging from $100 to, I think, $220 right into their hands and those sums are marked down in this volume of the Auditor General's Report as "unaccounted for." The name of the individual getting the sum, $100, $150, $200, of public money is printed right in the report, and no account is given of what was done with this money. Some economies could surely be effected in that direction. I am not stating these opinions on my authority; I am quoting from the speech of my hon. friend, and I hope whoever replies to me will give some information as to where this money has gone.

My hon. friend further stated that, according to a return issued about the beginning of this session, the Civil Service Commission had appointed fifty civil servants every day from the date of the Armistice to the date of the issue of that return. I give these statements for what they are worth. They were apparently not worth very much to the Ministry, because not even a private member was put up to reply to my hon. friend, and the hon. member for Gloucester seemed astonished at that. The only explanation I can offer is that, when statements of that seriousness as regards the expenditure of public money are made in this House and no reply is forthcoming from the ministerial benches, I am bound to remind myself that the nearer an autocracy gets to its doom, the more autocratic it becomes.

Without going into the past, there is plenty of room for warning as regards economy in public expenditures. I have told the Government again and again of instances where they could save money and of things they went into that they should never have gone into, and I wish to issue a warning now. The other day in a copy of, I think, a Canadian illustrated magazine, courteously sent to me, I read very carefully an article entitled the "Case for Shipping Subsidies." I wanted to see what the case was because I had not been able to see it on my own account, neither did I find it in the article. What do you think, Mr. Speaker, the writer gave as an argument in favour of granting shipping subsidies? These are temptations that come to Governments, especially amateur members of Governments—I mean politically amateur—and they are supported by arguments of this kind. The writer of the article favouring shipping subsidies said that Great Britain could build ships 50 per cent more cheaply as regards labour than Canada could, and further, that she turns out 15 per cent more finished work in a given period of time. Mark that, Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless, we have in this country a Government that expect they can embark with success in a shipping industry. I am dumbfounded that they should ever think so. Who, in his private life, would want to embark to any great extent in a business in competition with another person who could employ labour half as cheaply and get 15 per cent more done by that more lowly paid labour in any given period of time? As regards shipping, I noticed the other day in a leading article in The Times, the statement made that there are on the seas to-day 4,000,000 tons of shipping more than there were just before the war. The amount of tonnage is increasing every day; the United States, for instance, are very busy constructing ships. I throw out these facts and arguments with, in addition, the confident statement that freight rates must in a very short period come down, against any temptations that are held out to the Government in the way of granting shipping subsidies.

I should now like to say something about the new taxes. I was wondering this forenoon what Bernard Shaw would say if he were to come to Ottawa. Without coming to Ottawa, he said the other day that it looked as if the other planets were, at the moment, using this planet for a lunatic asylum. I imagine him coming to Ottawa and emerging from the central station on to the plaza. The first thing he would see would be that on the railway buildings the time would be, say two o'clock and on the Government buildings, three o'clock—the time arranged on the one hand by the railways and on the other by the municipality, with the Government concurring in the action of the municipality. Last year, the Government took a hand in the matter and were eventually beaten out by the railway companies. I will not dwell on that further than to remark that this is a funny country. Mr. Bernard Shaw comes up to the Parliament Hill and he finds that we are seriously discussing a bad system of taxation which died out on the other side some two centuries ago, and I am sure he will be confirmed in his opinion that this planet is being used for the purpose which he has described. In the first place, these taxes should be rechristened. They are called "excise" duties, and I appeal to the minister in this connection. By the way, very little that I say in the way of criticism applies to the minister personally. He has newly come into the Government; he has hardly found his feet amongst them, and I have no doubt he did not have anything like full responsibility for these taxes. If he did, if he has done all this off his own bat, he has preferred a tremendous indictment against the Government of which he is a member, because if these taxes are good, if they are defensible, and are going to raise us $100,000,000 a year, they should have been put on six years ago at the beginning of the war—$600,000,000 from this source would be a very tangible reduction of the national debt we are now labouring under. I should like the Government and Parliament and the people of this country to consider that; if these are good taxes, if they are defensible, they should have been put on six years ago. As I say, if my hon. friend is wholly responsible for these taxes he has got the Government into frightful hot water in regard to the operations they undertook before they had the benefit of his services.

I return to the point that these are not "excise" duties at all. I very much question if there ever were any such duties imposed in the world. I said that they were a bad imitation of what used to go under the name of excise duties on commodities in Great Britain. In 1643, nearly four hundred years ago,— just about a suitable period for a really Tory government to go back for its precedents — there were duties something like these on goods brought from Holland into England, but I doubt if they were placed direct on the consumer. I do not think they were. They were collected in bulk, just as excise duties are now in England. Real excise duties, such as those on spirits, for example, are not collected from the consumer. If a man wants a glass of whisky he is not asked to pull an extra cent out of his pocket. They would not undertake a ridiculous procedure of that kind—a man would not have time for it late at night. I is recorded of these duties in England, however they were collected that they were most unpopular, and I dare say that the Government individually and collectively have already had evidence that their taxes are not likely to be much more popular here. Their unpopularity was very well shown by Dr. Johnson, a good old English Tory, who described them as "a hateful tax levied upon commodiites and are judged not by the common judges of property but by wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid." I repeat that these duties are not excise duties as the word is understood. An excise duty has had a precise meaning for at least a century of time. I have fortified myself with authority on this question. Webster in his dictionary says that an excise duty is:

> An inland duty or impost laid on articles produced and consumed in a country.

That is an excise duty. It has always been placed on a home produced article, and it is not placed on the consumer. It is placed to save the consumer from being taxed more than he should be. It is placed so that the Government gets the excise duty in lieu of the tariff which is placed on the article coming in from abroad. The Encyclopedia Britannica defines an excise duty as:

> A duty charged on home goods, either in the process of their manufacture or before their sale to home consumers.

The tax is placed before the article is sold to the consumer, to protect the consumer. But there is no question of home goods in these taxes. If one goes to buy any of the goods in these almost wholesale lines which are in the schedule at the end of the Budget Speech, he will not be asked whether this article came from abroad or was produced in Canada. All he will be asked, under these proposals, when he buys a $50 suit of clothes is whether he has an extra $5, and if he does not have it I presume he cannot get the clothes. That is all he is asked. He is not told where the suit came from. He is simply taxed $5, and has that $5 taken from him. It is a case of catching a man buying in these many lines of goods and fining him for a legitimate operation between him and his neighbour. It is not an excise duty at all. It is an arbitrary proceeding. One should not in the main debate on this subject dwell on details and anomalies, because if the Budget carries on the second reading—and I suppose it will, because a government that is supported by a majority under certain conditions can get almost anything. In this House anyhow, we have had examples of that. We supported daylight saving by a huge majority one year and killed it the next year with just as big a majority, and nobody paid much attention to either of our operations—I suppose the Budget will be carried, but there are some terrible anomalies in the thing. The fact of the matter is that it is a totally arbitrary method of taxation, and there is no principle as to the incidence of the tax. If a man goes to buy a $20 suit of clothes he is not taxed at all. If a returned soldier who, after all, has as much right as anybody else to wear a respectable suit on Sunday, goes to buy a $50 suit of clothes and he just has the extra $5 necessary to give to the Government, he pays his $55. The millionaire goes and gets his $150 suit, and I suppose he will pay $15 in taxes. If I were a millionaire I would pay the tax very cheerfully under those conditions, but I am not so sure about the returned soldier or the working man who just manages to scrape together $55. There is no equality or decency in the incidence of a tax of that kind. It is wholly indefensible, and I am not sure that anything like it has been done in history, until something like it was done in the United States, and the department sent some all-sufficient individual down there for five minutes to look at the thing and he said, "This is the pure cheese." This is another piece of imitation the Government are giving us, if this is an excise duty, but I think I have proved it is not.

What is it? In some respects you might say it is a levy on capital. That has been talked of on both sides of the water as a method of raising money to meet war obligations, but I do not think anybody with preciseness in his make up would want to define this as a levy on capital, and I am sure no supporter of the Government would because, if it is a levy on capital, it is in many cases not a levy on the capitalist. The levy on capital I want is the levy on the capitalist, the man who has some capital worth levying on. So I think we may dismiss that. Then what is it? We have to classify this thing. It is a new species in the fiscal zoological garden and we have to classify and describe it. If it is not an excise duty, and not a levy on capital, what is it? What does it bear most resemblance to? When a taxable article is brought into this country we place a Dominion officer at the port in buttons and blue coat and pay him a salary and he collects the money. That is a tariff against external goods, and, as I hold, against external trade. But in the case of the duties on all these lines of goods you do not have an officer to do your business. You do not pay him to give a license to the buyer even to do the collecting for you. But that does not alter the rule. This is an internal tariff and it will have, and it is having to-day—and it is a splendid object lesson from that point of view—exactly the effect which an external tariff has on the commerce and life of a nation.

That leads me to an enumeration of objections which I think are cardinal and insuperable to this form of taxation. As this is an internal tariff, and it cannot be defined in any other way, my first objection to this whole line of taxation is that it is practically an enormous increase of the tariff on whole lines of articles by a government that in the same breath is promising revision of the tariff, presumably downwards. That is my first real objection to this taxation. My first general objection, of course, I have already dealt with; that there is nothing like it in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. But my first real objection to this taxation is that it is a huge boost of the tariff in the case of long lists of articles in some cases by ten per cent, in others by twenty per cent, in others by thirty per cent, and in others by fifty per cent. It is a huge boost of the tariff. It is nothing else, and cannot be otherwise described, and the mischief of it is that in many cases the Government have boosted things thirty per cent which they should have boosted only ten, and in other cases have boosted only ten when they should have boosted thirty per cent. There is a tax of ten per cent on candies, for example. Well, I am told that young people who go to dance halls in large numbers in this and other cities throughout the country eat a lot of candy, and a young fellow never thinks he does properly by his girl unless he gives her a $2 box. If you wanted to tax luxuries, I would have put that young fellow in the thirty per cent class. Keep him at home more nights in the week; there would be less money spent on candies, and it would make more for the good of the community. But the Government encourage that kind of thing. Then they put a thirty per cent tax on Pain Killer. I have no brief for patent medicines, but Pain Killer has been used for so long as a workingman's medicine that I think there must be something useful in it, and I would put it in the ten per cent class. But these things we can thresh out in Committee, if we ever get there, and I have hopes.

My next objection to the tax is that it will be complex and difficult of collection. Another objection to the tax is that it will inevitably lessen business. That is too true, Sir. This tax will lessen business; it will diminish the prosperity, the trade and the accumulation of wealth in the country at a time when we never needed so much to accumulate wealth as we do now. It must do that, and it is exactly what its twin brother at the sea coast does all the time. That is the value of this thing, and that is the value of our study of it in regard to the trade of the country. This internal tariff was not imposed three days till individuals all over Ottawa were going to the stores and cancelling orders. That is a fact that cannot be gainsaid. On the way to this House I met a gentleman in whose word I have implicit confidence, and he told me that one firm in a large line of articles, had lost $400 in trade that had been cancelled, and the reason is obvious. The cost of living is so high, that when a man who has made up his mind to buy a carpet for $150 finds $30 or $40 added to the price he determines to do without it and trade is lost to that extent. He wants a carpet, but he calculates that he cannot afford more than a certain amount, and when a large sum is added to the price which he contemplated paying for the article he prefers to do without it. I have met a great many individuals who have told me of their having cancelled orders. I may say that the same thing is true in regard to myself. I am a poor man and I have made up my mind to deny myself the extra suit which I had intended getting and to go this summer wearing overalls and duck shirts. The Government, I have no doubt, will take enough interest in me personally to congratulate me on that, because they say they are teachers of economy. But they reverse the rule. They have no right to teach me economy in my personal capacity. They have no right whatever to do that; indeed, there are far too many schoolmasters in the country. But I have every right in my capacity as a citizen to inculcate economy on the Government, because it is the money of the public which the Government are taking care of. Let me say, Sir, that there are limits to this practice of teaching individuals economy. Now, if it be a fact that you cancel orders in stores on articles of necessity, what is the effect? The store where orders are cancelled will be dismissing a hand before you know where you are; and to go further back, the factories will be employing fewer workers. What effect will that have on agricultural production? The people will not have money to buy agricultural produce, you will lessen trade, and you will hasten that stagnation which is bound to come before we are much older, according to all the men who know anything about trade conditions. I desire to revert for a moment to the question of economy on the part of individuals. When I spoke on the Address I said I doubted very much the soundness of the doctrine that individuals should be exhorted to economize in order to help the State at this time. What a man does with his own money, so long as he does not do anything that is not within the law, is no business of anybody's. It was my privilege at one period of my life to enjoy from time to time brief private conversations with one of the greatest men in the Empire to-day, Lord Morley, then John Morley, the member for Newcastle; and having a good deal of Scotch training in regard to the value of "thrupence." I remember saying to Mr. Morley: "There is a passage in one of your essays which I have been reading lately that rather puzzled me. You refer to the cant of having few wants." He said: "Well, I cannot at all recall having written such a passage, but it is just what I would have written; don't you think that it is the part of a high civilization for every one to have lots of private wants and to be able to supply them in a legitimate way?" I confess I could not reply to him; I thought he defended very well his criticism of that old doctrine of having few wants. But that same gentleman would have been the first to come in and preach, as I have often heard him preach on public platforms, that the duty of the Government is to economize because they are taking care of the money of the public. They are the nations' housekeepers, and as a matter of public uprightness and governmental righteousness it is incumbent upon them to take the best possible care of the peoples' money.

These taxes, therefore, I repeat, will be complex and difficult to collect. They will lessen business; they are lessening business at the present time. Furthermore, they will increase the cost of living in very many respects; there is no doubt about that. So far as the cost of any given article is concerned, they increase the cost of living at the point of the revolver. You go into a store and you are told that you have to produce $5 extra on a suit of clothes costing $50; otherwise you cannot do any business. That is increasing the cost of living with a vengeance, and yet we are all saying that it is our primary duty, in order to alleviate the unrest which exists in the country to-day, to decrease the cost of living as far as we possibly can. We all say that our object should be to lower the cost of living, but the intelligent rows of hon. gentlemen opposite me, who have been working their brains to see how the cost of living is to be reduced, are going to vote for the principle of a Budget which, on the whole line of absolute necessaries, will increase the cost of living in the most crude and arbitrary manner. The use of that word "crude" in this connection reminds me of a quotation which I am tempted to make, confining its application, however, strictly to the Government. Adam Smith says somewhere that the methods of taxation employed by primitive peoples are generally crude. I will not insult the Canadian people by making them, through all their representatives, responsible for a taxation to which that statement can be applied. I restrict the quotation entirely to the Government. They are a primitive Government, in regard to their taxation at any rate.

The Budget, in the way I have pointed out, increases the cost of living at a time when large numbers of people, with every means of economy which they can devise, are unable to make ends meet. It burdens those who are already burdened to the point of back-breaking, and in that respect I want to say that I except the class to whom I belong. The farmer is not the worst hit by this thing; he can avoid it by wearing overalls and duck shirts. He raises his own food and lives on the land, and therefore I exempt the farmer class from those who are hardest hit. I have said here before, and I repeat, that one of the defects of the Finance Department of this Government during the term of the war has been that it did not get enough out of the farmers when they were making money. We are always being asked "Where can we get more revenue?" If the Government had done a reasonable amount of thinking, or consulted those who were doing the thinking, they could have been told a dozen ways to get revenue. But this taxation does hit the city working man, and what is worse, it hits the veteran. That is who it hits, and that moves me to the special condemnation—the damning charge against this line of taxation is that under it war wealth is left untaxed in any special way, and the profiteers and the millionaires are left practically intact, while you are striking at the men who saved their country and the men who work in the factories with their hands for a daily living. Now these are the characteristics of this taxation as I see it. Some of the statements I have made about it no one can controvert, it is impossible to do so; and yet my hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), claims for the Minister of Finance the quality of courage for putting on this taxation, well, Mr. Speaker, I can only say in regard to that, that you mistake foolhardiness for courage. However, I am willing to waive the point and give my hon. friend the characteristic of courage. He certainly has courage. Any one who becomes responsible for that taxation, whatever other qualities he has, has courage, but I want to say that the members of the Government do not share that characteristic with him.

Now my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a most interesting speech on the evening of the day the Budget was presented. He also said "You see we are coming to direct taxation." I was charmed to hear him. I had been urging that for years and been looked upon as a fanatic for my pains; but here is the most experienced politician in the House —I would not be far wrong if I said the ablest debater in Canada—a man of unexampled parliamentary experience, a man who must be nearer the end of his days than the beginning, who actually says what I have been saying for years—and yet I maintain a reasonable degree of modesty. Of course there is this difference between my hon. friend and myself; he says we must arrive at this very gradually. Gradually we are coming to direct taxation! Well the gradualness of the process was remarkable to behold. We met for the first war session in August, 1914, and I ventured to say something about income tax then. The Government raised the duties on sugar and coffee. They would not put an income tax on—"Oh, no," they said "You cannot collect income tax in this country." And income tax went by for 1914. Of course my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) believes in a gradual approach to direct taxation. The year 1915 came; the first real war session. Burden on the consumer but no income tax! The year 1915 witnessed a flat raise of taxation all around. More burdens for the common people, further protection for the millionaire and the rich man,— no income tax! The year 1916 came. All blank, no income tax, no foresight! All blank, not a cent! The year 1917 came. Then came the foresight. An income tax came along and the thing that could not be collected was collected, and we have been collecting a little more ever since. I give the Government and the Minister of Finance full credit for any raise he has made in the income tax, but it is a very, very, sorry raise, it is a sorry attempt at direct taxation—a very sorry attempt. I give my hon. friend very great credit too for another thing; he states that this income tax has not been well collected. I am glad he has found that out, it is greatly to his credit. We have not got nearly as much out of the income tax as we should have, and now that the Minister of Finance has found it out I am sure he will correct that. The reason we do not have a higher income tax we are told, is, that we must keep step with the States; it would never do to have a higher income tax than they have in the United States. Well, I would never go to the United States, or anywhere else, for an idea that I did not believe in and could not defend on its own merits. I notice that this doctrine that we must keep step with the States is only used by the ministry when it suits their own need—they do not imitate the States in everything. You cannot make the States your guide in fiscal matters. I wish you would in some things. As I say I would defend an idea originating in the United States or Britain, or Timbuctoo, if it was a good thing in itself. But the United States has free boots and shoes, and free agricultural implements. If it be good doctrine that we should keep step with the States in the matter of income tax, why not keep step with them on boots and shoes and agricultural implements? Not at all, it does not suit your book. Then let me give another instance of how you do not keep step with the States, and I want to quote another little table of figures on this point. I have said again and again that our tariff in Canada is a monstrosity compared with the United States tariff, and some of my hon. friends have said: "You ought to prove that." I am just going to prove it. In the United States in the year 1917—and I am using the round figures again—$206,000,000 of duty were collected. In the same year in Canada, while $206,000,000 were being collected in the United States from 110,000,000 people, we collected $167,000,000 from 8,000,000 people. The average rate of duty that year was 7.09 in the United States and 16.8 in Canada. In 1918 the United States collected a total of $172,000,000 and we collected $154,000,000. The average rate of duty in the United States in that year was 5.85, and in Canada 17 per cent. In 1919 the United States collected a total of $249,000,000 from 110,000,000 of people, and we collected $168,000,000 from 8,000,000 of people. Their average duty in that year was 6.52; ours was 17.9. If it be a good thing to imitate the States in income tax, imitate them in tariff too, and get your duty down to an average of 6.52 where the United States tariff is, and has been for the last eight years, and you will make very great progress pari passu as the States have done in the last eight years; because, be it remembered, that the States never made such progress in her history as she has since President Wilson came into power and the Underwood tariff was brought into operation.

Just one more figure in this connection. It brings us nearly to date. The duty collected under the customs tariff in March last in Canada—and this is pretty recent history—was $24,000,000 in round figures, and it came to $3 per head of the population of Canada for the month. I have not the figures for March for the United States, but in the previous month the United States collected $26,000,000, or very little more than was collected in Canada in March. That represents 24 cents per head in the United States. If it is good to follow the States in income taxes, let us get our duty down to 24 cents a month, instead of $3 for every individual; $1.20 per family per month instead of $15 under our tariff. Imitate the States? Yes, where it is good for us to imitate them, imitate them by all means. You should certainly imitate them in the matter of the tariff. I do not think we have come up to them quite in our income tax yet. I have not had time to look into that, nor have I had all the material available, but I question if we are collecting as much by income tax, or at as high a rate, as they are in the United States.

I would not compare ourselves on this question of income tax with the United States. I would compare Canada with other portions of the great Commonwealth of Nations to which we all belong. I would want to see what the sacrifices are that are being made by the little Mother of Nations overseas. What is she doing about the income tax? Her exemption is a very low one. It would be too low for Canada. Her exemption is about $800—£160. She begins to collect income tax then, and how does she do it?—in the most drastic fashion. She charges six shillings in the pound or thirty per cent on the income of her citizens immediately the £160 mark is passed. That is her heroism at home as well as her heroism in the trenches, the heroism in money that our men showed in blood. That is where I would go for an example. I believe our people would do it. I mentioned before that in the course of the war a gentleman in Hamilton actually sent three quarters of a million to the Government and said, "I do not want the stuff; take it; while the sons of Canada are shedding their blood I want to shed my money." The most terrible fault I have against this Government and against the Finance Department is that when the patriotic fervour of the people was at its height, when it was easy for them to be taught the lessons of service and sacrifice, year after year the effort to inculcate that lesson along lines of taxation was avoided and, while gathering their revenue from the tariff upon the consumers, the sheltering wings of the Administration seemed all the time to be cast over those who were making their millions out of the various lines of commerce in the war.

If you do not like the example of the Old Country, then why not go to New Zealand —little New Zealand away in the southern seas? What has she done in the matter of income tax? I have in my possession a quotation and I do not think I need do more than just read that. It is from an article communicated to the London Economist, with a table showing what New Zealand has done. I will not apologize for reading it to the House, because it presents the comparison between Canada and New Zealand in a striking and incontrovertible way:

> Now, as compared with New Zealand, Canada held a favoured position in respect to war orders. Owing to distance from the theatre of war, the scarcity of shipping, and the lack of large industrial plants, the former country could not obtain munition contracts, and, while most of her agricultural products brought substantially higher prices, there was difficulty in exporting them. The population of New Zealand is about one-eighth of that of Canada. Yet in the years 1915-18 inclusive, New Zealand collected in income taxes alone £11,817,124, which at the old rates of exchange is the equivalent of $55,085,620. On the basis of population, Canada, levying the same rates of taxation, should have collected on income and other taxes on wealth a total of $472,684,960. In actual fact during these four years Canada collected nothing in income taxes, and in excess profits and other minor direct taxation a little over $40,000,000. The comparison of the year 1918 alone is particularly deadly. In it New Zealand raised from incomes a total of £5,619,561, which is equivalent to $28,097,803. On the population basis Canada should have raised $204,783,240. But instead Canada raised not one cent on income taxes and only $21,271,038 on excess profits taxes, or about three-fourths of what New Zealand with one-eighth of the population raised by income taxes.

I leave the comparison at that. I leave it at that but it is a hateful thought to me that the country of my adoption, and in which my children and my children's children will live, should come so badly out of this comparison with the little country of New Zealand with her handful of people away in the southern seas. I do not blame the people of Canada. I am bound to blame the Government; I cannot praise them. These facts and figures stare them in the face and it is for them to give the explanation if explanation can be given. If we had collected $204,000,000 a year in money from the beginning of the war, we should have half the war debt we have at the present moment and our position would have been a much more favourable one. But that apparently was too much to hope for because Canada could not come up to the standard of New Zealand in these matters. She did in the trenches—thank God she did in the trenches —but in this other matter we have been frightfully remiss. We know it and everybody who looks into the question knows it.

My reason for bringing this matter up is that we are not doing one bit better now; we are practically leaving the millionaires alone while continuing to burden the consumers just as we have done during these last years and since the beginning of the war. Such is the policy of the Government as I see it. I cannot support it. The amendment after all, does call for a substantial reduction. We are brought face to face with this situation, that when we vote we shall vote either in favour of increasing or of diminishing the cost of living in this country. We cannot help ourselves; we cannot get away from that conclusion. If we vote for a substantial reduction of the tariff and against the Budget we shall vote for a reduction in the cost of living.

This is a very serious consideration for some of my hon. friends opposite. We shall vote either to increase or diminish trade. That has been proved. Internal trade is being diminished by this legislation at the present moment. We who vote for a reduction of the tariff will vote for an increase of trade. Those who vote for the Budget will vote for diminishing the internal trade of the country and therefore will vote for diminishing production. It follows that we who vote for the amendment will vote for an increase in the prosperity and wealth of the country. Those who vote for the Budget will vote for a diminution in the wealth and prosperity of the country. The amendment is not drawn by us who sit in this little group to your left, Mr. Speaker. If it had been it would have been a stronger article. But I cannot avoid voting for the amendment, and I do not know how in the world the hon. the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder) was ever got to swallow this Budget, because he once believed the same about the tariff that I do. What influence has been brought to bear upon him, or how he has been mesmerized I cannot tell because in the general course of his human intercourse he has more often been the mesmerizer than the mesmerized. On this occasion he has been mesmerized; he must have been. I wonder if it is not too late for him to mend? How well that huge brain would look on the cross benches. I would very much like him to pay attention to what I say; to give serious consideration to my modest and humble invitation.

And what about my friend from Neepawa (Mr. Davis) and my hon. and gallant friend from Skeena (Mr. Peck), whom I see before me? And there are others,—my hon. friend from Strathcona (Mr. J. M. Douglas) and my very much respected and valued friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan)—are these gentlemen all going to vote for a diminution of the prosperity, the wealth and the trade of the country and for an increase of its tariff and its cost of living? Well, human nature is a funny thing; you cannot tell what it is capable of. I shall watch the operation of their voting with the very greatest interest. As for us, there is no doubt about where we stand.

We are against the Budget. We think the amendment is a little milk and watery. Our policy on the tariff is the tariff policy of the Dominion Council of Agriculture. If we were against the principle of the amendment I do not think we were made to think very much more of it by the speech in which it was introduced by the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). I do not want to say a single word in criticism of that speech; I would only repeat one single sentence of criticism that was passed upon it by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). The right hon. gentleman said: "I was very much pleased with the speech of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's. When my right hon. friend (Sir George Foster) says that about any speech of mine on tariff matters I shall have my head examined by a doctor. I think that is the most effective piece of criticism in one sentence that was ever passed upon a speech in this House. When my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce stands up and says to the Opposition's financial critic, "I was very much pleased with your speech," the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), ought to know very well that he has, fiscally speaking, gone to the devil.

Now, I am having a little crow to pick with the Official Opposition. My hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) whose attractive personality makes him an object of the love of every one in this Chamber, went down to a by-election in Montreal, and he said, in so many words: "I am in favour of a well-regulated protection of Canadian industry." Well, he is no good for the cross benches; I may tell him that out of hand; there is no place for him here. But he can line up splendidly with the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) who went out to Winnipeg and said that he believed in a moderate tariff. "Well-regulated protection" and "moderate tariff" are very close to one another. For the life of me I do not see why the Minister of the Interior and my hon. friend from Beauce should not be absolutely in the same camp on tariff matters. Would Sir Wilfrid Laurier have said that he was in favour of protection? Never; the word never came from his lips except by way of condemnation. There has been a retrograde metamorphism upon the part of some members of the Official Opposition. If my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) had been in his place I would have tried to do a little Romeo business on my own account—this Romeo business is getting popular in tariff matters. I have done the best I could with the Minister of Immigration, but he is leaving the Chamber now; he is a very coy and unapproachable spinster.

I would like also to address a word to my hon. friend from Victoria, Alta, (Mr. W. H. White), for whom I have as much respect as for any member in this House, and who is, to my knowledge, almost a free trader. And my hon. friend from East Quebec (Mr. Lapointe) will never say that he is a protectionist. I really would like hon. gentlemen on both sides to consider where they are going to get by these mixed up rations. There is my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy), the ex-Secretary of State. He has very broad and advanced views on the fiscal question; he would never describe himself as a protectionist.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Why not come along and stretch out our number on these benches a bit? Bring the others along, too, and let the Progressive party get the majority and choose the best man from among them to be Prime Minister. I will not tell you who that Prime Minister would be; I hold out no bribes to the Official Opposition.

Contrast these statements. My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's says that under certain circumstances bounties would be all right. He says: "I hold up my hand, theoretically, for free trade." Yes, and he would be prepared to hold out his hands for the bounties; that is the trouble. And my hon. friend from Beauce says: "I am in favour of a well-regulated protection of Canadian industry." I am going to give some quotations now, very brief, not for the purpose of recrimination; not to say whether the Liberal party did or did not do its duty, but to state the progressive fiscal policy that I have believed in all my life, and to give it as affirmed by a man who, being dead, still speaketh. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said before 1896:

> I submit to you that the ideal fiscal system is the British system of free trade.
>
> I come to expose to you the policy of the Liberal party. Let me tell you that the policy may be summed up in the good Saxon word "Freedom," in every sense of the term—freedom of speech, freedom of action, freedom of religious life and civil life, and last, not least, freedom in commercial life.
> I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage; yes, bondage, and I refer to bondage in the same manner as American slavery was bondage; not in the same degree, perhaps, but in the same manner. In the same manner the people of this country, the inhabitants of the city of Winnipeg especially, are toiling for a master, who takes away, not every cent of profit, but a very large percentage, a very great portion of your earnings for which you toil and sweat.

That was sound doctrine, Mr. Speaker, when those sentences were uttered by the voice that is stilled forever so far as this scene is concerned, and it is as profoundly true and more applicable to-day. I am here to claim for the little group by whom we are surrounded that we inherit that doctrine. We are the inheritors of that creed. We come by it honourably. We followed and believed Sir Wilfrid Laurier then, and we follow his teachings now.

Mr. HAY: What is the date of that speech, please?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: These utterances were made either at the 1893 convention, or in speeches immediately preceding. I do not know what that has to do with the matter in hand; the doctrine, not the date, is what matters, as my hon. friend will probably find when he goes to his western constituency.

I was saying that we believe that doctrine is as true to-day as it was at that time. We believe protection is economic bondage. Sixty thousand of the brightest, best and bravest of Canada's sons are lying in France and Flanders to-day because they were prepared to die to accomplish the political freedom of the inhabitants of Europe. Any man deceives himself who thinks that their survivors, and the workingmen, farmers and women of this country, who stood behind them in the fight, are going to submit any further to economic slavery in Canada. It is substantially true that from Confederation to the present day Canada and her people have been owned by a few manufacturers, a few railroad magnates, and a few lumbermen, and we all know that. But the war has changed all that, and an army of emancipation is on the march. The sound of it may be yet as distant thunder, but it is getting nearer every day. The farmers are in that army; the workingmen are in it; the veterans are in it; the women are in it; the best journalistic heads in Canada are in it; men of goodwill of all ranks and classes are in it, and it is marching. We are its outposts for construction purposes. When that army arrives, it will say to all and sundry, whether they be Conservative-Liberals or Liberal-Conservatives: We have come to enter into the inheritance which our sons and brothers died to purchase; we have come to free our beloved land from economic slavery; we have come to put Canada where she belongs in the forefront of the battle of the free and democratic peoples of mankind.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, much as I admire the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and, indeed, envy many of his gifts as a public speaker, I cannot say that I stand altogether appalled at the task of answering his arguments this afternoon. The hon. member has given us an example of the maximum of merit that a speech may reach, without the ingredient of logic and without the assistance of facts. There were, incidentally, as he proceeded, matters that emerged as to which I do not feel myself in possession of all the details and circumstances to enable me to reply. He made mention of certain items in the Auditor General's Report that were marked in that report "unaccounted for," and large items they were. These were referred to first by the hon. member for Guysborough and Antigonish (Mr. J. H. Sinclair). I was not in my place at that time; but I would presume that the items were British or foreign credits, the accounting for which had not yet reached the Auditor General.

and that consequently they appeared in the report in that form. But the hon. member for Guysborough, or the hon. member for Red Deer, knows that if there is anything he does not understand in the Report of the Auditor General, there is a standing committee of this House for the purpose of investigating every item questioned, and although we have been in session three months, that committee has never been called. If there be any reason for calling it, hon. members have it in their power to have it called, and if there be anything dark it will be revealed.

My hon. friend rather surprised me this afternoon by a prolonged and violent attack on what is described as the "luxury tax" of the Budget. He says that this is only a case of more tariff, 10 per cent upon sales of articles of special value; that is upon luxuries so far as luxuries can be isolated and designated by name. All these things, he says, are only additions to the tariff and cannot even enjoy the good name that belongs to an excise tax; there is nothing right about them; they are too big and they are too small; they came too soon and they came too late; everything that he can think of in connection with the luxury tax is wrong. He says: If this were an excise tax, it would be all right, because an excise tax is on home manufactures alone. Well, an excise tax is on home manufactures alone but there is always a corresponding duty against the import of the same goods, and this is exactly the same thing. There is here a tax on the goods produced in Canada, there is a tax on imported goods—there is the corresponding one to offset the other. If the hon. gentleman would have us pay ten per cent extra for a suit of clothes if it were made in Canada and nothing at all extra if it were imported from the United States, do you think, Mr. Speaker, many more suits of clothes would be made in this country? But that is the character of tax my hon. friend (Mr. Clark) says he would support. I would be sorry for the country that ever took the hon. member for Red Deer as its business mentor. My hon. friend says that we know where his political associates stand. I do not know where they stand.

Mr. COWAN: Nor anybody else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: His leader (Mr. Crerar), who sits to his right, was down in New Brunswick not long ago and he told the people of that province that he was against the tariff and that he wanted to raise revenue by a luxury tax. With the leader arguing in favour of a luxury tax and his first lieutenant opposing it, how are we supposed to know where they stand?

Mr. CRERAR: Does the minister consider a $45 suit of clothes a luxury?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If a $45 suit of clothes is not a luxury, then we have a pretty prosperous country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It may be that the limit on certain articles is too low, but does that affect the principle? Would the argument of the hon. member for Red Deer not be just the same against a tax on a $100 or a $150 suit of clothes or against anything in the whole range of the luxury tax? He did not oppose any item in the tax; he opposed the tax on principle, and his leader supports the tax on principle. How then are we to know where they stand? The hon. member for Red Deer says that this tax will add to the cost of living. The reports that have so far come to hand—and they have come direct from dealers in these articles—are to the effect that the tendency has been to bring down the sale price below the limits of the luxury tax. That tendency is in operation and effect.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Where does the revenue come from then?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If we do not get the revenue, no harm is done, and my hon. friend would not oppose the tax; at all events, his objection is gone and we get the economy. Does the hon. member not know that in this country, no matter who should do the teaching, we should have less extravagance and more economy? Will he not admit that?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: On the part of the Government, certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will he not admit that that is necessary on the part of the people? He is silent; he knows he has to admit that. He knows the country stands to gain by a diminution of extravagance, by an increase in economy on the part of every individual. If that be the case, how is it wrong on the part of the Government so to arrange its taxation so as to encourage that result.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: My hon. friend is putting into my mouth words which are absolutely contradictory to what I said. I said that the State has not much to do with an individual's expenditure so long as he spends his own money. If my hon. friend was listening he could not help hearing what I said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know he said that, but I am arguing that he is wrong. If it is in the interests of this Dominion that we have less personal extravagance and more economy why is it wrong on the part of the Government so to arrange its legislation as to aim at that end? The hon. member is silent. I knew he would get silent just at the opportune time.

After getting $81,000,000 by direct taxation, here is a Budget that by a luxury tax and other means seeks to raise $100,000,000 more by direct taxation. That is $181,000,000 by direct taxation, and the hon. member opposes this Budget because there is a luxury tax.

He says he wants more income tax, and presented a rather prolonged argument along that line. He made some strictures on the Administration, strictures that are so commonplace and which have been so often exploded as to come better at this time from a member not quite so intelligent as my hon. friend from Red Deer—strictures on the Administration of saving and sheltering the millionaire and taxing the poor man, and he asks us to follow Britain's example in income taxation. Is he aware that as respects the men of higher income in Great Britain, the tax in Canada to-day is higher on them than is the British income tax?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I shall not accept that statement until proved by exact figures taking into account the super-tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will provide the hon. gentleman with the figures and they will show that beyond incomes of about $200,000 a year, as near as I remember—and I shall have time to get the figures—the tax in Canada exceeds the British tax and has done so for a year, and now we are adding five per cent more to it. We have been on a level with the United States for the last year, and we are now increasing over them by five per cent. The hon. member does not like following the United States in that regard. Well, it is not for the sake of following them that we do it. It is for the sake of seeking to collect the largest revenue we can. We are alongside the United States whether we like it or not. We are a people of eight or nine millions alongside for 4,000 miles a people of one hundred millions. There is no barrier between, no wall there. Capital is mobile, and as soon as you reach the point where it pays capital to go there instead of here, the tendency is likely to be for it to go there, and as soon as you reach the point where it pays capital to stay there instead of coming here, we are not likely to get much capital. It is not that we love their example. It may be all right or it may not. It is because conditions compel us in the interests of Canada to have regard to the level of income taxation that prevails in that country.

The hon. member also talks about New Zealand. Certainly New Zealand has a heavy income tax. New Zealand has had an income tax for twenty or twenty-five years. We have had an income tax for only three or four years. We were not in office twenty or twenty-five years ago, but some of the hon. member's friends were. I might point out that after New Zealand had had an income tax for ten years they were collecting less than a million dollars a year. New Zealand to-day collects a heavy income tax, but they do not collect any profits tax or any corporation tax. They do not collect any of these other direct taxes that are imposed so heavily in this country. New Zealand is not a manufacturing country, but they have so managed their affairs, (much to the delight of the hon. member for Red Deer) that they have to-day reached the point where they have a debt per capita three or four times as great as has Canada. We will reach their point in income taxation at the rate of increase at which we are proceeding, just as soon perhaps as the most ardent income-taxer in this country may desire, and we are a lot closer to them now than the hon. member for Red Deer would give us to understand. If he adds to our income tax our direct taxes, which are not imposed in New Zealand, and that is the only fair way to compare, we are up now to about half of the New Zealand tax per capita, and when he gets the tax of next year, which is a direct tax too, though not of the nature of income taxation in the same way as the corporation and the profits taxes are, the hon. member will have as much direct taxation as will make him as a public man comfortable in any constituency in this country.

My hon. friend devoted a considerable portion of his speech, although less than formerly, to a disquisition on the proper tariff policy for Canada. I purpose following him with some care into a discussion of that subject. The tariff issue has been again forced to the front in public discussion in Canada, and is likely to be there for some time to come. We have two wings of the opposing party, one represented by the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and the other represented by those who, opposite, follow I presume, the leader of the party, at all events follow one of the triumvirate which has shared leadership within itself for the last several months.

As regards the group angularly opposite, the principle that they expound is clearly known. They stand, as the hon. member (Mr. Clark) says, where Sir Wilfrid Laurier stood previous to 1896. I do not think there is any doubt that that is an accurate description of where they stand. They denounce the principle of protection. They denounce all tariffs. They believe that tariffs themselves are a curse, and argue that we should follow instead the example of England and abolish the protective tariff altogether and the "tariff tax", as the hon. member puts it, practically altogether too.

As regards those directly opposite, I am afraid it would be with a smile that they would read the enunciation of the doctrine of Sir Wilfrid Laurier previous to 1896. I watched them as I heard it read this afternoon. There was no clapping of hands, no rejoicing. It brought back to them memories not quite so pleasant as those that fluttered through the mind of the hon. member for Red Deer.

We are opposed by two wings of wholly opposite views, two wings, however, that gather around the motion of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), two wings that hope to go before the people of this country fighting under two flags and under two leaders, to make the pretence all the better, and who hope afterwards to coalesce and entwine the two flags in one in an infamous unity, who hope after taking one camp of public opinion behind them and the opposite camp as well, to the utmost of their power to end up by deceiving both, by betraying both, because they must either deceive the one or doubly deceive the other.

The hon. member for Red Deer points as he has done for ten years in this House, to the example of his native land. If I direct my attention chiefly to the hon. member for Red Deer, it is not that I feel that he is the embodiment or the head of this manoeuvring that is going on and that he is using his great ability as a platform speaker for its own ends. It is rather because he presents the case as an argument on principle. He has placed before us everything that can be said for his cause, and I believe he has placed it before us sincerely. He is a man who has shown his true worth as a citizen, he has shown that he possesses the realities of patriotism, and for him as a man I have the profoundest respect.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Coming to the issue that is now before this House in its naked form, I want to discuss whether we should be led by the example of England as depicted by the hon. member for Red Deer, or whether we should not rather have regard to the experience of Canada, to the experience of the United States, which of all countries, is most like us, to the experience of every advanced nation in the world, and particularly to the actual and true experience of the United Kingdom itself. He tells us, as he has frequently told us, that the United Kingdom is exceedingly prosperous, that it has been given its position of supremacy by a policy of free imports, that it is an example to the outside world, that its trade has advanced all through these years. In that, in some degree, he is correct. He has told us this afternoon that we in Canada must sell more goods than we buy; that it is the only way we can discharge our outside obligations, and he says that we must sell more than we buy to the extent annually of at least $200,000,000 a year. While I am free to admit that British trade has advanced in the last 10 years British trade shows certain features since free trade became the vogue over there that utterly discredit it as a policy for this or any other country that seeks to sell more goods than it buys. And it must be remembered as well that while there has been absolute advance, there has as compared with great rival countries been a melancholy relative decline. Aggregate trade is one thing, but aggregate trade in itself means very little. It is comparative trade figures that tell the tale; it is also the nature of the trade that counts. I do not know that any country is better off—in fact, I know it is far worse off—that buys, as the United States bought for many years, the whole of its tin plate, thereby adding to its import and its aggregate trade. It would seem to me that the United States was better off when it set about revising its tariff and so improved it that later on, in 1913, according to the figures given by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) in a speech pregnant with illuminating facts that go to the heart of this question, it made at home two billion pounds of tin plate in a year. The United States were importing 680,000,000 pounds of tin plate in 1890. This added to their aggregate trade, it is true, and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) would possibly think that was a glorious achievement. But they set about changing their policy, and instead of importing 680,000,000 pounds and making only 2,000,000 pounds at home, they imported 28,000,000 pounds and finally were making 2,000,000,000 pounds in their own country.

Now, coming to Great Britain, the remarkable fact about the position of that country to-day—and they know it over there just as well as we know it and regret it more keenly than we do—is, that while they have an aggregate trade which I think is second in the world, (being next to that of the United States of America), they are selling in the world to-day something over $3,000,000,000 worth of goods and are buying over $7,000,000,000 worth. They are buying at the present rate almost $2 for every $1 they sell, and that is directly the consequence of the trade policy they have pursued. The United States, on the contrary, with a bigger aggregate trade, is selling $8,000,000,000 worth (round numbers) and is buying only $3,000,000,000 odd, a balance in their favour of goods sold over goods bought—and surely that is what counts—of over $4,000,000,000 annually. Such was the balance in their favour in the year 1919. It was almost that in 1918, almost that in 1917, and back to the year 1893, you cannot find a year in American history in which they have not sold more than they have bought.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: May I interrupt my hon. friend? I do so only to elucidate the argument. Does my hon. friend really think that his argument, at the end of the war, is worth the breath expended on it? He should give figures prior to the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I went back to the year 1893 and that is quite a while before the war. If the hon. member seeks to dispute in any way whatever the facts I have stated, I have the exact figures before me. He will find that last year's American imports were $3,904,000,000 and its exports $7,922,000,000, and he will find for the year before the figures that are relatively the same. I can give the hon. gentleman the returns right back to the year 1860, and until he gets back at least to the year 1884 he will find only three years in American history, the last year being 1893—a long while before the war—when they did not have a balance in their favour of an immense sum as against the adverse balance of England. There was a time when things were not thus.

Before and at the year 1850 England had a favourable balance of trade. The hon. member, who reveres the memory of Cobden and Peel, will know that it was just before 1850 that they abolished the Corn Laws in the Old Country. In 1850 they had a balance of trade in their favour, but they did not hold it very long, and from about 1850 to the present day the trade of Great Britain has shown an adverse balance every year, at least every decade year; they have been selling less than they have bought, until to-day it is a case of almost two to one, and the situation is getting worse all the time. It is a remarkable fact that the year 1850 marks the turn when the change took place in the trade balance of Britain. Some years after that they had annually about £150,000,000, or some $700,000,000 against them, and as they approached 1913 and 1914 the adverse balance kept on increasing, and in the years 1917, 1918 and 1919 it had reached colossal totals indeed. Now, I know that the years of war were certainly not normal years, and British trade suffered severely. But since the war the same story is being told. The balance against Great Britain last year was no less than £670,000,000, and for the first three months of this year the trade returns show that they had a balance against them there of £170,000,000 which multiplied by four for the aggregate of the year, gives us a total of £680,000,000, a worse situation than that of the 12 months before. British trade is increasing because prices are increasing and because transportation facilities are increasing, but that adverse trade condition is present to-day in an even more aggregated form than at any time before in the whole trade history of Britain. In the United States, I repeat, the contrary has been the case. Since the year 1893, they have never had an unfavourable balance. Their people have become richer year by year, in that they bought less than they sold to the outside world. On the business done at home the United States was improving its position year by year, and so was Germany, and so was Canada. But that was not so in regard to Great Britain. Canada last year had a balance in its favour of $222,000,000; the year before some $300,000,000 odd; the year before a little more than that. It was only about the year 1915 that we caught up. Previous to that we had balances against us, as every new country has. But Great Britain should long ago have been in the position where its exports should far have exceeded its imports.

Now, the hon. member will no doubt ask me this question: How is it they get along when they are paying out every year £670,000,000 more than they are buying? Well, they get along for this reason: They asserted their supremacy as a commercial nation away back in the last and the preceding century. Great Britain was in those times the wealthiest nation by far on the face of the globe. Their people have had their money invested and year by year they have been investing more. Their returns from outside countries are great and they have investments as well on all the seas of the world. While last year they lost £670,000,000—"lost" is hardly the correct term to use; I should say, while they were behind about £670,000,000 in their balance of trade last year—they had an income of £520,000,000 from ocean transportation earnings, money invested in ships that were traversing the world, and from investments in the United States, and in Canada, and in other lands. They had £80,000,000 from certain outside investments, £40,000,000 from other outside banking and insurance earnings. These with £400,000,000, returns from their shipping interests all over the world, make a total of £520,000,000 in all to put against that £670,000,000 which they were behind in trade. Now, is it to be the policy of this country so to arrange its trade activities that we should have to make up every year by investments in other lands what we lose by making at home and selling less goods than we buy? Are we to direct our efforts to encourage our people to invest in the United States or to invest in France, Australia or New Zealand? What does it all result in? It results in the accumulation of money in the hands of a few people and not in the multiplication of industries, except in foreign lands. Money that represents the accumulated energy of the British people is spent to-day to expand the industries of the United States and of Australia, and South Africa and even of China. There is no doubt about that. And the result is—while it is putting it somewhat strongly, in substance it is true—a tendency to make the people over there, while solvent and while perhaps they are getting wealthier by reason of these investments, a nation of remittance men, and at the same time, to use the words of John Barnes, the Labour leader in England, to being a sea of workless workers surging around their doors.

It is not very long since the hon. member for Red Deer told this House that the condition of labour was most desirable in England and better than in this country and in the United States.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Not this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, better than in the United States; but that does not modify the statement in principle in any degree. Well, I think the hon. gentleman has respect for the authority of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and he no doubt knows the celebrated statement of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in 1905 that there were 13,000,000 of the British population who were at or below the line of poverty, not having enough to eat.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Has the hon. member the quotation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes; I have it here in a book written by Messrs. Gray and Turner. Mr. Gray is an economist of Britain who has done much investigational work in this country and in the United States. He is a graduate of Oxford. I do not know who Mr. Turner is. They quote Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman as saying that "there are about 30 per cent of the British population on the verge of hunger;" that is about 13,000,000. In another work I have, it is put at 13,000,000 definitely; and Sir William Booth, who spent many years investigating the subject in the cities of England, and particularly in London, gives the number at 30.7 per cent who are below the poverty line. And Mr. Booth gives the cause as chiefly unemployment. Mr. Rowntree also, who is a celebrated authority—all these people are British people, not Americans—says that the same thing is true of every part of Britain as of the city of London.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does my hon. friend not know that Mr. Rowntree is a temperance reformer?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: He is a temperance reformer and attributes the poverty to drink.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what he attributes it to but is it not better to have as authority a man who is not interested in trade matters, and therefore not prejudiced, than a man who is prejudiced. This work (Gray and Turner's) is not written on trade subjects at all, it is written on social subjects. They present these facts in order that they may teach—not that there should be a tariff, that is not the purpose of the book; the purpose of the book is wholly different, it is to teach the value of improved methods. Consequently these men are not saying, or colouring, these things in order to make an argument against free trade; although it is not hard to tell what their opinions are. I quote this from those authorities:

It is generally known that American wages are from two to three times as high as the British wages. They are so very much higher than British wages because American production per man is from two to three times as great as is British production, as has been shown in sections 1 and 2.

Again we find these statements:

Those who know America and the British Dominions well are aware that not only are wages from two to three times as high as they are in this country, but that the workers live far better than they live over here, that they are better dressed, better fed, and are able to put by substantial sums of money.

In America, generally speaking, working hours are shorter than in Great Britain, and work is less arduous.

I would like to direct attention to these statements by men of authority, by men who have spent their lives in a study of this question —particularly the attention of the hon. member for Temiskaming (Mr. McDonald). Such statements could be cited page after page throughout this book; but the case is admitted by the British people. Mr. Lloyd George, stated before the Imperial Conference in 1907 that the degree of unemployment with which they were confronted in Great Britain was very "unpleasant to contemplate," and following that he said: "that undoubtedly the conditions of employment in Germany were far better than they were in England" and they were undoubtedly better in the United States. Further than that, at the time Great Britain was in this position, at the time Mr. Lloyd George made these statements, Great Britain was losing in population, chiefly her working men, at the rate of 225,000 a year. In 1907, 237,000 of her people left those happy shores, and at the same time Germany was gaining more in population, by immigration of working men, than she was losing. In 1906, 600,000 workingmen from other countries went into Germany and helped to enrich that protected country and that in great degree at the expense of Great Britain herself. Between the years 1850 and the year 1908, 12,000,000 people left British shores, and many millions of them entered the United States. All this was going on under the aegis of free trade with results which I shall describe a little more fully later on.

If the hon. member thinks—and he has argued it time and time again—that free trade is a great boon to the agriculturist why does he not contemplate his own native land. When free trade came into effect—I have the exact official figures before me from the statistical department—the proportion of agricultural population to the whole population of the British Isles was 49.8 per cent, or practically one-half. In the year 1913, before the war, that had been reduced to 21.9. One-half of the whole population when free trade came into effect, was agricultural; one-fifth of the whole population agricultural after it had been in effect for about 70 years.

Such is the result on agriculture. I give Mr. Lloyd George again as my authority for the statement (I feel sure it was he; anyway it is true) that between 1870 and 1905 3,000,000 acres in Great Britain went out of production in corn, and that in the year 1905 there was less wheat land in cultivation than had gone out of wheat production since the introduction of free trade. One million men to-day work in Great Britain in the industry of agriculture. There were more than twice that number at the time free trade came in to make them happy and rich! It was the manufacturers and not the farmers who wanted free trade in Great Britain and they had good reason then to want it as I will explain. Lord Macaulay in a speech delivered, I think, on his last election for the University of Edinburgh, about 1851, in ridiculing the antics of the men who opposed his party—I cannot help adopting his language now as regards those who oppose us—said that he did not know where any man stood on this question of free trade or protection. He went into the country and found that there were standards and printed flags, wherever the agricultural population predominated, bearing the legend "Vote for Smith and Protection." But as soon as he got across the river and into the city it was "Vote for Smith and Free Trade." These were the prevailing conditions at that time.

Why did England take up free trade? One never can answer for another but had I been at that time an Englishman, as I am to-day a Canadian, and had I expected as Cobden expected and believed that other countries would follow the example of Great Britain, I would have taken the step that Cobden advised. Why? Because British industries were then in a state of supremacy. They had the lead in magnitude, in perfection of operation and in the skill of their operatives. They had the lead over the industries of every other country in the world and England had more to gain by free access to the markets of other countries than she had to lose by free access being granted to her own markets. But had I been at that time a Canadian, or a subject of the Mikado of Japan, or a citizen of the United States, I would not have consented to follow the free trade example that Great Britain has set to the various countries of the world for the very simple reason that the industries of the United States of America were less mature, than the industries of Germany, that they were in comparison with British industries, infant industries. These countries were, wisely for themselves, opposed to following Britain's example because they had more to lose by unrestricted access to their own markets than they had to gain by unrestricted access to the markets of Great Britain. And being at this time, as I am, a citizen of a country that in relation to the United States, to England, and to many of the great industrial nations, has its industries in a position of comparative immaturity I would say it would be madness—manifest madness—for us to adopt the principle enunciated by or to follow the trail blazed by the hon member for Red Deer.

Great Britain, he says, is the example for us, but still we must have an excess of exports over imports. If Great Britain has a deficit in exports, as compared with imports of $3,000,000,000 a year, how are we by following Great Britain's example going to get an excess of exports over imports which he says we must get to the amount of $200,000,000 a year?

Then he says, "Follow the United States in these matters; there you have a comparatively free trade country." I admire the hon. gentleman's ability in eulogy, and I admire the skill with which he is able to deceive himself. The United States a free trade country! If the hon. gentleman would go to the United States and make a speech such as he has made here to-day, in the presence of any number of its citizens they would not know what to do with him. A free trade country! If there is one country on the face of the globe that has been rigidly, emphatically and consistently protectionist, it has been the United States. I would like to know what the hon. gentleman means when he talks about the United States being a free trade country or a comparatively free trade country. Of course they have got to the position by their policy of protection where they do not have to import much except raw materials or semi-raw materials and raw materials in the United States are free just as generally they are free with us. When a country advances to a state of industrial predominance, it is not going to have very heavy import taxes imposed on the body of its people, because imports will be relatively small.

England, he says, got into its position whatever it is by following the path of free trade instead of adopting the course which the United States pursued. The tariff taxes in England are far greater per capita than they are in the United States and greater per capita than they are in Canada.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: So was their job in the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly their people were equal to the job of the war. They have a great many people of the type of the hon. gentleman himself, and as long as they have men of his blood and of the blood of his family, they may make grave blunders in tariff matters but they will not soon be beaten in war. The fact is that Mr. Austen Chamberlain contemplates collecting next year one and a half billion dollars through his tariff tax some of which is a protective tax. And so the change stealthily comes on. We do not contemplate collecting more than $150,000,000.

The United States, pursuing not a revenue tariff course but a protective tariff course ranging from 40 to 50, 55, 60 and 75 per cent on dutiable articles all down through the past sixty years to the present time, are now in a position where they are selling about $7,000,000,000 worth and buying about $3,000,000,000 worth a year, mainly raw or semi-raw materials. They do not need to import much manufactured goods to-day but Britain has to import manufactured goods and Britain does import manufactured goods and every other kind of goods to a greater extent than any other country in the world.

I mentioned a moment ago that the policy of free trade in England had reduced agriculture to a very low standard of prosperity. That is putting it very gently. No wonder the Lord Selborne Committee to which my hon. friend referred advocated that the people of England should grow more agricultural produce because agricultural production has diminished year by year. They produced less and less of what they consumed all due to this policy. Their farm lands diminished in value. While their farm lands diminished in value and were being abandoned we find that the United States, in the same period, multiplied the value of their farm lands from $19,000,000,000 to $41,000,000,000. In Canada the same thing is going on. It is not long since the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was talking about the abandonment of farms in Canada. I have been through quite a lot of Canada. I have seen many farms being worked that I thought ought to be abandoned because they were never fit to be farms but I never saw a farm abandoned that appeared to be fit for anybody to farm. And the figures are wholly against him—statistics that cannot be denied, gathered officially under the charge of a man who certainly has no political affinity with gentlemen on this side of the House. According to these figures, the average value per acre of farm land in Canada in 1910—and you could go back to 1896; it is just the same story—was $38, while in 1919 it was $52, an increase since 1910 of 37 per cent. Now, a basic asset like that upon which money must be made increases in value only because you can make more money out of it; it could not increase for any other reason. In Nova Scotia, the province from which the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) comes, the value of farm lands increased within the period mentioned from $25 to $41 per acre, an increase of 41 per cent, and in British Columbia the increase was from $74 to $174, an increase of 135 per cent. In every province of Canada the very same process has gone on, so much so that while we have had a tremendous increase in the value of our farm lands—I mean, in the lands actually farmed, because that is what these figures apply to—the value of farm lands in Great Britain according to Mr. Rowntree, went down under Free Trade by £1,700,000,000, or nearly $8,000,000,000.

Our rural population diminished between 1901 and 1911 from 62.35 per cent of the whole to 54.47 per cent—I do not think it diminished in the absolute, but it diminished as compared with the rest of the population. In the United Sates the diminution was very small, from 59.5 to 53.7. But, this diminution which has come to Canada, to the United States and to every country in the world—it is terribly aggravated in Great Britain by reason of their fiscal policy, undoubtedly,—this general diminution in rural population is inevitable; no change of policy can ever alter it. Why? Well, it seems to me that the reason is obvious. The farmer produces food; that is the great product to the turning out of which he applies his energy. As the world advances in population, people do not eat any more food individually; the need of food increases just as the population increases and no more. But as civilization advances the other needs and indulgences of mankind multiply a hundredfold. Transportation needs, clothing needs, entertainment needs, all these requirements advance by leaps and bounds, whereas food remains relatively stationary. Consequently a larger proportion of the world's people are engaged in making these other products and rendering these other services than are engaged in the growing of food. Do what we will, we would be foolish to try to beat back logic itself, and the whole trend and movement of the age. You cannot defeat these things; you cannot conquer economic forces. Our rural population then is diminishing—not in the absolute, but relatively. The rural population of Britain, for the simple reason that their farmers could not begin to compete with those to whom they were exposed to competition by the abolition of the Corn Laws, has gone down precipitately from great to small until to-day it is almost negligible in relation to the rest of the people.

While all this has been going on, have manufactures flourished? Have the great basic industries of England advanced? Did England find herself, when she was confronted with war with Germany, in a position impregnable or even desirable? Why, the story is so plain that everybody knows it. In the great key industries of Britain they found themselves in a position next to humiliation itself. Certainly they pulled through the war; they fought through, muddled through and got through. They got through, and all credit to them, but they got much of their great basic supplies from their Allies. They got their great supplies of iron and steel from other countries on whose friendship they had to depend and without whose friendship their position would have been worse than precarious.

Now when Britain was in the war and under Liberal leadership;—not under the guidance of the present Coalition leader, Mr. Lloyd George, but under the leadership of a man revered by the hon. member for Red Deer, Mr. Asquith—they set about to ascertain why all this trouble was; why it was that they had landed themselves in a position of comparative helplessness and of dependence upon other nations in this regard. I want to lay before this House the facts as to that investigation, in my judgment about as illuminating facts as ever have been presented to the world, on any subject, of commerce or trade.

Mr. Asquith's Government appointed through its Board of Trade, presided over by Mr. Walter Runciman, four committees, one on the iron and steel industry, one on the engineering trades, one on the textile trades, and one on the electrical trades. The committee on the iron and steel trades was composed of seven men. Now, I want the House to keep in mind the fact that these committees were not appointed for the purpose of finding a certain verdict; they were appointed under the leadership of a Prime Minister who was a free trader and who doubtless hoped that free trade would be permanent in Great Britain. They were appointed under the presidency of Mr. Runciman who was also a free trader and who certainly would not engineer his department to bring in a verdict hostile to his own course and principles. But here is the verdict; here is the report, and to it I invite the attention not so much of hon. gentlemen opposite—because in my heart I do not believe that very many of them would disagree with a single line or letter of what I am going to read—but particularly to the attention of hon. gentlemen diagonally opposite, men who, I am bound to assume, are sincere in their discussion of this question; men who have gone up and down the township lines in Western Canada and in Eastern Canada and denounced protection as bondage; men who have pointed to the example of Britain; men who have referred to all whose products receive a protective duty as specially privileged persons—often, indeed, calling them "scoundrels great and scoundrels small." Here is the report of the committee on the iron and steel trades of a committee of Britishers. I do not know what they were before, but I know they were not free traders after they got into the facts:

A comparative examination of the iron and steel industries of the U.S.A., Germany and Great Britain reveals the fact that the proportional capacity of production of these three countries stands in the ratio of 40; 20; 10—

United States four times Britain; Germany twice Britain.

—millions of tons; and a survey of the historical progress of these industries indicates clearly that as a competitor in the markets of the world the United Kingdom has steadily lost ground. In 1880 Great Britain produced 7.7 million tons of pig iron; the U.S.A. produced 3.8 million tons, and Germany 2.7 million tons. In 1900 Great Britain produced 8.9 million tons, the U.S.A. 13.8 million tons, and Germany 6.5 million tons. In 1913, the record year of British iron manufacture, Great Britain produced 10.3 million tons of pig iron, the U.S.A. 31 million tons and Germany 19 million tons.

Forty, twenty, and ten! The committee goes on to say:

In 1880, therefore, Great Britain produced 54 per cent of the total output of the three countries. In 1900 her production was only 28 per cent, and in 1913 it had fallen to 17 per cent.

To-day it is probably 15 per cent of the output of these three countries—flourishing indeed! and all in the absence of "special privilege" and "scoundrels great and scoundrels small." But, to pass on, what is the remedy?

There is a general consensus of opinion among British manufacturers—

The men who wanted free trade in 1846, the men who forced it on agricultural England.

—that the British interests have suffered severely through the action of foreign syndicates which have been free to exploit the British home markets wherever it suited them to do so, while they themselves were protected from reprisal by the protection extended to them by their respective governments, and that British producers were defenceless against the aggressive methods of their foreign competitors.

The general result of these various conditions is that the iron and steel industries of Great Britain have become thoroughly discredited as a field for the investment of capital.

That report is signed by seven men out of the nine, and included in the signatures in favour of the report is that of Mr. John Hodge, labour leader of England and later Minister of Labour in the Government of Mr. Lloyd George. But I find two signatures against it, not of the plain people about whom the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) ranted so much; I find an hon. baronet, Sir Hugh Bell, and what he and a Mr. Davison say was so characteristic of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) that I had to look several times at the signature to be sure it was not "Michael Clark." This is what is said by Mr. Davison and concurred in by Sir Hugh Bell who dissented from the report:

While in agreement with the recommendations, and with the greater part of the report, I wish to record my complete dissent from those passages which appear to suggest the necessity of a change in the fiscal policy of the United Kingdom.

No reasons given. The report is all right, they say; it is true that the British iron and steel industries have gone down almost to decay; it is true, they proclaim, that other countries have taken from us the supremacy that we have enjoyed for years; it is true that we found ourselves faced with a war without such equipment in this great basic industry as would alone enable us to survive; all that is true; we hold up both hands as to the truth of every word of it; but we cannot stand for a change in the fiscal policy of England.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I suppose my hon. friend knows that Sir Hugh Bell is one of the greatest ironmasters in the north of England and, indeed, in the world, and he probably knows what he is speaking about.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That makes it worse than ever.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Why should he not want protection?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because of the very characteristic that—while it is admitted they have many great qualities—very often pervade the citizens of the British Isles, that dogged devotion to custom, obstinately refusing to make a change, that worship of tradition. These, notwithstanding many qualities that have brought them to the forefront of the world, have undoubtedly held them back and handicapped them in a war, and these, as nearly all of them admit now, have cost them thousands and hundreds of thousands of lives to succeed in the struggle, that has passed. Those peculiarities compelled them rather to muddle through instead of being in a position, by virtue of the very superior characteristics of that nation, to win the war at the least possible expense.

We must remember that this report is not the opinion of dogmatists; this is the deliberate judgment after thorough and complete investigation, the full facts of the matter having been laid bare. Does the hon. gentleman contemplate with satisfaction, to use the words of Lloyd George, a change from the position when free trade came on of supremacy in the iron and steel industry down to a ratio of 40 and 20 to 10 against Great Britain and in favour of the United States and Germany? Does he think that is all right? If it is not, how does he expect it is to be overcome? Do not have any artificial means, he says; everything is all right, cure it, somehow, but do not have the Government do anything. That is the policy of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark). Let us see, just by a few more quotations, what these leading Englishmen think of that policy. They say this in the report from which I am quoting:

> The war has taught at once how urgent was the need for vast resources of iron and steel, and how insufficient were the British iron and steel industries to meet that need. The causes of this insufficiency have been dealt with in some detail elsewhere, and the committee have made recommendations with respect to action within the industries which they believe will go far to remedy the defects which the strain of war has only too prominently revealed. Several of these causes, springing mainly from the pressure of foreign competition, cannot be removed by the private action of the industries themselves, and for their elimination direct governmental action is required.

What is that governmental action? They proceed to discuss dumping; they proceed to show that, by virtue of the free trade policy of England, dumping inevitably results that nations pour goods at below cost into England, not necessarily at a loss to the industry in the nation producing these goods because by doing so, the manufacturers were enabled to increase the scale of their product, and in that way keep down costs, while enabling them to destroy the industries of England at the same time that they were building up their own. They show that in the clearest terms; they advocate protection against dumping, and then they say:

> Moreover, the committee are convinced that for the future safeguarding of the iron and steel industries it will be necessary to establish a system of protective duties, and in this opinion they are supported by the practically united feeling of the British iron and steel producers who have given evidence before the committee.

These are from the same class of men who precipitated free trade on England, and they are practically united in their opinion that as things are going the industry cannot succeed, and without the iron and steel industry, what other industry can live? The iron and steel industry is the basis of a huge percentage of all other industries; it is the great substructure of all the industries of the country. But they go on:

> The maintenance of a great open market in the midst of the greater producing nations of the world is incompatible with the prosperity and even with the existence of a native iron and steel industry. Under modern conditions, the expenditure of capital is immense; renewals of plant must be rapid and frequent, and amortization must, therefore, be swift. This capital cannot be obtained unless there is reasonable security for the industry into which it is to be placed. So long as the British home market can be flooded with foreign imported material, a native industry will continue to be unprofitable and will become more and more unsafe.

I ask the indulgence of the House while I read further, because a more succinct and better informed presentation of the case, carrying clearer reasons with it, could not possibly be given:

> The conditions of competition between Great Britain and her rivals are thoroughly unequal.

Not because British character and ability are not equal to those of other nations, but for the reasons they set out:

The iron and steel industries of Germany and America are protected from retaliatory action by heavy tariffs.

That is, in a "comparatively free trade country."

Their home market is practically assured to the national industries, and the whole weight of their competitive force can be thrown into the trade in external markets. Great Britain depends for her prosperity much more upon exports than either Germany or America; but by reason of her free-trade system she has been compelled to divert her greatest strength from exports to the struggle for maintenance of her markets at home. The non-existence of a fiscal policy of any kind renders effective governmental action impossible, since Great Britain possesses no economic weapon by which concessions of any kind can be won from her trade rivals.

Now this is most significant, and I should like this to be read in association with the figures as regards the tin-plate industry given by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion):

A signal instance of this disadvantage is afforded by the history of the Welsh Tinplate trade after the introduction of the McKinley Tariff in the U.S.A., which resulted in the building up within a few years of an immense tinplate industry founded largely upon labour which migrated from South Wales.

"Which migrated from South Wales!"

The Welsh industry was for many years wellnigh ruined. Its mills and works were idle; its workmen were scattered far and wide, and cruel distress reigned in South Wales. Yet nothing could be done, save to yield to the operation of "natural" causes.

And as if to avoid plagiarism of the hon. member for Marquette they put the word "natural" in quotation marks. It goes:

The Committee therefore recommend that customs duties be imposed upon all imported iron and steel and manufactures thereof. They are of opinion that a specific duty should be levied upon each class of commodity, and that there should be maximum, general and minimum tariffs. The amount of tariff should be determined by consideration of the needs of the industry protected, and by the needs of the nation as a whole; and the amount of specific tariff should be varied readily, according to the changing demands of national policy.

Another familiar phrase!

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Was this committee appointed by the present Government in England?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, by the Asquith Government, distinctly a Simon-pure Liberal Government, and it just reported in 1918. It took two years for its work. It goes on:

[Mr. Meighen.]

The existence of a tariff of this nature would, in the opinion of the Committee, be of the greatest advantage to the industries and the nation. There is no reason to believe that the price to the consumer would rise.

Listen to this:

On the contrary, the increase in production at home would lead to very material reduction in costs, since it would be possible to effect economies in production by the installation of more complete and better plant. The experience of the United States proves that the stimulating effect upon production through the conservation of the home market results in an actual reduction rather than in an increase of price.

There is scarcely one of the romances in the theory which the hon. member for Red Deer has preached for the last twelve years that is not driven off the stage, or, as he himself expresses it, has not its head cut off at the tail, by this report of experts in his native land. It goes on:

Again, the existence of a tariff will place in the hands of the State a most powerful weapon of economic defence.

That is the argument urged by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in the very first Budget Speech he ever made in this House—the existence of a tariff was necessary for economic defence. So impressed was he with that argument, that before his Budget Speech he did what no Finance Minister has ever done before. He made a preliminary statement in the city of Montreal in which he said that on account of the contemplated 75 cents a ton duty in the Dingley tariff, there would be no reduction in the coal duty in this country, and he further stated in the same speech that if they would dare to put on that 75 cents a ton duty he would retaliate with a duty on anthracite coal itself. Everyone gets to see these views when they get into office. The report goes on:

The weakness of any scheme of imperial preference has hitherto been the inability of Britain to offer any real privilege in return for those accorded to her by the Dominions. The possession of a tariff will enable this country to discriminate in favour of the Dominions and to give them concession for concession.

(8) A tariff will be no less advantageous in the course of negotiations with independent foreign countries. Here, too, Britain has in the past had nothing with which to bargain, and has, therefore, been unable adequately to protect the interests of her subjects.

(9) From the labour standpoint a tariff is no less necessary.

And remember this is signed by John Hodge. I emphasize this, because there is a sort of bewildering combination now being sought between the U.F.O. and Labour:

From the labour standpoint a tariff is no less necessary. The anxiety of Germany is to preserve an open market in Britain; and it will not be to the interest of the workmen employed in the British iron and steel industries to permit the unchecked importation of the product of foreign labour, working under conditions far less favourable than those of British labour.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that report signed by Balfour or Burleigh?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I will give the signatures. I do not know who they are: G. Scoby-Smith (Chairman), John King, G. Mure Ritchie, Hy. Summers, Benj. Talbot. From that there is a dissenting statement by Sir Hugh Bell and Mr. John E. Davison.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The committee reported in 1918?

Mr. MEIGHEN: But was appointed in 1916 by the Government of Mr. Asquith.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has any action been taken by the British Government along the lines of that report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think any action has been taken except what I shall describe a little later on. Over there they are now going through the contortions and groanings and sufferings that precede repentance.

As respects the electrical trades, a committee consisting of six men was appointed, and their report is unanimous. In the Old Country, just as here, these men are appointed for the purpose of a specific investigation, they are appointed because they have special qualifications for the purpose, the committees are composed of representatives of every class. They are confronted in Britain just as we are here, with orators of the same sort as the hon. member for Red Deer, and with demagogues like other hon. gentlemen who go up and down the side lines in Western Canada and elsewhere talking "special privilege." All that, they have to overcome, and they are now in process of overcoming it. The report on the electrical trades says:

> Again, foreign governments, appreciating the importance of conserving their home markets as a basis for the development of overseas trade, imposed protective duties, and exerted influence on State Departments to purchase native goods.

They go on and say:

> The necessity for protective duties has been emphasized by many witnesses connected with manufacturing interests and has been frankly recognized by representatives of purchasers.

Of purchasers. That is consumers.

> The Committee is convinced that adequate protection is necessary and should be given at least for a period.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Quebec East applauds.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The word "adequate" is so often used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend ironically applauds at the phrase "adequate protection." The Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) whom he supported, the father of this milk and water amendment now before the House described his tariff, the Fielding tariff, as "adequate protection" himself, and I shall quote from his remarks after recess.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (resuming): The unanimous report of the British Government Committee on electrical trades states:

> The necessity of retaining the home markets as a basis of overseas trade has never been properly recognized in this country—

That is, in England; and their recommendation is as follows:

> The imposition of import duties sufficiently high to protect effectively the electrical industry.

And this following is something that is of moment in relation to a charge made in speeches of hon. members opposite, that Great Britain had been free from mergers and combines, which they seemed to believe were invariably against the interests of the consumers and the common people. This is the recommendation:

> The recognition of the advantage of combination among manufacturers, and official co-operation with such action.

I can be very brief with the other reports; they are all precisely to the same effect.

Mr. CHARLES MURPHY: Is the report from which the hon. minister is quoting signed by the same gentlemen as the report which he read this afternoon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; it is signed by a separate committee appointed on this subject. The members of that committee are: Hon. Sir Charles A. Parsons, Mr. John Annan Bryce, Mr. T. O. Callender, Mr. James Devonshire, Mr. Bernard Mervyn Drake and Sir John Snell. There was no minority report. In the case of the engineering trades the committee was composed of the following: Sir Clarendon Golding Hyde, Mr. Arthur Balfour—I do not know whether that is Arthur J. Balfour or not; I do not suppose it is; Mr. Albert John Hobson, Mr. William B. Lang, Sir Hallewell Rogers, Mr. Herbert B. Rowell, and Mr. Douglas Vickers.

The report of that committee was to the same effect as the previous report and I can summarize it in a word. They first of all, of course, outline the difficulties against which the trades have laboured. They depict in very clear and emphatic language the position to which they have been relegated in the struggle for world trade, and they end with this recommendation, among others:

That a Government department be charged with the duty of exercising vigilance over the adequate provision in this country of manufacturers as distinct from our staple trades which are at any time essential to the national safety, such as tungsten and magnetos.

(b) That the development of the supply of raw materials within the Empire for such essential industries be supervised, encouraged and assisted by the Government.

(c) That all necessary steps to protect such essential industries be taken by the Government, whether by prohibition, tariff protection or subsidy.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That is, during the war?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; it is a recommendation as to what is to be done after the war. They do not refer to the war period at all. What would be the sense in starting a subsidy system or a protective tariff in 1916 to help England during the war?

The committee on the textile trades take up each separate department of those trades in England, and make investigation into their conditions and their needs. If there is any respect in which England has managed to hold part of her own in business, it is in the textile trades. As to iron and steel she long ago abdicated her position, but with the textile trades this has not been true to the same extent. Here is what the report says with regard to these trades. As to the cotton trade:

In the cotton trade there is very little demand for any change in our present policy. The trade is predominantly an export trade, 80 per cent of its output being exported, and it cannot expect to derive direct benefit from any system of import duties upon yarns or manufactured goods. On the other hand, there is a generally expressed fear that the imposition of anything like a general tariff might raise costs of production, and to that extent handicap and lessen efficiency of trade in world competition. A majority of witnesses were in favour of restrictions upon trade with the Central Powers after the war.

Mr. CRERAR: When was this committee appointed?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1916.

Mr. CRERAR: All these committees were appointed during the war.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but they report what is to be done after the war, and they say so definitely in the report which they make in 1918.

They report late in 1918, having been appointed, under the Asquith Government, on the 27th of April, 1916.

Mr. DEMERS: What is the date of the report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: 1918 is the date of the report in the case of the iron and steel industry, and the date is the same in this case. I do not see that the report gives the day of the month, it gives the year.

Now in regard to the woollen and worsted industry the report says there is not unanimous opinion prevailing as to the trade in men's wear, the majority being against an import duty.

As regard women's wear the majority is the other way. But passing from that to the carpet industry let me read the report:

By a large majority the representatives of the British carpet industry advocate the imposition of minimum and maximum tariffs on foreign carpets entering the United Kingdom.

They go to explain that recommendation. Now as to the silk industry:

The Silk Industry.—This industry is practically unanimous in its request for tariff assistance on the ground that it cannot compete with the highly protected and carefully fostered silk industries of other countries—some of which habitually "dump" their goods in this market—unless such assistance is given at all events for a period.

Now comes the jute industry. In that connection the report says:

The Jute Industry.—This industry asks that an export tax of ½ d. per lb. (approximately £5 per ton) may be imposed upon all jute leaving India with a total rebate in favour of the British Empire, total or graduated rebates in favour of our Allies, and graduated rebates in favour of such neutral countries as may offer reciprocal concessions of some kind. In the case of the present enemy countries there should be no rebates.

They meet the case just the other way by an equal interference with free trade, an entire defiance of every principle of free trade getting at it by an export duty on the jute industry in India where the monopoly exists, with rebates to the British Empire, and lesser rebates for some other countries.

On the linen industry they report that—the prevailing feeling in the linen industry is in favor of a graduated scale of duties on manufactured goods, distinctions being made between Allies, neutrals, and enemy countries.

The Hosiery and Fabric Glove Industry.—There is a practically unanimous demand in the hosiery trade that duties should be imposed upon all hosiery, underwear, knitted fabrics and glove fabrics, whether of woollen, worsted, cotton or silk, imported into the United Kingdom from foreign countries.

The Lace Industry.—This industry is in practically the same position as the hosiery industry. One branch of it, namely, the manufacture of Leavers lace, plain nets, and lace curtains is prosperous and is able to hold its own in international competition, while another branch, namely, the manufacture of Plauen lace, Barmen trimmings and embroideries, encounters almost overwhelming competition from the specialized industry of Germany in these articles based upon large scale production.

This committee, in language the intent of which cannot be gainsaid but expressed in a sort of covering, concealed way, as if they were seeking to avoid political opposition, reports as follows:

That when the settlement of the general fiscal policy of the United Kingdom comes up for consideration and decision due attention should be given to the differing wishes and requirements of the textile trades, and to the facts in connection with international competition upon which they are based.

There is the clearest intimation in the report of this committee that by departure from the principles of free trade, and by that alone, can the textile trades in general expect to survive.

These are virtually all the industries of the United Kingdom brought under review by expert committees appointed by a Liberal Government. These committees report, not for temporary expedients as for the purposes of the war—nothing of that mentioned in the report at all—but on a permanent policy based on the lessons of sixty years of history.

Now I have taken up much time to indicate to hon. gentlemen of this House that no encouragement can be extracted from England for the free trade principle,—and remember it is principles we are discussing and only principles that count.

I can understand a man whose feet are based on free trade, however sinking the sand, voting against this Budget; but outside of merely the play of political purpose —what one might call political poker play— I cannot understand those who believe in the principle of protection voting against it. I have shown, I think, that there is no lesson to be learned for any no-protection principle in the United States; no lesson to be learned in Germany; the teachings are so plain in both countries that he who runs may read; and certainly, above all, there is no lesson to be learned in free trade England.

We are at a stage now where we cannot mistake the teachings of experience. We have seen the result through seventy years in the Old Land. It is traced in the history of their trade returns that turned in 1850, the last decade year when they had a balance in their favour. Every decade year since a large balance has been against them. Free trade has depopulated rural England; it has filled the emigrant ships with fugitives from her shores; it has scattered the manhood of Great Britain through the fields and workshops of the United States; it has starved and repressed and dwarfed the nascent industries of Ireland; it has reversed the supremacy that Britain held through centuries in the industrial life of the world, and caused her to concede the place to other great competing nations who adopted a different policy. Such is the history of free trade.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been in a position to learn from experience. They went through a trial of fifteen years in office. They knew the principles upon which they were elected. They know the appeals they made and in those appeals they were associated with many hon. gentlemen in the Agrarian party. They know the appeals they made against protection in every form, of all characteristics and by whatever adjectives described. They know they appealed on a platform in 1893 that denounced the whole principle of protection as false and unjust to the mass of the people and that proclaimed their policy to have for its goal free trade with England and with the United States—that was the immediate goal and with the whole world thereafter. They know they confronted conditions in 1896 that made them determine rather than to sacrifice their country to sacrifice their professions. For myself I give them credit for that decision. When the alternative was what it was that was the right thing to do. But the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's comes into this debate and in support of his vague, misty amendment, he tries to indicate to all, if he can, that he is now for a lower tariff; he tells us that when he came into power before he did shape a different policy from that which had been in force, that he was true to this much described principle of Liberalism, whatever it may be. He says that in those days some one described his tariff as ruination to this country. No one ever described the Fielding tariff as it actually was as ruinous, or likely to be ruinous, to Canada. At that time he brought down a tariff supposed to give a preference to Great Britain alone but which would in effect give a preference not only to Great Britain but to Belgium, and Germany, and by virtue of treaties, to nations practically all over the world enjoying favoured nation treatment; it was pointed out that its extension would be world wide. He denied the point when it was raised but he later conceded its correctness by coming down to this House and confining his tariff to Great Britain, because the treaties with these other nations had, I believe, at the request of Canada, specifically been denounced. But when the Budget Speech was delivered at that time the interjections which were offered by the Conservatives who were in Opposition clearly showed that they regarded the tariff that he had brought down as indistinguishable from the tariff which had preceded it and clearly showed that he then and there had departed from the principles to which his party had long given their adherence.

I hold in my hand the official percentage figures of duty charged under the tariff of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) and under the preceding tariff and I purpose to show the House just the extent to which his tariff was in the least degree different. The last tariff under the Conservative Government—because the scale had been reduced very much by the Conservative Government in the revision of 1894—gave an average percentage of duty on dutiable goods, (and these articles in effect remained the same) of 29.96 per cent. That was the tariff which went out of effect in 1897 when the Fielding tariff came in. The hon. gentleman gave us a tariff in which the percentage, instead of being 29.96, was 29.22, or the great reduction of .74 per cent. That is precisely the reduction that was made and that I suppose is all the hon. gentleman had to do to bring the tariff out of the Tory category and make it in keeping with the "historic" principles of Liberalism. The next year the percentage was 28.65. It remained around there till 1907. In 1908 it was increased and in 1909 it was further increased. It was increased indeed as much in 1909 as it was diminished in 1897. I do not know whether that was apostacy from the principles of Liberalism in 1909 but there was the same raise in 1909 as there was reduction in 1897 and in neither year was there anything like the change that was made by way of reduction by the Minister of Finance in connection with the revision that preceded it in 1894—nothing to compare with it in any degree and nothing to compare, in the whole fifteen years, during which the responsibility was upon the Liberal Government, with the reduction that is embodied in the Budget which we are debating to-day or even in the Budget we were debating last year. The reduction to-day is 40 times greater than theirs.

The tariff brought down now and under review by this House is the tariff of 1911 reduced in very considerable degree through all the long scale of articles enumerated in the excellent speech of the hon. member for St. John city (Mr. Elkin) a scale involving large aggregate reductions in the duties collected.

Now what position do we find ourselves in? In the meantime a new party has arisen. In the meantime the old creed—that which was the creed of the Liberal party of Canada before 1896—has been passed over to a new group originating in Western Canada and represented in this House by the members called the Agrarian party. The spokesman of that party this afternoon quoted the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1893 denouncing protection and stated that his party was the heir to that doctrine, which was in its possession now. It is not a legacy at all. It is nothing that passes by way of will on the death of the testator. It was assigned and put out of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's possession away back twenty-one—yes, twenty-four years ago. It was his property in 1895 but it never was his property afterwards.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: It is coming.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is coming, the hon. gentleman says. The hon. gentleman was complaining this afternoon that it was not coming. He was reading speeches to show that hon. gentlemen opposite are apostates to their doctrine.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Assiniboia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, there is the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould): I know he agrees with it, but how many hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House agree with it? I shall proceed in a minute to show that in 1893, before they knew what the responsibility of office was, before they had come close up to the real situation in Canada and were compelled to study it with a view to action, these hon. gentlemen denounced protection in adjectives that would almost burn the tongue. Nothing was too strong. They put forward a platform that denounced it. But in fifteen years of office what did they do?

They met last August. Did they denounce protection then? Not a breath! Last August they adopted a platform which started out with the resolution, moved now as an amendment by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). They had a platform last August which called for reduction with a view to securing these two visionary things that are so useful on the stump and so meaningless in themselves:

Diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

That was the first half of the Liberal tariff platform. Then it goes on—here is something practical; here is the method, here are the actual, specific, concrete things they are going to do in order to bring about these highly desirable results.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: An hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." They proceed:

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber—

The House will please observe the word "partly." In some of the newspaper editions of the platform they had it "dressed" lumber, but I see that the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has part of the "dress" off and it is "partly" dressed when it comes into the debate in this House. That is a significant difference.

—gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The leader of the Opposition says: "Hear, hear." I will have a few questions to put to him later on, and I hope he will be as prompt with his reply. Then the resolution goes on:

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw materials entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to fifty per cent of the general tariff.

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself—

Just think of what goes into that pledge.

—to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

Now, just let me read in that connection the platform of the Agrarian or Farmers' party that had previously been adopted, so that hon. gentlemen may get a little inside look into what went on at this Liberal convention, when they managed to evolve the beautiful production that I have just read. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the leader of the Opposition has been touring the country telling the people that the Liberals and the farmers were first cousins; that there was really little difference between them; that they both had the same great cause at heart; and he appealed and looked for a union of the twain, of course, under his supreme leadership. Now, here was the Farmers' platform that they were trying to copy; they wanted to produce a little ship painted as nearly like the Farmers' vessel as they could make it, and get it through the convention. The farmers wanted the high cost of living reduced, and wanted also the same thing with regard to the instruments of production. The first parts of these two platforms are practically the same. Now does the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) see why hon. gentlemen opposite sought to lure them with the milk-and-water resolution moved in this debate? I think he sees that all right. Now, let us look at the Farmers' platform.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I can let the hon. gentleman have a copy of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have it in front of me.

It says that our tariff laws should be amended as follows:

(a) By an immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

(b) By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada in five years.

(c) By endeavouring to secure unrestricted reciprocal trade in natural products with the United States along the lines of the Reciprocity Agreement of 1911.

(d) By placing all foodstuffs on the free list.

This is the article that hon. gentlemen opposite took for imitation:

(e) That agricultural implements, farm and household machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, gasoline, illuminating, fuel and lubricating oils be placed on the free list and that all raw materials and machinery used in their manufacture also be placed on the free list.

(f) That all tariff concessions granted to other countries be immediately extended to Great Britain.

That is the one they sought to imitate. It will be observed that in this second part enumerating the articles that they were going to have free, the farmers included agricultural implements, farm and household machinery, vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement, gasoline, illuminating, fuel and lubricating oils, and no more.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if that part of the Farmers' programme is not taken from resolutions moved on this side of the House and supported by Liberals in this House in previous sessions? If there is any imitation, it is not on our side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is contending that the farmers stole their programme from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly that part of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That feature of it. Well, if that is the case, why did the hon. gentleman change it again at the Liberal convention?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not changed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not changed? What about vehicles? What about coal? Did the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) put something over on my hon. friend? Where does he find coal in this list of free goods?—

Wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food, farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline; illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments, cements and fertilizers.

No coal there; no vehicles there. Does the hon. gentleman think that the member for Cape Breton North and the member for Shelburne and Queen's would stand for free coal? Does he not remember the speeches of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in this House when he was Minister of Finance? Does he think that the member for Cape Breton North would submit to free coal? Free coal is left out, but they meet the gentlemen of the Farmers' party half way, as they call it. How do they do it? They leave out free coal and vehicles, and they say to the gentlemen of the Farmers' party: Now, you just do without free coal and vehicles and we will give you—what? Free wheat, wheat flour and the products of wheat; farm tractors; rough and partly dressed lumber; nets, net twines and fishermen's equipment. We will put every one of these on the free list—every one of them was free before they passed the resolution and is free to-day. Of this list of eighteen articles that I have just read, the following are altogether free: wheat, wheat flour and products of wheat; farm tractors up to $1,400—that includes the bulk that are used—rough lumber; partly dressed lumber; gasolene—12 cents a gallon in free trade England but free in Canada—nets, net-twine and fishermen's equipment. Just think of the hon. member for Brome solemnly getting the Liberal convention to put in this new article in order to make the list look long: "nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipment" all of which, together with the articles that I have read, are free already. And this is the Liberal platform that takes the place of the pronouncement of 1893, where protection was consigned to everlasting oblivion. Even fertilizers uncompounded are free now, but of the eighteen articles I think it is eleven that are free already; and the making free of these eleven already free and of the six others that I will refer to in a minute constitutes the concrete policy of the Liberal party to-day.

Let me ask the leader of the Opposition why was not the Liberal tariff platform moved in amendment to this Budget?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall give the answer when I make my speech.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has become of the Liberal platform? What is the matter with the latter half of it? The member for Shelburne and Queen's knows that he cannot move another amendment; he knows that right well. Why, they have taken this Liberal platform and they have cut the dog,—well, not at the tail, but they have cut it horizontally right through the middle; they have left the whole travelling part at home.

What is the matter with the active, concrete portions of the Liberal platform? Why is it discarded? Is it a scrap of paper? Has it gone the way of the Liberal platform of 1893 and the denunciations of protection? I think it has. The leader of the Opposition has a somewhat difficult task in trying to sing the siren's song to the Agrarian party and at the same time to keep pretty close to the tune of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr.

Fielding). But my prognostication is that my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) will get a great deal closer to the note of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's than he will to that of the hon. member for Red Deer. What has become of the active, concrete portions of the Liberal platform? Where is this 50 per cent British preference? Why has it gone by the board? Nothing doing! No one speaking! Where, too, has the Farmers' Platform gone, this Farmers' Platform which has been proclaimed not for months but for years in this country? Have we ever heard it moved in this House?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: We did pretty well in Carleton, N.B.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We shall stay in Ottawa just now. Is it the amendment to the Budget? Not at all. All they are seeking is to pick out something that is common to the two and that means the minimum, nothing, if they can get to it, in order, if they possibly can, to get a vote of want of confidence in the Government of the day. That is what I called political poker playing.

I set out to say that both parties, if you call them such, or rather both horses of the same team, for political purposes, pretending only to pull in opposite ways, ask for a reduction in the duty on agricultural implements.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Did the minister not move in this House in 1910 a resolution asking that all duties be removed from agricultural implements?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not. The trouble with hon. gentlemen opposite is that they do not investigate and get at the facts.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Perhaps I did not ask the question aright.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member asked the question aright, but he was under a wrong impression.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Perhaps, it was the wrong year. Did the minister do so at any time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, never in the world.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: All right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know what the hon. gentleman is thinking of. In the month of January, 1911, when the duties on farm implements were as I shall give them in a minute, I moved for a substantial reduction in those duties.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: Just that and no more.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just that, and just that I obtained but not from the hon. gentleman's friends. Why, the hon. gentleman does not know what the duties are. The following are the duties that he supported and that hon. gentlemen angularly opposite supported through the whole fifteen years of Liberal government. I will give the reasons, taken from Hansard, why they did so. In order to keep things clear before hon. members, I had better give three scales of duties, first the one that prevailed for fifteen years. On some articles it was a little higher prior to 1907; they did not reduce the duty on farm implements by a copper between 1896 and 1907, a period of eleven years; then they took 2½ per cent off certain farm implements, and they said that was a very substantial reduction.

Mr. EDWARDS: And they increased the valuations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The valuations increased. Under the Fielding tariff the duty on ploughs was 20 per cent; under reciprocity it would have been 15 per cent; now it is 17½ per cent.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Fifteen per cent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is 17½ per cent, although possibly I am wrong in that, but that I think is one of only two exceptions in the whole list where the present level is not as low as under the Reciprocity tariff.

	Fielding Tariff Per cent	Under Reciprocity Per cent	To-day Per cent
Binders	17½	15	12½
Mowers	17½	15	12½
Reapers	17½	15	12½

Mr. W. H. WHITE: At the same valuation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Liberals raised the valuations.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: You have raised the valuation somewhat since.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The valuations rise with the value, and always did. I continue:

	Fielding Tariff Per cent	Under Reciprocity Per cent	To-day per cent
Seed drills	20	15	15
Weeders	20	20	15

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's would not reduce this tariff.

	Fielding Tariff Per cent	Under Reciprocity Per cent	To-day per cent
Manure spreaders	20	20	15
Harrows	20	15	15
Traction engines	20	20	Free up to valuation of $1,400
Separators	20	15	17½
Farm wagons ..	25	22½	20
Windmills	20	20	17½
Fanning mills..	25	20	20
Cultivators	20	15	15

I have taken a list of the fourteen principal farm implements, and I find that the duties on eight out of the fourteen are lower to-day than they were under the Fielding tariff and lower to-day than they would have been under reciprocity.

An hon. MEMBER: Who lowered them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Lowered by the Government of Sir Robert Borden. On eight the duties are lower even than under the reciprocity; on four more the duties are lower than under the Fielding tariff and equal to what they would have been under reciprocity; on two of them, or the balance, the duties are lower than they were under the Fielding tariff.

Mr. CRERAR: Why does the minister not get to work and reduce the duties on those articles still further?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will tell my hon. friend why just in a minute; but I have said enough to show that if in 1907 there was a substantial reduction made which hon. gentlemen supported as such, twice that reduction was made by the Government that is now in office. The duties on farm implements under the Fielding tariff would average 20.18; under reciprocity they would have averaged 17.32, and under the present tariff they average 14.64. What I should like to submit to hon. gentlemen is this. If they believe what they profess to believe on this question, would not the better thing for them to do be to support a government that acts, rather than a government that professes and fails to act?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I will answer that question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clark) has already spoken.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Might I suggest that the minister do not speak by way of asking questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister is quite within his right to submit any questions he chooses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just before the House took recess at six o'clock, I stated, in answer to an ironical interruption by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), who seemed to take a sort of sarcastic pleasure in the use of the term "adequate protection," that the leader whom he will undoubtedly now support and the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) whom he supported for many years, proclaimed the Fielding tariff as a tariff of adequate protection. Now I propose to show that that is correct, and I do not think he was very far wrong in his description. In fact, in some cases I thought, and think still, he had too high protection. Speaking on the 7th of June, 1904, in the Budget Speech he said that his tariff had:

included a considerable measure of incidental protection—

That was the favourite word of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's all the time he was in office in describing his protective tariff. He took care almost universally to call it "incidental" protection, as if it made a bit of difference what adjective he applied to it, whether it was incidental, accidental or transcendental. It was not the adjective, but the amount of the duty that counted, and those who were interested in the tariff of Canada did not care whether he called it incidental protection or anything else. He went on to say:

—and in that respect it will command the admiration perhaps of hon. gentlemen opposite who are more anxious for protection than some of us on this side of the House.

"Some of us." He did not name them. He goes on:

I think as to whether or not it is adequate protection we have some evidence of a gratifying character that the tariff, without being excessive, is high enough to bring some American industries across the line—

Pretty real protection!

—and a tariff which is able to bring these industries into Canada, looks very much like a tariff which affords adequate protection.

"Adequate protection."

And in the year 1909, I think it was or 1908, speaking on a motion for the further reduction of the duty on these very implements he made this statement, and I ask hon. gentlemen who feel like supporting the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in this vague, visionary, misty, and cloudy resolution, after he has lopped off the specific and the actual, just to read what he said when in office and in which he still believes to-day, judging from the whole tenor of his speech. Opposing the motion for reduction he said:

With a moderate duty we have induced American capital to come into Canada and to establish that great industry (The International Harvester Company of Hamilton) and after we have brought it in and established it in Canada, I believe that if we were to pass this resolution—

Reducing the duties, not making them free, but still leaving on 10 per cent. He says:

I believe that, if we were to pass this resolution the company operating that industry would find it profitable to close the Hamilton factory and bring in goods which they make in the United States.

That was his reason for opposing the motion. He was opposed to reducing the duty by 7½ per cent when in office. But once out of office and when he wanted to perform a marriage ceremony with hon. gentlemen angularly opposite he is ready to take the whole duty off and leave it just as it was before 1896. He said:

On behalf of the Government I wish to say, following the statement of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, that while we are not advocating a high tariff, while we are not advocating a Chinese wall tariff, while we are not seeking to shut everything out, we are willing that a moderate—

Listen to the words:

—that a moderate degree of protection, if you care to use the word, arising out of a tariff designed for revenue, but incidentally—

The same old phrase.

—giving some protection,—in some instances a considerable measure of protection—we are willing that, where there is a great industry in Canada, it shall receive a fair share of consideration which we have given by this tariff on agricultural implements, and so I must ask the House to reject the amendment of the hon. member for Souris.

Now it was argued in that debate, and argued again in the reciprocity debate in 1911, that the tariff that existed at that time, particularly the tariff on implements, was no more than a revenue tariff, and when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's came back from Washington and announced his programme, he told the House that he could not reduce further the duty on implements, and he said that the reason was that to do so would be getting below the line of a revenue tariff. Now I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if, at a time when the revenue necessities of this country were $125,000,000, the Fielding reciprocity tariff was no more than a revenue tariff, how does a much lower tariff become too high for a revenue tariff when the revenue necessities of this country are $350,000,000? Besides, through all those years, and many of them were hard years—there has never been a depression in Canada for twenty or thirty years like the depression of 1907 and 1908—he adhered to these means, and these means alone, of raising the revenue and never dared to impose one dollar of direct taxation in this country. I ask again if that Fielding tariff, if that scale of tariff, was no more than a revenue tariff, when we had not the courage to have direct taxation at all, how can hon. gentlemen complain of this scale now that we have $81,000,000 by direct taxation and propose to have $181,000,000 next year? There could be nothing more inconsistent, nothing more ludicrously grotesque, than the position of hon. gentlemen opposite in respect of the scale of this tariff if they remember for one minute not only their own innate beliefs on this subject, but the beliefs they put into practice through fifteen years of power.

Now I observe in this Liberal platform of August last, the greater part of which is now left at home, that they have changed the words of the farmers' resolution which calls for all foodstuffs to be put on the free list to read "the principal articles of food." The House will appreciate the skill of the generality, but would it not be interesting, and, indeed, is it not absolutely necessary, that the people of this country should know from hon. gentlemen opposite what these principal articles of food are. What are the principal articles of food? May I ask, is tea a principal article of food? I venture to say I shall never get an answer from the leader of the Opposition, and I venture to say he will not give me an answer when he speaks in this debate. Is sugar a principal article of food? I would think it would be. We use something like $100,000,000 a year of sugar, we import $75,000,000, and we make quite a lot here. Is it the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite to put raw sugar and refined sugar on the free list? If it is, I think the country has a right to know. Whether it is their intention or not, I think the country has a right to know. Here is our tariff. What do you mean by your professions? Are meats a principal article of food? Are biscuits a principal article of food? Biscuits, the hallowed biscuits on which they never thought of revising the duty, even under reciprocity, below 30 cents a pound. Are they a principal article of food? What are these principal articles of food? No answer, and there will be no answer, Mr. Speaker. It is in the vagueness and the generality of it that they take their refuge. Virtually all is vague and meaningless except the things that are free now, that were put in for mere padding, to make an appearance, and to paint a little ornament to look like the Farmers' platform. I have not succeeded in getting much in the way of answer from the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. PEDLOW: He has not been given an opportunity to reply.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. leader of the Opposition will have his opportunity in due course.

Mr. PEDLOW: I—

Mr. SPEAKER: If any hon. gentleman has a remark to make he might do the House the courtesy of rising in his seat.

Mr. PEDLOW: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. PEDLOW: My point of order is, Sir, that by your ruling we are precluded from the possibility of answering questions asked by the member who has the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: I fail to observe the point of order. The hon. member who has raised it has trifled with the rules of order of the House, which are clear and distinct. A question may be submitted by an hon. member who has the floor but no member has any right to make any statement in reply, even with the consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was just a figure of rhetoric.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has been the practice that an hon. gentleman, with the consent of the member who has the floor, may reply. I do not wish to question the ruling of the Chair, but I want to add this, that no hon. member has been precluded from replying to any question by any act of mine, either on this or on any other occasion. In fact, I should be pleased if the rule of the House could be ignored so far as this point is concerned.

Now, I desire to refer to one thing else, and it is clearly in harmony with the whole proceeding we are witnessing now. Hon. members will recall that a leading figure in the Liberal Convention in August last was the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). Not satisfied with the result of his labours, and no doubt having some recollection of the agony he went through in 1896 and the humiliating position in which he was frequently placed thereafter, he went back and wrote in the Journal of Commerce, a paper which he edits in the city of Montreal, a clear intimation, which I can read to the House if it desires, that the only practical acceptation of the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite was one with "interpretations and reservations," and that anyway platforms that were made at conventions were made in a hurry and were not footstools of policy or declarations of principle, but were merely in the nature of platforms on Pullman coaches to get in upon. That is the frank confession of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, and this platform which he himself denominated as a mere means to get in on is the platform of which he takes a truncated section and brings it into this House seeking by so doing to get a vote of want of confidence against the Government.

I remarked a few moments ago that we never had even from hon. gentlemen of the Agrarian party any motion in this House asking this House to debate and declare its judgment upon the platform which they profess. A year, or two years ago—I forget which—we had an attempt on the part of the hon. member for Red Deer to bring in something of the kind. It was stated at that time by you, Mr. Speaker, that on a motion to go into Ways and Means, that is to say, on the Budget debate, one amendment could be moved and no sub-amendment could be moved thereto, and also that, no second amendment could be moved after the first amendment had been defeated. In other words, there can be only one amendment. Hon. gentlemen knew that right well. It was shown them clearly by Mr. Speaker two years ago. But they come to this debate with a motion in amendment made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, a member of the official Opposition; and members of the Agrarian party know that by allowing him to make this motion they are precluded from moving their platform by way of amendment. Why was that? Was a request made that they be allowed to move their platform by way of amendment, and was it refused? I think not. Is it not clearly the purpose to protect those hon. gentlemen opposite from declaring where they stand on the farmers' platform? The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) laughs. For two years, or for something more than one year at any rate, the hon. gentleman has been a private member, and neither he nor any of his followers has ever put that platform on the Orders of the Day. They have never sought a discussion of it in this House; they have never challenged the opinions of hon. members in regard to it; they have never put hon. gentlemen opposite in the position of voting Yea or Nay. They have left them in such a position that they can go hand in hand with themselves in the country never having come into a recorded antagonism in Parliament. Each side can hold up a different flag and follow a different leader, seeking to get the free trade vote in one part of Canada and the protectionist vote in another, and then afterwards come back together to show the people of the country just what they care for the opinions and professions they make before a contest. That was the performance in 1897. It looks as if something even worse were on the programme to-day, and I am confirmed in that statement by the opinions freely and definitely expressed on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. I know that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) went to Montreal to the sanctuary of Liberalism, the Reform club, and stated there at the time of the by-election in St. James, that he did not stand for free trade; that, in fact, there was not a single free trader in his party. He said he stood for a well-regulated system of protection. And the hon. member now for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) declared in his speech in that campaign that he too stood for the encouragement of industries by a protective system. He was elected, not on the platform that is here moved in amendment, not on anything that bears a family resemblance to the professions of hon. gentlemen in the Agrarian party. He was elected on the platform upon which this Government stands in regard to tariff matters. That, Sir, is what he was elected on. He utilizes the tariff policy of this Administration to get elected in order afterwards to vote a want of confidence in the Government that puts forward that policy. That is his position.

Mr. POWER: Why did you not get him elected?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, he got elected and the man on the other side stood for the same. As between the two, there was not much difference so far as we were concerned; and all we ask of the hon. member for St. James is that he now vote according to the professions he made, that he stand true to the electors to whom he made those professions, on the strength of which he got their votes. And what about the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb)? He too was in the Montreal Reform Club and made a speech in which he defined himself as clearly in favour of the encouragement of the industries of a country by legislation. That is where he stands. And what about the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) who represents the city of Sarnia and the thriving county of Lambton? He went to the same Montreal Reform Club and he denounced free trade hip and thigh. He declared himself in favour of a tariff not only for the purpose of revenue but because we had to have a tariff for economic reasons, for protective reasons, and he knows he stands for that principle. He knows he is an advocate of protection as a principle; he would not dare to vote for a resolution in this House that denounced the principle of protection. Now I ask him if in this debate, where there is nothing at all in controversy but that principle, to stand up and vote as he professes and believes.

We have all these declarations of faith on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite saying to the people of Eastern Canada to its farthest limits "Do not be afraid of us. Here is our faith presented by Mr. Pardee of Lambton, Mr. Rinfret of St. James, Mr. Béland of Beauce, Mr. Robb of Huntingdon, and Mr. Lemieux" —they might just as well add him and they could add fifty more—"here is our faith, do not be afraid of us, vote for us on a policy of moderate protection." At the same time we have hon. gentlemen across the way saying in Western Canada "vote for us as free traders pure and simple, seeking free trade with United States, and with Great Britain first, and then with all the world." Then we have the leader—who hopes to be the leader of both parties if they get into power—trying to sing a song that attunes with each, and telling the people in all ends of Canada that the Liberal party and the Liberal platform are, to all intents and purposes, the same as the farmers' party and the farmers' platform. That is to say that protection and free trade are to all intents and purposes the same. The one principle is the profession of my hon. friends opposite, the other principle is the profession of hon. gentlemen on the cross benches; and the leader (Mr. King) claiming them both as his own in order to pave the way for the great betrayal when the day comes, if it ever comes, that their united numbers are greater than the numbers behind the present Government.

Now I stated a moment ago that in this country to-day we had not anything in the nature of an immoderate tariff. It may be —it doubtless is the case—that there are portions of that tariff that can be scaled down, that upon investigation it will be seen that deductions can be made. There may be other changes that may be necessary. The principle upon which the revision will be made is clear and well defined and all understand it. It will be designed to keep industries in Canada, to enable industries to expand, but will go no further than is essential for that purpose when accompanied by competent business management. Now surely that principle is plain. Will the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) say he could not support a tariff designed for that purpose and with that restraint? He could not say so. Why do not hon. gentlemen who believe in the principle I am expounding and who know this tariff is true to that principle—why do they not support it? Just in order that a political manoeuvre may be played and for no other reason whatsoever.

We have direct taxation now in this country, and the Government that imposed it is the Government in office. The Government that took all the responsibility and unpopularity of imposing direct taxation, that is the Government that now appeals to this House of Commons. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), the great champion of direct taxation, who has been preaching it in season and out of season all over this country, votes against the Government of direct taxation. He votes for hon. gentlemen opposite who never introduced the policy of direct taxation, and he holds the sheltering hand of his protection over Provincial Governments that do not put on the direct taxation that he advocates. Let us now have an examination into the policy of the hon. member. He says "I want to do away with custom duties." That is what he tells the people of the West,—do away with them. "It is no way in the world," he says, "to raise a revenue." "It is the most costly way" is the way he expresses in Brandon "ever devised by man."

Mr. CRERAR: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Hear, hear," the hon. gentleman says to-day; he says: put in its place income tax, a graduated income tax, and a tax on the unearned increment of land. That is his statement. His platform does not call for a tax on the unearned increments of land but for a tax on the unimproved value of land, a different thing altogether. However, I want the House to know that those are his two main substitutes. The others are purely provincial taxes, inheritance and the like—those first are the two main substitutes the hon. gentlemen advocates—land tax, and income tax. Now I hold in my hands the report of a tax commission appointed by the Government of Manitoba, the Government which is very close to the hon. member for Marquette, and whose continuance in office is one of the things dearest to his heart. I am not saying anything against that Government at the present time, that is not an issue in this debate; I am saying something about the consistency of the hon. member. That Government appointed a commission, and so far as I know a commission of pretty able men, to go into the question of this taxation and to report to the administration. That commission was composed of, I think, ten or a dozen men. There were represented on it the farmers of Manitoba, representatives of the rural councils of that province. Other interests in Manitoba were also represented, and among them the actual Grain Growers Association that is the very party that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) champions and leads in this House. They were directly represented on that commission by two men. Of these, one, Mr. Peter Wright, is a director of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, is he not?

Mr. CRERAR: One of the directors.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One of the directors of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, the council that propounded this Farmers' platform, and Mr. W. Wood is the secretary of the Farmers' party in Manitoba. Now the commission examined into this land tax, it examined into the income tax, it examined into single tax, and all other taxes; it reported against single tax in the most decisive terms. On discussing the merits of the land tax, a tax on land of any kind—on unimproved land or an unearned increment tax—it decided that a tax on land was a good thing by local authorities for local purposes but that a tax on land was a bad thing for the federal authorities for any purpose at all. I have the very words of that report in front of me.

Mr. CRERAR: Did Messrs. Wright and Wood sign that report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Wright signed the report. Mr. Wood did not sign the report but he made no minority report. I have the report before me and Mr. Wright's signature appears thereon. Here is what they say about the land tax:

> There are accordingly several cogent reasons why the taxation of real property has tended more and more to become the special prerogative of the local authorities. For the Dominion Government in this country, for example, to encroach on the field of real property taxation would, in the light of both history and theory, be a distinctly retrograde step.

And that is one of the taxes that the Farmers' party led by the hon. member for Marquette says that we should adopt, that is one of the fields he says we should invade which the Manitoba Government commission unanimously find—every man who signs the report finds—to be debarred by its own nature from adoption by the federal authorities for any purpose. Then they go on to the income tax, and what do they say about it? I am sorry that the hon. member for Red Deer is not here. This would be very interesting to that hon. member who complains of the small amount of income tax collected from the farmers. The commission quote with approval what Professor Adams says:

> The income tax yields little or no revenue in rural or farming districts, and for that reason I would not recommend it to farming communities; but for thickly settled manufacturing and urban communities, it is bound to spread and in the end to supplant the relatively unjust and unfair tax on personal property.
> This seems to be the prevailing opinion everywhere.
>
> In the income tax provisions of the province of Ontario we find that the income of farmers derived from the produce of their farms is expressly exempted from taxation under the income tax law.
>
> We have carefully and fully considered this feature, and recommend that the provisions of any general income law that may be enacted in this province, be confined wholly and exclusively to urban communities.
> It is to be borne in mind that the application of a provincial income tax to the farmer would, in any event, be lost energy, in that, if such were imposed, and the amount derived in each municipality was returned to the source derived, it would be equivalent to travelling north by south.

There is the report of this commission unanimously adopted and concurred in by a director of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, Mr. Peter Wright. Mr. Peter Wright is a man for whose opinion and personality I have the profoundest respect. He is a man who has rendered splendid service in our soldier settlement work. Mr. Peter Wright, after investigation, signs that report and says that, of the substitute taxes which the hon. member for Marquette proposes to take the place of the customs tax, the land tax is one we should not adopt and that the income tax is all right so long as we do not touch the farmers of Canada. I will ask the hon. member for Marquette—I will not ask him to reply now but I will be happy if he will reply when he takes his feet: Does he propose to repudiate Mr. Peter Wright who has gone into this case and got the evidence, and who is a director of his own association, and one of the framers of its platform, or does he propose to change his policy?

I stated to the House that the tax on large incomes in England was lower than in Canada. This is interjected out of its place because I did not have the figures before me then. I stated that the turning point was about incomes of $200,000. I have been sent over from the Finance Department the figures which give the tax on incomes of $100,000, $500,000 and up to $1,000,000. I do not have the figures for an income of $200,000, but I think that is about the turning point. The tax on incomes of $500,000 in Canada, under last year's scale, is $303,190. The tax on the same income in the United States is exactly the same amount. The tax on the same income in Great Britain is $257,321, or almost $50,000 less than the tax that we collect in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: Would the hon. gentleman give the tax on an income of $100,000?

Mr. MEIGHEN: An income of $100,000 is more heavily taxed in England, and so are smaller incomes all down the line. The tax on an income of $100,000 in Canada is $31,190 and in the United States the same. In England the tax is $47,327. Coming to the incomes of $1,000,000, our tax is $663,190 while the British tax is $519,812.77, or a difference of almost $150,000, between the tax on a million-dollar income in England and in Canada. Yet, we are upbraided—upbraided, it is true, for political purposes and no other—by hon. gentlemen opposite who say we are protecting the rich man and the millionaire and that we ought to follow the example of England. Our tax with respect to all these cases of high income is emphatically higher than in England, it is higher than in Australia, higher than in that paradise of income taxation referred to by the hon. member for Red Deer, New Zealand. Their tax on an income of $1,000,000 is $374,993—away below ours; and on an income of $500,000 it is $187,496 or very little more than half the tax in Canada.

I have sought to show that the tariff as now proposed should remain in effect pending a thorough revision, which hon. gentlemen opposite admit could not have been made up to the present time. The hon. member for Red Deer clearly admitted that. This is the tariff, and not higher, but lower than that adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in office under circumstances of far less urgent need. It is admitted to be a tariff which is lower than that which hon. gentlemen opposite unanimously supported all through those fifteen years. It is a tariff not designed to benefit the rich in this country; it is designed, so far as our own information goes—and it cannot be complete without investigation—only to give such measure of assistance as to retain within this country its industrial strength, and which does not alienate from this country a measure of the industrial strength that we have. We never can have a high tariff in Canada. We cannot have a high tariff in Canada for the most obvious reasons. In the first place, a high tariff is unsound in principle in that it tends to eliminate one of the factors of competition, namely, foreign goods. Foreign goods should be allowed to enter into competition under fair conditions in this or in any other country. But the conditions under free trade or without protection are such that the foreign competitor has every advantage.

Take an illustration. Here is a foreign competitor in the United States competing with the manufacturer in England. Are the conditions equal? Is a man in the United States, where he can get the biggest concern, the biggest industrial unit, the biggest output, in the same position as the man in England? He can have a much larger unit. He has a market of 110,000,000 assured to him right at home that no government can take away. In Great Britain he has another market of 43,000,000 almost at hand and free of access to him. He has the same show exactly as the British manufacturer in all the other countries of the world. He therefore has a free market of 153,000,000 to sell his output to. Where is his British competitor? What is his position? He has the bars up against him in the United States; he cannot get into that market save over the tariff wall. He has the same restrictions against him in other countries of the world and all he has left to him is that portion of his own home market of 43,000,000 that may be uninvaded by the products of other lands. Is that equal competition? Bring similar conditions here and you would soon paralyze and destroy the whole industrial fabric of this country. So I say we cannot have any immoderate or high tariff for the reason, first, that it tends to exclude that healthy element of fair conditions, namely, foreign competition; secondly, we have in Canada a territory of wide extent. We have one portion of Canada, newer than the other portion, a more predominatingly agricultural country, newer to manufactures and industrial development, and consequently the advantages of the tariff do not accrue to them as yet as they ultimately will accrue to them. They come more immediately to one portion of this country than to another. On account of these two reasons we must always have in this country nothing more than a moderate tariff under any conditions whatsoever. That will be the purpose of the revision, under the principles clearly set out, enunciated by the Minister of Finance, to which we adhere. On that policy I appeal to hon. gentlemen who have something great or small at stake in this Dominion—yes, I appeal to citizens, men and women who have nothing of this world's goods at stake, whose only concern is the well-being of their native land. There are those among us who will not see with their eyes or hear with their ears or understand with their hearts; there is that class in Canada, as in England, and there always will be in every country. I cannot appeal to those to whom experience has taught nothing and for whom reason has no persuasion. But to all others who will thoroughly study the needs of Canada; who will thoroughly study the example of other nations, and most of all, the example of the Mother Country herself—I appeal to them to yield support to what is fair and right. Come what may, good or ill fortune, I prefer to be of the number of those who have stood loyally by clear and well-defined and well-tried principles, who have been loyal to them in office and out of office, rather than among those who have two policies, one to profess and the other to practice.

Mr. M. J. DEMERS (St. Johns and Iberville): Mr. Speaker, I will not intervene in the contest between the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) and the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), because I admit I am not big enough to throw any light upon the question, for instance, whether the balance of trade should be considered in connection with the fiscal policy to be adopted by any country. I must say that after the speech of the Minister of the Interior I am more than ever in the dark as to that question of balance of trade. He told the House that Germany and the United States were prosperous with a balance of trade in their favour, and that England was prosperous with an adverse balance of trade. This question has been an open one for centuries; I think that it will continue so for some few centuries to come.

The Minister of the Interior read to the House lengthy quotations from the report of a commission appointed to study economic conditions in England. The fact remains that since that report was submitted in 1918 nothing has been done to comply with the findings of the majority of the commissioners. We all know that many by-elections have since been held in England, and I do not think that the electors there approved in any shape or form of the changes proposed in that report.

I wish to refer to what the Minister of the Interior said in respect to a statement made by the member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair). He said that the Auditor General's Report is open to revision and investigation by the Public Accounts Committee. I would like to remind the minister that the volume containing the particular item in question was brought down only last week, so we have had no time to take it up before the Public Accounts Committee.

The question before the House is a very important one. The ground has been pretty well covered since the beginning of this debate, but there are certain matters upon which I desire to express my views. I listened with interest to the speech of the Minister of Finance, which has been awaited with curiosity, I may say with anxiety. I was disappointed in it, because I found that the most important problem that confronts us, the cost of living, had not received the least consideration from this Government. I was disappointed to a certain degree, but not to the extent of being surprised, because it is well known that the Government have done absolutely nothing to bring relief to the consumers who have suffered and are still suffering to the extent of depriving themselves of certain necessities of life. All that the Government did on that account was to create a body known as the Board of Commerce, which, in my judgment, was an absolute failure. It will be said, I know, that the problem of the cost of living is a very difficult one. We all know that; but we all know also that it is not a more difficult problem in this country than it is in other countries. We know what has been done in some other countries, and we can appreciate the good results of the drastic measures which have elsewhere been taken against profiteers. The effect of the application of these measures, Mr. Speaker, was magic; to-day we witness a real race in the United States in the lowering of prices. England as well has taken action to fight profiteers and the high cost of living; the same is true of France and many other countries. Here we have had investigations which have shown how we have been oppressed by the profiteers in connection with the necessaries of life. It has been established that canners and packers and proprietors of refrigerating plants are mainly responsible for the increase in the price of foodstuffs. To my mind, it would have been easy to check them by a proper and strict control of their operations and by the enactment of laws providing stern punishment for unreasonable profiteering. The Government have been warned again and again without success. Notwithstanding the negligence of the Government in that regard to date, the people of this country were expecting an announcement of some measures of relief on the occasion of the presentation of the Budget. They expected that the production of foodstuffs would be stimulated by the removal of customs duties from agricultural implements and the necessaries of life generally. They, however, failed to see anything of the kind in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and their only comfort is to learn that the Government need money and that the people will be called upon to pay the bill. Increased taxes all along—that is the only relief offered to the people in the critical situation in which we are. We all admit that Canada must meet her obligations and that for that purpose the Government must levy taxes; but the reproach that we have to make to the Government is that we are called upon to pay for extravagances and waste, and also to pay our war debt when that war debt should have been paid during the war and since by the war profiteers and not by the whole community.

The other day the Minister of Finance spoke about economy. We can hardly reconcile the strong plea he made the other day for economy with the Estimates of $12,000,000 for military expenses. We cannot share the hopes of the Minister of Finance for the future of this country when we consider the shipbuilding policy of the Government. We cannot hope for financial success in the future when we consider the railway policy of this Government. I am not a pessimist, but for me to become an optimist would require a change of Government. If the ministers of the Cabinet are anxious to do something for the good of the country, let them dissolve Parliament. This is the wish of the people—of farmers, soldiers, labourers and consumers—and nobody can deny that. The people are not satisfied that we were elected in normal times and by normal means, and they believe that we received only a war-time mandate, because that mandate was given in a war-time election. Why should the Government accentuate uneasiness, discontent and indignation, by refusing to comply with the general and obvious desire of the people?

The Minister of Finance is standing by protection or by what is called generally the "National Policy." I am glad that this opportunity is afforded to me to express my views on the economic question as regards this country. I am not a protectionist; I stand for the Liberal platform of 1919 as enunciated at the Liberal convention, I am for a tariff for revenue. I want to speak frankly. If I had been in politics in 1878, I would have opposed the so-called National Policy, and I believe the situation and the conditions of the country in 1896, after eighteen years of that regime, would have justified my calculations.

The National Policy led the country to the verge of bankruptcy; it created large fortunes for a few privileged people; but it was detrimental to the great majority of the people of Canada. I am opposed to the so-called National Policy, although I must admit that in the framing of a fiscal policy for this country, we must take into consideration actual conditions as they were produced by such a policy. In 1893, the Liberal party pronounced itself in favour of the principle of greater freedom of trade, and to-day, the party is charged with not having fulfilled its promises in this respect. Every day we hear that the fiscal policy of the Liberal party when in power was the same as that of the Conservative party, and opponents of the Liberal party are naturally interested in trying to create that impression. It seems as if they fail to remember the great fiscal modifications brought about by the Laurier Government; they seem to forget that the Laurier Government lowered the customs duties on about 150 articles of the tariff and abolished the duties on many other articles of the tariff. They would not admit the real endeavour of the party to apply its principles, and in their appreciation of the fiscal policy of the Liberal party, they fail to take into consideration the fact that we had in this country during eighteen years previously to 1896, a regime of high protection. Was the Liberal party wheen it came into power to act by revolution or by evolution? The wisdom of the leaders induced them to choose the way of moderation and good order, and the party moved on gradually towards its aim, succeeding in reaching the reciprocity treaty of 1911. The fiscal policy of the Liberal party from 1896 to 1911 has been such that not one of its followers with lower-tariff tendencies thought it necessary to withdraw his allegiance from his party during the fifteen years of the Liberal administration. There were some Liberals who left the party because of its fiscal policy, but only those who were high protectionists. It is unfair to say that there is no difference between the Liberal and the Tory fiscal policies, for everybody knows that the Liberal party fell in 1911 in trying to put its principles of a low tariff into effect. There is absolutely no justification for saying that there is no difference between the two parties when not only were promises made but the Reciprocity Treaty was effected between the United States and Canada. In view of that treaty, I can hardly forgive those who persist in saying there is no difference between the Liberal and the Tory party fiscal policies. It is not worthy, it seems to me, for a public man to appear not to appreciate the difference that does exist between the two parties. The Liberal party stands by its principles. We have not changed. More than ever we believe that the application of a tariff for revenue should be the fiscal policy of this country, and that considerable reductions should be made in the tariff in the interests of the welfare and prosperity of this country.

With protection we have created large cities, but that policy has been detrimental to the farming community. Our country is mainly agricultural, and instead of establishing a policy the effect of which was to bring into the cities our young men of the country, I think it would have been far better to concentrate our energies on the development of our agricultural industry. For my part I would prefer Montreal with a population of 300,000 men and the other 300,000 on the farms, because I would be sure then that that other 300,000 would be engaged in the production of the first necessities of life. Agriculture is our principal natural resource. By high protection it has been deprived of the labour it requires to such a degree that a very serious problem has been created and is facing us at the present time. I have no hesitation in saying that because of the shortage of farm labour our farms are producing only about half of what they could produce. This is the direct result of high protection, and we must face the situation. We must do something to improve our agricultural industry. I regret that there is nothing substantial to be found in the Budget to help relieve conditions in this vital industry. The Finance Minister should have immediately decided on the free admission of agricultural implements, and should have reached the conclusion that the Reciprocity Treaty of 1911 should be revived. The minister gives us a promise of tariff revision, but can we take his declaration as a certainty or even as a probability after the promise we had last year from another Minister of Finance of this same administration? The Finance Minister, however, has spoken of having a revision of the tariff. If such a revision ever takes place let us hope that its principle will be a tariff for revenue without a vestige of protection, for protection means privilege. We have made immense sacrifices in the past to establish the industries of this country, some of which were what I might call exotics; that is, they had to get all their materials from other countries. Some of them now are very prosperous indeed, and, due to the fact that the Government has given them such high protection, we have witnessed the scandalous spectacle of some of these industries selling their products cheaper in Europe than in Canada. I say, let these industries take care of themselves now that they are strong, and if they are to receive any protection out of the tariff, let that protection be only incidental. If we had given to agriculture the protection that has been given to other industries what a prosperous and happy population would be ours to-day. If we had had more solicitude and paid more attention to the development of our natural industries, such as mines, pulp, paper, furniture and all those industries using lumber or iron and steel as their raw materials, we would certainly have had a much more prosperous country to-day and a more contented and a happier people.

Those are my views on the fiscal question. I shall leave to other hon. members to answer the arguments of the Minister of the Interior specifically, because there are answers to give. I have given my reasons for favouring a tariff strictly for revenue, that is to say, the establishment of customs duties in order to get the money necessary for the good administration of this country.

Mr. EDGAR KEITH SPINNEY (Yarmouth and Claire): Mr. Speaker, I have hesitated in engaging in the debate on the very important subject now before the House, feeling that both the hon. members of this House and the public generally were already over-fed by the conflicting views expressed by hon. members.

May I be permitted, Sir, first to join with many other members of this House in extending to the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) my very hearty congratulations on the great care and honesty of purpose he has displayed in preparing his Budget, and on his clear and lucid manner of presenting it to this Parliament. His declaration of the huge debt confronting this country shows no disposition to suppress the ghastly facts.

While it is not my purpose to refer at any length to the horrors of the atrocious war which convulsed the nations of the world, and in which Canada was so deeply involved, I cannot permit this occasion to pass without giving expression to our deep gratitude to our brave soldiers who so courageously and promptly obeyed the call to arms in defence of liberty, justice and democracy—three principles for which all Canadians in conjunction with other portions of this great Empire stand. Their services are far beyond commercial value, as the enjoyment of our liberty to-day is due to their great bravery and valour in conjunction with the army of the Allies.

We are also proud as Canadians of the hearty co-operation of all our people in that crisis by their willing and generous response in providing the adequate funds necessary in the successful carrying out of that great war. I desire especially to pay a high tribute to the women of Canada who took so prominent a part in this important movement. They indeed set a good example to the sterner sex in the great sacrifices they made and in the successful efforts they achieved in connection with Red Cross work and in their constant endeavours to send comfort to our noble soldiers in the trenches. We can well say, from the depths of our hearts, God bless the women of Canada.

While the penalty of this terrible conflict from a financial standpoint is great, yet it has no comparison with the loss involved when, approximately, 60,000 of our brave soldiers were called upon to pay the supreme sacrifice. Our hearts go forth in deep sympathy to those who were called upon to mourn the loss of their near and dear ones. The sacrifice of these valuable lives to this nation cannot be estimated or overcome.

We can readily understand the great problem of acquiring a revenue to meet the obligations of Canada which have increased more than six-fold as compared with pre-war time; and to meet further necessary expenditures in order to develop the growth and expansion of this great country it must tax the minister to the limit; and in accomplishing that desired result I am quite safe in assuming that no member of this House would place any obstacle in his way. In his system of taxation it is only natural to assume there will be many objections raised. There are those who very strenuously oppose the business profits tax, holding some very strong arguments in support of their views. The future development of Canada must of necessity depend on the sound financial basis of its business institutions. It is claimed that this tax as originally applied to buiness operations does not lend itself to that most desirable object. Permit me, Sir, to refer to alleged inconsistencies. Take this illustration: A business corporation is formed with a capital of $150,000 with a volume of business, say $650,000 yearly, showing a profit of $45,000. This, being applied to capital instead of the yearly turnover represents a profit of 30 per cent; but on the basis of yearly turnover the taxes this corporation must pay would amount to approximately $18,000. Under normal conditions this would not appear to be so great an injustice, as after allowing 7 per cent on capital employed, they would have a credit balance on the year's operations of about $17,000. But let me say that in applying this system of taxation the yearly balance sheet is taken as a basis. Any one engaged in business operations will readily admit that the operations for the year cannot be closed and there must remain on their books or in their bankers' hands at least a balance of $150,000. Any losses involved in the collection of this amount must rest with the corporation against which they have no redress. Take another case. Through some misfortune, mismanagement or otherwise, an adverse balance of, say, $10,000 may be shown. It is true no taxation applies, but there is no consideration shown for this loss the following year when normal conditions may prevail.

In order to conduct a business of this magnitude a stock of goods valued at pre-war prices of at least $125,000 must be carried. With the abnormal price prevailing during the war and even now existing the stock would reach a value of $300,000. He would be a bold operator who would say that present prices would be maintained or that a sudden depreciation would not take place. Such a reaction must come, and in order to meet these conditions very heavy sacrifices must be encountered. If there is not a reasonable surplus left in order to meet such a loss bankruptcy must result with all its widespread influences. That system of taxation was also inequitable as business operations employing less than $25,000 escape taxation. Some of the evil effects following the business profits tax are briefly:—First it limits investment. The tax operates to discourage the investment of capital in two ways: First, it diminishes the amount of foreign capital available for investment in Canada; and second, it incourages the investment of Canadian funds in high-priced bonds and other securities rather than in industrial enterprises.

Second, the tax discourages personal endeavour. Because the individual knows that the greater part of his profits over a certain amount will be taken by the government, he tends to limit his activities; in other words, the tax is a fine upon initiative and efficiency.

Thirdly, it tends to limit production. A great deal of money now being paid to the government should be employed in extending present plants or in constructing others, encouraging greater production of manufactured goods and the necessarily greater employment of labour.

In making these criticisms, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I want to declare most emphatically that the business men of this country desire to bear in a reasonable and equitable manner their share of the costs of the war. They recognize, as all true Canadians should, that the sacrifice of the noble boys who went to their doom was not made for any individual or any class in Canada but for all citizens. Each one should bear a reasonable share, and should not hesitate for one moment to acceptt a system of taxation that would equitable distribute the burden. I want to inform the Minister of Finance that it is gratifying to know that he has made a reduction in the business profits tax in his present Budget, and we can only hope that he will be convinced of the necessity of eliminating the tax and adopting some other method of raising the revenue which it provides.

May I venture to predict with the great wealth in natural resources possessed by this great country, second to none in this world, and with the indomitable spirit and determination of its people, the heavy burden of debt in which Canada is involved will be gradually dissipated.

Again, Sir, let me, with your permission, refer to the value of the great resources of Canada. The most important, and the one giving the very highest results in point of value, is that of our manufacturing industry. The products of Canadian manufacturers for the year 1919 amount to the large volume of $3,015,575,940. This magnificent business, which Canada cannot very well afford to lose in its future progress, employs 692,067 people, and the capital invested amounts to $2,786,649,727. There was paid in salaries and wages last year the large sum of $553,301,675. All must admit that in view of the magnitude of the interests at stake nothing should be done which will disturbe or restrict these wonderful resources. Anything that would bring about that effect would not only be improper but dangerous as well. From no individual source can Canada extricate herself from the debt in which she is now involved. It will be by co-operating in the development of all our resources and through united efforts by all those engaged in the various enterprises now being conducted in Canada, that the results we all wish for shall be reached.

One of our predominate resources is that of agriculture. Much has been done in its development, but the industry is in its infancy so far as future possibilities indicate. It is gratifying to know that financial aid extended by both federal and provincial governments in their endeavours to assist greater production and to attract an immigration suited for such occupation. A greater effort should be made to induce our young men to engage in agriculture. Under the able generalship of the present very efficient Minister of Agriculture, I am safe in saying every effort will be made in that direction. Permit me to give you some figures in connection with agricultural production last year. The value of farm production in 1919 was $1,448,153,500. This great wealth was produced from 667,951 farms, distributed throughout Canada and represents $165 per capita of our population. Comparing these results with those in the United States our figures are far in excess of that country. The estimate per capita production from agriculture in the United States is only $110 as compared with $165 in Canada.

Another very important industry and perhaps the most productive—bearing in mind the element of the cost of raw material—is our fisheries. It is an industry that affects my constituency perhaps to a larger extent than any other although we have some very important manufacturing industries there. I have prepared some figures in connection with the fishing industry from which it will be seen that in 1918-19 the value of the product was $61,368,502. The value of equipment was $37,169,328. The fleet employed consisted of 2,055 vessels and 42,236 boats, the employees numbered nearly 100,000. The Nova Scotia value of that production was $14,000,000, nearly one-fourth of the production for the whole of Canada, and employment was given in that province to about 30,000 men.

One very important branch of the fishing industry in Nova Scotia is the lobster fishery which is perhaps confined to a large extent to south-west Nova Scotia, eastern Nova Scotia, the Gulf, and Prince Edward Island. The value of the plants engaged in this industry amounts to $3,000,000, the pack of lobsters keeps 171 canneries employed, affords work to about 2,600 vessels, and gives employment to some 3,600 persons, the value of the output in 1919 being about $4,000,000. This is a subject which I feel justified in dwelling upon to a certain extent, on account of its very great importance. As I have already stated to my own constituents. In connection with the fishing industry the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) a few weeks ago gave a very illuminating and instructive address. My efforts will be in support of, and suggesting greater consideration from the Government for this very important and practically inexhaustible industry. It holds a superior place among all branches of production in Canada on account of the cheapness of the raw material which can be procured for the taking.

The fishing industry has undergone many vicissitudes during the past fifty years. In my own constituency, before the abrogation of the treaty between the United States and Canada, the large market for this product being absorbed by the former country, there was engaged in the deep sea fishery upwards of 200 vessels employing over 3,000 men. Owing to the unprofitable result of their operations under these conditions the vessels were disposed of in other occupations and this great army of our fishermen were forced to find employment in the ports of the United States. By this Act not only did Canada lose an asset of great value but a most lucrative business was built up for our neighbours to the south.

During the past few years conditions have changed enabling a large percentage of our men to return to their own home ports to continue their operations from their native land. That the maximum results may be reached, I desire to impress upon the Government the great necessity of extending to those employed in this most important and lucrative industry the same consideration and support as is given to other branches of industry in Canada. A system of education should be inaugurated to bring up our men to the full standard of other countries. Increased bounties should be granted to induce a larger number of men to embark in this industry in the effort to reach the greatest production from one of Canada's most important natural resources. The effect of this effort would be widely extended, promoting other industries such as the building of vessels and boats, increasing business prosperity by giving supplies to the great army of people depending for their support on those engaged in this work, and promoting the various interests of the country, especially in providing the Minister of Finance with an increased revenue. Other very important industries, perhaps of a minor character, might be referred to. One of the most important of our natural resources is that which is represented by our forests. We have unlimited resources which demand some care and protection on the part of the Government; otherwise they must become exhausted. We have a wonderful production of pulpwood. The production in 1919 reached a total of over $15,000,000. Unfortunately a large portion of that material which should have been manufactured into finished products, was shipped out of the country. Products represented by that raw material reached a volume of $75,000,000, an asset which was lost to this country. Not only was there a loss in point of the value of the products but also in the employment of our men in the various industries which would be required, to manufacture these commodities. I can only repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I have already stated, that with unity and determination taking advantage of all the resources which are available in Canada but have not yet been touched, there is no reason in the world why this country should not have an era of prosperity beyond our conception.

I refrain somewhat from referring to the amendment of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). He has been a lifelong friend in whose judgment I have always had implicit confidence in and whom I have followed during his long political career. It may be egotistical on my part to refer to the position I hold in this Parliament to-day, but I think it is necessary that I should state my position. I came here as a Liberal Unionist. I want you to distinctly understand the word "Liberal," for that means exactly what I am. I was induced to accept this position in a time of crisis in this Empire. I accepted it feeling that I was doing my duty and doing right. Support was given me by my constituents of Yarmouth, both Liberals and Conservatives voting for me and sending me here. My Conservative friends knew the conditions and they accepted me with my Liberal principles and policies. I have continued to support the Union Government. I am doing so to-day in the firm conviction that a united government can better deal with the serious problems now confronting this country than can a partisan government. I believe it is in the interest of everybody. I believe that from the political standpoint it will be in the interest of neither the Liberal nor the Conservative party nor, yet the Progressive party, which is growing very rapily, I see it has grown from two or three to twelve followers now. It would not be useful to a party of any political complexion to assume the duties of office to-day with the present unsettled conditions. Our soldiers came back from the war in an abnormal condition. The people of Canada are in a similar condition. They are still suffering from the effect of the war with its sad and hateful results.

I can only say that I regret that at this stage my hon. friend found it necessary to introduce his amendment which comes at a very inopportune time. It has for its purpose, I assume, the downfall of the Union Government or their return to the country to get a fresh mandate from the people. I do not wish to criticise, but as I am an honest follower of the Union party I must point out this fact that since they have been in power I have followed them as a free trader or rather as a revenue tariff Liberal. I am that to-day, but I do not believe that any tariff for other than revenue purposes could be satisfactorily dealt with in this country at the present time. Our progressive friends may declare for free trade. They have come out for free trade but I do not see where they propose to raise the enormous revenue to carry out the heavy responsibilities resting upon this country to-day. It means raising between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000 at least. You cannot get that by direct taxation in this country. The people of Canada are not educated up to that. Neither are the financial resources of the country capable of responding to direct taxation. To my mind the idea is absolutely absurd. We have to raise a certain percentage of our necessary revenue through customs taxation, entirely aside from any question of protection. The Minister of Finance has maintained his reputation for honesty, and I believe he fully intends to give this country what he has promised in the way of tariff revision. When that revision comes in, if it should have any earmarks of protection, if this Parliament is in existence at that time they can bank on my opposing any such tariff.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the discussion on the Budget, I do not intend to retain the attention of the House for a long criticism of what the honourable ministers and the honourable members sitting to your right may have said. Moreover, in spite of their great speeches, as far as I am concerned, the situation is always the same. The Union Government, which was born in the midst of prejudices and racial divisions, and constituted for the sole purpose of winning the elections, never had any other fiscal policy that that of the old Tory party.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. FONTAINE (Translation): When it was formed, the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) had intended, by calling a few Liberals into his Government, to make the people believe that the principles of the two great political parties were equally represented in the new Cabinet. But to-day, Mr. Speaker, when three so-called Liberal ministers have resigned and have not been replaced, and when, on a total of fifteen ministers, there are but four left who are supposed to be Liberals, can it be claimed that the Liberal party is really represented? I say supposed Liberals, because one cannot seriously believe that the honourable President of the Council (Mr. Rowell), the hon. Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder), the honourable Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie), and the honourable Secretary of State (Mr. Sifton) do represent the Liberal idea in the Cabinet; so much so, that not a single one of the four gentlemen whom I have mentioned could get elected in any division of the country as a Liberal, and, Mr. Speaker, you are well aware of the fact that, long ago, they have sacrificed their political principles to retain their portfolios as ministers. Therefore, it is not to be wondered at that the Government should wish to maintain its protection policy. May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to say right away, that I have no confidence in the protection which had no other effect than to enrich a certain class and to keep the people in a condition of hardship.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. FONTAINE (Translation): I want the tariff to be lowered. I believe in the Liberal platform which was accepted at the great convention of August last, and where every province and every class was represented; I have confidence in that platform, I believe that when it is put into effect, it will bring comfort to this country and will restore peace within its limits; we shall, then, hear no more of the uneasiness now prevailing among the workingmen, or of any United Farmers' party, because the Liberal flag is wide enough to shelter all the groups under its folds; it will satisfy the workingmen by lowering the cost of living, by doing away with the middlemen and the trusts who are growing rich at the expense of the people; it will satisfy the farmers by abolishing the duties on the farming implements and on all that which is necessarily required for a greater production.

Sir, I said that protection is the policy of the Government. That is so true that for two years they have been promising a readjustment of the tariff without ever redeeming their pledge. During the first session of 1919, I remember, the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), who was also Acting Prime Minister, only succeeded in placating his supporters by stating in the House that a committee would be named at once to travel around the country and revise the tariff. Over a year has passed away since then and nothing has been performed yet, and this year, facing the same wranglings among his supporters, the present Minister of Finance attempted to make the same promise, but the trick had been detected and the remedy was not as efficient. Having been deceived last year by the former Minister of Finance, they demanded the pledge of the real Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). But it was a serious, a very serious matter to disturb the Prime Minister who was sick, who had left a year ago for distant lands in order to recuperate. True it is that the press informed us now and then that he was recovering, yet that hasty return might have occasioned a recurrence of his ailments. Never mind, said his followers, even if he were to die, he must come back and give us his word of honour that this time a committee shall be named and a readjustment of the tariff be made forthwith.

Confronted with that ultimatum, he had to comply and then on a fine day, Wednesday, May 12, we saw the right hon. gentleman taking his seat in the House. What transpired between him and his followers, God only knows. No doubt, he addressed them thus: "Gentlemen, let us put an end to our quarrels, our wranglings, and agree upon a protective policy; otherwise, we shall have to appeal to the people and to hold elections, and judging from the outcome of by-elections lately held, a very few will be returned. Therefore, we had better agree and remain in power as long as we can." Thus it is that Liberal members sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, are to disown once more the Liberal party and to countenance the Tory policy of the Government.

Now, Sir, what had we from the Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech. First, he told us that the country is in a critical financial situation, that the debt now amounts to $2,000,000,000, that the interest upon the indebtedness represents $188,000,000. This sum is equal to our whole revenue before the war and to face those conditions, he is going to levy new taxation. Thus, we shall have to pay ten per cent upon our clothing, our shoes, our hats, our underwear, all of which are necessaries, and even upon the medicines for our sick ones. Ah! Sir, how much we should lament all the useless expenditure, all the follies, I would even say all the outrages committed during the war. We can still recall the scandalous profits which corporations and profiteers realized; we can still recall that investigations disclosed that the Government enabled their political friends to grow rich and to reap millions by supplying inferior shoes to our men, by speculating in drugs and everything that was to be used for dressing their wounds. To-day, instead of compelling those robbers to return to the treasury those ill-gotten riches, they levy taxation upon consumers. The Government should begin to economize rather than establish those new taxes. Why should they have acquired the Canadian Northern which showed a deficit of $47,000,000 during the first year of its operation? Why should they have acquired also the Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific which will beget other deficits? Why should they have enlarged the militia establishments and compelled us to spend $12,000,000 a year for maintenance? What need have we for the militia during an era of peace? Moreover, where is to be found that great policy of reconstruction so much talked about? The Government are trumpeting forth that the country abounds with natural resources, mines, water powers, forests, which can provide for 200,000,000 people. That is true, but those resources must be developed; it is time for the Government to act.

We import coal by millions of tons from the United States and we are paying $15 and $16 a ton for that coal, while here in our own country we have mines which could furnish all the coal we need for our industries and home use if only the Government would help the owners of these mines by abolishing all duties on the instruments they require for the operation of their properties. But the Government doesn't move one finger; apparently this Government would rather promote the interests of the trusts and the speculators. Why isn't a start made, Mr. Speaker, on the Georgian Bay Canal which would do so much to develop this country?

In the riding which I have the honour to represent we have the Lièvre river, flowing through a beautiful countryside settled with industrious, well-to-do farmers; the only means of communication open to these people is a boat service which goes as far as Buckingham; this boat carries their produce to market. Would you believe it, Mr. Speaker, the honourable Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Reid) who is also acting Minister of Public Works refuses to build a wharf, which would cost only $3,000, at a place called Poltimore, on the plea that the Government haven't the necessary funds. Still the hon. minister found the money to buy the Canadian Northern, he found the millions necessary for the purchase of the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. I suppose he would rather please the shareholders of these powerful railway companies than the honest farmers of the Lièvre river district.

In the city of Hull the mail service is very bad; we have only six postmen for a population of 32,000. Several times the city council and the Chamber of Commerce have requested the hon. Postmaster General to increase the number of postmen so that we might have two deliveries daily; but nothing has been done, always because the money isn't there. The Government finds money to help along its political friends and to promote the interests of millionaire capitalists, but it has no money to help our good, brave people of Hull.

Before taking my seat, Mr. Speaker, I state with pleasure that I intend to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Hon. Mr. Fielding), who for fifteen years was Finance Minister under the Laurier Administration, and whose talent and exceptional ability did so much to make that Administration prosperous and progressive.

I invite all those hon. members of the Government side who believe as I do, who believe in a downward revision of the tariff, to shake themselves free of the Government's yoke, to declare their independence manfully and to vote with the members of the Opposition for the Fielding amendment.

M. J. F. FAFARD (L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends will, I am sure, allow me to make a few remarks in French before I proceed with my speech.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, we have listened this day to some very eloquent speeches, but the sun must set on even the most beautiful day. Since the beginning of the debate the hon. members who sit on your right have repeatedly congratulated the hon. Minister of Finance on his courage. I certainly have enough sense of the fitness of things to congratulate him on the eloquent manner in which he presented the Budget to Parliament; but it would be more fitting I believe to wish courage to those who will have to pay the taxes the hon. minister has devised. Mr. Speaker, if I thought a national debt was an asset I would agree absolutely with the hon. Minister of Finance.

In the first days of the colony the worth of an Indian warrior was judged by the number of enemies whose scalp he had taken; he carried these trophies proudly displayed on his belt when he went to bury the hatchet and smoke the pipe of peace. The politicians of the Unionist tribe have not yet buried the hatchet of war and the tomahawk of taxes still deliver some wicked blows on the heads of the poor Palefaces who have witnessed, with a sinking heart, the transformation of this Parliament into a primitive wigwam from which the Great Spirit has been driven away.

If the people are not satisfied with the state of our national finances the ministers of the Government certainly are satisfied. There is no longer any necessity, in this country, of knowing what we must save; all we need know is what we are going to spend.

Only a few weeks ago you saw the hon. Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Reid) come triumphantly before the House to tell us that his policy of public ownership of railways had surpassed his fondest hopes; the deficit was no greater than $47,000,000. He could have gone further and stated that the operation of the Grand Trunk will likely not bring a deficit of more than $25,000,000. I protested against this policy last year, Mr. Speaker, and I protest again this year. What the Government has adopted is not a policy of public ownership of railways, it is rather a policy of competition between the Government and the private railway companies. Public ownership implies service at cost, not service at $47,000,000 below cost. The Governments policy in the matter of railways, is entirely unfair. As the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) pointed out a few days ago, the Government is not treating the Canadian Pacific fairly, it is not treating the workers and the farmers fairly when it saddles them with a deficit of $47,000,000 for the benefit of the wealthy importers and exporters, since the mass of our people seldom use the railways.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Dont forget the profiteers.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): Mr. Speaker I would never finish if I were to recite all the instances of extravagance on the part of the present Government, an extravagance only too plainly revealed to-day by the taxes saddled on the country. Who will be taxed to pay for all the boards of enquiry appointed for the sole purpose of paying swollen salaries to political friends? Of what benefit were all these commissions? What did they do to decrease the cost of living? Absolutely nothing, Mr. Speaker; instead they were perhaps instrumental in furnishing the profiteers with information which helped them to mulct the people even more.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): And thus increase the cost of living.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): This year we are going to spend millions on a standing army doubled since the conclusion of peace. During the war, in which we had such a glorious share, we were told in this House that all these sacrifices were necessary to encompass the defeat of Prussian militarism. Having seen the strength of our standing army doubled, having heard certain hon. members on the other side of the House call upon the Government to establish compulsory military service, haven't we the right, Mr. Speaker, to conclude that the Government wants to set up militarism in Canada?

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Translation): No.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): So much the better, then. Isn't the Government mocking those who gave their lives for a cause that was dear to them and who to-day are sleeping the glorious sleep of sacrificed heroes? Isn't it mockery in the face of the people of Canada to spend their gold for the establishment in this country of a system they gave their blood to destroy beyond the sea?

Either militarism is a good thing or it is not. If it be a good thing, Mr. Speaker, I wonder why we made such tremendous sacrifices to accomplish its downfall in Europe; and if it be a bad thing I am at a loss to understand the Governments efforts to bring it into being in this country.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), whom I congratulate on his eloquent speech the other day, told us how he became converted to toryism. He told us that his father was a Liberal and that he himself had been a Liberal up to the time when he was 21 years of age; according to the hon. member, when he was 21 neither party was any good and, since he could do no worse he voted for Sir John A. Macdonald. That is the only reason he gave this House for his political conversion. It appears to me that the hon. member would have great difficulty in finding a worse Government than the one we have to-day and he would be perfectly justified in declining to oppose any longer those who sit on your left, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for West Toronto, whose absence from the Chamber I notice with regret, spoke of the tremendous saving effected by the Government in letting out 300 employees of the Printing Bureau; however, if I remember correctly, we voted last year something like $500,000 to replace these 300 employees. I can't say that I find that very much of a saving. If the hon. member is of the opinion that the Government saved a lot of money by letting out 300 employees he will likely be scandalized to learn that this same Government has taken on 27,000 new employees since the end of the war.

As a consequence of such a policy we behold our young country to-day carrying a colassal burden of taxes on all the necessaries of life.

Those who raise a numerous family destined to furnish the country with valuable hands to insure production, will pay four or five times more taxes than the others.

I am in favour of taxing luxuries, but I do not consider that, at this time, a $9 pair of boots or a $45 suit of clothes are articles of luxury.

Nothing in the preparation of this budget has been done to decrease the high cost of living.

Hoarders fill their storehouses with enormous quantities of goods in order to bring about a rise in the prices. There is, at this moment, more sugar in the Canadian warehouses than there has ever been. The Government knows this, and it would be very easy to have a law permitting inspectors to go and visit such warehouses, and obliging the hoarders to put upon the market at current prices the commodities with which they are stocked, causing a rise in the cost of living. But the Government protects these profiteers at the expense of the public.

If you read the Budget carefully, Mr. Speaker—even though you will have heard a lot about it—you will find that two classes only have not been taxed. You might believe at first blush that one of them is the soldiers that have returned from the front and of whom we heard so much during the war; but no, these soldiers, for the Government supporters, are an interest of the past. Their praise was on their lips during the war; but no, these soldiers, for the Government one of the members who sit on your right will be willing to give them any credit. If we are to judge from their utterances in this House, it is evident that it was they and not the soldiers who won the war.

The only two classes of persons or things, which escaped taxing are the profiteers and the orders in council.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): A revision of the tariff would have had a good effect on the cost of living and would have reduced it. Nothing was done. I say that in order to decrease the cost of living, and towards furthering the general good of the country, a revision of the tariff is imperative at the present moment. The Government have no right to overburden the people with taxes in order to allow there favorites to build colossal fortunes. These favorites are but a few while the consumer is the whole people. In a democratic country, all the citizens should be equal and enjoy the same privileges.

The hon. members of the right seem to believe that the fact of our favouring a decrease of the tariff shows a desire to ruin industry. A lowering of the tariff would have altogether another effect. The result would be manufacturing in larger quantities, as well as an increase in the revenue of the country.

It does not require to be an expert, but a little good will is sufficient, to understand that it is not so much the high rate of duty which piles up revenue as the quantity of goods coming through the customs. If you add to the tariff on certain articles, the present rate of exchange, you will find it altogether prohibitive.

Everybody complains, and justly, of the high cost of living and of the dearness of food. The cost of articles of food, as of the other commodities, varies according to the law of supply and demand, and it is evident to any observer that, since the war, the equilibrium has been destroyed.

When two workmen come to an employer and ask for work, it is the employer who fixes the pay; but when two employers seek the labour of one workman, it is the workman who settles the price. What is true in one case is true in the other. When there are ten workmen that are consumers to one farmer who produces, it is the farmer who fixes prices, and when there are ten farmers producing to one workman to consume, it is the workman who decides what shall be paid. Hence, I come to the conclusion that, for the last few years, our industries, owing to protection, have gone on at a faster rate—too fast even—at a faster rate than agriculture, which was neglected by the Government. If the commodities are too dear, it is evident that we must turn our efforts towards agriculture. It is true that the task is difficult and alarming, for the young are drawn towards the towns by the high salaries, amusements and shorter working days. It is absolutely impossible to find hands to work the land, the working hours are longer and the work is hard. The little money which the farmer puts by in the year, is due to his foresight, his economical way of living, and his long hours of labour. The farmers do not complain at all, they are happy and content with their lot. They only ask one thing from the city people: it is to cease their malevolent criticism. They do not blame the workmen for their day's work being shorter than their own. They do not begrudge them the few dollars which they can spend on amusements, for they understand that a man living in a city must need have recreation—They have no objection either to the workman eating oleomargarine if he wishes, provided this stuff does not sell for more than in other countries and is so marked that it may not be sold for butter.

It is said the farmer sells his produce too dear. The farmer does not go out of his way. It is the dealer who comes and offers him the price at which he sells his goods.

I can assure the hon. members on the otherside of the House who live in cities, that if they paid for foodstuffs the price at which they are sold in the country, they would enjoy immediately a great decrease in the cost of living, and I can assure them at the same time that if the farmers sold their produce at the prices they sell for in the cities they would all be rich men. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the middleman is the one to blame; and not only does he corner the goods, but he allows them to spoil. In the city of Montreal alone, 366,000 pounds of meat and vegetables were confiscated last year.

Besides the farmer is himself a workman, a workman in the first, the largest of all industries, agriculture. The tillers of the soil, in the early days of the colony, were not only settlers, they were heroes; armed with an axe they pushed back the forest, and armed with a gun they fought the enemy; not only did they succeed in broadening their land, they secured it to the British Crown; inch by inch they have brought it under cultivation and inch by inch they have defended it. This soil on which they live to-day, bathed with the sweat of their brow, they love it, they are jealous for it. They know no other fatherland than Canada; they are in this country the true Canadians. I call the attention of the Government to that class of citizens. They are the only ones who can bring about our return to the days of peace.

The faults that bring blame upon the present Government are one of the principal causes of unrest in the country. The ministers resign one after the other; they change portfolios so often that even the members of this House have ceased to know who are the heads of the different departments. The right hon Prime Minister is at home everywhere but in Canada. No sooner does a vacancy occur in a desirable post than the hon. members, all conscious of the fact that they cannot be elected again, all turn greedy eyes towards it.

There is a talk of appointing a representative at Washington, and if we knew the secrets of the ministerial circles, we should be surprised at the stir and discontent which is caused by this coming appointment—The hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) had been pointed to for this post; but the arrival of the Prime Minister seems to have unsettled the question. While on this side of the House we are not made acquainted with the ministerial secrets, we fully surmise that there are more than two candidates for the position.

This Government have ceased to represent more than a part of the country. The interests of all the counties from Montreal to Halifax have been altogether ignored by them.

It would have ben a good policy this year to have fostered an agricultural immigration to help the farmer, and also to have reduced the duties on implements of production. Instead of taxing the people in order to procure a revenue, the Government might easily have adopted a policy tending to increase revenue through the development of our natural resources.

I think it is time, Mr. Speaker, that the Unionist tribe should bury the hatchet and that the hon. President of the Council should smoke the pipe of peace with his colleagues; I think it is time for us to cease talking war and to turn our attention towards cultivating good relations with our allies, and to the securing of a place in their markets.

I fear to weary you, Mr. Speaker, but I would also suggest to the ministers who have on various occasions to represent us in London, not to be content with abiding by the suggestions which they hear made to them, but to affirm there as they do in this House, that Canada is a nation and that as such we have the right to be respected. I would ask them to affirm our royalty, but not to represent us as valets ready to do any bidding.

In order that the restoration of our country may become an accomplished fact, Mr. Speaker, we need more unity between the different races; it is absolutely necessary that all Canadians should join hands in the pursuit of the same ideal, that is to say make a grand nation of this Canada of ours.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, I shall conclude my remarks in English. I thank you.

[Mr. Fafard.]

On the motion of Mr. Edwards the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty, the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NEWSPRINT CONTROL.

*Mr. CASGRAIN:

Now that a decision has been rendered by the Supreme Court, is it the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation at this session in regard to the control of papers and newsprint?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Any necessary announcement in regard to this matter will be made in due course.

BUTTER AND MARGARINE — FOOD VALUES.

Mr. GERVAIS:

1. What is the nutritive value of butter, expressed in calories, according to Government analysis?
2. What is the value of oleomargarine?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Butter.—Calories per lb., 3558.92; calories per kilog., (2.2 lbs.), 7829.62.
2. Oleomargarine. — Calories per lb., 3699.70; calories per kilog., 8139.34.

These answers are given both in calories by pound and calories by kilogram.

MR. WALTER DUNCAN.

*Mr. TOBIN:

1. Is Walter Duncan, now in the employ of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the individual on whose conduct and character an inquiry was held whilst he was chief of detectives of Toronto?
2. Was the department aware of the result of that inquiry when this man was appointed?
3. In view of the fact that at the said inquiry several witnesses gave evidence doubting his veracity, is it the intention of the Government to keep him on the staff of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes. Mr. Walter Duncan holds an honourable discharge from the Chief Constable, after thirty years' service in the Toronto force, and the highest recommendations from the Police Magistrate, the County Crown Attorney and the Chief Constable of the city of Toronto, and has proved himself a most efficient special agent.

BAGOT COUNTY—POSTAL INSPECTION.

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot):

1. Has the county of Bagot been transferred, for postal inspection purpose, from the district of Montreal to the district of Sherbrooke?
2. If so, why?
3. Who asked for said transfer, for what purpose and who recommended said change?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. In the interests of the Postal Service.
3. Transfer made towards equalizing the territory of Post Office Inspectorates and improving the service.

BURBIDGE—MESSINES.

Mr. BALL:

1. Is there a station on the Maniwaki Division of the Canadian Pacific railway known as Burbidge?
2. Has the name of the post office at Burbidge been changed?
3. If so, when, and what is the present name?
4. At whose instance was the change of name made?
5. Was it done on the recommendation or with the concurrence of the member for Wright county?
6. Was the original name Burbidge given in honour of the first judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada?
7. What are the reasons for substituting another name?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. 1st January, 1920, to Messines.
4. A petition was received from the majority of the residents of the place, advocating the change.
5. No.
6. Yes.
7. The request of the majority of the patrons of the office.

INTERNATIONAL PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE ON COMMERCE.

*Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton):

Will the Government submit to Parliament at this session a copy of the report of the International Parliamentary Conference on Commerce which closed on May 7th instant, after having adopted a series of resolutions, the first of which requested that international legislation be enacted to control responsibility in sea transportation?

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, the Government was not represented at this Conference and had no connection with it. No copy of the report of the Conference has been received by the Government. If a copy should be received, there will be no objection to making it available for the use of any hon. member who may desire to peruse it. It does not, however, seem to be a report which would in the ordinary course be submitted to Parliament.

NEUVILLE STATION, C.N.R.

Mr. PARENT:

1. Is is true (a) that the Canadian Northern railway station at Neuville, county of West Quebec, has no telephone accommodation; (b) that, consequently, this state of affairs is very inconvenient to the travelling public; (c) that twenty odd dollars would be sufficient to provide this improvement to the service?
2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to take steps to remedy such a situation?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. There is a telephone in Neuville station.
2. Answered by No. 1.

ROSS RIFLE FACTORY.

Mr. BUREAU:

1. What was the inventory value of the machinery in the Ross rifle factory at Quebec when taken over by the Government?
2. What amount has been received from the sale of this machinery up to the end of the last fiscal year?
3. Was said machinery and other physical assets of the plant disposed of by public tender, through commission agents or by private sale?
4. What method is being adopted at present in regard to the disposal of machinery still on hand?
5. Who is the officer in charge, where and on whose recommendation was he appointed?
6. What prior experience has he had in regard to the valuation and disposal of machinery?
7. Has the Government a special auditor at the plant to check up prices, methods of sale and amounts received from the assets disposed of?
8. Is it true that some of the machinery in the plant has been broken up and sold as scrap metal instead of being sold intact at present market value?

Hon. Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. The Canadian Apprisal Company made inventory values as follows:

Reproductive value.. .. .. ..$875,000
Sales value.. .. ..$500,000

2. Approximately $400,000.
3. The means adopted for the sale of the machinery and other assets of the plant were intended to meet conditions as they occurred, and are as follows:

(a) By the circulation of printed lists;
(b) By advertising;
(c) By assistance from machinery firms;
(d) By personal calls and correspondence.

4. Machinery is now being sold as in "3" above, and in accordance with a price list.

5. Mr. W. S. Fisher is the commissioner in charge, and was appointed by Order in Council in April, 1917.

6. He has wide business experience in foundry and hardware business.

7. No. Systematic auditing is carried out by departmental auditors, and a special audit on the premises is made periodically.

8. Yes, a few special machines have been broken up and sold as scrap. However, these were of special design for the manufacture of Ross rifles, and, being absolutely useless for any other purpose, were unsaleable.

EDMUNDSTON POST OFFICE AND CUSTOMS.

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. How much money was collected from the Collector of Customs at Edmundston, N.B., during the last fiscal year?

2. How much money was paid by the Postmistress at Edmundston, N.B., to the Post Office Department during the last fiscal year?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. $25,283.19.

2. $6,649.75.

MR. J. E. SMITH.

Mr. DEMERS:

1. Is Mr. J. E. Smith at present with the auditor of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment at Montreal, the same person who once held the position of chief accountant of that department in Ottawa?

2. What salary did he previously receive and what does he receive at present?

3. For what reason was he transferred to Montreal?

4. In what country was he born?

5. Has he seen service at the front, during the last war?

6. On whose recommendation was he appointed in Montreal?

Mr. HUGH CLARK (Parliamentary Secretary):

1. Mr. J. E. Smit, who was recently appointed Unit Auditor of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment at Montreal was previously acting chief accountant of the department in Ottawa.

2. $2,500 per annum, which he will continue to receive as Unit Auditor.

3. The position of auditor in a Unit requires a detailed knowledge of the procedure of all branches of the department. In this respect, Mr. Smit, who has been 3½ years in the accounting branch at head office, is thoroughly qualified and most suitable for this position, to which he has accordingly been transferred.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

4. England.

5. No. Mr. Smit was born a British subject. His parents who were Dutch by birth became naturalized British citizens. He has resided in Canada for over twelve years, is 45 years of age, married and has four children. His wife is English by birth and parentage.

6. On the recommendation of the Supervisor of Expenditures of the department.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

What were the average prices paid for anthracite coal in Canada in the years 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918 and 1919?

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Who are or who were the men engaged by the Civil Service Commission to re-classify the Civil Service at Ottawa?

2. When were they employed and at what rate of wages?

3. Are they still in the service of the Civil Service Commission, or are any of them in said service?

4. How much was paid to each of such assistants from date of engagement up to the end of April, 1920?

5. What is the total amount paid to the men so engaged from the date of the engagement to the end of April, 1920?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Parent):

For a copy of the Orders in Council: (a) concerning the establishment and the administration of a Board of Censors, (b) rules and instructions relating to said board, (c) letters and correspondence exchanged between the newspapers of Canada and abroad and said Board of Censors, or any of its members.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Chisholm):

For a copy of all telegrams, letters and other documents relating to the closing of the life saving station at Cheticamp, Inverness County, N.S.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Chisholm):

For a copy of all telegrams, letters and other documents referring to the application for the change in the site of the Scotch Hill post office, Inverness County, N.S.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Desaulniers):

For a copy of all correspondence, petitions, reports and other documents regarding the establishment of rural mail routes in the parishes of Champlain, Batiscan and St. Luc, in the County of Champlain, Quebec.

Mr. ROBB (for Mr. Boyer):

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, telegrams and affidavits passed between the Minister of Railways and Canals and Mr. Arcade Bissonnette and others, in connection with complaints made against M. St. Amour, Superintendent of the Soulanges Canal.

FURTHER LEGISLATION FOR THIS SESSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) if the House has before it notice of all the legislation which the Government intends to introduce at this session, or whether further legislation will be brought down?

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That matter is not yet absolutely determined. I hope to be able to make an announcement to my hon. friend in a day or two.

MORNING SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield): Have the Government any announcement to make in regard to morning sittings? There has been practically little or no committee work during this session, and there is very little now, and, in the historic phrase of the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid), "We want to go home."

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member will refer to the Votes and Proceedings he will find that there is a notice of motion covering his question.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I had not noticed it.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 25th, the debate on the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Monsieur l'Orateur——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on in French.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Fafard) having opened his speech in English and closed it in English, I thought that I should show appreciation of that courtesy by opening my remarks in the language which falls with such melody from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I will endeavour to close my remarks in the same language.

Notwithstanding the very violent remarks that were made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) in opposition to the Budget introduced by the Finance Minister (Sir Henry Drayton) I venture to express my general approval of that Budget, and I wish also to extend to the Finance Minister my congratulations on the ability, courage and candour which he displayed in introducing the Budget. I entirely commend him for removing the 5 per cent and 7½ per cent special war tax or revenue tax; which tax was never intended for any other than revenue purposes. I can understand that with the pressing needs of the country for additional revenue there would be strong inclination on the part of the Government to retain that tax. But its retention would have been a great mistake and open to misinterpretation; furthermore, its removal clears the way for that general revision of the tariff which has been promised and which will come a little later. I also wish to commend the Finance Minister in that he is taking steps to raise his revenue by a tax on what may be regarded as luxuries,—at least, by a tax which will rest upon those who are most able to pay it.

The amendment introduced by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) starts out with finding fault with the Government for not having carried out an alleged promise of the ex-Finance Ministed (Sir Thomas White) last year in regard to an inquiry which was to be made and followed by a revision of the tariff. The attitude of the member for Shelburne and Queen's in that regard is all the more remarkable when we remember his attitude on tariff revisions in former years. If you refer to the Budget Speech delivered by the member for Shelburne and Queen's in 1904, you will find a reference to tariff revision in these words:

> But, sir, though we speak of that as an outline of the method by which there might be a detailed tariff change, we have to consider the question of things as they are to-day. We desire to deal with certain things as they present themselves to us to-day; we desire to deal with matters of urgency, reserving the question of a more general and more detailed tariff revision until an early date—I would say, hopefully, next session, but at all events as soon as a proper inquiry can be made.

These remarks were uttered by the member for Shelburne and Queen's on June 7, 1904, when he was Finance Minister of this country. I submit that in these remarks you have as distinct a promise of tariff revision as was made by the member for Leeds when Finance Minister last year. No commission of inquiry was appointed immediately following that session. Time went on, and again in the session of 1905, on the 6th of July, the hon. gentleman brought down his Budget Speech. There was a further promise at that time of tariff revision. The promise of the previous year had not been carried out, and he asked for further delay. The matter went on for another year and in the Budget Speech of May, 1906, further excuses were given for his not having brought on this inquiry and the tariff revision which he had promised on the 7th of June, 1904. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that tariff revision did not take place until the 29th of November, 1906, or about two years and a half after the promise had been made. Now, this Government has not gone quite so far as that in this instance, and I submit that if there were reasons justifying delay at that time, in a time of peace, many reasons will suggest themselves to hon. gentlemen on both sides as justifying any delay which has taken place in connection with this tariff revision,—a revision which must be made in the very near future.

The member for Shelburne and Queen's was not, in my estimation, quite correct when he said that for many years our tariff discussions had been more or less "tinged" with free trade "Tinged" it strikes me, is rather too mild a term to apply to the abuse, I think I may call it—to the very strong utterances; to the denunciations,—that are to be found in speeches made from one end of this country to the other by hon. gentlemen opposite prior to 1896. The Liberal platform of 1893 contained this plank, among others:

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford relief to the trouble under which this country labours.

Now, I wonder if that is what the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's calls a "tinge" of free trade? Or would it be found in the remarks of the late Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier prior to 1896, when he said:

> If the Liberals are successful they will cut off the head of protection absolutely and trample on its body.

The hon. member for Red Deer said that that operation took place; that the head was cut off somewhere near the tail. My reading of the tariff changes that were brought about in 1897 leads me to the conclusion that only a very few hairs were cut off the end of the dog's tail,—hardly enough for the dog to notice. At all events, there was a very decided "tinge" of free trade in that denunciation of protection by the late Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I would ask this House to place along with that statement these words which were uttered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on January 13, 1911, when a deputation of manufacturers came to Ottawa to present to him their demands. I especially direct the attention of the hon. member for Red Deer to this quotation, because that hon. gentleman speaking in this House yesterday, said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had never said a word in favour of protection. The word "protection" he said, never came from the lips of Sir Wilfrid Laurier except by way of condemnation. These are the words uttered on that occasion by the late Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

> There is one thing in which this Government can take some pride and that is that we have been very very careful even when we had to reform, not to disturb conditions then prevailing in relation to the manufacturing interests of the country.

Those words contrast very strongly with the words he uttered previously to his coming into power when he was going to cut off the head of protection and trample on its body. You will, Sir, no doubt recall these remarks of Sir Richard Cartwright.

> Our policy is death to protection. Our policy from first to last has been to destroy the villanous system of protection which has been grinding out the vitals of the country.

These are the words of Sir Louis Davies:

> We are attacking this policy year after year. This is an accursed system, a system accursed by God and man.

It certainly was cursed enough by man at all events previously to 1896. Then we have this statement of the Hon. William Paterson previously to 1896:

> We declare for freedom of trade.

I have not any record of remarks made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) previously to that date, but I think I am stating a fact when I say that that hon. gentleman was backing up the position taken by the Liberal party during the years previous to 1896. The fact, however, remains that, although these people had been denouncing protection from one end of the country to the other as the vilest thing ever conceived of by any man or any government, when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's and the Hon. Mr. Paterson went to Washington, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's took care that protection was maintained on coal, and the Hon. Mr. Paterson took care that the duty was not eliminated from biscuits, a commodity which he was engaged in manufacturing. The virus of free trade has manifested itself at various times in certain hon. gentlemen opposite in one guise or another. Such as "unrestricted reciprocity," "continental free trade," "free trade as it exists in England." All of these had been inscribed on the banners of hon. gentlemen opposite previously to their coming into power in 1896.

Let me, Sir, call your attention for a moment to some tariff changes which were made in 1894. Reference has been made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's to "infant industries"; but this term was not coined by the hon. member; infant industries were referred to from the early days when the National Policy was first inaugurated. The general principle was that these industries, when starting in Canada, should be given a certain measure of protection until they got on their feet, so to speak, and, I maintain that that principle was adhered to by the Conservative party while they were in power. The National Policy was introduced into this country in 1878. What happened in 1894? Let me give one instance, in the matter of agricultural implements. The duty imposed on agricultural implements in 1878 was 35 per cent. Supposing a manufacturer of agricultural implements started manufacturing immediately after the National Policy was adopted, by 1894 his industry would have been in existence some thirteen or fourteen years, and the infant would have grown to be at least a good-sized boy. The Conservative party in power in 1894 introduced very radical changes into the tariff; for instance, they cut the duty on agricultural implements down from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, or a straight cut of 15 per cent. The trouble with hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was this, that, when he was in Opposition and before he came into power, while he talked destruction to protection, while he spoke of the iniquity of having any duty at all on agricultural implements, and while he spoke with disdain of infant industries, when that hon. gentleman took office as Minister of Finance, and apparently during the whole time that he was Minister of Finance, if we are to judge by the course he adopted, he accepted the legal definition of the word "infant", which, I think I am right in saying is, that a person is an infant until he is twenty-one years old. At all events, he apparently thought these industries should not be touched for at least twenty-one years, and that is practically the course he followed, because in the whole fifteen years that he was Minister of Finance of this country, all the reduction that was made on agricultural implements was a reduction from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent. The reduction was not even one of 2½ per cent, because in 1896 the valuation for duty, for instance, of a binder was $80 and at 20 per cent ad valorem a duty of $16 would be collected on a binder. But when the duty was reduced under the Fielding Tariff of 1907 from 20 to 17½ per cent, the valuation of a binder for purposes of duty was immediately increased from $80 to $100, so that a duty of $17.50 was collected on a binder, whereas formerly, at the 20 per cent rate, $16 had been collected. Therefore, I say that during the whole fifteen years that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they did not reduce the duty on agricultural implements by one farthing. Some consideration should be shown to the party on this side of the House for what they have done as regards agricultural implements. As regards mowers and binders, for instance, the first big cut was made from 35 to 20 per cent in 1894, and since this Government came into power, the duty on those articles has been reduced to 12½ per cent. A little later on, I shall have a little more to say as regards that and as regards the position taken by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in that connection.

I said that drastic changes were made in the tariff in 1894. In that year sixty-five articles were added to the free list, and the duty was materially reduced on 165 other articles. Between 1882 and 1895, by gradually lessening the duty or by removing it entirely, the Government had remitted in taxes $43,630,000. The customs and excise taxes per head in 1894 under the Conservatives were $5.42, but in 1899 under the Liberal Government they were $6.58, and the proof of that statement will be found in the report on Trade and Navigation for 1899 at page 7. The average rate of duty from 1892 to 1896 on all goods coming into the country amounted to 17.47 per cent and between 1897 and 1899, it amounted to 17.17 per cent, or a slight fractional reduction after 1896. But the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's says that they entirely changed the National Policy, that so great had been the changes made by himself and the Government of which he was a member that the National Policy ceased to exist in 1897.

If that is true, the National Policy ceased to exist the moment any changes were made in the original draft. If the reasoning of the hon. gentleman is sound, I maintain I am right in that contention.

Now what great changes did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) effect in 1897? Under the heading of Animals and Agricultural and Animal Products there are 88 items in the tariff. These are things which are produced by the farmer, and in which he is directly and very materially interested. Of these 88 items the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, then Finance Minister in the Laurier Government, reduced the duty on four articles, increased the duty on five, and left the duty precisely as it was on the other seventy-nine items. That was the extent of the changes made in the National Policy by the hon. gentleman then.

Now let us come down to the year 1907 and see what he did. He has spoken very reverently of free trade. He says it is of divine origin. Evidently his reverence for free trade has been so great that when in office he thought it too sacred a thing to touch. In 1907, on butter, cheese, eggs, lard, apples, fresh meats, meats in the barrel, rye, wheat, wheat flour, oats, hay, live hogs and wool, he left the tariff exactly as he found it when he came into office. On canned meats he raised the duty from 25 to 27½ per cent. On beans he added 10 cents a bushel, on buckwheat, peas and potatoes he increased the duty by 5 cents a bushel. On vegetables he added 5 per cent. On animals he increased the duty 5 per cent. Out of 23 articles sold by the farmer he made one free, namely, corn; he increased the tariff on nine articles, and on the other thirteen left the tariff exactly as it was in 1897, and those are all things which the farmer sells.

Now let us take some of the principal things which the farmer buys and see what was done by this one-time advocate of free trade. On cultivators, seed drills, horse rakes, harrows, ploughs and farm wagons, bags, salt, tea, boots and shoes and white cotton, the duties for the time being were left as they were. Binder twine he made free. On coal oil, coal, common glass and wire nails he slightly reduced the duties. He increased the duty on cutlery, buggies, grey cotton, coffee, biscuits and agricultural implements. Therefore, of these 23 articles which the farmer has to buy, the duty was left untouched on twelve, reduced on five, and increased on the other six.

In regard to the credit which the hon. gentleman has frequently taken to himself for making binder twine and some other articles free I might call attention to this fact: Where as binder twine was made free and the duty on coal oil reduced, it is also true that the bounties were extended far beyond those in vogue previous to 1896. Speaking from memory I think that between $200,000 and $300,000 had been paid out in bounties on iron and steel up to 1896. After that, the bounties were extended to Manila fibre, going into the manufacture of binder twine, to petroleum, and several other things, and in the years which followed something like $17,000,000 was paid out in bounties. I have given these details because I should like, if possible, to form a correct estimate of where certain hon. gentlemen stand in regard to the tariff. In April, 1903, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's speaking in this House said:

> We think there is nothing in the present circumstances of the country which calls for a general revision of the tariff, and there are some strong reasons why any extensive changes in the tariff schedules would be inopportune.

Further on he said:

> But it is the simple truth that we no longer feel the need of reciprocity as we once did. There will be no disposition on our part, I am sure, to clamour for reciprocity with the United States.

That was what the hon. member, then Minister of Finance, said in April, 1903. At the next session, in 1904, he said:

> We quite realize the difficulties connected with tariff changes. We have always had a strong opinion that there was a great deal of merit in a policy of tariff stability.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman had a great deal of confidence in tariff stability subsequent to 1896, but previous to 1896 he did not like tariff stability, and apparently he does not want tariff stability now, although it seems to me that conditions today are such as would lead almost anybody to feel that it is in the interests of the country that there should be stability.

Coming to 1906, an incident occurred in that year which showed, I think very clearly, that the Finance Minister of that day favoured the principle of protection. The Grand Trunk Railway had sent some steel rails to the United States to be re-rolled, there being no machinery for doing that in Canada at that time, and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, then Finance Minister, would not permit those rails to re-enter Canada without a tax of 25 per cent being imposed on the labour of re-rolling. If that is not an indication of favouring the principle of protection, I, for one, cannot understand the English language.

I want to refer the House to a few other statements which I am sure they will find extremely interesting, and particularly so in view of the platforms which have been placed before this House by the two parties opposite. I would refer hon. gentlemen to page 5621 of Hansard of 1907. The House was then in committee on a resolution fixing the duty on agricultural implements at 17½ per cent, and an hon. member, now Senator Schaffner, had moved that the duty be reduced to 10 per cent. The Minister of Finance, the present member for Shelburne and Queen's, opposed that reduction. He said:

> My belief is that if this motion were passed . . . . we would strike a severe blow at one of the great industries of the country. I believe the International Harvester Company would find it to its interest to close up its business in Hamilton, at least so much of it as is devoted to mowers and binders, and have them made at the American branch and bring them from the United States. The factory in Hamilton is an American concern. With a moderate duty we have induced American capital to come into Canada and to establish that great industry, and after we have brought it in and established it in Canada I believe that if we were to pass this resolution the company operating that industry would find it profitable to close the Hamilton factory and bring in goods which they make in the United States.

That was the expression of opinion of a man who had been for ten years Minister of Finance and who had consequently given close study to fiscal matters. He says that if you reduce the duty on agricultural implements to 10 per cent you will close that industry in Hamilton. There was a specific instance which the hon. member gave. Now he and those who support him say: "Remove the duty entirely; take all the duty off." I would ask my hon. friend what he thinks would be the fate of certain industries if the duty were entirely removed. On that occasion the Hon. Mr. Patterson, whose remarks will be found at page 5582, said:

> I do not disguise the fact that we propose to give these people nearly the amount of reduction in duty that has been made. For it must be remembered that 17½ per cent is no more than a revenue tariff.

I may also quote a statement made by Mr., now Senator Turriff, which may be found at page 5624 of Hansard of that year:

> Now coming to the present day, the Tariff Commission got information all over the country, and I do not think the farmers of the West, at all events, asked for a great reduction such as is proposed by this resolution on agricultural implements. . . They therefore asked that the duties be left alone. . . I say nothing further except that I shall give the Government hearty support on this question.

Mr. Knowles then member for Moosejaw speaking on that occasion said he would support the Government for the following reason:

> I believe the policy of the Government is in the interests of the country.

These are opinions expressed in 1907 by hon. gentlemen who declared at that time their opposition to reducing the duty on agricultural implements and their support of a tariff of 17½ per cent. I therefore say that the position taken then is not consistent with that which hon. gentlemen opposite are taking at the present time. I desire to add to the foregoing quotations. I statement made by the late Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in regard to this matter. In March, 1911, he said in this House:

> While we limited our negotiations to that—that is, natural products, referring to the reciprocity pact—in doing this I know we have not gone as far as certain sections of the country wanted us to go. A certain section wanted free implements altogether, but we did not think it prudent or advisable to go that far.

Further on he says:

> If the duty were suddenly removed it would mean the annihilation of millions of capital overnight and the non-employment of thousands of operators.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is on the other side of the House an hon. gentleman for whom I have a great deal of regard. He is a very genial gentleman; I refer to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster). That hon. gentleman is great on resolutions; indeed, I might describe him as the great resoluter of the House of Commons. Last year on the 25th of March, the hon. member for Brome moved an amendment on a motion, I think, to go into Supply. The gist of that amendment was that the House should immediately accept the reciprocity pact of 1911 and that all staple food products should be made free on reciprocal lines and that farm and garden implements, etc., should also be free. It might be interesting to recall some references made on that occasion by the hon. member for Brome concerning the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). The latter gentleman at that time did not sit quite so close to the hon. member for Brome as he sits to-day. He was on this side of the House but was gradually moving down to the far end and a little later got pretty close to the cross benches, finally completing the circle by landing where we see him to-day. The hon. gentleman's course in the House is typical of his course in connection with fiscal matters; he moves somewhat in a circle. This fact was evidently recognized by the hon. member for Brome, who on the occasion to which I refer pictured the ship of state with the Acting Prime Minister the present member for Leeds (Sir Thomas White) as captain, who was being warned by the starboard watch and the port watch. The hon. member then added these words:

> Then approaches with swift tread the quartermaster from Shelburne and Queen's and he says: "Captain, I belong to neither the starboard nor to the port watch. I believe in party government, a party of one. I tender you, captain, my independent support until I consider it is time for me and my friends to unite and make you walk the plank.

To this statement the hon. member for Brome adds:

> I do not know whether I can congratulate or commiserate the Acting Prime Minister, the captain of the ship, for the support he gets from the eloquent and revered quartermaster from Shelburne and Queen's.

I wonder just how much the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's thinks of the support which he gets now from the hon. member for Brome in his amendment. That amendment of the hon. member for Brome on that occasion was opposed by all on this side of the House and, I think, by practically all of those who now sit in the third party. I know it was opposed very strenuously by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg), and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). All of these gentlemen voted, and many of them spoke, against the amendment. What was said by the hon. member for Marquette on that occasion? What reason did he give for opposing the amendment of the hon. member or Brome,—an amendment which was proposing many things that are found in the platform of the third party to-day? He said, as will be found on page 821 of Hansard:

> If the amendment were accepted it would mean the overthrow of the Government and a general election, with all the necessary turmoil that would ensue. . . . . I say that it would mean the plunging of the country into a general election and that is not desirable at this stage. It is wholly undesirable for several reasons, which I do not need to enumerate.

He charges the hon. member for Brome with having introduced a resolution for no other purpose than to embarrass the Government in carrying on the business of the country. Well, I wonder what he considers is the object of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's in the amendment which that hon. gentleman has moved to this Budget? Is it not for the purpose of embarrassing the Government in their conduct of the business of the country? If accepted will it not put the country into the turmoil of a general election? All the reasons for which he condemned the motion of the hon. member for Brome in March 1919 will apply with equal force to the condemnation of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's which I assume, he intends to support.

That amendment of the hon. member for Brome was moved in the first part of the session of 1919 and was taken exception to very strongly by the hon. gentlemen I have named, but on June 9, the great resoluter on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Brome, introduced another resolution, the terms of which were practically the same, in substance and principle, as the terms of the amendment which he had proposed in March. Now ten weeks had passed since his former resolution had been condemned in unmeasured terms, but the hon. member for Marquette, the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's had experienced a change of heart. A change had come over the spirit of their dreams in these ten weeks and these same hon. gentlemen who had charged the hon. member for Brome with trying to embarrass the Government, and with having introduced a motion for the purpose of trying to throw the country into the turmoil of an election, got up two and a half months later to support the second amendment just as strongly as they had condemned the amendment on the former occasion.

Let us refer to some remarks made by some of these hon. gentlemen when the first amendment was introduced in March. I refer to them because they are indicative of the opinions which were held at that time on fiscal matters. Take, for instance, the hon. member for Red Deer who, speaking in the House on the 25th March, 1919, said:

> In the year 1896, the so-called Liberal party came into power in this country, and in 1897 they introduced some trifling reductions of the tariff, and put two or three articles of importance upon the free list. They also introduced the British preference, which was also a fairly substantial piece of tariff reduction, and then they went to sleep for ten years. That is not the way Mr. Gladstone tackled the tariff. For ten years, from 1897 to 1907, my hon. friend—

Referring on that occasion to the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie):

—who is so excited now—who says there is to be no such thing as waiting—waited with absolute patience during that long term, because the tariff was practically passed over for ten years, and then it was—I was going to say tackled, but that would be an absurd misuse of language—flirted with again in the year 1907.

Well, what happened to the tariff in 1907? Absolutely trifling alterations were made to it, and in some cases, so far from following the example of Mr. Gladstone, the tariff was raised, in favour of those woollen goods about which my hon. friend is so anxious at the present moment.

Two months later the hon. member for Red Deer was raving in the wildest manner against the iniquity of having a duty on woollens in a climate like that of Canada. This shows the change in the position adopted by the hon. gentleman in the course of a few weeks. In the same debate the hon. gentleman made use of these words which I commend to hon. gentlemen opposite:

The manufacturers of Canada were told by some one high in the authority of the Liberal party on that day, that they were not hurt in the reciprocity agreement.

He was referring to the spring of 1911 and he says that at that time the manufacturers had been assured that they were not hurt and would not be hurt, by the reciprocity agreement. Let me quote a few more sentences from the hon. gentleman:

When one thinks of the fifteen years' record of the Liberals in power, which practically amounted to the tariff being untouched, and not proposed to be touched in any way worthy the name in the reciprocity agreement.

Again:

What patience they had in power compared with their eagerness and impetuosity when they are in Opposition.

I venture to say that there has been no person in this House who has given evidence of the virtue and the fault to a greater degree than the hon. gentleman himself. He gave evidence of the virtue of patience when he sat in support of the hon. gentleman who was then Finance Minister, the present hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, and he is as impetuous as any youth in the eagerness of his demands now for tariff changes notwithstanding the condition in which the country is. Note these further words of the hon. gentleman:

And yet my hon. friends opposite have such confidence in their ability that they say, "In your very first Budget, within three months of peace being declared, we want you to make ten times as drastic tariff changes as we were able to do in fifteen years in the times of piping peace." Is that a reasonable proposition to bring before this country on a motion for going into Supply?

Two months later the hon. gentleman was taking that very course; the course which he condemned in March he was willing to accept as the proper course in June of the very same year.

If the hon. member for Red Deer were here I would like to ask him one or two questions. I would like to ask him in regard to his own position on tariff matters and whether it has been as consistent as he would like the country to believe. I entered this House in 1908 at the same time as the hon. member for Red Deer, and I have no remembrance of a single occasion when the hon. gentleman ever did anything more than quote Cobden, Bright, Peel, "Lord This" and "Duke That" in regard to free trade in tariff matters. The hon. gentleman talks about Gladstone—what would Gladstone do if he were here?—he talks about Peel and Cobden. Well, I venture to say that if any of these men who are mentioned as free traders in theory, and who might also be free traders in practice, were members of this House they wouldn't sit here for twelve years without going on record as having introduced at least one resolution proclaiming their convictions in regard to free trade. Yet during all the time that the hon. member for Red Deer has sat in this House he has never presented one single specific resolution along the free trade lines to test out the House in regard to the matters which he claims to have so much at heart.

Not only that, but may I refer you to what he said in this House in the month of April, 1909? You will find his words at page 4704 of Hansard of that date. He was discussing the tariff. The Budget had been brought down by the Minister of Finance, the present hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's. The hon. member for Red Deer got up and, after lauding to the skies the Finance Minister for his Budget, and after congratulating him on resisting the demands of the manufacturers, when, as a matter of fact the only changes made in the tariff of 1909 were changes in the interest of the manufacturers, he went on to use these words:

Whereas, under what I still claim is a revenue tariff, you have had a series of surpluses under the able administration of the Minister of Finance.

So that in 1909 the hon. member for Red Deer did not regard the tariff as a protective tariff. He says distinctly that it was not a protective tariff, but that it was a revenue tariff, and he reiterated his claim to that effect. Note these words, page 4717, Hansard:

Give them (the farmers) a chance in the markets of the world by keeping your tariff down to a revenue basis.

The hon. gentleman says "give them a chance"—give them a chance by keeping the revenue tariff not by having the tariff removed. He was then sitting here supporting the Government of which the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was Minister of Finance. Again in January, 1910, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) expressed himself as very well satisfied indeed with the way things were going. As a matter of fact, the hon. member when supporting the Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier was extremely patient. At that time apparently he was in no hurry for free trade, for he lauded the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on every occasion when he brought down his Budget; and we have only to compare the tariff of that date with the tariff of 1894 to see that there was very little difference between them, and no difference whatever so far as the protective principle was concerned, that principle having been admitted, in practice at least, by both parties.

But while the course now advocated by the hon. member for Red Deer is along the line of wiping out entirely all duties, what course is being taken in England at the present time? I have here a clipping taken from the Montreal Star of May 22, signed by the well-known correspondent "Windermere," and having reference to the attitude of the British Government in regard to redeeming their election pledges to the farmers of Great Britain. He cables:

Their Agricultural Bill, now before the House of Commons, is of especial concern to Canada as the "Future granary of the Empire."

Taking the wheat prices of 1919 as a basis, the Bill established a guarantee of 68 shillings per quarter of 504 pounds weight for wheat, and 46 shillings per quarter of 336 pounds for oats. But as wages and the whole cost of production have greatly increased since 1919, the Bill decrees that the minimum prices for 1921 and subsequent years shall be fixed by three commissioners, and four years' notice is to be given before this system of guaranteed prices can be ended.

There is the attitude of the Government in free trade England towards the farmer. If that is not a protective measure, I do not understand what protection means.

May I also call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to one or two other features of British policy? What about the embargo on Canadian cattle; is not that protection? Why, if they placed a duty of $100 per head on the cattle we want to ship to that country, they could not exclude them any more effectually. It is a drastic form of protection beyond all question. Then what about their attitude in regard to fixing the price of bacon? They have fixed a very low price for imported bacon, but no restrictions whatever have been placed on the home grown article; what is that but protection? I could mention many other articles of food on which there is a specific duty, and others on which there is an ad valorem duty, and those duties in many cases are very much higher than the duties we impose. For instance, there is no duty on gasoline coming into Canada; there is a duty of 12 cents a gallon on gasoline imported into Great Britain. Our highest duty on coffee is 2 cents a pound; their duty is 6 cents a pound. Our duty on tea is 10 per cent, except where it is imported direct, when it is admitted free; their duty is 24 cents a pound. In addition they have duties on condensed milk, plums, prunes, raisins, cocoa, chicory, figs, molasses and other articles of food, all of which must be regarded as necessaries of life. And yet hon. gentlemen like the hon. member for Red Deer would have us believe that no duties are imposed in England, when as a matter of fact their customs and excise duties per head of population are pretty near double those imposed in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to direct your attention to fiscal matters in 1909. In that year the Liberal party discovered a new star, and the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) entered this House as Minister of Labour. In 1910, under the direction of that hon. gentleman, a report was prepared on wholesale prices in Canada over a period of twenty years from 1890 to 1909. I would call particular attention to these words in the preface to that report:

For some time past, especially since the beginning of the present century, one of the most important features of the general economic situation in Canada has been a rapid and continuous advance in prices and the cost of living. When the history of 1910 comes to be written not the least memorable of its happenings to be chronicled will probably be the great agitation, partaking of the proportions of a national revolt, against the high prices of food.

I ask the House to note the concluding phrase:

—partaking of the proportions of a national revolt, against the high prices of food.

Mr. SMITH: Who said that?

Mr. EDWARDS: That is at the beginning of the report prepared at the instance of the present leader of the Opposition and submitted by him to the House and to the country with his approval. That is a very startling statement, Mr. Speaker—that the prices of food had risen to such a point in the Dominion that the people were on the point of revolting. That sentence is a rather severe comment on the praise which has been bestowed by certain gentlemen opposite on the conduct of affairs when they were in power. If, as is asserted so frequently by hon. gentlemen opposite, the remedy for excessive prices for manufactured goods is to remove all tariff walls, manifestly the way to bring down the high price of food is to open our doors to the surplus food products of the world. That is apparently what these gentlemen think.

In the report to which I have referred, which was prepared and presented to this House and the country in 1910 and which, it was said, was of great use to the negotiators who went to Washington to negotiate the reciprocity pact, 230 articles were considered. Of the 230 articles, 40 represented what the farmer sells and 190 represented things which he and others have to buy. So convincing was that report that the Government of the day considered that it would be in the interests of Canada, in the interests of the farmers of Canada, to whom they were appealing for support, to take the duty entirely off the 40 articles that the farmer had to sell and leave it absolutely untouched on everything that he had to buy. That was the conclusion that was come to by them in 1911 in the reciprocity pact, and that is the argument that they are presenting to this House and to the country to-day. Yet they pretend, as do the little group who sit angularly to my right, that they are the friends of the farmers of this country. I want to place before you, Mr. Speaker, some of the prices which obtained at that time,—prices which the present leader of the Opposition said were so high that the people were on the point of revolution. The following statement shows, the lowest prices obtained for any of these articles in the whole twenty years, the highest prices obtained for any of these articles during that period, and also the average price. Bear in mind that these figures are wholesale prices, which means that the farmer realized much less than the amounts given:

These are the prices taken from a report prepared at the instance and under the direction of the present leader of the Opposition covering a period of twenty years. I may add in passing that these figures show that on all except two articles the lowest price was obtained during the time that these hon. gentlemen were in power. But, Sir, what do we find? Again I direct your attention to the remarks in the preface to that report: that prices obtained by the farmers at that time had gone to such a pitch that in order to bring these agrarian plutocrats to their knees; in order to bring them to time; in order to stem the tide of revolution which was threatening on account of the high prices which were being obtained by the farmers, they made this proposal to throw the doors of Canada open to the surplus farm products of the world, at the same time compelling the farmer to continue to pay duty on everything that he had to buy. When butter rose to 22 cents a pound; when eggs were 16 cents a dozen and milk 15 cents a gallon, the dreams of the then Minister of Labour were disturbed by visions of the red flag of revolution. Something had to be done to bring things down to a reasonable basis. Sixteen cents a dozen was far too much for a farmer to get for eggs; 22 cents was entirely too much for a farmer to get for a pound of butter. Why, it was preposterous; sixteen to eighteen cents a bag for potatoes—whoever heard tell of the like? Was there not every excuse for the people taking up arms in rebellion against that sort of thing? So my hon. friends proposed to open the doors of Canada and to admit an exportable surplus of 462,000,000 pounds of butter; to admit 256,000,000 dozen eggs in order to bring the price of this commodity down from 16 cents a dozen, and to let in 2,290,000,000 pounds of meat in order to bring down the exorbitant price of meat. The farmers were getting too much for their cattle when they were selling them at $4.26 a hundredweight. They were getting an exorbitant price when they were selling sheep at $3.94 a hundred and hogs at $5.52—why, that was an outrage indeed. Notwithstanding the fact that they had all these figures before them as to the prices obtaining at that time—these ridiculously low prices that the farmers were getting for their stuff, prices which meant that the farmers were leaving their lands because they were not able to make one-quarter of one per cent on their capital investment—notwithstanding all that, Sir, they proposed to open the doors of Canada to the surplus production of practically the whole world in order to bring down the prices that the farmers were obtaining for their produce. Yet these hon. gentlemen are obsessed with the idea that in the election of 1911 they were right and the people did not know what they were speaking about.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am not in the least surprised to hear that exclamation from the hon. member for Brome. In that "hear, hear," he is simply giving an example of that peculiar form of political, delusional insanity, if I might say so, whose saddest feature—

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order, and I would, with all cordiality, geniality and politeness draw the attention of the Speaker to the fact that to apply the word "insanity" to any remark made by an hon. gentleman is not Parliamentary, nor even polite.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have not yet heard the end of the sentence of the hon. member for Frontenac. If it be his intention to apply the word "insanity" to an hon. member, the point of order is well taken.

Mr. EDWARDS: I had not the slightest intention of applying that term to the hon. member for Brome. What a useless waste of words it would be for me to say anything reflecting on the mental calibre of the hon. member! He has given in this House instances enough of his mental capacity or incapacity, according to the way in which one looks at it. Why should I waste time referring to the mental capacity of the hon. member? I merely said that the trouble with these hon. gentlemen was that they still think that they were right and that the people were wrong in 1911, and that is a form of delusional insanity, the saddest feature of which is that it is apparently incurable. If the hon. member for Brome thinks that is a reflection upon the gray matter which is inside that glistening dome of his, I can only express my extreme regret and pass on to the next point.

The hon. member for Brome would have us believe that he is an out-and-out free trader; at least, that is the line which he very frequently takes in this House. Is he an out-and-out free trader or is he under certain circumstances a very practical politician? Let us see what the Globe says in its issue of the 7th August, 1919, when it was reporting a very interesting occurrence which was taking place in Ottawa, namely, that last Liberal convention in which the hon. member for Brome held, I believe, the distinguished position of chairman of the resolution committee. One can readily understand why the hon. member was selected as chairman of the resolutions committee. He is the great "resoluter" of this House; he has been "resoluting" ever since he came into this House. True, he was put out of that little job this session, and I do not think he feels very comfortable about that. Another "resoluter" has taken the place formerly occupied by the hon. member for Brome. But on that occasion he was "resoluting" before that great convention, and this is what he is reported in the Globe to have said:

> I have got to say that we must keep the tariff as an engine of raising revenue.
>
> Voices—we have not.
> Mr. McMASTER: Well, until you devise and put into successful operation some other scheme, I submit that you have got to.

Therefore, while in this House he does not propose any scheme, while he simply denounces protection, hip and thigh, and announces himself as an out-and-out free trader, still, when he was in convention with a number of other hon. gentlemen who were looking for and devising ways and means of getting into power, he then became the practical politician and said: "Well, it is all right for me to talk free trade in order to catch those who have that bee in their bonnet; but when the question comes down to a matter of practical politics, you have to have a tariff for revenue purposes; you cannot get along without it." That is the position of the hon. member for Brome, and he is not the only one of that calibre on the other side of the House. We have the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), who declares himself as an out-and-out free trader. I am not very much disturbed by that, because the hon. member for Assiniboia may any day get word from that committee of fifteen to become an out-and-out protectionist, and he may change his policy when he gets the proper notification.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has been making speeches in various parts of this country; he was particularly active around Ontario before the elections which took place last fall, and he has made certain statements which I am going to challenge, notwithstanding the assurance of the hon. member himself that he knows all about economics from A to Z. I am going to question his right to that claim and also some of the arguments which he has advanced from time to time in various parts of this country. The hon. member for Marquette has said that the tariff is the cause of rural depopulation. I might ask the hon. member to consider this proposition. If a protective tariff or a revenue tariff be the cause of rural depopulation, how does the hon. member account for rural depopulation in free-trade England? Or if his statement be correct that if the farmers of Ontario had access to the markets across the line, there would be no further migration of the farmers; if he be correct that free entrance to the American market would mean so much to our farmers, then I would like him to explain why it is that rural depopulation is going on in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and other States, just as it has been going on in this country. There are no tariffs between the state of New York and the state of Pennsylvania, nor between the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg and other centres of population.

Why then is it that the rural population is leaving the farms if my hon. friend's contention be sound? The fact is that the rural population has been decreasing not only in this country but in every other country, and the tariff is not and cannot be said to be the reason for that rural depopulation. In the United States the rural population in 1890 was 63.9 per cent; in 1900, 59.5 per cent; and in 1910, 46.3 per cent; while in Canada in 1890, it was 68.1 per cent; in 1900, 62.4 per cent, and in 1910, 54.5 per cent. It is, I think, worth while noting that in each decade, with the exception of the state of Nevada, every state in the Union shows a decrease in the rural population. Speaking in this House in 1909, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark), said that during the first eight months of that year, more people had left the United States than had come into that country, and he brought that forward as an argument against the principle of protection in the United States. If his argument in that regard was sound, I might use the same argument against free trade because of the people leaving the farms and country districts in free trade England. I might even produce as an illustrious example the hon. member for Red Deer himself, and ask why he and thousands of others have seen fit to leave free trade England where they would have all the advantages of farming under free trade conditions, and come voluntarily to the Dominion of Canada to farm in a country where they are hampered by protective tariffs or any other kind of a tariff. Why is it, if conditions here are as bad as the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Marquette would have us believe, that we have people voluntarily leaving free trade Britain by the tens of thousands to take up farming in this country? Why have we people coming from the United States to farm in Canada? We certainly have very few people leaving Canada to farm in the United States, and we have no people leaving Canada to farm in England. That seems to me to indicate that conditions cannot be as bad in this country as these gentlemen would have us believe, and I am going to prove that. I want to say a few words more on this matter because of certain aspersions which have been cast on the province of Ontario and the farmers of Ontario by the hon. member for Marquette. I will not give the percentage of rural population in all of the provinces, but for the purpose of my argument I wish to give the percentage in Ontario. In 1891, the rural population was 61.2 per cent of the total population of the province, in 1901, 57.2 per cent, and in 1911, 47.4 per cent. In Michigan the percentage of rural population in 1890, was 65.1 per cent, in 1900, 61.7 per cent, and in 1910, 52.8 per cent. You will see from these figures that the percentage of rural population in Michigan is practically the same as in Ontario. Ontario and Michigan are very much alike in other respects. Farming, mining and lumbering are carried on in each, and there is practically the same number of farms in Michigan as in Ontario.

I would ask the members of the House to pay particular attention to the figures which I am going to give, and which I am giving because of certain statements which have been made at various times for political purposes by the hon. member for Marquette when he was endeavouring to influence the farmers of the province of Ontario. In the ten years from 1898 to 1908 the number of farms in the state of Michigan had increased from 175,000 in 1898 to 178,000 in 1908, and in the same ten years the number of farms in Ontario had increased from 177,000 to 183,000. I also want to give some figures which I have taken from the census returns for 1911 in Canada and the latest census returns compiled in the United States. In the ten years from 1900 to 1910, in the case of the United States, and from 1901 to 1911 in the case of Ontario, the value of Ontario farm buildings increased by $115,285,449, and the value of farm buildings in Michigan increased by $2,614,200. The value of live stock in Ontario in those ten years increased by $82,270,433 and in Michigan by $26,022,651. I would call particular attention to the figures I am now going to give, which seem to me to indicate very clearly that conditions in this country are not so bad as certain gentlemen, for political purposes, would have the country believe. Farm mortgages in the province of Ontario in the ten years I have mentioned decreased by $64,800,000, and chattel mortgages on farm stock by $280,424, or a total decrease in the ten years of mortgage indebtedness on farms and farm stock in the province of Ontario of $65,080,424. In the state of Michigan in the same ten years the mortgage indebtedness on farms increased by $77,602,491, and the indebtedness on chattel mortgages increased by $2,295,999, or a total increase in the mortgage indebtedness on farms and farm stock of $79,898,490 in the state of Michigan, as compared with a decrease in Ontario on practically the same number of farms of $65,080,824.

Let me point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that there was nothing to prevent farmers in the state of Michigan from entering urban centres like New York, Brooklyn or Detroit, which urban centres hon. gentlemen opposite claim it would be a great boon to the farmers of Ontario to enter. Notwithstanding all they say in that regard, the facts and figures are there, and I defy any hon. gentleman in this House whether he sits in the Opposition or with those people who are specially elected to look after the interests of the agriculturists in this country, to refute one single figure I have advanced, because they are all taken from our own official returns and from official returns which I obtained by writing to the city of Washington.

That is the condition in regard to Ontario and Michigan, but there are other States, and in order that I may not be accused of having taken merely an isolated case let me refer to conditions in the States of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio. According to official returns which I have here, and which any hon. gentleman is privileged to examine if he wishes—they are issued by the American Bureau of Census and are absolutely official—I find that in the ten years 1900 to 1910 there was a decrease in the number of farms in the State of New York of 12,070, in Pennsylvania a decrease of 5,854, and in Ohio a decrease of 5,336, or a total decrease for the three States of 23,260, whereas in Ontario in the same ten years there was an increase in the number of farms of over 6,000. In the improved acreage in these three States there was a decrease in the same period of 1,358,000 acres, whereas in Ontario there was an increase in improved farm acreage of 386,811 acres. In the total farm acreage there was a decrease in these three States of 1,893,000 acres, whereas in Ontario in the same ten years there was an increase of 822,261 acres. Every province in the Dominion of Canada, so far as the censuses of 1901 and 1911 are concerned, shows an actual increase in the acreage of farm lands occupied, as well as an increase in the improved farm acreage, except Nova Scotia, which shows a slight decrease of 19 acres as between 1901 and 1911.

There is another matter I want to take up, and that is the statement which is frequently made by certain hon. gentlemen that Canada's natural market is the United States. That statement in my opinion is absolutely ridiculous. Canada's natural market for her farm products is where there is a lack of those farm products—not where there is a greater surplus. The farmers of the county of Frontenac would not think of looking to the county of Leeds to sell their surplus cheese, because the county of Leeds produces more cheese than the county of Frontenac. It is just as reasonable to say that the natural market for Ontario wheat is Winnipeg, and the natural market for Quebec potatoes Prince Edward Island, as it is to say that the natural market for Canada's farm products is on the other side of the line. I make this statement, and I am prepared to prove it to the hilt, that of everything the farmer produces in this country and has to sell there is a greater surplus production in the United States, except in the one article of cheese, of which we have the greater surplus production. Outside of that, the United States have a greater surplus in every line of farm products. You would think, to hear the hon. member for Marquette talk, that there were no farmers on the other side of the line at all, that it was wholly a city population of consumers. What are the facts? The rural population of Canada in 1911 was 3,927,000, and in the United States 49,348,000. The number of farm holdings in Canada in 1911 was 714,000, and in the United States 6,361,000. The acreage of improved farm lands in Canada was 48,000,000 as compared with 478,000,000 in the United States. So we find that on the other side of the line there are thirteen people living in the country to every one living in the country in Canada, that there are nine farms in the United States to every one in Canada, and ten acres of improved farm land in the United States to one in Canada.

The following is a comparative table of the stock owned in Canada and the United States:

	1911. Canada.	1910. United States.
Number of horses and mules	2,598,000	25,163,000
Number of milch cows	2,595,000	21,801,000
Number of other cattle	3,930,000	47,279,000
Number of sheep.	2,174,000	57,216,000
Number of swine.	3,634,000	47,782,00
Production of butter (lbs.)	201,599,000	1,619,000,000

Production of eggs (doz.)	123,071,000	1,591,000,000
Production of wool (lbs.)	6,933,000	281,892,000
Production of wheat (bush.)	132,077,547	621,338,000
Production of oats (bush.)	245,393,425	1,186,341,000
Production of barley (bush.)	28,848,310	173,822,000
Production of potatoes (bush.)	55,368,000	400,000,000

222,000,000 bushels of potatoes produced in those States touching the Canadian border.

I should like to present to the House the following figures which show the exportable surplus of Canada and the United States in the years 1916, 1917 and 1918 of the commodities mentioned:

In 1916-17-18, it will be seen, we had a surplus of butter, cheese, eggs, lard, milk, cream and meats. I take these things because they come under the head of provisions. But while we had an exportable surplus of $57,863,000 worth of these products in 1916 the United States had a surplus of $271,000,000; in 1917 we had a surplus of $68,000,0000 and they had a surplus of $390,000,000; our surplus in 1918 was $99,000,000 and theirs was $644,000,000. Now, Sir, what I object to in connection with this amendment is its utter lack of consideration for the interests of the farmers. We imported last year over $9,000,000 worth of provisions from some thirty different countries and exported about $128,000,000 worth to thirty or forty different countries. We are exporting various farm products which I have named, such as butter, cheese, meats, etc., to thirty or forty countries throughout the world, and we have a proposition brought down by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's which would open the doors of Canada to the surplus productions of every country on the face of the globe. The surplus farm production of every country in the world, under the hon. gentleman's amendment, would have the right to come into Canada, while if we wanted to get our surplus products into outside markets we would have to face a duty For example, the surplus products of New Zealand would have free access to this country to compete with the products of our farmers, while if we wanted to put any of our surplus products on the markets of New Zealand we would have to pay from 25 to 30 per cent duty. If the object of my hon. friends opposite is attained, Australia will be able to send butter and cheese into Canada free of duty, although if we wanted to find a market for our surplus butter and cheese in that country we would find a duty imposed on those products. This is the condition of affairs which hon. gentlemen opposite desire to bring about. What have the farmers of Canada done to hon. gentlemen opposite—apart from what they did in 1911—that those gentlemen should try to do them this wrong? Mr. Speaker, it must be obvious to any one who gives the matter even the most cursory study that if the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite is carried into effect, if the platform of either the Liberal party or the other party is adopted, the doors of Canada will be opened to the surplus food products of the world; and so far as the Canadian farmer is concerned, there would in that event be only one absolute certainty: he would be obsolutely sure that he would never be allowed to get the highest price for anything he has to sell but would always have to take the lowest price. I say that for this reason: just as soon as the prices of any farm product would become attractive in Canada, our doors being open, the exporters of surplus products of the world would immediately take advantage of those attractive prices here, and down would come the prices of Canadian farm produce to the lowest level. That is the situation with which we are confronted by the proposal which hon. gentlemen put forward with such seriousness on the other side. Well, I have no doubt in my mind as to what would happen to those hon. gentlemen if they went before the people with a proposition of that kind and after the people had had an opportunity of sizing the matter up. I think there can be no doubt as to what the result would be. I have always maintained, Mr. Speaker, that any argument that might be advanced by protectionists in favour of protecting infant industries in Canada by a tariff is an argument that applies with peculiar and added force, to the tariff duty on farm produce, and I will tell you why. It has been alleged by hon. gentlemen in this House that the farmers of this country do not ask for favours. That is very true; I accept that statement. The farmers do not want favours but they do want a square and a fair deal. That is all they ask, and I say that it is absolutely unreasonable, unfair and unjust to ask the farmers of a country like Canada, with a climate such as we have, to compete on even terms with the farm products of all the countries on the face of the earth. I shall prove the unfairness of the proposition to the hilt. Take a map of the United States and draw a line from east to west along the southern boundary of the state of Pennsylvania, let us say, and you will find that the States of the American Union south of that line have practically no winter at all. Let us go further and take the state of Oklahoma, which has pretty nearly the same number of farms as we have in Ontario with stock of pretty nearly the same value.

But what do we find? We find that in Ontario our farmers have 187 million more dollars invested in farm buildings than have the farmers in the State of Oklahama. Will you tell me that the farmers have no right to look for any interest on that capital invested? That is what hon. gentlemen opposite are telling them. Why is it that the farmers of Ontario, with practically the same number of farms, have had to invest nearly $200,000,000 more in farm buildings than have the farmers in Oklahoma? Because their climate is such that their stock cannot remain outdoors the year round and they require to erect expensive barns and stables. In Ontario, Quebec and other parts of Canada it is not merely the amount of capital that is invested in barns and stables, but the farmer has to employ high-priced labour to feed and look after his stock for five or six months in the year in order to be able to make a few dollars out of it during the summer months. Yet these hon. gentlemen tell you that the farmer in Canada, with a climate such as we have, and with millions invested in buildings should produce and sell their product in their own home market as cheaply as those people can produce in States like those I have named, Argentine, Bolivia, and some other countries, where they have cheap labour while our farmers are up against the problem of exorbitant prices for farm labour, and are unable to get labour which will compete with the cheap labour of China, Japan, Patagonia, Bolivia, the Argentine Republic and many other countries throughout the world. The position assumed by hon. gentlemen opposite is illogical and unfair, and is a position which will not be endorsed by the farmers of Canada when they have an opportunity of looking into this matter and seeing what it means to them.

These hon. gentlemen talk a great deal about their interest in the farmer. The hon. member for Marquette assumes that he is the great guardian of the farming interests in this country. The hon. member for Marquette and those associated with him have taken some very peculiar ways of showing their interest in the farmer. The statement may be made, and very properly made, in regard to hon. gentlemen sitting across the way who represent themselves in this House and in the country as the special pleaders for the farmers of Canada, that while the farmers farm the farms they farm the farmers. They have farmed the farmers of this country, they have farmed them to a nicety, and I propose to show you how in some repects they have done so.

Take, for instance, the Grain Growers' Grain Company of which the hon. member for Marquette is president drawing his salary of $15,000 a year, while the secretary of the same company draws a salary of $13,000, the manager at Winnipeg a salary of $11,000, the manager at Calgary a salary of $5,200, and a young secretary a salary of $5,000 or an aggregate of nearly $50,000 a year. The first two or three members are farming the farmers to some purpose. We had the hon. member for Marquette speaking in this House in June last year and referring to certain manufacturing establishments like Dominion Textiles, Monarch Knitting, and Canners Limited. He called attention to the fact that some of these companies were making as high as 31 per cent. He pictured in strong terms the iniquity of the whole thing and fastened it all upon the fact that we have a tariff in this country. Thirty one per cent! Let us see. The company of which he is the president in 1916 made $855,288 profit on their capital, or 62.2 per cent. Who said that? That is the sworn evidence of Mr. Rice Jones, secretary of the Grain Growers Grain Co., before the Costs of Living Committee of this House last June. In the year 1917 they made $844,401, or 44.9 per cent on their capital. This company was also handling machinery.

Mr. SMITH: Are these farmers?

Mr. EDWARDS: These are supposed to be the heaven-sent pleaders for the farmers interests in this country. They handled things such as binder twine, fence posts, fence wire and machinery of various kinds. What profit did they make out of machinery? In one year they made $272,215 or a profit of 21.6 per cent. Here we have these people, the tears running down their faces and falling in splashes on the floor in their sympathy for the farmers, ranting and raving against the iniquity of 12½ per cent duty on harvesters. They figure out that 12½ per cent on a $200 machine amounts to about $25 and these same gentlemen, through the operations of their own company, take about $40 out of the farmer on his binder. You would at least have thought that when it came to farm implements they would have handled them for nothing out of love for the farmer. Not so. They do not even give the farmer one hour of credit. They have no expense such as other firms have in connection with these matters. They sell for cash; there is no six or nine months' credit for them. Give us the cash and we will know what to do with it. We will pay it out first for the good salaries that some of us have the good fortune to receive.

Then there is another matter—the handling of elevator screenings. The average price for elevator screenings for six years up to 1919 was $8.84 but when the hon. member for Marquette was Minister of Agriculture he paid $35 a ton for screenings. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Maharg) came in there and I believe that I am right in saying that his company sold 1,600 tons to the Government and that there was a Government loss on the transaction as a result of buying these screenings of about $80,000. It is a wonderful interest they have in the farmers, is it not? They took these screenings and sold them to the farmers at $35 a ton.

Then there is the New York Export Company of which the hon. member for Marquette is also president. They had a profit of $550,000 in one year on a capital investment of $250,000, or 220 per cent. There was only $100,000 of that capital actually paid up in cash. They had a profit of 220 per cent counting the capital at $250,000 and not $100,000 which was the actual amount of cash in the business, leaving out the water. Still we have these gentlemen, headed by the hon. member for Marquette, ranting and raving from one end of this country to the other about profiteers. They talk about what a terrible thing it is for a man to pay ninety cents on a barrel of apples or a third of a cent on an apple. They are talking about profiteers making their millions but they do not call attention to their own overages in five years in their elevators of 357,000 bushels or $418,000 worth taken absolutely out of the pockets of the farmers. These are things which they do not particularly call attention to, for very obvious reasons.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the whole history of the two political parties that have held power in this country from Confederation down to the present time in dealing with manufacturing establishments of one kind or another—pampered industries, if you like, there has never been an instance where we have had such colossal and unscrupulous profiteers as the Grain Growers' Grain Company, presided over and represented by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). It is the biggest profiteering concern that ever was organized in the Dominion, and it is taking money right and left from the pockets of the farmers—those farmers whom its members profess to take such a great interest in. And they take such a great interest in the farmers for the reason I mentioned before,—that they can "farm" them, and they are doing it to the limit.

Why, Mr. Speaker, do you want another example of what they are doing along that line? Take what they did in regard to red clover, alsike and timothy seed. The "Farmers Sun" of March 13, 1920, contained an advertisement by the United Farmers' Co-operative Company, Limited, of Toronto, offering No. 1 red clover seed at $47 per bushel; No. 1 alsike at $41 per bushel; No. 2 timothy at $9.75 per bushel. Those seeds are not sold to the people as breakfast foods, they are sold to the farmers to sow; and those were the prices the United Farmers' Co-operative Company, Limited, was asking, and getting, from the farmers of Ontario. At Sussex, New Brunswick, is published "The Maritime Farmer," and the editor of that paper, taking an interest in farm organizations, proceeded to purchase the same grades of these seeds for disposal among the farmers and the agricultural societies as well as the branches of United Farmers of New Brunswick. After paying the freight from Toronto to Sussex, he sold No. 1 red clover $4,450 cheaper per carload; alsike $3,550 cheaper per carload, and No. 2 timothy $1,365 cheaper per carload than these Toronto philanthropists were charging; or at the rate of $38.10 per bushel for No. 1 red clover as against $47 per bushel; $33.90 per bushel for No. 1 alsike as against $41 per bushel; and $7.56 per bushel for No. 2 timothy as against $9.75 per bushel charged by the aggregation in Toronto. We have other instances. In my county a week or two ago the United Farmers' Company brought in a carload of seed potatoes from New Ontario, and they soaked the farmers $2 on every bag for just simply handling that carload. I say, Sir, that we are only beginning to turn over the leaves of this book which will demonstrate the truth of what I say, that the most colossal profiteering concern that has ever reared its head in this Dominion is that which is presided over by the hon. member who leads the third party triangularly across the way.

Now, Sir, there is not a member in this House who has less personal interest in manufacturing than I have; there is not a constituency which has less direct interest in manufacturing than my constituency. Up to the present moment there is not a single manufacturing establishment in the county of Frontenac, unless we can so term a cheese factory. I could come to this House and denounce manufacturers as roundly as any hon. member without running much chance of hurting the feelings of the farmers of my county. But I take this position: I want to see manufactures in the Dominion, because so far as Ontario is concerned, at least, 90 per cent of all her farmers have to sell is sold at home. And I maintain that whether it be Ontario, Manitoba, or any other province, the best market for the Canadian farmer is his home market. That market I want to see retained and enlarged for him.

The trouble is that because of the very bigness of this country we are running into the danger of trying to legislate for this district and for that district, forgetting that if this is ever going to be a great country we must remember that we are members of the same family and must pull together. A little more team play is what we want. May I call the attention of hon. gentlemen from the West to one or two things which I will ask them to very carefully consider? In all seriousness I would ask them not to consider tariff matters entirely from the standpoint of the man who does nothing but produce wheat. I might remind them that to the two old provinces of Ontario and Quebec must be given credit for 52 per cent of the value of our horses; 60 per cent of the value of our cattle; 70 per cent of the value of our sheep; and 80 per cent of the value of our swine sold. I would ask them to bear in mind that the farmers in these old provinces have diversified interests, and I would also ask them to seriously consider that we cannot build up this country by simply throwing open our doors and saying: Because we do not produce any fruit on the prairies, therefore we have no interest in the thousands of fruit farmers in Ontario, British Columbia and the other provinces who do produce fruit. We will never build up this country in that way. The trouble is that the representatives of the different provinces are inclined to act more as if they were the envoys of rival nations rather than the representatives of provinces which should be brothers in the same family.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that to my mind the most illogical and unfair proposition that could possibly be made is contained in this amendment and in the platform supported by hon. gentlemen opposite—a proposition which tells the farmers of this Dominion: You must climb the tariff walls to get your stuff into other countries, but so far as your own country is concerned, you will have to compete with the surplus products of the world. That is unfair, that is illogical, and if we carry that process far enough we are going to simply ruin this Dominion.

I wish to express my appreciation of the patient attention which hon. gentlemen have given to me, and I will do so by saying, merci beaucoup.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE: (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that everybody in the House and everybody in the country must have recognized quite clearly, after the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) sat down yesterday, that the clarion cry for the new party had gone forth; that once more hon. gentlemen opposite were to go to the country shrouded in the old flag which is to be taken out for the occasion and wrapped around him and his Haman's gallows tariff policy. It must indeed have been rather surprising to some of my Liberal Unionist friends sitting on the other side to find themselves surrounded with the old guard of high protectionist Tories and to hear all around them the slogan of high protection and vested interests; and they must have wondered to themselves as they went to bed last night: "Where do I get off at?" I wonder where!

At the end of his speech last night the Minister of the Interior, almost with tears in his eyes, made a touching plea to us. He said: Why not support us? We have the same platform as you have; you are only camouflaging; get in with us; we are the real party. The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Edwards) says: "Why has the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) such an awful grouch against the farmers? He is going to ruin them with the amendment he has brought in." Which is right? Which is wrong? It is the same old story we heard away back in 1897; the tariff that we brought in was damned from the housetops by members of the opposite side; Sir Charles Tupper himself said that it would ruin the country. Who was right and who was wrong, Mr. Speaker? I shall say further on this subject only this: if there was one treat to me in the House last night more than another it was while the Minister of the Interior was making that high protectionist, Haman's gallows speech, to see the beatific expression on the face of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt); it was beautiful to a degree. He said to himself: "Ah, now have we got away from the deleterious opinions of these Unionists; we are out again in the open with the same old Tory policy,—plows and machinery up in the air so far as tariff goes; now may I sleep happy; now may I be comforted."

I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) upon the Budget, in this respect only,—that he was courageous enough to reach out and try to find some new way of getting taxes. But I cannot congratulate him upon his method; I think that he reached out the wrong way. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) spoke the other day he gave us some very good advice, as he very often does. He said: "What the people should do is stop grumbling; stop growling; stop grouching and striking." That is perfectly true. I do not intend to go back into ancient history on tariffs; the only thing that interests me to-day is what is the best tariff for 1920; what is the best for the Dominion of Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that these things should be stopped, and in that I agree with him. Then the thing that we as members of this House have to consider is, how are they to be stopped? Why do strikes take place? People want higher wages. What do they want higher wages for? To buy food. Food is one of the necessaries of life; it is constantly increasing in price; consequently higher wages must come in order to enable the people to live. The fact of the matter is that the necessaries of life have to-day attained such a high price that with the ordinary man it is a question of making both ends meet. What is the remedy for that state of affairs? If the labourer has to continue to pay enormous prices for his food and his clothing—because you must feed him and you must clothe him, and so it must be for his family—what will be the result? More strikes; more confusion; loss to the country; unsettled conditions.

For two years we have been promised tariff revision, and we are still promised it. I sincerely hope that it will come; it is necessary in the interests of the country that it should come. Now, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Ballantyne) the other day found fault with this side of the House because, he said; "You criticize but you offer nothing constructive." Now, I am going to offer him something constructive, though I doubt whether the minister will agree with me because I well know the trend of his mind along these lines. I have only to repeat what I said last year in speaking to the Budget in this House:

In my opinion the only method of making food cheaper is to produce more, and if greater production is desired, the tools with which men produce must be made cheaper. Therefore, my first argument is that the tariff on farm and other implements of production should be reduced to the lowest possible rate. In the second place, all foodstuffs and clothing should be free, and in the third place, there should be a downward revision of the tariff.

I have always been prepared to take that attitude, and I am prepared to take it now. That is where I stand to-day; I have no objection to going before any audience, be they of farmers or others and stating my position. I say to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and to the Government that, having regard to the present condition of the country following the war, you could not do anything more constructive than adopt such a tariff as I have suggested. You want a happy and a contented people; you want wages which are sufficient to keep the people in that state, and you want foodstuffs as free of duties as possible. Just take the ordinary man—I will enlarge on this a little later—and see what he pays by way of duty on the actual necessities of life:

Oatmeal, per 100 pounds	60 cents.
Rice, cleaned, per 100 pounds	75 "
Eggs, per dozen	5 "
Cheese	3 "
Canned meats	27½ per cent
Butter	4 cents.
Tea and coffee, per pound	10 "
Beans, per bushel	25 "
Peas, per bushel	15 "
Cornmeal, per bushel	25 "
Barley, per bushel	15 "
Wheat flour, per barrel	60 "
Sago and tapioca	27½ per cent
Biscuits, not sweetened	25 "
Biscuits, sweetened	30 "
Maccaroni and vermicelli, per 100 pounds	$1.25
Potatoes, per bushel	20 cents.
Canned fruits, per pound, including packages	2 "
Candles	25 per cent
Paris green	10 "
Sewing machines	30 "
Cotton and linen thread	25 "
Wearing apparel and ready-made clothing	35 "
Undershirts, drawers, socks and stockings	35 "

Then, on the needles and pins that the thrifty housewife uses, she pays 30 per cent. On the lamps that the workingman uses when he cannot pay for electric light, he pays 30 per cent, and 25 per cent even on the lamp wicks. On the tables and chairs that the workingman uses when he takes his frugal meal, he pays 30 per cent. On the cotton and cotton fabrics which every family must use, the duty is 20 per cent to 32½ per cent. On boots and shoes, it is 25 per cent plus 10 per cent luxury tax; on hats and caps, 30 per cent, plus luxury tax. On the ordinary woollen blankets used in a country as cold as Canada, 35 per cent is charged, and on plain flannel blankets, which are so much used, 35 per cent. Every one of these articles enters into the daily use and the daily consumption of every man, woman and child in Canada; yet, Sir, the duties upon them range all the way up to 35 per cent, even on those articles which are most necessary. Does anybody argue—and I propose to produce some figures later on to support my contention—that that kind of protection is necessary in order to enable the carrying on of the industries that produce these goods? It is not so; they do not need it; consequently the duties ought to be reduced.

Is the consumer helped by this Budget in any way at all? The consumer is not helped; he is hurt. As to the 10 per cent on boots and shoes, 10 per cent on hats and caps and so on, the consumer, as Mr. Breadner said last night, in the end pays every single dollar of that luxury tax. This is the same old proposition—taxes raised, not from the proper source, but from the consumer who puts up practically every dollar of the revenue of this country. In order to see the anomaly of this matter, let us take as an illustration automobiles that cost say $1,000 each. For many years on a $1,000 automobile, you paid 35 per cent duty, or $350, and in addition, under the war tax, you paid 7½ per cent, or $75, bringing the cost of the automobile up to $1,425. If you add ten per cent luxury tax on to that $1,425, or $142.50, the final cost of that automobile would be $1,567.50. To-day, under the tax of 15 per cent as levied by this Budget, an automobile costs, say $1,000, duty $350, luxury tax, $202.50, or a total of $1,552.52, or, under the present scale, a difference of $15. Thus, there is really not one per cent of a luxury tax on automibiles. What does the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) do? Let us ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) what he does. In these Budget proposals which he says are so good, he makes up what he can for the luxurious man who buys an automobile, and then he takes that out of the poor person who buys a nightshirt, an undershirt or a petticoat.

These taxes are called excise taxes, and while I am not going to find any fault with that term, they are not strictly so. As I said before, however, they are not collected from the right source; in every case —and my opinion is borne out by what Mr.

Bredner said last night—they are paid by the consumer. As regards clothing, 35 per cent plus 10 per cent, and as regards boots and shoes, 25 per cent plus 10 per cent is added on to the cost. My contention is that the excise duty should be paid by the manufacturer; it should be deducted by the manufacturer from the manufactured article and paid into the treasury at the time of the sale. Why could not that be done? On a $25 suit of clothes, the manufacturer would pay into the public treasury 10 per cent on the cost of the manufactured article, or $2.50. If you did not have an excise duty against the imported article, you would be absolutely all right; but having it against the domestic and also against the imported article gets you nowhere. If you would leave the tax off the imported article and charge it as a home excise duty which the manufacturer had to pay, he could not charge it up against the customer, and consequently he could not pass the tax along, because if he did, the importer would be able to sell his goods more cheaply than the home manufacturer. Therefore, the tax would necessarily have to come out of the manufacturer himself, and the consumer would be protected. Surely that is good doctrine. The Government recognize that policy themselves, because that is what they did this year in regard to patent medicines. Formerly, you bought a package of whatever it was and paid for it 25 cents, or whatever the cost might be. Under the stamp tax the vendor put a stamp on the package and the consumer paid 26 cents for the article. The Government recognized the fact that that was not good business, and now they make the manufacturer of the patent medicine put a stamp on, and the manufacturer, not the consumer, pays the stamp tax. The policy is absolutely the same; if it is good in one case, why is it not good in another? I cannot see what the difference is, and I think what I have suggested is what ought to be done.

Some time ago in Montreal I advocated an excise tax to be paid by the manufacturer just in the manner that I have described. I argued then that the manufacturer had been a large profiteer during the war and that, therefore, he should pay, as he is best able to. My reasons are these. In the first place, this would save the consumer, and in the second, it would get back from the manufacturer some of the war profits which he had made. In England, there is talk of getting back some of the war profits. Why should not a small portion of these war profits be taken from the manufacturer in the way I have eendeavoured to describe, and why should not the common man be saved that additional tax? By taking this tax from the manufacturer, we collect it from the man who is best able to pay, and that is what we want. Let us also remember that under these Budget proposals the tariff is left exactly as it was before; it has not been touched in any way whatever, and consequently the manufacturer is not hurt.

The other night the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) quoted a speech I had made in Montreal.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE: My hon. friend says hear, hear. The only thing that the minister did was to quote my speech incorrectly. In other respects it is all right. This is what the minister said:

> Well, the leader of the Opposition had scarcely delivered that speech when one of his followers, the member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) made a speech before the Liberal Reform Club in Montreal. He said nothing about the policy of free trade as enunciated by the leader of the Opposition in his St. John speech, and he carefully avoided any reference to the Liberal tariff policy as adopted at the Liberal Convention held in Ottawa during last August. But I must say that I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for West Lambton on that occasion. He said that he was a protectionist; aye, he even went so far as to say how he would fix the tariff.

Both of those assertions are absolutely wrong. I did not say that I was a protectionist.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member has been incorrectly reported in the press, then, of course, I shall withdraw the statement that I made. But the Montreal Gazette reported the hon. member as saying that he was a protectionist and that he would even go so far to say that, in his opinion, the tariff should be 25 per cent.

Mr. PARDEE: I can quite understand that in the Montreal Gazette and in my hon. friend; the wish is father to the thought. I did not say that I was a protectionist, and if the speech was wrongly reported, I cannot help that.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: You did not say you were in favour of a tariff of 25 per cent?

Mr. PARDEE: I did not. What I said was this: I went on to point out as best I could the condition in which this country was financially. I said that we needed money, and if we needed money we must have a tariff. I said: Supposing you take, merely for the sake of illustration, a tariff of 25 per cent and you split it up 17 per cent and 8 per cent, 17 per cent as a general tariff and 8 per cent as an excise tax, you would accomplish the purpose. I did not lay down a 25 per cent tariff. Surely my hon. friend would not expect me to say anything of the kind reported in the Gazette.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The newspaper so quoted you.

Mr. PARDEE: That may be, but the newspaper quoted only just so much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. gentleman intend 17 per cent to be the average over all the range of imported goods?

Mr. PARDEE: I did not intend that 17 per cent or 8 per cent to be fixed at all; I could have taken 40 per cent or 50 per cent and split it up in the same way. I only gave that figure as an illustration which we could divide into general and excise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: About what figures would the hon. gentleman fix?

Mr. PARDEE: The hon. member will gather that from my remarks before I am through.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not so far.

Mr. PARDEE: Patience is a virtue. I further stated in that speech that I suggested what I did because I did not feel this country was yet ready for a full measure of direct taxation. That is the reason I spoke that way and it is the reason I am speaking that way here to-day. I have pointed out what I hope will be a constructive thought to the minister in raising revenue.

Now let us turn to another phase of this tariff discussion, which is rather illuminating. The woollen textile industry, which has not been touched by this tariff, has a range of duty from 3 cents a pound specific duty to 30 per cent ad valorem, and it has a capital invested of $19,268,202. All these figures are taken from the Statistical Office. Its net profit was $3,578,318, or 18.41 per cent on its capital invested. Unitemized expenses, $1,107,126. The average wage paid to its employees—and I would call the attention of hon. members to this—was $624.04 per annum. The industry employs 2,530 males and 2,489 females, and operates 75 mills. That is a synopsis of the woollen textile industry.

The hosiery and knit goods industry has a capital invested of $31,092,866, and it made a net profit of $7,709,246, or 24.7 per cent. The return shows "unitemized expenses," $1,715,847. What these "unitemized expenses" are is beyond my conception. It has 108 plants, employing 9,000 females and 4,000 males. The average wage paid for 1918 is $516.32 per annum.

The cotton textile industry has a capital invested of $53,796,394, and it made a net profit of $1,344,913, or 25.8 per cent. Again "unitemized expenses," $4,819,860. It operates 26 plants, employing 8,279 males and 7,725 females. It has a protection of 35 per cent. The average wage paid is $538.23.

Now we come to the Canada Cottons, the statement for which was published in the Montreal Herald. The profits in 1917 amounted to $1,126,125, in 1918, $1,563,103, or 19 per cent, and in 1919 to $1,839,443. The surplus in 1919-1920 was $454,585, and their total surplus to-day is $2,683,479. The industry enjoys a duty of 20 to 32½ per cent.

There is one striking thing about these figures, and it is this: Every one of these industries is manufacturing goods which are required by every man, woman and child in this country. The industry enjoys a tremendous protection and is piling up surpluses every year. It pays enormous dividends to its stockholders, but if the figures I have given are correct the employees receive scarcely a living wage under conditions as they are to-day. I have often heard protection held up as the one thing that protects the workingman and gives him good wages, but here we have startling examples of what protection does not do in the way of giving working people a living wage. All these industries have a large protective duty, and it does not strike me that they are now altogether in swaddling clothes. The reason the protection is kept so high is this: The woollen textile industry, for instance, operates 75 mills; the cotton textile industry, 26 plants, and the hosiery and knit goods industry, 108 plants. Many of these plants are up to date, with the newest and best machinery and the best driving power that modern invention can give them. But some of them are weak sisters and have to be supported, and just as long as the weak sister is there, just so long you will find her willing to lean anywhere she can. Therefore it is that the people of this country have to dig down in their pockets and support the weaker plants in order that the whole combination may show a profit. That is the real reason why the duty is kept where it is. It appears to me that is a remarkably good example of what a tremendously high protective duty does—it does not foster enterprises or advancement, but rather retards it.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us the other night at a little dinner that what this country needed was people, and he never spoke a truer word. I would ask my hon. friend how you are going to get more people in this country if you go on making the high cost of living still higher? Indeed, how are you going to keep those you already have here? Will people come to this country to-day with the high cost of living increased so tremendously by this Budget, and with your franchise law standing as it is? They will not. Now, you must have people in order to make a country great, and I would therefore suggest a different mode of taxation. In Great Britain there is a tax on wealth, a tax on property, a tax on all those surroundings where you find wealth. In Canada you have a tax on people; you have a tax on food, clothes and comforts; you have a tax on the man and his family. It is not right. It is not the way to get people to come to our shores. It is an absolutely fallacious proposition. The two systems of taxation differ as widely as possible. I think the Canadian people might well take a lesson from the British system.

Sir, I hope I fully realize the present position of this country. I know the country needs money; I know that we have to pay our way; I realize the fact that a country for which we sacrificed so much is worth still more sacrifice. But what is the best thing to do? I say again, that you must not drive people who have come to this country, away from the country, and you must not deter from coming those who want to come here. We must make the conditions in this country such that Canada will be a good place to live in. We have tremendous areas in this country which we must fill up with people and get them producing. I say, make a tariff for revenue, not for protection, have it properly adjusted, and I repeat, make the necessaries of life free. In following this course the Government, I humbly submit, would be doing something constructive. Get your money from those who are best able to pay, and thereby reduce the cost of living to the consumer. The manufacturers, I am sure, will be patriotic enough, indeed, they must be patriotic enough, to help pay the debt of the country which has protected them while they have been building up their business. The manufacturer, I am satisfied, will be patriotic enough if the Government is strong and forceful enough to reach him in the right way, and not be entirely subservient to the vested interests of the country.

In conclusion, Sir, I desire to say that I do not believe that the taxes proposed by this Budget will produce results. I think that with the complications and the machinery required to enforce it you will find that the retail stores will have to largely increase their staffs, and if they are put under the necessity of having to pay more money to carry on business what will happen? Once more you will pile on to the consumer something extra which he will have to pay, and I do not think there is any question about that. For instance, apply this to such a firm as the T. Eaton Company. I was speaking to a large departmental store man the other day and he assured me that so far as he could see their staff would have to be largely augmented to carry out the tax provisions imposed by the Minister of Finance. I have no doubt there will be all sorts of evasions of this tax. There will be thimble-rigging in every conceivable way, and although I recognize the great ability of the Minister of Finance, I think it will require a far cleverer head than his if this tax is to be adequately collected. I am speaking with all seriousness. I believe, Sir, from what I can gather, from what I can hear amongst the retail merchants and amongst the people themselves in regard to the tax, that there will be evasions in every way which will largely augment the cost of goods while it brings no return to the treasury. Then if this increase is brought about, it means that once again the consumer will have to go down into his pocket to pay. So far as I can see, Mr. Speaker, this scheme will not, as the Minister of Finance hopes, prevent the abuse of the tariff for the exploitation of the consumer; vastly otherwise will it prove, I think. Nor do I think that it will, in the words of the Minister:

> Safeguard the interests of the Canadian people in the existing world struggle for commercial and industrial supremacy.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, before making the few observations which I propose to offer to the House, I desire to say a word or two with regard to some statements made by hon. members who have spoken before me. I wish to refer briefly to the attitude of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) in his bitter and unjustified attack upon United Grain Growers, Limited, the farmers company of which the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is president. Some men are born natural leaders and they have the ability to conduct big business. Naturally, people find them out and appoint them to the highest positions which they are considered so well qualified to fill. That honour has fallen to the hon. member for Marquette who is to-day the president of one of the largets corporations in Western Canada with a membership of 36,000 or 37,000. Reference was also made by the hon. member for Frontenac to the salary that is paid to the president of this company. Perhaps it would do the hon. member for Frontenac good to know that the salary which is paid to the president of this farmers' company, is paid as a result of the expressed desire of the shareholders of the company that it shall be paid. The hon. member for Frontenac and myself, no doubt, were not born under such a lucky star as we have not achieved that enviable position to which the hon. member for Marquette has climbed. That of course is our loss.

The hon. member (Mr. Edwards) also used very strong words in regard to the character of the United Grain Growers, Limited. He found fault with it for establishing a subsidiary company in a foreign country known as the Grain Growers' Export Company. If those composing the United Grain Growers, Limited is worthy of such a character as that which the hon. member for Frontenac has ascribed, it is surprising that this company has so steadily grown from a very small beginning with an investment of $1,000 away back in the early days, to the position which it occupies to-day, a company which has practically unlimited credit at the bank when it chooses to borrow its millions of dollars to finance its business.

About the establishment of this export grain company in New York, I fail to see what harm is done by forming a grain export company in the land to the south of us to carry on a very profitable business there and to bring home to Canada the profits of that business. Then again Mr. Speaker, in regard to the profits of the parent company, the United Grain Growers, Limited, I would point out that the profits are returned to the farmers who do their business through the company. It is their own business; they produce the grain, they put it through their own company and the profits are turned back to the farmers in the shape of dividends for the most part and in the shape of the commodities and necessities which are used on the farm such as machinery, supplies, binder twine and many other articles which are supplied at as low a rate of profit as possible consistent with good business.

Mr. SMITH: Do they first take it out of the farmers and then refund it?

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie): I fail to catch the point. I have stated plainly that the farmers who produce the grain trust their own company to handle it for them and the profits made from the earnings of the company are returned in dividends and by furnishing to the farmers necessities which are required on the farm at as low a rate as possible consistent with good business. Has my hon. friend any fault to find with that?

Mr. SMITH: In the first place they take it out of the farmer.

Mr. J. F. REID: There is a vast difference between an organization of that kind and joint stock companies, some of which are to-day being swallowed up by a merger. In the United Grain Growers, Limited, there is not one dollar of watered stock. Farmers believe that the only place for watered "stock" is back on the farm and not in a corporation.

I have a word or two to say in reply to the hon. member for St. John city and counties of St. John and Albert (Mr. Elkin). I want to be very careful as there are two members for this constituency. I direct my remarks to the hon. member (Mr. Elkin). I shall read from the Parliamentary Guide of 1919:

ELKIN, STANLEY EDWARD (St. John city and counties of St. John and Albert). B. October 12, 1880, at St. John, N.B.

and so on. Then the biographical sketch proceeds:

A manufacturer. Managing director Maritime Nail Company, Limited; president of Motor Car & Equipment Co.; vice-president Canada Nail & Wire Co.; vice-president Wilson Box Co., all of St. John; president, Rodstan & Co., London, England; director, Union Bank of Canada; was member of Canadian Government Commission to Washington, January, 1918, to formulate policy for war organization in Canada and to study United States war organization; chairman of the Liberal Association for the constituency which he now represents; etc.

When the hon. member entered this House he declared himself a free trader. But what do we find to-day? He is an avowed high protectionist. And he has been admitted into the steel merger—that merger which is known as The British Empire—and the rest. I understand that before admission into that merger the candidate must swallow an antidote, which causes him to lose his personality and to speak, not for himself, but for the merger.

When my hon. friend purchased steel rods from Germany and manufactured them into nails and sold those nails under a protective tariff, and when he returned his money to Germany to buy more steel rods for the same purpose, was he not sending his money to that country to help the Prussian war lords to manufacture guns and ammunition and poison gas to kill our soldiers when they went overseas to fight for us?

The hon. gentleman finds fault with the United Grain Growers for purchasing agricultural implements in the United States. When he was speaking I wanted to inform him why our organizations were compelled to take that course, but the rules of the House prevented me from doing so then. I wish now to enlighten him. It was not because the United Grain Growers, or rather their board of directors, preferred to buy in a foreign country rather than at home, but because of the fact that our Canadian manufacturers absolutely refused to sell to us, saying, "No, we will not sell to you, you are pirates in the trade." Those "pirates" were compelled to go aroving and to purchase their machinery in the States, where they found that the manufacturers were very glad to get their money, the business being spot cash; and if any harm has been done, this House may judge now who are to blame for the course taken by the United Grain Growers, Limited.

But Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not exactly fair. He said that we tried to so conceal implements of home manufacture that our people would not be able to recognize the Canadian implements which we had for sale. As a matter of fact, Sir, many of our Canadian manufacturers do sell goods to us to-day, for they recognize now that we are not "pirates," but that we are in the trade to stay; and therefore to-day we are selling Canadian-made goods wherever we can procure the right sort at the right price.

I understand that the financial position of my hon. friend (Mr. Elkin) is very much better to-day than it was before the war—my information comes from a direct source—and that he may be justly called a "war lord" or a "war profiteer." And no doubt since he has entered the merger he will be a participant in the $77,000,000 of watered stock that is now being issued by that huge amalgamation. This reminds me of the statement made by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), that before the farmers' organizations accused the manufacturers of reaping undue profits their own hands should be clean. I think it would be well for the hon. member for St. John city to see to it that his hands are clean, but I am of opinion that to get them clean he will have to scrub a long time.

I wish to say a word in passing in reply to the hon. and noble member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). I say "noble" because he enlisted of his own accord as a true Britisher. The hon. and noble member claimed that 48 per cent of our population belongs neither to the manufacturing nor to the agricultural class. In reply to that statement I want to draw his attention to the circumstance that although a large number of our people may not be directly employed in agriculture or in manufacturing, when we look at the tonnage we shall find that our agricultural products form a considerably larger volume than do our manufactured articles. The tonnage of our agricultural products in 1917—and the figures have very much increased since—was 27,000,000 tons; live stock 3,000,000 tons; mine products 37,000,000 tons; forest products 16,000,000 tons; manufactured articles 16,000,000 tons; miscellaneous 8,000,000 tons,—that is, tons of freight traffic moved on our railways. So I claim that this 48 per cent includes many who no doubt are employed in the transportation of agricultural products, while a lesser number, of course, are employed in the transportation of manufactured articles.

The hon. member for Fort William in making his comparisons was very careful not to declare himself either as being in favour of free trade or of protection; he simply gave us some figures. Then he asked the question: How is it that no great power, other than Great Britain, has adopted free trade? Well, an answer to that might be: how is it that during the war Great Britain's allies had to go to Great Britain, which is called a free trade country, in order to procure financial assistance? In fact during the war Great Britain practically financed all her allies.

Then again, the hon. member says let us create home markets for our farm products. Well, I agree that we should endeavour to create home markets for our farm products. But he also told us that eighty per cent of our wheat was exported. How long will it be, Mr. Speaker, before the population of Canada will be so large that it will consume eighty million bushels of wheat? In my opinion, it would take at least fifty million people to consume that quantity of wheat, and when Canada's population reaches that figure the production will still be on the increase. I think the idea embodied in that remark is an absurd one.

The hon. member made reference to the United States as being a country of high protection. When we look into it we find that the following goods are free in the United States but are not free in Canada: binders, reapers and mowers; threshing machines and parts thereof; cultivators, plows, harrows, horse rakes, seed drills, wagons and other agricultural implements; cement, leather, boots and shoes, pegged or wire fastened, other boots and shoes in soles, etc., harness and saddlery. The Government are in the habit of going to the United States for examples in regard to how they may raise their finances. Why do the Government not go to the United States once more for an example? Why do they not say to them: We will put on the free list in Canada all the articles which you put on the free list in the United States? Are we afraid of our American competitors to the south? I do not think so. I know that the farmers of Western Canada are not afraid of any farmer who grows produce on the American continent, and I am further of the opinion that our Canadian mechanics are second to none in the world. If we go to the United States we find Canadians at the head of many of the large institutions there.

Mr. BURNHAM: What is the hon gentleman's opinion on dumping?

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie): I will come to that later. In the United States the average ad valorem rate of duty on all goods dutiable and free in the year 1917 was 8.31 per cent. The average duty collected per capita was $2.11 and the percentage of imports from Canada free of duty was 69.46 per cent. The average ad valorem rate of duty on all goods free and dutiable imported into Canada during 1918 was about 17 per cent. The percentage of imported goods which were free to Canada was only between 43 and 44 per cent. During 1918 we paid duty to the amount of $161,000,000, in round figures, making a per capita tax of $20. Now, let us summarize that:

Percentage of goods imported free into the United States	69.46 per cent
Percentage of goods imported free into Canada	43 "
Duty collected per capita in United States	$2.11
Duty collected per capita in Canada	$20.00

Then, taking the average family of five—the average family of working people would, I believe, be more—and we have the following:

Duty collected from family of five in the United States	$10.55
Duty collected from family of five in Canada	$100.00

There is where the shoe pinches, Mr. Speaker—in the large family. Then, my hon. friend went on to say that living conditions in Germany—I assume he had reference to conditions before the war—were much better than they were in England or in Scotland; I will not mention Ireland. He also told us about two gentlemen who went over there to write books. Now, I have every respect for the journalists and for those who write books, but I myself lived in the Old Country quite a few years ago. I worked with mechanics who came across to Scotland from Germany and I received first-hand information in regard to conditions in Germany. Certainly the men were much better paid in Edinburgh and in Glasgow than they were in Germany, and certainly they lived better; so I consider that my hon. and gallant friend's information was not correct. Surely if conditions were better in Germany than they were in England, these men would not have come there from Germany.

The member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) told us that the capitalization of the railways in Great Britain was very much higher than in this country and that the rate of freight per ton mile was much greater there than in Canada. The figures he gave are as follows:

	Average rate per ton mile.
England	2.31 cents
Germany	1.41 "
France	1.46 "
Austria	1.49 "
United States	0.80 "

Some of the information which I have I got direct from the Railway Department. But I wish to explain briefly the difference between railway conditions in the Old Country and those which prevail here. We have a very long rail haul here. In Great Britain there is a very short rail haul; in fact, ten miles in the Old Country would be a comparatively long haul. My information is that twenty-four miles in Canada is the minimum haul; if you have to ship your carload of freight over a distance of eight miles, the eight mile haul will cost you just as much as a twenty-four mile haul would cost. In fact, one of my neighbours paid at the rate of six cents per ton mile for the hauling of a car of settler's effects eight miles. It would not matter whether or not the minimum tonnage was in that car; the ful freight rate would have to be paid. Therefore, I think I have made my point clear that the rate on our short haul in Canada is very much higher than the rate on a similar haul in England.

My hon. friend made this remark, which I did not like to hear:

> Before the war the United Kingdom surpassed either Germany or the United States in foreign commerce, but since the war the United States has completely overtaken the United Kingdom.

Any hon. member must know that during the greater part of the war the United States was absolutely at liberty to pursue her industries to the very best of her ability; her industries were not disturbed at all; her commerce was disturbed only by the submarines. She stayed out of the war long enough to get all the loose moneys of the world; so that it is no wonder that to-day Great Britain finds that the United States has surpassed her just a little bit as regards commerce, and the comparison should not have been made.

I wish to make just a few remarks in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens).

Mr. McMASTER: A little louder, please.

Mr. J. F. REID (Mackenzie): Move down this way. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre made the statement that the poor farmers of the prairies were being robbed by the United Grain Growers, Limited, and a statement made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to-day was but a repetition of this statement. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre went a little further; he told us that he had lived on the prairies, he did not say how long, but long enough to find out that it took considerable grit to stay on the prairies. We notice that the hon. member had not the grit and so he left the prairies. Evidently he found the Pacific slope a more congenial clime and his associates there more of his own ilk. He found that on the prairies the high protectionists had hardly a place to stand on, but on the Pacific coast they are, I understand, in the majority at the present time. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre is the mouthpiece in this House of certain big interests, a World in Vancouver, a Telegram in Winnipeg and a huge private terminal elevator at the head of the Lakes, and the owners of these are the gentlemen who are pushing our worthy friend forward as their spokesman in this House. He has condemned the action of the Government in appointing a Wheat Board, and for this reason solely: that his associates cannot get into the wheat game with their gambles, and their private elevator is not being well filled. I am very anxious to find out just why the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is championing the cause of the poor farmers, as he chooses to call us, who live on the prairies. There must be some motive behind all this; and while the hon. member was speaking, I tried to read his thoughts, and I have come to the conclusion that I have struck the nail on the head. While the hon. member was speaking, I interrupted him once for this purpose. I wanted to give the hon. member an opportunity of correcting himself as he made a statement which is entirely aside of the facts. The statement that he made when I interrupted him was that he claimed that storage charges are charged on grain when loaded into a box car and on the wheels and in process of transportation. In other words, he claims that after the grain is loaded out of a country elevator into a box car and is in the process of transportation, it still carries storage charges. I defy the hon. member to find in the Canada Grain Act, and from where else does he get his information unless it be from his associates? Further, there are fifteen days' free storage in country elevators, and that includes not only the handling charges and storage charges, but fire insurance charges. Again, at the head of the Lakes, in the terminal elevator, ten days' free storage is given before storage charges begin.

The hon. member also made a bitter attack on the farmers' organization, the United Grain Growers, Limited, for illegally taking grain from the farmers in the shape of overages. "Illegally taking," I interpret as stealing. In other words the hon. member claimed that the United Grain Growers, Limited, with other elevator concerns, were stealing grain from the farmers. Under the Canada Grain Act, as many hon. members in this House know, the operator of a terminal elevator has nothing whatever to do with the weighing of the grain either into or out of a public terminal elevator. A public weighmaster, a Government official, is charged with the duty of weighing the grain in and weighing it out. A Government grain inspector is stationed at Winnipeg; all grain coming through Winnipeg is inspected and the dockage fixed. If needs be, the grain is reinspected at the head of the Lakes while it is being unloaded, and if a wrong dockage has been fixed, that is corrected. Moreover, while the grain is in process of being cleaned in the terminal elevator, that operation is carried on under the supervision of the inspector who puts the correct dockage on it. How then can any hon. member in this House state such a deliberate falsehood?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that I altogether caught the full purport of the remark of the hon. member because I could not hear him very distinctly, but I hope he is not saying that a statement of an hon. member of this House is a falsehood.

Mr. J. F. REID: I withdraw the statement. I am sorry that the statement made by the hon. member caused me to make this break. I appreciate your ruling, Sir.

Moreover, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) made a serious charge against the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster).

Speaking in this House on May 20, he said (Hansard 1920, page 2676):

> Not only that; they induced the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make an amendment to the Grain Act which legalized what had up to that time been an illegal act.

Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to complain of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I pass on.

In the western grain trade we have three farmers' organizations doing a very large business. One is the company that has been under fire here for the last few days, the United Grain Growers, Limited, another, which is purely a farmers' organization, is the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevators Limited, and the third, also a farmers' organization, but not of this country, is the Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society. This latter organization buys millions of bushels of wheat from Canada every year and does business, not with a single eye to making a profit, but to give service to their people, and its policy is to narrow down the margin of profit as closely as is consistent with sound business. Now when these two farmers' organizations of which I have spoken belonging to Canada are doing business right alongside this Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society, is it possible that we could be such a rotten, corrupt, profiteering company as was stated the other evening by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens)?

I also wish to refer to some statements made the other evening by my good friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey). He told the House that Washington apples of a low grade were being dumped on the prairies to feed the poor people. He said in effect that this extra duty of 30 cents a box, for it is an extra duty because there was already a tariff on apples, had saved the situation for the British Columbia fruit growers and for the farmers on the prairies, because it gave them a cheap and sure supply of good fruit and prevented the Yankees from flooding our country with apples, putting the British Columbia fruit grower out of business and then raising the price on us. But, Mr. Speaker, the people on the prairies have not found that cheap fruit which the hon. member for Fraser Valley speaks of. We have noticed no reduction in the price of apples, but we have noticed an increase. That is only natural, of course. The British Columbia fruit grower, like the rest of us, is only human, very human. My good friend told us further that he was not talking politics, and I am sure we all believed him. He was talking money. Every box of apples meant an extra 30 cents in his pocket. In speaking of his loyalty to his country and of the huge debt which this country has to bear and pay, he said in effect: I am an old man, but I am prepared to do my share. He took very good care, however, to say in the first place that he required his 30 cents extra a box on apples, and after he got that, he would do his bit and pay his share of the debt. But who pays the 30 cents duty on his box of apples. It is the poor people on the prairies that he speaks of who are being fed on cheap apples from Washington. As I said, his loyalty to his country is based on the condition of 30 cents extra duty on a box of apples. Now let me apply to that the recipe of my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion), who said the other evening that if a little free trade was good, why not have complete free trade, or as he very aptly put it, as a medical man, if a certain quantity of strychnine and a teaspoonful of brandy was good for the heart, why not a pound of strychnine and a keg of brandy? Then why is my hon. friend from Fraser Valley content with 30 cents a box on apples? Why not make it $5. If one is good, the other would be better. While my good friend was speaking of fruit growing in the Fraser River Valley and of the splendid success the growers were having under protection, I could not help thinking of the poor people who live on the prairies who have hard scratching to get an apple, and I was reminded of that little verse of Burns:

> O wad some power the giftie gie us,
> To see oursels as others see us!
> It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
> And foolish notion.

Now I come to the Budget itself, and I am glad to see the Minister of Finance right opposite me here. It is said that Scotchmen never throw bouquets, and I am not going to throw any. I am just going to talk plain facts. I believe, Sir, that when the present Minister of Finance took office as minister of his department he adopted, with that strong personality of his, an orphan child which nobody else wanted. I say with all due respect that I believe when he came into office he had to handle the most difficult financial situation confronting this country in the last five years, because when he took office the treasury was empty. It was useless to try and borrow money outside of Canada, and the enthusiasm of our own people had waned somewhat. As I heard many of them say "The war is over. We have won our objective. Surely the Government will not want to borrow any more money." So with the treasury empty and no market in which to borrow, the Minister of Finance had to tackle a pretty stiff job. I remember meeting him in Winnipeg last fall when he was starting on his campaign in the West. The building where the meeting was held was cold. Winter had set in very early in the West and snow had come earlier than ever recorded before. A great percentage of the root crop was frozen in, and thousands of acres of heavy crop was snowed in and could not be threshed until the following spring. The dried out areas has suffered a greater loss than ever before in the history of the West. Such a condition of affairs was not encouraging to a man starting out to borrow money. Not only that; the people had pronounced against issuing any more Government bonds exempt from taxation. Then my hon. friend the Minister of Finance was practically compelled to go to a people who, I was going to say were unwilling, but many of whom at any rate were unable, to lend any money. When I saw the hon. gentleman address that meeting in Winnipeg in a cold building in which people were sitting with their overcoats on, I said to a friend who was sitting next me: "What do you think of the prospects? What do you think of this, the first step of the new Finance Minister?" My friend replied: "Well, I wish him luck." After the meeting, as we were going to the hotel, my friend said to me: "Reid, what do you think of the new Minister of Finance?" I said to my brother Scot: "It seems to me that the man who had courage to tackle the job in the first place will come through with this Victory Loan drive." I say, all honour to our worthy Finance Minister; but the position could have been made much easier for him if, when the war was on and huge contracts were being made with excessively large profits accruing from them, and when money was in abundance, his predecessor had taken time by the forelock and secured some of that money. This was not done, however. Nevertheless, I will take off my hat to a man of such courage and of such frankness as I have seen the minister display.

Now, I come to the principle embodied in the Budget. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the principle of income taxation which was introduced by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is a principle which is embodied in the platform of the Progressives. I am glad also to observe that the Budget contains the principle of a direct tax on luxuries. I am in hearty accord with that principle of the Budget, Mr. Speaker, and speaking for myself, and I believe for the other members of this little group, this "contemptible little army," I shall be only too glad to see this or any other government embody in their programme every plank of the Farmers' platform. But while the principle is correct, in my opinion, I believe it is wrong in its application. I want the Minister of Finance to understand that I am putting forward my views on matters of finance as an amateur, but I believe that the principle is wrongly applied. I think that the scale of luxuries comes down a little too far, and perhaps it is not sharply enough graduated as it goes up. I think my hon. friend should have had courage enough to go a step further, and I wish he had read carefully the platform of the organized farmers. I should like to see every article which is made in Canada and which enjoys a protective tariff subject to an excise tax, and that excise tax should be graded according to the height of the tariff wall. Just let me read an extract from this little platform of ours:

> That all corporations engaged in the manufacture of products protected by the customs tariff be obliged to publish annually comprehensive and accurate statements of their earnings.
> That every claim for tariff protection by any industry should be heard publicly before a special committee of Parliament.

I claim that any corporation in the Dominion of Canada enjoying the benefits of a protective tariff should pay and should be willing to pay an excise duty to the Government, because it is our information—the organized farmers have delved rather carefully into this matter—that under the protective tariff, before the treasury gets one dollar the manufacturer gets three dollars; and I certainly believe that the excise tax is at least one way of getting part of that three dollars which justly belongs to the Federal Treasury. Furthermore, I believe that all the necessities of life should be on the free list, and the application of that principle would touch the great mass of consumers. Surely no one will condemn a luxury tax if it is not levied on things that are not really luxuries. Those who are able to afford luxuries should be satisfied to pay their share out of the large riches which they have enjoyed freely for many years. We also have another little paragraph in our platform, and I trust hon. members will pardon me for referring so often to that platform. I have a word to say for the disabled soldiers. I have mentioned this matter on the floor of the House before, and if I remember correctly the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Calder), when sitting as chairman of the committee considering the subject of further gratuities to soldiers, made the statement that the Government would employ insurance actuaries to make inquiry into the advisability of establishing a life insurance bureau for returned soldiers. Now, this is the paragraph which I have reference to:

> That provision should be made for insurance at the public expense of unpensioned men who have become undesirable insurance risks while in the service.

I find that a great many soldiers did not carry life insurance before they enlisted, and many of them to-day cannot obtain insurance at any price. Some of them may be able to obtain life insurance, but at rates that are altogether prohibitive. I am still of the opinion that this Government should establish a life insurance bureau for soldiers, and if it were run under proper management it would not involve very much expense to the country. I was told by an eminent physician who had examined many of the soldiers that had been turned down by straight life insurance companies, that a large percentage of these men were quite likely to live to a good old age, but some disability or other prevented them from getting life insurance. I do believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of the Government to take some action in this matter.

I come now to the question of railways. The people of Canada to-day own some 22,000 miles of railway, and we do not need to discuss the question whether or not the Government adopted public ownership on principle as being in the interests of the country. At any rate, the matter was thrust upon the Government; there was no other alternative. Now, some people to-day are advocating a sharp increase in railway rates, and I am going to state my position to-night so far as this question is concerned. I for one do not believe that the time is ripe for this Government to permit any increase in railway rates, for reasons which I shall state. All the people of Canada are to blame for the railway muddle which we find ourselves in to-day, and it is my opinion that we have paid too much for our whistle. We have paid too much for the railways which we have had thrust upon us. The next thing that this Government can do, and do as speedily as possible, is to make a physical valuation of the railways in their possession, such valuation to be made by competent railway men and to be made from the operating point of view. Then, depreciate the system to what it is worth and forget the balance. If it is under competent management—and I am not saying one word against the present management—and if that management is divorced from politics entirely you should say to the men in charge of the systems: "We will supply you with the rolling stock and necessary equipments and you must compete." Then, after a thorough trial, if we find that our roads cannot pay under existing rates, it will then be time to raise the rates. I am convinced that in a very few years' time, by a proper amalgamation of all the systems of roads which we now have under our management, they would show a profit and be able to pay their way. I make these remarks for what they may be worth, and I hope that the Minister of Finance will think over them at least.

Immigration must go hand in hand with our railway system. We have been bringing immigrants to Canada and putting them out West. It has been our experience that many of our immigrants had not money to buy land and therefore they had to go back from the railways a distance of twenty or thirty miles. Grain cannot be profitably raised at that distance from a railway. Railway branch lines must follow settlement, and if we are to bring immigrants to Canada and encourage men to go upon the land, we must follow them up with our branch lines of railways so as to put them in a position to ship their products to market. I am convinced that if a proper policy is followed out, if branch lines are built and living conditions are made pleasanter for those who settle upon the prairies our surplus production of wheat will soon be swelled to the extent of many millions of bushels.

That brings to my mind the Hudson Bay railway. In 1882, when I came to the city of Winnipeg, I had my first experience in a federal election. Placards announced that Captain Scott "Is the man who will build the Hudson Bay railway." From 1882 down to the present time the building of the Hudson Bay railway has been made a political football. I wonder when this Government will finish the few hundred miles of steel that requires to be laid to the Bay. Our worthy Cabinet ministers tell us that the Government is committed to the project, but if they do not hurry up a good deal of the project will not be there when they come to look for it. It is rotting away. It is not finished, although it has been in course of construction now for ten years. Do not think for a minute that the people of the West have forgotten it. I hold in my hand a telegram from the Yorkton Board of Trade. In Yorkton to-day there is a large wholesale centre, and in the Board of Trade they have a good many farmer members. This is the wire they sent me:

March 29, 1920.

The Yorkton Board of Trade has passed the following resolution: Be it resolved that the Yorkton Board of Trade request the Federal Government to issue 20-year bonds to the extent of $5,000,000 for completion of Hudson Bay railroad, which shall include the amount required to complete the gap of sixty-eight miles between the towns of Sturgis and Hudson Bay Junction, to be known as the Hudson Bay main line completion issue, which bonds can be disposed of in Western Canada in a reasonable time after the issue is authorized on the basis of the Victory Loan.

Secretary, J. M. CLARK.

I read that telegram to show the House that the people of the West will not sit down quietly until this road is completed. It is a necessity to-day, and as the years go by the need will become stronger. I wish to give you a few figures on the last increase in freight as it affects the farmer. The recent 15 per cent increase in railway freight rates falls more heavily on the farmer and the rural population than upon any other section of the community. It takes the farmer living in Manitoba an extra $14.50 on every car of wheat—that is quite a chunk; on every car of oats $13.60 extra; on every car of barley $13.40 extra; on every car of flax the same amount. And it gets him again the other way when shipping in his machinery and other things that he must have on his farm. Therefore I claim that this proposed advance should not be made.

[Mr. J. F. Reid.]

With the indulgence of the House I will give a few figures to show how the tariff works out at the present time, and I will take for the purpose of my comparisons the years 1915 and 1920. I shall make my comparisons in dollars and cents, as that is a pretty sure way of knowing what one is doing, whereas percentages sometimes do not mean very much. On a 14-inch gang plough the customs tariff in 1915 was $11.20, to-day it is $13.97; on a disc harrow in 1915 it was $5.03, to-day it is $6.34; on a shoe drill in 1915 it was $17.75, to-day it is $19.40; on a gas engine of 1½ horse-power in 1915 it was $8.80, to-day it is $14.61; on a 5-foot mower in 1915 it was $5.60, to-day it is $9.50; on a wagon in 1915 it was $7, to-day it is $20.25. The percentage on the tariff works out very satisfactorily for the manufacturer, for as the price of the article increases so also does the protective tariff increase, and consequently the users of machinery have no option but to pay not only the increased price, but also the increased tariff.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make reference to an attempt which was recently made to muzzle the press of Canada, particularly the agricultural press. I am reading from the Grain Growers' Guide of March 17 of this year, the article being headed, "Moulding the moulders of public opinion." The originator of the scheme is Mr. G. M. Murray, former general manager of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. The article proceeds:

The plot is as follows: Mr. Murray has organized a bureau—presumably a Moulding Bureau—with himself as the Moulder-in-Chief. The Moulder and his staff are located on the ninth floor of the C.P.R. building in Toronto, close by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association headquarters. Just what is the relationship existing between the Moulding Bureau and the C.M.A. doth not yet appear. But at any rate Mr. Murray has quite a staff in his Moulding Bureau, and they are busy reading and clipping papers from all over Canada.

When the editorial articles have been clipped then they go presumably to the Moulder-in-Chief, himself, Mr. G. M. Murray. According to his contract he classifies them and makes up his "black list" and his "white list." He then sends out his "confidential" report to all the Divine Right protected manufacturers who have paid him $250 per year, or more, to become members of his Moulding Bureau. In his "black list" Mr. Murray, of course, names those newspapers and journals who have dared to lay unholy hands upon the sacred edifice of the Protective Tariff. He then, presumably, advises the manufacturers—who have each paid him $250, or more, to join his Moulding Bureau—that they should withdraw their advertisement from those offending journals.

Mr. Murray calls this scheme "shepherding advertising"—Mr. Murray, of course, being the Shepherd, and the low tariff press being the lambs to be fleeced. The Grain Growers' Guide was, of course, the most unruly and wayward lamb on the Shepherd's list and was to be plucked without mercy. All these journalistic lambs were to be fleeced of their advertisements until they would eat out of Shepherd Murray's hand and "baa-aa-aa" plaintively to be restored again to favour in the eyes of the Moulder-in-Chief and his battalion of Divine Righter protectionists.

But the tables are turning. The lambs have refused to be docile and have declared unanimously for the freedom of the press. The readers of the Grain Growers' Guide are ready to accept the challenge and are prepared to meet an advertising boycott by refusing to purchase goods from those firms who seek to cripple The Guide. Mr. Murray's plot has failed. He cannot secure a "safe and sane press" by "shepherding advertising patronage." The pitiless white light of publicity has exposed the rottenness of the scheme of this would-be Napoleon of the press. Instead of a bunch of journalistic lambs eating out of his hand he has merely caught a bunch of protectionist manufacturer suckers who have paid him their good money for an utterly worthless service. The press of Canada can never be bludgeoned into submission by any such Prussian methods.

I desire to also put on Hansard the contract sent out by Mr. Murray. It is in this form:

The undersigned hereby employs G. M. Murray for a term of..... ..... commencing .. .. and ending.. .. .. ..

(a) To ascertain by careful and systematic review, and to determine as correctly as he can, the editorial policy of every daily newspaper published in Canada (foreign language papers and papers published in the Yukon territory excepted);

(b) To ascertain by careful and systematic review, and to determine as correctly as he can, the editorial policies of such other Canadian publications as the undersigned may hereafter specify, or as said G. M. Murray may deem it wise in the interest of the undersigned to embrace within the scope of his investigations;

(c) To furnish information on record in his office or obtained within the period covered by this agreement concerning the editorial policy of any Canadian publication upon which the undersigned makes demand in writing for a report;

(d) To furnish without the formality of a demand in writing reports upon the editorial policies of such Canadian publications as, in his judgment, it is in the interest of the undersigned to receive;

(e) To advise, with respect to any Canadian publication (except as aforesaid) carrying advertisements for the undersigned, as to the desirability of continuing, increasing, reducing or discontinuing the space used therein;

(f) To advise, with respect to any Canadian publication not patronized by the undersigned for advertising purposes but apparently suitable therefor, as to the desirability of contracting for space therein;

In consideration of the work to be performed and the service to be rendered the undersigned hereby agrees to pay G M. Murray the sum of.....dollars ($.....) at the commencement of the above-mentioned term.

It is further expressly agreed by the undersigned:

(1) That all information, whether printed, written or verbal, furnished voluntarily or upon demand by G. M. Murray to the undersigned, shall be held in strict confidence, and shall never be revealed to the owners or officers of any publication reported upon, except in such cases and under such restrictions as may be authorized in writing by the said G. M. Murray.

(2) That, while the said G. M. Murray undertakes to exercise good faith, due diligence and care in the performance of the duties herein specified, he does not guarantee the correctness of the information supplied, and shall not be liable in damages to the undersigned in respect thereof.

(3) That the said G. M. Murray reserves the right to terminate this agreement at any time, by refunding to the undersigned the unearned portion of the above-mentioned consideration.

(4) That upon the expiration of the term set forth herein, this agreement may be renewed for a like term by the undersigned again paying to G. M. Murray the above-mentioned consideration, in which event, even though no new agreement shall have been signed, all the conditions embodied herein shall be deemed as continuing in effect.

(5) That the duplicate of this agreement in the undersigned's possession shall be held in strict confidence, and that without the said G. M. Murray's consent, no third party shall either during the currency of this agreement or at any time thereafter be shown the agreement or made aware of its existence or informed directly or indirectly concerning any of its contents.

(6) That upon the termination of this agreement the duplicate of it shall forthwith be returned by the undersigned to the said G. M. Murray.

(7) That the reports and other printed matter or written advices referred to herein shall be deemed to have been satisfactorily delivered by the said G. M. Murray when mailed, postage prepaid, under personal and confidential cover to.. .. .. .

the valuable time of this House and I do not purpose doing so now. I have sat quietly here for the past three sessions, intent upon hearing and if possible absorbing the views of those who have had more experience in the public affairs of this country than it is at all likely I shall ever have. While the hearing has been comparatively easy even at this great distance from the place where the stage is set in this House, and while I have benefited very greatly from the privilege of being here, in distant association with these great men, the process of absorption has been slow and somewhat difficult along some lines. It may be that it is to my discredit, but the fact remains that I find at this time, after all the instruction I have received from prominent members on both sides of the House on the subject of the fiscal policy of this country, the convictions I brought in with me when I first took my seat still hold fast, and, indeed, in some instances have gained strength to such an extent that I feel it my duty—at this most propitious time—when the stress of war is over and the country is rapidly settling down to a normal peace basis—to place my position fairly and squarely before this House and before the people who have placed upon my shoulders the responsibility of representing them here.

In my opinion there have been many considerations in the past that needed careful weighing, and which were of much greater importance from a national standpoint than the possibility of being personally misunderstood, and I have not hesitated in meeting the criticism and even censure of those for whom I have as great respect, and with whom I have more in common, than any other section of the people of this country, for the course I have followed in the past, believing that my actions were in the best interests of the nation, and that I have paid in some slight proportion at least, the debt of gratitude that is due to those hon. gentlemen in the Government who have laboured earnestly and without consideration of self in carrying this country through the grave perils of the last few years. I am satisfied that the future will show that they have done much to make the name of Canada famous, and that their names will be regarded by future generations as monuments to the tenacity and determination of a people who can never in the future be regarded lightly, but always as a power amongst the nations of the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when sentiment must be relegated to the scrap heap, and we must get down to the serious consideration of the issues that face us in a more matter-of-fact manner.

Coming directly to the Budget, for I do not want to delay the House unnecessarily. There is much in the Budget that commends itself to me, and I think should commend itself to the country. The excise tax on luxuries and near luxuries is to be commended as a democratic measure which places the burden where it can easiest be borne. To that I have nothing but words of commendation with this one exception. Would it not have been better to have placed this tax solely upon goods manufactured in Canada in the case of essential articles such as boots and shoes. I am merely using boots and shoes as an illustration and in no way singling them out for special treatment. When you put an excise tax on all boots and shoes selling over a certain figure, the net result may be increased prices to the consumer and the same old condition is perpetuated.

The manufacturer collects his profits, which a great many people in this country believe are very materially enhanced by reason of the tariff, and the real evil of a protective tariff still exists. Only a portion of the money paid by reason of the tariff goes into the treasury and the balance into the pockets of those who manufacture and sell the goods.

On the other hand had the excise tax been placed upon goods of an essential nature having their origin in Canada only, we would have been able to collect the customs tariff on goods of foreign origin at the port of entry, and on Canadian goods by the excise tax. The price at which the foreign goods could be sold in Canada after paying the customs tariff would then have had a stabilizing effect upon the prices to the consumer. It is my opinion also that the application of a real excise tax to many other articles enjoying protection would yield a handsome revenue and would not work any real hardship on any one.

The system of taxation which is perpetuated by this Budget, I do not agree with, and I can tell the hon. minister that it is not satisfactory to the great majority of the people in the portion of the country from which I come no matter to what party they claim allegiance. I would rather have the excise tax as it is suggested than not at all, but I merely wish to point out that the system of levying this tax could be greatly improved upon. As it stands the old system is perpetuated as practised by both the old parties, and this does not meet the approval of those whom I have the honour to represent.

It was a source of keen disappointment to me to find that no provision is made for placing such indispensible articles in the development of this country as farm machinery and building materials on the free list, or even the lowering of the duty thereon in a substantial manner. I have not heard any plausible argument put forward as to why this should not be done. The only hope we have is a promise of a tariff revision in the future. I remember very distinctly hearing just such a promise made last year, and when called upon to do so, in defending my support of last year's Budget I explained that a tariff revision had been promised and that I considered the Government was entitled to be given the opportunity of laying before the country their tariff policy. I do not wish to be unfair to the Government in this regard. It may be that owing to the necessity of holding an extra session there was not sufficient time to do this work. But there surely was time to start it. This has not been done. What am I to tell these good people now? The only thing I could say is that a new minister has made the promise this year and I am trying him out to see if he will keep his promise better than his predecessor. I have no intention of taking any such stand. It will take more than promises of future blessings to procure my support to Budgets in the future.

Even when the time comes and the tariff is revised. After listening to the discussion that has taken place during this debate, have we who do not believe in the principle of a protective tariff as practised in the past, any reason to suppose for one moment that there will be any downward revision or any change in the system of collecting the revenues accruing therefrom? I think not.

Never have I seen such an acrobatic display as we have witnessed here in the last few days, on any other stage in the country. Members on both sides of the House have apparently been vieing with each other in vaulting gracefully and otherwise from one side to the other of the lines of thought on the fiscal policy. I am not offering any criticism of these hon. members. They have a perfect right to align themselves with the forces they believe will further to the greatest extent the interests of those whom they represent, always keeping in mind the welfare of the country as a whole, and I accept their action as being sincere. I ask them to extend to me the same consideration.

An hon. member told us during the Budget debate of last session that we had at that time reached the parting of the ways. I did not agree with him then but I do believe that we have reached the cross-roads now, and I am sure that the changes of front that we have seen recently will prove that I am right in my conclusion.

I stated at the outset that I wanted to place my position fairly and squarely before this House. I stand four-square behind the tariff principles contained in the Farmers' platform.

To those who have seen fit to go to great pains to berate the farmers' activities, more particularly in the West, I have this to say: I am a farmer. I do not draw one cent of income from any other source except that eminating from the farm. I am a life member of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, a shareholder in the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, and this may be of more interest to my hon. friends,—I am a subscriber to the Farmers' Political Campaign Fund and heartily support the principle of raising campaign funds in this manner.

If these hon. gentlemen think that they have brought a blush of shame to my face by their efforts to show that there is something nationally wrong with my position as I have stated it, they are far wide of the mark. I consider myself just as true and just as loyal a Canadian as there is in this House, and they have only convinced me the more thoroughly that there is still abundant reason for the farmers continuing their efforts which were commenced when conditions were perhaps, more objectionable than they are to-day.

I do not wish to pre-judge, but I cannot see how I can support the tariff policy that any person must see will eventually be adopted by this party. An hon. minister has told us that it is upon the fiscal policy that political thought divides. I accept this as a statement of fact. I was elected to support this Government during the period of the war and demobilization. I have fulfilled my contract to the fullest extent and must now choose my path for the future.

I therefore purpose voting for the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, not because I think there is anything material in the amendment, but because I understand according to the rules of the House no other amendment can be moved and I have no choice in the matter.

Mr. Best and Mr. Rinfret having risen at the same time:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: According to long-established custom the Speaker should give the preference alternately to members on opposite sides of the Chamber. I must therefore recognize the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), but will see the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) next, if he then rises and desires to speak.

Mr. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, there is always a certain sentiment of restraint in the mind of a new member who rises to address the House, especially on such an important matter as the Budget. But if I correctly understand the duties incumbent upon every one of us, whether still privileged by youth or already touched by the heavy hand of age, we do not speak as individuals; we speak for our constituents, and as such it is in a spirit of confidence and determination that I offer these few remarks. Moreover, I claim a privilege which but a few on either side of the House can claim, a privilege which the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) wanted to extend to all hon. members, but which the Government has so far refused with much persistency—I hold a fresh mandate from my people.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That means something.

Mr. RINFRET: Events have occurred so fast in the last decade that the mind of the people has been in a constant state of unrest and evolution, and I contend that there has been no real consultation of the people since 1911, nearly ten years ago, or twice the extreme limit that the constitution calls for. There was, it is true, a sham election in 1917, directed along certain lines and governed by an Act which, for the sake of decency, its authors are presently seeking to replace by another. I shall not recall the restrictions which made of the right to vote in that nefarious instance a privilege based on political favour. I shall not even remind you of the code facilities with which certain ministers could direct the vote through the proper channels of party utilization. The election in itself was based on such a flagrant prejudice that it alone demurred from it any authority. I shall not go over that period except to the extent of saying that the election gave no real indication of the popular sentiment of this country. The whole country was befogged by a dense, opaque mist of misunderstanding. I will admit that some of it may have developed in the fight, but I think it is about time that the dim veil was dissolved so that the country might appear again to our eyes in its true colours. I say this Government has no mandate to conduct the affairs of this country. It was formed out of the fragments of either party linked together by motives which, even if they were sincere, have long since disappeared. It was endorsed by a panic-stricken and prejudiced-fed people. It has since been deserted by some of its foremost members and it cannot find public endorsation for new ministers to take their place. Let us look at the Government as we find it to-day. We find the Minister of Railways and Canals, not satisfied with losing $50,000,000 a year in that capacity, entrusted with $30,000,000 more as Minister of Public Works. We find the Acting Solicitor General occasionally forgetting all about legal matters and invading the Department of Militia. We find the President of the Privy Council, in utter disregard of his own political health, entrusted with the public health of the country. We have the Postmaster General sitting in the Senate. I understand I am not allowed to make any comment on an honourable senator, and therefore I shall summarize my comment in a single phrase, which in itself is very eloquent. The Postmaster General sits in the Senate. And we know why. The Minister of Labour also sits in the Senate, and when the workingmen of this country want to have their claims heard they must voice them within the walls of the autocratic Chamber. This Government has no mandate, but it has received partial intimations which, even to the mind of the most erratic and illogical computer, could convey only one meaning. This Government has been forced to consult the people partially, and what has been the result in practically every case? I have here a list of the recent by-elections. The Liberals have won the counties of Prince, of Quebec East, of Kamouraska, and of St. James. These constituencies were won either by acclamation or by the largest majorities that have ever been recorded in these divisions. While we were doing that, the Government has only been able to win in Kingston and in Victoria. It has lost seats in Glengarry-Stormont, in Assiniboia, in Carleton, N.B., in North Ontario and in Timiskaming. Altogether, out of the eleven by-elections, this Government has only won two, and on that basis if they had to go before the people of this country to-day they would carry only 30 seats in the whole Dominion. One can hardly be surprised therefore to find in the ranks of the people that spirit of distrust and unrest which is so apparent everywhere, and which no doubt my hon. friends who have been recently elected have found on their way here. It is no longer a choice between policies and party affiliations as in days of yore. In many parts of the country there is a general lack of faith in public men, which this coalition of 1917 has developed to its utmost limit. It has given rise to a new party, which has invaded even this House to a marked extent. We have to deal to-day with a class party, as we had to deal with race prejudice in 1917. This new party has won the Ontario provincial elections, where the Liberal party has been temporarily weakened through the capricious stunts and somersaults of some of its former leaders. This party has also won some federal by-elections and made strong efforts in other constituencies, such as my own, where a straight Government candidate would not have polled a hundred votes. What is the meaning of this new venture in the political field? It means only this: That wherever Unionism has flourished the people have lost confidence in both wings of the coalition, and if this Opposition is going strong and is full of life and promise, it is to the extent and in the measure that it has fought this Government from the very start.

As for my friends the farmers and labour men, I fully share what has been said about them by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). He expressed the opinion that they would best attain success, and at the same time ensure the welfare of the country, not by isolation, but by co-operation, and in full conformity with the very status of this Dominion I venture to say that the next government will not be a government for privileged classes, such as this one, or a government for any specified group, but it will be truly and simply a confederation of classes.

Mr. Speaker, the people do not suffer only from lack of faith in public men. They also feel in their purse, nay, in their very flesh, the sharp and burning sting of bad administration. So much has been said about the high cost of living that one shrinks from the prospect of hearing more. Yet it is a question ever present to the mind of every one, and like the spectre which followed the hero of the legend, it stares, flashes, and glares, at every corner of the household. It is felt most incisively at the very hour of rising, when the consumer is reminded by every bit of clothing he puts on of the heavy cost of linens and woollens, when his $12 pair of boots weight and rivet his feet like cannon balls. It is felt at the breakfast table, where under the eyes of the family every dish opens up like a book telling the sad story. It is told everywhere, in the street, behind the show windows, and in the office. And the worst feature of it is that the cost has increased not only during the war but has kept on increasing since the war is over. I have here a few figures compiled by the Department of Labour, which I shall have to trust, I suppose, giving an average family budget in sixty cities of the Dominion. Here are the figures: $15.98 in March 1920, $15.77 in February 1920, $13.07 in March 1919, $7.68 in March 1914. As you will see, Mr. Speaker, not only has the cost of living doubled during the war, which would not be abnormal, but it has increased since 1919, and it is increasing monthly. I do not wish to go into this question fully because it has already been dealt with pretty exhaustively, and I think it is up to the Government to stop the speeches and the evil at the same time.

There are many causes of the high cost of living. Some, like the war, are inevitable and need not be demonstrated. But I claim that the war has served as a pretext for much profiteering and speculation. When it comes to placing the blame, some people blame the farmer and some the labour man. Personally, I would not lay the blame at the door of either. I consider that the farmer who rises with the sun and who works all day is not a profiteer. He is a producer of wealth. He produces the very essentials to the life of the country and I consider that he derives a rather slim profit in view of the amount of beneficent work he accomplishes. He may be taught to contribute a little more to the public treasury, but he is inclined to leave the brunt of the burden to the city people. On the whole, Sir, I do not take much stock in the criticisms which are levelled at the farmer and the blame which is ascribed to him for the alleged fact that he receives too high prices for his products. Nor do I consider the labour man a profiteer. The labourer who has to face hard times and meet with a cheering smile the hungry members of his family is no profiteer. We hear sometimes the statement that we should pay the labourers higher wages and have them do more work. Well, Sir, I contend that eight hours a day on the part of the labourer is an ample contribution of work to the service of the community. It divides the day into three parts; eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for meals, recreation and social intercourse; and I think that a man who has worked consistently and with all his energy for eight hours of the day is entitled to spend a fair proportion of his time in the bosom of his family, so that he may be able to cheer them up and to enjoy a happy and comfortable life himself. The days are gone when a thousand men, slaves, have had to work for the pleasure and the extravagances of a single individual. I am a very strong believer in the eight-hour day policy. It has been adopted in most civilized countries, and I repeat that when a man has contributed eight hours of his day to the service of his fellowmen he is entitled to adequate remuneration and sufficient leisure time. Moreover, I do not think that the increase in wages counts very much in the general increase in the cost of living. I have before me a report of the American Railroad Brotherhood prepared by Mr. W. J. Lauck. I should like very much indeed, Mr. Speaker, to cite from the report of the Board of Commerce established by this Government, but so far we have had only one report from that board and that was in reference to the resignation of its chairman, Mr. Justice Robson.

Mr. BUREAU: Justifying the high cost of sugar?

Mr. RINFRET: As I have not that report I must be content with quoting from the report of the organization which I have just mentioned. I shall quote only a few lines, because I do not believe in the practice of reading long documents:

> Of the extraordinary increase in the price of sugar now amounting to 300 per cent, the study says, the increase in labour cost paid by the consumer was less than 15 per cent. . . .
>
> In the meat packing industry, where profits were said to have increased between 300 and 400 per cent, the labour item was shown so small that a wage increase of 100 per cent would add less than five per cent to the total cost of the meat. . . .
> Profits absorb approximately one-half the retail price of certain kinds of cloth, the report declared, while the labour item amounts to from one-fourteenth to one-twentieth of the price.

I shall not read any further. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers and the labour men are legitimate factors in the determination of prices, and the real profiteer is the man who stands between them, the middleman, the agent, the commission broker who produces nothing yet sells everything; who buys butter, eggs and vegetables from the farm and sells them back at exorbitant profits to the city people. In the transfer of produce from the place of production to the spot of consumption you have the whole process of profiteering. And the remedy must be applied at the source of the evil. In these days, from the moment when an egg is laid by a good-willing hen to the moment this highly essential and venerable product appears in the china cup before the consumer, it has travelled such a long way that it has increased as much in price as it has lost in freshness. It is brought from the farm in a state of innocence. It is put into a box and placed on board train; then from the train it is taken to a cold storage, where it lies in long confinement and meditation. Later on it pays a visit to a wholesale house and is handled by quite a number of agents. Then it spends a few days in the shop of the retailer at the street corner. Finally, after this extended tour, full of age and wisdom, it dies a natural death on the plate of the consumer. How many people, Mr. Speaker, from the poultry yard to the breakfast table, have handled this product and, thereby increased its cost? There, Mr. Speaker, you have the whole question, if I dare say, in an egg shell. The high cost of these articles is due to useless manipulation and criminal abuse of cold storages, and it is just there that the Government should intervene. Let me say a few words in regard to cold storages. It is a well known fact that cold storage owners prefer to allow thousands of pounds of meat to perish rather than have the market flooded for fear that poor people might be able to obtain food at reasonable prices. These institutions were designed pre-eminently to store goods so that in the bad season they could be sold at cheap prices, but they have served the very opposite purpose. They have not been utilized as refrigerators for the food of the people but they have been nothing but closed vaults to aid in speculation. This Government should see that these cold storages are properly controlled as has been done in other countries. The Liberal party in the convention of August last saw to that point and placed in its programme a resolution from which I beg to quote the following paragraph:

> With the object of reducing the high cost of living by eliminating as far as possible the waste and expense in handling food products between the producer and the consumer, it is expedient to extend the principle and system of Canadian Government elevators, and to provide interior and terminal cold storage warehouses equipped for the assembling, assorting, etc., of food.

I will quote no further. The Government says that the people should economize. I think, Sir, that by these new taxes they are introducing it will be very hard for the people to economize, because they will have no money left. I think that economy is akin to charity in this respect, that it ought to begin at home, and I would therefore ask the Government to economize. The Government, however, have brought down a Budget that shows us a sum of $550,000,000 which, they admit, they have revenue to cover only to the extent of two-thirds of that amount. Yet in the opening of the session in the Speech from the Throne this House was informed:

> It is satisfactory to know that business in Canada has been well maintained, that production has been large, and that general conditions are on the whole satisfactory.

This is the kind of satisfaction that the Government has to offer the Canadian people. I do not wish to dwell at any length on the Budget, but I cannot but deplore the fact that the Government not only has been unable to relieve, but it has added very greatly, to the already heavy burden which the poor consumer such as the low salaried men, the clerks and labour men now have to bear. Not only does the Government not relieve that class of people, but they add to their burden. The Government say that they are going to tax luxuries. Well, that reminds me of the statement of an economist who claimed that there were only three things which were essential to human life, namely, a glass of water, a loaf of bread and a blanket. I think the Minister of Finance must have consulted that economist when framing his Budget, because he has taxed pretty nearly everything but water, bread and blankets.

An hon. MEMBER: He has taxed the blankets too.

Mr. RINFRET: Possibly he has; that only makes my argument the stronger.

Mr. BUREAU: And they are taxing the bread too through the Wheat Board.

Mr. RINFRET: As to these taxes, Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to visit my division during the holidays. That division happens to be an important one, and the fact that I am about to state may possibly not surprise the Government. Probably they expected it; if they did they have not been disappointed. These taxes are damned by every one, both by the merchants and by the purchasers. I could say much about these taxes but I will limit myself to a few words. It has been shown that these taxes will create a lot of confusion. I said a moment ago that the Government taxed pretty nearly everything. That was a mistake. There are some oddities in this new taxation that the Minister of Finance has brought in. For instance, I do not know why it is that the Minister of Finance is taxing umbrellas when he is not taxing canes. I suppose he would want to lay a burden on the man who is putting something aside for a rainy day. The Government is taxing glassware but it is not taxing china. You may not drink—I shall not say wine because wine is not to be touched these days—but you may not drink water in a piece of cut glassware because you will be taxed but if you choose to drink it in the highest grade of Dresden, Saxony and Limoges ware you will be beyond the reach of the tax. Why the minister has done that no one can possibly know.

Mr. BUREAU: For pink teas.

Mr. RINFRET: I will accept the word of my hon. friend. It has already been shown that this tax will lead to fraud. I know there are stores—I will not admit they are in my own division—where they have already started imposing a tax on every line of goods no matter what the price may be. I also predict that before many months it will be practically impossible to buy a hat below $5 or a pair of shoes below $9 or a suit of clothes below $45 because the inducement that is given by this system of taxation will be so great that merchants will increase even low grade merchandise to the prices fixed by the Government.

With regard to the luxury tax, I might quote the Montreal Gazette which stated not later than this morning that it considered that the Government had fixed the limit of price on clothes at too low an amount. The Gazette says:

> He draws the taxation on clothing at the line not of luxury, but of necessity. It is not extravagance to-day to pay $45 for a suit of clothes, or $9 for a pair of boots.

With that I thoroughly agree. But there is also a general feeling that these taxes are altogether unfair. I will give an example that was pointed out to me of how it will affect the druggists. It relates to patent medicines. These medicines will be subject to four different taxes if they contain alcohol. They will first have to pay $2 per gallon on alcohol; they will then have to pay one per cent on the wholesale price; they will then have to pay for the stamps which must be affixed to the bottles and finally they will have to pay for the 30 per cent tax on patent medicines. The Ottawa Journal refers to this point. I shall not quote from my own paper or from Liberal papers but I am going to quote the Ottawa Journal. It says:

Further consideration might well be given by the Government to this heavy tax on what has become a necessity in many families unable to bear it. Doubtless a remedy for pain or discomfort is a luxury to the sick, but it is hardly the kind of luxury that the public treasury should profit from. Besides which, the proposed tax is unfair because it hits only the liquid medicines.

There is another point about this tax upon which merchants and the public at large feel very keenly and that is that the tax should be imposed not on the full amount but only on the excess of the amount over what the Government has determined. The other day, when my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) made a speech, he claimed that in the United States this tax on luxuries was charged only on the excess. He was contradicted by some hon. member on the other side of the House who wanted to wager a hat that he was wrong. I am afraid my hon. friend will have to pick up the hat and I will quote from the United States revenue law as approved on February 24, 1919. It reads thus:

Sec. 904 (a) That on and after May 1, 1919, there shall be levied, assessed, collected and paid a tax equivalent to 10 per centum of so much of the amount paid for any of the following articles, as in excess of the price hereinafter specified as to each such article, when such article is sold by or for a dealer or his estate on or after such date for consumption or use.

This makes the case very clear that the United States charge the tax only on the excess and not on the full amount; so that my hon. friend from Brome was altogether right and he is entitled to receive the hat from my hon. friend on the other side.

But there is something more to be said about this tax. The Minister of Finance himself has no idea what will be the result of the tax. Speaking to the Montreal Gazette on the 21st May he said:

"There will, no doubt, be some confusion for a time," Sir Henry Drayton, Minister of Finance, remarked to-day, "but that is inevitable with any new methods of taxation. When the system begins to operate it will be found to work smoothly."

Let us hope that it will prove true.

The luxury taxes will accomplish one of two things—either they will provide revenue or they will bring down prices. Revenue is needed, but if the cost of living is reduced, we shall feel that the luxury tax has equally accomplished its purpose.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

That is what the Minister of Finance says. Just imagine if you were to go to a physician and he were to give you a bottle and say: "This may be good for your appetite, or it may be good for your stomach, or it may clear your liver or possibly you may use it as an ointment; at least try it any way; it will do you no harm." That is exactly the stand taken by the Minister of Finance. But I will say to the Minister of Finance that there is another alternative that he has not foreseen in connection with this system. It may reduce the cost of living, it may produce revenue; but it may also lessen trade, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has said and it may put out of business quite a number of a certain class of retailers who will not be able to go on with their trade with this tax imposed on the special lines of goods which they are at present selling.

But the Government says that it needs revenue. It needs $50,000,000 a year for railways. But because it has seen fit to buy some railways, I think it is rather hard to impose taxes on everything our people wear because the Government blundered in that particular instance. The Government also needs revenue because at this time when we boast that we are done with militarism the Government is still spending $12,000,000 a year on the Militia, which is many millions more than we thought of spending before the war and when we were preparing for it. The Government also needs revenue because in previous years it offered war loans to the extent of $1,380,000,000 free of taxation. I do not wish to be personal, but I will give an illustration in a general way of how this tax exemption works out. Suppose that a multi-millionaire—and I think it actually took place—invested $1,000,000 in those war loans, bringing him an income of $55,000 a year, for which investment at the time he would be praised for his "patriotism"; that income of $55,000 should have been more than cut in half and I suppose at least $30,000 should have gone into the public treasury in the form of income tax, but as a result of exempting those war loans from taxation that patriotic gentleman has made an investment against the public interest to the extent of some $30,000 a year.

But there is this further feature to be considered, Mr. Speaker. We are paying interest on a huge war debt, and if we look at it closely we shall find that this war debt not only comprises the expenses of the war proper, but it also comprises the huge profits which were made by some friends of the Government during the war; in other words, we are paying interest on the large profits made by the friends of this Government, and those profits have been stored away safely in those tax-free war loans. Which means that to-day we are paying the interest on a large portion of those war profits; and while those privileged beings, friends of the Government, are in full enjoyment of their revenue, the Government is forced to tax the common people and to maintain a high tariff.

Naturally during this debate much has been said about the tariff, and reference has been made to the division which I represent. Before I come to that point, I would like to answer a question put by hon. gentlemen opposite who have occasionally asked us: What would you do if you were in our place? Well, we would be placed in the position of a tenant who enters a house that has been badly kept for a number of years. We would probably have to spend some money in papering the walls, repairing the floors, and possibly in fumigating some of the rooms. But should we enter that house, we would see to the fullest extent possible that the damages were paid for by the people who had caused the damage before we proceeded to administer the affairs of the country.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne)—who is not in his seat now—said that the election of St. James was waged and won on protection. I have Hansard before me, and I will read a passage of his speech, because it sounds so new to me. He said:

> My genial and astute friend, the member for Beauce (Mr. Béland)— whenever there is a compliment paid to some hon. member on this side of this House we may be sure of what is going to follow.

> —who was doing all he could to elect the hon. member—that is myself, and I feel much obliged to the member for Beauce.

> —who now represents that great division in this House (Mr. Rinfret)— you will notice, Sir, how my hon. friend was full of compliments before he reached his point.

> —also made a very strong protectionist speech.

I will not take issue with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he has not been better informed on this election. As will be remembered, there was no straight Government candidate in the division, and therefore the information that my hon. friend was able to collect was naturally from a most indirect source. But if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is under the impression that the St. James election was won on a platform of protection, I must inform him that he is labouring under a delusion.

Last night the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) gave us a most spectacular performance; he was speaking behind heaps of books and documents, and during the course of his speech he culled extracts from those books and documents as a busy bee would gather honey from a bed of flowers. And he also was very free in putting questions to the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) until the latter could stand it no longer and left the Chamber. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister was perfectly aware that we could not reply to his questions. He knows the rules of the House very well, and even if he had forgotten about them I know that the Chair would at once have recalled them. But he kept on putting questions to this side of the House and then looking to his supporters as if to pick applause from their very eyes, and again turning to us and saying, "The hon. gentlemen cannot answer my questions." But the hon. minister knew all the time that we were precluded from answering him. Unfortunately he is not in his seat now, but if he were I would have felt like putting a few questions to him in turn. Of course, possibly I would not care for a reply, possibly I would like to put to his very lips the same chalice that he wanted us to drink from last night. But just the same I might have asked him why, after spending two hours in the afternoon to demonstrate that free trade has been a failure in England, and that the people there are gradually coming back to protection, he found it necessary to spend two more hours in the evening—and to what purpose, Mr. Speaker?—to show that this Government has on some items lowered the tariff even below the reciprocity point! And yet the hon. minister would put questions to us and look at us staringly as if he had silenced us forever.

I would like to ask what the hon. gentleman was arguing about all yesterday afternoon and last night; was he arguing protection, or was he arguing for a lower tariff? I think he was arguing both, Sir. It seemed to me that he could cut his speech in two, and send the afternoon part about protection coming back into favour in England to his friends at Toronto—if he has any left there; and the other part where he demonstrated that this Government has lowered the tariff even lower than reciprocity called for he might send to his western friends. And after the hon. minister had made those two demonstrations in one day, it will be remembered that he concluded by admonishing us always to be consistent when dealing with fiscal policy!

As to the St. James election, I desire to be very emphatic in stating that at every meeting we held we stood for a lowering of the tariff on food, we stood for the very principle that is embodied in the resolution of the Liberal party that was adopted in August last, and which was read on many occasions by various speagers during the campaign; and also for the principle embodied, for although less specific it is the same principle, in the amendment proposed the other day by my hon. friend for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding).

My hon. friends opposite say that we are receding from former policies; that we are not consistent in the matter of fiscal policies. If this were a free trade country, I could quite understand hon. members opposite saying that in such an amendment as we are now supporting we were drawing backwards. But for a number of years we have had to deal with a high protective tariff. Everybody knows, even those, I think, who argue to the contrary, that to step from that high tariff to plain, absolute free trade would be national suicide. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is indicated by the very processes of nature itself. When a man's limb has been bitten by frost and you wish to restore it to its natural warmth, you do not expose it at once to the heat of an oven or a fire; but, lest you would lose it, you friction it with snow so that life and blood will gradually return to the inert limb. That is what we are trying to do. We have to-day a cold and inert tariff. We all understand that, having regard to the welfare of the country, it would be a great mistake to expose it once to the open air. We wish to take a cautious, a prudent, a gradual step. The Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen) made a pathetic appeal to me yesterday to support the Budget because I had promised that to my electors. I am full aware of my responsibility, Mr. Speaker, as a public man, and I say that when I do vote for the amendment brought down by the member for Shelburne and Queen's I will fully meet the views of the whole electorate of St. James, because the labour man who opposed me also stood for a moderate tariff.

There are other points that one would feel like touching upon, but I do not wish to overburden this House with speech. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), speaking of customs valuations, complained that the Government were having the goods valued on the basis of the nominal value of foreign money and were not taking into consideration the current rate of exchange. This is a very special matter upon which I have some documentation, and I think it would be better to leave it over; probably there will be an opportunity later in the session, or when we take up these resolutions in committee, to deal with it.

But before I take my seat, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter which I do not wish to treat at any length, but to which I would allude. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said this afternoon that we should have in this country a little more team play, and, probably to illustrate the thought that he had in his mind, he began and ended his speech with a few words in French. Now, Mr. Speaker, I too think that we should have a little more team play, and I would like to allude to that as a conclusion.

As a newly-elected member, fresh from my constituents, I would like to voice their feelings in this House and to express most sincerely the intense desire of my province for a good understanding with the English-speaking citizens of our country. This may not be a matter exactly relevant to the Budget, but I think it is closely connected with the general welfare of the country. During the war the province of Quebec was lamentably misrepresented, because people failed to understand the mentality of the French Canadians; they attributed to enmity and to lack of loyalty and courage what was really a most normal and most explicable state of mind. This, of course, is a dead issue and I do not desire to revise it. But I may be permitted to rejoice in the fact that since the conclusion of the war a better account of my province is given in the press of the country, because in these times of stress and social strife the proper mentality of the French Canadian is better understood; the so-called "Quebec apathy" appears in its real significance and is properly branded as moderation, steadiness and love of the land. When the strikers in Winnipeg were hanging a thundering cloud over that western city; when Ontario cities—aye, Mr. Speaker, even the pure and holy Toronto—were threatening rebellion, the good old province of Quebec still remained draped in its robe of quietness and peaceful stability. And the Montreal Star was well able to say:

> If a red wave of Bolshevism should sweep from overseas, as some people fear, it would shatter itself upon Quebec's stability as the Atlantic surges are shattered on the Gaspé cliffs.

I do say, Mr. Speaker—and I wish my hon. friends would well digest my words—that no province is more tolerant, more desirous for peace and harmony, than the province of Quebec. All that we demand—and it is treatment meted out to minorities within our borders—is a clear recognition of our rights; that is in full conformity with the British spirit all over the world. Wherever the true British spirit has prevailed it has preserved the essentials of the nationalities over which it has presided; and that is the spirit that we wish to see flourish in Canada. The Confederation pact conferred on the two great Canadian races certain rights as to their schools, their language and their institutions. I again say, let us live not according to the letter, but according to the spirit of that pact. The letter of the law is cold, lifeless, and leads to much misunderstanding. As the dramatist says:

> What damned error but some sober brow
> Will bless it and approve it with a text?

But the spirit of the law is warm, peace-breathing, life-giving; and whenever these questions arise as to school or language, let us stand not by the cold interpretation, or, rather, falsification of the text, but by that high spiritual motive which animates the words and gives them their true light.

Again I deplore that this Budget is bringing nothing in the way of relief to the consumer from the heavy burden that he is now bearing, and that it has to admit such a lamentable situation so far as the condition of our financial affairs is concerned. The Government say that the country as a whole is prosperous and that the people are satisfied. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the kind of prosperity and satisfaction that the Canadian people are asking for and that they are entitled to? The Canadian people want prosperity, not a prosperity locked up in vaults, bank safes and cold storages, but a prosperity that will flow like the rays of the sun on every humble citizen of this Dominion. The Canadian people want peace—not a peace written in books or laws, enclosed in cryptograms which only few can decipher, but a peace that will live, that will rise and blossom in the hearts of every one. That peace, that prosperity, the present Government have failed lamentably to bring about. They have had to face hard times and grave difficulties, but they have met them with a weak mind, an empty heart and a false purpose. And the Canadian people are longing for the time when it will be given them to elect new representatives and to choose a Government for this country more worthy of its great destiny and the gravity of the hour.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, if it is not out of place, might I be permitted to observe—and I think I am voicing the opinion of hon. members on this side of the House—that there has been a distinct addition to the debating talent of this House by reason of the election for the constituency of St. James, of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Rinfret). I do not think that I can say that everybody agrees with all that he has said, but I desire to make these remarks, because my hon. friend and myself have been companions in arms in the past and I have a very friendly feeling towards him and I knew that if he ever came into this House, he would be able to hold his own in debate. I desired to pay this tribute to-night before commencing to make the remarks I intend to offer on the Budget.

First of all, I am going to pay this tribute to the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), that he was at least heroic and courageous in the Budget which he introduced, and I am not going to offer any serious objections to his taxation proposals, because I am one who, I think, during the time I have been in this House, has consistently advocated the removal of certain forms of taxation. But I realized all along that if I advocated those things and they came about, we had to introduce another form of taxation, and that form of taxation had to be direct. I might criticise the expenditure that has been made by this Government and the previous Government. I might say that this Government is not practising economy as it should practise it; but I must realize this fact that Canada to-day has very heavy financial obligations, and it is the duty of Canada to meet those obligations, and the duty of this Parliament in some form or other to adopt means of taxtion that will raise the necessary money for that purpose.

During the war I think we should have imposed greater taxation upon the people, because I feel that many people, during that period, were better able to pay taxes to this country than some of them are at the present time. If we had done that, we might have been able to face the period after the commencement of peace with a much smaller debt than we have now. At any rate these proposals have been made for the purpose of meeting our financial obligations, and as long as the money that is raised by this taxation goes toward that purpose, I am prepared to support that taxation, although I must confess that I agree with some of the criticisms which have been offered, that in some instances, at any rate, these proposals do not hit at luxuries but at actual necessities. But where these taxes hit at actual luxuries, I am in favour of them and am prepared to defend them.

All of us, I suppose, cry for economy in the administration of the affairs of the country, but I find that most of us contradict ourselves by frequently placing before the Government claims for the expenditure of money. It is our duty at this time to demand only absolutely necessary expenditure upon those things that will be helpful to the development of this Dominion, and we should refrain from expenditures upon what we can safely call unnecessary things.

It is not my intention to make a lengthy speech, but I feel it is my duty as a member of this House to state clearly and distinctly my views on the tariff proposals contained in the Budget. I am quite in accord with the attitude the Government have taken in removing the war taxes. The more of these taxes they remove, the more I shall be inclined to favour the Government; but at the same time I feel I am standing to-night at the parting of the ways as regards my views in connection with the tariff, and I want to give my reasons for my stand along that line. Ever since I came into this House I have been a supporter of a low tariff; I have never at any time advocated free trade; nor have I at any time advocated moderate protection; but I thought, and I still think, that the reasonable policy to advocate is a low tariff and a tariff directed primarily for the raising of revenue and not for the purpose of protecting industries in this country. That is still my view and I want to be consistent with my record in the past in directing the course I intend to take as regards the Budget at this time. I might be able to support the taxation proposals, but it has been made clear to me during this debate that whatever revision of the tariff is to come is to be a revision that is going to maintain protection; and I would be inclined to say that the moderate protection that is being advocated really means high protection, because I have here the words of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) in quoting the increased tariff in Australia. The minister made this observation, after quoting the items:

> That will serve to show what our sister Dominion is doing. Australia evidently believes in a policy of moderate protection.

And the items that the minister was quoting in regard to Australia showed that Australia was increasing its tariff. Consequently, if moderate protection means an increase in the tariff, I cannot be in sympathy with moderate protection. I do not think this Government looks to a man to support them through thick and thin on every policy they introduce. I was not elected to this House under any such consideration. When I appealed to the people of my constituency in 1917, I told them that I was standing for a war policy and a war Government; and when I was asked where I stood on the tariff, I told them that I stood where I had always stood, namely, in favour of a low tariff and I did not intend to vary my position in that regard, but that I did not think the tariff should be any consideration during the war and it was my intention to support Union Government And I did so during the period of war. But as I said in speaking on the Address at the opening of this session, I felt that as regards the tariff and other domestic policies, I was free to act in the way that I considered to be in the best interests of the country and in accord with the course I had always followed on this particular question.

Coming to a consideration of the Budget, I might say this, that the points the amendment aims at I am in sympathy with. Anything that will tend to reduce the cost of living or anything that will tend to encourage production in this country has my support and sympathy, and I feel that a reduction in the tariff aims in those directions. Why, I have the words of my good friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—and he is my good friend, although I cannot agree wth him in his views on the tariff—that the removal of the war tax of 7½ per cent will tend to reduce the cost of living. When he was speaking on the Budget he stated, that the accusation of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) that this Government had not done anything to reduce the cost of living was untrue, because the removal of the 7½ per cent war tax will lessen the cost of living, let us reduce the tariff still further on the necessaries of life, and thus further reduce the cost of living. That is my stand on the tariff.

As to the whole question of protection, I do not want to see any industry in this country driven out of business. I have been told time and again, and I have heard it claimed on the floor of this House, that protection was primarily intended for the infant industries of this country. Now I might be influenced to support protection if it was for that purpose; but when I find that the industries of this country have been in the Infants' Home practically from 1878 until the present time, I reach the conclusion that the industries never pass the infantile stage, they are in that stage always. Now I do feel this, that our industries in this country should be well enough organized and should be able to put by sufficient reserves, after a period of protection, in order to face outside competition. They should not expect protection for all time to come, and I think the time is ripe now to cut away a great deal of that protection.

In regard to the question of the development of our natural resources and their connection with the tariff, I have urged this matter on previous occasions, and I urge it again now, that it by the removal of the tariff we can make the implements of production cheaper and thereby encourage the development of our natural resources we are doing something worth while for this country. It is the development of our natural resources that we desire at the present time because the development of those resources will enrich Canada and enable it to meet its pressing obligations. What do I find in the province of Alberta? Men are going out, individuals and companies, and spending thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars in an effort to find oil in that province. But practically everything they use in the operations to discover oil is taxed. Now I do not think in a case of that kind, where there is an attempt to develop our natural resources, and where if oil was found it would mean millions of dollars to this country, that those implements should be taxed any more than the implements used by the farmers who also are engaged in the development of our natural resources. I have a case in point, a local one, which I should like to give in this connection. In the section of Alberta from which I come many acres are devoted to the production of Alfalfa. Except for an exceptional year like last year when there was a shortage of feed throughout Western Canada I would say that there was a surplus of alfalfa produced in that section, and men who realize that with the development of irrigation there is going to be a large increase in the alfalfa area are looking for some other purpose to use that alfalfa. An enterprising gentleman in my constituency decided he would go into the alfalfa milling business in order to produce a meal that could be used for stock feeding. He wrote to me wanting to find out whether he could get a certain machine for that particular purpose into Canada free of duty. It was a machine that was not produced in Canada and was for the purpose of utilizing one of our own resources and making it profitable, and encouraging the development of the alfalfa area on irrigated land. This particular machine, an alfalfa grinder, valued at about $4,000, I found, was subject to a duty of 20 per cent, or nearly $800. That was a tax on what I would call a productive implement necessary for the development of our resources in Western Canada.

Briefly I feel, as I indicated before, that whatever revision of the tariff is contemplated is to be along the lines of protection. And when we speak of moderate protection I would say that it means sufficient protection at least to satisfy the industries of this country, and I have not yet been converted to the view that adequate protection or moderate protection for protection's sake only is desirable in this country. Consequently, under these circumstances, I cannot commit myself to a proposition inconsistent with the atttiude I have taken in this House from the beginning. I feel therefore it is my duty to go on record now as being in favour of a reduction of the tariff, and for that reason I intend to support the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding).

Before taking my seat I would like to point out to the Government a matter that I think is worthy of some attention, and again it is a case which comes from the section of the country which I represent, but I think it is important to the whole country. We are very anxious to develop our export trade and I think it should be the business of this Government—I am not complaining that they are not pursuing this policy—to widen our markets all over the world, and wherever we can get a footing in a new market we should get it, and get it as soon as possible. I feel that on the Pacific we have opportunities for the development of a great deal of trade with Canada if we only keep our eyes open and get after that trade. We did have a trade in flour with Hong Kong, and I think it is worth mentioning that one mill alone in the city where I live exported in 1912 to Hong Kong and Shanghai 155,901 bags of flour, in 1913, 182,404 bags of flour and in 1914, 101,196 bags of flour. When the war broke out that market dropped until there was practically nothing shipped in the other years. I am told by millers at the present time it is practically impossible to get into that market, by reason of an order of the Wheat Board. The Wheat Board says it will only issue a permit to ship to Hong Kong on receipt of a regular application form, accompanied by a cheque for $2 a barrel refund to the board. The millers claim that the $2 a barrel refund demand practically keeps them out of that Oriental market. It may surprise the House to know how much flour has been shipped from Australia to Hong Kong and Shanghai. The importer who writes this letter in the correspondence that has been submitted to me says that practically all this market is open to Canada and could be used by Canada at the present time. He says:

> Yet in spite of all the difficulties, shipping and so forth, this market (the Hong Kong market) imported 1,200,000 bags of Australian flour last year and will probably continue importing large quantities.

What I want to point out is this: Seemingly from this order of our Wheat Board we are unable to ship flour to Hong Kong in competition with other countries and we are losing a market we formerly had. Now I am not in a position to condemn offhand the Wheat Board. There is a great difference of opinion as to the Wheat Board. I am not a farmer or a miller, but it seems to me that in this case that particular policy is not in the interests of the milling trade of Canada any more than it is in the interests of the export trade of Canada, and this situation should be remedied if we want to build up with the Pacific countries a large export trade.

I have attempted to outline as briefly as possible my views on the Budget. I might say again that I am merely attempting to be consistent with the course that I have always taken on the tariff. I have noticed during this debate that there has been some criticism of other hon. members for their lack of consistency. Well, I may be inconsistent on some other questions, but on the tariff I think I can claim I have always been consistent, and it is merely to be consistent, and to continue to be consistent until I am enlightened that I am wrong, that I am taking the course I have announced to-night.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Mr. ROCH LANCTOT (Laprairie-Napierville) (translation): At such a late hour, Mr. Speaker, I thought the adjournment of this debate might have been obtained, but I understand from the whips of both parties that that is impossible to-night. I understand that if I were a big wig either of the Government or of the Opposition, there would perhaps not be so much objection, but when one represents the agricultural class he must be kept on the go, Mr. Speaker, and therefore I shall proceed. I will not stop considering the remarks made by the members opposite nor by those of the Third Party for, as far as I am concerned, I am always, as I have stated year after year, in a most particular position, and I must tell you from the start: I have not participated in that whirligig of millions since 1915, as have all the politicians in this House. The new taxes announced by the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) do not surprise me, for my grandmother used to tell me, when I was very young, that whoever wages war must pay the costs, and I have always believed that Baptiste and John should have to pay them; and that is really what is happening now.

Before entering upon the question of this new taxation, I wish to congratulate just a little the Minister of Finance upon the displacing he as made—it is something new to me—of certain items appearing on the balance sheet as assets and which ought to be set down as liabilities. L refer to the $140,223,373.89 due by the Canadian Northern Railway Company, of the $96,345,469.19 owed by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and of the $1,148,533.33 due by the Grand Trunk Company; so that our net indebtedness, which appeared in the Official Gazette as being of $1,935,946,312.85, is really of $2,273,305,456.92. There are still, Mr. Speaker, some other amounts which, in my humble opinion, should not be set down as assets; among others, there is the sum of $171,710,168.19 due by the Imperial Government.

If I do remember right, the former Minister of Finance told us, a few years ago, that the Imperial Government was owing us some seven or eight hundred millions of dollars, and we have not yet received very much of that money. I am very much in doubt that the present Minister of Finance may collect those amounts he enters to our credit. There are still many other amounts, I think, that will have to be deducted next year, if the same Minister of Finance is still at his post—although I do not expect it.

In his speech of the 20th instant, the hon. member for Vancouver-Centre (Mr. Stevens) declared to the Minister of Finance that the country's debt was far higher than he had stated it. He even went further: he wanted to add to our indebtedness, not to have the Federal government pay it, but he wanted to add to it the whole debt of the Provincial governments and of 12 cities of Canada.

As far as I am concerned, I think that we should not worry about provincial indebtedness; I think that each province can see to its own affairs, so with the towns. It is enough to have to look after the Dominion debt. The hon. member for Vancouver-Centre, instead of discoursing over the provinces and towns of this country, should have told us of the railway debts—I believe that it is more important that the people should know what is the real debt of our railways—I mean the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk railways. We have not yet taken possession of the latter, but the papers give us to understand that we shall in the near future.

According to the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Reid) our National Railways gave us last year a deficit of $47,000,000 for the moving of the trains (salaries, coal, and perhaps oil, also), apart from the upkeep of the lines; only for the moving of the passenger and freight trains. We shall soon have the Grand Trunk on our hands, as I said before, so that next year our deficit will be still larger. I don't think I am putting the thing unfairly to the House in saying that these two roads will cost the country at least one billion dollars. If these roads were to be the property of a well organized company, what would be the first question this company would ask itself? Will they pay a sufficient interest on the capital invested in their purchase? Will they pay expenses? Shall we be able yearly to put by a certain sum for depreciation? That is one thing which I do not believe the Government will ever be able to do. I believe on the contrary, that the deficit shall be of $100,000,000 for several years to come, particularly with the administration of these railways in the hands of such a Government as we have at present.

Wherefore, this amount of one billion dollars, should be counted with those which the Minister of Finance brought down this year and should be counted in the net debt of the country; and instead of being $2,273,000,000, it would be at least three billion dollars. It would only be fair to have the people of Canada know this. What do we see in the Estimates? The Minister of Finance asks us for $140,000,000 to meet the interest on our debt. If we only owed two billions and something, we should not require $140,000,000 to pay the interest on our debt; therefore, we owe more than that, and that is admitted by every one. Why hide the fact, when it exists? Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker that the people are greatly interested in knowing what we owe, and the Government should show things as they are. The people would be quite satisfied.

The hon. the Minister of Finance made comparisons. He told us the country was most properous, and the amount of business done last year was, according to him, an unprecedented success. He quoted the years 1910 and 1920. This success is easily explained, Mr. Speaker. Wheat sells $3 a bushel and more this year. The price of oats, rye, corn, barley, hay, every thing we sell in this country, has similarly increased, and in the same way, for every thing we buy we have to pay three, four and five times more than in 1910.

If I remember well, the Minister of Finance says in his statement of accounts that we sold in 1910, $665,000,000 worth, of agricultural products. If we sell, in 1920, $1,900,000,000 of such, I say that we have no more to sell than we had in 1910; one thing has changed, the loaves have decreased in weight since then; instead of weighing 6 lbs. they now weigh 3 lbs., and we pay more for these than we did for the 6 lbs. loaves. If takes now ten times more money than before to buy a bag of potatoes. Ten year ago we sold potatoes on the Montreal market for 50 cts. and 60 cts. a bag; now the man who wants a bag of potatoes for seed has to pay $7.50. So that if people want to consume as many potatoes as they used to, it will cost $98 to buy 14 bags of potatoes, which would at that time have cost $7.

I was speaking this afternoon with one of my colleagues from the West. He told me that in 1913 and 1914, in certain western provinces, wheat sold for 60 or 70 cts. a bushel, and sells now for $3 and $3.25. It is not surprising that our business should show higher figures in the Finance Minister's speech of the 18th instant. Now, we are always told of the balance of commerce. Are you to claim that munitions of war and all that was necessary for the carrying on of the war, were a regularly established trade of this country?

This is not the trade this country wants for future generations.

I hope we shall have no more such wars, and that we shall not be looking to the manufacture of war munitions for successfull business.

The Finance Minister told us also that his Budget will turn out $388,000,000 in the course of the current year. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker; on the contrary I am glad for him, but I would like very much to see a decrease in expenditures. If every year, the Minister of Finance, whoever he be, comes and asks us for $70,000,000 more taxes, and if it is only for the coterie, for the ministerial family, I object. I say the ministerial family because I find things going on in Ottawa which make me gasp. The Government for the last four years has been taxing the people at every turn, even compelling them to affix stamps on all articles of commerce, cheques, notes, contracts. I fear that our poor people will long remain in that state of misery. I was not a little scandalized last week; as I was going to leave this building, I saw four or five ministers, in company with some twenty members, who were waiting for automobiles to go and have a ride in town. There is no doubt but Johnny Canuck will have to pay for that.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Oh, yes, indeed.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): I object to that, especially in these hard times. Nowadays the ministers indulge in endless journeys.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): They are great travellers.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): They are travellers. Some of them are always sick so as to travel about. I sincerely wish they would return to health so they would return to us and stay.

Now, let us see what took place at the Peace Conference, at Versailles. We had there four ministers and many other people, and all their expenses were paid by the country. Now, we are asked to send a messenger to Washington, at the expense of our poor people.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): A messenger?

Mr. LANCTOT: A messenger to the English ambassador, nothing else. I hope they will not send a sick man; for a messenger must needs be in good health, so as to be able to face rain or shine.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): I think the president of the Council is robust enough to fill the position.

The people are not aware of these things. If they were acquainted with what is going on in Ottawa, I often ask myself if they would go to the polls at the beck of a Government who, after making so many promises to our soldiers, to our veterans of the Great War, refuse to pay small pensions to them or their widows and orphans, while the Government's favorites, the privileged ones, receive large pensions. For the soldiers who made war for the Empire, no pensions. Perhaps before the end of the session we shall hear of our judges not being paid enough. A pension will be offered them. While on this subject I wish to say this: I want our judges to be well paid. I have no objection to see a judge being generously paid while he works; but I certainly object to seeing a judge receive more after he is superannuated than he did when he was on the bench.

Mr. CANNON: There are no such cases.

Mr. LANCTOT: We know of such cases. One such beneficiary died not a very long while ago. Give the judges salaries that will allow them to live; but if they want annuities let them buy them, let them pay for them.

You hear of manufacturers, magnates and lawyers. They seem to be favoured ones. There are two classes of favoured ones, lawyers and manufacturers.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Shame!

M. MACKIE (Translation): What class do you belong to?

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): To the farmer class.

Mr. MACKIE (Translation): That of the opportunists.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): I don't think so.

Now, Sir, the Government want money from right and left and it will be the same with them next year. Millions are wanted for the militia. There are $12,000,000 for it in the Estimates this year; but if they were to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), $50,000,000 would be the figure required. Happily I have no idea that the hon. member's suggestion will be accepted by the House. However there is a scheme on foot which seems to be making its way. I don't know that it will reach realization this year. At any rate, it is said that the Mother Country is to make us a gift; it seems that it wants to present us with war ships.

So far as I am concerned I must say to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries that I am a man of peace who wants peace; we have had enough warfare and I, for one, do not want the Government to accept the gift of a navy. Let me make a comparison. Take for instance a labourer in St. Constant where I reside. There are large brickyards in the neighbourhood, at Delson. Well supposing the Government or anybody else goes to one of my constituents working in one of these yards and said to him: "I am going to give you a Ford, or a Dodge or any other motor car". That man never drove an automobile before; he would require a chauffeur and he would have to buy gasoline. Do you think he would be in a better position than he is now? Not at all. The Government say: "We shall not buy the ships". Very well, because we have not the means to buy them; but if they are given to us, we shall have to get coal and men to get up steam and that will cost a lot of money. We do not want it.

I am told that some of our ministers will not be satisfied with the militia and a navy, and that we shall soon have an air force of about 150 aeroplanes. We do not want any such thing for our people to break their neck with and I protest against it.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): These are airy notions.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): Yes, airy indeed, as would say the hon. member for Quebec-East.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding, I wish to say a few words about war, although being a man of peace, I must revert to war. Quite recently I found in my room, the report of the special committee of the House on the Soldiers Civil Re-establishment of last year, and here is what I noticed in it: A government official was asked to make up a statement in order to know how much it would cost to meet the request of the soldiers, namely those who had fought in France, those who remained in England and the others who had served in Canada. The report says that the total number of men registered in our army was 590,000; 418,000 went overseas and 50,000 remained in England; therefore 368,000 men went over to France and the remaining 172,000 stayed at home, and if you add the 50,000 who remained in England you will see that 222,000 men never went to the front and never smelled powder.

It is on account of that foolish and ruinous policy of the Government that we have to pay the present taxes, and such policy was not worked out in the interest of the people of this country but with a view to winning the election of 1917. Mr. Speaker, in order to win the election in 1917, to get the present government into power, they have spent 500 or 600 millions of the people's money—

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): It is not worth it.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation):— for we did not require conscription in 1916 and 1917, considering the number of soldiers we had in the country and also the fact that nobody in Europe ever expected that the government should send 500,000 or 600,000, men. It was a means of carrying the elections, and of aiming a blow at the province of Quebec, by shouting: The French Canadians will not enlist. We are going to poison the press and we are sure of beating Laurier and his Quebec supporters."

I notice, since a few months, that the feeling as regards Ontario is not what it was in 1917.

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): The people open their eyes.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): Why have we a third party to-day in this House? It is a result of conscription. The people of Ontario and of the English speaking provinces had been promised through their candidates that conscription was not directed against them but against Quebec. However, the Government took every body in and that displeased Ontario. A delegation came here, but the door was closed and they were told that they could not come in. That is how the farmers party was created.

A Toronto newspaper said that I was a party man.

I really have been one of them, I do believe; but if, however, in the future, the political party I have been a member of for a life-time should ever attempt to play the same pranks as are doing the party opposite in this House—

Mr. McMASTER (Translation): Impossible.

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation):—I would part from it, so much said, Mr. Speaker, it being late, for you as well as for myself, I do not wish to detain the House any longer; I am through with what I intended to say, taxation excepted, which I have not yet touched upon. Whoever breaks the glasses, must pay the cost; there is no geting out of it. But there is one matter I was forgetting to refer to, Mr. Speaker; we find the big wigs of this country are those who pay the least to the exchequer. I have noticed this evening in reading the newspapers, that the poorer classes would be affected by the new taxation, while the big fellows would get away much more easily. You can never get hold of a big wig; he always manages to pull through. When you lay taxes upon the manufacturer, the wholesale dealer, upon any retail merchant, he simply raises his prices in proportion and Baptiste pays the piper.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): What about the hay dealers?

Mr. LANCTOT (Translation): Well, the hay dealer—and I am one of them—has always to count on Providence, fair weather and showers, to ensure the growth of hay. The manufacturer, on the other hand, can do his business under cover; he is not dependent on Providence, all he needs is men and hands, while, we the farmers, we have to count on Providence; and there you have the main difference; we are the people dependent upon Providence, and for that fact we are rewarded.

Now, I have read in the Press that Germany will have to pay a total amount of thirty billions, 55 per cent to go to France, 25 per cent to Great Britain, and the other 20 per cent to Italy, Belgium and Italy, Canada is entirely out of it. I would have been inclined to think that the President of the Privy Council would have considered that point, as well as our plenipotentaries who spent months and months in Paris. They have not attended to it, for there is nothing coming to us. If the bill should ever be settled, John Bull's appetite will enable him, no doubt, to gobble up whatever is in sight and we shall never have a cent. For my part, I don't count on anything from that source.

In the course of the Budget debate, I heard many opinions so far expressed. I regret the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not in his seat, for I had a personal remark that might have interested him. Yesterday, the hon. Minister of the Interior wanted to know where we, the Liberals, stood on the tariff question.

On Tuesday, March 30, 1920, the hon. Minister of Marine, speaking in this House about shipbuilding, stated that everything was going as satisfactorily as could be expected and that Canada could build ships as cheaply as in Europe, as cheaply as in any other country in the whole world, I was rather astonished to hear such a statement from so good a protectionist as he is.

If merchantmen can be constructed in Canada as advantageously as they could be built in England or as in any other country in the world, why could not Canadian manufacturers and shipbuilders build them and sell them to the Canadian people or abroad under a 10 or 12½ per cent protective tariff, without telling us: "You must give us from 20 to 25 per cent, or, if not, we cannot go on and we shall close our doors."

Since I have been a member of this House, I have listened to so many such statements, often I am bored and I would like to see, just for once, the mass of the people, after being thoroughly skinned by the manufacturers of this and other countries, have at last their turn, as stated in 1896 by the hon. Mr. Tarte—I know that the hon. Minister of Justice can recall the statements then made by the hon. Mr. Tarte and the hon. Minister of Marine may probably remember them—he had then become a free trader, he did not remain such very long, he was just so during the electoral campaign. To my mind, a man should be in earnest and consistent. That is why I state, Mr. Speaker, that the minister of Marine has afforded me an opportunity for making a statement. I frankly declare that, had the Minister of the Interior been here to-night, I would not have had the least hesitation in telling him that I am in favour of a revenue tariff as low as possible, with a generous free list and a tariff not higher than 15 per cent all round. As a revenue tariff, that is what I should wish to have.

Now, why do you exempt the big wigs from the effects of the war tax for a period of from ten to fifteen years, according to cases, such people that have realized millions during the war? One of my good friends in this House gave me the case of one of his constituents who made at least $500,000 or $600,000 in profits on war munitions and who invested those $500,000 in Victory Bonds.

That gentleman has no more cause to be uneasy, he may spend the rest of his life riding automobiles, and he shall never have a cent to pay to the country; but the poor farmer who has laboured sixteen hours a day to supply food to the people of this country, as well as to the Allies, during the war, if he happens to have a $2,000 income, is obliged to pay a tax. Had I any say in the Government of this country, I know what I would do with these gentlemen who have grown rich during the war. I have already stated it in this House and it can be found in Hansard, when these same parties were demanding the conscription of our boys: "You want to have conscription, but you shall pay for it; it is to your liking, pay for it; we do not need conscription, but if you want to have it, you shall pay $3 a day to the soldiers and $100 a month to these soldiers' wives so that they may live decently; we are discussing now Bill No. 75 and to-morrow it will be Bill No. 76, I shall draw a Bill in two lines, and say: every millionaire in this country shall pay 90 per cent on every million spent for the war". Mr. Speaker, I would have had a surplus of money; I would have had enough to pay the country's debt after the war. Do you think a single one of them would have accepted such a proposition? Not one. Now that the war is over, after they have sent our sons to the war against their own free will, I would still be in favour of taking from these people the 90 per cent. That is what I wished to state, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you.

Mr. Speaker, before I close my remarks, I desire to say a few words in English, so that my hon. friends in this House who are not conversant with the French language will understand my position on the tariff question. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) is not here to-night. If he were, I would tell him that I stand for a reduced tariff, and I should like to see many articles free. That is the stand I have taken all my life, and I am still of the same opinion. It is true that during my career in politics we did not always have such a low tariff, but I think the time has arrived when the tariff could be reduced to the advantage of the people.

Mr. J. E. PREVOST (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the Budget Speech of this session of 1920 should have been made by the Finance Minister of a new Government created by the popular will on an economic platform, duly submitted to the Canadian people, for the purpose of purifying our finances and developing our country after the war. But such is not the case and the Government we have opposite is ever the same Government that juggled away the 1917 elections, through their ignominous Election Act and their cry of "Win the War."

Well, now the war is over, it has been won, and the Win-the-war Government still clings to power instead of going before the electorate to give an account of its war policy and obtaining from them a new mandate for a policy of peace and of national reconstruction.

The Union Government shuns the day of its rendering of accounts. The Minister of Finance has indeed produced his balance-sheet, but only in this House, where he is assured of a majority, the Government dare not go before the people and submit to it the deeds, or rather the misdeeds, of their administration, for they are well aware of the people's answer. The Government shun their responsibilities; it is one of the features of their character, or to state it in a better form, it is a sure indication of their lack of character.

Since 1914, the Government have appointed more than 100 commissioners to do what they should have performed themselves, and yet we had 26 different ministers, a figure that had never been reached previously; in spite of all that commissions have followed upon commissions, subcommissions upon subcommissions, without as a rule reaching any solution at all. Every time the Government entrusted any question to a special commission, the said question was sure of a first-class funeral. God knows how many serious questions the Unionist Government have thus solemnly buried! The Government shun their responsibilities. They have proved it by ever shifting to some other party the trouble of looking up matters they should have settled themselves, thereby leaving without any remedy all the evils which the Canadian people were then, and are still suffering.

I shall not undertake to enumerate the numberless commissions created by the Government since 1914 in order to shirk their responsibilities. The most important is, beyond a doubt, the Board of Commerce which should have assisted in the lowering of the cost of living. Well, since this Board has been appointed, the cost of living has daily increased. The cold storage plants—it has been stated many a time—are crammed with foodstuffs; the profits of numerous profiteers are scandalous, the profits of certain tradesmen are exorbitant, and the people at large find their living conditions more and more difficult.

That state of affairs has been in existence several years without the Government lifting a straw; they have established a Board of Commerce; what more do you want them to do? Since 1914, the cost of living for a family has increased from $7 to $15 a week. And the Government is enjoying the sweets of office, while complacently casting its paternal eye over those who are responsible for the increased prices of commodities.

Meanwhile, the big corporations accumulate tremendous profits. I do not intend to bore this House with statistics, but I have right here the proof that a large number of concerns have seen their profits increase two-fold, three-fold or a hundred-fold since 1914, while the consumers pay higher prices than ever for their products. From the Steel Company of Canada down to the Dominion Foundries, and including the Dominion Steel, the Canada Steamship Lines, Limited, the Canada Cement, the Riordon Pulp and Paper Company, the Dominion Canners, Penman's Limited, the Ogilvie Milling Company, the Dominion Bridge Company, the Dominion Textile Company, the Ames-Holden Company, the Stanfield Limited, the Lake of the Woods Milling Company and a great many others, as also the Smart, Woods Company, the Maple Leaf Milling Company, the Belding Paul Corticelli, Limited, etc., etc., all those big corporations make profits of more than 50 to 100 per cent and pay to their shareholders higher dividends than in pre-war times.

A parliamentary inquiry concerning the high cost of living held last year brought to light some shocking facts. The représentatives of certain concerns admitted that they were realizing profits varying from 70 to 100 per cent, and then adding boldly, in the very face of Parliament, that such companies were proud of the fact and would continue to take advantage of the consumer. But this Government, whose prime duty it is to protect the interests of the people, did not interfere. Those big corporations keep on piling up tremendous profits.

By the fact that they established a Board of Commerce, this Government is under the impression of having discharged its full duty. But what is that commission doing? We are absolutely in the dark on this subject; however, we all know that the high cost of living is going up all the time.

[Mr. Prevost.]

The Board of Commerce is supposed to hold inquests in order to ascertain what prices are charged, to fix reasonable prices and to deal rigorously with the profiteers, if need be. As a matter of fact does it do so? The Commissioners so state, but it is utterly impossible for us to secure the proof. I read in the "Labour Gazette" of January 1920, that the Board of Commerce has given to the press during last December, several statements concerning its policy.

The first one of those statements was published in Winnipeg, the 9th of December last; it is a kind of review of the work performed by the Board since last August. Two other statements that were issued in Toronto, on the 27th of December last, have reference to the combines and the tariffs respectively.

In one of those statements we read the following words:

> There has been established at Ottawa under the direction of the Board certain investigation machinery by means of which the Board keeps itself continuously acquainted with the manufacturing and production costs of the commodities over which the Board exercises jurisdiction. By this means the Board may at any time inform itself without delay whether in any particular case there has or has not been excessive charging. . . . Supplementing the Board's inquiries there have been a few— a very few—reports or charges made by private individuals. All reports or charges made have been carefully followed up. In some cases the allegations made have not been established. In other cases the matters have been referred for criminal proceedings. In other cases restitution has been required and made to obviate further action on the part of the Board.

I would like to know when the Board did interpose itself between the public and the profiteers in the manner indicated in its report?

At this very session, I asked the Government the following questions:

> 1. Has the Board of Commerce taken charge of the accusations which were the object of criminal suits?
> 2. If so, what are those accusations, and what has happened to such suits?
> 3. Has the Board of Commerce taken charge of cases in which excess profits had to be given back?
> 4. If so, what are these cases, and has restitution been made?

Those questions were the aftermath of the report of which I have read some extracts a few moments ago. The 7th of April last, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) gave the following answer to those questions:

> The Government has no record in this matter.

And it is the way this Parliament and the country are informed about the activities of that famous Board of Commerce.

In every other country of the world, as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the Government has taken stern steps against the profiteers. In the United States, in Great Britain, as well as in France, the Government has seen to it to protect the people against those vampires, which have been compelled to pay big fines; even some of those scoundrels have been sent to prison. However, here in Canada, one is at a loss to give one single instance where the Government or the Board of Commerce ever interfered in order to protect the interests of the Canadian consumer.

The Government are always trying to dodge responsibility. They have increased public expenditure to a tremendous extent, apart altogether from the cost of the war. At the very moment when they are preaching thrift, and practising extravagance, they are trying to throw the responsibility for their wastefulness on a new commission, as I intend to show later.

The Union Government is heir to the Borden administration. The public accounts show that between 1911 and 1919, ordinary expenditure was greater by $529,483,377 than during the last eight years of the Liberal regime. In the Department of Fisheries expenditure increased by 20 per cent; in the Department of Mines, 166 per cent; in the Department of Immigration, which would be more suitably styled the Department of Emigration for the last few years, expenditure increased 54 per cent; in the Department of Public Works, 100 per cent; in the Dominion Lands Branch, 372 per cent; Department of Inland Revenue, 60 per cent; in the Department of the Postmaster General, 162 per cent, and in the Department of Trade and Commerce, "last but not least," expenditure increased 1,534 per 100. Confronted with all this extravagance the Government is trying to avoid responsibility by appointing a purchasing board which will interfere with the absolute control of public expenditure which, under the constitution, this Parliament should have.

The Government are striving to dodge responsibility again in the matter of the tariff. For the last two years, pulled this way and that, bewildered, they have promised to appoint a board—still they come—to study tariff requirements; however they are in no hurry to appoint this last board; they keep putting it off.

The Government's policy is to favour one class at the expense of the rest of the people. Everything they do reveals this vicious principle. Study the tariff, Mr. Speaker; ascertain where the Government gets its revenue and you will find it is always the masses who pay.

The two essential sources of state revenues are: first, the customs duties which, in the long run, are paid by the consuming public; second, the taxes on income and business profits which affect the wealthy class of the population. In the United Kingdom the taxes on income and real estate account for 80 per cent of the exchequer receipts; customs duties account for a mere 20 per cent of the public revenue. In the United States income and property taxes bring in 69 per cent of the treasury receipts, while the tariff is responsible for only 31 per cent. In Canada we find that the State draws 94 per cent of its revenue from the tariff and only 6 per cent from income taxation. So we see that the burden is not fairly distributed. In other countries the rich pay more than the poor, while in Canada the poor bear a heavier burden than the rich, since 94 per cent of the treasury funds are drawn from the masses of the people through indirect levies which increase the cost of living.

So the Liberals have good reason to demand, through the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), substantial reductions in the tariff destined to lighten the burden of the high cost of living which bear so heavily on the masses of our people. No matter what may be said, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party is consistent. That party has always denounced extreme protection, though mindful of the needs of every class of the community. In 1893, as in 1919, the Liberals took their stand in favour of sane tariff legislation. From 1896 to 1911 they adhered to this policy; they brought about a general tariff reduction of nearly 20 per cent, and introduced a British preference of 33 per cent; moreover they wanted reciprocity in agricultural products between Canada and the United States. In his 1917 manifesto to the Canadian people Sir Wilfrid Laurier used the following words:

> No measure to reduce the cost of living can be effective unless and until the tariff is reformed and its pressure removed from those commodities in which there are "excessive profits," "hoardings" and "combinations for the increase of prices. . .
> . . . I would propose if entrusted with the administration of the country to immediately relieve agriculture from its disabilities in this regard.

In further mitigation of disadvantages to agricultural production, I would immediately remove the duties on agricultural implements and other essentials as demanded by the western farmers. A general well-considered reform of the tariff for the purpose of helping Canadian production and relieving the Canadian consumer would also be an object of my administration.

The amendment moved by the hon. member from (Shelburne and Queens) is entirely at one with the policy here set forth by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

True, the Government, through the Minister of the Interior, the minister with the ascetic mien, the subtle, cunning mind, boasts to-day of being partial to a downward revision of the tariff. How times have changed, Mr. Speaker! In very truth, if the Government really do take this position to-day, it thus renders unwilling homage to the Liberal policy and justifies our opposition to immoderate protection.

It is still a far cry, however, from the intentions of the present Government to the reforms demanded by the welfare of our people. Canada still has the highest tariff wall of any country in the world. Why should this be so, since our industries are more prosperous than ever?

Taking the figures quoted by the hon. Minister of Finance in his Budget speech, I find that our manufacturing industries which, in 1881, represented an invested capital of 165 millions, have increased, in round figures, as follows:

In 1891 this invested capital had grown to $300,000,000; in 1901, it had reached $400,000,000; in 1906, $800,000,000; in 1911, $1,200,000,000; in 1915, $1,900,000,000, and in 1917, $2,786,000,000. In the same way our manufactured products which represented, in 1881, a value of $300,000,000 were valued at $400,000,000 in 1891; $700,000,000 in 1906; $1,165,000,000 in 1911; $1,400,000,000 in 1915 and $3,000,000,000 in 1917.

Is it not time that some measure of protection were afforded the consumer, Mr. Speaker? Our protective tariff might well be lowered without working any harm to our industries some of which are far too highly protected.

We should awaken to the fact that Canada has an average customs duty of $18.45 for every man, woman and child in the Dominion, while the United States, that model protectionist country which we are constantly being urged to follow, has a per capita customs duty of only $2.11. Hence the necessaries of life are sold much cheaper on the other side of the line; shoes, for instance, cost 30 per cent less than in this country.

What the Liberals want—and what Sir Wilfrid Laurier fought for and worked for during the fifteen years of his administration—is a policy that protects everybody; the manufacturer, the businessman and the consumer.

However, before all else, before revising the tariff, before devising new taxes to increase the cost of living, before spending $20,000,000 for a merchant marine, before establishing a navy (which is just beginning to show above the imperialist horizon) the Union Government is in duty bound to go before the people and receive their verdict, favourable or unfavourable, whichever it may be. Why has the Government failed to do this? Why do its supporters who know in their hearts that their war mandate has expired, why do these supporters, I say, persist in giving to the present Government the majority which keeps it in power? It is because they are all aware that the day when a general election is held in Canada will witness the end of their political career. The lust of power and the sweets of office hold them together.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. PREVOST: In one of his most amusing pages which at the same time is most pregnant with philosophy and creative imagination, Rabelais describes Master Gaster, the personification of the stomach and of those appetites which to many are the very centre of the universe.

"I assure you," he says, "that when Master Gaster gives a command the heavens tremble, the earth quakes. His command is uttered; it must be obeyed without delay, else death will ensue."

And Rabelais parades before us all Creation: men, animals of every description, the willing slaves of Master Gaster, eager to serve him. And the prodigious nomenclature of all these beings in bondage under the sway of the lower appetites, is interrupted, at regular intervals, by the words, ever recurrent, like a sort of refrain: "and all for the stomach."

You readily discern, Mr. Speaker, my reason for recalling this page of Rabelais'. The Gaster of our political life is the Union Government which holds out to its supporters the alluring promises of power and honour with, to boot, the gratification of their gluttonous appetites. The Ministry's partisans bow to the sceptre of this modern Gaster so as to remain in close proximity to the Pork Barrel; "and all for the stomach," say we with Rabelais.

Before our very eyes the Tory-Conservatives with their former opponents; lay aside their hoary grudges and conclude an alliance with the antagonists they have always hated and always fought, they wanted to get into power, and to-day they are striving to remain there. They are under the thumb of Master Gaster who loosens the reins on their appetites: "and all for the stomach."

We behold former Nationalists who only yesterday were widely denouncing all they worship to-day, take their place at the manger and bury their heads in the feast: "and all for the stomach."

We see Liberals, unfaithful to their pledge trampling on their principles, forgetting the past, deaf to the voice of conscience—"a famished stomach cannot hear"—enter a morganatic alliance with the Tories and bow to the rule of Master Gaster, viz., of their selfish appetites: "and all for the stomach."

And you see wealthy capitalists, trust magnates, profiteers of every description, kowtow to the Union Government to Master Gaster: "and all for the stomach."

Aye, "all for the stomach;" the Union Government exists for nothing else.

The present Government has become so discredited in the eyes of the people of this country that we are all at a loss to understand how it has managed to hold onto office thus far. Those who support it and help to keep it in power, in spite of the will of our people, harken only to the lust of power and to their appetites that crave satisfaction.

"All for the stomach." There in four words, you have the definition of the present Union Government. In those words, so full of Rabelaisian flavour, you have the origin and the end of this Government; Master Gaster surrounded by the Unionists, insatiable Gargantuas.

The stomach has its tragedy. "There is a heroism of the stomach, said Victor Hugo; and the Unionists believe they are heroes because they make their conscience and their principles subservient to their appetites.

Union Government is merely the representative of certain factions; hence it fears the judgment of the nation as a whole. The Government represents Imperialism more than Canadianism, the manufacturer rather than the consumer, the profiteer in preference to the victimized masses of the people. That is not what their country is asking for. In the words of Gambetta: "Ideas create parties; interests create factions."

The explanation of the dignity and smooth running regularity of the constitutional regime in England for generations is undoubtedly to be found in the fact that the popular representatives were divided into two great Parties, the Whigs and the Tories, each in turn being raised to power by the movements of public opinion under the moderating influence of the Crown. On the other hand if parliamentary government has often hung by only a hair's breadth in Spain and Italy the reason is to be found in this mania for change which split up the great historical parties into insignificant personal cliques thus paving the way for anarchy.

We must chose one or the other of these two systems. The Liberals prefer the method of government by powerful parties, parties not only in name, but founded on clearly set forth opinion and a well-defined policy, and whose members willingly submit to the iron hand of discipline which is essential to true freedom. The tenets of the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, are far above all those factions whose policies are guided solely by their own private interests.

The Unionist group is something in the nature of a "crazy quilt"—I crave your indulgence for the expression, Mr. Speaker; it has none of the characteristics of a great political party. The Union Government is well aware of its own weakness and with good cause from the judgment of the people whom it has deceived and whom it is now trying to avoid.

The illustrious tutor of one the Dukes of Burgundy was wont to admonish his pupil in these words: "Remember, my child that a King is made for his people, not the people for their King."

Those responsible for the present maladministration of our suffering Canada's affairs have forgotten that governments are made for the people and not the people for governments. Perhaps these Unionist gentlemen believe that this principle was destroyed in the awful upheaval of which the world has not, even yet, seen the end. Let me tell them they are wrong. Like many other ephemeral leaders they are due to learn that the multitude knows its rights as well as its duties and that, in this new day the knell of absolutism in the conduct of affairs of state, has sounded.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lemieux the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Rt. Hon. Mr. Doherty the House adjourned at 12 05 a.m. (Thursday).

The House met at Three o'clock.

MEMORIAL TO THE LATE COLONEL G. H. BAKER, M.P.

Hon. Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to act with a like committee of the Senate in determining the form of a memorial to be erected in the Parliament Buildings to the late Colonel Baker, as follows:

The Special Committee appointed to confer and act with a like Committee of the Senate in determining the form of the memorial to be erected in the Parliament Buildings to the late Lieut-Colonel Baker, MP., beg leave to present the following as their first report:

At the request of the committees, made during the last session of Parliament, Major R. Tait MacKenzie, a noted Canadian artist and sculptor, prepared two alternative sketches of the proposed memorial, and at a recent meeting of the committees in joint session, the sketches were submitted and explained by Major Tait MacKenzie. Mr. John Pearson, architect of the Parliament Buildings, was present, and his views were also considered as to the merits of the suggested designs.

After several meetings and careful consideration, your committee beg to recommend that the site for the proposed memorial selected by your committee during the last session of Parliament and approved by both Houses be adhered to.

That the memorial be a figure in stone, about six feet six inches in height, in high relief, carved to a likeness of the late Lieut.-Colonel Baker in military uniform, and set in a shallow niche on a pedestal four feet in height; the figure itself and the background to be made out of a solid block of limestone, which would replace the part of the wall in the site chosen by your committee last session.

It is submitted that a figure in stone, in preference to a bronze figure, would fit in more harmoniously with the architecture of the building, and forming part of the building, would be a more fitting tribute to one who so gallantly laid down his life for the Empire.

With regard to the inscription on the proposed memorial, your committee recommend that the following be inscribed on the front of the pedestal:

"Lieutenant-Colonel George Harold Baker, M.P., Fifth Canadian Mounted Rifles,
Killed in action, June second, 1916,
At the battle of 'Sanctuary Wood.'
Erected by order of the Parliament of Canada."

and that the selection of suitable inscriptions for the right and left sides of the figure be submitted in a subsequent report of your committee, and for this purpose your committee further recommend that they be given leave to sit again, and to report from time to time.

A clay model in miniature of the memorial is on view in room No. 534.

Your committee have been informed by Major MacKenzie and the architect that the estimated cost of the proposed memorial will be in the neighbourhood of $12,000, and your committee beg to recommend that such an amount be placed in the Supplementary Estimates at the present session to defray the cost of the said memorial.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Sir SAM HUGHES moved:

That in accordance with the recommendation contained in the report of the Special Committee appointed to confer and act with a like Committee of the Senate in determining the form of the memorial to be erected in the Parliament Buildings to the late Lieut.-Colonel George Harold Baker, M.P., the said committee be authorized to sit again, and to report from time to time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not aware that this motion is required, inasmuch as the committee has not made its final report; but there can be no harm in its being adopted if the House approves.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

S.S. "VOYAGEUR"—INSURANCE.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. Referring to page ZZ43 of the 4th volume of the Auditor General's Report, was the $65,515.59 paid to Johnston and Higgins, of New York, for insurance on the steamer "Voyageur"?
2. If so, what period did this insurance cover?
3. With what insurance companies was this insurance placed?
4. What rate was paid on the hull?
5. What was the amount of commission paid to Johnston and Higgins?
6. Were tenders asked for by public advertisement?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1. Yes.
2. January 20, 1919, to January 20, 1920.
3. A list of the companies with which the insurance was placed on the hull, etc., giving the rates charged and the amount placed with each company is attached.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. No commission was paid Johnson and Higgins by the department.
6. No.

List of Companies with which Insurance on the "Canadian Voyageur" was placed.

Hull, etc., January 20th, 1919, to January 20th, 1920.

VESSELS UNDER RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton):

1. How many boats are under control of the Railway Commission as regards rates, tolls, tariff agreements and arrangements?

Hon. J. D. REID: The above question was answered on a previous occasion by the minister in the House of Commons on May 17, 1920. See Hansard No. 53, page 2491.

BRITISH EMPIRE STEEL CORPORATION.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton):

1. What companies operating in Canada or in other countries do the promoters of the British Empire Steel Corporation intend to include within the proposed merger?

2. Where are said companies located?

3. When and where were said companies incorporated?

4. What is the present capitalization of each of the companies which it is proposed to absorb?

5. What is the basis on which each company enters the amalgamation?

6. What is the total capital of the British Empire Steel Corporation and the division of the share capital of that corporation?

Rt. Hon. Mr. SIFTON:

1. No information.
2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. Answered by No. 1.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MORNING AND SATURDAY SITTINGS.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Saturday, the 29th instant, until the end of the present session the House shall sit on Saturdays, and that the order of business on Saturday shall be the same as on Friday; and also, that on and after Tuesday, the 1st June next, until the end of the present session, the House shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each day except Sundays, and in addition to the usual intermission at six o'clock, p.m., there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock, p.m.

He said: We have now entered upon the fourth month of the session, and there is a good deal of business still on the Order Paper. Representations have been made to me from both sides of the House that we should sit longer hours and should sit on Saturdays. I hope that the House will be willing to accept the motion for these reasons. I have not yet had an opportunity of making to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King) the statement with regard to further business which I promised a day or two ago, but I am entirely in the hope that it will not be necessary for the Government to bring down any further measures of a controversial character.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lost.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every hon. member of the House appreciates the Prime Minister's motive in desiring to have the proceedings of this session brought to a conclusion as speedily as possible to permit hon. members to return to their homes and give some attention to their private business. I feel it a public duty however, to point out that, with the Government's programme what it is, and the progress we have thus far made being what it is, it would appear to be very much against the public interest that we on this side should, at this stage of the proceedings of the House, acquiesce in the resolution which my right hon. friend has moved.

We are here for the purpose of giving attention to the public business of Canada. A certain amount of the country's business has been brought before us; but we have on the Order Paper notice of other legislation that is to be introduced, of which we have no particulars at the present time, and we have still before us for completion the main work of the session. May I point out that it is no fault of hon. gentlemen on this side, nor, indeed is it the fault of any hon. member of the House that we have reached this season of the year with so little accomplished in the transaction of the principal business of this session. If little has been accomplished thus far, it is certainly the fault of the Government, first of all in having called the session so late in the year, and secondly, in being so tardy in bringing down much of their important legislation.

May I point out what seems to me to be the effect of the motion of my right hon. friend? Only nine days ago, on May 18, the Budget was introduced, and it is recognized throughout the Dominion that it is one of the most important Budgets this Parliament has ever been called upon to consider. It is suggested that we shall sit morning, afternoon and night, six days in the week, Saturday being included. In addition to the Budget, we have still before us the Franchise Bill, which is another of the most important pieces of legislation ever introduced into this House. We have considered in committee a large part of the Franchise Bill, but the most contentious clauses still remain. Then there are the Estimates of the different departments of the Government, and thus far Parliament has had opportunity to consider little or nothing with respect to past public expenditures or appropriations for the ensuing year. I have made a summary of what has been passed thus far in the way of Estimates. On March 23, some Estimates in respect to shipbuilding were passed; on March 30, an item of the Estimates of the Railway Department; on April 15, the Civil Service bonus, (one-sixth of the amount); on April 23 and May 6, Estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries; on April 26, Soldiers' Land Settlement Estimates. That is practically all that this House has thus far considered of the Estimates. Yet, this Parliament is to be asked to expend for the public service in the ensuing year an amount running into many millions of dollars.

The Government's motion means this: that we are called on to deal with the most important matters before the country under conditions where each member will be obliged to give morning, afternoon and night to the proceedings of the House. In other words, it looks as though the Government had sought to bring about what I would call "one big drive," whereby to jam through the House legislation of vital importance to the country under conditions which make impossible proper attention, consideration, or criticism. It is physically impossible for members to sit here morning, afternoon and night, six days in the week, and give to legislation of this importance the attention it ought to receive.

Let me direct the attention of the House to the Bills that you, Mr. Speaker, have called within the last few minutes. On the Order Paper, under the heading "Introduction of Bills," there is the following list of Bills still to be introduced by the Government:

An Act to amend The Insurance Act, 1917.
An Act to amend the Criminal Code.
An Act to amend the Penitentiary Act.
An Act to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act.
An Act to amend the Irrigation Act.
An Act to amend the Admiralty Act.
An Act to amend The Naturalization Act, 1919.
An Act to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.
An Act to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act (Nova Scotia).

Either these are meaningless bits of legislation, or they are very important measures. If they are important measures, members of this House should have opportunity of studying them before they are called upon to register their votes for or against their several clauses. There will be no opportunity for any hon. member to get into communication with his constituents or other parties who are interested in the legislation; or to realize what public opinion as reflected in the press may be as regards these measures if they are pressed under such conditions.

We have yet to deal with practically all of the Estimates; we have the consideration of all the resolutions mentioned in the Budget; we have the contentious clauses of the Franchise Bill. My right hon. friend has just assured us that there will be nothing further of a controversial nature, which is a fortunate thing, but I shall be very much surprised if we do not have to consider further Supplementary Estimates or something other of a nature which should receive careful attention. In the public interest, therefore, it is desirable that at this stage we should ask ourselves just what is expected of members of Parliament who are sent here to transact the business of the country. I can well understand that every hon. member is feeling very keenly the sacrifice he is making in being absent from his home and not having an opportunity of attending to his private business. I can realize, particularly in the case of many members from the West where the seasonal nature of their callings requires their presence at this time of the year, that they would like to be at home attending to their work, and not be obliged to have someone else look after it or else leave it undone. These may be reasons for the Government considering what may be owing hon. members in the matter of indemnities to which they may be entitled under conditions as they now exist in the country, and as they have developed since the war. But I contend that the first duty of a member of Parliament is to give his time to public work, and that he should not seek to hurry through important legislation so that he can get back to his private business. I hope the Prime Minister will appreciate the force of these few remarks, which I make simply because I believe it is all-important in the public interest that the business of the House should not be rushed through with undue haste.

May I point out this to my hon. friends opposite? As the Prime Minister has mentioned, we have been in session for three months and are now entering upon the fourth month. The time of this Parliament has been taken up for the most part with amending legislation passed at previous sessions of this very Parliament, many of which amendments have been rendered necessary solely because of the undue haste with which this legislation had been rushed through at a previous session. I have a list of the legislation which has thus far been considered, and I will draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the extent to which the time of the House has been taken up, at the instance of the Government, with a lot of second rate measures—because that is all they amount to—to the exclusion of the important work of the session. We have had before is, for example, an Act respecting the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to amend a section regarding pensions which had already been amended in 1919. We have had the Franchise Bill, which is in reality a re-enactment of an old measure with additional amendments. There was an Act to amend the Currency Act, 1910, which Act had been amended at the first session of 1919 and has come in for further amendment at this session. There was an Act to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to patents of invention. This Act was amended in the first session of 1919, and again in the second session of 1919. There was an Act to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, another Act that had been passed previous to the session of 1919 and which was amended in 1919. This session still further amendments are brought in. Other measures are the following: An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, previously amended at several sessions, including the first and second sessions of 1919; an Act respecting Food and Drugs, also amended at both the first and second sessions of 1919; an Act respecting Commercial Feeding Stuffs, amended at the second session of 1919; an Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act, previously amended at the first and second sessions of 1919. An Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, previously amended at the first and second sessions of 1919; an Act to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, and the Civil Service Amendment Act, 1919; an Act to confirm the agreement between the Grand Trunk Railway and His Majesty, which the Government admitted was presented to Parliament to correct certain errors that had been made, and made on account of the undue haste with which the measure had been rushed through at the last session of Parliament; an Act to amend the Technical Education Act, which had been amended at the first session of 1919; an Act to amend the Industrial Disputes Act, 1907, which had been previously amended in 1918 and was further amended this year, much, I think, to the disadvantage of the legislation; an Act to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, amended in 1919; an Act to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, previously amended in 1918; an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, previously amended in the first and second sessions, 1919; an Act to amend the Oleomargarine Act passed in 1919; and finally an Act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act, previous amendments to which were made in 1918.

There is a long legislative programme, but what does it amount to? It is simply bringing back to this Parliament, to occupy the time of members of this House, a lot of legislation to be amended, some of the amendments being wholly secondary and unimportant. On the face of it, it is a confession that in previous years the Government's legislation was so ill-digested that within a year they have had to come back to Parliament for further amendments. I fear that the way we shall be rushing through legislation in the next few weeks, if we have morning, afternoon, and evening sittings, will mean that the time of another session, a year hence, will be taken up again with a lot of further amendments of this sort.

I might also direct the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that we have not yet obtained from the Government a statement of the Civil Service classification. We shall be called upon to vote appropriations for the Civil Service. In the Estimates presented to Parliament this year, the explanatory details of Civil Government usually printed are omitted. I hardly think the country will expect Parliament to pass the appropriation necessary for Civil Government until we get these essential details.

There are also several important reports that have not yet been brought down. There has been no report, as far as I can see, of the Public Printing and Stationery, the Militia Council, the Geological Survey, Mines Branch, the Penitentiaries Branch, Department of Justice, and the Archives Branch. Then we have no Parliamentary documents from the Department of Trade and Commerce relating to Steamship Subsidies, the Trade of Canada, Grain Commissioners, Criminal Statistics, Weights and Measures, Dominion Statistics.

We have not yet had the railway statistics brought down. It was only seven days ago that the Minister of Railways presented to this House the report of the Department of Railways and Canals, and it was only thirteen days ago that the fourth volume of the Auditor-General's report was presented to the House. Yet hon. members of this House are supposed to have mastered the details of these different reports. The reports are supposed to have been presented to the people's representatives in this House, and we are supposed to have examined the legislation that is before Parliament in the light of these different documents. Mr. Speaker, it makes Parliamentary government a farce when legislation is proceeded with in that fashion. That is not the procedure that ought to be adopted or followed by a deliberative assembly. As I said, it may be a satisfactory method of conducting warfare. It may be one way of effecting a great drive so that there will be great confusion when millions of dollars of the people's money are about to be voted, but it is not the method which should be adopted in a deliberative assembly having the responsibility which this Parliament is called upon to exercise. I hope under the circumstances that my right hon. friend will consider, first, the public interest, and secondly, the private wishes of individual members.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not in the Chamber when the Prime Minister made his statement regarding the resolution we are now discussing. I have listened with much interest to the speech of the leader of the Opposition—of the Opposition at that end of the Chamber. First, I would offer just one word of criticism of the Government in the most friendly way. I think they have been a little dilatory this session in bringing down the legislation which they had to present to Parliament. While absent through illness, I read the reports of the debates, and I feel that considerable time was lost in the first six or eight weeks of the session. Might I suggest that the Government in future get its legislation down before the House a little earlier in the session?

There is a good deal of force in the arguments advanced by the leader of the Opposition. We are here concerned with serious business. We have yet the greater part of the Estimates to consider and pass upon, and the expenditure of large sums of the public money at this time ought to be carefully scrutinized. Nevertheless, on the other hand, I feel that for the members from Western Canada and the Maritime Provinces there is a real hardship in sitting here a greater length of time than is absolutely necessary. Being a man of peace, and this little group around me being men of peace also, may I offer a suggestion to the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition? It is this, that we defer Saturday sittings until perhaps a week or two weeks, from next Saturday, and that instead of having mornings sittings we assemble at two o'clock in the afternoon from the beginning of next week, and continue to meet at that hour until the end of the session. I believe that in that way we could accomplish as much work as by morning sittings. The position of hon. members in regard to morning sittings is this: Some of the committees are still at work. All hon. members have correspondence to look after, they must study the legislation before the House, and have to attend to other matters that are coming up daily. With morning sittings we have no opportunity to attend to all this. With lunch at one o'clock, I see no reason why we could not assemble at two, sit till six, reassemble at eight and adjourn at the usual hour. I think that in that way we should make just as much progress as by having morning sittings. Being a humble individual I offer this suggestion to the Government and the leader of the Opposition for their consideration.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have on more than one occasion voiced my feelings and opinions in connection with the work of the House. Living three thousand miles away, I have come here for the purpose of transacting the public business, as we all have, as has been stated by the leader of the Opposition. It has been my desire to attend to that work regularly, and I believe that I am one of the members who attend the sittings of the House as assiduously as possible. My grievance is this: that by arrangement between the two whips in this House hon. gentlemen across the aisle leave here on Friday afternoon and return on Monday night, as do hon. members on this side of the House from the province of Ontario, and the quorum in this House from Friday until Monday is maintained by the members from the West, until these other gentlemen have attended to the pleasure of their families and their business at home.

As to the accusation of the leader of the Opposition, that this Government was attempting to make a drive in the last days of the session, I would remind him of the fact that last session he was very desirous of going home at an early stage of the game. So far as the measures on the Order Paper are concerned, they have been on the Order Paper for the last two months and it is the fault of hon. members themselves if they are not familiar with the proposed legislation. My hon. friend has touched upon indemnities. Let him rise in his seat now and say he is in favour of increased indemnities.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, well.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to remaining here twelve months if it is necessary, and I am paid for it, but under the present schedule of pay I am not willing to remain here while the members from Quebec and Ontario enjoy themselves at the opening of jockey club meets or at home, or attend to their office and business three days in the week while the members from the West are left here to transact the public business. Those gentlemen take temporary rooms in Ottawa, but we are required to sign leases for six months if we desire to have permanent quarters. Our friends opposite go home on Friday and save money by leaving the city, and in addition to this they enjoy the great advantage of spending considerable time with their families. We, on the other hand, are compelled to remain here continuously. We on this side are anxious to carry on the business of the country without interruption, but we have not the advantage of saving money, as hon. gentlemen from Ontario and Quebec who are objecting to this have by taking temporary rooms and going home at regular intervals. I think that the suggestions of the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) come with bad grace. We all regret, I am sure, his absence from the House recently through illness, but we have had to attend constantly to the business of the House; and if the hon. gentleman had devoted less time to the organizing of the Farmers' party in the East he would have been in a position to know more of the business of this session. There are no committees sitting that will embarrass the attendance of hon. gentlemen in the House. Within the last week no committees, except one, have been considering any business of the House, and yet I may point out the fact that the attendance on this side has been limited to three or four gentlemen, including the Minister of Finance—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the only truth in the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton):—while last night there were but barely twenty hon. members opposite. Is not the hypocrisy of this matter apparent? Hon. gentlemen are putting forward the plea that they are eager to attend to the business of the House, while as a matter of fact, at one sitting, there are only three members on this side and twenty members opposite, the Farmers' party being represented by one. Those hon. gentlemen who make professions of anxiety to attend scrupulously to the business of the House, should see to it, through the medium of their Whip, that they are in their seats while legislation is being put through, instead of attending to their own business at home. I want to go on with the business of the House so that I may be able to go home and attend to my own within a reasonable time.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the second occasion on which the hon. member has made the sweeping statement that all hon. gentlemen in this House coming from Quebec and Ontario go home on Friday and are absent on Monday. This general allegation on the part of my hon. friend opposite I do not want to go unchallenged. There are many hon. members from Quebec and Ontario who are present in this House on Fridays and on Mondays as well; and I desire to tell my hon. friend, further, that all, or practically all the members from Quebec on this side of the House remain in the House every day of the week, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays as well as the days on which he says they are absent. For the last two weeks we have sat in this House until twelve o'clock at night and sometimes one o'clock in the morning, and as the hon. gentleman has just truly remarked there have been occasions when there were only three or four hon. members present on the other side of the House. Sir, it is those gentlemen who remain here all the time, from three o'clock in the afternoon until twelve at night, that are entitled to some consideration in this matter. They give their full attention to the legislation that is brought before the House and study it with all the care it demands. They have to be here all the time, and it is unfair to ask those few—if there are only a few who so conscientiously attend to their parliamentary duties—to come back here at eleven o'clock in the morning after having spent a strenuous and trying day in this House until a late hour at night.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Is it not a fact that you have attended to your own private practice during the session,—something I have not done myself?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No Sir; it is not a fact. Let me tell my hon. friend that I have been here all the time; and I think I may fairly claim, Mr. Speaker, that I have been diligent in my attendance. I have endeavoured to give to the consideration of the public questions that come before this House that zealous study and attention which all legislation should receive.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am here promptly at three o'clock in the afternoon and I remain, not for a few moments and then go away; I stay, practically speaking, all the time. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that it is eminently unfair to ask me or any other hon. gentleman to come here at eleven o'clock in the morning after spending a hard day in the House. There is no one in this House who would be more pleased to see the session over than myself.

Mr. BUREAU: Except me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is all right for hon. gentlemen carelessly to say, "Let us go home;" but we have something else to do, Mr. Speaker. Our mandate demands something more than that we shall just come here and, when it suits our fancy, go home again irrespectively of what we may have done in the way of business. We must give to the legislation—to the Estimates and to all the business that comes before us—that consideration which the people expect us to give to our public duties. Business well considered is business well done; business rushed is business ill done; and it ill becomes hon. gentlemen who are seldom seen in their seats in this House to cheer their fellow members when they make the irresponsible suggestion that we should close up everything and go home.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): I depreciate very much the practice of washing dirty linen in public and I also think that on the whole the proposition of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), being in accordance, as it is, with precedent of many years' standing, is a very good one. Personally I think we had better adapt ourselves as best we can to the common sense of the situation and let common sense guide us. For my part, I support the Prime Minister in this matter.

Mr. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers and St. Maurice): I think we have strayed somewhat from the question under consideration, and my hon. friend from East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) in his desire to make an argument vented a little grievance which evidently he thinks he has. If the hon. gentleman had stated that when members from Quebec and Ontario went home on Fridays and stayed away from the House they hampered the progress of the business of the House, he would have made some point. But that is not his contention. He simply says that some members can go home and spend time with their families, while he has to remain in Ottawa. Now, Sir, as the hon. gentleman from Red Deer has said, this question is one of common sense, and the point to be settled is this: how much can human nature endure, and to what extent can men be taxed physically if they are to perform their duties thoroughly? If we are going to come here at eleven o'clock in the morning and sit until one, and then come back at three and sit until six, returning at eight and sitting indefinitely to all hours of the night, and sometimes until one or two in the morning—for the Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) in his zeal in putting through the Franchise Bill showed an unmistakable tendency to adopt late hours—then it will be utterly impossible for hon. gentlemen to give anything like serious consideration to the work that comes before them. There are still some very important matters to be dealt with, Sir. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) just now read the list of Bills which still appear on the Order Paper, and one of which is a Bill to amend the Insurance Act of 1917. The Minister of Finance, who is to promote that Bill, knows that it involves very important considerations; and from correspondence and despatches I have received in connection with the matter, I may state that every big industry, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, is interested in that Bill, which will affect their rates of insurance and will also affect their business to a large extent. Now, these people have a right to get their views put before Parliament, but we cannot help them. As my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has said, practically no Estimates have been brought down. The Budget is still under discussion, and we are told that the Government will require more money. Well, Mr. Speaker, the people are entitled to know what has been done with the money that has been already voted. When we voted one-sixth of the appropriations I registered my protest, because I thought the Estimates ought to have been brought down, and that, except as to salaries, it was unfair to ask any hon. member to commit himself to any appropriation without first having an opportunity to express his views thereon, for the discussion of these Estimates is the only way whereby we can get the information we require.

As my hon. leader has said, the latter part of the Auditor General's Report has been brought down only recently, and the report of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) has been on the Table only within the last six or seven days and contains very few details. Then, too, questions have remained on the Order Paper unanswered, or badly answered, and we have been unable to get further answers. When the Government do not want to answer a question, they just say: "Make it a motion for a return," and that question never sees the light of day again.

Although I am not as young as many hon. members, I have as much endurance as any of my hon. friends, and I say that I cannot rightly do my duty if I have to be here at eleven o'clock in the morning until midnight. We on this side of the House have to be in our places anyway, but conditions are different on the other side, and my hon. friend from East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) let the cat out of the bag. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is in the House his colleagues need not be in attendance; and the same remark applies if any other minister is in his seat; but we have got to be here, anyway. Another circumstance that makes conditions easier for them than for us is that they know in advance by reports prepared by departmental officials what business is to be taken up, so their brief is prepared before they come to the House, and all they have to do is to put their case forward, and their work is done; but our work only then begins. And how are we going to do our work satisfactorily if we have to begin at eleven o'clock in the morning and continue until probably two o'clock next morning? I say it is a physical impossibility.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we are all desirous of going home. I realize the hardship of my hon. friends from the West and I sympathize with them at being separated from their families for such a long time. But I dismiss the argument of the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie). We have to pay for our rooms the same as gentlemen from the West. I pay for my room by the week whether I am here or not, for I am not going to carry my rags home under my arm every Friday night.

Mr. MACKIE (Edmonton): I wish to correct a statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bureau). I said "some" hon. members from Quebec and "some" hon. members from Ontario gave up their rooms.

Mr. BUREAU: Some members from Quebec go home on Friday and spend less money than other hon. members who remain here. I may tell my hon. friend that it is not a question whether he spends more money than I do, or vice versa; it is a question whether common sense justifies the proposition to sit mornings and Saturdays. If we are humanly able to stand that pressure and discharge our duties satisfactorily, no objection can be urged; but I feel that I cannot endure the strain nor get through my work satisfactorily under such conditions.

It is just as great a hardship to me as to other hon. members not to be able to get back to my office, perhaps more so, because I have not the means that some others have to render me independent of my profession; but in spite of that I am ready to do my duty and to sit here until September, if necessary. And every hon. member ought to be ready to do the same. As my hon. friend said, we are just at the crucial sections of the Franchise Act where we are certain of a conflict of opinion. We are only human, and the strain of long hours is bound to tell on us. During the war we watched anxiously the morale of our troops; and if our electors watch our morale during two weeks of hot weather while we are sitting from eleven o'clock in the morning until the early hours of the following morning, I think they will notice a decline in it, and that those sections of the Franchise Act will be put through without proper discussion, simply because hon. members will be unable to give proper attention to them by reason of being physically unfit owing to attempting what is physically impossible. Besides, hon. members will not be fit otherwise, because they will not have sufficient time between two o'clock in the morning and eleven o'clock next morning to study the questions that are to engage their attention at the next sitting.

I do not think sitting on Saturdays will advance business at all. The suggestion to open the day's business at two o'clock I think is reasonable, and I for one am willing to accept that proposal, or we might even commence work at a quarter to two, but certainly not at eleven o'clock in the morning. For that reason I shall oppose the motion made by the Prime Minister.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the Prime Minister exercises his right of formally closing the debate hon. members will be precluded from further discussion of this motion. But as in such a case as this more or less latitude is usually allowed, I am sure the Prime Minister will have the unanimous consent of the House to speak without closing the debate.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, it has never been the practice in my experience of twenty-four years to press a motion of this kind when it is seriously opposed by the other side of the House. Therefore, I would not think of doing so now in view of what has been said by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

But my hon. friend made one or two observations which I think require a reply from me. If he is under the illusion that this Parliament sitting from the first day of January until the thirty-first day of December would pass legislation in such perfect form that it would never require any amendment, I fear that my hon. friend will be sadly disillusioned. I venture this statement also; that if he will look over the legislation of the past, under whatever Government it may be, he will find that the major portion consists in amendments of Acts already passed; and for this very good reason,—that almost every conceivable subject under the sun has been dealt with at some time or other, and further legislation, necessitated by new developments and new conditions, is ordinarily made by amendment to legislation already existing. I do not think therefore that the list of amendments which my hon. friend has placed before the House has any real significance so far as this particular question is concerned.

It is, of course, highly desirable that we should get on with the business of the House. When hon. gentlemen on the other side speak of hardship and difficulty, I am ready to give every consideration to what they say, but I would like to point out to them that if there be any hardship in beginning the session at eleven o'clock in the morning and continuing until perhaps midnight, the hardship is as severe upon members of the Government as it is upon hon. members.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg your pardon.

Mr. BUREAU: Some one said "Oh, no." I think he is right, too, because the ministers stay here by turns.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Well, my hon. friend had at one time some experience in a government, and if he will refresh his memory I think he will withdraw the statement he has just made.

Mr. BUREAU: That is my recollection.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to the statement by the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) that the ministers were absent from their seats both yesterday afternoon and evening, that is true, but they were not absent from this building. The mere putting through of the routine business day by day occupies very considerable time, and of course there are questions of policy regarding legislation to be brought down which demand conferences during a considerable portion of the day among the members of the Government. My hon. friends the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) will readily recognize the truth of what I say in that regard. However, that is perhaps enough of those matters.

Just one word as to the legislation that has been brought down. I am informed that the Franchise Bill was introduced on the 26th day of March, and that up to the present time no less than seventeen sittings of the Committee of the Whole House have been devoted to the measure. I would venture to think that such a degree of activity does not indicate any remissness on the part of the Government. I am also told by my colleagues, who were here when I unfortunately had to be absent, the Government legislation has been ready on every day on which Government business could proceed, and that there has been no delinquency on the part of the ministry in bringing forward such legislation for the consideration of the House.

If my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition recalls the history of legislation in this House—since I have been a member of Parliament at least—he will remark this: That measures of corresponding importance debated in the early part of the session necessarily receive very much more of discussion at all events than measures introduced in the latter part of the session. That is necessarily the case. It always has been the case; it always will be the case; and I do not think that in the future that lies before my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition he will ever be able to modify very seriously that condition of affairs so long as parliamentary institutions continue as they are. It is in the very nature of things. I admit that if it were believed possible that a remedy could be found it should be sought; but in my public experience I have never yet been able to devise any remedy for that condition. It unfortunately has proved in the case of all governments in the years that are behind us, that legislation introduced at a later stage of the session has sometimes gone through without the same attentive consideration that would be accorded to it in the early part of the session.

I am content to let the motion stand for the present and to consider the proposal made by the hon. member for Marquette for which I think a good deal may be said. The only purpose the Government has in mind is to get on with the business of the House as expeditiously as possible consistently with the public interest; and to impose no undue hardship upon any hon. member on either side. That is our purpose and our desire. I shall let the matter stand, and discuss it further with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Since the right hon. gentleman has been good enough to say that the matter would stand over for the present, there is no particular reason why one should continue the discussion; I only rise to refer to one point. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) defended the motion of the Prime Minister on the ground that it was following precedent. In our parliamentary institutions precedent counts for a great deal, I acknowledge that. I cannot speak positively but my impression is that the motion which the right hon. gentleman has made is without a precedent. Speaking only from memory I do not think he will find an instance where in the first days, or in the middle of, a Budget debate a motion of this kind has been brought forward. There are times during a session when we can all agree that morning sittings, Saturday sittings and Wednesday evening sittings—a departure from the regular rule—become necessary and will be supported by all. Where the main business of a session has been brought down, where all the public documents have been submitted, where there is abundant time to consider everything, and all that remains is for the House to wind up the session, there is something to be said in favour of a motion of that kind; but when we are in the midst of the most important business of the session, when some of the public documents have not been brought down, when a great many matters have only been before the House for a few days, I think my right hon. friend will find no instance where, under such circumstances, such a motion as is now proposed is made. My attention is drawn to the fact that among the Bills on the Order Paper yet to be introduced is one which I take to be very important — a Bill respecting the Canadian National railways which is given notice of by the Minister of Railways. Well, we know that must be a Bill of great importance. The Canadian National Railway system is the largest branch of the public departments of Canada and even without knowing anything whatever about the measure it is fair to say, and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister will admit, that it is of an important character. As to which side or the other is responsible for delay and remiss in attendance perhaps rocks could be thrown on both sides. I must, however, ask my right hon. friend to give credit to hon. gentlemen on this side for keeping a quorum on many a night when, if we had had to depend upon hon. gentlemen opposite, there would have been no quorum. Several times last evening I counted but nine or ten members on the Government side, and again and again during the session if hon. members on this side had wished to delay business they could have counted out the House, not, however, by reason of absentees on this side because here there is always a fair attendance. There is fault on both sides, but the main point I desire my right hon. friend to consider is whether or not he is right in saying there is precedent for the making of a motion of this kind in the circumstances in which we are now placed and when we are in the midst of the most important business of the session.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In reply to my hon. friend let me say that in the ordinary course I think this matter has always been one of agreement between both sides of the House. I think, however, this may be said—that usually forenoon sittings and Saturday sittings have not been commenced until the programme of the Government is fully before the House. I think that is a fair statement to make.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion stands.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE CONTINUED ON THE ANNUAL STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 26, the debate on the motion of Sir Henry Drayton (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks I intend to offer I shall be as brief as possible so as not to delay the much desired prorogation of Parliament. Moreover, the debate on the Budget has well nigh been exhausted, and I do not suppose that I can add very much to the very brilliant addresses which have already been delivered. The Budget Speech of the Minister of Finance has at least Mr. Speaker, one great merit: It faithfully reflects the financial situation of Canada to-day. If my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) will permit me, I will compare his speech to a little piece of art which I saw in an old cathedral during my last visit to Europe. Visiting the cathedral of Rouen I noticed in the rear portion of the cathedral a little font—a real piece of art—designed I am told by an old monk who worked at it for years and years. The especial feature about that little font is that when the passing traveller looks within it he will find reflected there the whole of the magnificent proportions of the cathedral, but unfortunately is seen upside down and reduced to a miniature. The Budget Speech, Mr. Speaker, recalls to my mind that little font I saw in the Gothic cathedral at Rouen. It reflects the Canada of to-day but the picture is all topsy-turvy and how mighty small it is after being under the direction of hon. gentlemen opposite.

However, Mr. Speaker, the present Minister of Finance, as has been stated on several occasions during this debate, is not responsible for the awkward position in which he finds himself, and if on the present occasion I cannot give him my support I, at least, can offer him my sincere sympathy. We are told that there will be no revision of the tariff in spite of the many promises that have been made to Parliament from year to year within, at least, the last five years. But of course we must face a revision of taxation. I do not object to income tax; indeed, I have advocated it. Nor do I object to any tax or impost on the luxuries of life. But speaking on behalf of my constituents; on behalf of the man on the street, I do strenuously object to any tax on the necessities of life. One has not to be much versed on political economy to know that the basic wants of man are threefold: food, clothing and shelter. These necessities, in a cold country like Canada, should not be taxed. Any tax on the necessities of life are a handicap to the labourer, to the worker; they press more heavily on the poor man than they do on any other man in the community. They also handicap the producers and work in restraint of trade. I shall not quote at this moment the various opinions on this subject as expressed by the newspapers of Canada on both sides of politics, but I only wish to quote the opinion of the man on the street. Upon reading the tariff resolutions of the Finance Minister, one of my electors, a respected citizen of the county of Maisonneuve who has quite a large family and who has only small earnings to support it, wrote me the following:

> Automobiles for passengers; former duty, 10 per cent plus war tax 7½ per cent—17½ per cent; present duty, 15 per cent, plus one per cent excise on wholesalers only; in reality, a reduction on the greatest luxury of the age. The duties—

And I agree with my correspondent.

> The duties on automobiles should be at least 25 per cent; that much was expected by the importers. As regards clothing, boots and shoes, if the principle of taxing luxuries is to be adopted—and it seems to be generally accepted as necessary—let luxuries be taxed, not necessities. The minimum prices on all these commodities subject to taxation should be raised at least 50 per cent.

Take shoes. There are several large manufacturers of shoes in the constituency which I have the honour to represent.

> It is impossible to-day to buy a shoe such as everybody in towns and cities is obliged to wear for less than $10 to $12. What are generally called Oxford walking shoes for ladies cost from $12 to $16. Is it not absurd to fix the minimum price subject to taxation at $9? Take confectionery. Not long ago Laura Secord chocolates were selling at 70 cents a pound; they now ask 80 cents, making an additional profit of five per cent for the company. They do not give or issue any slip or check to the customer; how much of this will go to the Government? The cost of sugar at retail is 22 cents a pound. Is not the price of Page and Shaw's or Neilson's candies at $1.25 a pound high enough to warrant the imposition of the tax of ten per cent on the manufacturer and not on the common people, not on the consumer?

Take sporting goods. I have many young sturdy Canadians in my division of Maisonneuve. French-Canadian families as you are aware are large and the boys are all more or less sportsmen.

Mr. BELAND: Baseball champions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, we have carried the honours on many occasions in Maisonneuve. Well, there is a tax of 50 cents and upwards on sporting goods. My correspondent says:

> If there is one thing in which the young people of our towns and cities should be encouraged, it is the practice of sports for the maintenance of virility and health. The class in the community that is suffering most from the high cost of living is the salaried class, the wage-earning class, and this provision hits them almost exclusively. It is a provision that should be struck out.
>
> Now, I have this remark to make regarding gold ornaments. Why should the Government not expropriate for coinage purposes all the gold mined, with the exception, for our provinces at least, of a certain quantity required for wedding rings and dental purposes? The use of gold should be absolutely prohibited except where no substitute can be found, until our coinage reserve again reaches the fine percentage which it had attained in 1914.

Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest confidence in Mr. Breadner's ability. But Mr. Breadner, able as he is, faithful watch-dog of the treasury that he is, is not ubiquitous. I tell my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that the administration of his new law will be nothing less than a premium on fraud.

My hon. friend did not, in his Budget Speech, dilate on the question of expenditure. He is new in the saddle as Finance Minister; he should read the speeches delivered many years ago by that grand old man of England, William Ewart Gladstone, on the question of economy. Mr. Gladstone was, perhaps, never more eloquent than when he delivered his Budget speeches as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he was not ashamed to proclaim the following truths:

> A Chancellor of the Exchequer must be prepared to be unpopular; he must learn how to say no to many requests which are made to him; he must be cheeseparing.

If there ever was an occasion when the Minister of Finance should practise cheeseparing, that occasion is now. My hon. friend says—and I believe he is sincere—that he will check the expenditure, and he appeals to hon. members on both sides to do the same. With the combination around him, I am afraid that on that question, at all events, my hon. friend, to repeat a phrase well known in Canadian politics, will be "nothing but a fly on the wheel." Let me offer him another suggestion. I already made one the other day to the House; I said, for instance, that our rules should be so amended that ministers of the Crown should have a right to appear before both Houses of Parliament, whether they belonged to the one or to the other. I say to-day that you shall not check the tremendous expenditures of this country, unless at the beginning of the session a special committee is appointed to supervise the Estimates which are to be submitted to the House of Commons. That committee should have a right to send for books, to call for witnesses and experts in order to bring before the House only such items of expenditure as should be considered by Parliament. This seems to me a practical question, and though the reform may appear to be somewhat radical, circumstances justify its adoption.

Let my hon. friend pause and ponder after having read the startling figures which were given to this House the other day by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). In 1914, the expenditure per head was, in round figures, $24; in 1920, it has reached the enormous sum of $75 per head of the population. In 1914, the gross debt per head of the population was $71.75; in 1920, it is $334.90. In 1914, the net debt per head of the population was $43.49; in 1920, it is $215. These are stupendous figures, and my hon. friend should commence at once to eliminate from the Estimates any expenditures which might well be postponed until after Canada has resumed the proud position she occupied when she was financially led by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's.

My hon. friend will, I hope, think I am sincere in my advocacy of a reduction in military expenditure. The war is now over, and the Englishman, being a plausible man, having the sagacity we know he has, has disbanded all his troops, and he is now hard at work to recuperate the trade and commerce of old England. Let Canada do likewise. We should reduce to its minimum the military expenditure of this country.

There are vague rumours regarding a naval expenditure. Many years ago when the treasury was overflowing with surpluses, I strongly supported the expenditure of several millions for the creation of a Canadian navy, manned by Canadian officers and Canadian sailors and flying with the British ensign, the Canadian flag. But those days have gone by, and we are face to face with heavy commitments and huge deficits which will paralyse the financial possibilities of this country for many years to come. We have had a visit from Lord Jellicoe, and since that visit we have been favoured with only a vague general answer as to the intentions of the Government in regard to the proposed navy. I do not know the intention of the Government nor of the minister who is at the head of the Naval Department, but all I can say, in all sincerity, is this: This is a time for Canada to build, not warships, but friendships. How will you build friendships? By giving something to do to my good and genial friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). He requires some work in that department which was described many years ago, I think, by himself, as the fifth wheel of the Government coach. How will you build friendships? By letting the Minister of Trade and Commerce, instead of appointing semi-ambassadors to play at diplomacy at Washington and elsewhere, appoint alert trade commissioners who will capture wider markets for Canada and will meet the competition, not only of Americans, but of Australians, New Zealanders, yes, and Britons too.

On this subject, we might learn a lesson from old England, from her political economy and her commercial sagacity. I was amused the other day, listening to my good friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) lecturing old England. Poor old England, in the throes of bankruptcy! Poor old England, having been the dupe of free trade for half a century! In fact, my hon. friend said: "But new days have come, new times have arisen in England and Mr. Asquith himself—and he coupled with the name of Mr. Asquith that of Mr. Lloyd George—appointed a commission four years ago to study the question of key industries. I asked my hon. friend if recommendations had been made. My hon. friend answered in the affirmative, but he failed to tell me if the Parliament of Great Britain had put into concrete form on the Statute Book any of the recommendations of that commission. I thought my hon. friend knew more about England than I did. I have been only a few times in the Old Country, but I know this: John Bull is a practical and shrewed business man. There are, it is said, two great safety valves in England. There is a safety valve to protect England against the agitator, and you might see that safety valve at work every Sunday morning in Hyde Park, where you hear the long-haired agitator disclaiming against Royalty, against the House of Lords and generally against the institutions of the land.

Mr. BUREAU: Blowing off steam.

Mr. LEMIEUX: People pass by, they listen, they smile, and there is no revolution in England. Another safety valve is the appointment of commissions by the Government of His Majesty in order to give a few faddists the time and opportunity to reduce their vapourings to writing. This commission appointed with a view to present Great Britain with the fallacy of high protection is one of those safety valves.

He coupled the name of Mr. Asquith with that of Mr. Lloyd George. He might just as well have asked his good neighbour, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, if England will change her present fiscal system for the one which he propounded for the benefit of his Toronto admirers. Why, some years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce, being for a while out of the House of Commons, and being known as one of the most, if not the most eloquent exponent of high protection in Canada, was invited to tour England on behalf of Mr. Chamberlain's party. He went across the water and spoke in all the large centres of England. He was applauded again and again as the great Canadian speaker, a gentleman who had been Finance Minister of Canada for many years, and much admired for his power of speech. But when the elections came off, poor Mr. Chamberlain's party was defeated horse, foot and artillery. My hon. friend came back and I have never heard him since proclaim to this House that England would ever adopt the policy of protection as against free trade,—the policy which has made England great and made the fortunes of the English merchants. Mr. Speaker, as I said, he coupled the name of Mr. Asquith with that of Mr. Lloyd George. Now just one word about Mr. Asquith. Defining the aims of Liberalism —and Mr. Asquith does not change his mind so often perhaps as others—he said:

> May I try, in two or three sentences to indicate to you what has been in the past and what, in my judgment, still remain its specific aims? As regards the Empire, to secure real unity by allowing the freest diversity and the fullest liberty of self-development in all its members. (Cheers). As regards property, to make it secure by divesting it of injustice. (Cheers). As regards political authority, to make it stable by resting it upon the broadest possible basis of popular responsibility. As regards religion, to remove from it the odium of an alliance with political disabilities. (Hear, hear). As regards trade, to make it world-wide by opening our own markets here at home to everybody.

Those are the views of Mr. Asquith, and though he appointed a commission to please a few faddists he remains as staunch and firm a free trader as ever.

As regards Mr. Llody George, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain, here is what he said not very long ago, and I am pleased to quote his remarks because, Mr. Speaker, he at least will surely not be classed as one of the disloyalists ever ready to sell his British birthright like my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's in 1911. Here is what he said on the 17th of February, 1911:

> I rejoice that it (the Reciprocity Agreement) has been negotiated, and heartily trust it will carry to a successful conclusion. I regard it as a great triumph of common sense, and an immense stride in the cause of free trade, inculcating a step towards the fraternity and co-operation of the English-speaking family.

Mr. Speaker, those very sane words were also used in the message addressed to the Canadian people at the elections of 1911 by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Enough of this subject.

From information I have, I wish to convey to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, the news that a change seems to be at hand in the government of this country. I have in my hand The Onlooker. I do not know who this Onlooker from Toronto is, nor at what window he perches, whether it is at the York Club, or the National Club of Toronto, or at the King Edward Hotel, or some other sanctuary, but this Onlooker seems to have been peeping into the affairs of the Unionist party pretty shrewdly, and I wish to give my right hon. friend some information he has gathered. Once more, it is the voice of Toronto speaking. This Onlooker states quite authoritatively:

It is possible that the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden may never again resume the reins of office. In that case a leader must be found who will inspire confidence and respect, if not enthusiasm.

Then he goes on to discard those who should not be the leaders, and it is all rather interesting. He says:

Sir Thomas White has absolutely no claim upon the premiership. To put it bluntly, he does not measure up to its requirements. For one thing, he has not had the necessary parliamentary experience, and for another, he is profoundly distrusted by the Conservatives; and the Conservative party will have to be considered in any question of the premiership.

We know that. I am glad to give this information to my Liberal-Unionist friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne). He goes on, speaking of Sir Thomas White:

He was invited to step into a financial aeroplane by a group of—shall we say disinterested and admiring friends?—and was wafted to Ottawa and placed in charge of the country's finances. The manner of his appointment was reprehensible and unprecedented. He left Toronto a Liberal and woke up in Ottawa a Conservative. Strange metamorphosis! He had never been in Parliament; outside of financial circles he was but little known; the country had made no wild demand for his services; yet, suddenly, overnight he is found in office It is safe to say that never again at the solicitation of any outside group will a Minister of Finance be appointed, or any other kind of a minister. The organ in question mistakes for the voice of the people "The wolf's long cry from Oonalaska's shore."

So much for my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance. Then he speaks of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) in this way:

His star is decidedly in the ascendant. . . In the hands of either of these strong men the country would be entirely safe, and, either in power, we could sleep safe in our beds o'night. Mr. Meighen, however, has his spurs to win.

Then he speaks of my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell):

He is not, and never can be, a politician. He is temperamentally unfitted for the game. The rough and tumble of the arena is not for him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is too good.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He goes on:

No doubt he is sick of the strife, and would be glad to return to those quiet walks of civic usefulness where his high and sincere character is known and valued.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is a soul-saver.

Mr. LEMIEUX (reading):

Cromwell's utterance in respect of a certain type of public man is always bearing in mind, as a warning if nothing else—"A man never goes so far as when he doesn't know where he is going."

Then he turns to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and offers him the palm, the crown, not of thorns, but of gold to adorn his brow:

Sir George Foster is incomparably the best debater in Parliament, and, although seventy-three, as lithe and limber as when, a mere stripling (as politicians go), he made his first speech to the delight and wonder of the House. His equipment as a parliamentarian is complete, and his profound knowledge of finance, not to be held in light esteem at this perilous juncture of affairs. It is not against him that he was once a professor of political economy, but very much to the good. His voice is music; his choice of English shows that rare quality—conscience of phrase; his logic is always germane to the subject under discussion, and his vision of Imperial greatness rises at times into the domain of poetry. When, years ago, the grand old Motherland stood practically alone with the wolves of Europe ready to spring at her throat, he thrilled the whole Empire with the phrase, "splendid isolation"—a phrase just re-echoed in the January 19th Century by Major Hurst. He deserves well of his country; and if faithful public service, complete loyalty to his party and passionate devotion to British connection count for anything, the premiership should be his for the asking. To him the words in Tennyson's immortal poem surely apply:—

"Old age hath yet his honour and his toil;
Death closes all; but something ere the end,
Some work of noble note, may yet be done
Not unbecoming men that strove with gods.
Come, my friends,
'Tis not too late to seek a newer world."

Yes, a change is surely at hand, as "The Onlooker" states. I am not against that change. At the present juncture a storm is raging and no one will deny that the ship of state is in danger. Indeed it has been on the rocks for many months. The crew and the pilot, I am sorry to say, are not equal to the task of steering her course. Another crew and another captain are badly needed. It is true that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) said the other day that the old hull could still carry the crew, the pilot, and the unfortunate passengers until 1922 or 1923. My hon. friend, being the master pilot of this Government, and having many sailing masters surrounding him, he is I think a judge of the hull of the ship of state and of the sailors and pilots in connection with it. Indeed, he is the gentleman who signs all the certificates. But let me tell him that if he thinks that the hull of the ship, as well as the crew, the captain and the passengers are all safe, he is sadly mistaken, because a ship cannot be safe when there are so many false lights on the shore. The sailors of this ship—whom I should call buccaneers—were united to carry on in that tragic year 1917; but they were united on one point and one point only, and that was the moral iniquity of the elections. Mr. Speaker, new conditions require new methods and new men. There are dark days in the history of every nation, though the people may be blessed with popular institutions and responsible government. This has been the case in Canada during the last five years; it was the case in England at the beginning of the last century. Every one conversant with history will remember that at the dawn of the nineteenth century, when the French Revolution and its horrors were haunting the minds of men, England under even the great Pitt established a system of domestic tyranny and a reign of terror. Habeas Corpus was suspended, right of public meeting was attacked, freedom of speech was denied and repressed. But a little group of men stood four-square against the assailants of freedom. Fox, the generous Fox, espoused the cause of the oppressed; Daniel O'Connell claimed and obtained for Irishmen the right and privileges enjoyed by the Englishmen of his day and generation; Grey, Russell, Brougham, Jeffrey and Peel claimed and obtained in turn the abolition of the ruling oligarchy, the extension of the franchise, and the repeal of the Corn laws which established free trade. Sir, in England in those days they thought that no political democracy could be real that was not the reflection of economic democracy. A French writer has said "L'histoire est un perpétuel recommencement," which I might translate by the homely phrase that history repeats itself. Under the shadow of the great war, the winning of which can be ascribed only to the young men who with unfaltering steps went to the front and with brave hearts climbed over the top,—under the shadow of that great war, I say Sir, the Government installed in Canada, as was done in England a century ago, a system of domestic tyranny and a reign of terror. The historian of the last five years, Mr. Speaker, after having described how our young Canadians fought and died to save democracy, will have to draw up a terrible indictment against the Government of the day. He will have to say that in their lust of power, in their desire—in unworthy mimicry of our brave soldiers—to entrench themselves in office, they have been guilty of the worst possible crime against society, that of shaking public confidence in our democratic institutions. The historian of the days that have just passed, will have to tell how the Government reinstated an old form of bureaucracy with all its baneful influences and discredible methods. He will have to tell how the courts of the land, here in Ottawa, and in the province of Alberta, were silenced by the Minister of Justice at the point of the bayonet; and how regiments were seen tramping, in the law-abiding and God-fearing city of Quebec on Holy Friday to suppress supposed riots, staged, concocted and organized by "agents provocateurs." What a sorry spectacle, Sir! Parliament flouted, absentee oligarchy, unreliable information, distrust of the common people, everything done in secret behind closed doors, a group of vainglorious men squandering public money to maintain a retinue of sycophants, protecting privilege, securing vested rights against molestation, delivering the country to the grasp of profiteering, extravagant war borrowing coupled with the creation of a monied aristocracy,—all this the historian will cite in his indictment against the Government. But, worse, still worse, he will tell of the deliberate destruction of the unity of Canada, that unity which, as a priceless heirloom, had been handed down from generation to generation to the great Canadian family by the Lafontaines and the Baldwins, the Cartiers and the Macdonalds, the Lauriers, the Mowats and the Blakes. Oh, that I were a Macaulay to draw up that indictment! Never was there such an urgent need for a change of methods and a change of men. There is an old saying which is familiar to us all: "Government of the people for the people and by the people." This pregnant epigram is attributed to Abraham Lincoln, and I accept it as the essence of Liberalism which the party on your left, Mr. Speaker, represents in Canada; and the application of the principles which it implies, to the problems of Canadian politics in relation to national, imperial and world-wide interest is the work of the Liberal party in Canada. The aims of Liberalism have been and are to-day to remove inequality. The main battlements of privilege and vested authority have been won by Liberalism through centuries of struggle. The fight of Democracy for freedom, for equality of opportunity and for substantial justice to all individuals of the Commonwealth, still goes on and will continue to go on. There are still inequalities of taxation to be righted, the oppression of vested interests in trade and in industry to be overcome, monopolies and trusts to be regulated; and in the sphere of economic legislation—a sphere with which the leader of the Liberal party is familiar—Liberalism still has its greatest work to do; the welfare of the common man at the common task is its first consideration.

Surprise has been expressed on both sides of the House, by some of my friends of the Conservative party and by some of my Progressive friends, at certain remarks made a few days ago by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding). Yet, Sir, although I have differed on one or two important occasions with the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's—honourable men may differ at times—I have no hesitation in stating, and I believe I am voicing the sentiment of the country, that his speech taken from the beginning to the very end is that of a Canadian statesman. It is consistent with himself and with the traditions and the policy of the Reform party.

In 1896, Mr. Speaker, when the Liberal party, and I was one of them—yes, twenty-five years ago, I joined the House of Commons, and I am now one of the old members in years of service in this House, and my recollections are very vivid—as I say, when the Liberal party took office in 1896 it did so, not under the banner of free trade pure and undiluted, but it took office under the banner of tariff for revenue. The two landmarks of that fiscal policy are well-known and they were erected by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) who was the trusted Minister of Finance in those days. My hon. friend first gave the British preference in 1897—which the very loyal party had not dared to give to the Mother Country; and in 1911 he implemented that legislation by the reciprocity agreement, which was appreciated in the words I quoted a moment ago by the present Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's, though surprise has been expressed at his remarks was consistent with the Liberal traditions as regards the fiscal policy of our party. No one, I suppose, will question the staunch Liberalism and the honest convictions of the late leader of the party, the Hon. Edward Blake. Sir, allow me to quote from the address of Mr. Blake delivered in West Durham in 1882. The National Policy had been inaugurated by the Conservative party in 1879, with the standing offer of reciprocity with the United States. In his address Mr. Blake used the following language:

> You know well that I do not approve—

I commend these words to my hon. friends of the Progressive party, to those who did not fight under the banner of Mr. Blake, to those who honestly ignore the traditions and policies of the Liberal party under Blake as they ignore them under Laurier and Fielding.

> "You know well that I do not approve of needless restrictions on our liberty of exchanging what we have for what we want, and do not see that any substantial application of the restrictive principle has been or can be made in favour of the great interests of the mechanic, the labourer, the farmer, the lumberman, the shipbuilder or the fisherman. But you know also that I have fully recognized the fact that we are obliged to raise yearly a great sum, made greater by the obligations imposed on us by this Government; and that we must continue to provide this yearly sum mainly by import duties, laid to a great extent on goods similar to those which can be manufactured here; and that it results as a necessary incident of our settled fiscal system that there must be a large, and, as I believe, in the view of moderate protectionists, an ample advantage to the home manufacturer."

And listen to these words, Mr. Speaker, because they tally with the words spoken the other evening by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's:

> "Our adversaries wish to present to you an issue as between the present tariff and absolute free trade."

It is an old game; it was known in 1882.

> That is not the true issue. Free trade is, as I have repeatedly explained, for us impossible; and the issue is whether the present tariff is perfect, or defective and unjust.
>
> "I believe it to be, in some important respects, defective and unjust."

So do we believe that with the colossal debt and with the enormous commitments of this country we require a revenue, and we shall require it for many years to come. Therefore, free trade as a theory reduced to practice at the present moment and in the years to come is a sheer impossibility, and any child in this country would appreciate the stand taken by the Liberal party.

But, Sir, Liberals and many Conservatives and many independent citizens of this country also believe that the time has come when protection "as high as Haman's gallows" must be done away with, and that the tariff as it exists is defective and unjust, and that in the fixing of the tariff some regard must be had not only to the manufacturers, but also, as Mr. Blake said, to the consumers and the public generally. That is the position of the Liberal party.

I am quite free to speak on this subject, and I think I take the common sense view of it. I happen to represent the constituency of Gaspé, where, to please my electors and to secure their votes, I would have only to say, "Gentlemen, I am a pure and undiluted free trader; you shall have free trade." On the other hand, I could turn to the manufacturers of Maisonneuve and tell them, "Gentlemen, I stand for the protection of your interests; I am a protectionist." By so doing I could get at once a clearance, to use a shipping phrase, from both Gaspé and Maisonneuve. But, Sir, I represent intelligent people, sane people, reasonable people, and they know that on this question of the tariff there must be give and take as on every other big issue which confronts this country.

Many long years elapsed, Mr. Speaker, before the Liberal party could put into practice their fiscal policy as propounded by Sir Richard Cartwright, Alexander Mackenzie, and Edward Blake. In those days we were blocked by impediments of somewhat the same character that we find to-day—there was an iniquitous franchise, there was a gerrymander, which debarred many Liberal constituencies, especially in the province of Ontario from their rightful representation in Parliament. The Liberal party was defeated in 1882, in 1887 and in 1891; but remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1891 in the great province of Ontario there was a majority in favour of unrestricted reciprocity. Finally in 1896 the Liberal party was triumphant. From ocean to ocean the party rolled up a majority and the reins of office were taken by new men. What was then the condition of the country? I do not wish to touch too vigorously the tender feelings of my hon. friend (Sir George Foster) who was the Minister of Finance in the Tupper Government, but it is only too well known, alas! that deficits were annually recorded, that our foreign trade was stationary, that our manufacturers—and my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Ballantyne) knows it perhaps better than any one else in this House—were making no headway, the great Northwest was undeveloped, and immigrants—yes and even Canadians were drifting to the United States. But on the 23rd June, 1896, a great wave of sanity, of intelligence, of patriotism, brought the Liberals to the helm and soon after Sir Wilfrid Laurier took office. The first question which engrossed the attention of the Laurier Government was that of tariff reform, and I well remember the investigation which was held in one city after another, in farming district after farming district, indeed from ocean to ocean. That investigation was conducted by Hon. Mr. Fielding, the then Minister of Finance who was accompanied by the Minister of Inland Revenue, if I remember well and by the then Controller of Customs, the late William Paterson. I followed the investigation of the commission in the city of Montreal—no doubt my hon. friend (Mr. Ballantyne) was also present at those sittings—and not one interest was neglected. The farmers had their say as well as the manufacturers and the fishermen—indeed all classes of our community had a chance to be heard and to propound their theories before that tribunal. As a result, Mr. Speaker, the tariff of 1897 was introduced by the Hon. Mr. Fielding. It materially reduced the duties on many necessities and staple commodities used by the consumer; it placed on the free list certain articles of prime necessity used by the farmer, the miner, the fisherman and the manufacturer; it reduced the duties on iron and steel which constituted, and still constitute, the staple raw materials for many an industry; it gave a substantial preference to Great Britain, first of 12 per cent, then raised to 25 per cent and at last increased to 33⅓ per cent. Mr. Speaker, what was the result? A new Canada was born; the country found itself and for the first time realized its immense possibilities. It was under the influence of these compelling events that standing before the then Prince of Wales—who later became good King Edward—the Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, voicing the sentiments of his country could exclaim "that as the nineteenth century had been the century of the United States, so the twentieth century would be the century of Canada." Every legitimate industry from the Atlantic to the Pacific, speaking in all truth, prospered. Manufacturing institutions were enlarged again and again to meet the demands of the industrial world. The farmers shared in the prosperity probably better than any other class. The price of farm products increased tenfold—the results being seen with the increase in the value of farm lands —and the much deplored exodus under the Tory regime was practically stopped. Four hundred thousand immigrants yearly invaded the plains of the West, and those plains were changed into smiling fields producing the best that any country under the canopy of heaven could yield. The total exports of agricultural products increased from $14,000,000 in round figures in 1896 to $82,601,000 in 1911, while the exports of manufactured goods were augmented from $9,365,384 in 1896 to $35,283,-118 in 1911. Such, Mr. Speaker, was the effect of the administration of a Liberal Government, with a sane tariff, with a give and take Fiscal policy, from 1896 to 1911. In the words of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) we can all say "That Administration gave Canada progress and prosperity, peace and plenty." Then Canada had a Government, not a coalition of appetites like the present. Then Canada had Laurier at the helm. Ah, Mr. Speaker, time is a great avenger. I was touched to a greater extent than I can express when I listened on Tuesday to the remarks of my hon. friend from Red Deer. I can forgive him everything else for which he might be criticised on account of the words he uttered in 1917 in this House. Let me repeat what he said the other day:

> I am going to give some quotations now, very brief, not for the purpose of recrimination; not to say whether the Liberal party did or did not do its duty, but to state the progressive fiscal policy that I have believed in all my life, and to give it as affirmed by a man who, being dead, still speaketh.

Then having quoted from a speech by Sir Wilfrid Laurier the hon. member went on to say:

> That was sound doctrine, Mr. Speaker, when those sentences were uttered by the voice that is stilled forever so far as this scene is concerned, and it is as profoundly true and more applicable to-day. I am here to claim for the little group by whom we are surrounded that we inherit that doctrine. We are the inheritors of that creed. We come by it honourably. We followed and believed Sir Wilfrid Laurier then, and we follow his teachings now.

Yes, I can forgive a great deal in the member for Red Deer, Mr. Speaker, for those eloquent words. Sir, truth and justice are sometimes tardy in arriving, but they are not unlike the glimmering lights of the dawn at break of day. Only a few weeks ago I visited one of the art galleries in Rome and there saw that beautiful painting of Guido's, in which he represents the dawn breaking through the clouds of the night. A magnificent chariot is shown; seated on it is a charioteer holding a sceptre representative of the sun from which the rays are emanating. In front are four horses preceded by a group of nymphs who scatter flowers. Quietly and gently the glimmering light of dawn breaks through the dense, opaque night, and afar you can see the horizon illuminated,—it is the break of a perfect day. Such is truth; such is justice. It is commonly said, Mr. Speaker that "murder will out"; so truth also will out and justice will out. Yes, though Sir Wilfrid Laurier passed away under the cloud of prejudice and fanaticism which had been cast over him by unscrupulous opponents, to-day, like the break of the day under the action of light, Sir Wilfrid Laurier is to us, as he ever was, "le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche", to whom Canada during many years could look for light and leading; whom the people could trust because he trusted the people; a real leader, not a political accident; an intellectuality, not a mediocrity; never stampeded by conspiracy or dominated by fear; a champion of the masses, a terror to the classes; never elated by success or dejected by disappointment; tried by both extremes of fortune, never disturbed by either; serene in adversity; insensible to ingratitude,—Sir, we can truly say in the words of the poet that he was:

> —made of unpurchasable stuff;
> He went the ways when ways were rough.

Let us pay to him, Mr. Speaker, a tribute similar to that which was extended by a Premier of France to a great French citizen: He bestowed on Canada the alms of glory.

But, Sir, I may be told that I am delving in past history. What of the future) I unhesitatingly proclaim that we should revert to a sane party system; it is the best devised under British institutions for the Government of men. Having thus wisely reverted to the party system, let us revert, for the sake of heaven, to responsible government. I am a Liberal because I believe in responsible government, but responsible government has been sadly shattered during the last five years. May I say to the young members who have graced this House since 1917 that the struggle between the executive and the popular government is never ending. The tendency of the executive is to grasp always larger powers than are necessary for the administration of the affairs of the country. The rule I venture to lay down to them as young men, after reading what I could of the political history of other nations, after studying, as well as I could, the principles of popular government, is the rule which, I am thankful to say, I hold more firmly to-day than ever before, that we as Liberals ought to give to the executive and remove from the people's representatives just so much power as, and no more than, is necessary for the efficient management of the business of administration.

As regards party government, I say that it is not in our gospel that all Liberals should think alike on any question. There is in the Liberal party some independence, some freedom,—freedom of thought; freedom of speech. There is in the Liberal party the advance guard, the main body, and the rear guard. All three are essential to the triumph of a just and noble cause. In the words of Mr. Blake, the advance guard are those who see or think they see further than the rest; who project their minds into a more distant future, and look, long before the time when it can be garnered in, for the harvest to be reaped some other day; who sow the seeds that are to produce that harvest. Then you find the main body, going steadily onward, dealing mainly with those things which after due ripening have become questions of the day—problems in practical politics. Then, you find the rear guard—and possibly because of the number of years that I have spent in this House and of the number of years that I have served in the ranks of the Liberal party, I might declare that I belong to the rear guard. The rear guard is an efficient and important part of the army, well alive to the true principles of Liberalism, yet rather emphasizing the importance of making haste slowly; in whom caution is often the prominent element; who steady us in our course, put on the brakes and prevent us from going too fast or getting at loose ends.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude, and I regret that I have occupied so long the attention of the House. I said a moment ago that new conditions required new methods and new men. I have pointed out the methods; where are the men? Where is the man, the leader of that rear guard, that main body and that advance guard of the Liberal party? Sir, I have the honour to sit beside that leader. A son of Ontario, the great province which gave us William Lyon Mackenzie, Robert Baldwin, George Brown, Alexander Mackenzie, Oliver Mowat, Edward Blake, he is by tradition, by nature, in all faith and conviction, in policy and in practice a Liberal, without qualification and without reserve. He brought to the work of leadership the most priceless of all assets in a public man, the asset of character, and to use the language of the stock market, the asset of character is yet quoted in the markets of the world. His road may be steep, his path may be strewn with difficulties, but he will remember that:

> In the race, not in the prize,
> Glory's true distinction lies.

He may take comfort in the words once spoken by the greatest of all Liberals, William Ewart Gladstone, when engaged in that fierce campaign know as the Midlothian campaign, when his party had been defeated at the polls, when at each election more Liberals went down to defeat. When the grand old man took the banner and proudly planted it in the Midlothians, he used this language:

> We cannot reckon on the wealth of the country, nor upon the rank of the country, nor upon the influence which rank and wealth usually bring. In the main these powers are against us, for wherever there is a close corportation, wherever there is a spirit of organized monopoly, wherever there is a narrow and sectional interest apart from that of the country, and desiring to be set up above the interest of the public, there, gentlemen, we, the Liberal party, have no friendship and no tolerance to expect.
> Above all these, and behind all these, there is something greater than these—there is the nation itself. . . . . The nation is a power hard to rouse, but when roused, harder still and more hopeless to resist.

Above all, the duty of the Liberal leader and the work of the Reform party in the coming campaign,—and it cannot fail to come because the Government is crumbling to pieces; we have that evidence before us every day—will be to restore that national unity which has been so criminally shattered by the Tory-Unionist party during the last five years. Yesterday evening, the young and eloquent hon. member for St. James (M. Rinfret) who, in his first speech, contributed a most admirable exposition of Liberal principles which gives him at once a front rank in the Liberal party in in this House, spoke words of wisdom when he appealed to both sides of the House to restore harmony in Canada. Mr. Blake, who was our great leader before Sir Wilfrid Laurier was elected in 1887, often spoke about the relations which should exist between French and English and also between Protestants and Catholics in Canada. I well remember his words. They ought to be repeated; they ought to be learned in the schools of this country, not only in Ontario, but in Quebec as well. He said:

> I hold those men false to the principles of religious freedom who would sow discord between Protestants and Roman Catholics on this subject. I freely render to my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, first, full religious freedom, and next their stipulated rights! but more, I say that being strong, we ought to be what the strong should always be—generous to the weak.
>
> Measure full, heaped up and running over, is the measure to be given by the strong to the weak.

John Morley, honest John Morley, speaking on compromise, uses this language:

> You have not converted a man, because you have silenced him—opinion and force belong to different elements. To think that you are able by social disapproval or other coercive means to crush a man's opinion, is as one who should fire a blunderbus to put out a star.

The great Lincoln once quoted Scripture to his purpose when he said at Springfield in 1858—and he understood human nature:

> 'A house divided against itself cannot stand.' I believe this Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free. I do not expect the Union to be dissolved—I do not expect the house to fall—but I do expect that it will cease to be divided. It will become all one thing or all the other.

Advocating, as I do, Canadian unity and restoration of public confidence between the two great races which compose this vast Dominion, I echo the words of Lincoln and say that 'a house divided against itself cannot stand'; a nation cannot endure half loyal and half disloyal; I do not expect the nation to continue divided; but trusting in Divine Providence, I do expect and believe that, under the leadership of my hon friend and the guidance of the Liberal party, our country will at no distant date become all-Canadian.

Mr. GEORGE BRECKEN NICHOLSON (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a word or two on the subject of the Budget Speech and the amendment moved to the Budget by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), it is not my intention to endeavour to follow the literary effort of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), who gave the House one of those rare treats that we always expect when the hon. member rises to speak, but who avoided the subject of the Budget and the subject of the amendment to the Budget as much as he possibly could. There fell, however, from the lips of my hon. friend one or two observations, to which if I refer just briefly, I may be pardoned. My hon. friend stated that the Liberal party did not come into office in 1896 on a free trade policy. He also stated that it took the Liberal party a long time to reach the goal of Cartwright and Mackenzie on fiscal matters in this country. If we can understand the language of Cartwright and Mackenzie on fiscal matters and if we can understand the language laid down in the Liberal platform of 1893 and in the declaration of the leaders of the Liberal party at that time, I cannot agree with my hon. friend's statement that the Liberal party did not come into office in 1896, at least professing the principles of free trade. Every declaration that the country was able to get from the leaders of the Liberal party prior to the election of 1896 was condemnatory of everything that tended towards protection. In the words of the great leader, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself, whose memory every member in this House reveres, "Protection was to be killed out and out, and its body was to be trampled in the dust." In the platform itself laid down at the Liberal convention of 1893 we find this:

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burden under which the country labours. This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

I do, however, fully agree with my hon. friend when he stated that it took the Liberal party a long time to reach the goal in fiscal matters aimed at by Cartwright and Mackenzie. When the Liberal party came into office in 1896, the average tariff against imports into Canada was, in round figures, 29 per cent. When the Liberal party went out of office in 1911, after being fifteen years in power, the average tariff against imports into Canada was between 27½ and 28 per cent. Giving them credit for reducing the customs tariff from 1 to 1½ per cent, we still can accept at its face value the statement of my hon. friend that it took the Liberal party a long time to reach the goal of Cartwright and Mackenzie. We might go further and give him credit for having used these words, and I will put them into his mouth if he does not object: At the rate of a reduction of 1½ per cent in fifteen years, it would take the Liberal party 359 years to reach the goal Cartwright and Mackenzie aimed at, namely, free trade as they have it in England. There were one or two other observations made by the hon. member that I shall perhaps take the liberty of referring to a little later on.

I now pass to the consideration of the Budget itself. May I join with those who have preceded me in offering to the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) my humble congratulations on the resolute and fearless way in which he has not only dealt with the financial position in which this country finds itself at the conclusion of the war, but has set about to find the money with which this country can discharge its obligations. I venture to say it would be difficult to find a man anywhere who would agree with his neighbour as to every feature we should find in the taxation proposals in order that Canada may discharge its obligations. Some of us, to a greater degree than others, may find some of the obligations that we have to meet burdensome. Some men in this country looked forward to the Budget Speech of this year in the hope that the business profits' tax would be eliminated, and that there would be substituted for it an income tax that would treat all types of income, whether earned or unearned, on an equal basis. Those of us who looked forward to that, however, were disappointed, but we accept the situation. We realize, as has been already stated on the floor of this House, that the Finance Minister was face to face perhaps with the most difficult situation that any Finance Minister in the history of this country has ever been called on to face, notwithstanding the problems his predecessor had to meet in financing the war. Having passed out of the war period, and being brought face to face with what we are pleased to term the reconstruction period, being called upon to develop a system of finance that would take care of the tremendous obligations we are carrying, we must all admit that the present Minister of Finance had to face a very grave responsibility and very great difficulties indeed, and it would be more than human to expect that he should develop a system of taxation or deliver a Budget Speech that would meet with universal approval on either side of this House or by the people of the country generally.

There are just one or two points I would like to refer to briefly in connection with the taxation proposals. With regard to what is termed the luxury tax, I believe that the Finance Minister would be well advised, when these resolutions go into committee, to consider these two points: First, eliminating from the application of the luxury tax some of the articles that are now taxed. There are articles of consumption such, for instance, as dried fruits, canned fruits, in fact, canned goods of all kinds, that might perhaps in the strict sense of the term be called luxuries, but which in many parts of the country to-day are absolute necessities and cannot properly be treated as luxuries. Therefore, they should not come under the incidence of a luxury tax. That, however, is only my own personal view.

There is another thought, and that is that the price limit beyond which the luxury tax starts might be raised. I merely offer that as a suggestion. We must not lose sight of the fact that the general use of goods that four or five years ago may have been looked upon as luxuries, make them absolute necessities to-day, and the tax on these goods therefore could not be avoided by any class of people in the community.

There is one other point. In order to make a luxury tax more specifically a luxury tax, the percentage tax might be applied simply on the overplus until the price of the article reached the point where it became a positive luxury. For example, on a $10 pair of boots, simply tax the overplus above $9, but when it comes to a pair at $12 or $15, compute, as a luxury tax on the more wealthy people of this country, the percentage on the full price of the goods. I believe these suggestions are worthy at least of some consideration when the Budget resolutions go into committee.

Turning to the amendment of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), and considering that amendment in the light of the declaration made by the leader of the Opposition during the speech of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the effect that the policy of the Liberal party of this country on the tariff was embodied in the platform laid down at the Liberal convention of 1919, and considering that amendment also in the light of the declaration of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Gauthier) to the effect that the amendment and the speech introducing it was simply the expression of a personal opinion, and that any hon. member who wished to remain a member of the Liberal party must subscribe in toto to the platform of 1919, I submit that I am not taking an unfair position when I say that the amendment evidently was not intended to be taken any too seriously. We have the declarations already cited of the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, as well as vague intimations from other hon. members opposite that the platform laid down at the Liberal convention of 1919 was a virile thing, that it meant what it said, and that it does embody the policy of the Liberal party in this country so far as fiscal matters are concerned. We have also the speech of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), every sentence of which contained eulogies of free trade and denunciations of everything in the nature of a protective tariff,—a speech that must have caused the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) to entertain some misgivings as to his laurels and to ask himself seriously whether there was not some danger that he might be superseded as the chief denunciator of everything protective in this country. Set off against that we have the speech of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin), stating, as the policy which he advocated, his adherence to protection in its purest form. Everything that would tend in the slightest degree to develop the industries of the country—it mattered not whether it was a protective tariff or direct bonuses to industries which required that kind of encouragement—he defended. Then we have the speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) stating that the policy of the Liberal party on fiscal matters was to be found in the record of that party from the year 1896 to the year 1911, during which time, as I have already said, the Liberal party succeeded, under the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) as Minister of Finance, in reducing the customs duties on goods coming into Canada by 1½ per cent. Then again we have the speech of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon), once more breathing the pure principles of free trade. And I might go on citing the declarations of other hon. members. For instance, we saw the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), who I regret is not in his seat, treating us yesterday to an acrobatic performance, metaphorically speaking, in which he told us that when he went to the industrial city of Montreal and said there that he was in favour of a 25 per cent tariff, with an 8 per cent excise, bringing it to a level

[Mr. Nicholson.]

17 per cent, he was only using a figure of speech. The hon. member said that he might as well have said 40 per cent or 30 per cent or 10 per cent or any other figure. Well, Mr. Speaker, all I have to say with regard to that point is that if the hon. member wanted to be consistent with his own record as a supporter of the tariff policy of the party to which he adheres, he could have quoted any figure in the world and he could have taken any position whatever. He could have put any interpretation that he desired upon his own words and have been perfectly consistent, if his statement which I have just quoted means anything at all.

Am I stating the case unfairly, Mr. Speaker, when I say that if hon. gentlemen opposite have any policy on the tariff, if they have any policy at all on fiscal matters, their varying statements are a revelation of the time-honoured policy of being all things to all men, that by all means they may deceive some people? In the application of this remark I intend to include hon. members who follow the leadership of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and I make this statement for a definite reason. I agree fully with the statement of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) made to the electors of the county of Glengarry that so far as it relates to the fiscal policy of this country the platform of the Liberal party laid down at the convention of 1919 and the platform of the Canadian Council of Agriculture are identically the same. In my conclusion that the hon. members who follow the leadership of the hon. member for Marquette are in the same position as those hon. gentlemen who follow the recognized leader of the Opposition, I am fortified by the interpretations placed on these platforms by the advocates of the platforms themselves. It is unnecessary that I should cite further declarations of hon. members directly opposite to justify the statements I have made. I would ask hon. members to study the actions of the hon. member for Marquette. If we go out to Western Canada where the hon. member appears before an audience of grain growers, an audience of western farmers in the city of Saskatoon, for instance, or in the city of Regina, we find that hon. gentleman sadly exhausting his vocabulary in an effort to find language with which sufficiently to denounce everything savouring of a protective tariff, and doing so in a manner that must apparently intensely please his own heart. He is a Simon Pure free trader out there; everything in the nature of protective tariffs must be wiped out so long as the hon. member is addressing audiences of grain growers or farmers in Western Canada. But once in a while the hon. member does Eastern Canada the honour of paying it a visit. On his way across the country on one occasion he stopped off in the metropolitan city of Winnipeg, that beautiful city of the plains, where East meets West and West meets East, and where the people see something of the conditions of organized and established industry. There we find the hon. gentleman putting on the soft pedal. He deals with this question of protective tariffs in a more or less pianissimo fashion and is not so vigorous in his denunciations of protection. He says: "What we want to do is to relieve the western farmer of the burden that is imposed upon him by the tax on agricultural implements. We are not in favour of free trade; we know there must be a tariff; but we want a moderate tariff. We don't want to be severe in either direction." The hon. gentleman proceeds further East and comes before an industrial audience in the city of Toronto, and what do we find? Why, Sir, the rabid free trader of the West has utterly disappeared. My hon. friend says there: "I am not in favour of free trade. We are not advocating the abolition of customs duties; what we want is the gradual reduction of the duty, a lessening here and a lessening there; something that will relieve the situation just a little and reduce the cost of living." You know, Mr. Speaker, if you put a man with his back up against the wall in this country in this present day of unrest, and leave him nothing else to talk about, he can always fall back on the cost of living, and the cost of living means something to every one of us. That is the attitude of my hon. friend when speaking to an industrial audience in Toronto. He is not a free trader; no! He does not intend to abolish the tariff. No! Then we have the hon. gentleman's colleague, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) coming into this House and in one sentence denouncing everything in the nature of a protective tariff. He denounces anything and everything that might be regarded as a tariff in any form; and the tariff, he points out, is a system of bond slavery. Yet in the next breath the hon. gentleman says: We followed the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier during the fifteen years that he was in office, and we claim to be the official legatees of the fiscal policy in existence from 1896 to 1911. And under that fiscal policy, let me repeat, my hon. friend from Red Deer,—and I am sorry to see that he is not in his seat—acknowledges that the Liberal party reduced the tariff only one and one-half per cent in fifteen years. I do not think that after making these statements—and I challenge satisfactory contradiction of them—the House will say that I am unfair when I assert that if either group in the Opposition have any fiscal policy, that policy, as I stated a moment ago, is: "To be all things to all men, so that by any means we may be able to deceive the people."

But, Mr. Speaker, our fiscal policy is a serious thing, notwithstanding the liberties that those hon. gentlemen are prepared to take with it. For over forty years we have had a tariff under which the major portion of our Federal revenue has been raised, and by means of which necessary protection has been afforded to legitimate Canadian industry. As our nearest neighbour we have the greatest competitor in the world,—a country with a population twelve or thirteen times as great as our own, a country with almost unlimited wealth and natural resources, and with an economic and industrial system developed to the highest degree of competitive efficiency, and fostered and carried to the position that it has attained to-day under a tariff deliberately designed to absolutely exclude from their home market anything that enters into the nature of competition with established United States industries.

During the forty years, from 1879 down to the present time, that we have had our tariff, Canada has progressed in every element that tends towards national stability, national independence, and national greatness, until to-day, I submit, there is not a country under the sun that affords so great an opportunity as does Canada for the man who is willing to work. I do not say that that condition is the result of a protective tariff. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) or Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) or Brome (Mr. McMaster) might say that that condition was brought about in spite of a protective tariff. But I say, without the slightest fear of successful contradiction, that the only time in that forty-year period when there was doubt in this country as to our industrial future, when men were timid about investing money, when things came to an apparent standstill, was during that period in the early nineties when hon. gentlemen opposite and their predecessors went up and down this country proclaiming the doctrines of free trade, proclaiming that if they came into office they would bring into existence a tariff policy based o the British principle of absolute free trade. But when the right hon. the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into office in 1896, and my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) in 1897 brought down his Budget, and it was found that the professing free trader had become the practising protectionist, industry settled down, realizing that having been brought face to face with the responsibilities of office, these hon. gentlemen who had proclaimed from one end of the country to the other the doctrines of free trade, had at last realized the utter futility of their theory and had reached the conclusion that if Canada was to develop as she should Canadian industry must be protected.

And, Mr. Speaker, in the speech of my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) introducing his amendment we have ample evidence of the fact that nine years' release from the responsibilities of office have not changed his opinion, but that to-day he realizes the position that Canada is in, faced as she is with the undue and tremendous competition of her wealthy neighbour to the south, and that Canadian industry, if it is to continue to develop, must be protected by a protective tariff.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma), (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I had just stated that the fiscal policy of this country was a serious matter notwithstanding the liberties that hon. gentlemen opposite appeared to take with it: That for more than forty years we have had in Canada a tariff by means of which a major portion of the Federal revenue has been raised; that we have as our nearest neighbour a most intensive competitor, a country with a population twelve or thirteen times as great as that of Canada, with almost unlimited wealth and natural resources, and with an economic machine developed to the highest state of competitive efficiency—that development having been fostered and maintained by the most scientifically applied protective tariff that any country in the civilized world has ever had applied. I pointed out that during the period in which our present fiscal policy has been in existence Canada has continued to progress in every element that tended to develop national stability, national greatness and national independence. But, Mr. Speaker, we have now before us the united platform of the Liberal Convention of 1919 and of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, and I submit to you, Sir, and to the House, that the time has come when we are entitled to a clear cut definition of just what this united platform means, expressed in terms of its relation to specific commodities either produced in or imported into this country. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that there should be no mystery with regard to a matter of this kind. The commodities that are produced in and that are imported into, Canada are not of the indefinite character that they cannot be defined and it should not be a difficult matter, therefore, for hon. gentlemen who are interested in these things to say just exactly what they mean. I submit that if this united platform means what it says it means, it involves the elimination of all customs duties, the loss of all the revenue that it derives under the tariff as it at present exists, and the virtual adoption of free trade in this country. Perhaps I am wrong in my interpretation of the meaning of that united platform. If so I hope that the leader of the Opposition, or the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), when they speak in this debate will point out in what respect I am at fault. In order that they may be the better able to do so I am going to ask the liberty of reading a list of specific staple commodities that, after a consultation with experts, I conclude will come into this country free of duty under a tariff based on the platform of either the Liberal Convention of 1919, or of the Canadian Council of Agriculture as put before this House by the hon. member for Marquette and his followers. Mr. Speaker, the list is as follows:

Steam engines, stationary; steam boilers, stationary; steam engines and boilers, combined; traction engines, steam; locomotives; gas engines of all kinds; motors and motor trucks; boiler plates; rivets; cast hand hole covers and bridges; cast man hole covers and bridges; safety valves; gate valves; globe valves; water mountings for boilers, all kinds; cast and wrought iron pipes; cast and wrought iron couplings, elbows and flanges; T-reducers, bushes and flanges; injectors; steam gauges; steam whistles; copper, rubber and asbestos and vulcanized gaskets; washers and liners; blow-off valves; grate bars and hangers; wire netting of all kinds; boiler cleaning components of all kinds; feed water heaters; steam separators; steam pumps; water pipes; hydrants; rubber and canvas water hose and couplings; rubber steam hose; brass, copper and cast iron nozzles; oil cups; lubricators; governors for stationary engine; rubber, palmetto and metallic packing; sheet rubbers; sheet asbestos; asbestos fibre; magnesia packing; magnesia compound; flake and ground graphite; castings of all kinds; bolts and nuts, all sizes and kinds; studs; cap screws; screw nails; set screws; pillow blocks; flat boxes; shafting; couplings, plain and flanged; gears and pinions, all kinds; endless chain, wrought; enlless chain, malleable cast; endless chain, cast steel; sprocket wheels; cost iron pulleys, solid; cast iron pulleys, split; wrought iron and steel pulleys, solid and split; wood pulleys; frictions; clutch frictions and pulleys; rubber belting; leather belting; balata belting; belt lacing; belt glue; belt dressing; belt rivets; rope; tar band oakum and lath yarn; tar and pitch; lubricating oils; lubricating grease; compounds; red lead; resin; copper wire; copper plate; copper washers; oil cans of all kinds; wool waste; cotton waste; felt; bar iron; bar steel; flat iron; iron plate; flat steel; steel plates; planished iron; Canada plate; galvanizel iron, plain; corrugated roofing; iron rods; wire rods; wire nails, all kinds; cut nails; ship spikes; plain spikes; anvils; vices; hand drills; hand taps and dies; tongues; pincers; cold chisels; blacksmiths' hammers; hardies; sledges; drill hammers; drifts; strappers; horseshoeing hammers; horseshoeing pincers; clinch cutters; farrier knives; hoof parers; horse shoes; horse shoe caulks; horse shoe nails; callipers; dividers; carpenters' squares; spirit levels; hammers; planes, all kinds; brace and bitts; augurs, plain; augurs, ship; chisels; gauges; clamps; hand axes; adzes; rip saws; hand saws, cross cut; files and rasps, all kinds; saw setts; saw gauges; all miscellaneous blacksmith, mechanical and carpenters' tools; circular saws, all kinds; band saws, all kinds; automatic saw grinders; saw swedges; saw anvils; saw vices; saw trimmers; face plates; brazing forges; clamps; emery wheels; ground emery; emery paper; sand paper; grindstones; planers and matchers; surfacers; stickers; morticing machine; shiner heads and cutters; planer heads; planer knives; knife grinders, hand; knife grinders, power; re-saws and splitters; automatic, glue presses; glue; power fans; power drills; lathes; thread cutting machines, iron; thread cutting machines, pipe; pipe cutters; pipe vices; shaping machine; slot cutting machine; power presses; steam hammers; air lifts; air cylinders, compressors; self oiling bearings; babbit metals; air hoists; dynamos; motors; transformers; electric motors; conduits; wire, copper and iron; insulators; water meters; chain blocks; plain blocks for cable; plain blocks for rope; wire rope; steel cable; cable clamps and fasteners; chain of all kinds; chopping axes; broad axes; pickeroons; cross-cut saws; saw wedges; portable forges; peavies; pike poles; cant hooks; skidding tongues; loading blocks; barringer brakes; log loaders; snow ploughs; dump carts; wagons; sleighs; harness of all kinds; harness leather; leather of all kinds; harness rings and buckles; snaps and loops; whipple trees single and double; neck yokes; axe handles; peavy handles; cross-cut saw handles; steam hoists and hoisting; machinery; steam drills; drill steel; overhead carriers with cable and cable attachment; ore buckets; steel dump lorries; lorry wheels; lorry axes and boxes; steam cranes; hand power cranes; overhead travelling cranes, and parts thereof; structural steel; fire brick; fire clay; burned brick, all kinds; pressed brick; roofing tile; tile pipe; wall tile; lime; cement; plaster of paris; doors and door frames; windows and window frames; factory finished building material of all kinds; window and other glass; shingles, wood and metallic; furniture of all kinds; woollen goods; cotton goods; clothing; hats and caps; mitts and gloves; boots and shoes; blankets, wool, cotton and combination; hosiery; horse blankets; steel rails and fastenings; railways, box, flat, stock and dump cars; bituminous coal; wheel barrows; hand cars; velocipides; wheel scrapers; slush scrapers; picks, all kinds; mattocks, all kinds; shovels, all kinds; well points and pumps, hand; wind mills; silo stock; feed choppers and grinders; flour and feed mill machinery of all kinds; agricultural implements, all kinds including; ploughs, harrows, cultivators, seed-drills, mowers, reapers, loading machines, hay forks, hand rales, hoes, potatoe diggers, threshing machines and grain; separators; cream separators; churns, power and hand; cheese making machinery; butter making machinery; sewing machines; carpet sweepers; lamps, lamp burners and chimneys; lanterns; curry combs; food stuffs of all kinds including wheat, oats, corn, barley, rye, maize, buckwheat and all products thereof manufactured; vegetables of all kinds, fresh and cured; dried fruits and preserved fruits; canned goods of all kinds; preserved milk; milk powder; yeast cakes: hops; vinegar; pickles; catsup; ginger; pepper; salt; mustard and all preparations thereof; rice flour; potato flour; macaroni; vermicelli; beans, fresh and dried; peas, whole and split; tea, sugar, coffee and cocoa; chocolate; tobaccos of all kinds.

Admittedly, that is but a partial list of the staple commodities that would come into this country free of duty under a tariff based on the resolution of the Canadian Council of Agriculture and the tariff platform of the Liberal party as laid down in 1919, because there is not one single commodity in that list that does not come under the category of things necessary to life and implements or commodities necessary to production. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if it is in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, in the mind of either my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) or the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), that part of this list of articles is to come in duty free and that some other part is to bear a tariff tax, it is their duty to take the House and the country into their confidence and say just which is to come in free and which is to bear that tariff tax. Let me put it this way, Mr. Speaker. Should it happen by any chance that the aspirations of our friend the editor of the Toronto Globe would be achieved and there should come into power what he is pleased to term a King-Crerar Government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I note that my hon. friends behind the member for Marquette cheer vociferously at the thought of a King-Crerar Government. But let me repeat: Should it happen by any chance that that combination should form a government in this country, I submit that it is only fair that the leader of the Opposition, who would head that government, should say to this House and to the country just which particular class of business indicated in that list of staple commodities he intends to put out of business and which he intends to allow to continue to exist. Or let me put it in another way. Assuming that the aspirations of our friend Joseph E. Atkinson of the Toronto Star will be realized and that Liberals of the type of my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), and the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) are thrown into the discard and that the new line-up is to be based on a Crerar-King combination, will the chief executioner in that case say just where he intends to wield the axe and where it is his intention to have mercy? I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing mysterious in regard to this; every single one of the articles that I have mentioned are articles of everyday use, necessities of life, implements and commodities necessary to production, falling absolutely within the range of the resolution of the Canadian Council of Agriculture and the united platform of the two bodies.

But to pass from that aspect of the case, and assuming that hon. gentlemen are sincere when they say that they are going to implement this platform; that they are going to have virtual free trade in this country and that it will become necessary for us to adopt some other means of providing the country's revenues, let us for a moment look at the merits of the question of free trade versus a moderate tariff—because in the final analysis that is the issue that is before this House; that is the issue that is before this country; that is the issue that the Canadian people must settle before industry will settle down as it should settle down and before this country will go forward as it should go forward in the reconstruction period that we are all talking so much about.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Will he tell us what is his conception of a moderate tariff?

[Mr. G. B. Nicholson.]

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I will come to that in a moment; I anticipated that. I think I shall be able to satisfy my hon. friend that there is nothing at all drastic in my conception of a moderate tariff. But let me proceed. I want to make my own position clear before the House and the country. Looking at the matter from a purely selfish standpoint, if I could make myself believe that the theories of hon. gentlemen opposite, the theories preached to western grain growers by the member for Marquette and the theories preached to this House by the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), were practical theories and would work out as they profess to believe they would work out—on selfish grounds, I say, I would be compelled to be a free trader. Why do I say that? Because if their theories would work out as hon. gentlemen profess to believe they would, no business in this country would profit so much by their application as the business in which I am engaged. Let me repeat that there is no business in this country that would profit so much by what my hon. friends profess to believe would happen in the event of free trade coming into existence as the lumber business, because in connection with no other product put on the market in this country does the cost of machinery, implements of production and staple commodities bear so great a relation to the total cost of the product as lumber. In no other industry in this or any other country that I know anything about is the percentage of total cost of production represented to so great a degree by the cost of machinery, implements of production and staple commodities. But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that, as I say, on selfish grounds I would be compelled to be a free trader could I bring myself to believe that the theories preached would work out in practice, I am not a free trader. I do not believe that these theories would work out. What would happen is that the manufacturers of the commodities that I purchase in Canada would be forced out of business by the unfair competition of the combines and trusts in the United States and I would then be at the mercy of those combines and trusts, as Canada has been in every single instance where we have tried that out. Let me refer to one or two. Away back in 1896 or 1897 we took the duty off coal-oil and we turned the whole trade of Canada over to the Standard Oil Company, and from that day to this the price of coal-oil has constantly been sky-rocketing. We tried the same thing in connection with binder twine, and the same thing applies; every manufacturing industry in Canada that was manufacturing binder twine, with the possible exception of one, was driven out of business. Barbed wire has been taking the same route. Every single Canadian manufacturer of barbed wire has had his factory doors closed, and in the past five years the price of barbed wire has increased to a greater degree than that of any other commodity that I can think of. Let me give one illustration. The price of binders and agricultural implements generally has increased by about 100 per cent in conformity with the general increase in the price of commodities of that character; while the price of barbed wire has increased 300 per cent, because it is controlled absolutely by the United States Trust.

Let me now turn to another aspect of this question of the tariff. Our free trade friends say that the tariff is responsible for the high cost of living, the general unrest and all other ills, imaginary and real, from which we seem to be suffering during the aftermath of the war. Let us examine that briefly, and in order to do so, let us consider the condition of things in the United Kingdom, or free-trade England, as our hon friends opposite are pleased to term it. Will any hon. member say seriously that he believes the cost of living is less in the United Kingdom than it is in Canada, or that there is less unrest in the United Kingdom than there is in Canada? Why, Mr. Speaker, the cost of living in Canada, or the unrest in Canada, is a mere bagatelle in comparison with what it is in every European country, the United Kingdom included. As regards the United States, the most self-contained country in the world, a country that provides practically everything its people require, is the cost of living or the general unrest in the United States any less than it is in Canada? If we consider what has happened in the steel strike, the coal strike and the recent railway strike, every hon. member who is honest with himself and who has examined the situation, knows that the unrest in Canada is less than it is in the country to the south of us. But let us come right home and see what the effect of free trade has been on the cost of living in Canada. There is no duty on wheat; wheat can be imported into this country absolutely free of duty. Can the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) or the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), if he were in his seat, or the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), point to any other staple commodity the price of which has advanced to as great a degree as it has in the case of wheat on which there is no duty, and wheat bears the same relation to the cost of living that gold does to the value of the notes that we have in circulation?

Mr. McMASTER: Is the hon. member not aware that as Canada has a large exportable surplus of wheat, the tariff never can and never has had anything to do with the price of wheat in Canada?

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): I accept absolutely my hon. friend's statement and as the quantity of the general commodities produced throughout the world and particularly in the United States is so much greater than the quantity of the same commodities produced in Canada, the quantity of commodities produced in Canada has very little to do with the high cost of living generally. But let us take meats, butter, milk, vegetables, all of those things which are produced in Canada and upon which we pay no duty, the things that enter into the cost of living. The cost of these commodities to the consumer is regulated by the cost to the producer, and to take specific articles, the price paid to the farmer regulates the price paid to the consumer, notwithstanding the fantastic imagery of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), who undertook to trace that illustrious egg from its nest away back in the farmer's barnyard on to his kitchen table. But my free trader friends will say: Here is where we have you up a tree; you just take off the tariff, and you will see the cost of production coming down so fast that you will not be able to change your money into small coin fast enough to keep pace with the decline. Just let us examine that statement from the free trader's standpoint. Will taking off the duty on implements of production, for instance, mean a reduction in production costs as my hon. friends contend it will? We shall call, as our first witness in this case, not a producer, not an advocate of high or low or moderate tariff, but an out-and-out free trader in the person of the present Premier of Ontario, the Hon. E. C. Drury, who came before a committee of this House as the accredited representative of the United Farmers of Ontario and gave evidence under oath as to the cost of producing foodstuffs in this country. Mr. Drury did not come at the request of the Parliamentary committee; he was sent by the United Farmers of Ontario as their expert witness. After going over the whole question in detail, pointing out just the effect that one item had on another, and assuming, for the sake of argument, that the Canadian manufacturer added the full amount of the tariff plus the cost of production and a reasonable profit to his sale price, the Hon. Mr. Drury stated under oath that the effect of the tariff on implements of production would mean an increase of four-fifths of one per cent in the cost of producing foodstuffs on Ontario farms. Mr. Drury further pointed out to that Parliamentary committee that, if you took clothing, boots and shoes, cooking utensils, every article that comes into daily use in an average Ontario household, and again assuming that the Canadian producer or manufacturer as the case may be, added the full amount of the tariff, plus the cost of production and a reasonable profit, the gross effect of that on the cost of producing foodstuffs on an Ontario farm would be 2½ per cent. If hon. gentlemen want to look that matter up for themselves, they will find it on pages 197 and 198 of the evidence taken before the Cost of Living Committee just about one year ago.

Let us carry this a step further. There also came before that committee a representative of the Saskatchewan Grain Growers, in the person of Mr. Hugh Thompson, and again under oath that gentleman gave the Parliamentary Committee figures to show that, again assuming that the Canadian manufacturer added the full amount of duty plus the cost of production and a reasonable profit to the sale price, the effect of that on the production of wheat in the province of Saskatchewan would be, on the basis of a ten-year period of depreciation, .9 of 1 per cent, and if you base your calculation on a five-year period of depreciation, the effect would be 1.8 per cent. On the basis of the prices prevailing in 1919, the cost per bushel would be about .2 or .3 of one per cent. I need not say that no hon. member will contend for a moment that the assumption on which these figures are based bears any relation to what actually takes place. No hon. member will contend that the producer of any class of goods in this country adds the full amount of the tariff to the cost of production, plus a reasonable profit. Every man who knows anything about business and who buys these commodities—and I think I buy as many of them as the average man—knows that competition regulates the price of every single one of these articles in this country.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) asked me what my interpretation of a moderate tariff was. In the first place, I am not, and never have been, a high tariff man. I am not supporting a high tariff to-day. There has been in existence in this country during the past year the lowest tariff that Canada has had for forty years, and there is coming into existence under the Budget that has just been brought down a still lower tariff—a tariff 3½ to 4 per cent lower than the tariff in existence during the whole period from 1896 to 1911, a tariff between 3 and 4 per cent lower than would have come into existence under the reciprocity agreement negotiated by my hon. friend the member for Shelburne and Queen's. I say this with regard to my position on the tariff: I believe we must have a tariff for revenue. I believe we must have a tariff just high enough, and no higher than is sufficient to protect legitimate Canadian industry against unfair competition and dumping by the highly specialized combines in the United States and Germany and against the cheap labour of Asia and South Africa. I say further, if I had the privilege of being a member of this House when any Government brought in a tariff that bore any relation to what economists would call a high tariff, I would vote against it. Let me go a step further. I agree absolutely with the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin) that what this country needs above all other things is the development of all our natural resources. What this country needs is stability in industry, and the development of her natural resources, and if I may be permitted to digress for a moment I should like to refer particularly to one natural resource, namely, iron. Beginning in 1904—I speak subject to correction as to the date—we began a system of business on iron and steel, and by the payment of a comparatively small sum of money in relation to the value of the industry established we brought into existence the iron and steel industry in this country. That meant that when we came face to face with the war period, we were in a position not only to furnish munitions for our own army, the Mother Country and our Allies, but also to weather the industrial storm that would otherwise have broken over this country and which would have made it exceedingly difficult for us to do our part in the war. By the application of a similar policy to the great iron beds in Northern Quebec and Northern Ontario, I claim that we would bring into existence in this country a pig-iron industry that would furnish raw material for every blast furnace in Canada and produce a large exportable surplus that would help to pay our national obligations.

Reverting for one moment to the effect of free trade on the cost of living, free traders are wont continually to refer to free trade England, so I may be pardoned if I make a reference to what is actually taking place and has taken place in free trade England. During the months, I think, of August, September and October, 1919, the British Government paid out over $6,000,000 a week in unemployment gratuities, while at the same time the United States Steel Corporation sold under the very nose of the British manufacturers to British buyers 100,000 tons of steel rails at prices $12.50 to $15 more than steel rails were being sold for in the United States and Canada. Let me give one other illustration. During the same year, 1919, the British Government paid in bonuses or bounties to British millers or purchasers of wheat $360,000,000 in an effort to bring down the cost of living. Let us see how successful they have been. I have here a despatch to The Toronto Globe from England dated May 20, 1920, wherein I find the following statement "The High Cost of Living Baffles Labour Leaders." The article goes on to say:

> The Labour party is calling another conference to study the question of prices, and a new campaign against profiteering is promised. The Governmental machinery erected to stop profiteering was a lamentable failure, and little hope is expressed that any fresh legislation will be more successful in "squaring the vicious circle."
>
> It is said that the Labour leaders who have been going into details of a plan for forcing down prices during the last few days have been forced to admit that the problem is a much more difficult one than they had expected, and their hopes of grappling with it successfully are marred by the fact that the trade unions generally are now starting a fresh series of wage demands, which will make the position worse than ever.
>
> Not long ago the Labour leaders had a cut-and-dried scheme for dealing with high prices, but they are now forced to admit that this stands in need of modification, in the light of fresh facts that have come under their notice.

May I now refer for a moment to what is being done by free trade England to protect her industries. I have here a clipping from a newspaper, of which unfortunately I neglected to note the name and date, but I give the House my word that the quotation is just exactly as I clipped it from a despatch from England:

> Under regulations at present in force the Government takes the power to exclude articles from foreign countries, wherever their price is shown to be lower than that of the home product. All the British producer has to do to secure protection absolute for his product is to raise the price of his goods a little higher than his foreign competitor, when the Government steps in and prohibits the importation of the article desired to be excluded.

That is one of the methods followed by free trade England to protect her industries.

I want to refer to one or two other matters that seem to me to be of vital importance to this country at the present moment. We hear a great deal about unrest throughout this country and a great deal about the high cost of living and all that sort of thing. My judgment, as I stated in the House last year, is that hon. members of this House and men in public and business life in this country are very largely responsible for some of the unrest that now prevails. Statements are made without any apparent appreciation of the effect they will have on the public mind, simply for the purpose, apparently, of gaining some political advantage. Let me give one illustration. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee), who I regret is not now in his place, speaking in this House yesterday, in the absence of logic with which to reinforce the argument he was endeavouring to make, and in an apparent effort to draw some applause from the hon. gentlemen sitting around him, took his customary fling at the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). Now I hold no brief for the hon. member for Brantford. He is perfectly able to take care of himself, but I say this, and I believe that if the hon. member for Lambton was brought face to face with his subject he would admit I am right, that the hon. member for Brantford is just as decent, just as honest, and just as ready to play the game, as the hon. member for Lambton. There is one other hon. member of this House to whom I wish to refer and I regret that he is not now in his place. I am speaking of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the position in which that hon. gentleman finds himself to-day is the most wholly indefensible—I use that word with no unkind implication—of that of any public man in the history of this country with whom it has ever been—I was just about to say my privilege, but I am afraid I cannot use that word—with whom, let me say instead, it has been my misfortune to come in contact. Knowing the hon. member for Marquette as I do, and knowing his kindness of heart, I cannot understand how he has allowed himself to take the position which he has taken from one end of the country to the other with regard to men who are engaged in practically identical business with his own. The hon. member is the head of the largest commercial organization in this country, the greatest combine that has ever been brought into existence in Canada, without a single exception. When the United States courts undertook to unscramble what they termed the omelette of the United States meat packers they had a child's job compared to what any one would have if he undertook to unscramble the omelette of the combine brought into existence by my hon. friend from Marquette and his associates. I do not wish to be misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. Those gentlemen had a legitimate right to bring this organization into existence, and so far as I am able to learn, they are conducting their affairs on sound and strictly business principles. No one therefore has any right to find fault with them. But let us consider the situation. Here is the head of this great commercial organization doing business which, according to the sworn statement of the secretary or general manager of the company—I forget which—made before a committee of this House, amounted to almost $200,000,000 in one year, and doing it at a profit that makes profits of the Dominion Textile Company or the Patent Manufacturing Company look like the proverbial two cents. Yet the head of this organization and his associates can go up and down the country denouncing other business men who are endeavouring to build up industries of a like character in this country and describing them as grafters, profiteers, and men who altogether are exercising an utterly immoral influence not only on the business but on the political life of the country. I repeat, Sir, that the position of the hon. member and his associates is absolutely indefensible, and is the most unfortunate position which I have ever witnessed on the part of any group of business men in this country. No one has any reason to question the right of these gentlemen to do what they are doing in a business way; neither have they the right, Mr. Speaker, to cast aspersions on other business men who are conducting their business with equal honesty and integrity and are making an honest effort to be of service to their country. Hon. members who sit behind the hon. member for Marquette are wont to refer to the milling industries, to Ogilvie's, the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, the Western Canada Flour Mills Company, the Maple Leaf Milling Company, and all these organizations as grafters on the body politic and parasites that are eating out the vitals of the Canadian people. But what do we find? The four largest milling companies of Canada conducted their business in the year, 1918, on a margin of profit of less than 11 cents per barrel of flour, while the commercial organization with which my hon. friends are connected handled a very large part of that flour and took as their profit 85 to 90 cents a barrel. One might go through the whole range of commodities, Mr. Speaker. Sir Joseph Flavelle has been held up to this House by hon. members as the embodiment of everything that is iniquitous.

Mr. CANNON: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): My hon. friend says "Hear, hear." Well, the business with which Sir Joseph Flavelle is associated conducted its operations in 1919 on a margin of seven-tenths of one per cent; and the commercial organization with which my hon. friends are associated handled a lot of these products and did it on a margin of 11 per cent. Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I am finding no fault with these hon. gentlemen. They are conducting a legitimate business. They have developed their business along sound economic lines and they deserve all credit for the manner in which they carry on their affairs. But let me also emphasize again the fact that they have no right to travel up and down the country casting aspersions on other business men who are endeavouring to do business along exactly the same lines.

Now, I want to refer to one other matter. Something has been said from time to time in this debate with regard to by-elections that have taken place in this country, and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who I am sorry is not here, said that he rejoiced in the development of the spirit that resulted in the return of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. McDonald) as an evidence of what was taking place in the country. Well, let me say that when my hon. friend's leader, the member for Marquette, entrusted the campaign in Timiskaming to Mrs. Rose Henderson, of Montreal he took good care to see that even his apparent desire to stir up class prejudice in this country would not be frustrated. Any one who went through the Timiskaming campaign and knew anything about it, and also knew something of the ideals that were put before the people of the district of Timiskaming, will believe with me that the hon. member for Red Deer, if he values at all highly the ideals which he frequently expresses in this House, was not aware of what took place in that district when he made the statement that he rejoiced in the development of the spirit manifested in the return of the hon. member for Timiskaming. I say this, Mr. Speaker, and I say it without the slightest fear of satisfactory contradiction, and with due regard for my responsibility as a member of this Parliament, that hon. gentlemen opposite went the length of associating themselves with an organization, the professed object of which is to destroy even this institution itself and all other forms of organized governments in this and other countries.

Mr. CANNON: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do I hear some hon. member say, "Hear, hear?"

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, I state my position in regard to that question very emphatically and I have nothing to take back, and before I sit down I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that my position is absolutely correct. I say that hon. gentlemen entrusted the conduct of the campaign to Mistress Rose Henderson, of Montreal. Now, who is Mistress Rose Henderson?

Mr. McMASTER: A very estimable lady.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He is not much of a judge.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): Does my hon. friend agree with the ideals that Mistress Henderson preaches?

Mr. McMASTER: Not with all of them. Nevertheless she is a most estimable lady.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. NICHOLSON (Algoma): In 1919, Mr. Speaker, a definite, well-planned and carefully worked out scheme was put into operation in the city of Winnipeg to destroy civil government in that city and in the province of Manitoba as a preliminary to destroying civil government all over this country. During that period Mistress Rose Henderson directed to the leader of the movement in the city of Winnipeg a letter couched in these terms:

I am enclosing herewith a copy of the constitution of Soviets approved by Lenine and Trotsky. You can trust me implicitly, because you know that I was an advanced Socialist before I became a Bolshevist.

That was the ideal that Mrs. Rose Henderson held out before the people of the district of Timiskaming, and it was the organization known in this country as the One Big Union, whose principles she espouses, which supported the candidature of the hon. member for Timiskaming. I know that he is not a member of the One Big Union, and I say here again, with, I think, a full appreciation of my responsibility as a member of this House, that I do not believe the hon. member for Timiskaming himself appreciated the kind of campaign that was carried on to return him to this House. That is my opinion with regard to the hon. member. But I say that the One Big Union was the organization behind the campaign that elected him to this House, and that the ideals of that Union were preached in every mining camp in that constituency. And let me repeat, now that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is in his seat, that when the time comes that hon. members professing the ideals of the hon. member for Marquette and his associates find it necessary to make use of the One Big Union in order to propagate their campaign of class hatred in this country, they have reached a fairly desperate condition.

In order that the House may know something about the ideals of the One Big Union—because I believe it is my duty to put this information before the House and the country—let me read the declaration of the chief organizer of the One Big Union, Mr. Fred G. Biedenkapp. I want the House to note the name B-i-e-d-e-n-k-a-p-p. The statement I am about to read is taken from the Chicago Times and is as follows:

Fred G. Biedenkapp, General Organizer of the One Big Union, says the true communist and labour leader rejoices more over one unsuccessful strike than over ten strikes that succeed. What the O.B.U., and smaller organizations aim to create is not asking better working conditions for the average man but worse conditions. The workingman, or organization of workingmen, who strikes for higher wages and gets them, or for better working conditions and fewer hours of labour, and gets them, is not the material from which revolutionists are made. He is likely to be contented and take a conservative so-called sane view of a world in which the conditions have been easier and better for him. On the other hand, the striker, or group of strikers, who fails, are likely to be more embittered against the employers, the whole employing class and society generally and after repeated failures of this kind they will come to the conclusion that striking and voting are alike useless to improve the workingmen's lot, and they will listen to the Red who talks intelligently of direct action and the overthrow of society and forms of Government as at present constituted. We have already two million workers, members of the O.B.U., and our numbers continue to grow as one unsuccessful strike follows another. Therefore, we, of the new vision, encourage strikes not because we desire to better the workingman's conditions but in order that they may fail—

Let me say right here, Mr. Speaker, that every regularly constituted body of organized labour in this country knows that the aim of the One Big Union is not to better the conditions of the workingmen; its aim is to destroy organized labour. Why? Because the men directing the One Big Union know that they cannot destroy organized society and organized forms of government as we now have them so long as legitimate organized labour continues to exist. I will go one step further, because I want to make my position absolutely clear. I assert that the One Big Union, whose principles I have just read, was the organization behind the election of the hon. member for Timiskaming, who sits behind the hon. member for Marquette, and who is one of the latter's loyal supporters in this House.

The headquarters of the Independent Labour party in the town of Cobalt are in the One Big Union hall, because the organization of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers has absolutely ceased to exist as an organized entity in the town of Cobalt, or in any other mining town in Northern Ontario, except one small branch in South Porcupine. As I say, the headquarters of the Independent Labour party, associated with the United Farmers of Ontario, are in the One Big Union hall. At the present time a suit is pending in the Ontario courts for possession of that particular property. The parties to that suit are, on the one hand, H. J. Everett, an officer of the Independent Labour party, and, on the other hand, an executive officer of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, Patrick James Redmond, and Charles H. Moyer, the president of the union. Why is that suit pending? Because an effort has been made to take the physical property of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers and to transfer it to the One Big Union organization, brought into this country to destroy legitimate organized labour. And let me repeat, that when hon. members find it necessary in their efforts to create class prejudice in this country to use an organization such as the One Big Union, in my opinion they have gone to pretty desperate lengths.

A few nights ago the hon. member for Red Deer said that 60,000 sons of Canada were sleeping in France and Flanders, and that they had died to release Canada from economic bondage. I know perfectly well that 60,000 of our sons are sleeping in France and Flanders, and that undoubtedly they died to save Canada.

But if my hon. friend from Red Deer were in the House to-night I would like to ask him this Question: Does he think that when his gallant boy stood beside my boy in the trenches in France and Flanders holding back the German line in those awful hours in 1918 when his heart strings and my heart strings were strained to the breaking point in the anxiety that the German forces would break through to the channel ports or take Paris, does he think that those boys had before their eyes the ideals of class prejudice and suspicion that he and his colleagues are preaching up and down the length of this country to-day? Mr. Speaker, if all the sacrifices of that awful war is for no other purpose than to bring about the condition suggested then I say that it is in the Providence of God, that those boys were taken to their rest before they were forced to live to see the awful futility of all that sacrifice. I say this further, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen may say what they will, they may preach their doctrine as long as they wish, but here is one man that will fight the hydraheaded monster of class prejudice and Bolshevism as long as the breath remains in his body.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, before I begin the few remarks I wish to utter to-night I think it would be appropriate for a moment or two to join issue with my hon. friend (Mr. Nicholson, Algoma), who has just resumed his seat with respect to certain assertions which he made. The hon. gentleman has informed us that he sees in the near future a lowering of the tariff to a greater extent than has taken place previously in the last forty years. Well, Mr. Speaker, like St. Thomas of old, I will wait and see before I accept the hon. gentleman's prediction in that regard.

The hon. gentleman has stated that the Grain Growers' Association is an organization that has been formed for the purpose of protecting its own interests. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that other associations are taking just as active a part in public affairs as the one to which he has alluded, the efforts of which may help to counterbalance whatever effects the hon. gentleman fears the Grain Growers' Association may produce. I refer particularly to an association to which reference was made in the Montreal Gazette of 13th May last, as follows:

> Million Dollar Fund for C.M.A.
> Time to slam back at interests unfriendly to manufacturers.

So it would seem that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is trying at the present time to raise a fund in order to protect its own interests against those of the rest of the community. Further, if we look at the end of the report to which the headings I have quoted relate we will see who are the members of the Manufacturers' Association. We shall see in that list some gentlemen who are the greatest supporters of the present Government and their policy. We see, for instance, Colonel Grant Morden, Sir James McKechnie, J. W. Norcross, W. F. Foster, B. W. Coughlin, Lieutenant-Colonel Sadler, and E. Bristol, M.P. In view of these facts I would ask my hon. friend whether the Government are likely to reduce the tariff to a greater extent than has been witnessed in the past when the association referred to is prepared to spend an enormous sum of money for organization purposes.

Another point to which the hon. gentleman alluded was that of the One Big Union. I do not know much of that body and what we hear of it has come to our notice recently, but if it is spoken of as likely to develop socialism in this country, let me tell the hon. gentleman that the policy of the Government is developing another kind of socialism in the shape of the nationalization of all the railways in Canada that they can lay their hands on.

My hon. friend stated that in the years which preceded the advent of the Liberal party to power in 1896 they advocated a policy of free trade, and that as a consequence there was great unrest in the country. The hon. gentleman stated that for forty years previous to that time there had been great progress in industry and in manufactures in Canada and that this was due to the National Policy adopted in 1878. As to that, one thing I can certainly affirm. It is that if industrial development in Canada failed to keep pace with the times it was not due to any policy propounded by the Liberal party, but was due—and nobody can deny it—to the bad administration of the Conservative Government which preceded the advent of the Liberal party to power in 1896. So much dissatisfaction was there with that administration that the lower tariff policy propounded by the Liberals carried the country in 1896 by a great majority.

My hon. friend has asserted that when the Liberals came into power they made but a slight tariff reduction, and that in the course of fifteen years the reductions only amounted to one and a half per cent. Well, to reduce the tariff at all was a step in the right direction. But the public must have been satisfied with what was done along that line, because when the Liberal Government proposed to go further in 1911, who asked them to move slowly and not go too fast? Who raised the slogan at that time throughout the country, "Let well enough alone?" It was the party of hon. gentlemen opposite.

My hon. friend also says that the policy of the Liberal party on the tariff issue has been one of vote catching and deception. That, Mr. Speaker, has not been the policy of the Liberal party in the years that have passed. Our record is exposed to view for all to see. It is a splendid record and one of which the Liberal party may well be proud. I can assure my hon. friend that if there was a policy of vote catching and deception adopted by anybody it was adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite. It was, to a large extent, by means of such a policy that they carried the country in 1911. The same policy was followed by them in 1917, and as a result they are in office today. What did they do in 1911? In the province of Ontario they raised the cry that the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier was too much of a Roman Catholic and a Frenchman, whereas in the province of Quebec they went round saying he was too much of an Imperialist. At that time also the Conservatives made an alliance with the Nationalists; they preached a certain policy in Quebec, and they advocated an entirely different policy in Ontario. Was not that in very truth a policy of vote catching and deception?

I wish now to make a few remarks with regard to the subject particularly under discussion, the Budget.

When the Minister of Finance presented his Budget to the House the other day he looked to me like a person who was very much worried; as a man would look who had taken charge of a beautiful estate that had just been ransacked by robbers or struck by a tornado. A frenzied and feverish attempt is made to tax every possible source of wealth in a supreme effort to make both ends meet and to repair the damages made by the storm. The Budget, Mr. Speaker, when we look at it, seems to me to be something conceived on the impulse of the moment, not thoroughly thought out as to detail, its practicability, or its ultimate effect. The Budget is open to serious objection; in many ways it will increase the cost of living at a time when every person should be trying to reduce it. There is one thing that the Government seems to forget: that the struggle to obtain an adequate share of the necessities of life, even in this country, is becoming, in the case of a vast number of people, a tragedy more than anything else; and it seems to me that the new taxation will increase the struggle rather than diminish it. The Government seem to have taken as their maxim: "We will tax luxuries in order to check extravagance." That might be a laudable object except for the fact that the only authority the Government have for imposing taxation at all requires them to assess the burden equally upon the whole body of taxpayers and for the exclusive purpose of raising the necessary revenue to carry on the country's affairs. The people, I believe, will resent keenly their being taxed into submission to whatever the party in office thinks they should do or should buy, or can afford to pay, and so on.

There are anomalies in the Budget. A suit of clothes is taxed at the rate of 10 per cent if it costs $45 or over. Well, I would ask any hon. gentleman if to-day any person can get a decent suit of clothes for $45? It is in very many instances good policy and economy to buy the best clothes, for they last longer. But in view of the new taxation proposals, how many people will be able to afford to do that? Not many. The same thing applies to shoes and other articles which everybody must buy, which nobody can do without. As was said last night by the member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) the tax on patent medicine is one which will surely bear heavily on the great masses of the people, because they rely upon these medicines, having not the means to consult a physician or doctor. I am afraid that in many instances the people will have to do without these medicines. Mr. Speaker, calling a tax "luxury tax" and applying it to staple articles of everyday necessity on the basis of certain prices —the lowest prices at which such articles, of fair quality, can be bought—is simply a bit of camouflage. That is what is involved in this feature of the Budget proposals.

There are other anomalies, Mr. Speaker, in the taxation proposals of the Finance Minister. For instance, pianos, which are purchased chiefly by rich people, are taxed at 10 per cent, while phonographs, which are commonly used by people of smaller means, are subjected to a tax twice as large. Different opinions have been expressed as to the probable result of the new taxation. The majority of people see in it great disadvantage, increase of cost in operation and a source of trouble to all traders. The method of collecting the taxes on retail transactions is objectionable. It makes the retail merchant an involuntary tax collector and adds to the cost of carrying on his business. It leaves the door open to unscrupulous dealers to ignore the tax or to decline to collect it and make dishonest returns, and it also invites certain non-bona fide dealers to sell at supposedly reduced prices articles of inferior quality, —and in the end it will be the consumer who will once more have to pay and bear the burden.

According to the Minister of Finance, our own income tax has not been well applied; the machinery for its collection is imperfect. Well, I submit with all due respect that the Minister of Finance should have perfected the machinery for collecting the income tax and should have tried to collect as much under it as possible without resorting to the great majority of the taxes which he has put on to-day and which certainly will bear heavily on the people.

While speaking of income tax, I should like to direct the attention of the minister and of the House generally to another feature of the matter. Why not have the income tax returns made public? Everybody in this country knows what any citizen pays to the municipality, to the school commission, to other public institutions, for taxes; why not make the same thing apply to federal income taxation? Why not make it public that Mr. So-and-so pays $200, $300, $1,000 or $2,000 by way of income tax, in order that the people may know who have made the big money and who ought to be made to pay more?

The country is facing very serious conditions to-day. Canada, like many other countries, is suffering from the effects of post-bellum conditions, although not so acutely as some other countries. In Canada, as in other places—in some instances I would say that the condition is worse in Canada than elsewhere—there has been developing a certain disease which we may call acute profiteering. The amount of wealth in this country has not, I am sure, increased very much during the last decade, but the number of millionaires, Mr. Speaker, as you well know, has increased immensely. The unrest throughout Canada is more pronounced on account of the increased number of millionaires and the amount of wealth that has been concentrated in the hands of few, while other people who are not making enough to support themselves find the conditions of living absolutely hard to bear.

Among the new taxes brought down by the Minister of Finance I would like to have seen a tax on land values. Everybody will admit that during the war vacant lands escaped taxation much more than anything else. By the taxing of vacant lands, the country would secure a large income and, in my opinion, the cost of living would be reduced by more adequate facilities being given for building houses, thus relieving housing conditions in different parts of Canada.

I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the question of earned and unearned incomes. The income tax, as it stands at present, ought to be modified in such a way that an income, based on sound securities such as real estate, from which the owner will derive great benefit all his life and from which the people who come after him will have an opportunity of being able to live without working, ought to be taxed much higher than an income such as that of a professional man, an industrial expert, an engineer, or any other salaried individual, because that income ceases with the death of the one who earns it; and on account of having to pay the enormous taxes that at present fall on such incomes, a man of this class runs the risk of having no capital at all at the time of his death. The man who has a steady income derived from bonds and real estate and who will be able to leave that real estate and those securities to the people who come after him ought to be taxed twice as much as the salaried man. In England, this is done, and it would be well for the Minister of Finance to bear this in mind, and when we get into committee on the resolution, I hope this suggestion will be adopted as part of the legislation.

The Minister of Finance has seen fit to retain for another year the excess business profits tax. I do not agree with him in that regard. He cited a number of reasons why this tax should be abolished, and yet he has retained it. The excess business profits tax has given as much as we can expect from it, because people have got on to it and companies have devised ways and means of hiding their income by expending it in many ways such as advertising or different kinds of improvements, thus making it, in certain cases, impossible for the Government to reach the big institution which make such huge profits.

I desire to take objection to the removal of the tax of 15 per cent on films which are exhibited in moving picture houses. Like most hon. members, I am an amateur at moving picture shows; but I contend that this tax should have been retained for this year, and there is no good reason for its removal. The Minister of Finance gave as a reason for the removal of this tax the statement that it was bearing heavily upon some small institutions, making them pay about 6 or 7 per cent of their receipts, whereas big moving picture houses were paying one or two per cent. I have nothing to say against moving picture houses; but I have not yet seen, in any of these theatres, any picture shown that did not in a certain way reflect on morality or come very near to immorality. In many cases, a picture invites luxurious habits and extravagance in expenditure, and this Budget is especially devised to prevent luxury and extravagant expenditure, to curb all these evils. Another point I want to make against these moving picture institutions is that they are responsible, in Montreal, Quebec and other large cities for a great deal of evil that is being committed. In many cases a moving picture show is a common rendezvous for a certain class of people who want to hide themselves. The other day a Montreal judge told me that he had to pass upon a case of separation, and what happened? The beginning of the case was in a moving picture house. The pictures that are exhibited are suggestive, and in some cases they lead to very bad results. They are an invitation to the people of the poorer classes to revolt, and they bring disorder in the country. Thank God, there is not a moving picture show in any town or village in my constituency, and I hope there will not be any for a long time.

I should like to make a few remarks in regard to the tariff, to which a number of hon. gentlemen have referred in this debate. For a long time every person who bestows any thought on our national life has been of the opinion that a change ought to be made in the tariff. Although the Minister of Finance has given us a promise and a declaration of principle as to the commission that is to investigate what the future tariff should be, I am sorry to say that I cannot put much stock in what he has said to us; and for this reason. Last year, for instance, we had a similar promise and nothing has thus far been done in the matter. I am afraid, with the big million-dollar organization of which I spoke at the beginning of my remarks, the Government will have a very hard time to convince its friends, the manufacturers, to make any reduction at all. The tariff is a pressing question in all parts of Canada. It is a question that the Government cannot put aside much longer, because if it is put aside by any party in power and that party refuses to deal with it, I am afraid that in the near future that party itself will be put aside. As regards the commission that is to investigate the different circumstances which might lead to new conditions when the tariff is revised, I have this suggestion to offer. It is all very well to have commissions go throughout the country and take opinions from different classes of the community as to what ought to be done and what ought not to be done. This has been done in the past, but I am afraid, with the different kinds of organizations and class movements there are to-day in this country, politics might creep into the affairs of this commission, and the good results which one would expect of such a commission might not be brought about. I would suggest that in years to come the best thing to do would be this. The Minister of Finance, whoever he may be in the future, would be surrounded by an advisory board, say of seven or nine persons, one of whom would be a manufacturer, another a farmer, another an economist and the others representative of the different classes of the community, who would, year in and year out, study the economic policies of the different countries of the world and who would at the proper time give the minister suggestions which they thought it proper for him to follow. Then, if the minister was a sound business man, like the present Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), or the hon. gentleman who preceded him (Sir Thomas White), or the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding), who held the position of Minister of Finance in the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, this minister would be able to make good use of the information collected from different sources and would be able to give to Canada a progressive administration and a good tariff which would tend towards building up this country. In that event, we would not have, as we have to-day, a Budget that might be hurting certain individuals without striking at those who ought to pay more.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

The Minister of Finance stated that we ought to economise; that we ought to curtail expenditures on public works and to assist him in adjusting the finances of Canada. I am heartily in accord with what the minister has said, but I have this to point out to him. He should begin by himself setting an example to the people of this country. I would say to him as others who have preceded me, have said: Stop nationalizing the railways of this country; stop building a merchant marine; stop building a militia force and a navy in Canada; stop building the Hudson Bay railway and the Welland canal; stop expending money on the parliamentary secretaries we have to-day who do not do much work; stop the expenditure on the Board of Commerce, which has given us no results. I am astonished to find in the Estimates this year that it is proposed to vote the sum of $324,000 for the maintenance and operation of the Board of Commerce, and $26,000 for salaries. This is for the work the Board of Commerce is supposed to have done last year. Ever since this session began I have been asking for a statement of the investigations and prosecutions made by the Board of Commerce, but I have not yet received any statement. Ministers have told me that the statement would be forthcoming later, but no statement has come yet. As one hon. gentleman said yesterday, the only official statement we have had in connection with the board is that Judge Robson has resigned.

With respect to the Board of Commerce I might say that it was created last year in a very hurried manner to curb profiteering and reduce the high cost of living, but it seems to have achieved nothing along that line. Have we seen any really serious action brought by the board to make traders comply with the law? What has been done in that respect in other countries? I was reading a newspaper the other day which gives an account of what has been done in Paris. This is what it said:

French Profiteers Get Just Deserts.

Paris, March 13.—A few of the many profiteers are meeting their deserts. The manager for a wholesale dealer in butter and eggs was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and to pay a fine of 1,000 francs ($200 normally). He had sold eggs for 715 and 710 francs a thousand instead of at the normal price, 695 francs. The wholesale dealer was fined 2,000 francs for complicity.

Other profiteers in foodstuffs have been imprisoned until their cases can come before the courts. Not only does the new law deal with profiteers in provisions, for a salesman at Chalon-sur-Saone has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment and 5,000 francs fine for speculation in boots and shoes.

Then to-day I read in the Montreal Gazette the following:

Profiteering Charge.

Grand Jury's Bill Against American Woollen Co.

New York, May 26.—The American Woollen Company was charged with profiteering in an indictment returned here late to-day by the federal grand jury, with the American Woollen Company of Boston and William M. Wood, president of both companies. The indictment, charging violation of the Lever Act, contained 12 counts, alleging that the campany had sold cloth at unreasonable and unjust rates. One count charges that on January 2 the company sold 74⅛ yards of material that cost $1.62 a yard for $3.25 and that on January 19, 85½ yards that cost $1.90 was sold for $3.90.

Many examples of profiteering were given when the Board of Commerce held its sittings in Ottawa last year, and the offenders should have met with just such punishment as was meted out in the cases I have cited.

When I urge the Government to tax people who have made big money and got rich quick through the war, I think I am supported by sane people everywhere. This is what a French newspaper, L'Echo de Paris, of April 21, 1920, says on this subject:

THE WAR CONTRACTS TO BE REVISED.

A maximum profit of 10 per cent to be Allowed.

The Government is soon to bring down a bill countersigned by Mr. Lhopiteau, keeper of the seals, and Mr. François Marsal, minister of Finance, by which shall be instituted a relief tax upon the war contracts with the State, the departments, the communes and public establishments.

The amount of the tax is calculated so as to leave to the purveyors and the middlemen, after deduction of charges of all sorts, a maximum profit of 10 per cent for the former and, for the latter, of 2 per cent or even of ½ per cent, according to the importance of the contract.

The tax will be collected through the process in use in the matter of direct taxation.

The examination of the contracts and the assessment of the tax to be collected are the work of a district commission, the members of which are chosen by reason of their fiscal, industrial, commercial or agricultural qualifications.

The decisions of the commission are not subject to appeal.

Appeal to the State council is allowed only in case of violation of the law or abuse of power.

That is what the countries of Europe and the United States are doing, and it is what this Government ought to have done, but which we find to our great regret it has not done.

The Minister of Finance in the course of his remarks also stated that he has stopped borrowing. Well, we might congratulate him on that, but he cannot take all the credit for it, because if he has stopped borrowing, it is for the good reason that there is no more money to borrow. The people have given just as much as they could, and I do not think the Government could float another popular loan to-day.

The Minister of Finance also said that the road of the administration had been made very hard for him to travel on account of sectional differences and the lack of unity in this country. He said that if there was such unity of sentiment and feeling as prevailed during the war it would be a very easy task for him to put the finances of this country in proper shape. I would ask him how he expects there can be unity of feeling throughout this country when the additional taxes he is imposing to-day are going to bear more heavily on certain classes of the community than on others? How can he expect unity when the people of this country find out that those who ought to have been made to pay are exempt under this Budget, and that the so-called luxury tax affects the working classes and those less able to bear it more than any others? Let me remind the hon. gentleman that if he wants to have unity in this country he must follow the traditions which have been handed down by our ancestors in years past. He must follow the traditions of Baldwin, Lafontaine, Laurier and others who preceded us, and fill vacancies in important posts in different parts of the country in accordance with tradition. When the President of the Harbour Commission in the District of Quebec resigns a man of the same nationality should be appointed to replace him. He should also see, when there is a vacancy on the International Joint Waterways Commission which had been filled for years past by a Frenchman from the province of Quebec, that tradition should be followed in filling that vacancy, so that unity of sentiment might exist throughout the country. I would suggest to the Minister of Finance that if he wants to promote unity of feeling and sentiment in this country he should try to put into practice the admirable words uttered by no less an authority than His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in Montreal, last October. That Royal personage pleaded for freedom of speech and mutual respect between different peoples for the feelings of each other. It was only by recognizing the importance of these things, he said, that a country could make substantial progress; and let me say, Sir, that it was by a full recognition of the principles so well laid down by His Royal Highness that Canada made such great strides during the fifteen years of the late Liberal administration.

Mr. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): In common with other hon. members who have spoken, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance on the comprehensive and straightforward statement which he has given to the House in regard to our liabilities, and also on the courage which he has displayed in going after sufficient revenue to take care of our responsibilities without resorting to further borrowing. I do not intend to take up a great deal of the time of the House, but whatever time I do spend in addressing hon. members I shall devote to a discussion of tariff matters alone. I believe that the tariff is to be the one feature of the next election, and I think it is an important subject at the present moment. Before dealing with this subject, however, I want to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy) a few days ago. I am sorry that that hon. gentleman is not in his seat, but I observe that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) is present, and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee), who was here a moment ago is, I regret, absent for the moment. These three hon. gentlemen appear to me to be a sort of co-operative triumvirate from the western part of the province of Ontario. The hon. member for North Essex a few days ago made an attack on the dry dock proposition in the city of St. John, and I must say that he goes a long way from home to make his attack. The hon. member for Kent makes a vicious onslaught on the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) regarding Massey-Harris and the International Harvester Company, also going far afield; while the other member of the triumvirate attacks the automobile industry. It is interesting to note that there is not an automobile industry in that hon. gentleman's riding, but there is such an industry in the riding of the hon. member for Kent and in the riding of the hon. member for North Essex. He makes his attack upon something that is not a home industry; he takes good care to see to that. Now, I desire to read a statement made by the hon. member for North Essex the other day in his speech. It will be found at page 2730 of unrevised Hansard:

[Mr. Casgrain.]

There seems to be an organized plan to raid the public treasury. Now, Canada has done pretty well for the shipbuilding industry, at all events so far as helping them to get started is concerned. I have here a prospectus issued by a bond house dealing with the St. John Drydock and Shipbuilding Company, Limited, showing that the Government of Canada have agreed under certain conditions to assist this company to the extent of $247,500 per annum for a period of thirty-five years.

That is going a long way from home to make an attack. I might say, Sir, that this dry dock proposition was inaugurated by a measure passed through this House, and I may read a couple of clauses from the Act incorporating the company. I happen to know something about the establishment of dry docks because I come from a partly maritime county where we have a dry dock and where, when the Welland Canal is completed, there is likely to be necessity for another dry dock to take care of the larger boats; and when I saw the statement of the hon. member I felt pretty sure that he had either been very much mistaken or that he was misleading the House or trying—to use a vernacular expression—to put something over. Let me read a couple of clauses from the Act:

The Governor in Council may, as an aid to the construction of any dry dock, authorize the payment out of any unappropriated money forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada of a subsidy, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, to any incorporated company, approved by the Governor in Council, as having the ability to perform the work, which shall enter into an agreement with His Majesty to construct a dry dock under the provisions of this Act, with all necessary equipment, machinery and plant, for the reception and repairing of vessels.

No such aid shall be granted unless the Governor in Council is satisfied, upon a report of the minister, based upon a report of the Chief Engineer of the Department of Public Works,—

Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be irritated by this expression "Governor in Council"; we are always hearing something about it, and so on. This dry dock company, under this law, was established as a public work, and it will be interesting to hon. members to know that the measure establishing it was passed in the year 1910 under the Laurier Government. Hon. members will also see that there were Orders in Council then as well as now, and we are just carrying out the law that was made by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not say that the law is a bad one. I think it is good, and those hon. gentlemen are entitled to credit for putting it on the statute book. But I do not see any reason why my hon. friend should have made the attack which he made, especially when this law was established by his own party. Now the hon. member for Lambton made an attack upon the automobile industry. I do not know that it is my business to defend that particular industry, Mr. Speaker. If there is any one who should defend the automobile industry it would be the hon. member for Kent, in whose city there is a large automobile industry, and the hon. member for North Essex. But they allowed the hon. member for Lambton to come forward and attack this industry by a supposititious case that has no application whatever and no truth at all. That hon. gentleman gives us a supposititious case of an automobile that cost a thousand dollars. Why did not the hon. gentleman get some information from the hon. member for North Essex or the hon. member for Kent as to the automobile industry if he did not know anything about it? He could have gotten that information if he had sought it.

He could have given it to the House instead of putting on Hansard the statement he did. I wish to correct that statement and to put on Hansard accurate information regarding the automobile industry. I may say for the particular benefit of my hon. friend from Victoria and Carleton (N. B.) (Mr. Caldwell) and other hon. gentlemen who talk about the Ford automobile, that the information I am about to furnish is in reference to that particular car, so that he and his friends may not in future make the same error that they are making now. My figures are based upon prices in effect on the 4th of this month. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) told us that any change in price did not amount to a hill of beans, that it was just taking a shirt and collar or a petticoat off some one, so it cannot very much affect my figures.

The Canadian price of the Ford touring car, as far as the Ford Company is concerned—because they have nothing to do with the inland revenue tax that is collected on sales—is $740; the United States price is $575, a difference of $165, or 28 per cent. Now, what I am about to state is not generally known in this country, and although I am not giving this information on the direct authority of the Ford Company, it came to me from an authentic source and I see no reason why it should not be published. It is not generally known that in regard to equipment the car that is put on the United States market by the Ford Company is not on all fours with the car that is put on the Canadian market. The Ford Company in this country equip their cars with 3½-inch tires, with non-skid treads on the rear wheels, and with demountable rims. The larger-size tires alone are worth $10 more, and the non-skids and demountable rims are worth another $25. In addition, they use a one-man top, finer upholstery, leather door grips, and other accessories that make a difference of $50 more. So that the Canadian Ford car has an equipment costing $85 more than that of the American Ford car. Then there is another factor to be noted. Of course, it is well known that the Ford Company import certain component parts from their American factories, and the duty on those parts amounts to $23.12. I might say that until quite recently none of the automobile companies in this country made all their parts, and even to-day they import a certain proportion of them. There is also a duty on what are termed the unproductive materials that enter into the manufacture of these cars, such as coal, oil, and other articles which do not appear on a car. There is also the item of exchange on the products imported from the other side, and that exchange in the case of the materials that enter into the Ford car amounts to $10.40. Those items total $118.52, leaving a difference between the Canadian Ford car and the United States Ford car of only $48.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in a business of the proportions of the Ford Company we are very fortunate to have it established in this country even under these circumstances. The reason for that difference of $48 is due to the fact that in the United States the Ford Company turn out 1,000,000 cars as against only 60,000 turned out by the Canadian plant. Therefore the difference in the cost of making the various parts, and in furnishing dies, and other equipment must be plain to every one conversant with modern factory practice. As a matter of fact the Canadian Ford Company have no hesitation in saying that if their business grows—and at present they are exporting 25,000 of the 60,000 cars they manufacture—if their business grows a little more so they can overtake the unit cost of manufacture they will eventually be able to market the Ford car in Canada just as cheaply as in the United States.

It seems to me that it should not be up to me to defend an industry in the county of Kent; certainly I would not want to have another member jump up and do it in respect to an industry in my own constituency. But what does this industry mean to Canada in general and to the county in particular in which the hon. member for North Essex lives? His county is benefiting to the extent of a payroll of $4,350,000 a year; the Government of this country is benefiting in customs paid to the extent of $696,000 a year, without including the duties paid by other corporations that supply the Ford Company with goods used in the manufacture of its car.

Now, having performed the duties of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McCoig) and of the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Kennedy)——

Mr. McCOIG: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He has referred to the hon. member for Kent not defending the automobile business. Would it make any difference if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) read what the hon. member for West Lambton said in relation to the automobile business? I cannot see that he criticised that business to any extent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That may be the opinion of the hon. member (Mr. McCoig). At any rate, I do not wish to repeat the speech he refers to, but I certainly looked upon it in that light. The hon. member for West Lambton made out a suppositious case in an attempt to show that the Government was taking a tremendous tax out of the people, and that the people were getting no particular benfit in return; but I think I have shown by figures that cannot be refuted that such is not the case—that as a matter of fact the reverse holds good.

Mr. McCOIG: From your standpoint only.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Now I want to refer to a book that I have under my hand entitled "The Farmers' Platform." This book was published a year or two ago, but although its colour has not changed, the name, I understand, has, and the Farmers party is now known as the Progressive or the Agrarian party. A year or two ago the old name was good enough, but they were afraid that possibly the class call that was raised against them would be prejudicial to their prospects so they changed their name. I want to refer to several quotations in this book and I wish to do so in a kindly and gentlemanly spirit. I hope that what I shall have to say will be taken in the spirit in which it is inetnded; I do not want to be harsh and I will not accuse those concerned of profiteering or anything of the kind. The book in question has been prepared by the Canadian Council of Agriculture and adopted by the United Farmers of Alberta, the Saskatchewan Grain Growers' Association, the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association and the United Farmers of Ontario. It is issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture and published by the Grain Growers' Guide, so that it is fairly well revised or edited and fairly well, I should think, recommended. The first quotation I shall make is headed, "What the tariff costs," and reads as follows:

> As already explained, under a system of protection, the consumer is compelled to pay a tax upon all imported goods that come under the tariff schedule. Upon all goods of domestic origin, produced under a protective system, the consumer must likewise pay a tax—although in this case the revenue finds its way to the bank account of private individuals alone. Now it has been estimated that the domestic trade of Canada alone is at least four times as great as the country's foreign trade, and in the United States seven times as great. It follows that for every dollar collected by way of customs dues, at least $4 are paid to private individuals. When one considers that the customs revenue for the year ending March 31, 1916, was $133,000,000, and that four times that sum was paid in addition to the protected interests, it will be seen what a crushing weight is laid upon the country's consumers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to avoid all posisibility of a mistake, but this book has been so well edited and revised and so well prepared, that I would not think it posible for a clerical error of any consequence to have crept within its covers. Consequently I am very much surprised to find that the customs revenue for the year ending March 31, 1916, is given as $133,000,000. I now have under my hand the customs returns for that year and they amount to $103,000,000. Of course a difference of thirty millions is only a small item, but you will notice that they say here that the figure is to be multiplied by four as being trade within the country. Thirty millions multiplied by four makes the trifling amount of $120,000,000. I am not advancing this as an argument but merely pointing out that these gentlemen from the Northwest, these new economists who have been studying political economy and all other forms of economy, during the last year, might have paid some attention to the facts, and seen that this book was published in correct form. That would occur to me as a good thing for them to do, and I would recommend that the next time they venture upon such a publication they will see to it that it is accurate. And here I might pause to observe that although in the first book they issued they went into a lot of particulars they have since learnt a lot of sense; the latest book contains no particulars but simply a lot of glittering generalities—that is all, just generalities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the argument is correct that the duty is also collected on all internal trade—that because the internal trade is four times as great as the trade that goes through the custom house then four times the amount of that revenue goes into the pockets of somebody else—I assume that if the internal trade should amount to ten times as much as what comes through the custom house, there would be ten times the amount of duty plundered by somebody—because "plunder" is the word these people use in another case which I shall mention presently. To illustrate the effect of their argument I propose to go through the tariff and mention some of the articles that it contains. First of all I will roughly run through the tariff items that I have marked down; I have not done it very carefully but hurriedly in order to show how absolutely unjust and entirely unreliable any such statement as made here can be. Now out of this $103,000,000—not $133,000,000 as they say in their book—there is the war tax collection and the balance consists of the regular customs returns for that year. But the manufacturers are certainly not interested in the figures that I am going to read, however much other people may be. Consequently if four times, or ten times the amount of taxes have been collected than should have been it cannot be on the items I am going to read. That will be self-evident as I read them. The first item is—animals, $110,000 duty. Now if there has been $400,000 of duty cribbed by somebody else on this item, you will have to go down into the pockets of some hon. gentlemen sitting on the opposite benches below me and recover that money. The next item is—grain, duty of $400,000. That money was collected on different kinds of grain and if you deduct the exports I assume the grain consumption in the Dominion would be very considerable. Therefore, if it is true that that amount of duty has to be multiplied ten or twelve times I would like to know which hon. member among the Farmers' party has got this money. The next item is $4,000,000 worth of coal. Now the manufacturers cannot be held responsible for that.

Mr. EDWARDS: What has the hon. member for North Cape Breton and Victoria (Mr. McKenzie) to say?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Perhaps that hon. member can tell us whether four times the amount of money I mentioned for coal was received by somebody in Nova Scotia? I pass over the item relating to coffee and come to the sum of $113,000 for eggs. Now who has cribbed this egg duty? Then there is $170,000 collected on fish. I would like to know whether the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) can tell us who got the multiplied amount in this case? Then there is an item of fruits, including nuts, $1,500,000. Well, there is a lot of fruit grown in my county but the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Stacey) will also have to stand for some of that $6,000,000 steal. The next item I run across is hay—$19,000 collected on hay.

Mr. BUTTS: The Speaker's county.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; I understand that that has reference to your own county. Honey—my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), a good Scotchman; we will put the honey on to him; he got it. Butter, cheese and lard, $336,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Frontenac.

Mr. EDWARDS: I wish it were.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Now, here is another item: vegetables, $676,000. I have something to say about this vegetable business. One item on the vegetable list is potatoes. Potatoes, I understand, carry a duty of 20 cents a bushel. The value of the potatoes grown in Canada for home consumption in that year was about $51,000,000. At 20 cents a bushel there was $10,000,000 that somebody grabbed; I think that the member for Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell), and probably some hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island constituencies had better divvy up with the rest of us and call it square.

Now, I do not want to continue; there are a lot of other items—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

An hon. MEMBER: Good stuff.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The items of spirits on which the duty was paid amount to a good many hundred thousand dollars. Brandy paid $960,000; cordials, $114,000; gin—where is that consumed?—$2,047,000; rum, $534,000; whisky, $3,245,000;—and yet to read the Farmer's book you would suppose that all that stuff was properly chargeable against the manufacturers, multiplied by four, because that is really the way the thing reads. If it means anything at all, that is what it is intended to convey, and in dealing with the matter as I have, I am simply following the directions that they laid down as to how the thing should be applied.

Now, this brings me to another phase of the question. I wish again to refer to the Farmers' platform, page 19,—and this is where the word "plunder" comes in: "Plunder over boots and shoes:"

> During the year ending March 31st, 1911, Canada imported $2,000,000 worth of boots and shoes—

I am not giving the odd figures.

> —the duty upon which was $585,000. In that year the Dominion imported six times the value of boots and shoes from the United States that it did from Britain, and paid duty thereon amounting to $522,000, equal to 30 per cent. The value of the domestic product for that year is given as $33,967,000, of which $60,000 was exported.

Now, here it is again, the same argument, so it is not a mistake like the other mistake of $33,000,000,—it is in the game. I read:

> Now, if our contention is sound, that the manufacturers add the full amount of their protection to the selling price of the commodity when disposed of in the home market, the people of Canada paid for that year, by way of taxes, the following sums:
> Customs duties.. .. .. $ 585,996.71
> To the manufacturers.. .. .. .. 10,177,893.90

Then the amount of wages and salaries is given, but that does not enter into the argument. That is to say, the Canadian people paid by way of taxes, directly and indirectly, to the manufacturer and to the customs, $10,736,000. The way this is written: "Now, if our contention is sound" would make me believe, Mr. Speaker, that the man who wrote it was not quite sure of his ground; he was not very certain, so he put it that way. From the statement made in the House last year by the member for South Waterloo (Mr. Scott) I am quite convinced that the consumer pays little, if any, duty on the article manufactured in Canada. I am quite convinced that with the keen competition amongst over two hundred manufacturers in this country it would be absolutely impossible for any body of business men carrying on a business of $33,000,000 to make a profit of $10,000,000. What is more, I say to the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and to the other members of that aggressive party that there is no better field in Canada for a manufacturing enterprise than a proposition built upon that basis; if I were a younger man I would get after that business very quickly. It seems to me that that party would be a good deal better off to build up a business of this kind in their own part of the country than to try to pull down similar business in another part of the country.

Another industry referred to is that reviled industry of canning. Every time some hon. members of this House look around the Chamber you will hear some attack upon the canning industry. Now, I have something to say about the canning industry. I have in my county over fifteen canning factories, and not half of them are associated with Canners, Limited, either; they are operated by independent concerns, farmers' co-operative and other enterprises. It seems to me that if hon. gentlemen on the other side would get together with these men rather than hammer the business, they would make more progress and probably do more to benefit the country than they will ever do by trying to pull them down. It seems to me that there is a class of men running about in this country endeavouring to create class prejudice. There are men who are trying to make the farmer believe that the citizens in the town, his best customer, is his enemy, and others who are trying to make the city man believe that the farmer, his best customer, is his enemy. Such business as this ought to be "sat upon," to use a common expression, by the rest of the people of this country.

I want to refer again to this book. I would advise all hon. members of this House to get this book.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: And live up to it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: There is no book that I would rather discuss before an audience of intelligent people anywhere in my constituency. I will take the book back to my constituents. I shall be glad, indeed if the secretary will send me a dozen or more copies of it. Let me read a few words on page 25 in regard to trusts and tariffs:

> Truly, the tariff is "the mother of trusts" and when it is abolished the trusts, with their high prices, unfair competition with the small producer and unfair practices, are bound to be broken up. Free trade England is free also of the trust which flourishes in every protected country in the world.

The emphasis is not in the book.

Mr. LALOR: That is a joke.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I want to say something about this oft-repeated statement "no trusts in free-trade England". I wish the hon. member for Red-Deer (Mr. Clark) was here.

because he knows all about English history, and I want to go back a few pages in history and tell him some things that he will probably not be so sure are satisfactory to his free trade theories. I have under my hand a list of mergers that were formed in free-trade England and that cover a large number of trades. This list is not by any means up to date, but I can tell hon. members whfere they may procure the list and thus, probably, they may be able to get in touch with someone from whom they can get the more up-to-date list.

Mr. BURNHAM: I have the British reports, if any hon. member would like to have them.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I should be very glad if I had recent ones. This, however, will suffice to let the hon. gentleman know that free-trade England has been a trust country not only since a gentleman from Montreal went over there a few years ago and now threatens to come back upon us with another one. I know the English people could teach our people a good deal about the trust game before we ever learned it. This list of businesses that the affected starts off with the names of the companies, the nature of the industry, the number of firms joined together and the capital. The first of them is the Nobel Dynamite Trust Company, Explosives, four firms combined, capital £2,785,000; stone, seven companies; cotton spinners, three companies; salt, 64 firms in one combine. (We hear something about salt from our hon. friends across the way.) Then, there are chemicals, 51 companies; fireclay, 7 companies; lime, 12 companies. Some of thes industries are repeated, but I will not read the names. Then there are thread, 5 companies; coal selling, 8 companies; shipping, three companies; thread 15 companies; engineering, 2 companies; shipping and oil, 11 companies; steel shipbuilding, etc., 6 companies; coal mining, 4 companies; tubes, 4 companies; tubes, 3 companies; dying, 4 companies; linen thread, 6 companies; gun powder, 8 companies; cotton spinning, 47 companies; dyes, 4 companies; dying, 34 companies; borax, 12 companies; combs, 3 companies; coal selling, 2 companies; dyeing, 11 companies, coal selling, 8 companies; oil cake, 18 companies; wool combing, 41 companies; linoleum, 3 companies; dyes, 8 companies; wool machinery, 7 companies; calico printing, 47 companies; dyeing, 22 companies; shipbuilding and engineering, 2 companies; shipbuilding, 34 companies; wall paper, 31 companies; dyeing, 51 companies; dyes, 5; bleaching, 53; cement, 28 companies. We heard something about cement here. Then there are rivets, etc., 15 companies; velvet, 5; wool, 7; knitting yarn, 5; dyeing, 10; fustian, 5; steel, 3; steel, 3; engineering, 3; coal, iron and steel, 2; textile machinery, 3; shipping, 2; granite, 8; shipping, 2; shipping, 3; coalmining, 4; omnibuses, 3; shipping, 3; shipping, 6; ice, 3; tobacco, 19; iron and steel, 3.

I am leaving out twenty more. I hope we have heard the last of beautiful free-trade England as regards combines. As I said before, we may know something about combines in this country; but the game was not big enough here, and certain gentlemen went from this country to learn the trade in England and now I understand they are coming back to Canada, as the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Casgrain) said a few minutes ago, with an English corporation to do the job over here. We cannot do it in a big enough way for them, and they are being helped, not particularly by this Government, but by the Government of Nova Scotia of my hon. friends opposite. If anybody wants to find any fault with that corporation, it is, I understand, getting its capitalization from the province of Nova Scotia and not from the Dominion of Canada.

I wish to refer briefly to the present condition of British trade; but before doing so, I should like to quote a few words from Henry Clay. These words were spoken at a time when there was a tariff in England. We hear a great deal about free-trade England, and free traders do not like to listen to the story that British trade was built up on protection and that England had a start ahead of any other nation. But when we consider that a number of hon. members in this House who are older than I am have referred to long-gone-by affairs, I may be forgiven for trespassing a little upon the time of the House in quoting a word or two coming out of the past from a man as eminent as Henry Clay, when he was addressing the House of Representatives a good many years ago. Mr. Clay finished his address in the House of Representatives in this way:

> The committee will observe that the measure of the wealth of a nation is indicated by the measure of its protection of its industry, and the measure of the poverty of a nation is marked by that of the degree in which it neglects and abandons the care of its own industry, leaving it exposed to the action of foreign powers.

Now mark what he says regarding Great Britain:

Great Britain protects most her industry, and the wealth of Great Britain is consequently the greatest. France is next in the degree of protection and France is next in the order of wealth. Spain most neglects the duty of protecting the industry of her subjects, and Spain is one of the poorest of European nations. The views of British prosperity which I have endeavoured to present, show that her protecting policy is adapted alike to a State of war and peace. Selfpoised, resting upon her own internal resources, possessesing a home market, carefully cherished and guarded, she is ever prepared for any emergency. We have seen her coming out of a war of incalculable exertion, and of great duration, with her power unbroken, her means undiminished. We have seen that almost every revolving year of peace has brought along with it an increase of her manufacturers, of her commerce, and consequently of her navigation.

We have seen that, constructing her prosperity upon the solid foundation of her own protecting policy it is unaffected by the vicissitudes of other States. What is our own condition?

He was talking to his own people in the United States, and at that time the United States was free trade, or practically so. He was advocating protection in the United States. To continue:

Depending upon the state of foreign powers —confiding exclusively in a foreign, to the culpable neglect of domestic policy—our interests are affected by their movements. Their wars, their misfortunes, are the only source of our prosperity. In their peace and in our peace, we hold our condition the reverse of that of Great Britain, and all our interests stationary or declining. Peace brings to us none of the blessings of peace. Our system is anomalous; alike unfitted to general tranquility, and to a state of war or peace, on the part of our own country, it can succeed only in the rare occurrence of a general state of war throughout Europe.

I wish the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) had been here, because I think I have heard almost similar words from him in respect to Great Britain at the present time. How history does repeat itself! That was the opinion and spoken word of the man who was trying to induce his own country to adopt a policy that had built up British trade. I think there is a lesson for us there.

In 1846, Great Britain changed her fiscal policy. Mr. Codden, speaking at Manchester on January 15, 1846, said:

Europe altogether has been corrupted by the vicious example of England in her commercial legislation. I believe that if you abolish the Corn Law honestly and adopt Free Trade in its simplicity there will not be a tariff in Europe that will not be changed in less than five years to follow your example.

On another occasion Mr. Cobden said:

You might as well tell me that the sun will not rise to-morrow as tell me that foreign nations will not adopt Free Trade in less than ten years from now.

Mr. Cobden may have been a wonderful economist, but as a prophet he did not amount to very much.

I have here a list of the customs tariffs which the British are imposing at the present time. The list is too long for me to read it all, but I will give a few articles to show that free trade England is no longer free trade:

Customs Tariff of the United Kingdom.

Clocks and watches and component parts, 33⅓ per cent.
Motor cars, 33⅓ per cent.
Musical instruments, 33⅓ per cent.
Gramaphones, 33⅓ per cent.
Pianolas, 33⅓ per cent.
Accessories and component parts of musical instruments, 33⅓ per cent.
Playing cards, 3/9 per dozen packs.
Chicory, raw, £1 19s. 8d. per cwt.
Chicory, roasted, 6d. per lb.
Chloral, hydrate, 1/9 per lb.
Chloroform, 4/4 per lb.
Cider, 4d. per gal.
Cimematograph films, from ½d. to 5d. per foot.
Cocoa, £2 2s. 0d. per cwt.
Cocoa husks, 6/- per cwt.
Cocoa butter, 4½d. per lb.

I will not give you the duty on beers because that covers all of two pages. There are four pages more of the duties, but I think I have read enough to show that Great Britain is no longer a paradise for free traders.

I want to say a word about the iron and steel industry in the Old Country. My hon. friend the member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) elaborated on this the other evening and so did the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). I shall give only a few figures and put the matter in a little different way. I am giving these figures to show that free-trade England has not advanced—and I very much regret it,—as fast as protectionist countries. Whatever is the reason, free trade is not helping Great Britain; it may be helping her the other way. The United Kingdom in the year 1900 produced in round figures 8,900,000 tons of pig iron, and in 1914—I will not take a war year because that would not be fair—8,924,000 tons, which is a shade less than she produced in 1900, namely 8,960,000 tons. Germany produced in 1900, 8,500,000 tons, practically the same as Great Britain, but in 1914 she had increased up to 14,000,000 tons, just about double. While Great Britain had stood pat, Germany had gained almost 100 per cent. Now let us look at the United States. In 1900, she produced in round figures 13,000,000 tons, and in 1913. 30,000,000 tons—more than double, or about 150 per cent. France had increased at an even greater rate, but her output was not large.

The production of steel is on exactly the same basis. Germany and the United States advanced by leaps and bounds, while Great Britain did not advance. I can say this from personal experience: For nearly forty years I have been a buyer in the British market of certain lines of steel and we never failed to buy in Sheffield from people like Henry Bessemer & Co., and Steel, Peach & Tozer, two grand old English firms. To-day we are not buying one solitary pound there, not because we do not want to buy. We would pay 15 or 20 cents a hundredweight to have the British connection, but we cannot pay any more. The relative difference between the cost to-day is 30 per cent in favour of Pittsburg. That seems remarkable, and it applies not only to steel but to tin plates as well.

In 1891, there were no tin plates made in the United States, as the hon. member for Fort William told us the other night. What happened? The United States put on a tariff, and to-day they are making tin plate into the billions of pounds. We used to be importers of tin plate from England. England was, one might say, the source of supply for tin plate, but last year whereas this commodity came into Canada from England to the value of $11,000, we bought $11,000,000 from the United States. Is there not a lesson there for some one to learn? I do not mention this fact for the purpose of in any sense belittling England. I wish the facts were otherwise, and I would sooner buy there than from the United States. But there is a great deal to be said in the matter. English tin plate can be landed in Montreal at about twelve cents a pound, whereas the price from the United States is eight cents. Under those circumstances are you likely to buy tin plate from England, even if you give them more preference than they have? I think I have said enough on the British aspect of free trade. I might say something in connection with the cotton industry. In 1870 Britain had about three-quarters of the cotton spindles of the world. She had thirty-seven and three-quarter million spindles, and all the other countries of the world put together had twenty million spindles. England has increased her capacity in the matter of cotton by fifty per cent, and during the time she has brought about that increase the continent of Europe has increased two hundred per cent and the United States three hundred per cent, while other countries, including Canada and France, have increased theirs four hundred per cent. This is another line of business in which Britain was predominant.

Now, I want to revert for a moment to the question as to who pays the duty, and I should like hon. members to be indulgent enough with me while I refer to a line or two of my own manufacture. I believe that the best way in which one can put an argument is to deal with one's own line of goods, and, in passing, I may say that I was somewhat annoyed to see one of my lines in the Farmers' platform which has been referred to. This list puts me in mind of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) when he brought forward his wonderful resolution a year ago and began to dress the farmer upside down, putting on his boots before he put on his socks. I see one article of mine in the list of farm implements mentioned in that book, and that is an axe. It is a small item, it is true, but there it is, and it bears a duty of 30 per cent. Now, I want to say that axes are being sold in Canada, delivered at a point like Montreal or Toronto, as cheap as the Americans are selling similar goods of he same weight delivered at Pittsburg, without any reference whatever to duty. Some hon. gentlemen will say: "Well, if that is so, why do you want a tariff?" I will tell you why. By that tariff I get one hundred per cent of the business, and I am satisfied with the margin of profit that I can get out of it, and I will sell my goods, irrespective of the tariff based on cost of production. That is what I am doing, and I believe there are hundreds of people who are doing the same thing. I come from a district of Canada that is very well favoured and is looked upon as the garden of the country. It is an important district so far as either farming or manufacturing is concerned. There has been in that country a wonderful development in manufactures and a most wonderful development in farming.

I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to refer to a few other manufactures in my own town. I am cognizant of the fact that I am not very consecutive—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on; you are doing splendidly.

Mr. CHAPLIN:—but I shall put before the House all the facts that are in my possession. My own city has wonderfully improved during the last few years, and there have come into our district a number of American factories. Now, I would ask my hon. friends this question: If it is true that the duty is collected entirely by the Canadian manufacturer how is it that the American comes in here to establish factories? If the American could place his goods on the Canadian market on an equality with Canadian goods there would be no necessity for him to build factories in Canada, and I may say that there are 150 new factories in my district. Would these men be foolish enough to start these new concerns if they could make their goods in the United States and place them here on an equality with the Canadian goods? The argument is ridiculous. The argument that the consumer pays the duty is absolutely futile and ridiculous. But if any other argument is needed to show the necessity for a tariff I will supply that argument by stating a matter of personal knowledge. A short time ago an automobile tire company came into our town. It was a branch of an Akron concern. Some time last fall the Toronto Globe was worrying about the tariff, and, like my hon. friends opposite, indulging in generalities, undertook to discuss the question of tires. Someone had written to the Toronto Globe stating what an awful shame it was that they had to pay 47½ per cent on tires, and one tire company, which makes goods in Canada and in the United States, wrote under its own signature to the Toronto Globe and said something to the following effect: We are probably the largest makers of tires in the United States and certainly the largest in Canada, and we are selling our product in this country at just about the same prices as it is sold in the United States. Now, for three years the prices of tires in the St. Catharines Company, which is a branch of the Akron concern, have been the same as those at Akron. Who pays the duty there? If there are some people who want a tire not made in Canada and who are prepared to import it, of course he will pay the duty on it; but if he is content to buy from one of the eight or ten manufacturers of tires in this country he will get a tire as cheap as one that is sold in the United States. What I say now has reference to the condiion of affairs a month or two ago. What prices are to-day I do not know. Rubber and fabric both come from the United States, and the rate of exchange may have altered matters to a slight degree; but under no circumstance is there more than a difference of 5 per cent between the tires made in Canada and those made in the United States.

I have a few remarks to make in regard to some more goods sold in St. Catharines, and I have personal information in regard to the matters of which I shall speak. I did not want to take figures from any firm in St. Catharines for the purposes of any comparison; I took the trouble to write to a Montreal concern, competitors of mine, who do business in the United States. I do not mind telling the name of the company; it is the Simmonds Saw Company. I got my manager to write and ask what was the selling price in the United States, and in reply we were advised, "The prices are practically the same." In giving some examples the writer said:

> We are selling such and such a style of saw to mill men in the United States at $5.50 per hundred, and we are selling it in Canada at $5.75 a hundred.

A difference of only 25 cents, or a little more than a postage stamp, especially where we import our raw material. The writer also says:

> On mill saws, high grade cross-cut saws, cheap cross-cut saws, points, shanks, etc., there is the same slight difference, and in order that you may have the fullest information which I can give you on American prices, I am attaching discount sheet effective April 1st, 1920, showing the Fitchburg, Mass. and the Canadian prices.

There is another American firm in my home town, and they write me to say that their largest item of production, malleable iron, is sold just as cheap in Canada as it is in the United States.

Then I have a letter from the Yale & Towne Company, a well known concern, also located in St. Catharines, giving me a list of their products,—and I could give a few figures showing their American prices as compared with their Canadian prices, but I will not weary the House with these details. It is sufficient for me to say that the figures show the benefit our people are deriving from these American factories having been established in this country, and that we are not paying a sou more for their products.

One more item and I have exhausted my list. A firm which manufactures grape juice—a beverage which is very much needed in these dry times—established a factory in my home town, and in reply to my inquiries the manager writes me:

> We are selling grape juice in Canada just as cheap as we are selling it in the United States.

Yet our friends of the Farmers' party would have us believe that the full tariff is taken by the manufacturers on everything they produce

Before I close I want to refer to one other matter which perhaps I should have mentioned before; it is another personal illustration of how the British manufacturer or shipper can be protected without a tariff. Not very long ago my company was enjoying business at the coast on a certain article, and suddenly that business dropped off, our agent advising us that the decline was owing to some British goods coming in. We know that the British trader as a rule does not cut prices, and in that respect he is not like his brother in the United States; the British trader makes his prices out of the freight rates and his lower cost of manufacture, and very seldom does he cut prices. We applied to our Liverpool agents to ascertain what the rate of freight was from Liverpool to Victoria, B.C., and we discovered that the Canadian Pacific Railway was carrying the goods from Liverpool across this continent at $1.25 per hundred freight. Our freight rate from the factories at St. Catharines to the same point on the identical class of goods was $1.80. In other words, the difference in the rate was a profit in itself. I appealed to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, because it looked to me like an outrage, but I got no satisfaction. Then a body of our manufacturers got together in Montreal, and from our plant there we shipped those goods down to Vera Cruz in Mexico and across Mexico up the Coast and landed them in Victoria at 90 cents a hundred. It was not until we were able to protect ourselves in that way that we could deal with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Then they came to us and quoted us a rate of $1 a hundred, which enabled us to hold that trade. I just mention that to show that there are other factors besides the tariff to protect a manufacturer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am through. I merely want to add that I come from a county that has had a wonderful expansion in manufactures, and I ask the people of this country if their representatives here are going to do something which will injure that industrial prosperity. I come from a county that has spent on its fruit industry millions of dollars; and those fruit farmers want the duty on fruit retained. Gentlemen of the Farmers' party may talk as much as they like, but the fact remains that the people in my county want that tariff, and if my friends of the Farmers party will go down there they will find out the real state of affaires in pretty quick time. Again I ask hon. gentlemen: What are you going to do? Are you goin to do something that will destroy these industries?

I am rather ashamed, Mr. Speaker, at having taken up so much of the time of the House, but I have the excuse that I have not transgressed very much before. I wish to thanv hon. members very heartily for the kind atention that they have given to me remarks.

Mr. T. W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton (N.B.): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss the Budget and the amendment to it which is before the House, I would like to deal briefly with some of the remarks made by the last speaker, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin). Especially do I want to deal with his statement with regard to the difference in the American and the Canadian price of a Ford car. And when I speak on this matter I am not speaking of something that some one told me or that some one wrote to me; I am speaking from personal experience.

In the early stages of this session I made a statement in regard to this matter, and I might say that the hon. member for Lincoln was not the only person who got up in the air about it. Here is a letter I received from the manager of the Ford Motor Company, covering four large sheets of paper, as the House will observe. In it he advances much the same argument as that employed by the hon. member for Lincoln, and he even threatened that he would put this in the hands of some hon. member and that I would get a "trimming." Well, I am quite prepared to take a "trimming" when it is coming to me, but it is not coming this time, thank the Lord! I want to quote some of the contents of this letter, and then I will come to the facts. The manager of the Ford Company wrote:

In the case of the Ford touring car—which is the article which is the major proportion of our production—I may say that the equipment of the Canadian car is somewhat different from that of the car in the United States. Inasmuch as we put on larger tires and the car is also equipped with demountable rims and extra tire carrier and other items of this kind, which makes the car in Canada of considerably more monetary value.

Further on he says:

We put on a one-man top and a ventilating wind shield also.

I have worn out one Ford car. In September last I bought another one, and I have the receipted bill right here, the items of which I will give a little later. I bought this car in Woodstock, N.B. I was in the town of Holton, in the state of Maine, only twelve miles from Woodstock, the day before I bought the car. I priced the value of the car in Holton. I will admit there was a difference in the forward tires. The forward tires on the Ford car in Maine are three inches whereas in the case of the Ford car sold in New Brunswick those tires are three and a half inches, representing a difference in the neighbourhood of $7 in price. In all other respects the car was exactly the same as the car I bought in Woodstock the next day. The car I bought did not have the one-man top, or a ventilating wind shield, or demountable rims or have even a tool box or tire carrier; the only difference was in regard to the forward tires. The car I bought has a self-starter which is identical with the self-starter made by the same firm in the case of the Holton car. With regard to the starter the difference in the price was $40. This starter cost $70 in Holton whereas in Woodstock it cost $110, a difference of $40 on a $70 article notwithstanding the fact that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat told us that manufactured goods are as cheap in Canada as they are in the United States notwithstanding the duty.

Mr. BURNHAM: What was the duty on that car?

Mr. CALDWELL: If the hon. member will have the patience to listen what I am stating may penetrate his cranium if it is not too thick, before I have done. Now the car I bought cost $900, and the tire carrier $7.25, a total of $907.25 for the bare car without any tool box to carry tools in. Even without any tire carrier the car cost $900 in Woodstock when I could have bought it for $640 in Holton. Allowing for $7 on account of the difference in the tires that would make the Holton car $253 cheaper. I said to the dealer in Woodstock "I should have bought a car in Holton yesterday, I could have bought one for $240 less." He replied "Yes, but the car would cost you just the same when you brought it in because you would have had to pay duty on it." It was because of the duty I was charged the extra $240 in Woodstock, and in these purchases we cannot help ourselves. There has been a campaign conducted in Canada for the last few years—you will see the posters on every fence, and on every vacant lot—urging you to buy "Made in Canada goods" otherwise you are a traitor to your country. If I had bought this car in Holton I would have got it for $240 less and would have paid $240 in duty on it, and I consider that I would have been more patriotic to my country because then the revenue of Canada would have benefited to the extent of $240 instead of it going into the manufacturer's pocket.

The hon. member for Lincoln made the statement that there was a duty of twenty cents a bushel on potatoes. I did not quite catch the whole of his remark in that connection and I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not at present in the Chamber. If he were here I would ask him if that applied to potatoes going out of or coming into Canada. I want to tell him that he does not know what he is talking about, there is no duty on potatoes going from Canada to the United States or on potatoes coming from the United States into Canada. He also states that there were 20,000,000 bushels exported I can prove that he is wrong in that statement because we have never exported more than 4,150,000 bushels from Canada in any one year according to the export statistics.

It would also be of interest to the House, it would certainly be of interest to the people of Canada, to know that the hon. gentleman—who by the way just made the kind of speech I would expect him to make after looking up, shall I call it his pedigree, in the Parliamentary Guide—is the president of two large manufacturing firms therefore he delivered just the kind of speech I would expect such a man to make. I do not blame him much because if the Farmers' platform is put into effect—to call it by its right name, which he seems to think we are ashamed of, but we are not—he and his like will certainly lose a nighty good graft they are collecting off the people of Canada.

The hon. gentleman also said he would like to discuss the Farmers' platform throughout the country. Mr. Speaker, I think you will admit that the discussion of the Farmers' platform has so far not brought very good results to the party the hon. gentleman supports. That platform has been discussed not by the farmers alone but by others. In the recent by-elections we had the spectacle of some of the ablest ministers in the present Cabinet going out and discussing the features of that platform. If they were not able to present it in a way that would make the people condemn it, that fact is surely a commendation of our platform.

Another thing the hon. member said was that the gross difference in the price of a Ford car in the United States amounted to $165. He worked that down, I believe, to $48. The manager of the Ford Motor Car company claimed that there is a difference of $130 between the American car and the Canadian car. Therefore he could not have written the same letter to the hon. member for Lincoln that he wrote to me, and I have the bill of the car I bought, under the Ford Motor Company's own bill heads, at $900 without even the tire-holder or tool box. The House will believe me when I make this statement and I am not saying something that somebody wrote me or telegraphed me. As I say I bought this car and paid $240 more for it on account of buying it in Canada instead of the United States. They tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the experience you buy is the best experience you can get if it does not cost you too much. I feel that my experience in this case cost just a little too much.

I had not the privilege—on account of illness in my family—of being in the House when the Budget Speech was delivered. Perhaps I was more disappointed than surprised to find that no provision was made for a revision of the tariff, although we were promised last year that the whole tariff question would be investigated before the present session was called so that the Government could deal with it intelligently. The ex-Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) in the Budget Speech which he delivered on June 5, 1919, is reported as making the following promise:

> It is my hope that within a year conditions will have become so stabilized as to permit of a general revision of the tariff, which is long, but, owing to the war, unavoidably overdue. Preceding such revision there should be a thorough inquiry conducted by the Minister of Finance and two or more of his colleagues representing the different geographical sections of Canada. Such inquiry should afford all interests, agricultural, industrial, fishing, lumbering, mining, commercial, and financial, producers and consumers alike, an opportunity of expressing their views and opinions and urging their particular needs and requirements. The rsult of such inquiry should be a body of information which will enable the Government to effect a general revision of the tariff fair to all parts of the community, and effectually promoting the national welfare of Canada. This inquiry should proceed with its work just as soon as conditions are sufficiently stabilized to permit. My own view is that it might well be commenced about autumn of this year.

That was in 1919. And yet we had the spectacle in this House recently of the Finance Minister (Sir Henry Drayton) bringing down his Budget and promising that there shall be a revision some time in the dim and distant future. The ex-Finance Minister said that this revision was overdue a year ago, or almost a year ago. If it was overdue at that time it is certainly more than overdue to-day. I think we have a right to be disappointed to find that no mention is made of the revision of the tariff this year; the Government speak of waiting until the conditions are stabilized. I think, Mr. Speaker, that considering the course the present Government are taking the conditions will be no more stabilized than they are to-day until we have a general election and perhaps a change of Government—who knows? I think the low tariff supporters of the Government must be easily satisfied if this continued promise of revision from year to year satisfies them. However, I was glad to notice yesterday that they are not all satisfied; that some of them have the courage of their convictions, the courage to get on their feet and condemn the party which they have supported, when they believe it is wrong. If the Government are wise they will take warning from the defections from their ranks, made by men who have supported them for years.

I would warn the Government also not to put off too long this promised investigation into the tariff, because if they put it off a couple of years or more they man not have the opportunity of making the investigation. If they wish to investigate tariff conditions and adopt a tariff that will be satisfactory to Canada, they are making a great mistake, if I may be allowed to give them that advice, in putting it off as long as they have. Their chances for re-election would have been much better if they had brought down a measure for reduction of the tariff this year.

I am very much pleased to see the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) in his seat; I thought that he was going to leave the Chamber, and I wanted to direct his attention to one or two matters. I was rather amused at his speech the other evening, and he is not usually amusing. I do not think that he really meant to be amusing on this occasion, because he seemed to be in his usual sarcastic form. Shall I be allowed to say that he even seemed to be a bit anxious? In one breath he said that it would be the ruination of Canada to lower the tariff, and in the next breath he claimed credit for the party he supports for lowering the tariff on a number of articles, and for taking off the 7½ per cent special war tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to quote two sentences that will illustrate the truth of his two remarks?

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not know just what two sentences out of his speech a man could find that would illustrate what the minister said with regard to any particular matter; but if he will have patience I will go on. He did not explain to this House or to the country that the present Government put on this 7½ per cent duty in the first place; yet he brags that the Government took it off. He puts me in mind of the method followed by some of our retail storekeepers when they put on a cheap sale: they mark their goods up fifty per cent, then mark them down twenty per cent and call it a cheap sale. The minister's reduction of the tariff reminds me very much of this kind of cheap sale.

Another statement the Minister of the Interior made the other evening was that he thought the new Progressive party should support the party in this House that acted, not a party which only professed and did not act on those professions. He also made a great ado because we did not move the Farmers' platform as an amendment to the Budget. Now, no man in this House knows better than the Minister of the Interior that the rules of this House allow only one amendment to be moved to the Budget. The fact that the member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) was the first speaker after the Budget was delivered and that he moved his amendment before he sat down effectively shut us out from moving any other amendment. But, in the first place, I wish to state that the new Progressive party do not propose to support either party in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I be permitted to suggest to the hon. member that he may still move that Farmers' platform in amendment to Supply?

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Mr. CALDWELL: Thank you; no doubt we will do it. I have no doubt that the Government will adopt that platform after the discussion is over. I notice that it seems to be in great demand among the supporters of the Government and that they have already adopted some of its best features. If they should be lucky enough to hold on to office by hook or by crook, I think that they will adopt it all.

But, as I say, we do not propose to support either of the old parties in this House. When a question arises such as the present question before the House we intend to take a stand on it that will be in the best interests of Canada. We may err, but if we do we shall err in judgment; we shall not be whipped into line to support this party or that against our convictions,—do not make any mistake about that. I think that we have proved our independence in this House during the present session; we have voted with the Government perhaps as often as against them. I am only sorry that we were not able to vote with them oftener, because if we had been able to vote with them it would have meant that they were bringing down good legislation, legislation for the good of Canada and which we would have been pleased to support. We do not come here to oppose any party; we are not like the Irishman who said: "Is there a government in the country?" and upon receiving a reply in the affirmative, said: "Well, I am opposed to it." We are certainly not in that position. We are here to support good legislation, not party. Partyism is what has brought governments in Canada—and I use the word "governments" advisedly—to such a condition as that which we see to-day. When people support a party regardless of how—I am almost at a loss for a word to express it strongly enough without disobeying the rules of the House—regardless of how much evil they have committed and how bad the administration is, it tends to bad government. The indications are that this Government will be turned down, if the late by-elections are any indication of the feeling of the people in constituencies where opinion was formerly pretty well divided as between the two parties. I think the Government themselves realize what that means.

With regard to the amendment that is before us, I for one do not approve it in its entirety. But I shall certainly support the amendment, because we have been denied by the rules of the House the privilege of moving a second amendment and I consider the amendment is the lesser of two evils. I would like very much, however, to see the third party in this House recognized as such, so that we should have the privilege of moving a second amendment. When there were only two parties in this House it was certainly proper that there should be only one amendment moved to the Budget, but when there are three parties it is no more than right and fair that two parties should have the privilege of moving amendments. However, we do not feel like insisting very strongly upon our rights as a third party, because we do not expect always to occupy third place in this House. I do not think any hon. member who is in touch with the feeling of the people would be considered a prophet if he expressed the view that after the next general election the present Government would be occupying third place in this House—I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I am not afraid to make this prophecy—and those who live to see will know—that the Unionist party will be the smallest party in this House after the next general election. I firmly believe that, and, as an hon. gentleman near me says, I think the Government believe it too.

Mr. COPP: They look like that.

Mr. CALDWELL: Now, the new system of taxation as proposed by the Finance Minister is said to be a luxury tax on manufacturers and wholesalers, but, to my mind, if that is the mark aimed at, the minister has missed it by a considerable distance. The maximum price on articles exempt from this tax is too low. The poorer a man is the less, for instance, he can afford to buy shoes under $9 a pair, because the cheaper shoes are not of good quality and not good value for the money. What applies to shoes also applies to clothes. No man knows better than the Finance Minister that you cannot buy a decent suit of clothes at less than $45, the maximum price of an untaxed suit. If the maximum amount exempted had been half as much again, it would have been nearer the mark. On the other hand, instead of taxing the manufacturer and wholesaler, the Government are simply imposing another tax on the consumer, because the manufacturer adds the amount of these taxes to his invoices. In fact, the Minister of Finance has instructed him to do so; on Hansard, unrevised edition, page 2571, the manufacturer is specially instructed not to include the tax in the price of the goods but to invoice the goods at the factory price and to state the amount of the tax as a separate item on the invoice. Therefore, the Minister of Finance, by no stretch of his imagination, could claim that this was a tax on the manufacturer, because the manufacturer was instructed to pass it along and mark it as a separate item on the invoice.

I notice the Minister of Finance, as reported on page 2571 of unrevised Hansard, states that this tax shall be deemed to have come into force on the 19th day of May, 1920. I do not know what time of the day these resolutions were presented, but I understand they were presented one afternoon and put into effect the next morning. If this be the case, if the minister can draft a Bill and present it to this House one afternoon and have it put into force the next morning, what is the need of calling Parliament together at all? I had thought that a Bill had to pass this House by a majority of votes and after that be ratified by the Senate, and be signed by the Governor General before it became law. Of course, we know that the present Administration has set all kinds of precedents by way of Orders in Council, but it certainly gave me quite a jolt to find that the Finance Minister could enact a law overnight, and put it into effect the next morning before breakfast. Truly the day of miracles is coming back to us again. It would be much quicker, instead of calling Parliament, for the Minister of Finance to handle this end of the matter; the Minister of the Interior could handle his department, and so on. The trouble is that the Government have not sufficient ministers to man all the departments, and they dare not appoint any new ministers and send them out for election because they might not come back; they might get lost. I might, however, suggest to the Minister of Finance a source of revenue that would not impose a hardship on the common people of Canada; in fact, I believe it would confer a benefit on them. My suggestion would be to impose an export duty on our print paper, say of 10 per cent. I believe there is a possibility that hundreds of our small papers will go out of business after July 1, because at that time their contracts for newsprint, I understand, will expire, and the cost of paper at the present time is so great that the small papers, without increasing their subscriptions to a price that their subscribers would not, perhaps, feel like paying for the paper, will not be able to carry on.

This may not appeal to the Government because, perhaps, the Government would be pleased if there were fewer newspapers printed in this country. Perhaps they would be as well pleased if the doings in this House, especially an event that happened on the other side of the House last night, were not heralded broadcast in the newspapers of this country. I saw this big headline in the newspapers this morning: "Big defection from the Government ranks last night." No doubt the Government would have been pleased if that had not appeared. I believe the United States' papers are willing to pay per ton for newsprint $240, in American money, which means much more in Canadian money at the present time. I believe the representative of a number of British dailies is in Canada, and he has $40,000,000 with which to buy what newsprint he can pick up. If there were a 10 per cent export duty on this commodity, we would collect $4,000,000 on this one deal. I believe there is also in Canada a Hindoo who represents a large combination of publishers in Bombay and who has power to purchase newsprint, price being no consideration, and he wants newsprint in thousand-ton lots. Two years ago, our publishers were paying $45 a ton for newsprint; after the 1st of July they expect to be compelled to pay $240 a ton. Of course, our publishers are not objecting so much to the price; their fear is that they may not be able to secure a supply at all, because these outside firms are willing to pay almost any price for the full output of Canadian newsprint. If I might be allowed, as a new member, to make a suggestion to a gentleman so high up as the Minister of Finance, I would suggest that he take this into his serious consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Did the hon. member say that at the present time Canadian publishers were paying $240 a ton for newsprint?

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand that American or British firms are willing to pay $240 a ton. Canadian publishers are not paying that at the present time. Their contract does not expire until the 1st July; but after that time they expect they will have to pay this sum, or at least, I am so informed by a good number of publishers.

Mr. RICHARDSON: I am sorry I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, because at the present time Canadian publishers are paying $80 per ton.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does the hon. gentleman deny that it will be likely that they will have to pay $240 per ton after the 1st July?

Mr. RICHARDSON: The price after the 1st July will be $110 or possibly it may be $115 per ton, but we are notified that the price will be from $110 to $115.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for correcting me, because I do not wish to mis-state the matter. There is a big difference between $110 and $240 a ton. The publishers who have written me do not object so much to the price; their fear is that they will not be able to get newsprint at all.

I have said that I was somewhat surprised and disappointed at different matters in the Budget Speech, but I was more surprised at a statement made by the mover of the amendment (Mr. Fielding) in his speech of May 18, more especially as he has been looked upon for a long time as the father of the reciprocity agreement and an exponent of lower duties on manufactured articles, especially the instruments of production. On page 2582 of unrevised Hansard, for May 18, he is reported as saying:

> I had a call one day from a manufacturer who informed me that he had no complaint in regard to the tariff. He said he was satisfied with it, and as a matter of fact, was doing fairly well in his business. Indeed, he said, he was contemplating an expansion of his business, and he felt that in view of the large trade he was then doing, and the larger business he was planning to do in the future, he could afford to sell to the ultimate consumer at a little lower price, and so he had scaled down the price of one article of importance in which he was dealing. I remarked that that was gratifying, but he said: "Wait a moment, I want to show you a letter I have," and thereupon he placed on my desk a letter written by an agent of an American manufacturing concern which is engaged in making in the United States a similar commodity to his and shipping it into Canada. This agent wrote to the man of whom I am speaking: "Why do you cut the price? You can just as well get the larger price and there is no reason why you should not. If you reduce your price we will have to reduce too. We will meet your reduction and we will do more than that; if you are going to start reducing prices we will meet you and keep on reducing, and no matter what price you name we will cut below you." Ah! that was a new light upon the question of dumping. Again, I suppose my free trade friends would say: "All right, let him send his goods in; let him come in; so much the better." Well, if we could have got a bond from those manufacturers in the United States that would compel them to send their goods forever at sacrifice prices it would have been an excellent thing to have adopted the course suggested in this hypothetical quotation. We could afford to close our Canadian factories and buy American goods if we could have got a bond from across the border guaranteeing us their goods for all time at a sacrifice price. But who imagines that the American had any intention of doing that indefinitely? His avowed intention was to cut prices and sell at a sacrifice just long enough to close the other man's business. That was the clearest thing in the world, and my manufacturing friend visiting me asked me what he was to do.

Notice that he speaks of just this one friend.

I said to him: "What do you think of the situation yourself?" He replied: "Well, I suppose I have to go back to the old price or shut up shop," and I told him that I could not blame him; I said we would have to think the matter over. We did consider the matter, and the conclusion we came to was embodied in the dumping duty. We came to the conclusion that if big manufacturing concerns in the United States could come here and close up Canadian manufacturing interests it was right that there should be a special duty to meet that condition. It was considered by some as a piece of freak legislation, but I am glad to know that it has been copied in other countries, and the present Government have paid us the compliment of continuing it on the Statute Book.

In the first place, he says that a number of people consider this freak legislation. I think they do yet. I myself would not have felt flattered by having the legislation copied by the present Government, or by having anything in common with them at all. What impressed me most about this statement of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was that if a call on him from one lone manufacturer, who "had no complaint in regard to the tariff" had such an effect on him, an avowed low tariff advocate, as to cause him to enact a protective tariff to protect his one lone manufacturing friend, not from hardship, but from something he was afraid might happen—price cutting—what would he not have done if the Canadian Manufacturers' Association had called on him en masse with some of the cock-and-bull stories they are able to put up with regard to the menace of the United States manufacturers? Does any hon. member of this House or any intelligent elector in this country believe that the United States manufacturers can manufacture goods or machinery any cheaper in the United States than can be done in Canada, or that the United States manufacturer is any fonder of cutting prices than his Canadian competitor? I heard my hon. friend who took his seat not long ago say what good fellows the British manufacturers were because they did not cut the price. That seems to be the one thing in common with all these manufacturers. In the above statement of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's you will see one writing to another, "Why do you cut the price? You could just as easily get a bigger price." And the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's was willing to pass legislation to enable these men to get together and hold the prices up. And still they talk of reducing the cost of living to the consumer! This bogey in regard to the American manufacturer and price-cutting is trotted out time and again and made to do service by our protectionist friends, but I was surprised to find so old and shrewd a politician as the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's riding this hobby, and I would be inclined to think that he is riding for a fall with his own party when he rides that hobby. I should like to warn him that it will have a tendency to discredit his party's low-tariff professions throughout the country. I would also point out to him that there are a large number of electors in this country who are still of the opinion that the duties on the necessities of life should be lowered, if not entirely taken off, and certainly lowered on the implements of production.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that on a former occasion in the early days of this session I made my position fairly clear with regard to the present tariff, but even at the risk of being tedious I wish on this occasion to emphasize some of the remarks I made at that time. I wish especially to impress on this House and the country the fact that a tariff law that will enable an American manufacturer to establish a branch factory or assembling plant in Canada, bring in his raw material practically duty free, and charge the Canadian consumer the price of the finished article, plus the duty, putting that duty in his pocket, or worse still into his Yankee bank account—a tariff law that will enable that to be done has something radically wrong with it. The duty that this American manufacturer collects from the Canadian consumer does not stay in Canada. It might make us feel a little more comfortable if we felt it was going to make Canadian millionaires, but we are making American millionaires, for this money does not stay in Canada.

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) made a statement that you could buy machinery as cheap in Canada as in the United States. Fortunately, I had heard that statement before, and I went to the trouble of securing price-lists of an American farm machinery company doing business both in the United States and Canada. It is an American firm with a factory, or assembling plant, whichever you like to call it, in Canada. My hon. friend quoted the prices of axes in Montreal and Pittsburg. No doubt those axes were manufactured by different firms at widely separated points. The price-lists I have here are those of an American firm with a Canadian branch factory, or assembling plant—the firm itself calls it a factory. The two points at which these price-lists are put into effect are only six miles apart on either side of the American boundary, one being in the State of Maine and the other in New Brunswick. I am not simply giving hearsay in this matter, because I live within six miles of the American boundary line myself, and I know the conditions; I know whereof I speak. Two men living on adjoining farms, one on the American side, and the other on the Canadian side, buy the same machine and one pays the American price, while the man on the Canadian side pays the bigger price. Here are the prices. On a six-foot mower the price in Canada is $97.50; in the United States, $90; a ten-foot rake, $57 in Canada, $52 in the United States; five-foot reaper, $134 in Canada, $125 in the United States; nine-foot land roller, $77.50 in Canada, $60 in the United States; six-foot binder, $258.50 in Canada, $235 in the United States; six-row potato sprayer, $235 in Canada, $185 in the United States. If you want any more evidence I can give it by the yard. I am sure that these prices will be of interest to the hon. member for Lincoln, who, I am sorry, is not in his seat. I know they are of interest to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), who I see eyeing me very sharply. I have some of his prices here which I could compare with the prices of machinery sold by the Grain Growers in Winnipeg, but I will not put them on Hansard unless he wishes. He shakes his head. I do not blame him.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Do not consider me. You won't hurt me.

Mr. CALDWELL: Of course the same old cry will be raised, how will you raise your revenue? I should like to ask my high protectionist friends how the revenue has always been raised. The people of Canada must always raise the revenue, but there has been a tendency for the party in power in this country to make the people believe that the Government by some miraculous agency was able to raise the revenue of the country without going into the pockets of the people. The sooner we get away from that fallacy the better, because there is no miraculous way of raising the revenue. It is up to this Parliament (and we can all assist if they will take our advice a little) to devise the most economic method for raising the revenue. I do not think a man needs to be any very great student of economics to realize that our present tariff is the most extravagant method of raising the revenue that could be devised, for, as I have shown, pretty clearly I think, for every dollar of duty, especially on the implements of production which I have mentioned, that goes into the treasury of the country, perhaps three or four go into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturer, or worse still, into the pockets of the American manufacturer with a Canadian branch factory, who sends the duty he collects from the Canadian people back to his Yankee bank account.

Mr. COPP: Does that apply to the ploughs as well?

Mr. CALDWELL: Undoubtedly. I do not blame the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, or the hon. member for Lincoln for protesting against the lowering of the tariff, because it would cut off a mighty nice graft they have been collecting from the people. I put the blame where it rightly belongs, and that is on the shoulders of any government or any party in this country which will enact legislation allowing them to do this. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, or its members, are only human after all—we are all more or less human. One of these Canadian manufacturers is so human that I think he made the statement under oath that he was not running his factory for the glory of God, but to make dividends for the shareholders. That is what we are all doing more or less, but I hope that some of us, in our daily work and business, are giving a little more glory to God than that man was. However, I say I do not blame these people, but the Government, which enacts legislation which enables them to do it, and even instructs them through that legislation how to do it by stating on the invoice to the next man to whom the manufacturer sells his goods what the tax is and to charge it up, for fear it would not otherwise be charged up to the retailer. and in turn to the consumer. From my experience with the manufacturers I do not think those instructions were needed. I do not think the Minister of Finance needed to add that rider to his Bill.

Of course, your high protectionists will say that if you take the duties off these things, it means direct taxation. I for one, am not afraid of direct taxation, nor are the farmers of this country, and if the farmers, the largest property holders in Canada—I say that without fear of successful contradiction—are not afraid of direct taxation, why should the rest of the people be afraid of it? I consider that direct taxation is the only equitable method of raising the revenue, because then every man in Canada will pay his share according to his ability to pay. In other words, he pays according to what he is worth, instead of on what he consumes. I think the tariff carried to its logical conclusion even tends to race suicide in this country, and I will show you why. You need not laugh Mr. Cockshutt, because I can show you that what I say is true.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must point out to the hon. member that the rule of the House requires that a member shall refer to another hon. member by his constituency.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am sorry for having transgressed the rules of the House, Mr. Speaker, but I assure you I did so inadvertently. May I ask if it is in accordance with the rules of the House for one hon. member to laugh at another?

An hon. MEMBER: Of course; if you talk rubbish.

Mr. CALDWELL: I do not mind the laugh, Mr. Speaker, and I know it does the member for Brantford good. By direct taxation a man is taxed on what he is worth and not on what he consumes. I believe, Sir, that the tariff, carried to its logical conclusion will tend to race suicide at the present high cost of living. Take a labouring man working for ordinary wages and having to support a family of nine; indeed, Mr. Speaker, I know a man in my constituency—he is a farmer—with a family of twenty-one. At the present high cost of living, with the high duty on woollen goods and shoes, and with this new tax added to all these articles if they come above the maximum price at which goods are exempt—and I believe that a good many articles will come above that price even when bought by the poorest people in Canada—it will be almost prohibitive for a poor man to raise a family. For that reason I think I am justified in saying that the tariff will tend to race suicide; I think I am logical in that statement. With regard to direct taxation I am very much pleased to know that I am in such close accord, on this very important subject, with one of the oldest and possibly one of the wisest parliamentarians in Canada to-day. I refer to the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), and I desire to quote from his speech delivered on May 18, 1920, at page 2592 of unrevised Hansard:

> Every one must realize the fact that there is a duty to be done, and that it is not by the indirect method that it shall be done. We have had two systems of taxation, one almost entirely predominating up to the present time, and that is the method of indirect taxation, by which the people paid heavily and did not know when they were doing so. All sorts of assertions have been made as to the amounts they paid,—assertions which of course would partake of the particular power of imagination of the man who made them and of his boldness of speech. All kinds of assertions, have been made, many of them grotesquely exaggerated; but nevertheless one of the features of indirect taxation is that you pay out not knowing how much you do pay. I doubt if that system of taxation altogether imposed upon a country is a good school teacher to that country, and does finally eventuate in what is best for the interests of the people.

To draw a comparison, Mr. Speaker, or to illustrate the principle of indirect taxation I might suggest that it is just the same as if a storekeeper, when a customer went into his store to buy something, got some one to divert that person's attention while he picked his pockets, and if the customer did not know that this was being done it would be all right. That is the principle of indirect taxation carried to its logical conclusion: "If you do not know that your money is gone, therefore it is not gone." The statement I have just quoted, coming from an hon. gentleman of the ability and experience of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a man who has always advocated the indirect method of raising a revenue—or in other words a tariff for revenue—cannot fail to impress the members of this House and the people of this country.

I wish also, before I sit down, to compliment the hon. Minister of Finance on the fact that he had the courage to say that he would not exempt the last Victory loan from taxation, especially in view of the precedent which his predecessor had established in the matter. I wish also to compliment the Government on the enactment of the income tax measure, as I believe it is one of the wisest acts that have been passed by this Government, and I also believe that the exemption of the former Victory loans was perhaps the most unwise act of the present Administration. I think, Mr. Speaker, that "unwise" is even too mild a word to express my disapproval of this act, and I hardly think the ex-Minister of Finance realized the seriousness of this act at the time, nor the far-reaching consequences of it. In the first place, now that we have this very wise income tax Act, the people with large incomes are seeking every avenue of escape from its operation, and this exemption of the Victory bonds provides a very good way of escape for them. And in view of the immense revenue that Canada must raise, not only this year, but for at least as long a period or possibly longer, than these bonds are issued for, I consider it was little short of criminal to exempt them from taxation, for in this way our wealthy men in Canada are able to tie up their wealth so that we cannot tax the income from it, and the Government know what that means; at any rate I hope they do. It means that if the wealth of the country escapes taxation, the rest of us must pay more in consequence.

Last summer as I travelled through the province from which I come I saw in every broker's window, and in the windows of a good many barristers in the different towns through which I passed, some such notice as this: "Victory bonds bought and sold"; and I wondered what they meant, because I knew there was no Victory loan floated at that time. My mother used to tell me when I was a boy that I was of a rather inquisitive turn of mind, and I fear that I have not entirely overcome that failing, if it is a failing. I was therefore somewhat curious to know what this notice meant. On inquiry I found that they were not selling Victory bonds at all but were buying them, and I was anxious to know the reason. The corporations and individuals in our province—and I imagine that what is true in the case of New Brunswick it true in regard to every other province in Canada—who formerly had money to loan on real estate were withdrawing it as fact as they could find tax-exempt bonds to invest in. They were withdrawing their money out of these loans as fast as possible and getting different brokers and barristers to buy Victory bonds. Someone will say, perhaps, that they would not get many. Well, Sir, it would surprise you to know how many they gathered in. We have many patriotic people in our province, and though I would not claim a greater share of patriotism for that province than exists in any other province, I do not think that it will take second place to any other part of Canada so far as response to duty is concerned. We have a number of very patriotic people in our province, I say, who did not have very much money to invest but who felt that they should do what they could to help in the crisis that faced the country. A number of these people bought Victory bonds and made a payment down of only 10 per cent. At a later period they were having a hard time to finance their business, or for one reason or another they were not able to make their further payments, either it was not convenient for them to do so, or they could make more money perhaps in some other avenue of business; at any rate, a large number of these small bond holders—not the big ones, but holders of $50, $100, and $500 bonds—were anxious to sell, and the brokers gathered up their bonds. The consequence is that in New Brunswick to-day you cannot borrow money on real estate at the same interest that you could before those Victory loans were floated. It not only deprives the people of this wealth in New Brunswick, as well as all over Canada, but it makes it harder for the poor man who wants to get into business to borrow money; so it has had a double effect.

Another thing that makes the tax exemption of these bonds more iniquitous than an ordinary Act of Parliament is the fact that it cannot be repealed; it is like the laws of the Medes and Persians. Being a part of the agreement made with the people of Canada when we borrowed this money from them, no Government has any power to rescind or vary it, and we must stand by that agreement, no matter how iniquitous we find it to be.

I wish also to refer to another matter, contained in a series of questions that I put on the Order Paper and which were answered on March 16 by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid)—and I am very sorry that he is not in his seat. However, he will be able to read this in Hansard and I hope he will be able to clear the matter up for me, because I must confess that it has disturbed me somewhat. The questions are as follows:

Did the Dominion Government make an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to secure running rights for the said St. John and Quebec Railway trains over the said Canadian Pacific railway between Westfield Beach and St. John?

The answer is: No. The next question is:

If so, what was the date of such agreement and the terms?

The answer is: Answered by No. 4. The next question is:

And if the Dominion Government did not make such agreement, who did, and what are the terms?

The answer is:

St. John and Quebec Railway Co. The terms are as follows: St. John and Quebec Railway Co.

are to pay interest on a proportion of the value of the joint section plus a proportion of all working expenses calculated on a wheelage basis.

The last question is:

Is the Dominion Government now operating the St. John and Quebec Railway as part of the Dominion Government railway system?

The answer to which is:

This line is being operated by the Canadian Government railways as part of the system.

Those answers look all right on their face, but I was afraid at the time that possibly the Minister of Railways did not have correct information, for I did not suppose the error was a typographical one and knowing the facts in connection with this transaction I realized these answers could not be correct. Consequently I was not at all surprised when I saw the statement made by the Premier of New Brunswick in the Provincial House of Assembly on April 19, 1920, in regard to this matter. It will be noticed that the answers to my questions were given on the 16th of April, and the Premier of New Brunswick made his statement three days later. He said:

It was expected that the Canadian National railways would take over the road for operation when completed on September 1st, 1919. For more than a year previous the directors of the company had been urging on the management of the Canadian National railways the necessity of making some arrangement with the Canadian Pacific railway for running rights between St. John and Westfield. Assurance had been given by the officials of the Canadian National railways that such arrangements had been made and that there would be no difficulty or delay. When the road was completed, however, it was found that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would not allow Valley railway trains to run over their tracks until an agreement in writing had been made. The statute provided that if the St. John and Quebec Railway Company did not make an arrangement for running rights that the Canadian National railways could do so, in which case the Valley railway could take no share of the receipts from the line between Westfield and St. John, nor would it be obliged to pay the rental and other charges in respect to that section. The Canadian National Railway people had due notice that the province would not assume the burden of paying the Canadian Pacific railway for running rights. It was felt that the interest on the money borrowed for the purpose of constructing the railway entailed a sufficient burden for the people of New Brunswick and it would not be wise to assume additional obligation, a rental which apparently would have amounted to $100,000 per year. They thought that the Dominion, which had done so much to relieve other provinces in railway matters, could very easily take up the responsibility of providing for the connecting link between Westfield and St. John. The Government of New Brunswick and the directors had been active in seeing to it that an agreement between the Canadian National railways and the Canadian Pacific railway was consummated, and after considerable delay the Valley railway trains were allowed to run into St. John. The delay was regrettable, and the Government of New Brunswick felt that it was attributable to the officials of the Canadian National railways and not to the directors of the St. John and Quebec Railway Company or the Provincial Government. Neither the Government of New Brunswick nor the railway company has agreed to be bound by any arrangement with respect to running rights, nor had the Canadian National railways been authorized to act on behalf of the Government of New Brunswick in connection therewith. The Government of New Brunswick did not expect to receive any portion of the receipts for the section between St. John and Westfield.

That is a copy of the official report of the statement made by the Premier of New Brunswick. It will be readily seen that if the answers of the Minister of Railways are correct, this statement is not correct; while if the statement by the Premier of New Brunswick is correct, the answers by the Minister of Railways to my questions are not correct. I hope that when the railway Estimates are before the House the Minister of Railways will clear up this matter, because it is of some concern to our province.

I believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway proposition was that the Government should pay 6 per cent on half the cost of the ten mile section from Westfield Beach to St. John, valued at $3,000,000. That would amount to $90,000 per year. Besides that the Government were to pay a proportion of all the working expenses calculated on a wheelage basis, which would amount, as the Premier of New Brunswick has said, to $100,000 or more. Perhaps this will give us some insight into why the Canadian National railways made a deficit last year of $47,000,000, for if the system is managed by the same inefficient methods as the running rights were secured by, it is no wonder that we have such a heavy deficit.
