HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 9, 1979

• (1035)

FIRST SESSION—THIRTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT

[English]

The Thirtieth Parliament having been dissolved by proclamation on Monday, March 26, 1979, and writs having been issued and returned, a new Parliament was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on Tuesday, October 9, 1979, and did accordingly meet on that day.

Tuesday, October 9, 1979

This being the day on which Parliament is convoked by proclamation of His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada for the dispatch of business, and the members of the House being assembled:

• (1040)

C. B. Koester, Esquire, the Clerk of the House, read to the House a letter that the Honourable Ronald Martland, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to open the first session of the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada on this day, Tuesday, the ninth of October, 1979, at 10.30 a.m.

A message was delivered by Colonel T. G. Bowie, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Members of the House of Commons:

It is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada that this honourable House attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable members of the Senate, and members of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General of Canada does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock, His Excellency the Governor General of Canada will declare the cause of calling this Parliament.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

HON. JAMES JEROME, MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF SUDBURY

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Dr. Koester, the time has now come to proceed to the appointment of a candidate as Speaker of the House of Commons, a privilege long bestowed on the Prime Minister. The Deputy Governor General has just told us that the Prime Minister cannot state the reasons for convening Parliament until such time as a Speaker has been elected, because without a Speaker we are but a group of men and women and not a House of Commons. The Speaker is indeed our spokesman.

The first Speakers elected by their parliamentary colleagues had the responsibility of speaking to the sovereign, because the House had fought for several centuries to wrest from the crowned head of the state the power to rule the country in order to put it in the hands of the elected representatives of the people. It was indeed a dangerous office, requiring an exemplary courage and strength of conviction of those elected to it.

That is why we are electing a Speaker today. According to our tradition, he is supposed to resist the appointment and be accompanied to the Speaker's chair. This reminds us all that our government is a democratic one, that democracy has evolved over many centuries and that each and every one of us must do his or her utmost to protect our democratic rights and privileges.

• (1100)

[English]

The Speaker, sir, is the custodian of the privileges, rights, and the honour of the House of Commons, for he presides over the debates of the House and enforces the observance of all of the rules for preserving order in its proceedings. He is the representative of the House in its relations with the Crown, the Senate and other authorities and persons outside Parliament.

The Speaker has to be many things. He must be rigorously and scrupulously impartial in his deliberations. He is the servant of the whole House, not just a particular party. He must have a thorough knowledge of the rules, orders and precedents which guide our proceedings. Since, in the heat of debate, we are sometimes fractious, he must be firm, wise and able judiciously to settle our differences.

I am sure the members of this House will agree that Mr. James Jerome has displayed all of these qualities since he was first elected Speaker in 1974. He has been fair, effective and sensitive in presiding over this House through five active years.

It is, therefore, Dr. Koester, my great pleasure to move, seconded by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau):

That James Jerome, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Sudbury, do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Koester, dear colleagues of the House of Commons, may the agreement between the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and myself on the appointment of the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) as Speaker of the House of Commons be a token of harmony during this new Parliament. His appointment is also of historical significance in that, for the first time ever, a member of the opposition has been recommended for that important office by the government party.

• (1105)

[English]

I must confess that I feel a little like a father sending a son off into the world, anxious for his well-being but confident in his ability and determination to fight for the common good.

In the context of this Parliament, the hon. member for Sudbury is a natural choice to guide its business, moderate its disputes and uphold its procedures. I think we have made a right choice, for in the past five years he has presided over this House with wisdom, understanding and good humour. It would be a tough act to follow, and it is perhaps provident for all of us that he is following his own act.

Filled with good will as we are today, most of us know this will not be an easy Parliament. I suppose no Parliament is easy, but the experience of the last two decades has shown that minority Parliaments are fascinating, challenging and nerve-racking. Perhaps no-one's nerves are more on the rack than those of the Speaker, who holds the reins to pull the House together.

[Translation]

It can very well be stated and repeated that the government will act as if it had a majority, but the facts remain unchanged. Given that element of suspense, the atmosphere will be electric and the Speaker will have a difficult part to play warding off a storm. It rests with us all to recognize that the proceedings of the House are always vitally important for the country and go beyond mere partisan interests. My right hon. colleague opposite and his party now form the government. As for myself and the Liberal party, we will be playing a new role in the opposition. The roles have been reversed, but I am sure that both sides have had an opportunity to think it over during the past few months.

• (1110)

[English]

There can be an honest debate over the many changes of the past decade, but there is no question that change, slow as it always is with the parliamentary structure, has produced benefits for all parties. Rather than stifle opportunity, it has expanded it and past oppositions have benefited in a way to make them, as I well know, much more effective observers of government.

I talk of rule changes, of course, but there are many other innovations which were brought forth in the past ten years to make the oppositions more effective critics of governments, such as research staffs for caucuses, increased office and staff, space in the Confederation Building, offices in the constituencies, certain travel and telecommunications facilities, and broadcasting of the House of Commons. All these have made Parliament more effective, and the oppositions more effective.

Equally as important as change is the interpretation of change to fit the pressures of the House of Commons. In the past five years, the Chair has assessed these pressures in accordance with the Standing Orders and has issued, on a variety of occasions, its view of how procedures are best adapted to the functioning of the House.

In 1975, the hon. member for Sudbury set out in some detail his views on the considerations which should govern the daily question period, which he described as unique. To use his own words:

It is an excellent feature of our Parliament and while we have much to learn from other governmental systems, the question period is one area in which we are in the forefront of responsible government and every effort must be made to preserve the excellence of this practice.

He went on to say:

—any basic principle governing the question period ought to be such that it will enable members to put questions with a minimum of interference.

In a similar manner, he widened the operation of Standing Order 43 when it was agreed, in 1976, to allow 15 minutes to this procedure rather than have it encroach on the question period itself. I use these examples, Mr. Koester, to illustrate how the House has benefited from a flexible approach to its procedures in rapidly changing times.

I wish to assure the hon. member for Sudbury, should the House elect him to succeed himself, that this opposition will strive to follow the interpretations he has set down in the past which always gave a fair shake to the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Finally, I would like to touch briefly on another aspect of this nomination which we feel is extremely important. This party has adhered consistently over the years to the underlying principle of the independence of the Speaker. On a number of occasions we have had debates and arguments about what independence means. I know some of my friends in other parties believe it is best achieved by the creation of a permanent Speaker who is above participation in the political process; in essence, a figurehead who has security of tenure no matter how the political winds may shift.

Our view of independence, on the other hand, is that of a Speaker who is one among equals. He has earned his way into the House of Commons through election as a member of Parliament and then, through the confidence of his parliamentary peers, is chosen to serve them as the arbiter of their interests. Through this process we endorse our Speaker with the substance of independence, and I commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) for accepting the principle that a member who has had the confidence of the House of Commons as its impartial presiding officer may continue to enjoy that confidence regardless of party affiliation.

[Translation]

My colleagues of the official opposition also join me in supporting the motion respecting the election of the hon. member for Sudbury to the Chair of the House and we can assure him of our support and co-operation.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Dr. Koester, I am pleased to give the support of our party to that motion.

• (1115)

[English]

I add immediately in this context, Dr. Koester, that under this motion—one which I am sure will be carried unanimously—we shall be reappointing the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) to perform in the present Parliament the duties he so ably carried out for us in the last. I would only add this to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) have said—incidentally, it was interesting to note that the Leader of the Opposition has taken a new-found interest in the fate of the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —I understand the hon. member for Sudbury has just returned from a visit to China, and therefore he will understand me better than most when I say that the coming Parliament will be one in which we shall be living in interesting times. A man or a woman—in this case, a man—of a judicious nature, fair-mindedness and tough-mindedness is required, and my colleagues and I cannot think of anyone who better fits the bill than does the hon. member for Sudbury.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Dr. Koester, I am very happy to join the mover and the seconder as well as the leader of the New Democratic Party in supporting the motion now before us. I think the selection of the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) as Speaker of this House is a very wise one. His experience and competence are known not only in this House but also outside of it. And I think that the way he ran the business of the House of Commons in recent years is a sign of his impartiality and his intention that the business of the House be carried out in an orderly and dignified fashion. I am convinced his experience will be very useful to the House, and his role is to consider as well that there are also minorities in this House. There are four political parties sitting here with avowed responsibilities. That is why we rely on the co-operation and impartiality of the Speaker so all members on both sides of the House can be heard and represent their fellow citizens and carry out the role they have been assigned under their mandate.

Dr. Koester, I want to assure him of my support and that of all my colleagues so he may indeed carry out that task with dignity and impartiality.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Dr. Koester, I think that the Social Credit Party of Canada having been given the floor it might be agreed that other members participate at this point in the debate and join the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) as well as the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) as well as the Leader of the New Democratic Party and my good friend the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) in supporting this nomination with great pleasure.

• (1120)

[English]

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and James Jerome, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Sudbury, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Mr. Jerome was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's chair by right hon. Joe Clark and right hon. P. E. Trudeau.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members, I beg to return my humble acknowledgements to the House for the great honour you have been pleased to confer on me by choosing me to be your Speaker.

It is hard to believe that it is a little more than five years ago that I first spoke those unfamiliar words, and in doing so I reflected at that time on the tradition that those words involve. I then said, not considering myself at that time to be much of a traditionalist, that in examining traditions those which persist seem always to have an intrinsic value to them which far outweighs their mere ceremonial significance, and that language with which an elected Speaker humbly returns acknowledgements for such a great honour is accurate in every way and significant, just as the tradition of resisting, once chosen by the House, taking on this obligation.

That has as its roots the traditions of the very speakership itself which, even in its terminology, seems to be obscure in meaning because the one thing the Speaker is never seen to do is to speak in the House or, at least, not very often, to the delight of the members, I am sure.

Going back to the early traditions of this great responsibility, initially having to go, on behalf of Parliament, to appear before the monarch in his own chosen chamber, and there to demand, on behalf of the people of the nation who had dared to get themselves elected into a House of Commons and, furthermore, dared to try to have a say in how the country might be run—a development which was not particularly popular with the monarch at the time—meant that Speakers were not very popular with the monarch at the time and in fact one of them, on this mission on behalf of democracy, was beheaded.

I say that so that my reluctance in coming to the Chair will be understood, and I have no illusions that on many days during the course of this Parliament that would be a fate which would seem quite acceptable as far as most members of the House of Commons are concerned; and, in fact, on some days there will be some who will be glad to take a hand at the axe.

In any case, I am happy to say that the reception which we now receive in the other place is much more cordial. Nevertheless, even this afternoon my first obligation on your behalf will be to appear before the representative of Her Majesty to demand, on our behalf, the rights and privileges we require to carry out our business as elected representatives, freedom of speech in this assembly and the right to carry out, free from interference from Her Majesty or any other powers, our business on behalf of the electors of the country.

[Translation]

Needless to say, it is a great honour to be elected as a member of the House of Commons. And if it is an honour to gain approval from the supreme judges within our democratic system, our fellow citizens, it is an even greater one to be chosen by hon. members to preside over these important sittings.

• (1125)

[English]

It is an honour and an obligation which I accept with humility. I accept it on your behalf and I make the commitment to you, as I did five years ago, that I will place the obligation above every other consideration, whether it be of party politics, of family, of friends, or whatever. It is an obligation which I place above every other. I said then that it was one that I never expected to fulfil. Certainly, I never expected that I would be standing here attempting to fulfil it a second time.

In conclusion, may I say, in thanking the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) and the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy), that it is not possible for any Speaker to preside over this chamber without the good will of the members. Furthermore, it is only possible to succeed, or hope to succeed, on the basis of your desire that the meetings be orderly.

I cannot help but conclude that we have taken a step in these last five years, in introducing television into our proceedings, which has placed us, I believe, in the forefront of the democratic nations of the world, because the essence and the fundamental principle of democratic government is that it takes place in the open, in full view of the citizens. Television has made that possible in our society in a way that no other single step has been able to accomplish in our history. It has offered us the opportunity to participate together as citizens in this process, but it has also placed upon us the obligation to see to it that in this chamber, where often opinions clash, our meetings are exemplary, not only in the content of our dealings but also in our attitude and our conduct toward each other.

I say to you that it is with your good will and your consensus that we will be able to have such meetings. My ability to preside over them always rests in your hands. This will never change, and the minute I lose that good will or that confidence I shall not be able to preside. It is you who make it possible to preside and I offer you my co-operation, as I have tried to give it in the past, because I do believe that together we will make this one of the great Parliaments of our country. I thank you again for the confidence you have placed in me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SITTING SUSPENDED

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the sitting be suspended until 3 p.m. this day.

Mr. Speaker: It has been suggested by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) that the sitting be suspended until three o'clock this afternoon. Is the House agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, the sitting is suspended until three o'clock this afternoon.

At 11.26 a.m. the sitting was suspended until 3 p.m. this day.

• (1510)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 3 p.m.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary announcing that His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Colonel T. G. Bowie, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada that this honourable House attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber. Then the Hon. James Jerome, Speaker of the House of Commons, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons have elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada was pleased to open Parliament by a speech from the throne.

● (1548)

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to report that, the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

[English]

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-1, respecting the administration of the oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the First Session of the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada.

Canada has been honoured this year by visits from two members of the Royal Family. In April the Prince of Wales travelled to the west and north and to Toronto and Ottawa. In June and July Queen Elizabeth The Queen Mother graciously undertook engagements in Halifax and Toronto. Members will be pleased to hear of Prince Philip's forthcoming brief visit this October in preparation for the Duke of Edinburgh's Commonwealth Study Conference in Canada next spring. Meanwhile in November Princess Anne will fulfil engagements with the Canadian Save the Children Fund.

During this year I have had a most memorable opportunity to reinforce my appreciation of the beauty, variety and natural wealth of our country. My wife and I have experienced the warm welcome extended to us by each region in its own special way. We have paid official visits to all ten provinces and the Northwest Territories, and we look forward to a visit before long to the Yukon Territory. We have also had periods of residence in The Citadel, Quebec, and in quarters made available in the Governor's House at Lower Fort Garry.

I am proud, in my capacity as representative of our gracious Sovereign Queen Elizabeth II, to participate in this important ceremony in the life of our nation, which brings together the three elements of the Parliament of Canada, the Crown, the Senate and the House of Commons.

I look forward to meeting the members of this new Parliament.

My ministers were given a mandate to change the direction of the Government of Canada, as we enter the 1980s. The basic purposes of that change will be to enhance the rights, freedoms and opportunities of individual Canadians, and re-establish the spirit of partnership and renewal which are fundamental to our federation.

[Translation]

The mandate of my ministers is also to build upon the special strengths of Canada. We front on one mass market and three great oceans, with access to the world. Each of our regions contains vast physical resources which can be the basis of industrial strength well into the future. Confident local identities are emerging—rooted in language, custom and community—and yielding a cultural vitality unique among nations. My ministers believe that the way to build a whole nation is to respect our individual parts, and you will be invited to consider measures to build upon the diverse regional and cultural strengths of Canada.

During the past four months, my ministers have made every effort to change the climate of federal/provincial relations which has prevailed in recent years. As a result of their efforts, there has been visible progress. An agreement on lotteries has been concluded and agreement in principle has been reached with certain coastal provinces concerning offshore mineral resources. Bringing about this change in relations is fundamental to my government's philosophy. Working with our provincial partners, we seek practical solutions to concrete problems.

To make federalism work, it is essential to change the attitudes of the past and the federal government must set the example. Accordingly, it is a primary goal of my government to bring about a new era in federal-provincial relations. Consultation and co-operation will be the hallmarks of that new era. The time has come to reconcile our differences. It is time to work together to fully realize our country's potential. It is by building for the future that we will renew Canadian federalism. In this spirit, my government looks forward to the next Conference of First Ministers in Ottawa this year.

[English]

Citizens and Parliament can control government only if information is public. You will be asked to approve freedom of information legislation based on the principle that government information should be available to the people, that necessary exceptions to that principle should be limited and specified, and that disputes over the application of those exceptions should be resolved independently of the government.

To correct inequities currently borne by some Canadian individuals, you will be asked to amend sections of the Indian Act, to extend spouses' allowances in circumstances where they are now denied, to amend certain legislation respecting veterans, and to further protect the privacy of individual Canadians.

You will also be asked to consider reforms to extend the power of Parliament. Proposals will be submitted to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to strengthen the powers and resources of parliamentary committees, to accord more prominence to private members' initiatives, and to make my ministers more accountable to you. The standing committee also will be invited to consider the question of a permanent Speaker for the House of Commons.

To demonstrate the capacity of Parliament, you will be asked to approve the immediate establishment of four small select committees, with the resources and powers necessary to enquire fully into the special needs of handicapped and disabled Canadians; measures to strengthen the role of the voluntary sector in our society; policies with respect to foreign ownership, including the operations of the Foreign Investment Review Agency; and measures necessary to prevent recurring cost overruns on major government projects. You will be invited to establish a joint committee to undertake a broad enquiry into the future development of nuclear energy in Canada. In addition, standing committees of Parliament will be invited to examine Canadian cultural policy, Canadian foreign policy, and the retirement income needs of Canadians in the 1980s. Annual reports of crown corporations, the commissioner of official languages, the Economic Council of Canada and other similar bodies will be referred automatically to the appropriate committees of Parliament.

To broaden responsibility for the management of Parliament, Privy Councillors not members of cabinet and drawn from both sides of the House will be invited to serve as commissioners of internal economy.

[Translation]

My ministers believe the greatest immediate challenge facing Canada today is to restore growth, confidence and jobs to the Canadian economy. While our economy faces serious immediate problems, my government believes the economic potential of Canada is the strongest in the world. My ministers will propose a five-part strategy to build on that potential.

First, my ministers will reduce the burden of government on the economy by better controlling expenditures. A new expenditure management system has been introduced within the government to set strict over-all spending limits, to ensure that all ministers accept full responsibility for spending restraint, and to require that funds for new programs come from savings in existing programs. In that context, you will be asked to approve creation of a Ministry of State for Social Development to better co-ordinate social programs and expenditures.

My government has initiated action to reduce the size of the federal public service and to offer for private purchase and ownership Crown corporations operating in areas where direct government intervention is no longer necessary. Legislation will be introduced to strengthen control over and accountability of remaining Crown corporations. You will also be asked to approve "sunset" legislation to provide a regular opportunity for Parliament to judge whether government programs and agencies need continue in their present form, if at all. The form of the estimates to be placed before you will be improved to provide more accurate information. You will be given projections of government revenues and expenditures for the next four years so that you can judge the probable impact of today's decisions on tomorrow's economy.

[English]

Second, my government will place greater reliance on individual initiative to generate growth and jobs for Canadians. You will receive proposals for regulatory reform, designed to ensure that the certainty and nature of government regulation encourages individual initiative and planning. Measures will be introduced to expand research and development in Canada and to further promote exports of Canadian goods and services. You will be asked to approve agreements arising from the Tokyo round of multilateral trade negotiations, including adjustment measures for industries adversely affected by those agreements. The Minister of State for Economic Development will convene a National Economic Development Conference to discuss with the provinces, business, labour, co-operatives and other groups, Canada's economic goals for the decade ahead, and how they might best be achieved in a spirit of full economic partnership. In that same spirit, legislation will be introduced to improve the handling of industrial disputes within federal jurisdiction.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Third, my government will propose measures to help individual Canadians build a stake in our country. You will be asked to approve a program of tax credits for mortgage interest and property taxes. Measures will be placed before you to assist small and medium-size enterprises, and to encourage more Canadians to participate in the ownership of public and private enterprises. You will be asked to consider revisions to the Employment Tax Credit program, the creation of a Youth Employment Secretariat, and other measures to create new jobs for young Canadians. An employment strategy for women will be placed before you. Programs to assist native Canadians to develop and apply work skills will be expanded. Changes will be introduced in the unemployment insurance program to ensure greater equity and to remove disincentives to work.

Fourth, my government will ask you to support programs which build upon the strengths of the regions of Canada. Legislation will be placed before you to strengthen the mandate of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. You will be asked to consider a white paper on future development of our fisheries resources, prepared in consultation with fishermen, the fishing industry and the provinces. My ministers have begun to overhaul the grain transportation system through appointment of a grain transportation co-ordinator, the signing of agreements for the development of the Prince Rupert terminal, and a significant increase in hopper car capacity. A Seaway Advisory Council will be created to ensure that users and affected areas can contribute to policy concerning this essential waterway. My government will ensure an even flow of work to Canadian shipyards, as we develop an effective Canadian merchant fleet. Measures will be introduced to encourage further mining development in the Canadian north, and to strengthen the capacity of our two territorial governments to manage their own affairs. In co-operation with the provinces and industry, a national tourism strategy will be developed.

Fifth, my government is committed to making Canada self-sufficient in energy by 1990. To that end, in consultation with the provinces, measures will be introduced to encourage a significant reduction in Canada's over-all energy consumption, and to stimulate a major expansion in our capacity to supply and distribute energy in various forms. In bringing forth these measures, my government accepts and respects provincial jurisdiction over resources, as it accepts its own responsibility to ensure economic stability, competitive advantage and other national objectives.

My government views the diversity of Canada as a great national asset, and is determined to encourage, not limit, the development and expression of that diversity. That encouragement will be the beginning principle of the proposals by my ministers for consideration by the parliamentary committee reviewing cultural policies. It will be the purpose of an amendment to the Immigration Act to embed in its preamble the multicultural fact of Canada.

[Translation]

Legislation will be introduced to encourage fuller provincial and parliamentary participation in telecommunications policy-making. The Canadian Film Development Corporation Act will be amended to significantly increase private sector participation in the corporation and to broaden its mandate to encompass development of the recording and publishing industries in Canada.

Members of the House of Commons,

During the session you will be asked to appropriate the funds required for the services and payments authorized by Parliament.

You will be asked to approve a number of bills left pending at the dissolution of the previous Parliament.

You will be asked to consider other measures.

[English]

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May divine providence guide you in your deliberations.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General delivered this day from the throne to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration later this day.

Motion agreed to.

The Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, member for the electoral district of Prince Albert, by decease.

Accordingly, new writs of election have been issued.

THE LATE RIGHT HON. J. G. DIEFENBAKER

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate at this point in the proceedings of the first session of the Thirty-first Parliament for the House of Commons of Canada to pause and pay tribute to a man whose presence dominated this chamber for almost four decades, the late Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker. Different Canadians remember different qualities of that extraordinary man. But whatever our other memories over a long and dynamic past I think all of us see him here in this House of Commons in a fighting stance, a House of Commons man who came to symbolize an institution he so often dominated. Here and in the land he was the great populist of Canadian public life who brought vitality to a political process which had all too often become distanced from the people it served. As Canadians, we have always felt ourselves heirs to the spirit of parliamentary democracy as well as to its form, and John Diefenbaker was the symbol of that spirit.

[Translation]

But what is even more fundamental is that he has entirely changed our attitude toward our own country. The development of the north which he initiated, and that of the various regions which he encouraged, demonstrate to what extent he was aware of the very extensive opportunities offered by this great country of ours. Canada is essentially a country of builders, and our strength and outlook as pioneers have never been expressed more vigorously or presented more dramatically than through John Diefenbaker's convictions.

[English]

He was an indomitable man, a man of passion with strongly held and vigorously defended views, an unequivocal patriot whose commitment and devotion to Canada were beyond question, a statesman whose stature was enhanced by his warmth and by his personal approach toward the people and the land he loved so deeply. He was a singular man who entered and enlarged the lives of all of us as no one ever will again. Our people and our Parliament will miss him deeply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, all of us have expressed in our own way our feelings on the death of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, but it is fitting that one of our first functions in the new Parliament should be to remember him in the context he loved the most. This House was his working home, politically, intellectually and emotionally; it was courtroom, hustings and family parlour all rolled into one.

Almost 40 years is an extraordinarily long time to remain in the nest. Even more extraordinary is the manner in which the right hon. gentleman continued to contribute to this House. Members came and went, were exulted or diminished, performed or languished, but John Diefenbaker marched right along, never missing a step, never missing an opportunity.

First elected in 1940, he arrived here full of enthusiasm, dedication and fighting spirit eager to do what he had always dreamed of doing. The winds of fortune may have changed many times over these past 40 years, but John Diefenbaker remained faithful to his personality and convictions. The eloquence and idealism he had brought from western Canada were still very much in evidence in the last electoral victory which was to bring him back fighting in the House of Commons.

John Diefenbaker will be remembered as a fighter, because that is essentially what he was. He had fought for human rights and for values dear to the hearts of ordinary citizens. He was a man they could understand because he spoke their language. Whenever he stood up in the House to speak on their behalf, other hon. members not only listened well, but took note of what he had to say.

[English]

He was a remarkable politician whose strongly held beliefs, ideals and antagonisms were not always shared, though his vigour in holding them was greatly admired. He was more than just a public man. He did not simply touch a person, he got inside him. Indeed, some might say he got under their skin. He was part of this chamber in an almost unnatural sort of way. Even when he did not speak you knew he was here. And when he was not here people would go around wondering what Dief would have said.

I do not know about other members, but I have the uneasy feeling he is still part of this place. Just this morning as I was speaking my thoughts on the role of the opposition when we elected you, Mr. Speaker, I half looked over at the other side expecting to see him shaking his finger at me and thundering, "Never has there been such a conversion since Saul on the road to Damascus."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Late Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker

Mr. Trudeau: He sometimes mentioned to me the loneliness of being the only surviving former prime minister and seemed sincerely keen to have some company. I now know how he felt and sincerely share his keenness.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It is sad that John Diefenbaker is not here today, Mr. Speaker, and we shall miss him. But just speaking of the impact he made on Canadians and upon this House is a happy tribute to a person who knew the joy and satisfaction of doing what he wanted to do with his life and doing it to the best of his ability. What more could any of us wish as a record of our own ambitions and achievements?

On behalf of the official opposition, I extend our sympathy to the right hon. gentleman's family. They can treasure the memory of his career and take comfort from the rich life which he and Mrs. Diefenbaker enjoyed together.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I join the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) in extending deepest sympathy on behalf of our party to the members of John Diefenbaker's family.

Although it goes without saying among members of this House who knew him and saw him in action that John Diefenbaker was an extraordinary parliamentarian, it is also important for those of us who are here and who hope to remain to note that at the same time he was an extraordinary populist in the sense that he never forgot that in a democracy it is essential to maintain the closest possible rapport with the ordinary citizen. He did not forget this at any point in his political life. He was also a notable, tough-minded fighter both against his enemies on the other side of the House and, from time to time, as his colleagues will recall, within his own party when he thought a battle was in order. This, too, is something all of us in political life can learn from the memory of John Diefenbaker—that he fought for what he believed in.

He was a man who had an extraordinary sense that Canada is much more than merely the sum of its regional parts. Although he was not always—perhaps I understate it—precise in his vision of what constituted a greater Canada, there can be no doubt that no Canadian was ever left in any question about his own very real passion on that important subject.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Diefenbaker was the first head of government who was of neither British nor French extraction. This fact is very important because, like many Canadians, his ancestors came from another part of the world and they played a very important role in the development of our country.

[English]

John Diefenbaker will be remembered and missed by Canadians in every part of our land.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the head of the government, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), as well as with the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) in paying tribute to this great Canadian. My leader, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy), would have liked very much to do it himself, but being a newcomer to this House he did not have the privilege to know as well as I did this great Canadian, Mr. John G. Diefenbaker. It is therefore a great honour for me to pay a posthumous tribute to this great Canadian.

I had the pleasure of meeting him in Quebec City on one of his visits there as a member of Parliament. He gave a lecture at the Chateau Frontenac and as it was open to the public, I went to hear him. I was curious to meet this fellow, if I may use this expression with reference to him, who had a bad reputation in the province of Quebec. He was reported to be hostile to French Canadians. Later on, after getting acquainted with his views and his intentions, I soon realized that this Canadian loved his country, every part of his country.

He was defeated several times prior to being elected on March 26, 1940. That shows that he was a great fighter. Some of us were defeated more than once before being elected. That does not make us any the worse for it, but it does give us many more ideas and more determination to keep on forging ahead.

Mr. Speaker, for 11 years I had the good fortune of knowing him, as we all did, at least those of us who spent those 11 years here and, as the Leader of the Opposition said a while ago, his repartees afforded us truly enjoyable moments even while working hard in this Parliament and fighting for our respective stands. I should like to remind the House that it was under his administration that we were given simultaneous interpretation, a means of unity in this country. I consider it an essential tool in drawing us all closer to one another. I wanted to stress that. I should also like to remind this House that he set an excellent example by his attendance in this House. When he was in top shape, he came to the House regularly, taking part in the debates and respecting the opinions of others while fighting very courageously for all of his own.

I remember, among other things, that he occasionally held views that differed from those of the members of his own party but that, because of his convictions, he defended his own.

He loved Parliament and he used to call it "this democratic institution". I think that taking our inspiration from his convictions and his courage, we should love this institution and work together at giving our country the best administration possible. On behalf of my party, I should like to extend my sincere condolences to his family. We shall long keep his memory.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF C. B. KOESTER, ESQUIRE, AS CLERK

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the governor in council has appointed Charles Beverley Koester, Esquire, C.D., M.A., Ph.D., as Clerk of the House of Commons in the place of Alistair Fraser, B.A., LL.B., resigned.

May I borrow just a moment from the House at this juncture to say two things. First, it is self-evident that no Speaker can survive without the constant counsel, advice, support and assistance of the Clerk of the House of Commons. In all of the Speaker's responsibilities, some of which are very visible in the chamber and many of which are lesser known in administrative capacities, in the direction of the House of Commons personnel and organizations and things of that sort, in every respect a Speaker is lost without the constant support and advice on procedural matters, administrative matters and in every way of the Clerk of the House of Commons.

Having worked with Dr. Koester, I have every confidence that we are in the best possible hands at this moment, and I look forward to his very wise and already demonstrated able counsel in assisting me through the years to come.

May I also say that since I have been the Speaker of this House, and for some time prior to that, I and predecessors of mine were the beneficiairies of the excellent counsel and advice of Mr. Alistair Fraser, who distinguished himself as Clerk of the House of Commons and, finally, just as he was leaving office, I think put a fitting stroke into the history book of our procedures and practices by being a co-editor and co-author of the most recent revision of Beauchesne's parliamentary procedures. It is an excellent work and stands as a tribute to him.

I felt at this moment as we change Clerks of the House of Commons that the House would want to join me in paying tribute to Alistair Fraser for all of his great years of excellent and faithful service to the House of Commons, and at the same time wish Dr. Koester, the new Clerk of the House of Commons, the same kind of success with which Mr. Fraser distinguished himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

APPOINTMENT OF ALISTAIR FRASER, ESQUIRE, AS HONORARY OFFICER

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I naturally want to join in your remarks of tribute not only to Alistair Fraser but also to Dr. Koester, with whom we look forward—and I know I speak on behalf of all members of the House in saying this—to working very closely in ensuring that this House of Commons continues to be an effective and respected institution in the country.

Alistair Fraser, Esq.

I think it is appropriate that we take a moment now to say a few words in tribute to the outstanding service over 12 years of Alistair Fraser as Clerk of the House of Commons. I pronounce that word differently than others do for reasons Your Honour will understand.

Each one of us, whenever we came here, who had the opportunity, to serve with Mr. Fraser have cause to regret his resignation, because he has been not only attentive to his duties but tireless in the discharge of those duties toward all members of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

He is responsible to a large extent for the structure of the House of Commons as we know it today. Moreover, he looked after programs for parliamentary interns, he extended more facilities to members, he arranged for the broadcasting of our debates, he supervised major changes to the Standing Orders and participated in the drafting of the new edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which will be for us a valuable guide for many years.

[English]

I want also to express my personal recognition of his courtesy and his unfailing attention to all matters on which I have consulted him over my years in the House.

It is my privilege to propose the following resolution, which I am sure will meet with the unanimous approval of all members of this House. I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau):

That this House, desiring to record its deep appreciation of the distinguished and faithful service of Alistair Fraser, Esquire, B.A., LL.B., as Clerk of the House of Commons, designate him an honorary officer of the House of Commons with an entrée to the chamber and a seat at the Table on ceremonial occasions.

● (1620)

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in seconding the motion, we in this party would also like to offer our best wishes and co-operation to the recently appointed Clerk of the House of Commons, Dr. Koester. He is, of course, no stranger to those who have already served in this chamber. We have great respect for his background as a scholar and a former clerk of the Saskatchewan legislature. We welcome him to this important position and I am sure all members of the House join me in looking forward to his friendship and guidance for many sessions to come.

However, today, much as the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has done, I want on behalf of our party to say farewell to another good friend of this House, Mr. Alistair Fraser, who retired as Clerk of the House a few weeks ago.

[Translation]

When paying homage to someone, one often speaks of "selfless devotion". That expression has been used so often as to become almost meaningless. Yet I believe it to be an accurate description of the way in which Mr. Fraser served the House of Commons as an institution and its members as individuals. He has indeed shown selfless devotion to a task whose origin dates back to the British Parliament at the beginning of the fourteenth century.

[English]

Those who accept the position of Clerk of the House of Commons are not allowed to display the range of opinions and emotions which so delight the heart of a politician. Clerks are not allowed to be cantankerous, exasperated or belittling. Rather, they are teachers, conciliators and friends. They do not think of self but bend their will and their stamina to making the House of Commons work. They help each member, regardless of seniority or status, to fit his own aims and responsibilities within the parliamentary framework, bound as it is by long tradition and a maze of complicated rules and procedures.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the description I have just given is, in fact, a portrait of Mr. Fraser. In 12 years, he himself became an institution in this House. Apart from the pressures inherent in his position, he was in a sense the key to some revolutionary changes which took place in the workings of the House of Commons and the services to its members. What comes to mind in particular is the creation of the parliamentary interns group, which benefited all parties, the growth in committee staff, the reorganization of the role of the pages of this House, who serve us all, the implementation of the broadcasting service through which our proceedings are broadcast live to the Canadian public.

[English]

Mr. Fraser takes with him a unique background and a parliamentary insight which I hope, indeed urge, that he share with others in the productive years which lie ahead of him. He also takes with him the gratitude and affection of members of the House.

I am delighted to second the motion moved by the Prime Minister that Mr. Fraser become an honorary officer of this House, with the hope that he will become a frequent visitor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party—and I speak also in a personal sense as one who has known Alistair Fraser for many years—I should like to indicate our wholehearted support of the motion that has been moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau). Like each of them, I should like to take a moment first to say that we, too, welcome most warmly the appointment of Dr. Koester as Clerk of the House of Commons. We are already aware of his efficiency and his ability and we look forward to the years when he will be our man at the Table.

With respect to Alistair Fraser, I may say that I am one of those in the House who remembers Beauchesne not just as a book but as a human being.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: And not just a spirit.

Mr. Knowles: Dr. Arthur Beauchesne was Clerk of the House of Commons when I came here. He was succeeded later by Mr. Leon Raymond, and both of them served this chamber exceedingly well. They had distinguished careers in that high office, but I am one who can say that Alistair Fraser measured up to the standards that they set.

Reference has already been made to the tremendous amount of expansion and development which has taken place during the past 12 years. This made being Clerk a different job than it had been in earlier times, and I say that this House is doing itself proud to take this moment to pay tribute to the work of Alistair Fraser. We found him in our midst to be one who was extremely friendly to all of us. We found him to be impartial and helpful in the advice that he gave to us as members, and I believe that the same could be said with regard to the advice he gave to the Chair. We also found him to be efficient in the conduct of the House of Commons. We are pleased to give to him the same honour that was given to the previous Clerks whom I mentioned by making him an honorary officer of this House. He is a young man, he has a career ahead of him, I am sure, and we wish him well in that career and happiness for many years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, personally and on behalf of my party I am happy to second the motion of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) proposing that the new Clerk of the House of Commons be Dr. Koester. There is no doubt in our minds that he will work in co-operation with you, Mr. Speaker, and with each hon. member of the House. I have had the pleasure of knowing him for a few years and I am sure he will fulfil his duties with great competence and dedication to all members of the House.

As for Mr. Fraser, I welcome the motion proposing that he be made an honorary officer of the House of Commons. I have also had the pleasure of working with him for 11 years and he gave me judicious advice. Of course, any newly-elected member has a whole lot to learn. Occasionally, conflicts do arise and hon. members take the advice of the people we usually call the people at the Table who are the link between them and the Speaker. Mr. Fraser fulfilled his duties with know-how, integrity and impartiality. I am pleased, therefore, to say these things about him and to thank him for all the help he gave me and my party and which allowed us to better serve our country, to be more efficient in the House and, finally, to be good Canadians. All hon. members are in favour of this motion; that is natural. I am sure that we will always remember Mr. Fraser in our deliberations.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two reasons for saying a word about this very felicitous motion proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), not only because I have been a friend of Mr. Fraser for many years but also because of the association that the Fraser family has had with the province of Nova Scotia. His father served as Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia for one term and his grandfather before his father had the same honour, and I have not lost hope that Alistair Fraser, whom we are honouring today, may follow in that tradition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: In light of the warm praise given by the Prime Minister, maybe it will happen earlier than I had expected.

• (1630)

Of course, Alistair gave outstanding service to the House of Commons and he deserves the rest he is now receiving in a very beautiful part of Canada, in the town of Guysborough, in the constituency of Cape Breton Highlands-Canso. After having lived in Ottawa for so many years, I have no hesitation in saying that Alistair has definitely improved his residential status.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister) presented the following message for His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

His Excellency the Governor General of Canada transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved order in council appointing the Hon. Walter Baker, President of the Queen's Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue, the Hon. Roch La Salle, Minister of Supply and Services, the Hon. Sinclair Stevens, President of the Treasury Board, and the Hon. Perrin Beatty, Minister of State (Treasury Board), to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter H-9 of the Revised Statutes of Canada entitled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister) moved:

That a committee be appointed to prepare and report, in accordance with Standing Order 65, lists of members to compose the standing and standing joint committees of this House; that the committee be composed of Messrs. Baker (Nepean-Carleton), Kempling, Friesen, MacEachen, Lefebvre and Knowles, and that the provisions of Standing Order 65 (1) be suspended in relation to the number of members on the said committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I notice that you referred to Standing Order 65, which states:

65.(1) At the commencement of the first session of each Parliament, a striking committee, consisting of seven members, shall be appointed—

If I understand correctly, you have mentioned six members. However, this Standing Order does not stipulate at most seven members, but rather the following:

—consisting of seven members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report, within the first ten sitting days after its appointment, lists of members to compose the following standing committees of the House:

Mr. Speaker, I would like you to note that three members, that is the first three members named, belong to the government party. Two are members of the official opposition party and one of the New Democratic Party. There obviously remains one member to be appointed and since our party has always been certain that one of its members would sit on this committee, Mr. Speaker, with your consent, I would like to move the following amendment.

Some hon. Members: Janelle! Janelle!

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, this is quite in order as it concerns a motion now before the House. The Standing Orders provide that a motion can be moved. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would move:

That the seventh member of that committee be the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

In making this suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members that some of my new colleagues in this House are very prone to laughter. I would like to tell them this and remind them quite simply that we have—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give my reason for moving this amendment. I would also like to remind my colleagues in this House that we got a higher percentage of voters—I can see that it bothers some—than the total number of voters who went to the polls in Nova Scotia and the number of people who voted in New Brunswick. Our party got a higher number of votes than the total number of voters in six provinces of Canada.

Nevertheless, I think that in all fairness it is quite simply a matter of principle, of equity, that our party should have a member on that committee to be appointed as you suggested under the terms of Standing Order 65, which calls for a committee of seven members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to have the written motion before determining whether or not it is in order.

Order. There is no reason not to accept the motion under our procedures. So I must rule the motion in order under our procedure.

I have here the amendment moved by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) which is as follows:

Mr. Roy (Beauce), seconded by Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse), moved:

That the motion be amended by adding the name of Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse) as member of the striking committee under Standing Order 65.

● (1640)

[English]

The question, therefore, is on the amendment. The House has heard the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: No.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which has been made to the main motion may appear to be very routine and very simple on the surface, but it must be remembered that this is not a routine motion as indicated by the comments of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) and his arguments in support of including a member of the Social Credit group as part of the striking committee.

The motion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) says something very clearly about the political composition of the House of Commons, and particularly about the rights which each element of that composition may enjoy. I do not believe it was an accident or an oversight that the Prime Minister did not include in his motion a member of the Social Credit group.

Here, of course, I want to say that the member proposed to be added in the person of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) is a friend of all of us and has participated very effectively in the debates of the House. But we are not at the present time dealing with the status of the hon. member for Bellechasse; we are dealing with what status the members of the Social Credit group, now numbering five, will enjoy in the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada.

It is obvious that if there had been included in the motion a member of the Social Credit group, that would carry with it the implication that in the House of Commons, if it did approve that motion, that group would enjoy a status, particularly the leader of that group, equivalent in standing to that of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr.Trudeau) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

We do not, of course, accept the proposition that a spokesman of the Social Credit group should enjoy the same privileges and rights traditionally accorded the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. It is not a question of denying members of the Social Credit party their rights as members of Parliament. Each of us would fight very energetically to maintain the rights which each member of the House of Commons enjoys as a member, namely, to participate in debates, to ask questions and so on. All members will enjoy those rights. We have reservations as to whether, with the acceptance of this motion, a spokesman, for example, for the Social Credit group would have the same opportunity following ministerial statements on motions as would the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

It is a fact that the matter came before the House in February, 1966, on a point of order raised by the then hon. member for Cumberland who questioned the appropriateness of members of the Ralliement Créditiste and the Social Credit party being permitted by the Speaker to comment on ministerial statements. The Speaker at that time made a ruling which has been in existence since then.

I should, however, underline the fact that the House itself has never had an opportunity to give an expression of opinion on a matter of this kind. This motion, and particularly the amendment, gives the House and each member the opportunity to express an opinion on the appropriateness of a group of five members, in this case the Social Credit group, having the full status of other parties in respect of (a) the question period and (b) statements on motions in response to ministerial statements. We believe that we cannot extend that unqualified right in the present circumstances, and that is why we agree with the Prime Minister in not including a member of the Social Credit group as a member of the striking committee. To do so would be to carry with it the implications I have already described.

For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, and in an effort to provide the sense of the House, and certainly the sense of this group, we propose to vote against the amendment and to vote for the main motion proposed by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that we regard this amendment as unnecessary, to put it in technical terms. I want also to say that we regret that it has been presented, and I shall indicate what I mean by that in a moment.

First, when I say that we regard the amendment as unnecessary, I would point out that the striking committee itself really has a very routine job. Sometimes in a whole Parliament it meets only two or three times. What it does is receive the lists from the various parties as to the persons to be put on the standing committees, and then in the name of the striking committee that report is presented to the House and adopted and the memberships are confirmed.

It is not a matter of great importance to be on the striking committee but, as has been indicated by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), there is a principle involved that we have to consider.

The other reason I give for saying it is not necessary to have every group of members in this House represented on the committee is that on former occasions there have been times when various parties, either the Social Credit party or my party, were not on the committee. A number of years ago, for example, when our two parties were about the same size, in fact for quite a number of years, we had a member on the striking committee one year and they had a member the next, and the member who was there saw to it that the other party got its representation on committees. It is not very important to be there, and hon. members of the Social Credit group can rest assured that they will get just as many committee positions without being represented there as they would by being represented. In fact, they might even get more as we might feel we have to show some generosity.

Therefore, this is not an issue, it seems to me, that should engage the House for any length of time, and certainly should not engage the House for the time it would take to have a division on this motion. But, as the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso has pointed out, for the House to take a decision on this motion, whether it is a voice vote or a recorded division, would seem to involve the issue as to whether five members constitute a party for the purpose of a number of things.

It is my view, and I have stated it at the meetings of representatives of all the parties which have been held, that there are several such issues and that most of them should really be decided by Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker was helpful in resolving the question of where the various parties should sit in the House, and I think that it was appropriate that he gave his advice on that issue. The next important issue will be time allotted in the question period, and it is important to opposition parties that they know whether a third opposition party has the kind of status that entitles it to lead off questions, that entitles it to questions every day even though it has only five members. In my view it is something that ought to be decided by you, sir.

If we take a vote today, and the consensus seems to be that this motion will be defeated, then you, sir, will have the decision of the House that on the first occasion when the issue was raised it was felt that we should not give to five members the status of a party.

As the House leader for the official opposition pointed out, we are here to defend each other's rights as individuals to speak, to ask questions and to take part in debate. But there are certain special advantages which go with party status which are at issue. We have provision in the statute on pay allotted to members of the House which indicates that it takes 12 members to get extra pay for the leader of any small party. There is no debate about that. The Social Credit party does not have 12 members and, therefore, its leader does not get the extra pay. That is all that section says. While it has come to be thought that 12 members were required for party status, we over-stepped it when the party had only 11 members last time. Now they are down to five. What happens when it gets down to four, three or two? Can a party that has used a name in an election come here and claim all the advantages that go with party status regardless of how small it is?

Frankly, sir, I am raising these questions without feeling that it is my right to give the answers. I believe that the Chair should give the answers, especially on such things as rights in the question period, statements on motions and so on. On the question of funds for research, that is up to the commissioners of internal economy. I would think that the part of wisdom would be, in so far as my friends across the way are concerned, not to ask for a vote in this House today, because if we must vote the House will be put in the position of saying no on the first formal occasion that presented itself with regard to five members being treated as though they were a party.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have to join, on behalf of my colleagues, with the House leader for the official opposition in saying that if this question is to be put to a vote we shall oppose the amendment, but that we shall support the motion presented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), which was what we had agreed upon at a meeting of House leaders. The rights of my honourable friends as individual members we shall defend, but party status is something else. That is our position.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to make a correction. When you read the motion in amendment, you indicated it was seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse, although it is stated on the sheet the motion is seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard). I would like this to be recorded accordingly in Hansard. It would be somewhat awkward for a member to propose himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) is quite right. It is indeed specified that the motion is seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard).

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to the two speakers who spoke before me. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated at the very beginning of his remarks this was a committee of little significance and the House should not be asked to decide on such a trifle. This is a committee that meets only two or three times in the course of a session. But if indeed the issue is of so little significance, it follows in my view that we should not be refused representation on that committee. This is simple logic. A member on that striking committee, we always had one in the past and we did not fare any worse.

I understand the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He is a personal friend, and he always takes care in this House to defend the rights of hon. members, whoever they may be. Indeed I remember that at one time he supported one of my motions so that my party or myself could discharge our duties.

On the issue of my party's status, I grudgingly acknowledge the fact that we are a minority party. But looking at the representation in this House, every party is a minority party. Therefore we are no exception to the rule. It depends on the number of persons. We are all minority parties.

Moreover, it is quite true that the status of a party as far as the allowances payable to the leader of a party are concerned—and the House itself passed the legislation and decided that to be entitled to a special allowance, the leader should have at least 11 members in his group excluding himself; that is, 12. However, I feel that it has nothing to do with our duties in the House as a recognized, registered national party.

It is in such capacity, Mr. Speaker, that we are asking to be allowed to name a representative to that committee. It would not hurt anyone, because we all agree that the matter is unimportant. We would then continue to work and bring our contribution to that committee and, strictly speaking, I do not think that it would hurt anyone.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we consider that the motion is a basic one which could affect the status of our party, I think that we are going beyond the scope of the proposed amendment. In my opinion, the question should not even be raised. It is a mere technical matter and of course when we disagree, the question is then put. Such is democracy. This is why an election is held, because we do not share the same views.

When the members of this House disagree, they ask, of course, that the question be put. If we are not allowed to have a representative on that striking committee, the matter will be settled. As for other issues which could arise later, they will be dealt with in due course.

Mr. Speaker, I leave it to you to decide whether the motion is really in order and if we should deal with it right now or if you would rather wait to make a decision. We leave it to your discretion.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong the discussion in the House, but I do say that there is here an important matter of principle at stake. The original motion was framed with that in mind. The hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have set out, I believe, the principles quite clearly. They do not need to be repeated. In that sense it is clear, as the government House leader, that I ought to indicate to the House that, based on the principle that is involved, we do not intend to support the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment, please say yea.

• (1700)

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed, please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. GIRVE FRETZ AND SECONDED BY MR. WILBUR MacDONALD (CARDIGAN)

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, before I begin I would like to take the time to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and his cabinet for the confidence they have placed in me. It is a singular honour and one that is most appreciated, not only by myself but by the constituents of my riding. To have one's maiden speech move the Address in Reply is a privilege that I will remember and treasure all my days.

I would also like to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your re-election to that position which you so ably held in the past and which, I am sure, you will continue to fill with distinction. I wish you every success in your duties and envy you not at all.

Before I go on, it is appropriate to pause and remember a person who is not here, the late John George Diefenbaker. Mr. Diefenbaker, as he himself said, was always a "House of Commons man". He devoted his life and efforts on behalf of the Canadian people to this great institution of Parliament, and we are saddened and diminished by his loss. Those of us who are new members will especially miss the wisdom and counsel he so freely gave. Mr. Diefenbaker's final hours were spent preparing himself for this session of Parliament, a session he was particularly looking forward to as our party had been given the mandate to govern by the people of Canada. We shall take up that mandate and govern in the way that Mr. Diefenbaker would have wished, with concern for the rights of the individual Canadian. The emphasis of government will return to the recognition and reaffirmation of the fact that individual rights are the cornerstone of our democracy.

In my opening remarks, Mr. Speaker, I made mention of the riding of Erie, the constituency I am pleased and honoured to represent here today. In the tradition of maiden speeches, it is my pleasant task to acquaint the members of the House with Erie riding.

As is obvious from the name, we are situated on one of the greatest of the Great Lakes, Lake Erie. Our eastern boundary is defined by the Niagara River which has its beginnings here, as does much of the history of early Canada. Many battles of the war of 1812 took place on the soil of what is now Erie riding. Our early settlers had their numbers swelled by United Empire Loyalists and my own forebears came to this region in 1800.

Not only has the area been blessed with tremendous beauty and historical significance, but we are justly famous for our fresh produce, abundant orchards, and flavourful vineyards. Our fertile soil and temperate climate make the Niagara region one of the best grape growing regions in the world, and form the basis of Canada's wine industry. I am sure that yesterday as we celebrated Thanksgiving many of us had turkey and chicken from the riding of Erie.

We also share the Niagara River with the United States and have one of the gateways between that great country and ours. Over 150 years of friendship with the United States are epitomized by the bridge that links our two nations, the Peace Bridge. Being on an international boundary has also been a great advantage in teaching our citizens that great Canadian pastime—smuggling.

Proximity to our American neighbours and the lush beauty of our region have made the Niagara peninsula and Erie riding a natural gathering place for many hundreds of thousands of tourists each year. Tourism plays a major role in the economy of Erie as, in fact, it does in all Canada. The announcement by the Prime Minister of a national tourism strategy is indeed a most welcome proposal.

One of the prominent man-made features of Erie is the Welland Canal, which is 27 miles long, an integral part of the St. Lawrence Seaway and an important facet of our regional economy. Studies by the Niagara regional chamber of commerce have shown that the economic impact of the Welland Canal and the Canadian Great Lakes shipping industry is growing steadily with more than $180 million flowing into the Niagara region annually. The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority alone provides more than 650 jobs while over 3,000 local residents find employment on the ships themselves. The operation of the canal, movement of cargo and construction and repair of ships remain the dominant part of the industry's effect on my riding, yet numerous smaller companies depend on ships and shipping for their existence. These suppliers and contractors provide services essential to the maintenance and operation of the 170 Canadian flag vessels which regularly use the Welland Canal. It is in this context that I was most pleased to learn of the Prime Minister's intention to set up a seaway advisory council to maintain and improve the viability of this industry which is so important to our region and to the whole country.

The people of Erie riding reflect in both their ethnic make-up and their geographical distribution a common bond with the rest of Canada. The urban areas of Erie are close to the American border while the agricultural and less populated areas are to the north. Aside from this physical similarity to Canada as a whole, the people of Erie through their background and heritage echo the history of our great land. Representatives of our two founding nations dwell here, as do representatives of other nations from all around the world. These people have seen the promise that is Canada and have moved here to realize that promise. Whatever reasons have impelled them to come to Canada, leaving their native lands, whether flight from adversity or a longing for freedom or a sense of adventure, these new Canadians have flocked in their thousands over the years to find that dream, to slake their spirit of adventure, to live in freedom. And they have made Canada, including Erie riding, what it is today, a vibrant, forward-looking land that has taken the strands of diverse experience and culture and woven them into a new, stronger entity, a land and people who are more than the sum of their parts, a land and people who have prospered by recognizing and capitalizing upon their differences. Erie is the living proof that diversity is an asset and I am sure its people join with me in applauding the Prime Minister on his appreciation of that fact. Our multicultural heritage is one of Canada's greatest resources.

In Erie, the people reflect traditional values which were perhaps overlooked by the previous administration. They believe that initiative should be encouraged and rewarded, that a good day's work deserves fair compensation, that individuals should take responsibility for their own lives and that government should impose as little as possible upon the governed. What is good for the individual is good for the country. We can regain our independence. We can depend upon ourselves. We will cease to turn to Big Daddy to solve our problems with the big dollar which inevitably leads to the big deficit. It is a truism to say that one best appreciates something one has worked for—that if the object of desire is given on a silver platter, it is not valued as highly. There is a vast, untapped resource in Canada, with more good ideas than any army of well-paid bureaucrats could produce. It stands to reason that 22 million people will have more ideas and be better in tune with their own needs than self-appointed experts in Ottawa.

The volunteer sector is the perfect expression of a nation's responsibility to itself. Witness the groundswell of support and sympathy for the Indo-Chinese refugees; people organized themselves, set up their own committees, found their own answers and are responding on a one to one level with each other and with those they have been moved to sponsor. Surely this is a more human and more humane way of dealing with each other—to remove the faceless interference from above and to relate face to face. The Prime Minister's announced intention to set up a select committee to study volunteerism in Canada is therefore welcome.

It is my belief that one of the major challenges to be faced by the new government will be to get our economy moving again. Canada's potential is limitless. We have the people, we have the resources. What we need is the will. We need to restore our confidence in ourselves. These are qualities the present government will foster. Our government will be an example for Canadians to follow. It will not be a case of substituting "Do as I say" for "Do as I do". A promise was made to privatize certain Crown corporations. That promise will be kept and those corporations will be returned to the private sector where the profit motive is not an alien principle.

The greatest wish of most Canadians is to own their own homes. The promise was made that aid would be forthcoming so that for many this dream could become reality. That promise, too, has been kept.

The promise was made that no longer would civil servants or cabinet ministers be able to hide behind a web of secrecy; no longer could those in positions of influence escape responsibility for their actions and decisions. A freedom of information law is to be enacted as promised with an outside arbiter to decide disputed matters. This will make Parliament more accountable to the people and less a system of divine right of cabinet. Parliament will be strengthened and thus improved. The imperial cabinet will become a thing of the past and our government, by its solicitous attitude toward those who are disadvantaged, will also be an example to the people of Canada. In spite of our determination to improve our economy and to cut back government expenditure, we shall not practice restraint on the backs of those who are truly in need and who, by reason of disability, of age or traditional barriers, have been kept from realizing their full potential and denied the opportunity to benefit from the riches of Canada. We shall not forget or neglect these people.

Those of us who are strong can only be diminished if we do not give proper regard to those in our society who are less strong. For we have not forgotten that we are Progressive Conservatives, and our attitude to social programs and to those who will benefit from social programs will be enlightened and compassionate.

I have already said that indeed it is an honour to move the address in reply. It is also an honour and a privilege to be a member of a team which will have a positive impact on Canada.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald), that the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Forces' Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilbur MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to be here on this occasion and to be afforded the opportunity to second the motion for the address in reply. I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and his cabinet for their courtesy in asking me to have this share in the opening of the Thirty-first Parliament. It is certainly an historic occasion for me, for my family and for the people of my constituency of Cardigan.

As we approach the dawn of the next decade this Parliament is confronted with challenging economic and social problems. The Speech from the Throne has indicated that this House will be asked to seek solutions to a wide variety of these. As I listened to the Speech from the Throne I could not help but realize that many subjects, such as fisheries, energy, transportation and regional economic expansion, are important to Canada as a whole but especially important to the constituency of Cardigan.

In area, Cardigan takes in the eastern part of Prince Edward Island, and all but one of its boundaries border on the sea. My constituents include farmers, fishermen, small business people, housewives, labourers, professional people, young and old alike, all hardworking Canadians with strong Christian values and a no-nonsense approach to their jobs.

As a farmer I share this no-nonsense approach to my job in Parliament. One of my tasks and, I suggest, one of the problems confronting this Parliament, will be to end the exodus of young rural Canadians from family farms. The family farm must remain the cornerstone of our agricultural industry in Canada. In this country and in my riding there are men and women willing to work long hours and a full week on their farms. All they ask is a fair return for their labour, fair prices for their produce and a chance to have their children follow in their footsteps.

However, if we continue to import food which our farmers could be producing economically and if we continue to let our small family farms slip needlessly into corporate hands, we will be undermining one of Canada's greatest strengths, its agricultural industry. We have the land. We now have the farmers. Let us see that they get fair prices for their products and a chance to pass their land on to their children. If this is done, we should never have a food crisis in this country, and we should be able to provide food to parts of the world which now have hungry and malnourished populations.

Another subject of special concern to my constituents is the need to create a fisheries policy which will permit fishermen to reap the full benefits of Canada's recently declared 200-mile limit. The key to this policy is intelligent management of the fishery resource. I believe that we in Prince Edward Island have a stake in the expansion of this important industry, and I am pleased that this Parliament will be working to create a fisheries policy which will maintain Canada's position as the number one fishing country in the world. I look forward with great confidence to expansion of the fisheries industry and more year-round employment for our processors and fishermen.

I am also pleased that this House will be attempting to create a favourable business climate in Canada. This is important to all industries in Canada, but it is especially important to small business in this country. In my riding of Cardigan small businessmen include not just farmers and fishermen but also restaurant owners, tourism operators, small shop proprietors, and the list goes on. Not only are small businessmen the backbone of our economy but they also represent and embody the spirit of free enterprise which makes Canada great. It is important that this Parliament formulate policy which will permit businessmen to plan and to expand their operations.

Another important concern of small businessmen in my riding and, I am sure, in other rural parts of Canada is the need for improved transportation systems. If the potato, fishery and tourist industries of Prince Edward Island are to remain viable, our railway and ferry systems must be upgraded. I need not remind hon. members of this House that our railway system was originally planned by the Fathers of Confederation as a tool to assure equal development of Canada's regions. This development is not yet fully realized in Atlantic Canada. The railway is the most efficient means of transporting goods from our province and within our country, and it needs our attention.

We look to the development of alternate energy not only as a means of creating energy but also as a rejuvenation of the forestry industry in Prince Edward Island. An increase in harvesting of our forests, followed by an intensive reforestation program, will result in increased employment and a revitalization of the whole industry.

Finally, the subject of energy is especially important to my riding. My constituents are almost totally dependent on oil for energy and have the highest electricity rates in Canada. It is not important just that we find new sources of oil but equally important that we develop reusable sources of energy which will carry us into the next century. Efficient energy systems are the key to our economic well-being in the decade ahead, as they are to all Canadians. We in Prince Edward Island have the potential for many forms of alternate energy such as wind, solar and wood power. We all recognize that there is no simple solution to energy problems and that this has caused a great deal of concern to all Canadians. I believe that part of the solution lies in the alternate energy field.

We new members of this House, members of the new generation of members of Parliament, have each come as individual representatives of our ridings to this historic chamber to help bring leadership to this nation. We are all proud to be here, determined to continue the development of this country and determined to face the future with confidence. I sense that there is also a determination to keep this nation united and strong. I am sure that is shared by all in this chamber.

I sense also a determination to restructure some of the proceedings of this Parliament. We are not here for glory or honour alone. Neither are we here to waste our time or the time of this Parliament. We come to work with those who have been here before us so that together this Thirty-first Parliament can move forward, providing solutions to the problems which confront us, and as it moves into history we can all be justifiably proud that we were part of it.

I believe that individual Canadians everywhere look to this Parliament for leadership and a sense of direction so that together we can formulate policies to improve the economic, social and spiritual well-being of our citizens as we move forward into the next decade.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF INTEREST RATE POLICY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that the record increase in interest rates carried out yesterday by the Bank of Canada, apparently with the agreement of the government, will have adverse effects on employment, business, especially small business, and consumers as well as the economy generally, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien):

That this House immediately order its Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to be set up and that that committee undertake an immediate review of the interest rate policy of this government and of the Bank of Canada, and that for this purpose the governor of the bank and the Minister of Finance appear before it to explain their actions and what they will be doing to solve the problems which the governor of the bank himself said interest rates are now causing for individuals and to business.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Hon. members know that motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be put to the House only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FRENCH LANGUAGE SCHOOL AT PENETANGUISHENE, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43, and I trust the precedent established by the government will be followed.

In view of the recent Davis decision in Ontario refusing the establishment of a French language school in Penetanguishene, noting the impact that that decision is bound to have on both linguistic groups in Quebec in the face of the debate leading up to the Quebec referendum, and since this House, recognizing the historical importance of minority language rights to the viability of this nation, has voted moneys for the provinces to foster second language education, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Henri-Westmount (Mr. Johnston):

That this House urge the Ontario government to reconsider and reverse its decision to refuse a French language secondary school for the population of Penetanguishene.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented to the House for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT RATE IN SYDNEY, N.S.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

On October 3, 1977, the then minister responsible for the federal government decentralization program announced that a combined 378 full-time jobs plus 56 part-time jobs would be placed in the very high unemployment area of Sydney. The cabinet of the new government rescinded this healthy idea. In view of the fact this decision for Cape Breton shows tremendous insensitivity to diversifying a very narrow employment base, and in view of the fact that I fought long and hard for such action, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this government be denounced for turning its back on a very high unemployment area by the punishing decision not to relocate these jobs to the Sydney area.

Mr. Speaker: I have some misgivings about the rather parochial nature of the motion, but nevertheless on this day I opt in favour of the hon. member. I may not be as generous in later sessions. The House has heard the terms of the motion. It can be presented to the House for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

NEGOTIATIONS TO SETTLE MONTREAL GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact there has been a grain handlers' strike in the port of Montreal for over four months, which seriously affects not only farmers and consumers in the province of Quebec but also the grain producers in western Canada, and considering the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) personally intervened in the grain handlers' strike on the west coast within a few days after assuming office, I move seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre):

That the Minister of Transport and/or the Minister of Labour intercede directly and immediately in the port of Montreal negotiations, bringing the two sides together in an effort to reach a positive solution.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE TO INFORM PUBLIC OF ABUSE OF WOMEN BY MEDIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with the decision of the Minister of Communications (Mr. MacDonald) to abolish the committee on sexist stereotypes in the media and on his decision to integrate it in a far less representative way in a study group of the CRTC. Far from me the idea of objecting if the CRTC is asked to consider the urgency of such a problem, but I am concerned that the minister has deemed it advisable to entrust the CRTC with the task of passing some value judgments under the circumstances. Standards alone could be considered, but when he announced the creation of the study group the minister suggested that it could look at the opportunity of legislating to bring an end to the exploitation of women on television.

I therefore move, seconded by the member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc):

That an independent committee to set up to make the people sensitive to abuses in the representation of the role of women on television and that the CRTC and the government refrain from any censure procedure to solve that urgent problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. The presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF "PATRONAGE BOOK OF APPOINTMENTS"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the government's welcomed initiatives concerning freedom of information providing greater public access to government information, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instructs the government to table in Parliament the patronage book of appointments put together by the Prime Minister's special assistant, Mrs. Jean Pigott.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF THE BUNDESRAT OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before beginning the question period, may I ask hon. members to join with me in signalling the presence in our gallery of a distinguished visitor in the person of Dietrich Stobbe, President of the Bundesrat of the Federal Republic of Germany.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

POLICY IN RESPECT OF PRICING

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of a commitment in the Speech from the Throne to make Canada self-sufficient in energy by 1990, a goal that we find commendable.

We intend to co-operate in some of the measures in respect of consumption and the reduction of consumption indicated in the Speech from the Throne. However, in the more immediate future, can the Prime Minister tell us if any arrangements have been made in terms of pricing petroleum in Canada? We know that the Prime Minister has had meetings with various premiers, and for the purpose of planning we would like to know if there are any announcements to be made in the near future.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have carried on extensive conversations with all the premiers with an eye to the development of a general energy package, and they naturally included conversations regarding price. There is not at this moment any agreement which I can reveal to the House, and I have no expectation of making an announcement of such an agreement in the next few days.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know that this is a particularly difficult task since we ourselves in the past have had to seek pricing agreements in Canada and it was not always possible to get the agreement of every province. Therefore, I would not want to press the Prime Minister for an immediate answer. Can he let the country know if it is likely that the agreement put together by our government last winter, which was to be operative till July 1 next, will be left in place, or will some new agreement be brought in before July 1?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that is another matter that is under consideration in the discussions we are having with the provinces. I would hope that if there is to be a change in the agreement that is now in place, or if there is to be a new agreement based upon the agreement initiated by the former government, that will be announced before the first ministers' meeting in early December.

● (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister mentions early December. We have been given to understand that there would be a budget in the course of the first part of the session. Should one assume that the oil pricing agreement will be reached before the budget is brought down, or will the hon. Minister of Finance be basing his budget predictions and concluding the very important import compensation funds on the agreement which was brought forth by the Liberal government last winter?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we would prefer to have an energy agreement in place before the budget. However, if that is not possible in the matter of weeks, it is entirely likely that a budget will be brought down before the first ministers meet in early December, and consequently before there is a new agreement on energy.

POLICY ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Given the government's approval yesterday of a third hike in interest rates over the summer period, could the Prime Minister explain to the House how his government's interest rate policy differs from the policy of the preceding government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the degree to which interest rate increases in Canada have followed those in the United States has slackened since the election on May 22. We are dealing with a very, very difficult situation here, as the hon. member knows. That is why members of my party were so pleased to be able to accept the recommendation made by the economic spokesman of the official opposition to have the question of interest rates referred as quickly as possible—we would hope, this week or early next week—to the relevant standing committee where there can be not only an opportunity for the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance to express their views, but also an opportunity for other members of this House and members of the public to express their views as to the appropriate policy for a country in our circumstances at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that no such committee has been formed as yet and that this matter is of profound importance in terms of its impact on the people of Canada. Just prior to the election the Prime Minister, in his role as Leader of the Opposition, stated:

> —there is nothing less sensible than the government's determination to increase interest rates to record levels. That idea . . . has led to the most expensive monetary policy in this country's history.

I would agree entirely with those sentiments. I have not changed my mind.

Will the Prime Minister tell the House what has changed in the country, in the interim, if high interest rates were so disadvantageous to consumers, to people who wish to buy a mortgage, and to virtually everybody in the country, before the election but now that the election has taken place they are no longer disadvantageous?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, high interest rates are welcomed by no one. They are no more welcome or, indeed, satisfactory to this government now than they were to us prior to May 22. We do live in an international circumstance which limits the flexibility of the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: This government has demonstrated a greater independence from the rate of increase in the United States than was the case prior to the last election. We do believe, and I repeat it to the Leader of the New Democratic Party, that it would be useful for all aspects of this question to be reviewed by a standing committee of the House of Commons. The Leader of the New Democratic Party knows that the striking committee will be meeting tomorrow. We expect it will be possible for that committee to be struck before the end of this week. We would certainly be prepared to have that reference go as quickly as possible to that committee.

● (1425)

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the present Prime Minister was leader of the opposition, he used to castigate the Liberals for passing off serious problems to committees. I suggest he should practice now what he was preaching then.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that his loquacious colleague from Newfoundland, the Minister of Finance, said—and he is quoted in today's papers—that "interest rate increases no longer seem to have the effect"—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect, the hon. member is engaging in a preamble that I think is lengthy in terms of his third question. Will he please put a question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will come right to the point. Since the Minister of Finance said this policy is now disastrous—he admitted it yesterday—will the Prime Minister now implement a policy in accord with what he was preaching before he formed the government, namely, reduce interest rates instead of boosting them?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the New Democratic Party will know, we have already this day implemented one of the major undertakings we made in the election campaign, which was to accord much greater respect to the committees of this House so that we can draw upon the advice of all members of this House and, indeed, of the public, in dealing with very complex problems.

The members of the New Democratic Party will have the same opportunity as members of other parties in this House to contribute in a practical way to solutions to the dilemma that faces Canada. We look forward to receiving in that committee and in other forums the specific proposals that members of that party may well have, as the committee will receive specific proposals and testimony by the Minister of Finance.

POSITION OF CHAIRMAN OF TASK FORCE ON PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, with respect to Petro-Canada. Can the minister confirm that the chairman of the task force on Petro-Canada, Mr. Don McDougall, although on leave as president of Labatt's is still receiving full salary from that company, and that that company is owned by Brascan which has indicated an interest in buying Petro-Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Already?

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm the facts with respect to the income received by the chairman of the task force, but I can tell the hon. member that I am not aware of any interest formally expressed with respect to the acquisition of PetroCan by the company referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. McCauley: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can we count on an investigation and some answers to that question?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I will be glad to look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

OIL—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON PRICING

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to ask him if it is true that, regardless of any agreements between the federal government and the provinces, the federal government favours a price increase of $5 to $6 a barrel in the price of oil in 1980, which would cost the average consumer perhaps $100 more per year to drive his car and $120 more per year to heat his house.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister has indicated exactly the status of the negotiations. We have been on record with respect to the question of an increase that we think is necessary in the price of oil, but the matter of the precise extent—

An hon. Member: What do you think?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am trying to explain this to the hon. member, who has lots to learn about energy policy.

An hon. Member: Arrogant.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to tell this House that we are in the process of deep consultation with the provinces, a practice that the hon. member for Outremont, in his former capacity as federal-provincial minister, will recall is very essential. We intend to pursue those consultations, which are of a very serious nature, to a very serious extent.

Mr. Phillips: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I was really asking if the minister had these plans for 1980, and has his department, for example, examined the regional impact of any such substantial increase in the price of oil?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is that we are not putting forward that particular price increase regime. The answer to the second part is yes.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who a little while ago announced he would release by the end of September an inspirational and dramatic energy blueprint for the 1980s, to quote his words. We are in October, and there is no sign of that blueprint.

● (1430)

My question to the minister is: Are we to believe press reports to the effect that no blueprint is in sight, and that inspiration and drama have gone the same way as so many other Tory promises, that is to say, in those famous trashcans to which the late Right Hon. member for Prince Albert used to refer?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I want to tell the hon. member that I intend to work as hard as possible in order to make progress with respect to our objective of energy self-sufficiency. I do not take the task lightly.

Mr. Chrétien: Ready for 1990?

PRICE OF OIL—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO ASSIST INDUSTRY AND PRODUCERS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Given the reports that the government wants to increase domestic oil prices by $4 to $6 a barrel by the end of next year, and that such a move would result in 2 per cent to 4 per cent additional inflation, another 100,000 unemployed and about 1 per cent less economic growth, at a time when the economy is already not healthy, will the Prime Minister postpone such an increase, review the whole matter and ensure that proper compensatory measures to assist industry and consumers are put in place first before saddling the nation with the double-digit inflation that these prices will bring?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, naturally, any part of any energy package that we negotiate with the provinces will include measures to deal with the serious impact that energy price increases might have, particularly in some parts of the country with lower income Canadians. It is clearly part of the policy and determination of this government that we will not continue with policies that will leave the people of Canada exposed to a situation where we are forced forever to rely upon unstable foreign sources of oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, in the meantime, I would take it that we are blindly pursuing a path of escalating prices and economic disaster without proper measures.

Since resolving the energy price question first before any budget is imperative, surely if the budget is to have any meaning in terms of these aids to industry and consumers that the Prime Minister is so concerned about, and in view of the most recent rebuff the Prime Minister had from the Premier of Alberta concerning energy price increases, is he prepared to act unilaterally to implement a new domestic oil price prior to the November budget?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, certainly not prior to the November budget. The hon. member will know that there is more to budgets than energy policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONTRIBUTIONS OF CROWN CORPORATIONS TO PRO-CANADA

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In the Speech from the Throne, it was announced yesterday:

To make federalism work, it is essential to change the attitudes of the past—

More specifically, again I quote:

—and the federal government must set the example. Accordingly, it is a primary goal of my government to bring about a new era in federal-provincial relations.

We were advised throughout the year that big Crown corporations made generous contributions to Pro-Canada with the blessing of the former government. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if that attitude will be maintained or whether the government intends to alter it.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): We can see he will think about it.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had to check with my colleague the Minister of Supply and Services. Indeed I do so not merely with regard to policies, but also concerning the French vocabulary.

Mr. Speaker, we are now in the process of reconsidering the practice followed by the former government with regard to the matter the hon. member has brought up.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister also aware that a number of Crown corporations, of which Canadian National and the Canadian Development Corporation are two, are directly involved in the committee that canvasses for donations? Is he aware of that, and does he intend to announce, in coming days, his decision to put an end to the political game, I repeat, the political game of partisanship which seems to inspire the Crown corporations?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that is why we are now reviewing the arrangement.

ALLEGED GOUGING OF PUBLIC BY OIL MULTINATIONALS

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, in light of the very questionable pricing practices and the literal gouging, to the tune of more than $100 million, of Nova Scotia citizens by Imperial Oil, an Exxon affiliate, as evidenced by a civil trial in Halifax and reported recently by the New York Times, can the minister tell us if he intends to launch a full investigation of the pricing practices of oil multinationals, particularly Imperial Oil, and if not, why not?

Some hon. Members: Hear hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question of profits of multinationals and other oil companies, for that matter, is under constant review and surveillance by the department. If the hon. member has any specific information on which to substantiate the allegations which he has made, I would be glad to receive them.

Mr. Chrétien: Read the papers.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, does the minister not recognize that the existence of a national oil company like Petro-Canada, belonging to all Canadians, would prevent the spread of such practices and would keep the Canadian government and those large multinationals honest in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure when the hon. member re-examines his question he will recognize an argumentative tone in it.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SALE OF CANDU REACTORS TO ARGENTINA

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for International Trade. If there was any uncertainty as to the system of safeguards that the previous government had offered the government of Argentina—as seemed to be said by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce sitting in the other place, and I could quote him on that subject—why did the Minister of International Trade wait four months before going to Argentina to rectify that possible discrepancy?

[Mr. Roy (Beauce).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the question of safeguards was clearly understood by the Argentine government in this recent negotiation. They were precisely the same safeguards as were applied by the former government, and it was made quite clear to them that these safeguards would apply in the contract under negotiation; there is no doubt about that.

As far as any delay by myself going to Argentina, there were a number of matters under review. These were taken into account in the process of reaching a decision to support it, and we went to Argentina as soon as those matters were complete.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the safeguards offered by the previous government are not the cause, in any way, shape or form, of the sale not being made in Argentina.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, in the discussions I had with people in Argentina, as well as has been made clear in the report of the nuclear agency of Argentina, the factor of safeguards was a matter in the decision they reached recently on the Candu reactor sale.

The matter was made quite clear. Those, together with the fact that balance of the existing contract does run into some problems that have taken place over the last four or five years, were the two factors that led to the Argentine government taking the decision to develop alternative technology in Germany to provide a second source of supply for this important contract.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION BY McDONALD COMMISSION—ACCESS TO DOCUMENTS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and concerns the order in council passed by the former government just prior to leaving office, prohibiting the McDonald commission from examining minutes of the cabinet or cabinet committees during the ministry of the right hon. member for Mount Royal unless he gives permission to do so.

Will the Prime Minister and the government give serious consideration to amending, repealing or replacing this order in council and any other similar orders in council which would permit complete examination on all matters concerning the RCMP, particularly in the field of national security, by the McDonald commission and the Government of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have no intention of repealing that particular order in council. It was an order in council which, by my understanding, was perfectly in accord with precedents established previously relative to documents that had been in the possession of the government replaced at the polls.

There is an arrangement in place, as has been the case for some time now, in the event of a change of government where a senior official of the Public Service of Canada is custodian of documents and will refer back to the Prime Minister and the senior ministers of the former government with regard to the release of any such documents. I, personally, am satisfied that the former prime minister, the present Leader of the Opposition, will not act in any way as to deny access to the McDonald royal commission of documents to which that royal commission should have access.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

LOST SALES OF CANDU REACTORS TO ARGENTINA AND JAPAN—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to that asked by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton. During the prolonged period pending the recall of Parliament, Canadians have been witnessing the potential loss of our exports. Mention was made of the loss of the Candu reactor sale to Argentina.

My question is directed to the Minister of State for International Trade: it is with reference to the $2.8 billion loss which has been estimated as a result of the loss of the Argentina and Japan sales and the 75,000 jobs that have been affected. What specific measures is the minister of state contemplating in order to assist an industry which is now recognized as being in the doldrums and may well in the future need additional financial assistance from this government?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the hon. member. The $2.8 billion figure is somewhat inaccurate. The total amount of exports at stake here as far as Canada is concerned was about $800 million. The balance was local costs in Argentina.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I are taking the opportunity to assess the situation with regard to the loss of this contract, in order to decide where we go from here to develop new markets for what we believe is a very important Canadian resource, the Candu reactor system.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, in view of the hon. gentleman's reply I call to the attention of the House the fact that on May 4 of this year the former government entered into an arrangement, which was initialed, with the state of Mexico. Article 3 of that agreement provides for nuclear co-operation. It was envisaged that a potential Candu sale might be effected as a result.

Can the minister explain why, after five months, especially in view of the Argentina sale loss, AECL, which has been identified as our consultant pursuant to that agreement, has not received any instructions from this government to attend upon Mexico in order to comply with the terms of the agreement? Indeed, there has not been any approach by the minister or the government toward Mexico relating to implementing the terms of that agreement, much to our loss.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of countries that are potential markets for AECL and for the sale of a Candu reactor. One of them is Mexico. That will be one of the potential markets we will be discussing to see where we go from here. A great deal of time was taken this summer in approaching the Argentine market. That will now be behind us. We can look from here to Mexico and about five other countries which are very good potential markets.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROMULGATION OF REGULATIONS UNDER ACT

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-Port-Au-Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration why, in view of the fact that his party opposed Bill C-14 last November—and opposed it quite strongly, I might add—he promulgated the regulations under that act making regressive changes in unemployment insurance, affecting many thousands of Canadians, including 62,000 Newfoundlanders, and taking some $34 million out of the Newfoundland economy this year.

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the changes made as a result of Bill C-14 were a product of a previous Parliament. It fell on the governor in council in the early days of the new government to consider those changes, those that had not yet been implemented, and to proclaim them. The amendments were proclaimed to honour the legitimacy of the previous Parliament in its decision-making process. I can say to the hon. member, and he will have a full opportunity to participate in the debate perhaps later this year or early next year, that a full-scale review of unemployment insurance, including some of those changes, has now been set in motion, in fact four days after the new government took office.

That review will include a variety of subjects, including those that were the subject of debate in this chamber in the last Parliament. I am hopeful that that review, which involves extensive consultations with the provinces, labour, business, women's groups and other interested parties, will be brought to a conclusion toward the end of this year. A new bill, hopefully, will be introduced in the spring. The hon. member, along with all members of the House, will have full opportunity to make known his views on this important subject.

Mr. Faour: Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the minister that he is now in the government and has the option of changing regulations such as these.

Further to what the minister mentioned about the review procedure that is taking place, can he explain why, in the proposals contained in that review, there were many proposals to cut off from entitlement to unemployment insurance seasonal fishermen and other seasonal workers in places such as the Atlantic region, without at the same time in any way providing any discussion on alternatives? I think this is very important. Can he explain why this was done without discussing the alternatives?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the subjects of review are many. They include seasonal workers and about ten other items. There is no intention of conducting a review simply to cut off any individual group of employees in Canada. As was indicated in the throne speech yesterday, the intention of the review of the Unemployment Insurance Act is to provide greater equity and to remove disincentives to work. That is the framework, and it includes many alternatives which I will be pleased to debate with the hon. member at the appropriate time.

SPORTS

GRANTS TO UNIVERSITY ATHLETES

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the new Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. I should like to take the opportunity to express my wish that he keep as fit as his predecessor.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the minister announced a few weeks ago that universities in the maritimes and western provinces would see travel grants for their athletes competing in Canada during the academic year 1979-80 substantially reduced, from $450,000 to $190,000. The $450,000 was an amount previously agreed upon between the universities concerned and his department.

● (1450)

Could the minister inform the House whether he is ready to reconsider this drastic cut with the two university associations concerned, since their athletic program for the academic year was designed with the understanding that the federal government would give the amount already agreed upon?

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Sherbrooke. I do not think I will ever possess the same form as the previous minister.

The Canadian Interuniversity fiscal Union received $456,000 in the fiscal year 1978-79. That was not to be a perpetual grant. It was something which was looked at, and it was to be a once-around type of grant. We discussed it with the university directors. I decided to cut down. Hon. members are aware of the restraint program: let us call it belt-tightening.

An hon. Member: Whose?

[Mr. Faour.]

Mr. Paproski: We did cut it down to $190,000 after a considerable amount of discussion with some of the local athletic directors both from the Atlantic provinces and from the west. We decided to give them an extra $100,000, which brings it to $290,000.

ENERGY

OIL PRODUCTS—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT SOLVE SUPPLY PROBLEMS OF INDEPENDENT DISTRIBUTORS

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Charlesbourg): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. We recall the fragile situation of the independent distributors of oil products in Quebec and we also know that the minister met the independent distributors of oil products in September. I should like to know, what are, precisely, the measures he intends to take to solve the problem of supply faced by the independent distributors of oil products, with a view to preventing bankruptcy of those independent distributors and ensuring that consumers in Quebec will have heating oil next winter.

[English]

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right in saying that there has been considerable pressure over a period of some months and over the course of the last few years with respect to the independents of Canada.

As soon as I took over this responsibility, I directed my attention to this particular, serious matter. In fact, in August of this year I wrote to all the refiners and terminal operators asking them to observe certain rules with respect to supply for independents not only in the province of Quebec but in what we might generally term eastern Canada. That particular telex asked them not to alter substantially their trade class mix, to continue to supply customers of record and not arbitrarily deny contract renewal.

On the other hand, the hon. member will appreciate the fact that the federal government cannot give ironclad guarantees that all independents will be able to stay in business. We are trying to encourage independents to enter into long-term or extended contracts so that they may, in fact, be able to be assured of supply during the course of next winter and subsequently.

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING OIL REFINERS AND DISTRIBUTORS

Mr. Pierre Bussières (Charlesbourg): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that the requests for the supply of heating oil which were made by the minister to the big companies were fruitless. I should like to know whether the minister would be prepared to introduce a bill in the House which would force refiners to sign contracts with all independent distributors in which they would indicate a certain supply, and at the same time would guarantee a certain price at the refinery for all the independent distributors, a price which would be competitive with the price offered to their own distributors.

[English]

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, my department is keeping a very close watch on progress with respect to this matter. We have taken steps with respect to allocation of additional supplies and additional flexibility in the interprovincial pipeline. We have been successful in arranging for some additional supplies because of the increased capacity which will be available.

I want the hon. member to know I am seriously concerned about this matter and I am going to do all I can to get us through the next few months. Unfortunately, I inherited this problem when I took over this portfolio.

INTERIM REPORT OF McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question put by the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville and it is to the Solicitor General. I wonder if the Solicitor General has had an opportunity to discuss with the chairman of the McDonald commission when we might expect an interim report of this ongoing commission.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of a couple of occasions to speak to Mr. Justice McDonald. To be frank about it, there have been more answers than one. The answers I have received have not been entirely clarified. The problem simply is that the McDonald commission construes its terms of reference and mandate as being rather ongoing.

I hope to have a further conversation about this with the chairman of the commission as soon as possible—as a matter of fact, hopefully within the next seven days—and I will be very glad to report to the hon. member and perhaps to the members of this House at that time as a result of that discussion.

ACTION TO SOLVE PROBLEM OF HIGH INTEREST RATES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I want to ask him how the government could present a throne speech yesterday indicating its commitment is to growth, confidence and jobs, while on the very same day it permitted interest rate increases by the Bank of Canada which even business spokesmen say weaken growth and confidence and hurt employment.

Does this contradiction not show that the new government does not know where it is going, especially since the governor of the Bank himself admitted that current interest rates are causing problems for individuals and for business? I want the minister to tell us now, because he has an obligation to answer in the House of Commons, what the new government is doing to solve these problems the minister has allowed to arise for individual workers and for business in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the difference between our policy and that of the government of the hon. gentleman is that we have not slavishly followed U.S. interest rates. Quite frankly, hon. gentlemen opposite left us with a deficit this year of at least $7 billion, which is the present forecast, and that does not leave us much room to manoeuvre. There is a budgetary deficit of $11 billion. Despite these factors, we believe our policies in the longer term will get this country working again.

STEPS TO REDUCE INFLATION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Can he explain to the House why he has discarded the policy enunciated by his Prime Minister during the campaign, that after the election, if he was elected, he would not rely any more on monetary policy but solve the problem of inflation through fiscal and budgetary policies?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our position is exactly that. It is not only monetary policy but also our fiscal and budgetary policies and our stopping the scandalous expansion of expenditures and the huge deficits of the hon. gentleman which will bring about a solution in the next year.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, can the minister explain to the House why last March he and his colleagues were calling for a budget, why so far they have not been able to find any new policy better than mine, and why they have carried on for 13 months with the same budget?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I admire the hon. gentleman's spirit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

INTENTIONS RESPECTING PROPOSED MORTGAGE CREDIT PLAN

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Finance, who is enjoying his small deficits. In view of the fact that since his government came to power the carrying costs on a $60,000 mortgage have gone up by $1,500, which totally cancels out any benefits under his proposed mortgage credit plan, is the minister prepared to withdraw that plan and revise and amend it so that we will have a plan which will reduce mortgage interest rates so that Canadians can buy homes?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman suggests a unique solution: mortgage interest rates have gone up, so take away the benefit that we are offering the people of Canada under the mortgage interest deduction plan and make it more difficult for them. No, we are certainly not going to withdraw that. We are carrying on, and there are 3,800,000 households in this country which are delighted with that plan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Is the minister prepared to meet with his friends and associates in the residential construction industry who state that increased interest rates will result in a total depression in the construction industry, that they have total disregard for his mortgage credit plan, and therefore will he be prepared to withdraw it when his friends and associates tell him to?

● (1500)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to meet with any group at any time and commiserate with them at the dismal record of the last ten years which has brought them to this state and which has forced mortgage interest rates to go up and caused the bank rate to go up and caused the central bank rate to go up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST MINISTER INTERVENE IN MONTREAL GRAIN HANDLERS' DISPUTE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour and it relates to the five months old grain handlers' dispute at the port of Montreal.

In view of the fact that the minister injected himself very quickly and expeditiously into the west coast grain handlers' dispute, bringing it to a successful conclusion, and in view of the fact that the present grain handlers' strike has been going on for five months and has the potential of creating problems for Quebec farmers this winter and for others, is the minister now prepared to insert himself directly into the dispute in an effort to resolve it as successfully as he did the west coast grain handlers' strike?

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to give the hon. member credit for asking that question, because I am also concerned about the matter. But I want to point out to him that at this very moment the mediator, Mr. Rolland Doucet, is meeting with the parties involved in a private way and having meaningful discussions. Progress is being made. For me to say anything further at this particular time would be unproductive.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROVINCIAL STATUS FOR THE YUKON

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Yesterday, the minister announced substantial changes in the administration of the Yukon which put it well on its way to provincial status and, I might say, has led to the resignation of the commissioner.

How does the minister reconcile that sort of unilateral administrative action with the statements that he and the Prime Minister made with respect to Parliament and the parliamentary system and also their promise to consult with Yukoners through a referendum, to consult with the other provinces on substantial constitutional changes and to consult with the Indians as well? I would ask him if he is now ready to withdraw his instructions of yesterday and refer the matter to a parliamentary committee until at least he carries out some of the promises that he has made on this important question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the hon. member that it is the position of this government that responsibility must, and should, lie with those who are elected. The elected people are the legislative council of the Yukon territory which has been given the responsibility. I have given instructions to the commissioner to follow the mandate of this government, that is, to give those responsibilities to the elected people that we were able to give under the Yukon Act.

I have consulted with the Council of Yukon Indians. We have said that we will sit down for further consultations on the constitutional amendment with the Yukon territorial government, the Indians of the Yukon and the interested parties. But what I have to reiterate to the hon. member is that the elected people of the Yukon and those who elected them want to have responsibility in the Yukon, and that is what we have done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, in the press release that the minister issued yesterday he said that the commissioner must from now on follow the instructions and the advice of the Executive Council of the Yukon. At the same time, he said he would keep for himself the responsibilities that he has under the Indian Act for the administration of the Yukon.

How does he reconcile that? Does that mean that the commissioner no longer has the right of veto, but that he reserves that right to veto the decisions of the so-called elected representatives in the Yukon, and how does he reconcile this with the position of the Yukon Indians who are opposed to any movement to provincial status while their land claims are not even near to settlement?

Mr. Epp: I have to tell the hon. member that he is wrong in his allegation. First of all, I did not tell the former commissioner that she was bound by the decision of the executive committee. I said, as the Yukon Act determines, that she was bound by the decision of the legislative council: they are the elected people of the Yukon. What we have also said, and the hon. member should be aware of this, is that in terms of the land claims the commissioner was not involved in the ongoing negotiations on land claims.

This government has stated clearly its recognition of land claims and the desirability of the early settlement of the land claims. That will go forward as well.

THE ADMINISTRATION

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL LISTING ACTING PRIME MINISTERS, ACTING MINISTERS AND PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table in both official languages copies of the order in council listing acting prime ministers, the acting ministers and the order in council listing parliamentary secretaries, Nos. PC 1979-1641 and PC 1979-2716.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like, at the outset, to offer my best wishes to His Excellency the Governor General, who presided for the first time over the official opening of Parliament.

Since Mr. and Mrs. Schreyer have moved into Rideau Hall with their children they have not ceased to impress Canadians of all ethnic origins by the enthusiasm they display in carrying out their noble duties. In the course of their travels to the various regions of our country, they have rejuvenated our national pride and have reminded us of the values which form the very basis of our strength and our greatness. On behalf of the official opposition, I wish them health and happiness in their service to Canada.

[English]

I wish to commend the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne for the impressive way in which they have launched their parliamentary careers. The hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) spoke movingly of the multicultural richness of the Niagara peninsula, and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) spoke with the conviction of the farmer that he is when he stressed the importance of preserving the family farm. Both men demonstrated they have much to contribute to Parliament. I was moved when the hon. member for Cardigan said that as a member of a new generation of parliamentarians he intended to bring his best efforts to serve his country. I am reminded that on all sides of the House we have new members who have been elected to the various parties, who show that the parliamentary system and the federal form of government in Canada is very vigorous indeed and that it can grow men and women of such value, prepared to give their best in this place in the service of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: While I am in a kindly mood, Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to welcome to the House in his new role the man who now bears the title of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Although I am still able to restrain my enthusiasm over the electoral success he has had as the leader of his party, I have no hesitation in joining other Canadians in wishing him well as the new Prime Minister of our country. If in the future he should sometimes doubt the sincerity of my support, let him remember that even the friendliest surgeon must frequently use the knife.

• (1510)

As one who knows something about both the satisfactions and the frustrations of the office he now holds, I may be permitted a few words of advice. I would advise him that he will seldom be as powerful as people think he is to right what is wrong in Canada, nor seldom be as personally responsible as his admirers tell him he is for what is right about Canada. So the secret of serenity is to be tolerant of the criticism, however undeserved he may think it is, and to be skeptical about the praise which probably will be equally undeserved. If the burden of office should sometimes seem too heavy to bear, let him be assured we will do our part to see that both the burden and the office pass quickly from his hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I offer congratulations to those who have been chosen to serve as ministers of the Crown. For Canada's sake we wish them well. Along with all of us, Mr. Speaker will have to become accustomed to the idea that while all the ministers opposite are equal in splendour and dignity, some are more equal than others; and some of the ministers are not opposite at all, they are hiding down the hall in the Senate. One of them has become the hero of hopeless candidates. He has proven that the best way to win is to lose. So now we have a cabinet where some are inners and some are outers. To compound the confusion, some of the inners do not have senior portfolios while some of the outers do. Some of the inners and outers are members of the House. They are called the in-House group. I dare not say what the other group is called.

I understand the in-House outers will be given free newspaper subscriptions to keep them up to date on what is going on in cabinet. Down the hall we have two inners and one outer who are being encouraged to become proficient in the use of carrier pigeons. We even have a doghouse group comprising outers like the now Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Grafftey) who originally found himself ceremoniously sworn in to absolutely nothing and then had his title abolished. Also we have an open-House group including inners like the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who, after years of advocating open government, has gone into hiding and demanded that his entire department be given an unlisted telephone number.

Looking over the cabinet I am reminded that I have been telling Canadians for some time in another context that we should all lower our expectations. I know some of the veteran members across the aisle, who have been secretly writing "honourable" in front of their names for years in keen anticipation of the great day, are more than a little chagrined at being excluded from the cabinet. I can only offer them in consolation the certain knowledge that in time being left out of this cabinet will be seen to be the greater honour.

Much more serious is the total exclusion from the inner policy-making cabinet of representatives from the three provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba. Originally British Columbia was excluded as well, I am told, until a powerful lobby was mounted to persuade the Prime Minister that the Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser) was more worthy than might immediately be apparent to the untrained eye. Also we have an inner cabinet where there is no minister as such from Alberta. Apparently the Prime Minister plans to speak in cabinet for Alberta and for Canada simultaneously, as though their interests were always identical. That offers small comfort to the majority of Canadians living in other provinces who do not believe that what is good for Alberta is automatically good for Canada. I think that has been established by the seeming inability of the Prime Minister to reach an agreement with the Premier of Alberta on a pricing policy for petroleum.

During the election campaign the Tories promised a new federalism for Canada. Who would have believed that they meant one in which no voice speaks for Nova Scotians in the inner council of government, no voice speaks for New Brunswickers and no voice speaks for Manitobans? Who would have believed that they meant a federalism in which the voice of British Columbia is barely tolerated as a reluctant afterthought and the voice of Alberta is presumed to be also the voice of Canada? To give voice to the voiceless, the members of Parliament of my party will go out of their way to ensure that before any government policy is translated into law, the Prime Minister and his inner cabinet will hear in this House from Liberal members the legitimate concerns of the people of Nova Scotia, the people of New Brunswick and the people of Manitoba.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: What about Alberta?

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members are worried about the members from Alberta. That is the point I was making: None of them are in the inner cabinet and that should worry them indeed.

I should like now to touch upon the manner in which, as members of the Liberal party, we intend to play the important role of representatives of the official opposition. There is no doubt that the people of Canada have given the Progressive Conservative Party a mandate to govern Canada and want us to give them the chance to administer our country without being exposed to political interference and chicanery. Not only do we accept and respect the decision of the people, but we will take seriously the responsibility with which we have been entrusted to co-operate constructively in the preparation of Canadian policies.

The Liberal party demonstrated very early following the election its strong desire to constitute a positive and constructive opposition, and I, for one, agreed to discuss with the Prime Minister current issues and the various personalities he would have to deal with at the summit in Tokyo and the Commonwealth conference in Lusaka.

I am happy to say that there was no tension or hostility in our discussions and that they reflected our mutual concern to put the national interest above any partisanship. I am also happy to note and to recognize publicly that the Prime Minister has scrupulously respected the confidential aspect of our discussions.

If any advice was of any use to him in Tokyo or Lusaka, I am happy about it and I am quite willing to repeat the experience. The national interest is the major concern of our party and we would take no pleasure in seeing our country badly represented at such vitally important international meetings.

Mr. Speaker, the government can continue to count on the co-operation of the official opposition for any of its initiatives which can improve the situation of Canada and Canadians. We do not believe in the senseless ritual which consists in voting against the government on every occasion and every issue. This type of irresponsible opposition that the Progressive Conservatives and the New Democrats have unfortunately practised in the past prevents Parliament from legislating and helps weaken its reputation among the people. Indeed, to vote against everything goes against the interests of the opposition parties as it erodes the influence that they can have on the people by keeping their negative votes for major issues which violate their basic political principles or which are in obvious conflict with the prime interests of the country.

On these last issues, on issues of this importance, we intend to give the government a fight such as this House has never seen before, with all the strength, the vigour and the determination that we can muster. On such major issues, we shall not hesitate to unite with other opposition parties to force the government to review its legislation under penalty of defeat in the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister said that he intended to govern as if he had a parliamentary majority. Those are courageous words from a leader whose government can be defeated any day and on any question by the combined forces of the opposition parties, a leader who failed to convince the people to give him a majority, a leader whose candidates won half a million votes fewer than the Liberal candidates.

Those are courageous words from a leader who cowardly delayed his inescapable meeting with Parliament longer than any other prime minister in our history. Indeed, almost five months have passed since the election, almost five months during which the Canadian people waited for the government to organize itself and find the courage to submit its measures to Parliament.

In the extreme, such an improper delay could be forgiven if the government had put this time to good use. But instead, we saw a government which, at best, appeared vague and confused about the orientation it wants to give the country, distrustful of all those it suspects of being enemies of the regime in the public service and flatly inconsistent in its public statements.

Let me illustrate a few of the ways in which the government has frittered away the goodwill which the public extends to any government in the early months of its mandate.

As one of his first acts in office, after pledging to bring government closer to the will of the people the Prime Minister appointed to the top economic policy-making position in cabinet a man who, after serving six months in Parliament, was strongly repudiated by the voters of Ottawa Centre. Senator de Cotret's continued presence in such a key cabinet position is a lingering insult to the voters who rejected him, an insult to the spirit of democracy and an insult to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Sensing the unacceptability of that decision, the Prime Minister indicated that the senator should seek election to this House when the opportunity arose. Those, I believe, were his words. The senator, on the other hand, has shown no enthusiasm at all for subjecting himself to yet another repudiation by the electorate. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he should give Senator de Cotret a chance, or perhaps an ultimatum; either he becomes a candidate in one of the vacant ridings of Prince Albert or Burin-St. George's in the November 19 byelections, or he vacate his seat in cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I want to make it clear that I do not direct the same criticism to members of the cabinet from Quebec. It is important that every province have representatives in cabinet, and if they cannot be elected I have no strong objection toward their being appointed. But the Conservatives elected more than 50 members from Ontario. It is astonishing that the Prime Minister found it necessary to pass over practically all of them and give a cabinet seat to an Ontario candidate who was defeated.

Equally astonishing is the fact that the senator occupies one of the Ontario seats in the inner cabinet while metropolitan Toronto, which elected some 12 Tory members, has no representative in that central policy-making group.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Here is another example of the government's ineptitude: the issue of the location of the Canadian embassy in Israel. During his first press conference after the election, the Prime Minister solemnly stated he would keep his electoral promise to move our embassy to Jerusalem. He said he would not tolerate senior civil servants of the government or anybody else for that matter telling him what to think. Like a man of honour, he was going to take action and deliver the goods.

The Prime Minister did not suspect then that nobody would suffer more from his policy than those whose votes he wanted to attract. The main priority of the Jewish community of Canada is to protect their civil rights against any boycott threat from the Arab countries. Yet at this time, precisely due to the growing opposition aroused by this government's policy in this matter, the public is not as willing to support an anti-boycott legislation as it was before and that legislation has been pushed back to the bottom of the government's list of priorities.

Through inexperience or naïveté, I do not know, the Prime Minister did not realize how very significant the move of our embassy was in all countries of the Middle East. He seemed to believe that what pleased the Conservative voters in Toronto would please the rest of the world. But once he was faced with a strong opposition from the rest of the world, he retreated with a rapidity worthy of an Olympic champion. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) did not do much to make up for the foolish antics of the government. On the contrary, he thoughtlessly stated that the Arab world's barks were worse than its bites. Well, Mr. Speaker, those are the bites which now cause serious injuries to exporting companies and Canadian workers.

It is one thing to make formal statements on a matter of principle and to accept with lucidity the repercussions involved. It is another thing to defend obstinately a highly controversial position although it might have been conceived rapidly without taking into account all its possible repercussions. However, after it became obvious even to the Progressive Conservatives that their position on the move of our embassy was dangerous, that it would be harmful to the fragile peace talks in the Middle East and that it was jeopardizing the economic interests of our country, one would have expected that the government recognize its error by trying to save face as best as possible.

Nothing of that happened. On the contrary, we saw one of the most painful sights in the political annals of this country. To evade any personal embarrassment, the Prime Minister chose to humiliate his former leader. Like a scapegoat, Robert Stanfield was dispatched to the Middle East where he is dragging himself miserably from one capital to another, supposedly to win time for the Prime Minister when in fact he is only gathering contempt for a government which is inexorably lurching toward a reversal of position all the more humiliating that it will have been delayed so long.

Mr. Pepin: Another Suez!

An hon. Member: Spending millions for nothing.

Mr. Trudeau: The third example of the confusion of this government also has to do with foreign policy. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) went before the United Nations Assembly and urgently appealed for greater generosity and better co-operation from all countries in the area of human rights and social justice. Several people, including us, think that secret and discreet diplomacy is more efficient than great speeches to ensure those rights. But we are not for that matter reproving the generous intentions of the minister. What we are reproving is the contradictory statements made by this government, because at the very moment the hon. lady was urging the other countries to have more compassion for the plight of the oppressed and presumably help them with their money, as without economic justice human rights have no meaning, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) was warning the poorer nations at the Malta and Belgrade conferences not to come and beg for increased help from Canada whatever their needs. The Minister of State for the Canadian International Development Agency (Mr. Asselin) who is sitting in the other place with his carrier pigeons said to the press of this country that the government intended to reduce the amounts to be spent on foreign aid.

The net result of all this, Mr. Speaker, is that Canada's solid and established reputation as an open, committed and generous ally of the Third World in the fight for greater economic and social justice has changed overnight to one of hypocrisy. Canada will support any initiative to further the cause of social justice and economic development in the Third World provided we are not asked to contribute a single penny. We will support any action that could prove useful provided somebody else foots the bill. That is the hypocritical message this government is sending abroad. Even the Secretary of State for External Affairs is going against her own urgings at the United Nations when she suggests that Canada should perhaps concentrate its help on developing countries which are making real economic progress and reduce its help to poorer countries. That is like being in favour of medical insurance for healthy people, Mr. Speaker, while leaving to private charity the task of looking after seriously ill people.

No wonder the poorer countries which had considered Canada to be one of their strongest and most dedicated allies are beginning to view us as not so reliable friends. Mr. Speaker, when the Progressive Conservative Party came to power, Canada had very few enemies throughout the world. Within a few short months, this government has managed to set against us Argentina, Pakistan, several African countries and every Near Eastern nation. Quite a success, Mr. Speaker, which does not lead us to expect much from this government.

This recital of confusion could go on and on, Mr. Speaker. How many times did we hear before the election that if the Progressive Conservatives were to take power, they would restore the supremacy of the House of Commons. Ever since the election, the Progressive Conservatives have taken every opportunity to reiterate their commitment to a more open and more effective Parliament. However, there was but one problem—they had no desire whatsoever to convene this Parliament, Mr. Speaker. And while the House was not sitting, they have transferred senior portfolios from the House of Commons to the Senate; they have set up what they called parliamentary committees, on which actually only Progressive Conservative members sit; they have disclosed to the Progressive Conservative caucus, long before they were published, the results of ministerial research on energy and transport; they have spent some $10 billion through mere Governor General's warrants without being in any kind of a hurry to seek parliamentary approval; and finally, they have announced budgetary measures out of this House.

● (1530)

[English]

The new government starts from a position of considerable economic strength.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: This is the funny party this week.

Mr. Trudeau: The members opposite will have to realize that the telegraph has been invented and that what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) had to say in Great Britain a couple of weeks ago was heard in Canada and should be read by them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Their finance minister, the one who they are seemingly smirking at now, told an audience in England three weeks ago:

The underlying state of the Canadian economy is strong and healthy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Thank you, John.

Mr. Crosbie: Despite the excesses of the previous government.

Mr. Trudeau: Some of them will remember the words I once used, "a healthy economy in a difficult world".

Mr. Crosbie: "The land is strong".

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, the land is strong, but I am afraid that it is being seriously weakened and undermined by that government across the aisle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: At the time when the Conservative government came to power the economy had achieved a first quarter growth rate of 1.7 per cent, or 6.8 per cent on an annual basis. That is a real growth rate of 6.8 per cent. There were 10,286,000 Canadians employed in May, which is an increase of 366,000 over the previous year. Over the same 12 months the number of unemployed had been reduced by 74,000, indicating that our rate of job creation was higher than the rate at which new people were entering the labour force. The rate of unemployment in May was 7.7 per cent, down from 8.5 per cent one year earlier.

The consumer price index stood at a year over year increase of 9.3 per cent in May, down from a 12-month increase of 9.8 per cent in April. In the first quarter of 1979 industrial corporation sales were 17 per cent higher than in the same quarter a year earlier, and after tax profits had risen 57 per cent. The value of exports increased by $556 million in the first quarter, more than half a billion dollars, compared with the fourth quarter of 1978. Total farm cash receipts between January and May of this year were 20 per cent higher than a year earlier.

When the Liberal government left office Canada's textile, clothing and steel industries were, like many others, operating at full capacity. We led the industrialized world in the rate of job creation. Canada ranked first in the world among exporters of forest products, first in the export of fish and fish products, first in the export of minerals. Despite the continuing critical problems of inflation, unemployment and slow growth, which Canada shares, as the hon. members opposite are discovering, with every other industrialized country, we in the Liberal party are proud of the economic achievements which we have helped to secure for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As the new government assumes its responsibilities, it inherits the stewardship of an economy and country whose strengths are firm and deep. As I just quoted the Minister of Finance a moment ago, the underlying state of the Canadian economy is strong and healthy. In the exercise of that stewardship, it will be necessary for the government to focus its attention on those major policy areas which will also be our preoccupation on this side of the House—economic growth and stability, the price and supply of energy, the unity of our country and its people, the way Canada is governed and the way in which we meet our responsibilities in the world community. As it faces these priorities, the government has already given cause for serious doubts about the quality of its judgment, doubts which we intend to bring vigorously to the forefront of parliamentary debate.

I cannot give too many examples arising from the Speech from the Throne yesterday, but it seems to me it is worth underscoring a theme which is recurrent in several pages of the Speech from the Throne and which was recurrent today in the answers given by the Prime Minister and Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that there will be a new spirit of co-operation in Canada, a new federalism. We will re-establish, the Speech from the Throne says, "the spirit of partnership and renewal which are fundamental to our federation." I quote again as follows:

My ministers believe that the way to build a whole nation is to respect our individual parts—

Then it goes on further to say:

During the past four months, my ministers have made every effort to change the climate of federal/provincial relations which has prevailed in recent years.

Many, many years, Mr. Speaker. After all these words we have two examples. I quote the Governor General again as follows:

As a result of their efforts, there has been visible progress. An agreement on lotteries has been concluded and agreement in principle has been reached with certain coastal provinces concerning offshore mineral resources.

Are there any other examples? None. Later on is the speech you will see, Mr. Speaker, that they are going to bring in an amendment to the Immigration Act. In terms of those five months, however, and in terms of the new spirit of co-operation, they reached two agreements which undid agreements reached by the previous government. There had been an agreement on lotteries reached by the former minister of fitness and amateur sport, the minister from British Columbia. There had been an agreement with the ten provinces which gave some of the share of the lotteries to the federal government and some to the provincial governments. What is this new spirit? We tear up an agreement which is favourable to the provinces and federal government and replace it with an agreement which is favourable to the provinces.

An hon. Member: A give-away.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, giving away some $50 million to $70 million per year. They are hoping to get some of that money back. The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism (Mr. Paproski) is smiling because he knows how little he will get back, if any. I know he will get a few tickets for the Olympics, Mr. Speaker, and I hope he will invite me to share them. As a matter of fact he already has, Mr. Speaker; I thank him for his graciousness.

Mr. Paproski: I will take you over the ski jump.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will go over the ski jump if he comes with me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Then what about the agreement concerning offshore mineral resources? There had been an agreement there also, one that the federal government signed with the three maritime provinces. It was an agreement according to which practically all the revenues were given to the provinces—the net revenues—since the federal government was paying the "upfront" costs. There had been an agreement not to quarrel over jurisdictions. What is this new spirit of federalism, Mr. Speaker, this new nation-building, this new way of building our whole nation which is to respect our individual parts? It is to give it all to them, Mr. Speaker—tearing up the agreement they signed of their own will and giving them the whole works. As I said last year in the Speech from the Throne debate, these are great victories for the Prime Minister who then was bragging about Kingston where he had given, I think, five things that the provinces had asked of him. Now he has given a few more.

It is all very well to talk of co-operation, Mr. Speaker, in an area where the ten provinces together agree that they should get more from the federal government, as in lotteries, and one has to make the difficult assessment of who gets what, as on the price of energy. We have just heard from the Prime Minister and his government that they are giving it very earnest study and consideration, that they do not know if they are going to have any results in time for the budget and whether they are going to be able to bring in a new pricing agreement such as was requested or suggested by the caucus committee on energy, meaning some increase of $5 or $6 next year—we do not know, Mr. Speaker. But this is an area where co-operation really means something. We have not heard from the Prime Minister if it was Premier Lougheed who told him to go shake himself or if it was Premier Davis. We do not know what the results of these talks were, but we do know that in this spirit of co-operation it will be important for the Prime Minister to bring about some concrete results.

The question of the referendum is another area where the new era of co-operation has brought a great decision. The federal government has decided to give up this one tool it had to counter the separatist government of Quebec which will hold a referendum of its own. What is this new spirit of co-operation which says to the separatist government of Quebec, "If you don't like referendums we won't have any"? Some of the provinces do not like the federal government sending decentralized departments into their jurisdictions so the federal government announces it is going to bring to an end the federal program of decentralization which would ensure a federal presence across this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This would show the provinces in a visible way that there is a federal government, with a federal bureaucracy which is at their service and which is prepared to work for them in their cities, towns and villages. The government puts an end to this, Mr. Speaker. So there is a very, very obvious distinction between our approach to federal-provincial relations, which is to stand for all of Canada and which is to say, Mr. Speaker, that you do not save Canada if through compromise and abdication you have pleased the ten provincial premiers and you still have the word "Canada" written on the maps of the world. You save Canada if you have a government that can speak for Canada and can say that it is in the interests of the people of Canada that this be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Speech from the Throne stated "that the way to build a whole nation is to respect our individual parts". Yes, Mr. Speaker, but there are some cases where you cannot please all the provinces on the pricing of energy. Then the way to build a whole nation is to realize that Canada is more than the sum of its parts; it is more than just ten provincial feudalities which are warring together; it is more than just a piece of geography. Canada exists if there is a national spirit and a national will.

During the election I recall that the Prime Minister talked a lot about Canada being a "community of communities". He never quite explained to us what he meant by that, but we see now what he meant, Mr. Speaker. A community of communities is a place in his mind where all the communities get the last word and the community of those communities, Canada, takes second place to the will of all the provincial premiers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This is not a new tendency in Canada, Mr. Speaker. Six years after confederation the great parliamentarian and Liberal, Edward Blake, had this to say:

The future of Canada, I believe, depends very largely upon the cultivation of a national spirit . . . we must find some common ground on which to unite, some common aspiration to be shared, and I think it can be found alone in the cultivation of that national spirit to which I have referred.

What is this government doing for that national spirit when it gives up to the provinces very important areas of federal jurisdiction?

May I also quote Mr. Henri Bourassa, a Canadian nationalist well known on all sides of this House and who sat in this House with great distinction for 40 years, I believe. Seeing the spirit which developed at the time and which is very similar to the spirit developing now in Canada—and which we fought in this election campaign, Mr. Speaker—Mr. Bourassa warned as follows:

—there is Ontario patriotism, Quebec patriotism, or western patriotism, each based on the hope that it may swallow up the others, but there is no Canadian patriotism, and we can have no Canadian nation when we have no Canadian patriotism.

That is what we are asking of this government, Mr. Speaker—to create a spirit of Canada and to bring in policies which are not an abdication of its responsibilities. I think the Prime Minister is influenced by Mr. Jim Gillies whom we knew when he sat in this House. He was reported in The Globe and Mail of August 27 as having said that a traditional Conservative believes that no government is the best government in the most narrow of all senses.

I believe that is what we have in this government, Mr. Speaker. This is what the neo-conservatism is: it is a feeling that this government cannot govern. It think it is well justified in having doubts about itself, Mr. Speaker. It is a feeling that this government cannot govern so let us give it up to the provinces and they can govern. They can have the Crown corporations. They can have their corporations on energy. They can organize their economy and use the tool of the Crown corporation in order to serve the people of their province. This government believes that no government is the best government. It is really withering away, and withering away the spirit of Canada in the process. That is what we on this side will combat to the best of our abilities.

In the question period we heard the government—the Prime Minister, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance explain lamely that an energy pricing agreement would soon be reached. Perhaps not this week or next, perhaps not this month or next, but hopefully next year, Mr. Speaker, because then the agreement put together by our government when it was in office will expire. Instead, what have we heard? We have heard hints of possible acceleration in the rate of price increases. As members on our side have pointed out, acceleration would lead almost inevitably to double digit inflation and an economic slowdown in the consuming provinces.

I need not remind this House that the problem of guaranteeing a sure supply of energy to Canadians at the price they can afford is the most urgent and critical economic issue facing this Parliament. Could anyone fail to be alarmed when they compare the growing energy crisis facing all countries and the fumbling backtracking and confusion that has accompanied the government's lack of energy policies since the election? Could anyone fail to be alarmed when we know that each fumbled energy opportunity exposes Canada to greater inflation? The government has shown no sign of being able to cope with this problem. Indeed, I would say their actions over the last four months have given Canadians a great deal to worry about. I speak of their jeopardizing our agreements with foreign suppliers, foolish antics over domestic pricing, a secret giveaway of federal powers to deal with offshore resources, and appalling fumbling over Petro-Canada.

In the last two years of our government, Mr. Speaker, we had managed to make arrangements with Venezuela and Mexico to ensure an interim supply of oil to eastern Canada. Those arrangements would lead to such countries using the proceeds of their sales to purchase Canadian exports worth billions of dollars. Now, what about those arrangements? Are they in jeopardy? Will they come through? Will the government be able to pull off what we had negotiated?

On the pricing issue, it was only when they came to office that those opposite saw federal-provincial relations were more than Sunday school picnics. Provincial premiers do not disagree with Ottawa or among themselves because of mere personality clashes. They disagree because their interests are different. The division over energy among those three great Tories, Mr. Lougheed, Mr. Davis and the great leader opposite, are deeper today than they were ten years ago. If the Prime Minister hopes to be a leader he will need more than secret meetings in Toronto, Calgary, and Montreal. He will need to take the tough actions which are in the interest of all Canadians, actions that will not be universally popular but which will ensure new sources of energy, energy at a fair price which does not cripple families who are worried over what price they will pay for their furnace oil this winter, and, in some regions, whether there will be enough oil for every family. The Prime Minister must consider those who drive to work and their worry whether gasoline will go up ten, twenty or thirty cents a gallon this winter.

The long summer of Tory platitudes from mountain retreats is over; the realities of fall and winter are upon us. Canadians want to know the score on the energy question. Where does the government stand? Our position was clear and it is clear. We subsidized the consumer. We allowed prices to increase only enough to keep new production coming on-stream. We were not loved by every premier but we were responsive to the needs of every Canadian. I do not mind the premiers loving the Prime Minister to death. I am worried if they love Canada to death, and I am worried that this government will not be able to reach tough agreements.

Our position on offshore jurisdiction is equally clear and responsive. I have never considered the offshore question a fight over money. Indeed, our deal with the maritimes which was signed, sealed and delivered in this House in the Commonwealth Room was a better financial deal for the Atlantic provinces because we agreed to pay the costs to reach the production stage. But I tell you today, Mr. Speaker, that on this side we will fight vigorously, not against the producing provinces getting financial benefits, but against a diminution of the federal power to act on resource. Because only a strong national energy policy will lead Canada out of the crisis that is threatening the economies of the western world.

First, the federal government has a right and a responsibility to ensure that there is sufficient new exploration and production; second, to negotiate internationally for Canada's offshore rights; third, to settle interprovincial quarrels; fourth, to set a fair domestic and a fair export price; and fifth, to see that citizens in poorer provinces have access to adequate supplies at reasonable prices.

Ottawa's obligation to do these things is not only a constitutional duty that cannot be given away, it is what Canadians want when they elect a national Parliament. I say to this government: accept the responsibility that comes with office and stop running away from the job. But if you feel compelled to run away, if you must run away, run away from your insane policy on Petro-Canada.

This government has abandoned just about everything it stood for in the election. Why does it stick to the foolish stand it took on Petro-Canada? That is almost as ridiculous as the leader of the NDP travelling across Canada trying to make people believe that Petro-Canada was his brain-child. I am afraid he is going to repeat this statement again and again, so let me just remind him of a few facts. When we published our white paper on an energy policy for Canada in June, 1973, it set out the need for "a national petroleum company which would provide a vehicle by which the government could seek to obtain knowledge of the domestic and international petroleum industry." In September, 1973, the national Liberal policy convention adopted a motion calling for the government to establish such a corporation. In December, 1973, I announced in this House that a bill would be forthcoming that would create that national petroleum company. In May, 1974, we introduced Bill C-32 and the government was defeated by the combined forces of the Tories and the New Democrats.

What happened? We then obtained a majority. We no longer needed that party to get our legislation through as the new leader of the NDP seems to think. Did we say that is no longer our priority, that it was the brain-child—what a brain!—of the leader of the New Democratic Party? We did not, Mr. Speaker. In the first days of the thirtieth Parliament we introduced the new bill giving existence to Petro-Canada. It was given royal assent on July 30, 1975, after a long, hot summer of debate—43 hours of discussion, 14 committee meetings and a filibuster by two or three members opposite who now sit in the front benches. It was the government that we then headed which brought this bill to fruition at the end of a long, hot summer, and not with the help of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: To set the record straight, Mr. Speaker, let me just come back to the government and remind them that every Canadian knows these facts. Every nation which is seriously looking after the energy security of its citizens has a national oil company. Even Mrs. Thatcher changed the British Tories' pledge to privatize British National Oils.

The next fact: 91 per cent of our oil and gas is owned by eight multinationals. Petro-Canada is a company that is well-managed and successful. Petro-Canada has had huge success in the Arctic, in Nova Scotia, off Newfoundland and in the west. Petro-Canada is a company that is profitable and risk taking at the same time. Finally, Petro-Canada is a company that allows Canadians for the first time to know what is going on in this industry and to have some say in what is going on.

This government has taken every stand and no stand on Petro-Canada. It has announced at various times that it will sell it, save it, shield it, shave it, smother it and then, like every other problem they have, study it to death, all in the same month.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Let me say this in closing. The threatened status of Petro-Canada is a matter of major and mounting concern, not only to the official opposition, but to private individuals and groups which have petitioned the government to keep Canada's national oil company intact, in place and in action. The Canadian Association of Consumers, the Chamber of Commerce, the trade unions, the provinces, the major newspapers, the Canadian small business organizations, presidents of oil and gas companies, bankers and businessmen, all have told the government it should not proceed with its intention to remove Petro-Canada as an effective instrument of national policy.

Now the government has established a study group headed by one of the leading Tory fund raisers in Ontario to study Petro-Canada, a man who I understand is involved with a company that talked of buying Petro-Canada. If that is their way of examining the issue in a detached way, the minister is right in giving the undertaking that he did a little earlier in the House to look into the background of some of these people who are going to look at the future of Petro-Canada.

We in the Liberal party would be derelict in our duty to Canada and inconsistent with our own conviction if we did not fight the government with every means at our disposal over Petro-Canada. Whatever is done, our view is that Petro-Canada must remain one strong, healthy corporation that can act for Canada, that remains intact, that can be an instrument of national policy, that can take the necessary exploration risks, that can help protect all Canadians from the energy crisis.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), that the address be amended by adding the following words:

—and this House condemns the attempt of the government to undermine Petro-Canada and supports the maintenance and expansion of our national petroleum corporation, as the property of all Canadians, as the largest Canadian-owned corporation in the petroleum industry and as a major instrument of Canadian energy policy.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to stand and take part in this debate for the first time as Prime Minister of this country. I must say I am pleased to find that the former prime minister is adapting so well to a role which obviously very much fits a man of his talents and temperament.

On behalf of the government I want formally to express our appreciation to the Governor General and Mrs. Schreyer for the work they have done for Canada during their period of office. It has been a service that has been very energetic, one that has sought to bring the values and customs of that office to all corners of the country.

I also want to congratulate most sincerely the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. That is always a difficult occasion for new members rising for the first time to make their maiden speech on the first sitting day of the House of Commons. I join in the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) in expressing our congratulations to those two members who made very direct, businesslike speeches, speeches in the tradition of the regions from which they come and in the tradition that animates and moves most members, whether they have come newly or again to this House of Commons.

I want also, Mr. Speaker, after the great struggle in which we had to drag you from your seat yesterday, to congratulate you on your re-election by the House of Commons to preside over our proceedings. I am sure it will be a presidency and direction that will be as distinguished in the future as it has been in the past. We wish you well and wish all of us well as you preside over this central institution of the democracy of the land.

I must say to the former prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition, how much I appreciated his counsel and advice in the early days of my prime ministry, his willingness to meet with me, particularly in preparation for trips abroad, and his absolute co-operation in the work of transition from one government to another. It was very much appreciated. It was another signal contribution on his part to this country. I want to take this opportunity here to thank him formally and directly for that help at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As I said earlier, he seems to be taking very well to his new role. It is an area in which I have certain experience. He will recognize as time goes on that there is a time to stop fighting the last election and to begin thinking about the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1610)

Mr. Clark: If he does not do that, there is the hon. member from Winnipeg and there are others who will ensure that the party does that for him.

In his remarks the Leader of the Opposition raised the rhetorical question as to which of the premiers of Canada told me to go shake myself. Well, we all know that they all told him to go shake himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He raised the concern—and it is not unnatural that he would—that we have changed the system of cabinet government in the country. We have changed it principally in two ways. First, we have made public what had previously been kept secret about the way cabinets govern in this country. There has always been an inner cabinet in Canada. The difference is that with this regime, which believes in open government, the composition of that inner cabinet is public, whereas under the regime of the former prime minister the composition of his inner cabinet had been private.

Again the Leader of the Opposition raised a question about the strength of the influence of the voices from New Brunswick, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Alberta. What has happened is that distinct from the kind of government we had prior to May 22 this is a government in which voices from all of the regions of Canada count and in which influence is not reserved to a select elite accumulated around the Prime Minister, in the office of the Privy Council and in the Prime Minister's office. I should say to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I should say to the former prime minister. I wanted to raise his hopes because there is no question that none of the hon. members opposite are going to do so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want to say to the Leader of the Opposition that I am a Prime Minister from Alberta, and I am no less a Canadian for that. If he had recognized some time ago the fact about Albertans and, indeed, about citizens of other provinces, that we can be loyal to our provinces and loyal to our nation, he would not have encountered the difficulties he and his government did.

I want to extend my personal congratulations to all members of the House of Commons elected here. I have had the opportunity to extend those congratulations personally to several of them, but I want particularly to extend a welcome to those members of Parliament who are elected for the first time because, as they will find, they are members of a very special institution which is clearly unique in this land. This is the central institution of Canada. It is the one place where every corner of a vast country has the right to be represented and the power to be heard. The traditions of the institution change, but our constant obligation here is to be the one place where the whole nation comes together, speaks frankly together and acts together.

In my view, this Parliament is not now as strong as it needs to be because too much power rests with the executive of Parliament and with the executives of political parties; too many limits are placed on the right of private members to know, to inquire, to propose and to be responsible for their own actions and for their own decisions. In particular, the historic right of Parliament to control the public purse was eroded by guillotine rules which meant that each year billions of dollars of public spending went unscrutinized and unchallenged. Parliamentary committees were denied the authority and the resources to have a positive influence on public policy. Members of this House of Commons, people sent here to represent their constituents and the interests of all of Canada, were denied information which should have been made public. As a result of that, great numbers of our fellow citizens have been turning away from Parliament and have ceased to regard this as the vital, national institution which it must be seen to be.

Parliament is the only institution we have which can rightly claim to represent this whole nation. This Parliament is in danger of losing its constituency, and one of the solemn obligations upon those of us who are fortunate enough to be members of the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada is that that is a trend which we must change and reverse. That will require change in some of our rules and some of our practices, but more has to change than just the rules of Parliament. There must be a change in the attitude toward the institution on the part of all members, not just those who are ministers of the Crown.

I am confident that that will occur because there are so many members here in all parties who came to this House of Commons—and I quote the words of the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald)—"to make Parliament work".

The government will be introducing proposals for rule changes and has already indicated changes in attitude which, in effect, will provide a latitude to private members of the House of Commons which can be used, if members choose, to obstruct all progress here. That will be one capacity. That will be one consequence which could flow from the latitude we intend to give to private members of the House of Commons. Or it can be used to make the House of Commons the vital centre of discussion and decision in this land.

I hope that this Parliament might be characterized by very open inquiry. Naturally, on some questions some members have their minds made up already. So do some parties, and I am not looking particularly at the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent). However, on many of the most important questions we face there are no easy answers, yet there is an obligation to act and, indeed, in many cases an urgent obligation to act. As a government we cheerfully accept the responsibility to put forward answers when we think we have them. What is more important is that we cheerfully accept the responsibility to initiate unfettered inquiry where that might yield better answers than the ones we propose or the ones we have. I give the commitment now as we start this session in the House of Commons that this government will welcome amendments to legislation from whatever part of the House they come if their proposers can persuade us of their merits.

I hope that attitude of openness will extend throughout this Parliament and to most major questions, and that this will be a Parliament where decisions are based on evidence and not on ideology. The government itself is proposing action which questions certain long-held assumptions concerning, for example, the notion that Crown corporations, once established, must stay in the public domain forever, or the attempt to keep public information secret, or concerning the nature of relations between the central and the provincial governments. We do not expect that everyone will agree, but we hope it will not become the habit of any party in this House to resist reform just because it is new.

There is an obvious fact about the forthcoming decade: it is that a substantial part of the old formulas has become worthless. We must reconsider our procedure to develop policies in several areas and it rests with Parliament to undertake openly such a task. The drafting of the following reports is almost completed and they will be submitted to the standing committees well before Christmas: to wit, the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) on foreign policy; the report of the Secretary of State (Mr. MacDonald) on cultural policy; the report of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) on parliamentary reform; the report of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) on pensions and that of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) on fisheries. A joint committee will be set up next week to consider the matter of atomic energy. Moreover, we want to complement the proceedings of standing committees by setting up select committees that will deal with specific matters. The first select committees were announced in the Speech from the Throne and I add today that we intend to suggest that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) be appointed chairman of the select committee on the specific needs of the handicapped and disabled; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), chairman of the select committee on the voluntary sector; the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Jupp), chairman of the select committee on foreign ownership, and the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Thomson), chairman of the select committee on measures necessary to prevent recurring cost overruns. We hope that those committees will be entirely set up and active next week and that they will submit their reports for the consideration of Parliament and government at the beginning of 1980.

● (1620)

[English]

If the House accepts the challenge that we are placing before it, I believe that we can make this again an instrument which is strong enough and respected enough to reflect the diversity of an exciting country. Instead of talking about the instruments of national action and national unity, we can become an instrument of national unity and of national action, and that is the purpose of the reforms that we propose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Leader of the Opposition made reference to the phrase I had used during the election campaign, a phrase concerning communities. That is a matter of great concern to me. The concept is of great concern to me because in recent years the sense of community in Canada, despite the best intentions of the hon. gentlemen opposite, has become unravelled. That was evidenced most dramatically by the election in Quebec of a government explicitly committed to dismembering the country.

But that erosion of common purpose has grown in other ways as well, such as in the decision of the Canadian Labour Congress that they could not trust government enough to continue in consultation; the mutual suspicion that has clouded relations between the federal and provincial governments; the growing gulf between Canadians working in the private sector and Canadians working in the public sector; a sense among private citizens that their government and their Parliament was ignoring their interests and their views. More was happening in recent years than just the development of interest groups and narrow movements which arise occasionally in every country. There was a pattern of things coming apart in Canada, of the centre being literally unable to hold, and the irony was that every assertion by the centre of its authority weakened that authority. The lesson is that this nation cannot be ordered together. This nation must be brought together, and the starting step must be to establish a basis of mutual trust, of goals that emerge from the community of Canada rather than being imposed upon the community of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As a new government we have believed that the way we should begin to knit the nation together was to establish a climate of calm and of co-operation. My ministers have travelled and consulted widely with the provinces, labour, business, co-operatives and a multitude of groups and individuals, sometimes concluding agreements, more often establishing the basis for future agreement. The fact is that the central government can lead the nation in resolving difficult problems only when the central government is seen again as a leader which itself respects the other partners of the Canadian confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it had been obvious for several years that continuous confrontation had become a rule, a kind of system for federal-provincial relations.

As a new government, we have set a first immediate objective: the easing of the climate of federal-provincial relations. This is what we did. Action has been taken in that perspective. I think, for instance, of the agreement signed as regards Loto Canada. An agreement in principle has also been reached between the new government and some coastal provinces concerning offshore mineral resources. In the same spirit, we have decided not to reintroduce in the Commons the bill on the referendum as proposed by the former government. This measure was perceived in Quebec as an act of aggression and it is precisely the kind of attitude that my government intends to change.

So, my government has the firm intention of altering the atmosphere of federal-provincial relations. Concrete measures have been taken in recent weeks and others will be in the future. We believe that it is possible to solve several problems without any constitutional amendment and without revising the constitutional tool we now have at our disposal.

This is not a one-way process. In some cases, the answers we will choose might imply a jurisdictional transfer from the federal government to the provinces, whereas in others it might be a transfer from provincial jurisdictions to the federal authority.

Of course, there are skeptics in this House. It is quite possible, however, with a will, with a determination to chase partners rather than conflicts, for a Canadian government to get co-operation, understanding and agreements.

During this parliament, the issue of federal-provincial relations will still lead to controversy and intense debate. It is my hope there will be indeed outspoken debates. It is my hope that every member in this House will share a determination to contribute fully and outspokenly, with deep conviction but without prejudice, because, Mr. Speaker, no party can hope to have all the wisdom needed, or all the answers. The government will listen to members on this side and members opposite who may have different perspectives and priorities. It is this government's view that all hon. members, wherever they sit in this House, want to have a strong Canada and maintain our confederation.

[English]

Mr. Olivier: Say that to René Lévesque.

Mr. Clark: Someone asked me to tell that to René Lévesque. In my judgment, it is the duty of all members of the House of Commons to tell that to René Lévesque.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: And it is important for all of us in the House to end that personal preoccupation with René Lévesque. The message which we are interested in delivering is not to the premier of the province of Quebec; it is to the people of the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We believe that there is a much wider range of opportunity for accomplishment with us as a government prepared to seek new approaches with the people of Canada than there was with the former government, which was determined to continue old quarrels with the Premier of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: If the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin) does not stop interjecting, I will quote sections of his report to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The results of the election in May left all of our parties deprived, in one way or another, of the balanced representation that might be considered ideal. That is a problem for our parties but it is a great opportunity for this Parliament. We can rise above narrow partisanship and help each other to achieve a better understanding of how our respective regions perceive, and are affected by, these national issues. I am not suggesting that any of the parties argue their own views less aggressively; only that in this Parliament, and especially on this subject, each of us should be more open to the views of the others.

Mr. Clark: That will not be easy. It will require of us in this House an act of mutual trust, just as the conduct of federal-provincial relations, in our view, required a new spirit of mutual trust between Ottawa and the provinces.

The test of our federalism and its strength is not in the undoubted power of the central government to have its way. Rather it is in the willingness of the partners to act together. The success of our federalism will lie in our ability to accommodate the different kinds of communities Canadians choose to live in. These communities have different economic potentials, different economic strategies, and they have different cultural and social goals.

Confederation gave to the provinces not only real powers—and in some cases exclusive powers—which could be exercised in those fields, but it assigned to the provinces the sources of revenue, the economic means to exercise those powers effectively. That was the spirit in which the forests, the mines, the natural resources of another day and the revenues therefrom were assigned to the provinces. That is the spirit in which in 1979 this government agreed that the provinces which have offshore resources should control their development. The extent to which all provinces have the economic means to exercise their powers will determine their ability to pursue their different cultural, social and economic goals. The greater their dependence on Ottawa for their revenues, the less likely they are to develop that diversity which is at the heart of the Canadian idea.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In these so-called constitutional debates the real question at issue was not the law of the country but the nature of the country.

Miss Bégin: It is the country.

Mr. Clark: Can we afford to have Canadians doing different things in different ways in different parts of the country? I ask that of the former minister: can we afford to have Canadians doing different things in different ways in different parts of the country? Not only do I think we can, I believe we must if we are to honour the spirit of this country. One thing which is beyond debate, to my knowledge, is that everyone in the House accepts the absolute necessity of a central government strong enough to guarantee basic standards of service, instruments of growth and national co-ordination, and indeed capable of initiating and expressing national policy.

When it comes to the national interest, the final responsibility and the ultimate authority lie with Parliament. If paramount national interests were endangered by federal-provincial conflict or federal-provincial stalemate, this government and Parliament could act. There is no question that we would have the support of Canadian people in so acting. But asserting that ultimate power in emergencies is quite different from insinuating that ultimate power every day. The nation is more than the central government. The need for a national transportation policy, to take one example, is of an order quite different from the need for a national lottery. The nation will survive the provinces running the national lottery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Indeed the nation will be much stronger if the government in Newfoundland uses wealth from offshore resources to build its economy directly, rather than having part of the proceeds recycled back from Ottawa. One fundamental fact is that there is a limit to what Ottawa can do, because there is a limit to what Ottawa can know. Ottawa cannot know the local needs, natures, and requirements of different corners of this country as well as the properly constituted governments of those provinces.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition quoted Edward Blake and approved of him. I will quote Sir John A. Macdonald on a matter where—one of the few times—I think Sir John was wrong. Sir John A. Macdonald would have preferred a unitary government. That is what he wanted; that is what he dreamed about. That was the model he had in his mind, but Sir John A. Macdonald was a practical, pragmatic man. He wanted to make the nation work. He was more interested in having a nation which worked than having a nation which accorded to his theories. He recognized that the nation was not built the way he wished it was, and successful national governments since have recognized the limits of federal power. That is not a matter of constitutional law. It is a matter of common sense, and it is an approach which must be applied to the economy and the culture of Canada as well as to our constitution.

Today, Canadians want to recover control of such matters as concern them in their homes, in their communities. The challenge which this government, and this Parliament, must primarily face, is that of rerouting our Canadian economy. For the better part of the last ten years, we have constantly been plagued with a low rate of economic growth, a high rate of unemployment and a high rate of inflation. And short-term forecasts promise much more of the same.

Canadians have a right to ask themselves why, in as rich a country as ours, we have not been able to fare better. There is no doubt that the international situation is to be blamed in part. Today, we are feeling the effects of a slowing down in the economic activity in the United States—but we cannot blame the whole wide world for our problems. Canada is surely not in bondage. The failures in our economic policies have their roots here, not in Washington, Zurich or Jedda.

We have an alternative. We may go on pretending that we cannot solve our own problems, and looking for scapegoats. That will surely result in the realization of pessimistic forecasts. Or we can take on the job, which is ours anyway, of building this country. The time has come to roll up our sleeves and build this country.

[English]

Our goals as a government are clear. The Canadian economy must begin growing again much more close to its potential. Job opportunities must be created for Canadians, especially for groups like young people, women in the Canadian economy, and native Canadians, among whom unemployment is especially high. We must reduce the inflation which continues to rob Canadians of their savings and the real value of their incomes. Simply continuing existing policies will not work. That is why we intend to change the economic direction of Canada in several ways.

First we intend to open up economic policy-making in Canada. Under our system government does not control the economy; it can only influence it. If that influence is to be effective, economic signals from the government must be public, understandable, and certain enough so that they can be relied upon. The best way to ensure that is to lift the shroud which has enveloped the making of economic policy. That is why we propose to encourage pre-budget hearings by a committee of this House, so that Canadians can understand the economic issues and options before the government. That is why we intend to make public with each budget four-year revenue and expenditure estimates. As we indicated today, that is why we are quite prepared to have a committee of parliament look into major economic questions such as the questions relating to interest rate policy.

Second, we intend to be much more specific in economic policy. We believe that management of the large economic levers of fiscal and monetary policy should be stable and consistent. We reject fine tuning as an effective economic option. Instead, we recognize our economy is not monolithic but consists of a multitude of parts, each with its own sectoral or regional requirements. We intend to be sensitive to those specific needs and to tailor policies to fit them.

That is the approach reflected in the Speech from the Throne in its emphasis on developing regional strengths such as tourism, shipbuilding, fisheries, grain transportation, and northern mining, and in its commitment to stimulate the housing industry through tax credits for mortgage interest and property taxes and to provide new incentives for small and medium-sized enterprises. Those programs will create jobs, jobs which are stable because they are founded on inherent economic strengths.

The same objective—creating specific programs to meet specific economic requirements—served as a basis for the implementation of our other job creation programs. I am sure all members welcome the fact that in September the rate of unemployment was down for the seventh time in as many months. But we all know that this improvement is not shared by all Canadians, the rate of unemployment for women is still 2 per cent higher than that for men, more than 12 per cent of Canadians under 25 are unemployed which is nearly double the national rate. Although no official statistics are available in the case of natives we know for a fact that the rate of unemployment in that group is much higher than in others.

We intend to grapple with those problems. I will present the House with an employment strategy for women based on the principle that women have an undeniable right to participate equally in all sectors of the economy. That strategy will include steps to reduce occupational segregation through better training programs and contractual clauses that will recognize the women's responsibilities concerning the children and will increase the opportunities made available precisely to them under economic expansion programs.

In addition, our programs will underline the significant part played by the government which will become a leader in this area with the introduction of specific employment policies.

Still in that vein, we intend to set up a youth employment secretariat to co-ordinate and plan programs making training and job opportunities available to young Canadians. We will be reviewing the job tax credit program to promote on the job training for young people who do not have all the necessary skills and we will be introducing a better program to encourage young Canadians to serve their communities.

[English]

Sir, in seeking to broaden economic opportunities available to native Canadians, the government supports the growing desire among native people themselves to assume authority and responsibility for their own development.

The minister and I have recently had very useful conversations with representatives of the National Indian Brotherhood concerning, mainly, other matters, but certainly opening the door for discussion by which we can work together on important work opportunities for the native people of the land.

Finally, sir, I want to emphasize this government's determination to place much greater reliance on the private sector, and private sector broadly defined, whether in terms of business or in terms of volunteer agencies, to achieve our economic and social goals. In recent years, in many ways the federal government became a burden on our economy. Record deficits and virtually uncontrolled spending were sometimes explained as being intended to spur economic growth. They were nothing of the kind. They were a drag on the economy. We are implementing in this government a program of spending restraint, not because we believe it is one easy step from restraint to lower deficits and ultimately to a balanced budget. Our restraint program is intended to free resources to the private sector to encourage investment, to encourage business expansion and to encourage job creation, which we believe is the best way to generate the revenues which in turn will help us balance the budget of Canada. We intend to reduce the burden of government on the economy and offer practical incentives to individual Canadians to build a stake in our country.

I am confident that Canadians will respond to that kind of encouragement and incentive. As I have travelled this country in recent months I have sensed a growing confidence, almost an enthusiasm, among Canadians over the prospects for this country. We should be confident and we should be enthusiastic because there is literally no country in the world with a greater potential, with a greater capacity to build, and with a greater offer of liberty and opportunity to its citizens, than this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Sir, energy is just one example. Certainly we need a new agreement on pricing and more effective programs both to conserve energy and to increase its supply. My ministers and I, as the House knows, are discussing these questions now with the provinces, and I have every confidence we can reach an understanding that acknowledges our needs and acknowledges theirs.

But, the true significance of our energy situation is not what it requires in the short term. The true significance is what the energy situation in Canada offers our citizens in the long run. This country can be self-sufficient in energy within a decade. We can be free of the insecurity that is the price of dependence on supplies beyond our control. For many years we have talked about our energy potential in this country, about the billions of barrels of oil locked away in the tar sands, about our heavy oil deposits, our frontier potential, and our 500-year supply of coal. All we could do in those days was talk; we lacked the national need and we lacked the economic rationale to develop the resources we talked about.

The time for talk is over. Resources which used to be too expensive to develop are becoming almost cheap at their price for Canadians. To that extent OPEC has done us an economic favour. The economics now make sense to take advantage of our resource potential. Our national need is evident. What we require is a national will to make that happen.

During his remarks the Leader of the Opposition referred to a phrase he had used often during the election campaign, a phrase to which I took the deepest exception. He suggested that Canadians should learn to lower their expectations. We disagree on many things, but we disagree on nothing more fundamentally than that, because I believe this is a time for Canadians to raise their expectations, not to lower them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We are a nation of immense potential; immense potential in our physical resources and immense potential in our human resources, in the great strength that comes to a country like this by the fact that all of us, coming from every corner that is represented here in this House of Commons, have in our heritage, in our past and as part of our being, a different sense of what this country can become, and a different identity that, woven together, can create a vibrant and strong national identity.

There used to be a time in this country when Canadians feared the regions and feared the different identities that might develop. There is nothing to fear in the regions of Canada. There is nothing to fear in the differences of Canada. Those regions, those differences, and those resources are the strengths of our country.

Our challenge as a Parliament is to try to give the leadership to restore that sense of calm and that sense of co-operation that can bring Canadians together to work toward the realization of the individual dreams of Canadians across this country.

What we have tried to do in the Speech from the Throne is set down a beginning agenda, steps we can take to reform this institution to make it the vital centre of the nation again, steps we can take to start Canadians along the road to feeling a part of their country and to building a stake in their country. That is the work we invite Parliament and the people of Canada to join in accomplishing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by joining the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) in congratulating the mover and seconder, who both spoke so well yesterday, and I mean that completely. I agree with the Prime Minister that it is something which all of us who have been around this place for a few years must recall from time to time. It is a tough job to get up in this place for your first time. I, on behalf of my colleagues, want to congratulate those gentlemen most sincerely.

I would also like to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition in his new role. He is finding the same adept skill with the truth that he had as prime minister, and I am sure that that will persist, and I hope that he persists for many decades. I would also like to congratulate the Prime Minister on becoming the Prime Minister of this great country of ours, and I genuinely wish him well in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Broadbent: Yesterday the Prime Minister announced in the Speech from the Throne his intention to introduce several measures this session. Some of these measures are good and we will support them. For instance, we are fully in favour of certain reforms which the new government intends to carry out to increase the powers of Parliament, as well as the freedom of information legislation it will introduce. For the time being, federal-provincial relations are certainly running a smoother course. No more confrontations with the provinces. We are fully in agreement with this new attitude.

[English]

So much for the good, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: It didn't take very long.

Mr. Broadbent: Yesterday I had the pleasure of joining the Prime Minister and the leaders of the other parties in paying just tribute to a former prime minister, John Diefenbaker. On that occasion I said that one of the things which characterized Mr. Diefenbaker was his view of Canada that this was a land that was certainly much more than the sum of its regional parts. When I, later in the day, heard the Speech from the Throne, I must say that I got a very different vision indeed from the present government, from the present Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister said in the throne speech, and they are his words and the words of the cabinet, that they were given a mandate to change. I agree with that. I think that the people of Canada throughout the breadth of our land did indeed want a change. They gave the Conservative party an opportunity. Indeed, I suspect that there was good will from all Canadians, those who voted for the Prime Minister's party as well as those who voted for the Liberal party, for our party and the Creditiste party during the summer months. The question is how has that mandate been utilized? How has that mandate for change been recognized in reality during the four and a half months since the government took office?

We agree with all the good things there are in the Speech from the Throne, the removal of confrontation in our federal system and a genuine attention to the concerns of other regions in advance of decisions. I agree with the concern on a number of matters in which the Prime Minister has expressed his interest, but what has been lacking throughout the summer and in the throne speech yesterday has been a perspective of our great country, that it is something other than a mere collection of regions. If I had to contrast the Speech from the Throne and the attitude of the present Prime Minister with that of Mr. Diefenbaker's, whereas Mr. Diefenbaker said that we were more than the sum of our parts, the attitude that I am getting from this government is that we are somewhat less than the sum of our parts.

I suggest that if the government continues in this direction Canada will be in great trouble in terms of disunity, for opposite reasons to those which produced the kind of disunity that we had during the tenure of his predecessor. It is one thing to argue for new attitudes, and attitudes count in politics profoundly, but it is quite another thing to have a direction in policy that will clearly have as its implication the dismemberment of a nation, which is devoid of a broader national perspective designed to draw people together.

It is my serious concern, Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian, that the new Conservative government has reacted, indeed, overreacted, to what was done by its predecessor. In saying that, I would like to spend a few minutes discussing the Leader of the Opposition and his comments. I am sure that the members on the government side as well as in my party listened with a combination of disbelief and horror as the current Leader of the Opposition tried to leave the impression, as he has done for years, that he and he alone speaks for Canada. We have heard it all before, the talk about déjà vu.

Where was the Leader of the Opposition and the Liberal party when we lost our merchant marine off the east coast and west coast in recent history? Where were the Liberals in terms of a strategy in advance while the textile industry, shoe industry and the furniture industry in Quebec went, if not down the drain, down into serious trouble? Where were the Liberals, and where was the present Prime Minister, when Canadians on the prairies called for a speedy implementation of the Hall report that would have seen rail facilities, boxcars, and terminal ports provided for our western farmers? Where were the Liberals? Where were they in Cape Breton when serious capital investment in the steel industry there could have provided jobs instead of handouts? These are examples of what really produced disunity throughout our land, and it was the Liberal party, and only the Liberal party, that was in office.

If there has been one major source for the cause of problems which have occurred in our country, from British Columbia in the west to Newfoundland in the east, it has been connected with our natural resources. In all of my lifetime here, the party that sits at my right, with the exception of a few years, has stood by and, indeed, produced policies that saw us sell out our resources from region after region, instead of developing in this country a sound industrial nation based on those resources. That will come to be the most serious condemnation of the Liberal party in the history of our country. The present Leader of the Opposition cannot lecture the Prime Minister or anyone else on that subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The government has been given this mandate for leadership. There was no doubt from every survey that was taken during the campaign, not by our party or the other parties, but by the Gallup poll, that Canadians did have economic concerns, whether they were regional needs for jobs, unemployment in general, or inflation in general. That is what their concerns were all about, and they voted for a government which, instead of providing confrontation and sophistical arguments as we had for a number of years, would produce action on unemployment, inflation and energy.

The present Prime Minister campaigned, and I think campaigned correctly, on these issues. We differed in our solutions, but we had the same concerns as the present government. If his concerns were right in the campaign—as they were—what action has he taken in the last four and one-half months?

• (1700)

Before the election the Prime Minister, while he was in opposition, pointed out that wage increases were being outstripped by price increases and he called for action on inflation. Since the election, however, there has been no action on inflation—none at all. I remember very vividly that before the election the Prime Minister—

[Translation]

In a speech dealing with unemployment which he made in Quebec City, he assured Canadians living in the province of Quebec and elsewhere that he had a formula to strengthen the economy and create new jobs.

[English]

That was very early in the campaign, Mr. Speaker. He said it was important. I think he said also that under the former prime minister unemployment had increased by some 5 percentage points. That was before the election, however, and in the four and one-half months since there has not been an announcement of a single new job-creation measure.

I could go through the list till I come to interest rates, Mr. Speaker. It was the Conservative party that, through the "Happy Hacker", the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens), who unfortunately is not in the House at the moment, wanted to destroy every public enterprise in Canada. He was instrumental in getting the Governor of the Bank of Canada before a committee on interest rates, and quite correctly pointed out that many other countries do not jack up interest rates all the time but recognize that investment comes where there is a growing economy—countries such as Switzerland and others, where low interest rates are maintained. The Conservatives talked about damage done to ordinary Canadians—small businessmen and homeowners. Before the election they spoke about it with passion, but after the election they approved not one, not two, but three increases in the interest rate.

I have no trouble now in understanding what was once for me a contradiction in terms; that is the expression "Progressive Conservative." The message is clear: progressive before the election, and conservative after.

I agree with some of the things the Prime Minister said in his speech today, especially as they referred to women and the young people, but there was nothing in his speech and no awareness in the Speech from the Throne of the crisis in the economy in North America.

I learned from the New York Times last Sunday that the Americans are seriously worried about their economy. Economists in government and outside are alarmed that we may find ourselves in a situation analogous to that of 1929 or the early thirties. This concern was not reflected in the Speech from the Throne. There was no suggestion of serious structural problems because of the interconnection of our economy with that of the United States. There was no call for action.

I agree with the Prime Minister that the people of the provinces, including the premiers, must agree to some new, all-embracing industrial strategy. I am certainly aware that it is not easy to work out the details of such a strategy. There was no determination in the Speech from the Throne, however, nor in the Prime Minister's remarks today was there any awareness of the need to mobilize effective national government leadership on these crucially important economic matters.

I think I would have the agreement of members of all parties when I say that high among the concerns of all Canadians and people of the industrialized world is the matter of energy. In the west we have partly created the problem for ourselves through our lack of concern for conservation measures. There are a variety of reasons for this. I am not too interested in delving into the past but rather in dealing with the present and future. No single aspect of the economy so profoundly affects our people now, and will in the future, as does energy. In the Speech from the Throne there were maybe three lines dealing with energy and for me they were rather alarming in their implications. I shall come back to that.

Quite apart from the question of energy in general, the question of pricing and means of developing alternative sources and other related matters, what was alarming to most of us in this country during the summer was the decision by the government to abolish Petro-Canada. I regard that as the most seriously negative decision made by the Prime Minister. I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that if he persists with this course of action future historians will indeed have seen a turning point with this new government, a negative turning point in a decisively important part of our economy.

Just as Petro-Canada approaches its maximum usefulness, just as we are beginning to develop measures of energy security, just as we begin to pry ourselves from the grip of the multinationalists who dominate the industry, the Prime Minister decides to break it up. In my view rarely, if ever, have Canadians witnessed such a triumph of dogmatism over intelligence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Rarely have we seen such a betrayal of our long-range national interests.

I feel there are Conservatives who recognize and accept their public ownership tradition. I could list those in the Conservative party who have recognized the need for a public sector in this country to serve important functions. Not only is the present Prime Minister betraying what I regard as the general interest; he is betraying a particularly important, if minor, aspect of his own party's traditions.

I want to say something about Petro-Canada in detail. The Prime Minister tends to be very frank in private conversation as well as in public. When he talks about parliamentary reform he believes it; I have no doubt about that. I listened with care today when he said that he intended to consider amendments very seriously in the present Parliament, and if I understood the argument he implied that he would lend the government's support, and implement policy along those lines. In that context, therefore, I want to talk seriously about Petro-Canada because it concerns me. I am not interested in the paternity aspect. The Leader of the Opposition talked more about the paternity of the institution than about its importance. I would welcome a paternity suit by the Leader of the Opposition any day, and I have no doubt about who would win it. It is not paternity that is crucial here; what is crucial is the institution and what it does for our country. What has Petro-Canada done for all our regions during the past year?

First of all, it opened a research centre in Calgary which provided $10 million for Canadian men and women to work on a Canadian resource. That meant Canadian jobs. In the past year it spent $1.5 billion on the purchase of Pacific Petroleums Ltd. This means that Canadians from British Columbia and as far east as Thunder Bay can go to a Canadian-owned petroleum station and know that the money they spend there will stay in Canada. That is important, because in this way the company acquires capital that it can invest to explore for more oil in the north or off the Atlantic coast. It gives the company a cash flow. It is not simply jingoistic nationalism although I, for one, believe we need a little more of that. I believe it has an important economic function.

In the east, Petro-Canada is currently involved in 80 per cent of the drillings off the coast of Labrador. It was involved in the strike off the coast of Nova Scotia at Sable Island, and it was involved in the discovery made off Newfoundland about two weeks ago. These are some recent examples of what Petro-Canada has done for our people in different regions.

I want to make the point that just a few years ago, shortly after it was forced upon us by the minority government at Christmas, 1973, the corporation was established with some $500 million in assets. But it has taken that investment and used it to create jobs for Canadians in virtually every part of our land, to find energy resources, and to provide retail outlets for Canadians. Instead of being simply a $500 million loser that the President of the Treasury Board would like to get rid of, that $500 million has been taken and turned into $3.5 billion for the people of Canada. Petro-Canada is the great business success of the decade, and we should be expanding it.

I want to provide some arguments for maintaining this corporation as an integrated entity that will continue to serve Canadians. Any resource sector should be developed with two views in mind. First, one should try to maximize the number of Canadian jobs. We should not just export the resource, but develop a secondary industrial strategy based on the resource. Second, an end product should be produced, in this case energy. That is the first reason for maintaining Petro-Canada as it is. It should become part of a totally integrated developed energy sector, Canadian owned and Canadian controlled.

In pursuing the course the government has embarked upon in this area it is going to repeat something done 20 years ago by the last Conservative government, of similar proportions. Twenty years ago the last Conservative government announced that it would kill the Arrow project, this is an interesting parallel. Consider, sir, what was going on 20 years ago. The Arrow was a plane designed and produced by approximately 14,000 Canadians working in the Toronto area. Without question it was the best designed engine of its time. On its test flight it had the best record of any jet of its type anywhere in the world. But the Conservative government of the day decided it was too costly and the project was scrapped. The cost would have been $3.75 million per jet had they continued.

What are the consequences of that decision? First, we bought the Bomarc missile which turned out to be a military dud, quite apart from other considerations. Beyond that, we lost one of the most highly skilled and talented labour work forces in the world. As a result, these people went to the United States and worked on the space program. I am sure they are working now on a lot of the planes we purchase from the United States at five times the original cost of the Arrow.

The lessons to me are important, Mr. Speaker. Some people say that perhaps we could not have done it. At the same time, in 1959, Sweden had the Saab aircraft. As it turned out the Saab was not as good as the Arrow, for technical reasons. However, the Swedish government made a different decision. Up until recently the Swedish government has believed in an industrial strategy, and the current government maintains the same basic policies. Because the Swedish government decided to stay with the Saab aircraft and pursued the industry, that country is now exporting aircraft all over the world. A spin-off has resulted in the automotive industry also called Saab.

Twenty years ago Canada made a decision which resulted in the loss of technicians and of a tremendously exciting aircraft industry in terms of its potential. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we must not make a similar decision now. Just as we could have gone ahead with an imaginative aircraft industry then, we must keep Petro-Canada as the central, integrated, developed petroleum company now. The Prime Minister must not be allowed to snatch defeat from the jaws of victory with Petro-Canada.

Second, Petro-Canada can ensure that this country gets development when it is needed and at the price we want. In the early 1970s the multinationals went on an exploration strike. They said they were not making enough money. They were unhappy with some provincial governments' royalties and were unhappy with the federal government's tax policies. Petro-Canada filled the bill. Petro-Canada moved into Atlantic Canada and into the Arctic. Important results have ensued.

By breaking up Petro-Canada, what the Prime Minister would be doing would be turning it back into the hands of the multinationals. We would return to a situation where we had to use our own money to pay exorbitant profits to develop our resources. My party and I say that surely the day for that kind of development is past.

The Prime Minister talked about tax incentives for the oil industry in his campaign speeches. If I understood him correctly, he made reference in the throne speech yesterday to the same reality. I say to the Prime Minister, please check the oil industry's profit figures. Under the Liberal administration, we had a tax rate that saw the oil industry, and I am speaking of the "Big 5", make $4 billion in profits between 1974 and 1978. During that time, the tax rate for the oil industry declined from 35 per cent to 21 per cent.

Mr. Woolliams: Is that in Canada?

Mr. Broadbent: Canadian profits, yes. I say to the hon. member from Alberta that he could probably confirm that rather quickly.

Shell, that poor enterprise, had a profit last year of $150 million. Shell did not pay one cent in taxes. Gulf Oil had fantastic profits, with a declining tax rate. We do not need to give the multinationals in the oil industry any more money. In the United States President Carter recognizes it; why at long last cannot the Government of Canada?

It is important to note in terms of the development intentions of the Prime Minister and his government, as I understand it, that he wants to duplicate, for example, with the Gold Lake project, exactly what is taking place in the Athabasca tar sands development.

I ask you, sir, and the people of Canada to think seriously about this. Taxes of every working Canadian were used, not to provide an investment, not to provide a loan, but to provide a handout to Shell and the others that were working in the Athabasca tar sands. More than $2 billion of Canadian money has been given to Shell and its partners. Talk about welfare and handouts. Some people may say that was necessary and that we will get taxes back later on when profits are made. As I stand here, and you sit there, Mr. Speaker, 99 per cent of Canadians do not know that Shell in that project will not have to pay one cent of tax on its profit, providing Shell buys more Canadian resources.

Think of the logic. We are giving them $2 billion to develop our resources. That is not equity, that is a gift I am talking about. When a profit is made from our resources, taxes do not have to be paid if this money is reinvested in Canada. We have to be the only people ever who have financed our own takeover.

If time permits, Mr. Speaker, I could say something about the leading multinational in the field, Imperial Oil. It is not a joking matter. Once again I refer not to social democratic sources but to the New York Times. I ask the Prime Minister to read in that paper how that corporation has behaved in recent years. It tried to get $100 million additional money out of the people of Nova Scotia having already rooked them, and I say that deliberately, because the evidence that was presented at the trial which took place in our land in 1975, and not given much play, was that Imperial Oil, the largest multinational in Canada, indulged in all kinds of nefarious practices, backdating orders, not passing on to Canadian consumers reduced prices they were getting from their parent firm, Exxon, and using a dummy corporation in Bermuda to save some $35 million in taxes that ought to have come to the people of Canada.

• (1720)

That is not mythology. That is not rhetoric. It is fact. It was a decision reached in the Canadian court and reiterated, interestingly enough, in the New York Times. Is that a good corporate citizen? Is that the kind of entity we want to turn our oil industry over to once again? I say not, and I know the majority of Canadians say not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The third reason for maintaining Petro-Canada as an integrated firm is to enable it to negotiate for the people of Canada on a state to state basis. The Prime Minister knows that the government of Venezuela and the government of Mexico, among others, want that. They do not want to work through the multinationals. They want to deal directly with the people of Canada. We want that as well.

We saw last year Exxon attempting to redirect shipments of oil that were intended for our borders. We say that we, like other countries, need a large oil firm owned and controlled by the people of Canada which will deal directly with the oil producing countries and not work through the multinationals.

The final reason I want to give for not simply maintaining Petro-Canada but for extending its operations, is in the retail field. I mentioned earlier that Canadians living from Thunder Bay west can now purchase at the retail outlet level gas for their cars from a Canadian-owned and controlled subsidiary of Petro-Canada, Pacific Petroleums. We believe that principle should be extended. For once give us in the east what they have in the west. Ontarians would like that. Let someone in downtown Toronto, Moncton or St. John's have the right to a credit card with the words Petro-Canada and a little maple leaf on it, which he can use to buy his gas, knowing that all the profit would be reinvested in Canada.

Having made those points in defence of Petro-Canada, and indeed for extending its role, I want to conclude with this observation. It is my strongest conviction that the Conservative party is being dictated to by the purest doctrinaire ideology on the issue. It is as simple but as unfortunate as that. If intelligence prevails, if pragmatism in the national interest prevails, and indeed I suspect if the ordinary Conservative backbencher had his way, because the ordinary voter who voted Conservative wants it, we would keep Petro-Canada doing exactly what it is doing in the national interest.

It is my view that the Prime Minister is marching to a non-existent drummer. He is the only guy whistling that tune. The Prime Minister laughs. Consider what other countries of the world are doing in petroleum.

The government of France controls two oil companies in that country. Their aim is to control 50 per cent to 60 per cent of the market in that country. In Italy, the state-owned petroleum company has 30 per cent of the market in that country. The government of Germany is involved in a massive way in a large integrated oil and gas firm that is involved in petrochemicals as well. In the United Kingdom, even with dear old Margaret Thatcher, just two weeks ago the Tories decided not to sell off their shares of the North Sea development, but to keep them. That was reported in The Economist. The Tories there recognized in that instance there is a national interest in public involvement.

The state oil company in Norway is playing a major role in North Sea oil development. In Mexico it is 100 per cent government owned, and in Venezuela 100 per cent government owned. There is the same pattern, the same question of government involvement, in Argentina, Brazil and Peru. Indeed, in the United States of America, the home of most of the multinationals, President Carter in his most recent energy address over television said it is time that country moved toward a public firm in the oil and gas field. I repeat, there is one person and one person alone in the world who is out of step in the energy field, and it is our Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We cannot accept the government's intention to break up Petro-Canada and have the private sector get the profit-making part while the public sector holds on to the debt-creating part. There is economic genius! We have a successful public enterprise and the Tory proposal is to give to the private sector the profitable part and keep for Canadians the debts. That does not make sense. Any businessman in the world, including those in Canada, agrees that it does not make sense.

I plead with the Prime Minister to pay attention to his own argument which he made earlier today. I listened with care. He said he will consider amendments and consider this issue seriously. I ask him not only to look at the long range future for Canada in terms of our very serious energy position, but to look around the world. Instead of breaking up Petro-Canada, keep this very remarkable Canadian success story. Encourage it to grow so that one day it will be the dominant firm in the industry.

I am not interested in the paternity suit issue raised by the Leader of the Opposition, although I would be prepared on another occasion to argue it in detail. I have no doubts about who would win.

I spent the last few weeks, as hon. members know, attempting to get an expression of concern from the people of Canada on this issue. I want to tell the Prime Minister that, as of noon today, there were 81,231 signatures in my office. They have been collected over a few weeks. We might have had more or we might have had less. I do not know the ultimate significance of that figure. However, I want the Prime Minister to know they are honest signatures, partly from lawyers, partly from farmers, and partly from members of his own party. These people are very serious about keeping this company. The Gallup poll which came out today showed that 75 per cent of Canadians, in a national survey, agree.

We take our obligation on this issue very seriously. That is why we are joining in a non-confidence vote against the government on this issue. We think it is of fundamental importance not only in the short run but in the long run of this country. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House calls in particular for the corporation to be designated as the sole importer of offshore oil, and for the corporation to open retail outlets to serve the people of Canada from coast to coast."

Mr. Speaker: The question is upon the amendment to the amendment. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse).

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I think we are about to live an historical moment in the history of our country. In my point of order, I would like to seek the understanding of all members. For many years now it has been the custom in our institution, during the throne speech debate, to allow the leaders of all political groups in the House to make their speeches right after the speeches from the movers. I do not understand why, a moment ago, the Chair failed to recognize the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) who is sitting for the first time in this parliament, a man who was elected in his riding with a sweeping majority and who therefore represents sensible people, Canadians who trust he will work in the House along with all other hon. members and all political groups towards the healthy administration of the country. Yesterday I considered, and I still consider today, that it was our privilege to introduce an amendment to a motion moved by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). I understand that it is an amendment to a motion and that the House voted on this amendment. I do not see how it could have changed the tradition of the House. So why does that happen on the second day?

Yesterday we talked about achieving some sort of harmony in the House. All members who took the floor yesterday did allude to that. Personally, I am in favour of harmony but it cannot be achieved unless all Canadians and all members of the House show some good will. Harmony is a sign of prosperity, division a sign of misfortune. It is always unfortunate to be divided, and all Canadians are watching us today. They are watching television. The broadcasting of the debates is certainly an advantage. It helps Canadians understand our speeches without having to resort to other media. Sometimes the facts were distorted, sometimes not. But, Mr. Speaker, the House was mainly interested in respecting its tradition instead of going by the standing orders. We tried to be reasonable. Decisions were rendered which were wise. Often the Chair availed itself of decisions rendered by previous Speakers.

Today, however, with all due respect to the Chair, I should like to recall a decision which Speaker Lamoureux rendered in this House some 13 years ago, more specifically on February 18, 1966, in a situation similar to this one and where Speaker Lamoureux stated in part:

Order, please. Perhaps this might be a good moment for the Chair to unburden itself of a very weighty opinion prepared following the discussion in the house on Tuesday, February 15, when hon. members were invited to argue the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cumberland.

The Chair undertook to give a decision after considering the arguments submitted. I can assure hon. members that I have studied most carefully the several views expressed by those who participated in the discussion on the point of order.

As hon. members know, it has been the practice for some years that when a minister of the Crown makes an announcement or a statement of government policy on motions, a spokesman for each of the parties in opposition of the government may comment briefly.

● (1740)

Beauchesne refers to this practice in citation 91 of his fourth edition. On February 1, 1954, Mr. Speaker Beaudoin stated that it was the practice of the house, when a minister makes a statement, to allow one spokesman for each opposition party to make observations, and he referred to a ruling in that regard made by his predecessor, Mr. Speaker Macdonald, on June 4, 1951.

That confirms what I was saying earlier.

Last year, that practice was incorporated in our standing orders and now constitutes provisional Standing Order 15(2) which says in essence:

On motions listed in section (2) of this Standing Order, a minister of the Crown may make an announcement or statement on government policy. That kind of announcement or statement should be limited to the fact that it is thought necessary to bring it to the attention of the House. It should not be designed to bring about a debate at that stage. A spokesman for each of the parties in opposition may make brief comments subject to the same restriction.

Closer to us, in 1963, an amendment was made to the Senate and House of Commons Act which reads as follows:

It was to pay a supplementary allowance to party leaders, but that is not the point. It was suggested that provisional Standing Order 15(2) should not be interpreted in the light of the 1963 amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act and that the Speaker should use that amendment as a guideline for the procedure to be followed on the matter of comments on minister's statements, and all the more, at the time of the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. However, we must not forget the following principle of parliamentary procedure as provided in citation 8(3) of the fourth edition of Beauchesne.

(3) "In the interpretation of the rules or standing orders the House is generally guided, not so much by the literal construction of the orders themselves as by the consideration of what has been the practice of the House with respect to them."

We must not forget that after the 1963 amendments to the Senate and House of Commons Act, the House agreed to Standing Order 2, and the same year that this standing order was approved, the House decided, and I would like hon. members to listen to the decision of Speaker Lamoureux. The House allowed the hon. member for Red Deer to comment on the statements of ministers even though at that time his party had fewer members than the number provided in the amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act. The Speaker said that in view of the precedents, he could not see how he could conclude that Standing Order 15(2) should be interpreted according to the amendment to the said act.

Moreover, the Speaker did not believe that it would be reasonable to conclude that independent members are covered by Standing Order 15(2). He did not believe either that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who had taken part in the debate, should be considered as such. But as long—and this is what the Chair wanted to draw to the attention of the House—as long as the House does not amend the Standing Order concerning statements by ministers to define better the right to comment on such statements, the Speaker believed that he should follow the practice established during the last session and state that the standing orders authorize the Leader of the Official Opposition and the spokesmen for the New Democratic Party, the Ralliement Créditiste and the Social Credit Party of Canada to comment on statements by ministers.

At the time of that decision, there was a division in the party and the Ralliement Créditiste had nine members. The Social Credit Party of Canada, led by Mr. Thompson, member of Parliament for Red Deer, counted five members.

The Speaker decided, however, to recognize that group of five, pursuant to the Standing Orders, and to give them the same privileges, the same right as to those who had nine, fifteen or a hundred members. I should not like to be racist, but the Speaker who recognized those legitimate rights to an English-speaking group was a Francophone. Today the roles have changed. In order to avoid useless frictions, let us think seriously that we are members from the province of Quebec, but Quebec is part of Canada and I want it to remain so. That is why we shall need harmony and—

An hon. Member: You are not the only one.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Indeed not, but I am an individual among others, just as you yourself are only an individual among others.

An hon. Member: We were elected.

An hon. Member: I was not elected as an independent, but as a Social Crediter.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The hon. member has just given me an opening. All members of the House have been elected on May 22 by means of a ballot cast by the electors. They had the choice between candidates from various parties, and after the candidate's name appeared the name of his party. This is done under an act of Parliament, and the electoral act is the same for all political parties and for all Canadians. So, with all due respect, I ask that this Parliament show that we really want harmony.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, today is a memorable day, and if the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) is to be denied the right to take part in the debate as has always been done in the past at this stage, well, it will be a blunder, a most unfortunate blunder at a time when efforts are being made across Canada to maintain harmony in this country, to work at its further development in order that our children may inherit a good country to live in. We should not get out of our way to irk and make things easier for those who are committed to its destruction.

This is a very serious situation and it will be interpreted according to decision made today. I respectfully ask all my colleagues in this House, I ask the Chair, on the basis of the points I made, on the basis of the decision and the tradition in Parliament, that the hon. member for Beauce be allowed to express his views pursuant to past tradition. In so doing, we can rest assured of one thing, which is that Parliament will come out stronger from this mix-up, and every Canadian will perceive us as responsible people.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) raised a point of order, and of course he has been heard by the Chair this afternoon.

I totally agree with him about precedent. I weighed carefully the specific precedents he very aptly used in support of his position in this House this afternoon. However, the difficulty I find is not simply that of considering precedent on this occasion. A vote was taken yesterday in the House; a formal decision issued from the House, and there has been not only a decision on a procedural motion, but also a specific statement by the President of the Privy Council, a specific statement by the House leader of the New Democratic Party, and finally a specific statement in yesterday's Hansard, the wording of which I have before me: specific statements on the motion concerning the present position of the Social Credit Party of Canada in the House. So, whatever the precedents, I must always accept the decision made by the House. I think it would be contrary to its decision and would definitely reverse the consensus reached yesterday.

It is for that reason that I did not give the floor, this afternoon, during the question period, to the hon. member for Beauce immediately after the Leader of the New Democratic Party had spoken but later. I wanted to demonstrate clearly that it was still the privilege and the right of every member of this House to take part in the debate. And it is not just a matter of privilege but the right of the hon. member for Beauce or the hon. member for Bellechasse to take part in discussions during the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

It is the right of every member. Of course, there are some numerical restrictions. But it is the right of every member to take part in the debate. So, tomorrow, perhaps after some other members have spoken, I think that the hon. member for Beauce will have the right, as any other member, to participate in the debate. That is why this afternoon I gave the floor to the hon. member for Beauce during the question period, as a member of the House like any other member, but not as a party leader.

As far as the consensus reached in this House yesterday is concerned, I could not reverse it and give the Social Credit Party of Canada a status in the House which it has been denied by a formal decision and not only on a matter of procedure but by a decision which is phrased as follows, and I quote the President of Privy Council:

● (1750)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong the discussion in the House, but I do say that there is here an important matter of principle at stake. The original motion was framed with that in mind. The hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have set out, I believe, the principles quite clearly. They do not need to be repeated. In that sense it is clear as the government House leader that I ought to indicate to the House that, based on the principle that is involved, we do not intend to support the amendment.

I should like to repeat the representations made by two other members. In the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he said the following:

If we take a vote today, and the consensus seems to be that this motion will be defeated, then you, sir, will have the decision of the House that on the first occasion when the issue was raised it was felt that we should not give to five members the status of a party.

In the language of the opposition House leader, he said:

It is obvious that if there had been included in the motion a member of the Social Credit group, that would carry with it the implication that in the House of Commons, if it did approve that motion, that group would enjoy a status, particularly the leader of that group, equivalent in standing to that of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

We do not, of course, accept the proposition—

The declarations were very specific. My difficulty is not with the precedents quoted by the hon. member. My difficulty is that on those declarations I cannot regard that decision as any other kind of decision. I can speculate, together with the other hon. members who participated in the discussion, that had a vote not been taken yesterday possibly the precedents the hon. member was arguing today would have left me in a position to accept his argument today. I do not know. But I am faced with a fait accompli and a decision of the House.

Therefore I have to indicate that the decision is no longer mine. The decision was that of the House, and it was clearly taken yesterday. Therefore while I have every intention—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. While I have every intention of recognizing——the hon. member for Beauce maybe tomorrow, it is now, I think, the turn of a government member since the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) spoke first, then the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and finally the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), an opposition member. A government member will now have the floor. That is why I recognized the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse).

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to raise a question of privilege since I am the one concerned.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Beauce on a point of order.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I was the mover of yesterday's motion and I do not want to discuss again the decision of the House. The motion that was moved yesterday did not seek in any way the acknowledgement of our party. There was no such intention in it and maybe it should be read again in the House. The motion dealt exclusively with the standing orders governing the proceedings of the House, which have been accepted by members who have sat in this House long before me and to which there should be no exception except by unanimous consent. This tradition prevails not only in this Parliament but in all parliaments of British tradition. We are ruled not only by the standing orders but by tradition as well.

Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who stands as the conscience of this Parliament—at least that is the reputation he has—since he is an expert on parliamentary procedure, did not remind all my colleagues that in 1958, at which time there was a Progressive Conservative government with 208 hon. members—it then held the majority—there were only eight CCF members, there was a CCF member on yesterday's famous committee, and the House accepted the suggestion unanimously. Mr. Hazen Argue was the chairman of the committee, the first to be appointed by Mr. John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Speaker, I thought there was room for gentlemanliness in this Parliament. I examined the precedents in this House. I would be the first party leader ever to sit in this House to whom would be denied the right to speak, to reply to the Speech from the Throne, after the spokesmen for the other parties. Mr. Speaker, as precedents govern future relations between parliamentarians, the precedent which may be created today runs the risk of suggesting a line of conduct to be followed by those who will sit after you in the Speaker's chair. The matter is extremely serious. In 1963-64, Robert Thompson, leader of a five-member party, was allowed to speak. Why? Because our Standing Orders, Mr. Speaker—and I shall close on these words—because the standing orders which govern the business of the House of Commons do not define the status of the parties that are recognized or otherwise. There is absolutely nothing in our rules on that question. The only thing that governs those rulings is tradition, precedents. I have always been told that parliamentary tradition was something sacred to our Anglophone fellow-citizens. That is what I have always heard.

So, I am surprised to realize that today, despite the mandate given to us by our electors, there should be some kind of complicity between both sides of the House in attempting to have us sit as independents. With all due deference to our political adversaries, and anyone else, Mr. Speaker, we will not sit as independents. We were elected as members of the Social Credit Party of Canada. I took on the responsibility of leading that party and I intend to assume it fully. That is why I am asking you, Mr. Speaker, to postpone your ruling for tonight. Sleep on it, as the old saying goes. There are three minutes left before six, so it is too late for me to make my speech tonight. If it is permissible to think aloud even in this House, I think that if the idea was to prevent us from taking the floor tonight it has been successful indeed.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am asking you sincerely, taking into account the seriousness of the issue at stake and what I said yesterday and repeat again today, namely the fact that more ballots have been cast for us than for all members in six provinces, why is it that they enjoy a different status at this moment of our history when more and more people ponder on the future of this country? Mr. Speaker, I cannot emphasize enough the significance of the decision you must take and how heavy the consequences. That is why, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect I urge you to give it serious consideration and let us know tomorrow morning the decision you will have reached in your wisdom.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I was concerned yesterday and I am concerned today with the decision made in a very roundabout manner concerning the matter of the status of the Social Credit party. I think I can safely say, probably being on the extreme left and they being on the extreme right, that there is no philosophical reason for my defence. Over the years I have looked at the changes made in the party structure here, most of them having been done in a roundabout manner.

Yesterday we had a motion which affected Standing Order 65, one very specific position. A decision was made which meant the Social Credit has no right to have a member on the striking committee. That was the decision. I object to us expanding that to making the decision Social Credit is no longer a party of this House but its members are now Independents. If we want to make that decision, let the hon. House leader (Mr. Baker) make the motion. I am bothered with the fact that it may happen to me some day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: We were here when there were 208 Tories and only eight members of the CCF. We had some difficulty in establishing our position, not as the opposition, but as the Official Opposition. The Liberals of that day knew that the government would defeat itself and they very smartly just waited. We in the CCF were not that smart and we were too small a group to have that luxury, so we fought very hard for the position as a political party and a role in the opposition. That was not an unfortunate role and we now have 31 members—

• (1800)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where are they?

Mr. Peters: I must have been thinking of some of the byelections that are coming along.

I sincerely believe that the members of this House do not want to make a decision that will deprive a number of members of the opportunity and rights of being a political party under whose banner they campaigned and were elected.

We, as members of this House, may decide who sits on a committee. We may make that decision from time to time, and the circumstances may vary. It may be that we do not want a member of the Social Credit party to respond or reply to motions. If that is the case, let us say so.

Ever since that list was delivered to you, Mr. Speaker, by all political parties, it has been of concern to me, because it has elevated political parties and members thereof to positions to which they were not elected. I think we have arrived at a stage where there are political parties when it suits the majority, and individuals when it does not suit that majority. I suggest we would be very unfair to take from the Social Credit members that right to belong to a political party, under whose banner they were elected as members, by the process of a majority without the benefit of a motion and without the benefit of any real discussion or debate. I think we should not do that under the guise of having made a decision on another matter.

I have sometimes made statements in speeches that I was happy afterward to have rejected. Just because one makes statements during an argument does not necessarily make those statements right. I suggest with all due respect that the decision made yesterday was a decision regarding membership of a Social Credit member on the striking committee, and that is all. That decision was not taken in respect of a party, it was taken in respect of an individual.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) has left a question of privilege with me and has asked that I consider it overnight. I would simply reiterate what I have said. I will consider his question of privilege carefully overnight. I have already decided on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

My difficulty lies in the fact that a decision has been taken by the House. It seems to me that the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) would have me brush aside the validity of the House and come to some other conclusion in the face of the clear position I quoted this afternoon. That decision was more than a simple reflection of the matter involved in the motion concerning the membership of the committee. That was a decision clearly taken by the House and I cannot ignore its very clear content.

Let me also say this. Indeed, the House has ways of dealing with these situations. Let me leave an example. Had the hon. member for Beauce been the only member standing 30 minutes ago, he would have been recognized and it would not have been clear whether he was being recognized as a party leader or not. These are devices the House knows well, and can use.

The House, by consent, can do a number of things to oblige or accommodate members at different times. If the House wishes to do something, it has a perfect right within its power to do so. However, I am a servant of the House and the House made a clear decision yesterday. In my opinion I no longer have any choice in the matter. The House may have another choice and may do some other things, but, in the absence of any clear direction by the House on the subject, I have to be bound by yesterday's decision, which, in my opinion, stands directly between me and the precedents the hon. member cited this afternoon.

However, I did say I will give the member's question of privilege consideration overnight and I will do so.

It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 6.04 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

COMMITTEE STUDY OF CODFISH QUOTAS IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of urgent necessity.

In view of the unfortunate decision of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) to increase codfish quotas in the 4T and 4VN areas of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and to allow boats of 100 feet and over to fish 6,000 metric tons of cod, which will have disastrous consequences for inshore fishermen and those who depend on the fisheries of the Gulf for their survival, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Cyr):

That the committee on fisheries and forestry be set up at once and that the House refer the matter to the committee so that the minister may explain his decision which favours the companies at the expense of the independent fishermen and that the fishermen of the Gulf may show to the committee the effects of that irresponsible decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF TERMS OF REFERENCE OF ROYAL COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. Since Canadians, particularly those 2.7 million living under the poverty level, are worried and concerned by the many contradictory statements recently made by ministers on cuts and selectivity in pensions, family allowances, Unemployment Insurance Commission and social services, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc):

That the House requests the Prime Minister to table without delay the terms of reference and the members of his planned royal commission which is purported to reduce federal payments under medicare and CAP, in order that Canadians in this vulnerable sector of our community may have their very real fears allayed.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CALL FOR LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE PRORATA PENSIONS FOR CERTAIN WIDOWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I present this motion under Standing Order 43 believing that it expresses the opinion of every member of this House. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House welcomes the assurance that legislation respecting veterans will be introduced at this session, and calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce forthwith an amendment to the Pension Act to provide prorata pensions for widows where the rate of the veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent, it being understood that such a measure would be dealt with very quickly by this House.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

ADVISABILITY OF LOWERING ELIGIBILITY AGE FOR OLD AGE PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the very large number of young Canadians between ages 16 to 24 who are jobless, and in view of the fact that a great many people between ages 60 and 65 have acute survival problems due to the lack of purchasing power, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House require the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take all the necessary steps to introduce in the House this fall a bill lowering eligibility age for the old age security pension to 60 in order to allow workers of that age to leave their jobs, a situation which would have the effect of reducing the unemployment rate that prevails in the main regions of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be put to debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FUNDING FOR SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. On the basis of the Prime Minister's statement on CBC "Newsmagazine" recently that the government should stimulate certain sections of the economy, on the basis of public statements by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) that heavy emphasis should be laid on the inshore fishery, and in view of the fact that fishermen cannot get any money to replace sadly-used vessels on the Atlantic coast particularly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming):

That this House calls on the government to immediately ensure adequate funding for small craft harbours, including those Canada Works projects which require support from federal fisheries.

REQUEST THAT INTERESTS OF SHAREHOLDERS BE SAFEGUARDED IN EVENT OF SALE OF CANADAIR AND DE HAVILLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to draw its attention to the fact that following the announcement made by the government that it would sell Canadair and de Havilland, the shareholders of these profitable companies, who are Canadians, are anxious and want to be informed prior to any other transaction, to ensure that the objectives of the former government are maintained. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro):

That the House consider that the government, in view of the record success of Canadair and de Havilland in the aeronautic field, must ensure, prior to selling these companies, that the objectives set out by the former government, namely Canadian control, technological development and job creation, are maintained and that such transaction, if it is deemed necessary, serve the interests of the present shareholders, who are the Canadian taxpayers.

CONSIDERATION OF BUDGETARY COMMITMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the new Secretary of State (Mr. MacDonald) now proposes further studies into the federal government's role in the cultural field, and considering that this action follows the Secretary of State's criticisms, while in opposition, of the previous administration for alleged policy inaction and restraint, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Gourd):

That this House urges the new government to demonstrate the sincerity of the views of its Secretary of State by bringing into the House for consideration as quickly as possible the six budgetary cultural commitments made by the new Secretary of State to this House on November 24, 1978.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FUNDING OF NATIVE PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of an urgent and pressing nature to this House.

In view of the serious nature of Indian health care in Canada and the stated concern of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) to this situation, and because of the contradictory position of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp), who has implemented a freeze on unexpended funds for capital projects, including those for safety and health, which affect hundreds of current projects which should be currently under construction, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That the House instruct the minister to immediately lift the freeze on capital funds for native projects.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POLICY ON INTEREST RATES—SUPPORT FOR GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question arises from the public comments made by the distinguished member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain to the effect that the Conservative caucus was in revolt against the increase in interest rates. I believe his words were that the caucus are not a bunch of sheep.

It is important that the country knows from the Prime Minister, for economic stability reasons, that his government is in complete support of Governor Bouey and his policies.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to give that assurance to the House of Commons, and also to give the assurance that one of the changes that occurred after the election of May 22 is that the caucus of the government party is no longer a caucus of sheep.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I expect we will witness this spectacle very often, of the caucus applauding itself for its great virtues. I am more interested in the virtue of the government, and I really want to know if there has been any question or any discussion of the resignation by the governor of the bank made to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there has been no discussion with myself, with the Minister of Finance or any other minister of the government of the possibility of the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada. We do not expect any such indication, and we certainly would not welcome any indication by the governor of the Bank of Canada that he might be contemplating any action.

INTEREST RATES—POLICY FOLLOWED BY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is it correct, as stated, apparently, by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain on "Canada A.M." this morning that the governor of the Bank of Canada is not following Conservative policy in what he is doing with interest rates? Is it the intention of this government to simply make the governor of the Bank of Canada an arm of Tory economic policy, whatever it might be?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question by the hon. gentleman, the governor of the Bank of Canada is not following Conservative policy, nor following Liberal policy: he is following the policy of the Bank of Canada, which is an independent—

An hon. Member: That is not what you said this morning.

Mr. Crosbie: When you get more members, you can sit on this side of the House.

● (1120)

Mr. Speaker, if I can answer a serious question in a serious fashion without the caterwauling from the left, the governor of the Bank of Canada is setting his own policy. The Bank of Canada has an independence given to it under legislation passed by this House. I agree with the steps the governor of the Bank of Canada has taken, because in my view there are no alternatives to those steps due to the economic condition we have been left in by the previous government.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Do his words mean that even though on the surface he talks of support, when he refers to the governor of the Bank of Canada following his own policy, it means the Minister of Finance does not really agree with what the governor is doing and would prefer to see him do something else?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman should consult with my predecessor as minister of finance, who explained the relationship between the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada some months ago.

The position is that the governor of the Bank of Canada consults the Minister of Finance. He consults me weekly. When something comes up that requires action by the Bank of Canada, he informs me of what action he believes he should take. We can then discuss what action I think he should take. I can agree, or discuss it. I might even question it. Then he makes his own decision on what action he is going to take.

In connection with the three recent interest rate increases, I have concurred with the governor of the Bank of Canada in his decision. There has been no conflict between us. We have consulted, and we have not always slavishly followed the increases as the last minister of finance did on at least seven occasions in the last year and one-half.

Mr. Trudeau: Three in five months!

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT DIRECTION OVER GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. He has just said that he and the governor of the Bank of Canada have reached agreement on three occasions to raise interest rates. Just before the election, he and his Prime Minister, then the leader of the opposition, were denouncing interest rate increases time after time. Since we have now had the greatest collapse in stock market prices in the Toronto Stock Exchange—

An hon. Member: How would you know?

Mr. Broadbent: —since 1929, and since small businessmen are paying up to 17 per cent to borrow money, and everything indicates that we are heading into a depression, I should like to ask the minister if he knows that he has the authority under the Bank Act to direct the governor of the Bank of Canada to adopt a different policy, perhaps in line with the kind his party argued for before the election.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party is following his usual procedure of shedding crocodile tears about what happens on the Toronto Stock Exchange. What happened on the Toronto Stock Exchange was that there was a lot of speculation, particularly in oil and gas shares, and people are taking their profits now.

With respect to the policy of the Bank of Canada, I want to try to explain this to the Leader of the New Democratic Party. What was objected to by us with respect to the previous government's performance was their economic performance that resulted in their being put in a position where the Bank of Canada had to approve interest rates caused by the fact that they had allowed our economy to degenerate with a huge deficit, with the balance of payments and the like. Our criticism was of the economic action of the government which had caused these interest rate increases, not the interest rate increases themselves. They are only a symptom of what had been permitted to happen by the last government.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): You have been the government for the past six months!

RESPONSIBILITY FOR MONETARY POLICY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question to the Prime Minister who, in that position, was doing just the opposite of what the Minister of Finance has alleged. I quoted the Prime Minister yesterday and made it very clear that as leader of the opposition he was opposed to the policy of increasing interest rates because of its damaging effects on the people of Canada.

There was no question about that before the election. Since he has the legal authority, as Prime Minister, to direct monetary policy, I should like to ask him who is determining monetary policy in Canada—the governor of the Bank of Canada, or he as Prime Minister? If he believes there should be a change in interest rate policy, why does he not use his authority and leadership to bring it about?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has explained to the Leader of the New Democratic Party and to the House the relationship, which the Leader of the New Democratic Party should have known, between the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada. The Minister of Finance has also indicated that what we took exception to prior to the election, and what we take exception to now, is the state of the Canadian economy created by years of ineffective leadership by the government which the people of Canada replaced.

Naturally, we do not like high interest rates. What we are working toward now, as I indicated yesterday in my speech in this House and as other colleagues of mine have indicated frequently in this House and in the country, is an improvement in the economic situation in Canada which will allow the governor of the Bank of Canada to recommend policies of lower interest rates, which this government will certainly support when that recommendation is made.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question. The Prime Minister said in this House in February: "There is nothing less sensible than the government's"—please note—"determination to increase interest rates to record levels."

Considering that his Minister of Finance has just acknowledged—he is, I think, in the government; I think he is there—that he agreed with the interest rate increase three times this summer, and therefore he has implicitly acknowledged it is government responsibility, I ask the minister if he will exercise his authority under section 14(2) of the Bank Act and issue a directive to the governor of the Bank of Canada to roll back the most recent increase to avoid the kinds of evils in the economy which the Prime Minister himself alluded to last spring.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the answer to this specific question is no. In reference to the rather lengthy preamble, our determination is to create economic conditions in this country which will allow interest rates to come down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Why don't you bring in a budget?

POLICY ON INTEREST RATES—SUPPORT FOR GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. With all due respect, in response to the question posed by my colleague, the hon. member for Windsor West, the minister did not adequately respond.

Will the Minister of Finance confirm his unequivocal support for the governor of the Bank of Canada and assure this House that he will remain in his job, or are we witnessing another Coyne affair which took the Diefenbaker government three years to fall out with the governor of the Bank of Canada, and this government five months?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me put it beyond any doubt. Mr. Bouey has my full support. He has had my full support since June 5, and he will continue to have my full support. I think he is doing an excellent job. He is a very capable man who is doing his best in very difficult circumstances.

There is no question that he has been asked to take any action against his will or to take any action that he does not want to take, nor will he ever receive any threats or have anything to fear from this government. That is all I can say to put the hon. member's mind at rest.

The governor is taking the action that our economic conditions dictate, that our perilous position with reference to our trade balance dictates by its own inflationary tendencies.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance, is it going to be the same kind of support as that given to Bill Hood, former deputy minister of finance and a very responsible senior public official? Would the Minister of Finance confirm that after Mr. Hood's dismissal he had a meeting with his senior officials, at which time he outlined his support for Mr. Hood, and that the decision was imposed by the Prime Minister's office?

Mr. Chrétien: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I do not see how this is a supplementary; but I do not want to "Hoodwink" the hon. gentleman, either!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The former deputy minister of finance, Mr. Hood, has my full support as a very capable—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is going to be dangerous.

Mr. MacEachen: Your support is the kiss of death.

● (1130)

Mr. Crosbie: He is a very fine public servant, and I am glad to see that he has good friends in hon. members opposite who will drag his name up in public with these kinds of questions. I do not think they have done him any good.

ENERGY

POSITION OF CHAIRMAN OF TASK FORCE ON PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding the question I asked him yesterday which, I will remind the House, had to do with the chairman of the task force on Petro-Canada, Mr. McDougall. Although he is on leave of absence as president of Labatt's, he is still receiving full salary from that company. That company is owned by Brascan, which has indicated an interest in buying Petro-Canada. Has the minister been able to find an answer to that question?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is that the chairman of the task force, Mr. McDougall, is on leave of absence from Labatt Limited. It is not his intention to return to that company at the end of the leave of absence. He will, in fact, be terminating his relationship with that company.

Mr. McCauley: Whether he is on leave of absence, going back or not, is he still on salary?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday that he is on salary.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is on a leave of absence with pay. He is in the process of terminating his employment and will, in fact, be terminating his employment. However, as I indicated yesterday, the premise of the hon. member's question is completely unfounded in the sense that Brascan has indicated in public statements that it has no interest with respect to the acquisition of either Petro-Canada as a whole or any assets thereof, so that the question the hon. member puts is simply not relevant.

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister's answer is fair to Mr. McDougall. The government has put Mr. McDougall in a very unfavourable position with regard to conflict of interest, and I feel—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. McCauley: The minister should answer the question regarding conflict of interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Davenport.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON ACID RAIN POLLUTANTS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment and it has to do with contradictory statements attributed to him on acid rain pollutants. On the one hand the minister seems to prefer to delay action on this very serious matter, waiting for the United States to develop controls, and on the other hand he says that "our appeals for more U.S. controls will likely fall on deaf ears if we do not begin to clean up our own act," as he stated here in Ottawa on September 25.

Can the minister explain to this House and to the country what is the actual policy of the Government of Canada in dealing with this very serious danger to our environment?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for raising this question because, as I have said before, the elimination of the acid rain problem is the number one priority of the Department of the Environment and this government in environmental matters.

The policy of the government is to negotiate with the United States an agreement somewhat along the lines of the Great Lakes water quality agreement, in order to achieve at the same time joint control of emission sources on both sides of the border. To this end discussions have been going on between the Government of Canada, my department, the Department of External Affairs, the appropriate departments in the provinces and officials of the American Environmental Protection Agency. As the hon. member knows, I met with Mr. Costle on August 8 and came back with confirmation that the United States is prepared to work toward such an agreement.

With respect to our own situation in Canada, we are working very closely with the provinces to have in place shortly recommendations as to the action which should be taken in Canada to bring before our American counterparts. The strategy is to move equally with the United States, and we are working very hard to bring about an international agreement because it is impossible to solve the problem without international action.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, could the minister inform this House whether this agreement is being negotiated, and what are the specific steps the Government of Canada is asking the governments of Ontario and Quebec to take in the meantime?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is not saying to the provinces that they ought to impose controls which are much stricter than controls presently existing in the United States. We are asking the provinces to work with us to work out, in an agreement with the United States, equal standards and identification of emission controls so that the two countries can form such an agreement and work equally on both sides of the border.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED REDUCTIONS IN PERSONNEL—STATUS OF WOMEN

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

An hon. Member: Sink with Sinc!

Miss Jewett: My question concerns the commitment of the government to reduce the size of the federal public service and its commitment not to have these reductions disproportionately affect women, in keeping with its election promise to promote the status of women in the public service.

Would the minister tell the House what guidelines have been sent to the departments and agencies to ensure that women do not disproportionately bear the burden of these reductions and, if the guidelines have been set, would the minister please table them?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her first question in the House. This will be my first answer in my present responsibility.

The answer to the question the hon. member has put has indeed been communicated. The status of women in the public service has been something about which we have been clear. We do not want to see the status of women lessened in any way as a result of the reduction in the number of federal public servants which we anticipate will take place over the next three or 3½ years. I can assure the hon. member that we intend to monitor the situation continually to see that such a lessening of women's participation in the public service will not occur.

Miss Jewett: Mr. Speaker, clearly there are no guidelines. The minister has avoided any reference at all to the guidelines which were basically promised by the Progressive Conservative Party. Specifically, last month 12 of 14 of the employees laid off by the Agricultural Stabilization Board were women. Two were women in their fifties with families to support. They have little hope of finding new jobs.

Would the President of the Treasury Board tell the House what immediate plans he has to protect these women and what plans he has to avoid repetition of such discriminatory practices?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that clearly there are no guidelines. I indicated that the guideline is no lessening of the number of women working in the public service as a result of reductions.

An hon. Member: That is a wish.

Mr. Stevens: With reference to the hon. member's specific point, I will be very pleased to look specifically into the situation to which the hon. member has referred, and I will report back to her in a private letter.

PROPOSED REDUCTIONS IN PERSONNEL—EFFECT ON FRANCOPHONES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board if he has established guidelines regarding the consequences of the reduction in the number of Francophones in the civil service who, according to reports we have received, will be more affected than any other group in the civil service as a result of the initiatives taken by the president.

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to congratulate the former minister on his new critic's role in this House.

With reference to his question, he will be pleased to hear that the proportion of Francophones in the Canadian public service has actually gone up marginally on a percentage basis. We have indicated that we do not wish to see any deterioration in that ratio, that is, the number of Francophones in the public service compared with the total number in the public service.

INQUIRY WHETHER PROGRAM WILL BE ESTABLISHED TO PROVIDE JOBS TO PERSONNEL LAID OFF

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Is the minister not aware of the serious consequences of a policy of attrition on the groups just mentioned by the member for Saint-Maurice? Francophones and women have a high employment termination rate, 27 per cent for women and 21 per cent for Francophones. Has the minister devised a development and training program for these persons who might find themselves on a very competitive labour market, who are now pursuing a career in the public service and could be laid off as a result of the arbitrary decisions he has taken and of his attrition policies as he calls them and which are just out of this world?

• (1140)

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Again, may I congratulate the hon. member on his role as Treasury Board public service critic. I must say, however, that although he has been a critic for several months he has obviously not understood our attrition program.

The anxieties to which he refers are, in fact, unreal. Over the coming period we anticipate that for every three persons leaving the public service two will he hired, and I believe the hon. member will find that the problems to which he refers will not materialize.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): The minister did not answer the question. I would like to know if there will be a program for the development and improvement of public servants? There should be a full development program that would allow public servants either to embrace a new career or to get a new job within the public service. That is the question. Is there a global program for the development and the improvement of the staff?

Some hon. Members: There is nothing.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: In his supplementary question I suppose the hon. member has underlined the fact that he did not read the material we put out. We have indicated that we do facilitate the re-employment of any person who may have to leave the public service as a result of program changes or that type of thing.

There is no doubt that the kind of circumstances to which the hon. member refers have been anticipated and we intend to ensure that those who are presently public servants will not be laid off simply as a result of any reduction or attrition in the public service.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER LEGISLATION WILL BE AMENDED

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the President of the Treasury Board. Knowing the great sympathy of the minister for public service employees and also the uncertainty that is created by some of his initiatives, would he tell the House if it is his intention to amend the Pension Act in order to assure retired public servants that their pensions will be geared to the cost of living?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): The anxieties to which the hon. member refers are, in fact, only in his mind. He has referred to legislation which was before the previous Parliament, Bill C-12. I can tell him we have reviewed that legislation. We found it inadequate and we intend to introduce in this House a much more appropriate bill in substitution for it, one which will take into account the rather frightening "unfunding" which took place under the previous government with respect to the superannuation accounts held on behalf of the public servants of Canada.

INQUIRY WHETHER NEW BILL WILL PROVIDE FOR INDEXING

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): My question is again directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Could he tell the House if there will be a clause in the new bill which is going to be tabled, in order to assure retired public servants that they will get a pension indexed to the cost of living?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): I have already indicated that the bill which was brought before the Thirtieth Parliament is now under review. We intend to bring in a more satisfactory bill, at which time the hon. member will see that we have more appropriately provided for the indexing of public service pensions than perhaps he is now anticipating.

TRANSPORT

CTC APPROACH TO CANAVIA TRANSIT APPLICATION

Mr. Robin Richardson (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. I refer to an article in The Globe and Mail in which Mr. John P. T. Gilmore, the president of Canavia Transit Inc., a somewhat mysterious Montreal-based company which refuses to disclose its directors and financial backers, and a company which has filed an application before the Canadian Transport Commission to use the Toronto Island airport for a STOL commuter service, alleges that the hon. gentleman, as Minister of Transport, has given a clear directive—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should put his question.

Mr. Richardson (Beaches): I should like to ask the minister whether he has given approval to the CTC to proceed with the application of Canavia Transit, whether he has given support to that application and whether the government has taken a decision on the use of Toronto Island for STOL service.

[Mr. Isabelle.]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): As the hon. member knows, I am sure, Canavia is free to make an application. I indicated this in my letter, and the interpretation which Mr. Gilmore has placed upon my letter is inaccurate.

ENERGY

PROTECTION FOR CONSUMERS IF ENERGY PRICES INCREASED

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given that it is the reported intent of this government to move immediately and quickly toward world energy prices, and that the entire agricultural sector of Canada will be unduly affected by such abrupt and unconsidered movement; given, further, that producers of foodstuffs, as well as consumers in the country, will be affected and are virtually unable to shield themselves from the impact of such action, may I ask whether the minister has consulted with his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, to ascertain the impact on food production and food prices of such a move, and whether he has set in motion some mechanism for shielding both agricultural producers and consumers of this country from the kind of action contemplated?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Members of this cabinet, unlike their predecessors, are always in consultation with each other with respect to matters of national concern. I can assure the hon. member that these factors with respect to the implications of price increases are very much in my mind, that there is full discussion with respect to a comprehensive energy policy, and that our approaches to the subject take seriously into account the aspect the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Daudlin: I am more than happy to hear that the minister is consulting with his colleague. I wonder whether I might ask his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, whether he would be prepared to entertain an alternative to allowing the price increases to go ahead and to suggest to the minister of energy that the energy-related cost increases should be exempted, and that the farmers of this country should not be required to pay them either through the fuel going into their tractors or the nitrate fertilizers derived from natural gas, thus protecting not only food producers of this country but consumers as well.

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): I thank the hon. member for his question. I might say it is not the kind of question I had expected to receive off the bat. But I do appreciate his recommendation because it does concern a serious problem affecting the food sector in its totality.

When my hon. friend, the minister of energy, tells the House we are consulting, he means just that; and we expect to continue to consult on a regular basis to bring forth solutions to this very serious problem.

LAUZON SHIPYARDS—INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL MEET REQUEST OF UNION PRESIDENT

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In the first place, I am pleased to see that shipyards are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne as they were of course in the last Speech from the Throne of our party. Now considering that concern or those pious wishes stated in the Speech from the Throne, I would like to ask the Prime Minister why he has not yet replied to a first telegram sent in August and a second one dated September 19 signed by the president of the Lauzon shipyards representing 3,000 workers. I am also asking him when he will answer the request made by the president of shipyards' workers that a meeting be arranged with the senior members of the cabinet to discuss the short-term rather than the long-term future of the shipyards where there have been so many dismissals throughout the country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will answer that question next week.

COMMUNICATIONS

REASON FOR RESIGNATION OF CRTC CHAIRMAN

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. As the chairmanship of CRTC is a term appointment for seven years—and rightly so, since that function requires total independence from the government of the day—I should like to know from the minister why the government decided to tamper with this rule and found out all of a sudden that Mr. Camu was indispensable as deputy minister of another department before he had finished his term. He had served only two years of a seven-year term, and I am wondering why this function was tampered with and why Mr. Camu was offered another job.

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —the hon. member is poorly informed. It will take a day or two to get used to the new relationships.

The hon. member, who is the former minister of the department, is not well informed. As I understand it, that is not what has occurred at all. We were most anxious for Mr. Camu to remain in his present position but—as the former minister, the hon. member, knows—Mr. Camu has chosen employment outside the public service. We regret that very much, but we wish him well in his new work.

Mrs. Sauvé: I am quite aware that he has taken a job in the private sector, but I would like the minister to check if he had been offered another job in a government department before he decided to go to the private sector; and I should like to know from the minister whether we can now expect to see the very competent vice chairman, Mr. Dalfen, promoted to the position of chairman or whether we will be treated to another patronage appointment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I know that the former minister is well aware of what patronage appointments are all about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I want to assure her that I have discussed the matter of Mr. Camu leaving the public service directly with him, and that it is not as has been said by the hon. member. If she wants to, she should talk to Mr. Camu directly about that.

On the second matter, in order that we can have the very best people serve in important institutions like CRTC, this government is going to consult widely and fairly before making the proper appointment.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST MINISTER INTERCEDE IN MONTREAL GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour and it concerns a question which I put to the minister yesterday regarding his intervention in the grain handlers' strike in Montreal.

In the question period yesterday the minister replied that "meaningful discussions" were taking place at that time. It turns out now that no meaningful negotiations are taking place and none are planned. Will the minister please cut out the flimflammery—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: —and tell the House that he is prepared to involve himself directly in bringing to a resolution this very serious problem on the Montreal docks?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to note that the hon. member has adopted my wording which was so effective, but unfortunately it is not as effective when he uses it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I just want to tell the hon. member that, as I stated yesterday, the mediator was meeting with the parties involved in a private way. I have received confirmation, contrary to press reports, that there have been—I say this without any equivocation—private meetings with certain parties and discussions have been held.

I would think that the hon. member would know the way that mediation works and that this is the procedure that is brought about when there is an ability to know that an all-encompassing meeting around the table is counterproductive. The mediator intends to follow this course of action in order to bring about a solution to this very worrisome matter, and we hope now that the parties will get together in order to bring about the necessary solution.

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that I have in my hand a telegram from the trade unions representing the workers, in which they indicate clearly that no discussions are taking place and none are planned, can the minister inform the House who these persons are who are having these private discussions to resolve the matter? Stop bamboozling us; come clean!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: There is another word which I think the hon. member cannot use effectively. I wish the hon. member would acquire his own vocabulary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: The parties with whom the mediator is meeting are, of course, the parties to the dispute and I do not accept the hon. member's premise, arrived at by way of some telegram, that there are no meetings being held and no meetings planned. Certainly meetings are being planned. The mediator knows his job and he has been meeting with the parties in the dispute and has been having discussions with them.

It does not serve any good purpose for the hon. member to aggravate what is a very delicate situation. It seems to me that he does not want the strike settled, but I want it settled and the only way we can settle it is to use common sense—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MINISTER'S INVOLVEMENT IN NEGOTIATIONS TO SETTLE STRIKE

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

He has just indicated that meetings are now in progress. I think he has been misinformed: no meeting is being held at the present time. I should also like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he will decide to intervene personally to solve the problem, and when he will accept the recommendations made by the Prime Minister to the effect that he should ask to be involved in this case and to solve the problem. When will he decide that the country is not made up of two parts and that it is normal that the problem should be solved in Montreal and in Vancouver?

[English]

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is screaming about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Let me tell him that, in terms of personal involvement, I have had more involvement with this particular work stoppage than any other.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: He does not know, or he conveniently forgets, that I have met with CNTU who have indicated to me that the only way this matter can be resolved is by way of a settlement, and I told them to go back and settle the dispute.

In terms of what the Prime Minister had indicated about personal involvement, we did appoint a mediator who has been on top of the situation. If the hon. member wants the strike settled, he should be more constructive in his questions, he should understand that delicate negotiations are going on and that any flimflammery or bamboozling we have heard from the hon. member and the hon. member for Nickel Belt will not solve the situation in a very meaningful way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHY THRONE SPEECH OMITTED ANY REFERENCE TO AGRICULTURE

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture, I take this opportunity to congratulate him on his new responsibilities and to assure him of our co-operation while wishing him good luck in the almost impossible task of replacing the hon. member who preceded him.

An hon. Member: How true!

Mr. Lessard: However, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if the way to face the challenge is really that which the Speech from the Throne suggests: nowhere is mention made of the agriculture department, except for a reference to grains, which are the responsibility of the Minister of Transport.

I wish to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he really intends to participate actively in promoting his department and ensuring that the commitment of his party, that is to give the Minister of Agriculture even greater stature and make of him a special adviser to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada who, yesterday, in his speech, did not even allude to the agriculture department. What does the Minister of Agriculture intend to do to make sure that he can fulfil—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROTECTION AGAINST OIL SPILLS IN WEST COAST WATERS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me without binoculars. My question is for the Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment. It concerns a possible west coast oil port at or near Port Angeles, Washington.

I think the minister and I share some common ground in this matter. We both live in British Columbia and love the west coast. We both regret any possibility of a spill in those waters. What does the minister propose to do to ensure that the routing of Alaskan oil will be done in the best interests of Canada and will not endanger the west coast?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and his expressions of common cause in environmental problems. At the present time, the Government of Canada has indicated to the United States, by an aide memoire, that the preference would be for the Foothills' route, which would be an overland route, and that the Kitimat route does not meet with our approval. No mention has been made of Trans Mountain, but the aide memoire indicates that any decision will be subject to the Canadian regulatory process. That means Trans Mountain and Foothills will appear before the National Energy Board. We will watch very closely those deliberations.

The object of the exercise is to minimize, to the degree possible, tanker traffic on the west coast. This is not completely in our hands, but to the degree that we can get one of those options selected, as opposed to the northern tier route across the United States, we will have met our environmental objectives at least to a degree. If all else fails, we will have to work very closely with the United States in an agreement to ensure that navigation is safe and that clean-up facilities and crews are available.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT CARTER WILL DISCUSS SUGGESTED OIL PORT ON WEST COAST

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister on this matter. Considering that President Carter, by American law, must make a decision on the oil port by December 6, and considering that the Prime Minister, I understand, is meeting with the President in Ottawa in November, is the Prime Minister prepared to put on the agenda of that meeting the crucial matter of the oil port? Is he prepared to ask the President if it is possible to extend that American timetable so that we can work out a proper timetable suitable for the interests of both countries?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to raise that matter with the President of the United States when he is here. I should like to take the opportunity to advise the House of Commons that there has been a confirmation of dates of the visit of the President of the United States to Canada on November 9 and 10 of this year. I will be extending, on behalf of the House of Commons—or suggesting that the Speakers do—the opportunity for the President of the United States to deliver an address to a joint session of this House.

I will be pleased to raise the matter with him. If it looks like there is any practical possibility of our achieving any extension of those deadlines, I would be prepared to raise that matter with him as well. Naturally, I will not raise that matter if it appears that there is no practical possibility of the American President responding positively.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PROVINCIAL STATUS FOR THE YUKON

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister resulting from the unsatisfactory answer his minister gave in the House yesterday regarding the resignation of the commissioner of the Yukon in protest over his government according certain provincial powers to the Yukon Territorial Council, which is the government for the 23,000 inhabitants of the Yukon. He did this without consulting Parliament, without consulting, as promised, the people of the Yukon or the provincial premiers. What appears to be happening is the establishment of de facto provincehood without the consent of either Yukoners or the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Watson: Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the commissioner will remain on the executive committee, and that no changes to the commissioner's role and no additional provincial powers will be turned over to the Yukon Territorial Council without reference to and a full review by the Parliament of Canada of all the implications of this irresponsible rush toward provincehood?

An hon. Member: Shame.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must say in passing that I am surprised at the resistance expressed by spokesmen of the Liberal party to the extension of democracy in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: But let me make it clear to the hon. member who raised the question and to the former minister who should be better informed—

Mr. Breau: Will you do the same thing to the Acadians?

Mr. Clark: What the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has done is extend powers to the limit allowed under present legislation which in fact will extend the capacity for assuming greater responsibility over the affairs of the people of the Yukon, people who on May 22 had an opportunity to cast their votes among parties which had taken different positions on that question. They elected the Minister of Public Works whose position on the question was well known.

If there is to be a further extension of the powers and the movement toward self-government of the people of the Yukon, which in the view of this government there should be, naturally that will involve consultation with the provinces, the people of the Yukon and to the degree necessary it will involve consideration by the House of Commons of any amendments to relevant legislation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RODRIGUEZ—GRAIN HANDLERS DISPUTE—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF LABOUR DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which has to do particularly with the question and the answer given by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) yesterday afternoon in the House. I asked the minister the following question, as reported at page 28 of Hansard:

In view of the fact that the minister injected himself very quickly and expeditiously into the west coast grain handlers dispute, bringing it to a successful conclusion, and in view of the fact that the present grain handlers strike has been going on for five months and has the potential of creating problems for Quebec farmers this winter and for others, is the minister now prepared to insert himself directly into the dispute in an effort to resolve it as successfully as he did the west coast grain handlers strike?

The minister replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I want to give the hon. member credit for asking that question, because I am also concerned about the matter. But I want to point out to him that at this very moment the mediator, Mr. Rolland Doucet, is meeting with the parties involved in a private way and having meaningful discussions. Progress is being made. For me to say anything further at this particular time would be unproductive.

I was rather flabbergasted by that response, so I immediately had someone from my leader's office, Mr. Jacques Bélanger, contact the union involved, particularly Mr. André L'Heureux, the vice-president of the CSN representing the workers in this dispute. As a result of that telephone call, the following telegram was received in my leader's office yesterday afternoon at approximately five o'clock. I will read the telegram into the record because it is extremely important to the question of privilege I am raising. It reads as follows:

[Translation]

Following your call to my office at 3.30 p.m., I do not understand how the Minister of Labour could have said that we were now discussing or meeting for that purpose, for neither I nor the president of the union nor any union spokesman are meeting the mediators or the National Harbours Board at this time.

Signed: André L'Heureux, vice-president.

[English]

It was signed by Mr. André L'Heureux, vice-president. It is very clear from the telegram that those who have the responsibility of representing the workers in this dispute clearly know nothing of the negotiations that the minister said in the House were going on at that moment. Not being satisfied with that, I asked the assistant of the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) to contact the mediator's office. The mediator's office indicated that it knew nothing about any negotiations or discussions which were going on at that moment or had been planned.

An interesting Canadian Press article appeared in the Thursday, October 11, 1979, edition of the Gazette. It quotes the Minister of Labour outside the chamber. I should like to quote from the article as follows:

● (1210)

Alexander said "the full force and effect" of the labour department's mediation and conciliation services have been in motion for weeks in an effort to end the dispute.

In addition, he had met union representatives, heard their case and "indicated that the door's always open." Also, Don Mazankowski, minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, had met union officials.

L'Heureux said Alexander "is certainly misinformed about what his officials are doing in the field."

"They are not very active or dynamic . . . we would have expected them to be present more forcefully," he said, adding that all Mazankowski had done was to send a telegram Tuesday expressing hope that negotiations are going well. The union had asked Mazankowski for help in a September 14 telegram.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the last meaningful contact between the mediator and the parties concerned was on October 4 when Mr. Rolland Doucet, the mediator, presented a proposal for settlement to both the union and management. It is interesting to note that the union accepted the mediator's proposal for settlement, but management rejected that proposal.

This dispute has now gone on for five months. It was interesting to note the speed with which this minister involved himself in the dispute on the west coast when grain handlers were on strike. I think the minister has misled this House. It is not for me to say whether or not it was deliberate, but he repeated what he said again today. I would have to say with all knowledge that he has misled this House again today by the comments he made in response to the question I put, which was the same as I put yesterday.

I say that the minister should show himself to be an honourable minister by retracting what he has said and by accepting responsibility for lack of communication in his department, and he should immediately insert himself into the negotiations to ensure a speedy settlement of that particular dispute.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) also wishes to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I want to support my colleague for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). I believe that yesterday the minister involuntarily misled the House in his answer and I hope that he will recognize his mistake today. The parties involved have not met with anyone since October 4. I believe that the minister's department may have misinformed him, or that perhaps the minister did not ask the necessary information from his department. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I note once again that the minister intervened in the Vancouver matter much more quickly than in the port conflict in Montreal. Yet, this conflict has been going on for five months. I believe that it is extremely important for the minister to realize that not telling the truth involuntarily in the House is extremely serious because if we can no longer believe the answers given by a minister, the privileges of all the members of this House will be weakened. The Canadian population is entitled to ask questions about the qualifications of a minister or a government.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) to withdraw the misleading statements that he made in the House yesterday. This was certainly involuntary because I am aware of his qualities as a man and as a parliamentarian. However, it is extremely important that in the future he does not act as though there were two Canadas instead of one. When there is a problem in Montreal, the issue is just as important as when there is a problem in Vancouver.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) rising on the same question of privilege?

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege.

We are faced here with a minister who many of us like personally. However, the question raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is a very crucial one in that it affects so importantly the privileges of all members of parliament. We have been greeted today with a spectacle. We are members trying to perform as opposition members are supposed to perform. This was the spectacle of a minister clearly misleading.

No one is accusing him of doing so on purpose, but this is a government that has given us platitudes about being consultative with the Canadian people and informing everyone, yet the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) is clearly found to be, accidentally and not meaningfully, misleading the House. He has given us information to which the hon. member for Nickel Belt has clearly responded. The minister has given us information about a strike situation in Montreal about which he really does not seem to know anything. We saw this happen today in respect of minister after minister.

I think this is an important question of privilege. The hon. member for Nickel Belt is to be congratulated for bringing it forward early enough in this Parliament so that you, Mr. Speaker, can make some kind of decision about how long this spectacle of ministers being totally without knowledge of the affairs of their departments will continue in this House.

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that was a delightful debate. The only thing that bothers me is that when we are involved with the full force and effect of mediation and conciliation services, members should, for their own motives which are not understandable to me, bring about such a debate. They have said that I am misleading the House. They have said there have been no meetings and no discussions held. This really makes me wonder whether they are keeping abreast of these things.

My department, through my officials, has been involved with this matter. I can go through the litany in my briefing book starting from way back on February 20, 1979, when Mr. Len Waller was appointed as conciliation officer, right down to this date and the appointment of Mr. Rolland Doucet as mediator.

Obviously, hon. members will know—I see the former minister of labour sitting there and I am sure he will understand—that the whole concept of mediation and conciliation services, particularly those provided by the mediator, calls for discussions and meetings with the parties, not necessarily around the table, collectively speaking.

When I say that discussions and meetings have been held with the parties I stand by that. As a matter of fact, I have a note I want to read so that all will know what I was trying to say and what I did say today. This is what I intended to use this morning to indicate, as I did yesterday in the House, that the mediator in this dispute was "meeting with the parties involved in a private way".

I have since received confirmation, contrary to reports in the media, that the mediator did, indeed, meet with certain parties privately and held private discussions with others. Anyone knowledgeable of the processes of dispute resolution will readily recognize that such an approach is an integral part of a mediator's techniques when joint meetings around a table would be counterproductive. This is the procedure the mediator will be pursuing in his continuing efforts to bring both parties to the necessary compromise that will lead to a freely negotiated collective agreement.

An hon. Member: Oh, go on.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) says, "Go on". It seems to me that that hon. member, being one of the critics in this regard, should be more responsible in terms of knowing how a mediator's services are applied and how they work. Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I urge those concerned with the resolution of this dispute to explore all possibilities of solution in a co-operative effort with the mediator.

● (1220)

Having regard to the question raised yesterday, I would respectfully submit that all members who have spoken, other than the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), should check the preamble to the hon. member's question posed yesterday in respect of me personally, because once again he did not know what he was talking about in that regard. This is the answer that I gave as reported at page 28 of Hansard dated October 10, 1979:

> I want to give the hon. member credit for asking the question because I am also concerned about the matter, but I want to point out to him that at this very moment the mediator, Mr. Rolland Doucet, is meeting with the parties involved in a private way and having meaningful discussions. Progress is being made. For me to say anything further at this particular time would be unproductive.

It is not up to me to try to hide the facts or flim-flam or bamboozle anybody. My way of answering that question was a sincere attempt to make members more knowledgeable about the situation. If there was anything wrong with my answer at that particular time, it is the words "this very moment", and if that is what the hon. member is referring to, I must agree. Perhaps I got carried away in terms of answering the question, but it still does not deny the fact that discussions and meetings have been held with other parties and that meetings have been held with the parties.

I notice that the hon. member who spoke after the hon. member for Nickel Belt is nodding in the affirmative; in other words, he is agreeing that discussions and meetings have been held. If it will make members more confident with respect to my knowledge or lack of knowledge regarding my department—incidentally, I am not concerned about what they think of my knowledge or lack of knowledge with regard to my department—those are the facts.

I am here to do my job and I can tell hon. members that I am going to do the job and that this work stoppage is of concern to all of us. I would hope that those who are on the outside looking in, particularly the parties to the dispute and the mediator, get on the ball and resolve the matter as quickly as possible, because we all know what must be done in the long run.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, if it will make members happier and if it will remove that cloud which has been cast upon my integrity, I will withdraw that point and the words "this very moment". Discussions and meetings were held with the parties, and I hope that my integrity remains intact as a result of that very important concession. There was no intent—

An hon. Member: Order.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Alexander: This gives me the opportunity to make my maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Alexander: There was no intent to mislead anyone in this House. I am here to give hon. members the facts and I will try my best to give the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members, I am sure, have realized for some time during the course of the discussion that what was at stake was a disagreement with respect to the kind of answer and the content of the answer given yesterday by the minister. The minister has said that he stands by his answer with the exception of a specific interpretative part, "this very moment". It is clearly a dispute between the parties and does not constitute a question of privilege.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1978-79

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, by leave, I would like to table a report to the House of Commons on Supplementary Estimates (B) 1978-79 which shows how the items in these estimates were financed. Since some items were paid under authority of a special warrant, special reference to this effect will be included in the next appropriation bill. I have three more documents to table.

Mr. Speaker, by leave, I would like to table a report, in both official languages, to the House of Commons showing the special warrants issued under section 23 of the Financial Administration Act following the dissolution of Parliament on March 26, 1979, in accordance with Standing Order 41(2).

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1979-80

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am retabling the 1979-80 Main Estimates, and I have a message from His Excellency the Governor General signed by his own hand.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1979-80

Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order relating to the tabling made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens). Is he tabling the Main Estimates as we saw them in the last Parliament, unchanged; is he recommending them to the House, unchanged; or is he recommending the approval by the House of the spending plans of the former government which had ten months to run when he took over as President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Stevens: The Main Estimates that I have just tabled, Mr. Speaker, are being tabled in identical form to the estimates that were last tabled by the former government. I have no further comment.

Mr. MacEachen: Is the minister recommending these estimates to the House?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) just said that he is not recommending the estimates to the House.

Mr. Trudeau: Throw them away.

Mr. Chrétien: That is a very unusual statement. I would like clarification from the President of the Treasury Board. If he cannot stand up to his responsibilities, perhaps he should resign immediately.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is vitally important to know, from the minister who tabled these estimates, whether the government and the President of the Treasury Board are recommending that the House of Commons approve these estimates—those words which were put in the mouth of the Governor General. Is the minister recommending these estimates for approval to the House?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the matter is an appropriate point of order, in the first place. It seems to be a matter which would be much more appropriate for the question period. If the opposition House leader and the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) have that kind of energy tomorrow, perhaps they can raise it at that time; I think that would be quite appropriate. As I understand the rules, the duty performed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) was to table the documents. They have now been tabled. If there are questions about those documents, they can be put during the question period in the normal way. That, certainly, is not an appropriate point of order at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think if the President of the Treasury Board is not living up to the tabling of those documents on the recommendation of the Governor General, he should withdraw them right away. If he does not want to propose to the House that we approve them, and he does not approve them—he has been President of the Treasury Board since the month of June—what the hell has he done since that date?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I will take the matter under advisement. The documents have been tabled; they rest with the House. I will take under advisement the effect of the action of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) which has been to acknowledge that he has tabled the documents, and he has heard the representations about his own recommendation to the House. I will take the matter under advisement.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on this question which goes to the very root of our parliamentary system, I have a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACEACHEN—SUBMISSION OF ESTIMATES TO THE HOUSE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I heard the message from His Excellency. I do not have it before me, but as read by the Chair it stated that His Excellency recommends the spending estimates to the House of Commons. There is some doubt as to whether the Governor General received this advice from the government. On whose advice is he acting now, if the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) will not say that he is recommending the estimates to the House? On whose authority is His Excellency recommending them, if not on the authority of the government? I do not believe this is a matter that can sit for 24 hours. This is the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The matter is very fundamental. I certainly do not intend to make a decision which would affect such a fundamental matter without an opportunity to consider it. I have taken under advisement the question which has been raised and I intend to give it careful study and consideration. I intend to rule on it as quickly as I can. If there are other arguments on the point, I would be pleased to hear them.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that in answer to the question by the opposition House Leader (Mr. MacEachen) and by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) the President of the Treasury Board said that he did not take responsibility—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Trudeau: It may not be on the record—

Mr. MacEachen: He shook his head.

Mr. Trudeau: —but he obviously said no. If he is now saying that he did not say no, but that he recommends them—

Mr. Stevens: Because I never said it.

Mr. MacEachen: You said it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe we saw him shaking his head "no", but if he is saying—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we have to say what we see. If the hon. member is saying that he did not say no and he did not intend to say no, why does he not indicate to us now that he is accepting his responsibility as the servant of the Crown to take responsibility for these estimates? He either said no, or he did not say no. We want to know if he is responsible, or not—

Mr. Chrétien: You said you are not recommending.

Mr. Trudeau: —as a minister of the Crown.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to clarify now, as a mechanical matter, is the hon. President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens), in making any negative action, saying that he has not recommended their approval to the House? He was asked if he recommended their approval, and he had said that he did not recommend their approval today. Is he saying that he did not add a recommendation of the approval, or is he saying that he does not recommend their approval? They are two entirely different statements.

I have nothing on the record except the statement by the President of the Treasury Board that he has tabled the estimates and takes no further action. That is the matter that is before me. I have to examine the question of the absence of a recommendation. I do not have in front of me any statement by the President of the Treasury Board that he does not recommend these estimates to the House of Commons; I simply have his declaration that he takes no further action. That is the point I have to decide.

The estimates have been tabled. The President of the Treasury Board has simply tabled the estimates and says nothing further. That was his declaration in response to the point of order. That is the situation I have to consider.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when you are looking into this matter, would you examine the record to find out whether the president of the treasury board in the last government went any further than the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) did today? My recollection is that all that is ever said by the President of the Treasury Board when he is tabling the estimates is that he has a message from the Governor General signed in his own hand. I do not see that anything different happened this morning than has happened in the past.

Mr. MacEachen: We asked him a question.

Mr. Speaker: Tabling of documents.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Trudeau) (p. 37), and of the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Broadbent) (p. 47).

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy), I must add a few words to reaffirm the intention of the House concerning the situation which we discussed yesterday. On that occasion, I made some remarks about the decision made by the House Tuesday afternoon. To me, the situation is unchanged.

[English]

I want to express careful concern here so that the circumstances be well understood. In my opinion, the precedents which have been cited by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) are very important. As I said to him and to his colleagues, in my view the vote in the House on Tuesday stands between me and those precedents. Because of the language used in that debate on Tuesday afternoon, I have to regard it as binding upon me as a declaration of the House up to this point. I have, therefore, said I am bound by that. As a result of being bound by that, I recognized another government member in the course of the debate. I do not change that decision.

I am concerned, however, and I sense that perhaps other members may be concerned, that we are dealing here with a matter of extreme importance and of a very fundamental nature respecting the position of parties and elected members in the House, and that is therefore fundamental to our democracy and our whole parliamentary system. We are dealing with it on the basis of a decision which may have the appearance of having been taken for some other purpose. We are relying, in other words, on a decision upon a motion for representation on a striking committee to come to a conclusion which affects the status of a party in the House of Commons.

I have said that I see no other alternative but for the Chair to be bound by that decision. Again, I say I do not change that position. I do not have the power, by any means, to change that decision or to reflect in any way on the decision of the House. I want to bring to the attention of the House, however, a similar situation which occurred in 1963 and the action that the House took at that time. There is in the Journals of the House a rather thorough treatment of the subject by the very distinguished Speaker at that time. This appears at page 385 of the Journals for 1963. That decision goes into the definition of parties as defined by Burke in the classic quotations that were referred to in defence of the position of minority parties in the House of Commons. The Speaker at that time suggested to the House that, without prejudice to the status quo at the moment, the matter might be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for examination. I do not have the authority to do that; only the House can decide to do that.

I leave with the House the suggestion that, while we recognize the leader today, the hon. member for Beauce, I am doing so without prejudice to the decision I took yesterday to recognize the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) who does not find it convenient to proceed at this time: I do it in those circumstances. I cannot say to the House, "Please reflect on the decision that you took on Tuesday". That is not the purpose. I cannot change that; that is not the purpose, either.

It may be there is a consensus in the House, and if we are going to deal with the question that touches on the status of a party in the House, we might deal with it directly rather than indirectly, because it is a very important question.

Since some of the rationale in this decision seems to me to recommend itself on the very important and substantive grounds about the position of parties and minority parties in the House, I would invite all hon. members concerned to study the reasoning behind the decision of 1963 simply to determine whether the matter might be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. This committee can examine the status of a party, report back to the House its findings with respect to that status, what the party should enjoy, what it should not, and what requirements would be. That would enable the House to deal directly with a problem which seems to me it has only been dealing with indirectly.

I leave that suggestion with the House. Nothing has changed; the situation remains the same. The hon. member for Beauce will speak in ten minutes.

As I said, the situation remains exactly as I described it yesterday. In the interim, I ask the House to consider the possibility of agreeing to make a reference to a committee so the matter can be studied and this decision examined. Members of all parties can make their representations. Then, upon receiving the report of the committee, the House can deal with this very important problem in a direct way and make its declarations directly, rather than in the indirect manner in which we now seem to be dealing with this rather important problem.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, with respect to your suggestion, it is a matter that I am prepared to take under advisement. As you so very clearly put it, it is a suggestion, and I am prepared to agree. I want to consult my colleagues concerning it, but it is a matter I will be prepared to consider.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, like the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Baker), I would like to indicate our interest in examining your suggestions. It may be that the House will want to act at some future time in having the matter referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. In the meantime, as you have indicated, the status quo is maintained, which we understand to be the decision of the House as interpreted by the Chair yesterday—an interpretation with which we agreed. We have no objection, now that the principle has been established and in light of the fact that the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), who was recognized yesterday and who is not in the House today, that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) be given the floor in the normal course. The principle has been established, and until it is changed we in this party propose to operate on that principle. We thank you for your suggestion.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too are prepared to consider and, indeed, to consider favourably the suggestion you have made for a reference to a committee.

In effect, what you are suggesting is that the various aspects of what it means to be a group or a party in this House be considered separately, rather than assuming that one motion settles all the facets of the matter. We think that is worth while. We are prepared to enter into such discussions with the other House leaders for the purpose of considering a committee reference. In the meantime, we are pleased that the present issue is being settled amicably and that we shall now hear from the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy).

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few brief remarks on the subject under consideration. Yesterday I spoke of the dignity of Parliament, but I stayed up quite late, and tried to get to the bottom of things: the first principle mentioned in Beauchesne is that of parliamentary law. I simply want to read two sentences.

The principles that lie at the basis of English parliamentary law have always been kept steadily in view by the Canadian Parliament; these are: to protect a minority and restrain the improvidence or tyranny of a majority.

So today everybody seems more understanding and in your wisdom, Mr. Speaker, you have made a suggestion which seems acceptable, namely that the whole question be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in the light of the information you have provided and with reference to a ruling made in 1963. I am therefore led to believe that we shall proceed as usual and I feel that this solution will promote harmony and allow Parliament to operate normally and efficiently.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker).

APPENDIX TO HANSARD—LIST OF MEASURES TABLED THIS DAY

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I tabled a few minutes ago a list of legislation, in both official languages, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2). I neglected to ask the House whether, for easy reference, it would be appropriate to have it appended to Hansard of this day. I ask now if that could be done.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed and so ordered.

[Editor's Note: For above list, see Appendix.]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. Speaker: I just wish to pay tribute to my distinguished predecessor, Speaker Alan Macnaughton, for the excellent reasoning of 1963 which I have commended to the House for consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for recognizing me at this time. There is no doubt, anyway, that because this is my maiden speech in the House, my colleagues of the House have looked forward to it for a long time.

Mr. Speaker, words of welcome were addressed to the new hon. members which made me very happy; I want to thank those who expressed their welcome in my behalf though I must say that, as far as I am concerned, I had a feeling, at one point, that the words of welcome took on a slightly different tone.

That having been said, Mr. Speaker, allow me first of all to congratulate you most sincerely on your appointment to the very important office which presiding over the business of the House constitutes. The experience acquired in that post over the last few years and the way in which you assumed that important role have made of you a man of high repute who has deserved the trust and esteem of all his colleagues on both sides of the House. I want to assure you of my wholehearted co-operation in ensuring that our parliamentary business is performed in an orderly and dignified fashion, in the better interest of our fellow-citizens, and with the utmost respect for our parliamentary institution.

Mr. Speaker, please also allow me to pay tribute to and thank, as I should, the voters, men and women of Beauce for the confidence they have shown me once again, because after having given me three mandates to the Quebec National Assembly, the Beauce riding electors did not hesitate to give me a first mandate to the House of Commons and this with a sweeping majority.

That is to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am well aware of the resulting responsibilities and that I intend to assume them fully with my modest means, in close co-operation with my fellow members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, yet remembering that my predecessors, Mr. Réal Caouette and Mr. André Fortin, have always been equal to their task. I would be remiss were I not to take this privileged occasion to congratulate my colleagues from Abitibi (Mr. Caouette), Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), Rimouski (Mr. Allard), and Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) who did well in keeping the confidence of their electors. Their political beliefs, their tenacity, it should be mentioned, as well as their loyalty and their almost limitless devotion to duty have succeeded in triumphing once again over the electoral machine of the traditional political groups. The dean of our group, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), who has been a member of parliament since 1962 and who acted as leader of our parliamentary wing until last May 22 deserves all our consideration.

Finally, I want to thank most sincerely the half million voters who gave us their support at the last election and who allowed our party to rank second in Quebec. For us, that is the promise of a great future. It is appropriate, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this Thirty-first Parliament, to congratulate the new Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Clark) for his victory at the last May 22 election. It certainly takes an extraordinary capacity to succeed in co-ordinating the forces of that party whose history was too often made of disputes and divisions.

I also thank the former prime minister who is now leader of the loyal opposition of Her Majesty and who unfortunately is not here, for having occupied with dignity and courage during so many years the high functions of government leader. I wish to pay tribute as well to the new Governor General of this country and to his wife for assuming with vigour and integrity the heavy responsibility as ultimate guardian of our traditions and institutions. He will know how to use, I am convinced, his exclusive and reserved right to be advised, to advise and to recommend.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with deep emotion to the reading of the government program for this session. The speech was well drafted, from the handicapped to the youth, from energy to the merchant navy, not to mention the traditional new vision: everything was there. The one thing missing was their undertaking to lower taxes. But in that respect, Mr. Speaker, I suspect the government is keeping this issue for the budget speech. To proceed with a good analysis of that speech, we must compare it with the present economic situation in this country. The actual situation in fact amounts to an understanding of two basic mathematical operations.

During the last ten years, unemployment has doubled. Bureaucrats have doubled and the public debt has quadrupled. We have seen productivity divided by two, same thing for the growth rate, the rate of inflation was multiplied by two as was the number of man-days lost due to strikes, public expenses were multiplied by four and the deficit of our trade balance was multiplied by ten. Whichever way you size up our economic performance, Mr. Speaker, the outlook is bleak. Yet, after having listened to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday and to the questions put by members of the official opposition yesterday and this morning, in my opinion we are forgetting very rapidly that in the last 60 years this country had some 50 years of Liberal government; the last 11 years with the Liberals gave us the bad economic situation we now have. In those 60 years, the Conservative party governed Canada for barely ten years. We have to acknowledge reality, Mr. Speaker, and we should not duck away from it; we will have to work with sincerity and determination. We will have to act with straightforwardness and loyalty, and say things as they are.

In an international economy, characterized by a lack of resources, we have achieved a feat, here in Canada, that is of constantly decreasing the standard of living of our fellow Canadians, and this, Mr. Speaker, in a country which has the largest reservoir of resources in the world. That is one of the economic aspects which best depicts the present situation.

Considering that Canada is one of the countries with the largest debt in the world, that Canada is the only one among industrialized countries in the international context which has to borrow to pay the interests on its debt, that during the last ten years, the proportion of our exports of raw materials has risen, and that we have to borrow to be able to restore the balance of payments, when one considers all of these things, Mr. Speaker, it is a sign that we live in difficult times. It is not without reason that a few strove to shift the interests of the nation towards other problems, at a time when the national economy is on the brink of bankruptcy.

It is normal to see scapegoats popping up and that is how I consider all those appeals to national unity, particularly when I realize that those who make them did everything they could to create the problems. Divide and rule, they said, and you see the result.

On the political level, we inherit a country that suffered from a slow but progressive erosion of its civil liberties. Newspapers reported peculiar rumours about thefts, illegal entries, property destruction but no one took the trouble to dig up those incidents. A foggy notion of national unity, never defined but supporting an incompetent power, has been used as an excuse. The greatest victory of men, the fact that "those who wield power cannot do so without the assent of their peers" is a famous historic saying. The feeling that "those who wield power cannot do so without the assent of their peers" had simply been thrown away!

Thomas Jefferson said, during the discussions on the drafting of Virginia's statutes: "To force people to contribute their money to the propagation of an ideology which is not theirs is, to me, an act of tyranny".

What is happening? Crown corporations, states monopolies, private monopolies are subscribing enormous amounts for the referendum battle; apparently, a secretariat has been organized with public funds. Nobody protested or worried about it. However, Jefferson was very clear. There was and there still is an erosion of our most basic liberties.

This phenomenon is such, Mr. Speaker, that some hon. members in this House have interpreted—and I do say "interpreted"—our absence from the striking committee as the non-existence of our party, an absence due to a change to the rules of the House following a mere proposal. No parliamentary procedure expert realized that without unanimous consent, a notion which exists in all parliaments—and the federal parliament remains the best guardian of the British parliamentary traditions—that without unanimous consent, the Standing Orders have been contravened, and I refer hon. members to pages 7153 and 7154 of the Hansard of June 28, 1977.

However, the only ones concerned were Social Crediters who, it must be said, gathered all their votes in Quebec and, in so doing, obtained more votes than there were voters in six other provinces. By bringing in more than 513,000 ballots in the province of Quebec, members of the Social Credit Party of Canada obtained more votes than the total of votes in Nova Scotia where 11 members of Parliament were elected democratically. The members of the Social Credit Party of Canada obtained more votes than the total of the votes in New Brunswick, which added up to 337,000 and which resulted in the democratic election of 11 members of Parliament. The Social Credit Party of Canada obtained as many votes in Quebec alone as the total of the popular vote in Manitoba. With 513,000 votes in Manitoba, 14 members of Parliament were elected democratically.

I could go even further and talk about Prince Edward Island, and also about Saskatchewan, where 489,000 votes elected fourteen members to the House of Commons, that is fewer votes than the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada obtained. In the case of Newfoundland, the figure is 201,000. Let us make a quick mathematical operation. I have taken the liberty to do so since this seems to be the popular thing to do these days. Therefore, if we divide the total of the votes obtained by the Progressive Conservative Party by the number of Progressive Conservative members, we find that each member of this minority party—as we know that no party holds a majority in this House—represents 32,000 voters who exercised their right to vote. As for the Liberals, they represent in the House of Commons an average of 40,000 votes.

An hon. Member: That is a lot!

Mr. Roy (Beauce): It is a little better. The members of the New Democratic Party represent in the House of Commons 78,800 votes each. However, the five members of the Social Credit Party of Canada each represent 105,000 votes. Mr. Speaker, that is 330 per cent more than what each Conservative member represents in the House. Were we to calculate the proportional representation of the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada in relation to the vote obtained by the Conservative members, we would be entitled to 16 members in the House instead of five. Nobody would then question the recognition of our party or the privileges which it should obtain. If I did the same calculation with the votes given to the Liberal members, we would get 13 members in the House. This is a higher number than the one mentioned in the only provision on political parties granting an additional allowance to the party leader. Mr. Speaker, one must be careful when attempting to regulate democracy. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the House since it is one o'clock.

[Mr. Roy (Beauce).]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

● (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): When the House took recess for the lunch break, Mr. Speaker, I had just started to deal with something I consider of utmost importance because it relates to our civil liberties. As a matter of fact, our civil liberties have been so much trampled on that we do not realize the extent of their erosion. Since when, in Canada, does Parliament have the authority to rule on the existence of parties in the House? When, before today, did Parliament ever assume this right? Never. But the climate is such that it dares do so. This is a serious matter and gives one food for thought.

Before his appointment to the American Senate, Senator Irwin had been chief justice of the supreme court of his state. He had been one of the first American judges to have a convicted murderer released because he had felt that the rules of procedure had not been adhered to and the accused's rights respected. In support of his action, he had stated that what really matters is not the final verdict rendered in a criminal case but the way this verdict came about, for it reflects on civilization as a whole.

What matters here is not the existence of two, three, four or five political parties, but the right of the people to join them. One party more or less is of no consequence, but the manner in which it appears or disappears bears witness to the depth and value of our democratic liberties. And what is the first principle of the parliamentary right? It is to protect the minorities in the House against all possible abuses from the majority. That is the situation in which we find ourselves today, where attempts are made against the political choice of the people.

Mr. Speaker, in our political system the fact that five, six or twenty members of the Social Credit Party of Canada sit in the House is basically a transitory phenomenon on the political level, just as it is for 60, 80 or 120 members of the Progressive Conservative Party, but the way these five, six or ten members of the Social Credit party are treated in the House is concrete evidence of the respect and consideration the government has for the right of the people to elect their own representatives. The fact that the Progressive Conservative Party acted that way in this affair came as no surprise since it has always despised the Quebec voters and still does. This is certainly unfortunate but needs not be proven any more. The fact that no Liberal noticed anything is just an exchange of courtesies.

I am upset and concerned to see the reaction of the New Democratic Party which, for some years now, has been sitting next to us as a third party. I can still hear the warnings given by that exceptional parliamentarian, Mr. John Diefenbaker. In 1958, after his overwhelming victory, he recommended that a member from the CCF should sit on the select committee although it only had eight representatives in the House. And I want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) because he is not merely a New Democrat, he is a democrat. Socially speaking, Mr. Speaker, our country is divided region against region, province against province, Francophones against Anglophones. And in the last years they even managed to exacerbate the tensions among those who first settled here.

And these are not the only problems. In the area of technology and science, Canada is one of the countries which depend most on the importation of knowledge in order to progress. Once we become aware of the direct impact of higher productivity on the growth of the gross national product and once we know that higher productivity is directly proportional to the increases in scientific knowledge and technical know-how, then we suddenly realize that two American companies, IBM and GM, are spending more on research and development than we do in Canada at any level, either private or public.

Mr. Speaker, that is the situation in the social, political and scientific fields. Such is the state of our country. A country showing a deficit in every aspect, facing bankruptcy, socially divided, depending on other countries for technology and capital, a country where basic liberties are gradually eroded. We must analyse the government program with this situation in mind.

The speech is not moving any more. It is unfortunately poor, sad and meaningless. It is in keeping with the preceding attitude—talk problems away and try to solve everything through another series of programs. It is a mistake, for the problem is internal. It is through what was omitted that this speech is important. In the economic field, where the government has the budgetary, fiscal and monetary powers, we might rightly have expected a policy presenting the phases of the Canadian takeover of our country. We might have expected a policy establishing phase by phase and sector by sector the withdrawal of this intrusive bureaucratic government which in trying to solve every problem is depriving us of everthing. We might have justly expected a fiscal policy providing for more justice and the sharing of government revenue sources, a less backward fiscal structure, the abolition of the fiscal privileges enjoyed by the rich people.

Mr. Speaker, during the last 10 years the portion of fiscal revenues paid by corporations has constantly diminished and the portion paid by individuals continually increased. Knowing the strictly regressive nature of the fiscal system for individuals in this country, a change would certainly have been appreciated. When we realize that the monetary policies favour only the great lending institutions, we can see who is really governing, who has the real powers. Are the powers vested in this House, in the Canadian Parliament, or have they been transferred to some other authorities? We will be able to check within the next few days, few weeks or few months where is the real power in the country, and to know whether those who have been elected by the people have the real power or if those who had the power in the past have handed it over to others.

We would have liked to hear at least one political statement announcing some measures against inflation, this scourge of modern society which is extraordinarily profitable to banks and other loan companies which always benefit from indexation. On the question of energy, Mr. Speaker, we would have liked to hear whether the government is going to follow the tripartite recommendations following the studies made on the tidal power program of the Bay of Fundy and is ready to give impetus to the building of a tidal power station generating electricity in the maritimes in order to reduce the cost of petroleum and dependence on it as a source of energy in this important area of the country. We would have liked to hear that they were going to launch an important study on the fantastic energetic potential of the Mackenzie Valley, so that the western provinces do not depend any more on petroleum and gas for their primary energy, as these are non-renewable hydrocarbons which have an efficiency of 38 to 40 per cent only.

We would have liked to hear that they are ready to study the possibility of finding replacement energy sources other than petroleum, electricity or methanol, which are needed for our transport in order to reduce our oil consumption by 50 per cent.

But no, nothing—a collection of used clichés repeated ad infinitum as if isolating ourselves from the reality of those problems in a distorted price structure by repeating the same pious wishes was very simply going to exorcize them. I heard the Liberal party talk about Petro-Canada as if Petro-Canada was supposed to be the energy policy, as if only a government corporation was to be the energy policy in itself. May we be permitted to ask ourselves serious questions about the seriousness of such statements and assertions.

Mr. Speaker, in the political area where liberties are flouted, in a political context where institutions are being questioned in their very foundations, the government does not announce anything. Not even intentions. As to the liberty of access to information legislation the least we can expect is that it will at least match the one that exists in the country to the south.

We would also have expected the electoral respect for rights and liberties to be maintained because that is the measure of a country. That is, Mr. Speaker, the price this country is starting to pay for the erosion of the liberties that characterize our society.

I strongly urge this government to reflect on this question—it is easy for them. They only have to read over the speeches of their former leader, that great advocate of liberties, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. And with respect to relations between provinces, regions or with the various groups in this country, we would have expected to see new measures. After the aggressivity and the confrontation of the former Liberal government we get silence. We need a clear statement of the manifest intention to stand by the rights and liberties of people, groups, cultures so as to eliminate in this country politicians who live on our national and cultural, economic and social differences, those merchants of equality who are only sowers of economic ruins, budget and trade deficits and bureaucratic controls.

I am concerned about the silence in the speech in this respect. I hope this is not an indication on the part of the government that it has managed to appropriate too, after others, the theme of some "national unity" as a palliative to the real problems, a cure-all to incompetence, as a way of getting power, with only the forms being different. In the scientific and technical area, we would have also expected a specific statement indicating what percentage of the GNP would go to research and development. But again, nothing on this subject. There should be a desire to capitalize on our specific assets, a concern to develop and to further the knowledge and the technology in areas where we have a natural advantage stemming from the very nature of our country, its size and its resources, program aimed at making us world leaders in the following areas: transport and communications, petrochemistry, forestry biomass, oceans and fisheries, food industry, mining technology, electro-metallurgy and electrochemistry.

Mr. Speaker, I realize, to my great surprise, that I am a citizen of the second largest country in the world, with the biggest per capita reservoir of natural, agricultural and marine resources in the world, and that the major leaders of this country are either politicians without any vision or impostors trumpeting that ever foggy notion of "national unity". I have to admit that this narrow vision has now touched upon the domain of external affairs, which was not the case before, and I compliment the previous government for this. I am forced to admit that our foreign policy in regions as important as the Middle East is determined by electoral considerations. We are about to discard thirty years of patient diplomatic work in these countries. I am forced to see and to deplore that the aid we will be providing to poorer countries will be based on criteria of profitability. Mr. Speaker, one can measure the greatness of a man or a nation by its attitude toward the poor and the weak. The recent policy statements made by the present government are a sad thing. We are going backwards. Smallness is becoming a virtue in the second largest country in the world.

[Mr. Roy (Beauce).]

Before ending my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word on the amendment motion submitted by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). We have made known and repeated our position on this precise point. We have even made public, on September 9, the document in which it is clearly explained. We said, and I am referring to the news release, the official document of our party, dated September 6, that Petro-Canada would have played its role in the negotiations with the producing countries if it had become necessary. It was our position at the time. We will not discuss it again. But I would like to add that before doing anything with Petro-Canada, the new government will have to give us a complete statement on its energy policy. On this subject, after extensive discussion and consideration, the members of my party have adopted this attitude which we do not intend to change. Before anything is done with Petro-Canada, we will have to know in precise terms the energy policy of the present government.

Mr. Speaker, it is not too late to make a wise decision and to develop the means. I am almost finished, Mr. Speaker, if I may ask for one more minute—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The easiest way would probably be to obtain unanimous consent; I am sure that hon. members will allow the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) to finish his remarks.

Will the House allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Beauce has the floor.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will be brief and that is no electoral promise.

Mr. Speaker, it is never too late to take good decisions and to formulate efficient and drastic measures. It is very important to take up the future's challenge and that is why, in concluding my first speech in the House, I call on parliamentarians of all parties, and particularly on those who bear the responsibility of governing the country, to act with statesmanship. Mr. Speaker, you can count on my collaboration and on that of my colleagues of the Social Credit party. We are determined to fight and to work towards the achievement of a political ideal which will enable all the inhabitants of this great country to benefit from an economy of abundance in the greatest respect of their dignity and freedom.

[English]

Mr. Bill Wightman (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me so early after the speeches by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I am grateful, albeit a little awed, to follow those distinguished parliamentarians. May I also thank the Prime Minister for his expression of confidence in naming me Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour.

Some weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, I took the opportunity to tell you in a personal way how, as a member of the televiewing audience, I had come to admire the manner in which you perceived and discharged your responsibilities as Speaker of the previous Parliament. Today, as a new and untried member of Parliament, I am pleased to have this opportunity to express those same sentiments both formally and publicly.

The tenor of your opening remarks reflected the kind consideration extended to new members by all members of the House of Commons staff, and however long any of us are permitted to serve here I trust we will never forget the importance of the role played by those good people.

You have reminded us in the House of your dependency on the good will and support of all members. I would want my first undertaking as a parliamentarian to be in the form of an assurance to you that I will endeavour to meet the standards you have outlined. Should I falter I have no doubt that you will correct me, and I only hope that any faltering on my part will not belie my fundamental respect for all members of this House. Neophyte that I am, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the mutual respect we must have for one another in this House flows from the fact that, regardless of political affiliation, we have a strong common bond drawn from the fact that each of us is privileged to represent a constituency of fine people whom God has blessed with Canadian citizenship or Canadian residency.

Perhaps those outside Canada would wonder why we are loath to refer to anyone as a "typical Canadian". As Canadians speaking one to another our reluctance needs no verbalization, because to be a Canadian is to be aware of the wondrous diversity of this land and of our quiet pride in it. The concept of mon pays and, indeed, notre pays, is central to what differentiates us from the rest of the world.

I was pleased by the manner in which the throne speech made reference to the many communities in Canada. The prior concerns of the people of Scarborough West are for their homes and families, and rightfully so, for the home and family constitute the basic building block of any society. It is understandable, too, that their next concern should be for the immediate community, for it is in that context that most of the day to day relationships with others are experienced. However, sir, let no one misguidedly think that the people I represent lack a sense of that larger community which is Canada, and let no one be mistaken as to their love for Canada and all of its citizens.

That underlying love and concern for the nation always comes through in my conversations with the people of Scarborough West, irrespective of the issues we may be discussing or the mood of that discussion. The issue may seemingly be local, such as with railway grade separation, but the underlying concern is for the safety of our children. The issue may be the erosion of the Scarborough bluffs, which also is seemingly local, but the concern is for the preservation of the natural beauty of this country as well as for the very real threat that is posed to the homes of some of our people.

In Scarborough West the idea of government encouraging individuals to decide for themselves the direction their lives should take is welcomed, as are the attempts by the federal government to create an environment which is most appropriate to the achievement of those goals. If it be dogmatic to hold to the belief that this is the proper function of government, then so be it. Put me down as a dogmatist.

Let me for a moment, if I may, relate the concepts of the less pervasive role for government and of enabling people to realize their own aspirations, and let me relate those concepts to the field of labour-management relations.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I was surprised yesterday when the Leader of the New Democratic Party concluded a 40-minute address without having made reference to the Canadian Labour Congress or the Public Service Alliance of Canada from which his party draws heavily for its financial support. Nor do I recall specific reference to the working people of Canada, who comprise a constituency for whom he sometimes purports to be the sole spokesman.

Before my entry into politics I had the intense satisfaction of working co-operatively with the president of the Canadian Labour Congress, the executive committee of the congress, and the executive council of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in an effort to identify some of the areas wherein representatives of organized labour and management could find agreement. Everyone involved in the exercise took a realistic attitude born out of personal experience. We were under no illusions as to how much we could expect to accomplish. By the same token we were convinced it was in the national interest for us to put aside temporarily those issues wherein agreement was unlikely to be found and, instead, focus our attention and energies on those issues, or portions of issues, where agreement was likely. It was our hope that we might assist the Government of Canada in its policy-making decisions by identifying for the government these areas of common ground.

The result of that effort was a submission to the then prime minister of Canada, now the Leader of the Opposition, signed jointly by the presidents of those two organizations. To our knowledge it was the first time in the history of the CLC and the CMA that a joint submission was made to the Government of Canada. The points made in that submission might have seemed unimportant or insignificant to some, but they were of consequence to the authors, and of even greater consequence, in our view, was the fact that a common understanding had been reached irrespective of the import of the specific issues. The fact that the specific recommendations were in large part ignored was not as disheartening as the lack of encouragement for our efforts.

The throne speech emphasizes the fact that this government is committed to consultation rather than confrontation. I see in the totality of the throne speech a thrust which recognizes that consultation, to be productive, must take many forms. One of the most important forms could be bilateral discussions between organized labour and management if it is the will of the parties of interest to enter into such discussions. I would want to emphasize the latter part of that statement because labour and management in Canada should understand that if they decide to take such an initiative the government will view its proper role as being to facilitate their efforts, not to dictate to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wightman: It seems to me that this is a time for healing in the field of labour-management relations as much as any other aspect of our national life. It is a time for recognizing the practical limitations of collective bargaining and the reality that progress may be necessarily slow. But surely on the occasion of this newly constituted government, it is also an occasion when we can start from the presumption of a clean slate in terms of the relationships between government, labour and management. I say this notwithstanding full recognition of the particular dispute going on at the Montreal port. We dare not ignore the past, but for the present it seems to me that we can start from an assumption that the parties aspire not only to the common good of Canada, but to the respect and confidence of each other. Nor is it too much to expect the parties to recognize that just as the accommodative process of collective bargaining requires mutual understanding, respect and confidence can only come about as a result of mutuality of effort.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I turn to the subject of Petro-Canada. Some of my constituents have expressed concern over the question of security of oil supply, and rightly so. Yet they have been quick to accept that the Government of Canada has every bit as much authority as Petro-Canada to deal with the question of supply. Many of them want a major Canadian oil company owned by Canadians and they want Petro-Canada kept as a strong, operative company.

If my understanding is correct, I can assure my constituents and members opposite that these are precisely the concerns which we anticipate that the task force will address and meet in the context of the report soon to be submitted to us. Moreover, the task force report notwitstanding, they are precisely among the concerns which this government will address and meet.

Given our commitment and given that these two concerns are central to the statements made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition and by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, it would appear that these concerns are being met. However, if it is the view of the opposition that Petro-Canada can only be owned by the government and not by the people of Canada, at that point we part company.

Yesterday it was suggested that on this issue the Prime Minister is marching to a non-existent drummer. I want to assure this House that on this issue, as on the range of issues dealt with in the throne speech, I hear the same beat. I march gladly and proudly with the Prime Minister of Canada, not only because I am convinced that it is in the best interest of Canadians to do so, but because I suspect that the beat we hear is not so much a drum beat as the heart beat of a nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, as the roll call of people introducing themselves into this throne speech begins to accumulate, I am very pleased that you have occupied the chair when you did so that I may be allowed some small nuance of original tact to introduce myself; and may I be the first, sir, to compliment you on your election to the position of Deputy Speaker. I know that you will provide the same kind of conscientious, careful watch over this House as does the permanent Speaker.

I must confess at this juncture to being a little nervous, having listened to the debate regarding the recognition of the Social Credit party. It brings back recurring nightmares of my previous state in life when I occupied one of the more exclusive associations, being the only Liberal in the Manitoba legislature. I can say that if the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) thought he had trouble getting recognized, he should try getting an office once in a while; then he will know that he is in real trouble. However, I do strike a sympathetic chord for his concern about the necessity of ensuring that, no matter how small the number in a party, it is in many cases the ideas and principles that one represents that counts. We in our group certainly have no hesitation or compulsion in recognizing the right of the Social Credit members to speak their minds.

I would like to pay my respects to the mover and seconder of this motion. They set a very high standard of elocution and commitment which all of us who are in the freshman class will find it difficult to measure up to. I must confess to being somewhat intrigued by the interesting discussion of the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) as he weaved in and out of a very fulsome praise for the orchard trees of the Niagara peninsula speckled throughout with fulsome praise for his leader. I do not know what position the hon. member took in the last Conservative convention, but I am not sure whether he was more in favour of the flora or the fauna in this case. I think that he was trying to send out a political signal for all of those to read.

I would also like to pay my respects to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) although he is not in his seat. He was kind enough to single me out yesterday, but probably his misguided jab is an indication of what we can expect in the future, that he is partly right and mostly wrong. He is partly right in saying that one of my ambitions as a member of this party is to be mindful of the future, but I would suggest to him that that is the golden objective of 113 Liberals. The definition of being a Liberal is to be concerned with the future.

We are not worried about how our own leader is concerned about the future but about how the leader of the government is concerned about the future. That is our concern. I would only remind the Prime Minister of the scripture that can be borrowed from the Book of Job. Being one of the few Liberals from western Canada I would remind him of the story of the messenger who came to report to Job that his cattle were stolen and his barns were burned and who said that he alone had escaped to bring the terrible news. I am one of those who escaped to tell the Prime Minister the terrible news.

May I begin by recounting a story that was fairly common in the Manitoba legislature. One of the legends that was handed down through a succession of premiers told of a defeated premier who handed his successor three envelopes, saying that he had kept the envelopes on hand for such a contingency. He told the new premier to use the envelopes very carefully at times when his government found itself in real trouble. It was not very long until that happened. When the new premier opened the first envelope it contained one simple message: "Blame the previous government." Mr. Speaker, this government is obviously in serious trouble already because it has already followed that advice.

It was not too long before that government got into trouble again. The premier opened the second envelope and found the message: "Blame the other levels of government." That seemed to be good advice and he followed it. I suggest that the new government opposite is very close to doing the same as it tries to work out an agreement on oil prices. I think we can expect to see the first minister of this land saying, within a week or two, "It is the fault of those other fellows."

It was not too long before the government in the story found itself in trouble a third time. The new premier opened the third envelope. The message was again very simple; it read: "Start preparing three envelopes." I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this government is very close to the necessity of preparing that third envelope for itself.

I had intended to follow the tradition followed by the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne debate of describing to members some of the glories and virtues of my constituency. That would be especially appropriate at this time as Winnipeg has become a favourite place to hold meetings. I am afraid that if I were to begin to describe the conditions in the province of Manitoba and my constituency, however, hon. members opposite would find the discussion a little sobering, and I would not want to depress them or shake them from their present state of euphoria.

For the last few years Manitoba has been suffering a very strange and debilitating malady called "conservative government"; in fact, some people have called it a severe case of cirrhosis of the government organ brought about by an extreme case of conservatism. Others have called it "Lyon's fanatic syndrome". The symptoms are very clear—economic anemia, stunted growth, impairment of the faculty to listen, political constipation and a lack of the will to move, to make decisions or to lead. For those who may be more clinically minded the statistics tell the story.

Since the Conservatives took over in Manitoba the province has had the lowest growth rate of any in Canada. It has lost more people in out-migration than at any time in the last 13 years. It is the only province in the country with an absolute decline in population. There has been a constant decrease in the amount of health and social services available to the poor and the elderly. This is all done in the name of this new religion that is seizing the land—this new religion called privatization, or restraint, or restructuring, or neo-conservatism—call it what you may. I had hoped that once the election was over we could quarantine that disease within the province of Manitoba. I thought that the Conservatives wanted to experiment and might damage a few provinces, but surely would not try to do that to the whole country.

During the summer there were some signs that certain ministers began to pick up that same strange fever that was all too common in Manitoba. I thought that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) had probably taken a side trip to New York and had seen the Broadway show called "Sweeney Todd" and, being very current and fashionable, had applied to himself the title of "Mad Slasher of Wellington Street". I thought this might be part of the new philosophy and new theology that we have to apply, though I felt that those erstwhile characters called "Red Tories" would prevail and be able to restrain their more exuberant right-wing colleagues. In this I was wrong, for the throne speech shows very clearly who won the day in the Conservative caucus. It is not the Progressive Conservatives; it is the regression conservatives who are running the show with this government.

This suggests a basic unwillingness to look at the issues of inequality and social injustice in this country and an equal distrust of government as a positive, effective force to right those kinds of wrongs. It is all right for them to fool around with that particular, curious malady in the provincial context, but when they begin to prescribe those same medicines on a national scale the implications become far more serious.

As I read the throne speech and listen to hon. members opposite speak on it, I am reminded of a line from the play "The Rainmaker" which dealt with the evangelical preacher who was so busy preaching what was right that he forgot what was good. That is the problem with the Conservatives in this country, Mr. Speaker; they are so busy preaching what is right that they forget what is good.

I was particularly struck by the line in the Speech from the Throne which said that we can have unity in diversity. That may be true, but I would ask the government if you can have unity in depression. Can you have unity in disparity? Can you have unity in divisiveness, because that is what the tone and content of the Speech from the Throne indicates?

The clear, underlying threat in the document before us in this debate is that this is a government that intends to govern for only part of the people—the powerful and the privileged. If you happen to be weak, this government has nothing to say to you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: There are some throw-away lines in the speech, Mr. Speaker. The government promises to study some of the problems of the aging. I think Parliament is turning into one big study session. For all their antagonism towards academics, the government seems to have a proclivity for getting back to the classroom. I suggest these studies are simply throw-aways. We do not need them. The real issue and the one they are not prepared to face is how to share economic costs and benefits among individuals and groups in this society. It is very clear from the throne speech that they are loading up the costs and limiting the benefits.

In his introduction the hon. member for Erie said that this is a government that wants to free people in order to enhance liberty. That was a high-sounding phrase but he forgot the other part of the corollary. He neglected to say that liberty also comes when you begin to knock down social and economic barriers, not build them up as has been done in the Speech from the Throne.

There are millions of people in this country who are forgotten people; they are ignored, neglected and even spurned. This government does not speak to them, Mr. Speaker; all it does is build the barriers higher and create deeper divisions.

As an example, I should like to refer to a cornerstone of their economic policy, the jewel of their proposals, the campaign springboard that swung them into victory. I refer to the mortgage credit plan. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) has said that this will benefit 3,300,000 people and give them a stake in the country. He has said that it will stimulate jobs and bring wondrous benefits. I would ask him what program benefits the other 40 per cent of the people in this country who rent accommodation. They receive no direct benefits whatsoever under this plan. If I understood the minister, he defended the program by saying: "We did not promise them anything so why should we care about them?" In other words, the whole equation of the government is that they only care about those to whom a promise was given and everyone else can be forgotten.

When we examine the housing needs in this country, Mr. Speaker, we see that the full pressure of cost is spread across the whole spectrum of society and is felt more keenly by those who are renters. Let me give some examples for members opposite. How can members of Parliament from Edmonton go back there and tell renters they are being ignored when 41 per cent of the tenants and renters in Edmonton must pay over 30 per cent of their income for accommodation and only 15 per cent of the home owners are in the same situation? For the city of Winnipeg, 39 per cent of renters pay over 30 per cent of their income for accommodation while only 12 per cent of home owners do. Now I come to the city of Toronto; 25 per cent of Toronto renters pay over 30 per cent of their income for accommodation compared to 13 per cent of home owners. By that kind of logic, if you are really trying to serve those in need you try to assist those who are in the greatest need. Obviously something has been forgotten in this plan.

Let me now look at the position of the elderly in Canada. Sixty-five per cent of the elderly own their own homes but only 6 per cent of the elderly hold a mortgage on those homes.

An hon. Member: The tax credit will help.

Mr. Axworthy: The member opposite says the tax credit is going to help. It is $67 next year. His government will be responsible for an oil price increase which will raise his heating bill by $200 to $300. That is not a very good trade, Mr. Speaker. That is what you call a Tory bargain—$60 for $300. If that is the way the pie will be cut, members over there will not be around very long.

We heard a lot about women in the throne speech. The problems of women are to be studied. But what about women who come under the mortgage credit plan? Does the government realize only 8.5 per cent of women in this country have homes with mortgages? The average income for women is only $2,300 compared to an average for a male of close to $13,000. With those figures none of them will be eligible for the full benefits of the mortgage plan.

What about the regions, Mr. Speaker? Is this a program that fits the regions equally? How can this consensus building be justified when it is found out that some provinces are treated far more unfairly than others? I want to see the first minister at his first conference explaining to the Premier of Quebec that while that province has 27 per cent of the population, only 18 per cent of the benefits are received under this great mortgage credit plan. The same thing holds true in the maritimes.

Perhaps we should talk about those who have the most serious need. I refer to the low income earners in society. For accommodation 51 per cent of senior citizens pay over 30 per cent of their income, 51 per cent of single parents pay over 30 per cent of their income, and 37 per cent of single and attached people pay over 30 per cent of their income. Those are the ones who are having trouble with housing costs.

It was not for lack of thinking. A cabinet document has been prepared by officials. They said "You can solve the problems. You can have a tax credit plan and a shelter allowance too for about the same cost". It was not for lack of proposals or prescriptions, it was for lack of commitment and lack of caring.

I have a proposal. The first minister was very kind to us all in the opposition. He said, "Come up with a good amendment; show us something that makes sense and we will accept it." I will give him something that makes sense. Let us include a shelter allowance as part of that credit plan. Let us do something for the tenants in this country. Let us do something for those in real need. Let us attach a shelter allowance to that tax credit program. Let us show how much members really care. That seems to me to be a fairly logical sentiment. It is one that we have talked about and urged upon this government. I say adopt that proposal, Mr. Speaker, and they will have our support. If they do that it will be the first time the government will show that it is not trying to divide society but instead trying to spread the benefits around.

The problem with this particular program is not only who gets immediate benefits, it is also what we are giving up for the future. The Prime Minister says he is very concerned about the future. How can he be concerned about the future when it is foreclosed? It is foreclosed by committing an expenditure of $2.3 billion or more, totally using up all discretionary income and having nothing left in the purse for any other programs. If someone comes along and says he is concerned, as many Canadians are, about the problem of safety in the streets, what does this government have to offer? Nothing. The money has been spent. Perhaps someone will come along and ask if we can do something for public transit, and we ask the question what can we do to help get better transportation in this country? But we find there is nothing left in the till. We have foreclosed the mortgage. We have spent the money. We have locked ourselves in to the commitments for the future and we have nothing left.

A commitment has been made, Mr. Speaker, and these people do not know how to get out of it. They are going to wriggle and wrangle, and in the meantime the only people they will hurt are the people in this country. To conclude on that note, if they have not gone far enough, they are designing a program that is unequal in its benefits and illogical in its economics; but they have decided to give the coup de grâce. Now they are talking about getting rid of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. They are not satisfied with simply using up all the money in housing, they are going to get rid of the very agency which the federal government has used to make sure that there are proper programs for social groups across Canada. This is all in the name not of any logical reason, but in this new theology, this new religion, in the name of privatization. You develop a certain blindness when you become so concerned about what is right that you forget what is good. There are many other examples that one could use. For instance, the cutbacks in Canada Works which has led to serious unemployment problems; the UIC cutbacks, all in the area of picking on those who are least able to defend themselves.

An hon. Member: The Liberals started it.

Mr. Axworthy: I want to spend a moment or two on what is an even more surprising betrayal, to my mind. It is surprising and perhaps ironic. It is a real betrayal of western Canada by this government. It is surprising because this has been the basis of its support for so many years. Western Canadians for their own reasons have said, "We believe the Conservatives will serve our interests". The benches are full of members from western Canada. We have had Tory MPs who have made careers out of lambasting Liberal governments for their neglect of the west. We have a very clear case now of western Canada being on the verge of a major economic breakthrough, and this government is going to pull the rug out from under its feet.

We have talked a lot in this House about the issue of Petro-Canada, but the one thing that we have not talked about is what it means to western Canadians. Petro-Canada is the largest Canadian-owned oil company. Not only is it the largest, it is the only one located in Calgary and it has 2,000 employees. All the rest of the big multinationals that members opposite are giving up are located in the east. It is the only oil firm that has invested millions in research and development of new technologies in liquefied natural gas and in drilling in the Arctic. This research and development gives western Canada the opportunity to develop new technology that can be applied throughout the world. But who is selling it off? It is those western Tories who are selling it off. They are the ones who are betraying their own region and giving up on it.

I want them to go back and explain that kind of betrayal. This is the first time the opportunity has come to develop an economic institution which has its roots, foundations and activity centred in western Canada and which can provide an enormous stimulus for various independent western Canadian businessmen. Let me give just one example. One of the rules Petro-Canada works under is that it has a 25 per cent reserve on Crown lands. Its practice in the past was to take that 25 per cent reserve and allocate it to the small independent oil exploration firms in western Canada because they could not afford the upfront money that the big multinationals could provide. They have asked those small independents to form consortiums and they give them the Crown land reserves. They are the ones who for the first time in a long while are being allowed to come into the Arctic development, the Newfoundland development and the other forms of oil development in western Canada. It is Petro-Canada that is enabling them to develop a brand new business class in western Canada. Yet this government is pulling the rug out from under their feet. We have a direct economic betrayal of the best interests of western Canada in their action on Petro-Canada, and they will pay a heavy price for that kind of betrayal.

It does not stop there. With regard to oil pricing there is a danger that one province will be set against the other over who gets the benefits from the oil price. This country cannot long survive if there is an increasing disparity between the have and have-not energy provinces. If this government allows the price of oil to go to the present world level it will pull $460 million out of the economy of my own province of Manitoba, and we cannot survive that kind of reduction. If this first minister thinks he is going to get Peter Lougheed to agree to some other distribution, he has been reading the wrong newspapers and the wrong speeches, because Mr. Lougheed has said very clearly that he is not interested in that kind of distribution. He wants the benefits to stay in one province and one province only.

The opportunities in western Canada to put that capital to work are enormous. It makes one shudder to think of the way we have allowed that money to sit idle for so many years and to think of what we could be doing to improve our transportation system, to modernize and electrify that whole transportation system in western Canada to move our grain to ports and increase the productivity of our grain resource, which will be here long after oil is gone. Yet we allow huge amounts of capital to sit idle because we are not prepared to work out agreements on proper sharing and distribution.

Mr. Lougheed says he is not interested in a resource bank and not prepared to negotiate such a proposal. We need that kind of capital to ensure that there is an opportunity for other forms of resources in western Canada to grow, prosper and flourish. I refer to hydroelectric power and water irrigation which are designed to upgrade the ability of that part of the country to make its resources work for Canada. However, we are not going to get them by the kind of shilly-shallying we have now. Someone has to take the initiative and speak for the entire country. There must be an assertion of a strong national interest because that is the best solution for westerners.

We often hear that same interesting question many of my colleagues heard in the early sixties when they were asked, "What does Quebec want?" Many eastern Canadians and central Canadians are now asking, "What do western Canadians want?" Unfortunately, all too often the answer comes back in the tones of parochialism and provincialism as expressed by provincial premiers. They mutter away about protecting. They go into a fetal crouch to protect what is theirs. However, there is not a monolithic attitude to those issues in western Canada. The premiers do not speak for all western Canadians in taking that attitude. There is a tradition of reform in western Canada, a tradition of seeking a national interest as seen in the activities of Liberal premiers like T. C. Norris in Manitoba and in the writings of John Dafoe which exemplify a sense not only of national interest but also international interest. They were not small minds with shrinking values. They did not pull themselves in. They did not engage in a form of regional narcissism wherein they looked at their own images and said what was best for them. They had a vision of how the strength and resources of regions could be used to work to the benefit of the entire country.

The Prime Minister says we should not be afraid of giving the regions too much power. No one is afraid of giving the regions too much power, but the Prime Minister, as a sometime student of history, should know that there must be a balance between the regions and the centre, and that if the pendulum swings too far, the centre folds. We are going through that very period now. There is no other federal country in the world which has allowed its regions and provinces to become so decentralized and so powerful as we have in this country. It is time to right the balance, to bring it back into equilibrium and to begin to assert that only a national government speaking with a national voice can encompass the full flow of energy and resources to work for our totality.

Provincial boundaries are too limiting for the great tasks this country needs performed. We cannot ask provincial premiers, even those who are legitimately saying that they want to serve our interests, to broaden their scope. Their constituencies are their provinces. It would try the highest values of statesmanship to say "We want you to be great friends and neighbours to the provinces three or four to the west or east of you". That is why we have a national government.

However, as we lop off and give away piece by piece the federal presence, and as we hold 40-minute meetings and blithely walk out with a little grin and say "We just gave away the offshore resources today, what can we do next?", surely we are eroding and ripping apart the ability of this federal government to speak for an entire country.

The western voice which will be heard in this House is not one of parochialism and provincialism. It will try to seek a broader national interest and represent those westerners who see things in a different way from the westerners opposite.

In closing, let me remind the House of the words of another good Liberal, John Stuart Mill, when he said that we have far more to fear from the weaknesses of our enemies than from their strengths. He said that it is the task of an opposition to challenge those weaknesses for the sake of the country. It is a welcome challenge to challenge the weaknesses of the new members opposite, and judging by what we have seen so far, it is a very big job. I can assure the House that the group on this side is up to it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to be back in an old home of mine. This is where I belong.

First, sir, I would like to commend and congratulate you as Deputy Speaker and as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. I commend and congratulate also the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) for the excellent presentations they made on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I am indeed fortunate in being able to represent Hamilton Mountain. I say this with all sincerity because I was the recipient of only 42 per cent of the popular vote. But I will tell this House and my constituents in Hamilton Mountain that I will be constant in my duties and do the best I can for the benefit of Canada in general and my constituents in particular.

As I mentioned earlier, this is not a new experience for me. I was here before, in the Twenty-ninth Parliament. However, this time I sit on the right side of the House, so it is a new experience for me in that regard.

I suppose Hamilton Mountain could be termed, in political terms at least, a swing riding, but I do not see why that should mitigate against my doing a responsible job. On the contrary, I think it makes us all the more cognizant of the mood of the peoole of our ridings and of Canadians in general.

From Mountain Lookout the visitor enjoys a scenic panorama with miles of residential and commercial development in the foreground. In the middle distance is the heavy industry of Canada, the third most important manufacturing city and the home of Canada's two largest steel mills, the whole framed by the dramatic and exciting Burlington Skyway in the background. Front and centre in Canada's golden horseshoe area, Hamilton sits at the strategic west end of Lake Ontario.

It is indeed an idyllic setting for a city. But the natural beauty also gives the city a number of geographical advantages. The advantages of location, harbour and the escarpment would shape Hamilton's commercial and industrial future. It is located at the junction of two great waterways, the United States Mohawk-Hudson and Canada's first inland highway, the St. Lawrence River.

Hamilton Bay is an ideal harbour. It is protected by a sand bar sheltering it from the rougher waters of Lake Ontario. This protective harbour saved the British Navy and perhaps Canada from the Americans during the War of 1812 when the navy slipped into the harbour. Some suggest we have a navy in Canada which is disappearing. I am sure our government will be doing something about that.

The escarpment on the mountain itself has been an asset. It was formed by glacial deposits on the receding of the ice age. The sedimentary rock of shale, sandstone and particularly limestone provided necessary raw materials for industry. With all these natural assets one might say that a city at the end of Lake Ontario was inevitable, but one would not have predicted a city with the vibrancy and diversity of Hamilton today. These geographical advantages were used by past generations of Hamiltonians to make it Canada's industrial giant, as well as the second largest city in Ontario, producing 60 per cent of the nation's steel, which in turn is responsible for Hamilton being the third largest port in terms of tonnage in Canada.

It is against such an economic backdrop that Canada's two largest steelmakers, the Steel Company of Canada and Dominion Foundries, are pushing ahead with significant increases in capacity. In 1978, Dofasco brought into production its new steel-making shop which represented at that time the largest single capital investment in that company's history. But this project, important as it was to Hamilton and to Canada, was dwarfed in an announcement by the company last week of a new mill, the construction of which is to cost $350 million. And just six months from now, Stelco will pour the first steel at its Lake Erie development, in an expansion program which is the largest single venture in the history of the Canadian steel industry. So even in these times of economic troubles I am proud to say that Hamilton, the ambitious city, is holding its own.

There were, however, problems with respect to getting help from federal governments in the past; hopefully, there will not be the same difficulty in the future. There is, for example, the question of seaway tolls so central to keeping these giants of industry expanding and keeping Canadians working. I might refer to the blatant discrimination of seaway tolls as they pertain to bulk cargo vis-à-vis general cargo. There is also the matter of a commitment made by the previous government—nothing final has yet been determined—concerning funding for an important expansion project in Hamilton harbour.

We also have an airport, of a sort, in Hamilton whose 215,000 movements a year—215,000 movements, yes—placed it seventh in the whole of Canada, ahead of Mirabel, Windsor and Winnipeg, just to mention a few. The city of Hamilton has been clamouring for the last ten years for expanded facilities, improved runways, better lighting and navigational aids. In 1973, as a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, I asked a question regarding the expansion of Hamilton airport and was told a decision would be made after the completion of environmental studies. Mr. Speaker, six years later I find they are still studying the environment. At this point we know the habitat of every bullfrog and reed in Wentworth county but still no decision has been reached. Can anyone question the attitude of some Hamiltonians who claim they work hard all year and ask where it gets them in terms of promises from government? To copy a well-known television advertisement, they get it in the back, the neck and God knows where else. Am I asking too much when I press at this point for a decision which would eliminate the atmosphere of uncertainty surrounding this extremely important project? I think not.

Hamilton, I might add, is a city destined to grow and prosper, an ambitious city. It might well be termed a city within a city, because as is the trend in most metropolitan areas many workers live in the suburbs and commute to work. Today, 30 per cent of the population live atop the escarpment, hence the term "split level city" and the name "Hamilton Mountain" for the constituency which I proudly represent. So part of the area could be described as a bedroom community for the city proper and is highly cosmopolitan, its population made up of many ethnic groups. These new Canadians, through their activities and by reason of their heritage, add colour and depth to the city's cultural fabric which does much to build a sense of co-operation and understanding among all the citizens. Hamilton is a richer community as a result and is a microcosm of Canada in this regard.

I am proud to say that Hamiltonians were in the vanguard of Canadians who contributed time, effort and money in alleviating the plight of Vietnamese refugees. As one of an earlier group of boat people I know how grateful we all are to Canada for granting the opportunity to build a new life in this great nation.

Having said this, I should like to add a few words of comment. One gets the impression at times that anything but blind acceptance of present immigration policies as they relate to refugees is to be viewed as being in poor taste. But if there are valid questions to be asked—and there are—not all of them are being asked by racist, red-necked crackpots who lack compassion for those less fortunate. There are some questions to be asked pertaining to racial balance or imbalance and I do not think they are all being asked by racist, red-necked crackpots. There are two sides to this important question and I believe each should be listened to.

On a more serious note, the possibility exists that there will no longer be a Canada to open its doors to anyone if we do not resolve our internal disputes. What does the future hold for Canada and Canadians? I listened to the former prime minister talking yesterday about famous Liberals and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) talking about Sir John A. Macdonald. I should like to go back to Georges Etienne Cartier, one of the founding fathers of confederation and a favourite of mine who, when asked what he thought was going to happen, said "We are going to build a new nation and a new nationality". Sir, Cartier meant that this country would be Canada and that the nationality would be Canadian. We cannot settle for anything less than that.

We must divorce ourselves from those who conveniently forget that Canada was created despite the great problems of geography. It has been held together for more than 100 years by the free will, determination, courage, tolerance, understanding and sacrifice of the vast majority of citizens in every province. Anyone who would seek to gain political ends by provoking one part of the country against another must accept a very grave responsibility. Surely, it is the duty of every member in this House to promote Canada as a country unrivalled in its opportunities for freedom, security, wealth and equality. I am convinced that the will and the attitude of the people of all the provinces will determine whether these two great benefits, opportunity and equality, are to be destroyed, whether our nation is to break up in separate packages. For my own part, I subscribe to the theory presented on provincial equality and national unity by A. R. Kirby, who proclaims that Quebec knows, just as all of Canada knows save for a wilfully self-blinded but influential few, that the constant placation of la belle province for these many, many years is not because of our respect for its culture, the so-called "French fact" and so on. The core of the truth is that we are scared stiff of the alternative to what we recoginize as our present Canadian unity.

I believe Quebec knows its identity and its destiny, or thinks it does, which amounts to the same thing. Some other provinces may also have reached the same point. What this country needs now is not the grovelling, snivelling, sentimental plea of appeasement which only insults the dignity of Quebeckers and tramples whatever shreds of our own dignity that remain. Instead, we need the quiet self-assurance and courage which enable us to say: "This is who we are, and this is where we are going. If you think your interests will be best served by staying with us and sharing the journey, you are welcome to be aboard. We will be happy to have you. We would be lost without you. As you see, we respect you and your wish to preserve your heritage and your cultural identity. However, if you decide to come with us, we expect reciprocal respect from you for the many languages and cultures which exist in the other provinces."

[Mr. Beattie.]

Mr. Speaker, culture should not have to be propped up to controlled. Culture, like religion, is a private matter and will survive according to the devotion of its own adherents, not by false and abrasive artifices. Thus, in genuine mutual respect we can go forward in search of a future we have voluntarily sought as partners, rather than as cohabitants unwillingly bonded only by our fears.

● (1520)

I was delighted to hear the word "individual" permeate the throne speech and to hear the word "opportunity" in the speeches of some hon. members following that. I say this because I believe "individual" and "opportunity" are the two key words in the Canadian system, a sort of Canadian ideal, if you like. In my opinion, the most beaten up word in the Canadian system is "equality", mentioned by the previous speaker. All over this country I have seen people trying to translate the word and make it mean something else. By the wildest stretch of the imagination the people who founded this country, the founders of confederation, never expected everyone to go up the ladder of success the same distance. But they must have the opportunity to go as far as the next individual, and as individuals they have the right to put their foot on the first rung of that ladder and to go as high and as far as their ability, their willingness to work and some breaks will take them. When you have that in Canada, you have guaranteed opportunity; and when you have opportunity in Canada, then you have equality.

I think that is the least we can do for our people, and I think it is important that we at least recognize that fact rather than adopt the gloomy outlook of some of the members of the opposition that this government will destroy the Canadian system in, my goodness, four months! The danger, as I see it, is that we will be unable to transmit the system to future generations, not just this government but all of us. To put it another way, the system will not fail us but some of us might fail the system.

Today our country is facing big problems, but then which country is not? Most Canadians are bewildered by these problems, used as we are to constant growth, regular productivity increases, an unlimited supply of natural resources and social benefits. But occasionally one gets the impression that those who maintain that the world owes them a living are going to win. On top of all this, everyone seems to be blaming everyone else for this turn in our fortunes. While I agree that we may be faced with difficult times ahead, I cannot see anything being gained by encouraging the growth of a feeling of defeatism. The problems that must be dealt with call for a sense of confidence, a sense of hope and a spirit of courage and determination to succeed. We must refuse to let the odd setback interfere with our long range goal of a united and prosperous Canada.

The method of achieving this goal brings me to the story of a great Canadian. I am indebted to Kenneth Bagnell for this story. In one of Pierre Berton's recent and vivid books "My Country" there is a story of Samuel Hearne, from the same province as the former speaker, a man whose life was filled with risk, who stands in contrast to the mood of many people of our own generation who seem given more and more to caution, hesitation and second thoughts. Hearne was a magnificent risk taker. In 1769 when he was 24 years old, he set out on foot on a trek of 4,000 miles across the hard and lonely land from northern Manitoba to the shores of the western Arctic in search of a fabled copper mine. Hearne was almost completely inexperienced. Along the way he was robbed once, he had to turn back twice, and toward the end of the expedition he witnessed a massacre of helpless Eskimos. In the end there was no copper mine. His journey took seven years 24 months and seven days. He managed to produce, despite the ordeal, a journal en route that is a classic to this day. Hearne's real contribution, writes Berton—

—was his close and accurate description of the Chipewyan and Dogrib Indians, the flora and fauna of the country through which he travelled and his willingness to adapt to native ways, which set the pattern of Arctic survival for generations.

It is obvious that the days of that special kind of risk, one man pitted against the elements, have passed into history. But in recent years, among many of our people there seems to be a growing awareness of risk of any kind. With few exceptions, our generation is making a high virtue out of caution. Some who recognize this claim that it has grown out of despair, specifically American despair brought on by the assassination of leaders, the ordeal of Vietnam and the disgrace of Watergate. That gloom, I suggest, has touched all of us, for if the morale of such a close neighbour is lowered, it is natural that our own will be affected.

The causes for the timidity around us, however, lie beyond the recent American past; they are historic and worldwide. They may be the result of a century that has been disappointing, of wars that were futile, alliances that were doomed and dreams of world brotherhood that did not materialize. Beyond these, there has been a disappointment in science which has not cured all our ills, in education which has not solved all our problems, in political promises made but not fulfilled. This series of frustrations, one after the other, has created a climate in which it is easy to retreat, to lose the willingness to venture.

It is not hard to find reasons for prudence, to set aside the old maxim "nothing ventured, nothing gained" and to replace it with another which sounds just as wise, "nothing ventured, nothing lost". This passive and defensive mood is reflected, in some ways at least, in the growing trust we give to the opinions of people we call futurists, recent professionals, often commanding large fees, who tell us what lies ahead, so that the risk of experiment and adventure are diminished.

Now, in the field of economics in which issues are growing more and more complex this care may be necessary and wise, but when it becomes the philosophy by which people live so that courage is replaced by caution and energy by inertia, then life is lessened and generations to come are defrauded. Some of the hesitation about making a bold decision or setting upon a new course arises out of a fear that we may make the wrong decision or take the undesired course. While this may be a natural inclination, it is nonetheless weak. Too many of our organizations, business, labour and government, are kept from reaching their high ambitions because within them are men and women who, when called upon to make an adventuresome decision, waver because they are frightened of being wrong. They misunderstand.

Thomas Edison, it is said, once experimented over many months without success. Someone working alongside him sympathized, saying that it was too bad to have to work so hard, so long, without results. "But", Edison said, "we have a lot of results. We now know 700 things that don't work". Samuel Hearne was sent, in one sense, on an expedition that was a mistake. There was no copper to be mined on the rim of the Arctic and the fabled Northwest Passage of which his employers dreamed was of little value. His chief findings, as Pierre Berton notes, were negative but they were nevertheless meaningful.

Nothing could be more wrong than for people to believe that the prevalent mood of retrenchment is acceptable, for the main trouble with an attitude of retreat is that it feeds on itself and becomes self-fulfilling. People who go on the defensive, whether in relation to the future of our country or the future of their own lives, find it more and more difficult to change their attitude and to take new initiative. There are people, of course, who have given up, who believe that the signs of the times are so ominous, populations exploding and habitable land decreasing, that it is naive to expect man to hold on to courage and to act in constructive and creative ways.

This, however, is not what history has shown, for in both nations and individuals the great contributions to history have always been in the midst of circumstances that were, on the surface, far from conducive. We have a choice. A discouraging time can bring paralysis or stimulus. That was clearly the case in the light of one Nathaniel Hawthorne who travelled a difficult road before he found the key to triumph. Hawthorne wrote a sentence significant for all whose dreams are temporarily at bay. He said:

An individual must keep faith in himself while the incredulous world assails him with its utter disbelief.

I have people say to me once in a while, "How do you defend taking strong stands on things and having strong convictions?" I have reached the point now of telling them that I have spent all my adult life trying to reduce my ignorance. I have gained a body of knowledge from people here and from people who have preceded me. I am not ashamed to say that occasionally I go to the source of all truths, the scriptures. I have a way of life now which kind of works and I can defend it.

● (1530)

I ask my fellow members how we are going to convince our Canadian brothers about the great equality of opportunity which exists in our country today, opportunities magnified in a united and prosperous Canada, if we do not have the courage of our own convictions. It will take courage, a special kind of courage. However, I have travelled this world and I have studied history and I can simply find no great contributions made by those of placid faith and cringing courage. Only those with abiding beliefs are the ones who look ahead of the time and make any imprint in history. We must give people something that endures.

My plea today is for us not to rob our generation of the power which comes with simple abiding belief in oneself and in one's country. The capacity for that kind of belief and courage is not something a country or its leaders can set in motion, the way it can set in motion controls upon wages and prices. Our people must be encouraged to rediscover their natural gifts, their human gifts and their true potential, realizing at the same time that there is no heavier burden than a great potential. Also they can be asked to remember that their country has achieved its character in the face of great odds and continues in spite of great difficulties, and they can be reminded from time to time of their abiding strength.

Donald Alexander Smith who drove the last spike on the CPR said:

> Canadians have always stood for courage and unconquerability. They have the muscle, the wholesomeness of life, the strength of will.

It should be clear to all of us that we have already entered into Canada's most critical period. The wisest among us cannot predict the outcome, but we know we have the resource to face it and to see it through in constructive ways. What all our people need now is a renewal of our confidence in the human spirit and its reach. In the end that may matter more than anything else. Mr. Wilfred Grenfell said the following:

> It is courage the world needs, not infallibility. Courage is always the surest wisdom.

Like enthusiasm it is contagious. It must be kept on display. But we cannot kindle the fire of courage and enthusiasm in the heart of another human being unless it burns brightly within our own. That fire burns in our bellies or we would not be here. It is transferable. We must reach the hearts and the minds of people who would despair in the sordidness and cynicism of our times, individuals who look to us for help, leadership and a display of courage which will keep this great country of Canada united and prosperous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset to extend to you my sincere congratulations for your nomination. The fact that hon. members designated you a second time to sit in the chair in spite of the present circumstances is a proof of your impartiality, efficiency and wisdom. I also want to congratulate the two movers of the address and assure the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) that as a part of a new generation of members of the House, I am just like him dedicated to keeping the country united and strong.

It is a privilege and a great honour for me to make this first speech in the name of the people of the riding of Shefford who, after having been represented for more than 11 years by a member of the Social Credit Party of Canada, have come back to their long time Liberal tradition. I hope that this tradition will be kept for many years. Following the footsteps of parliamentarians like Huntington, Parmelee, Boivin, Leclerc and Neveu is for me a very important challenge and I hope I will take it up successfully.

Let me thank most heartfully my constituents of Shefford for the confidence they have put in me, and I want to assure them of my most assiduous devotion and of my determination to defend their interests in the House. According to the tradition, when a new member of parliament makes his maiden speech in this House, he does his best to describe the beauty and the charm of his constituency. I would like to describe the beauty of the eastern townships, but since that beauty cannot be described, I would rather invite my colleagues to come and visit our beautiful region. If we consider the numerous visits that the new Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) made to our region in the last two years, we must conclude that the Progressive Conservatives did like my constituency but, unfortunately for them, my constituency did not like them.

To come to the Speech from the Throne, I must acknowledge that, probably because I am the youngest of all members, I was still deluding myself about the determination and the sensitivity of this new government faced with the problems which preoccupy Canadians in general and more particularly the voters in my constituency. Unfortunately, after having heard, read and read again that speech, I only feel bitterly disappointed. While the former government was called breathless, I call this one asthmatic. For me, to take over four months to prepare such a poor program of action is a sign of general weakness and asthma. As an example, I would like to recall the expectations of Canadian farmers since the May 22 election and show the inaction of this government.

Just a few days after the election, everybody was waiting impatiently for the appointment of that super minister of agriculture who was, according to what the new Prime Minister had said, to hold a very high rank within the cabinet, precisely in order to improve the status of farmers. What a disappointment it was for us to realize that the new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) was not even admitted within the closed circle of the most important cabinet ministers.

With the milk producers, I waited in vain to hear the announcement that there would be a drastic cut in cheese imports. With them, I have come to realize once again that the government does not keep its promises. With the pork producers, especially, I have been waiting for the energetic measures that were promised with a view to encouraging the sale of their products abroad. In that field, as in the others, our hopes were dashed. With the whole agricultural sector, I have been waiting for an increase in the funds allotted to research and development. There again, the government has changed its mind. Mr. Speaker, those many commitments having been betrayed, I felt sure that the government was saving the best for the Speech from the Throne. But alas! The height of deception was reached when His Excellency the Governor General failed to even mention once the word "agriculture". Let me tell you that for a party that was supposed to raise the status of agriculture, this is a very discreet way of doing so.

Worse still, the government says it is prepared to introduce in the House a bill to help settle more quickly labour disputes under federal jurisdiction, whereas current statutes do allow the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) to intervene into disputes that have been lasting for too long. I will give only one example: the dispute in the Montreal harbour. Farmers have been asking the minister to step in for many months now, but he keeps saying no and disregards their appeals. If this is how they raise the status of agriculture, then I deeply question the intentions of this government.

Mr. Speaker, although agriculture is a vital matter for the people in my riding, I would be remiss if I did not refer to other aspects of the Speech from the Throne which attracted my attention.

My age allows me to share the worry and concern of young Canadians faced by their job prospects, their future. That is why I welcome with pleasure, but also with a little reserve, the government's intention to create a youth employment secretariat. But I am afraid this could only be a new name for some old agencies. I hope the axe of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) will not prevent this new agency from playing a really efficient part in the fight against unemployment.

By refusing to earmark funds for the Canada Works program in my riding, this government has put a number of young and not so young people out of work. I hope that programs will be created as soon as possible to enable the idle but powerful hands in our society to join the labour market and thus contribute to building our country.

I am much concerned by the review of the Unemployment Insurance Act and I hope the government no longer intends to apply its discriminatory concept of variable benefits. I have already communicated my views to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) and I hope he will take them into consideration.

Industrial development is also an important issue in my region and I urge the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) not to wait for his mandate to be extended by Parliament before reviewing the delimitation of areas designated for grants. The riding of Shefford must recover its status of designated area to respond fully to the challenge launched by the Prime Minister yesterday to build our country. I consider that change so important that I asked to meet the minister responsible to explain to him in detail the validity of our representations. I hope that my request will be favourably considered.

Another significant aspect for development and employment in our area is the proposed decentralization of the cartography services of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the vicinity of Sherbrooke. That big project announced by the previous government has been shifted over to the "deferred" files in the office of the President of the Treasury Board. I speak now on behalf of my colleagues from the eastern townships to ask what this government intends to do now. I would say that I am relying now on the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. LaSalle) who holds the important office of Minister of Supply and Services, in the hands of the Progressive Conservative Party now, to inform us on the future of this project.

I also take this opportunity to comment on the now famous and unique speech of the no less unique minister of state for social programs, his address to the Fédération des clubs de l'âge d'or du Québec. Here is what he said to those people: "Our country can no longer afford to wander in the field of universal benefits and must concentrate its efforts on those who are the most in need without, however, jeopardizing its economy and the situation of those who depend on the present system."

These few words have caused much concern and insecurity among our senior citizens, because to question universal entitlement to old age security would be, in the eyes of many Canadians, a retrograde and anti-social move. I hope that the disappearance of the honorific title of this minister will result in the disappearance of this theory which would take away from Canadians the prospect of a secure future at the time of their retirement.

In closing, I join with my right hon. leader in asking the government to create a truly national spirit and to introduce programs which do not mean a shirking of all its responsibilities. Nothing in the Speech from the Throne shows the coherent vision of tomorrow's Canada that my colleagues and myself in the official opposition can offer to our fellow citizens of Quebec for the referendum. We do not believe that the Utopian feelings of this government, which can lead it to believe that there can be any spirit of co-operation between a central government and a government of secession, could promote the cause of federalism in Quebec. This attitude of neglect towards separatism will certainly be compensated by the energy and the vigour with which we, on this side of the House, intend to fight this battle.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the government party, in view of its extreme fragility, will be willing to accept a few of the suggestions made by the opposition and show some realism in the best interests of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I feel quite honoured today to make my first speech of this session. It is not my maiden speech and I guess you could say that I am a member of that small "class of '78", having arrived here about this time last year. It is a fairly short time since I made my own maiden speech. I should like to congratulate the mover of the motion before us and the seconder, as well as those other new members who have spoken on this motion in respect of the throne speech.

It is always a very significant occasion when an hon. member makes his maiden speech, at least it was when I made mine in this House. I trust that for all of those new members this will be the beginning of an interesting and rewarding career. I was going to add the word "long", but perhaps I should reserve that for members of my own party.

I should also like to congratulate those hon. members who have returned here. It is interesting to note how the composition of the House has changed. It is interesting to see different faces opposite at this time.

My comments today will present a perspective from my point of view of Atlantic Canada, with emphasis on my own riding and my own province of Newfoundland.

Before commencing those comments I should like to present my own impression of what I have witnessed in the House in the last few days, those few days the House has been in session since the election. I find it astounding that two parties have basically changed positions in the House and seem to have reversed themselves in terms of policy as well. It is incredible that the former opposition party, now the party in government, is promulgating policies and programs it criticized not more than five months ago. It is equally incredible that the party on this side of the House to my right, which was the government only five months ago, is criticizing the present government for proposing the same policies it was implementing five months ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Faour: It is perhaps a fact that I am a little naive, Mr. Speaker, being still a relatively new member, just having a little less than a year in the House under my belt. Perhaps it is naive to think that political parties are supposed to stick to their convictions. If that is naiveté, Mr. Speaker, I hope it remains with me for quite a while.

My comments today about Atlantic Canada have been prefaced by the comments of the former leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), when he stated during the election campaign that regional development would be at the very centre of national policy, whereas under the Liberals it had been given secondary importance. That is a very significant commitment by the Prime Minister to the people of Atlantic Canada. For many years we in Altantic Canada have had a problem in making our presence felt on the national scene, and certainly in making our presence felt among those in the government of the day, in spite of the fact that as members of the government, whether Liberal or Tory, there have been and are many from Atlantic Canada. Over the past years the Atlantic region has just not had a voice or input into the program and policies of government, a voice and input needed by the Atlantic region in order to make it a contributing part of this country we call Canada.

In that regard I was encouraged by what the Prime Minister said before the election, that regional development, in particular Atlantic development, would be a priority of this government. The government has only been in power for four and a half months but they have already reneged on that promise. Their record has been dismal in that time in terms of placing priority on regional development and Atlantic development in their programs. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion is supposed to be an instrument of government policy for furthering the development of the underdeveloped regions, in particular the Atlantic region. But how can the Prime Minister say that it is a priority of his government if the minister responsible for DREE is not even within the inner cabinet?

The throne speech places regional development in the forefront as a concern of the government. I do not claim that in that speech the government was listing its priorities, but it would be nice if regional development were listed as one of the five priorities of the government. But their record of the past four odd months has shown otherwise and in fact regional development is not a priority of this government. The Atlantic region can expect no more from this government than they received from the previous government.

The government has not pursued a policy of full employment. Although the Atlantic region has the highest rate of unemployment in the country, there has been no real attack on this particular problem. All that the government has proposed, and it is all that we have heard about in the media over the last four months, are cutbacks, spending restraint, privatization and so on. The government seems to feel that by spending less the unemployed in Atlantic Canada will somehow go away, that maybe they will go to some other country or another part of Canada. However, the problem will not go away just by the government wishing it away.

Positive action must be taken, but in the past four and a half months not one new job has been created by this government. There has not even been a review, a study or a royal commission formed to study the particular problems of the Atlantic region. The only review affecting the Atlantic region in particular was done by the Department of Employment and Immigration, and it was not of a positive nature. There was no review of programs to create jobs or economic development. What we had was a review of to what extent the government should further attack the unemployed in the region.

Specifically that review, that restrictive document issued by the department, called into question and asked for a review of the entitlement of seasonal workers, fishermen and others, to unemployment benefits. There was no discussion at all of jobs to alleviate the unemployment problem in a positive way. There was no discussion of what these people will do if they are disentitled to unemployment benefits, people such as workers in the fish plants and in the tourist industry. The guiding light of this government has been a slavish adherence to the dogma of "spend less". Any first-year economic student would tell them that that policy is foolish, but I will pursue that area a little later.

The government expressed its commitment to regional development in April during the election campaign, but how has this been expressed over the last few months? One needs only to look at the negative effects of their spending restraint policies since that time. As I mentioned before, the biggest problem in economic terms in Atlantic Canada is unemployment.

I have here the statistics on the unemployment rates of a few months ago. The official unemployment rate for Newfoundland was 18.8 per cent, 14.3 per cent for Prince Edward Island and 13.4 per cent for New Brunswick. If those figures are contrasted with the western provinces, for example, Alberta was at 4.9 per cent, Saskatchewan at 5.8 per cent and Ontario at an unemployment rate of 7.4 per cent. Statistics Canada confirmed what we had known all along last year when they came out with the concept of hidden unemployment. If one looks at the hidden unemployment figures for the Atlantic region, the rate jumps to 32.9 per cent in Newfoundland and 27.3 per cent in Prince Edward Island.

Those particular figures only tell part of the story. Let us look at the job availability statistics in the region. Whereas Alberta had over 64 jobs for every 100 residents age 15 and over, the maritimes average only 44 jobs. In terms of the unemployed there were nine jobs for every 100 people unemployed last year. Nothing has been done to solve the problem at all. Instead the government has embarked on another systematic attack on the unemployed.

I say "another" because the Liberal government initiated the first attack last fall. The Liberal government introduced Bill C-14 last fall, which amounted to a vicious kick to the unemployed. Present government members opposed that bill quite strongly, but where are they now? The present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) is across the way, and he said during the debate on the bill that it amounted to a kick in the gut to the unemployed. We agreed with him. At that time we were arguing the same side of the issue and we felt that priority should be given to fighting unemployment, not the unemployed. We felt that unemployment was the enemy, not those of our constituents who happened to be without jobs. They were not the enemy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faour: The government of the day looked quite inept and stupid when it tried to rationalize the changes by saying, in effect, that the unemployed were there through their own fault. I have no doubt that the present government will look just as inept and stupid when it tries to rationalize the proposals they are putting forward. We in Atlantic Canada know that people are unemployed through no fault of their own.

The Tories agreed with us last year on that point, but they do not seem to agree with us quite so strongly now that they are the government. They opposed the bill last year quite strongly. When the present minister of fisheries was merely the hon. member for St. John's East, he made this comment in the committee on labour, manpower and immigration on November 21, 1978:

> —the fact is that the damage has been done and that damage is going to result in severe injustices in areas of high unemployment, specially in the province where we come from, and that to me is the travesty of this bill.

That was the attitude of the minister last year. This year his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey), is presenting proposals in the same vein. In fact, he has enacted a portion of that bill which went unproclaimed until after the election.

Mr. Benjamin: Where are you when we need you, Jim?

An hon. Member: Fishing.

Mr. Faour: It was not only members of the NDP who opposed that bill at that time. Another member of the Tory party, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester (Mr. Coates), who was also the president of the national Tory party, said at that time that the Liberal government was attempting to tinker with the unemployment insurance scheme on the backs of the unemployed in Atlantic Canada. That was their attitude then.

After making such comments last year it would be natural to assume that this party once in power would take these views with them to that side of the House. I do not understand what it is about this side of the House. It seems that the opposition has a conscience and understanding of what the real problems are, but it seems to leave that conscience over here when it crosses the aisle. And now the new party in opposition has picked up the conscience.

Mr. Faour: It does not make any sense to me to say that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) and Bay Street are deciding policies for Atlantic Canada, where the results are absolutely tragic. After May 22 when the Tories became the government, they forgot about their concern for the unemployed in Atlantic Canada and proclaimed this very regulation that they had fought. And as if that were not bad enough, they then reviewed the entitlement of seasonal workers, fishermen and so on. No job-creation programs have been presented nor have any proposals for economic development been presented, but there have been plans to cut back on benefits for the unemployed and other underprivileged people in the country.

The Speech from the Throne referred to other cutbacks under the guise of streamlining spending. It is amazing how sweet words like "streamlining spending" can camouflage for weak minds the havoc that is wreaked on individuals by an insensitive government. Mr. Speaker, this government is dedicated to a mindless pursuit of a mindless ideology. It is obvious that it is no more a friend of the unemployed than was its predecessor. This new review will make it an even greater enemy of the unemployed.

Some hon. members opposite are from the Atlantic region and I know they appreciate the problem. Frankly, I do not understand how they can rationalize their membership in that party. Hon. members opposite from other regions of the country would do well to visit communities in Atlantic Canada to see the beauty down there, to enjoy the friendliness and hospitality of the people. At the same time they could see what this type of policy means to individual Canadians there and to the children of workers caught in this bind.

In the debate on this issue last year I said that it would mean cold homes and hungry children. Mr. Speaker, I have just completed a tour of my riding and I can see that there are going to be cold homes and hungry children this winter because of the regulations promulgated by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. If the government pursues this policy, 8,700 Newfoundland fishermen on the south coast of the island, on the west coast of the island and on the northeast coast of the island—not counting the number affected in the other three maritime provinces—will be placed on provincial welfare rolls.

I will return to the original thread of my comments today, Mr. Speaker, which is to ask if this is what the government regards as placing a high priority on regional Atlantic development. If it is, I am certainly glad they have not placed a low priority on it.

The government's attitude of restraint at any cost does not make sense when applied to the economic situation in Atlantic Canada. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) was a member of the opposition and the House was debating Bill C-19 in November, 1976, he said:

> It is beyond my comprehension how any government can restrain expenditures in an area of the country which has an unemployment rate of 13.9 per cent.

It was lower then than now, Mr. Speaker. He continued:

> It is, in fact, positively cruel and inhuman for any government to apply a restraint policy equally across this country as though every section of it is the same. It may be a policy of restraint that is quite apt for provinces like Ontario, Alberta or Saskatchewan, perhaps, where there are now high employment figures, but it is not proper to apply it blindly to Newfoundland which has an unemployment rate of almost 14 per cent.

At that time the unemployment rate was only 14 per cent in Newfoundland but today it is 18 per cent. This leads us to ask why a restraint policy must now apply holus-bolus across the board to Newfoundlanders and Nova Scotians as well as to Albertans and people in Saskatchewan. This appears to me to be contrary to the expressed promise of the Prime Minister for Atlantic regional development. He seemed to place a high priority on such development. This would seem to me to mean special policies tailored to individual areas of the country, particularly the Atlantic region.

As an aside, Mr. Speaker, I would remark that hon. members opposite at least seem to be demonstrating some interest in the plight of Atlantic Canada by their presence in the House today. When I look to my right to the Liberal benches, however, I see only three members. If this is a demonstration of their interest in the Atlantic provinces, it is no wonder that the party to which I belong is on the increase in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. It is also probably the reason for the lack of action during the last 16 years under a Liberal government. The Tories cannot take any consolation from that, however, because for the past four and one-half months they have not stayed with the ideas and policies they presented while in opposition.

As I pointed out, when the Minister of Finance was in opposition he stated it was madness to apply this type of policy right across the country without making exceptions for areas such as the Atlantic region. Yet that is what is happening right now. The Atlantic region is caught in the bind imposed by this cutback mentality, this restraint program that is affecting the lives of Canadians all over the country. In Atlantic Canada it will mean more unemployment and hardship, especially this winter.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister stated that regional development would be a priority of this government, but its over-all policy has turned out to be to the detriment of Atlantic Canada. When we examine some of the government's programs on the national level it is easy to see how disastrous they will be for Atlantic Canada.

The leader of this party questioned the Minister of Finance this morning on the matter of interest rate hikes. This will further depress the already depressed economy of the Atlantic region. If this policy creates problems in the stock market in Toronto it is easy to imagine what a problem it will be for consumers, small businessmen and fishermen in Atlantic Canada. It strikes at the heart of economic activity all over the country. The government has not seen fit to introduce programs designed to alleviate the effects of interest rate hikes. The problem presented to Atlantic Canada in this respect is even greater than that presented to the rest of the country, yet the government has not produced any offsetting programs for that area.

The whole thrust of the government's policies has been to exclude the Atlantic region. The biggest plank in the Tory platform in the last year or so was first mortgage interest deductibility, and later a mortgage tax credit, but that totally bypasses Atlantic Canada where over 70 per cent of the people are ineligible. In the final year of the program the government will spend over $2 billion, yet it not only has minimal effects in the Atlantic region but has already been cancelled out by the interest hike. How does a government that stated regional development as a high priority justify this type of expenditure? I will be interested to hear what the government present on this subject in the next few months.

Another area of cutback that will have serious impact in my part of the country concerns the moneys that were allocated to the development of small craft harbours for fishermen through the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Hundreds of fishermen in my riding and that of the hon. members from Cape Breton will be affected. I would be interested to know why no allowance was made for this industry which is so crucial to the Atlantic region when the government has a stated policy of regional development as a priority. It is imperative, particularly in Newfoundland where harbour development has been behind the other Atlantic provinces, that the priority attached by the Prime Minister to regional development be demonstrated in this area. We are not getting that. We are getting the "happy hacker from Bay Street". His influence and effect is being felt in every fishing harbour in Newfoundland and in the maritime provinces.

In this particular area many projects are needed and many more need to be completed. There are thousands of fishermen depending on this particular program for their livelihood. In these areas the Tories opposite are showing themselves to be carbon copies of the Liberals on this side. They are continuing to implement Liberal-Tory policies and promises that have detrimental effects on the Atlantic region, and they are continuing to pay only lip service to regional development in the eastern provinces. That is obviously all that the former leader of the opposition, now Prime Minister, meant when he talked in the spring about placing regional development as a priority.

What areas can we suggest that the government work on? The Liberals' refusal to make a commitment to the steel industry in Cape Breton was one area, and the Tories seem quite reluctant as well. If the government would provide the economic leadership, this area has the potential totally to transform certainly the Cape Breton economy as well as the economy of Nova Scotia. We have seen no new initiatives in terms of ending discriminatory transportation policies in the region. There has been no departure, certainly on the part of the government, from the user-pay policy which was the philosophy of the former government.

An hon. Member: We know what happened to that government.

Mr. Faour: I hope the same thing is going to happen to this government fairly quickly too.

Transportation policy is the major tool that the government has at its disposal to stimulate development. We have seen nothing in terms of a study in the area, let alone some activity.

The other major tool is energy policy. The Atlantic region has the highest energy costs in the country. Not only does it present hardship for consumers, but also it has to have a stultifying and stunting effect on the growth and development in the areas as well. In terms of saying that regional development is a priority for this government, energy policy has to be right up there with transportation and fisheries policy for the Atlantic region. Energy policy is probably more important because it takes energy to run trucks, trains and fishing boats. So I say that energy policy is crucial yet this government has done nothing in terms of solving the Atlantic region's energy problems.

We have heard talk of energy self-sufficiency in 1990 and deals with Mr. Lougheed, but have heard nothing in terms of policies to balance the real problem which Atlantic Canada faces. To his credit, and I say this quite openly, the Prime Minister has agreed to provincial jurisdiction over offshore resources, unlike the former government. This is very important to the future energy requirements on the east coast. That is not the only answer. The granting of provincial jurisdiction has to be seen as part of an over-all energy policy for the region. There is no evidence at all that the government has even broached the question of a maritime energy policy. Not only that, but in terms of their disastrous policy concerning Petro-Canada, the long-term energy security of the eastern provinces is seriously threatened and undermined.

I am not going to go into detail about Petro-Canada. My leader has already done that in his reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would like to speak briefly about the particular concerns of the region with regard to the effect PetroCan has on it. Petro-Canada has been involved in the search for oil deposits off the east coast. It has been involved in the Sable Island discovery and in the Hibernia well off St. John's that was said to be so promising a few weeks ago. It has been involved in 80 per cent of the wells that have been drilled off the coast of Labrador. For eastern Canada our dependence on imported oil makes it imperative that Petro-Canada protect our interests. We need that corporation to do that.

We propose as well—and this has important significance to Newfoundland—that the oil refinery that is now in Newfoundland lying dormant at Come-By-Chance should be taken over by Petro-Canada. It makes common sense. There are benefits for Newfoundland and for eastern Canada. First, it will provide security of energy supply for eastern Canada. Secondly, that security of supply would provide security of employment for people in Newfoundland.

I am just about to end my speech, Mr. Speaker, and I know that my time has just about run out, but I do want to emphasize that Petro-Canada should be expanded in this area as a fundamental part of the energy policy in the Atlantic region.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. I have been very lenient with him but in order to continue he must have the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Faour: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for their indulgence.

In closing, I want to appeal to the government opposite to adhere to the stated policy of the Prime Minister that regional Atlantic development would be a high priority for this government. It will not only benefit the provinces involved, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, but it will benefit the whole country. If a region of the country is weak, then the whole country is weak. If a region is strong, then the country will be stronger for it.

Each province, each part of the country, must have the opportunity to receive all of the benefits of being Canadian. More important, we must have the wherewithal and the opportunity to be able to develop to the point that no longer will our hands be continually asking for handouts, but that we in the Atlantic provinces will be able to make a net contribution to this land of ours. This is a high priority for me. I appeal to the government to maintain its commitment by giving Atlantic regional development a high priority so that all regions of this country will be able to say, "We are Canadian, we are proud of it, and we are prosperous as a result of it."

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to participate in this debate. It is a privilege I have enjoyed since I was first elected to Parliament in June, 1957.

I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address. They gave a worthy account of themselves, and in my view they are a credit to the constituencies which elected them to this House.

I wish also to congratulate Mr. Speaker on his reappointment, which is an honour I believe he has earned and richly deserves.

● (1620)

I also wish to commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the members of the cabinet on the quality of the proposals put forward in the throne speech, the first of a set of new proposals put forward by a Conservative government in, I think, 16 years. I believe the measures which have been earmarked for consideration reflect the careful thought and planning which took place between the dissolution of Parliament and the election of the new government. I believe that the legislation, when implemented, will be beneficial to all Canadians.

Unlike some hon. members who have already participated in this debate, I am pleased that the new government took a little extra time to prepare its legislative package. I say this because I have a long memory, and I well remember Canadians—and even today—suffering from the hasty actions of a previous administration, which hoped to be all things to all people in its planned "sixty days of decision".

Down Lunenburg way our oldest citizens have a saying which I suppose our forebears brought with them when they came over from Europe in 1753. It goes something like this: "The hurrier I go the behinder I get". So I hope that the careful, thought-out approach to our problems evidenced by the government will be the hallmark of this new administration.

While this year marks 112 years of parliamentary government in Canada, a record of which we can all be proud, it is worth nothing that a good friend and neighbour of Canada's is this year celebrating 250 years of parliamentary rule. I refer to the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, which celebrated this event with the opening of Parliament in Nassau on Saturday, September 29. The years from 1729 to 1979 have seen a tremendous evolution in the Bahamas not only in Parliament but also socially and economically. They have moved from a farming and fishing community to a tourist based economy with banking and finance becoming an important part of the economic life of the country. They also moved from representative government to responsible government and then to full independence from Britain. In 1967, although it cannot be said, strictly speaking, that it was a parliamentary change, the country experienced what we perhaps would call a quiet revolution when the white minority government was overthrown by a black majority government which was then instituted. This change, more than any other, showed the importance of the vote and the significance of ensuring that each adult person in the country be granted this important right.

I was privileged to represent Canada at the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary celebrations, and the interest taken in this event not only by members of the Commonwealth but by other countries as well was outstanding. From the minute you arrive in Nassau you cannot help but be aware of the fact that racial tensions there today between blacks and whites are non-existent. I view this as a tremendous accomplishment which we and other countries would do well to strive to emulate.

When we look at what is happening today in Cuba, for example, and review the statements made by the so-called non-aligned countries at the recent conference held in Havana, I hope hon. members will agree with me when I say that the Commonwealth of the Bahamas stands out like a bright and shining jewel in what is becoming a very troubled sea, the Caribbean, and the importance of this area will grow considerably in our immediate future.

As the struggle for power intensifies in the Caribbean, where it is now evident Communist forces are on the increase, especially in Cuba, it is a welcome relief to note the importance attached by the Bahamians to parliamentary democracy. This condition exists, I believe, because of the respect that is shown by the people to their elected representatives and to the church. They believe that of all God's creations, people are the most important. We are made in His image, and we have been given definite rights and freedoms. As part of God's plan we do not exist alone. We are placed in communities, and our orderly and just development and our prosperity and happiness must be the concern of each other. They believe that it is for this very purpose that Parliaments exist, to provide opportunities for orderly developments. It is for this reason that they respect parliamentary democracy and pledge themselves to its continuation in the future, upholding it in the face of all onslaughts.

I believe that a democratic Parliament has the right to expect the trust, respect and support of all its citizens. Parliamentary democracy cannot function satisfactorily unless it receives this support. By the same token, an awesome responsibility is laid upon members of Parliament. It is a position of great honour and dignity, and I submit that it must not be taken lightly. It necessitates a respect for traditions and for the ideals of the institution as well as a willingness to work and advance its future. It also necessitates a willingness to maintain a relationship with constituents and to take seriously their well-being.

Just as reasonable support of Parliament must be an integral part of its functioning and well-being, so must constructive criticism from the political opposition as well as from supporters of the party in power be accepted and expected as a vital ingredient of the democratic process. All human beings require constructive, objective evaluation in order to perform efficiently and effectively, and this is no less true of members of Parliament.

In many areas of the world today the democratic parliamentary process is under severe attack, or it is even being supplanted. This, unfortunately, is happening because Parliaments have failed to live up to their ideals. They have not provided opportunities for all the people they represent. A dissatisfied people will quickly seek that system that will fulfil its needs. Here in Canada I believe we must be especially concerned that all of our people have an opportunity for full human development, most especially in the fields of education and economics. Our system must make certain that opportunities for employment and medical care are available to everyone as far as it is economically feasible. Parliament, through its legislation and its influence, must do all in its power to promote the peace, unity and happiness of the Canadian people.

Divisions caused by language, race, colour, creed, geographical location or social standing, I submit, must never be supported. Within the democratic system there will be differences of political persuation. We see them right here in this House. But these must not be allowed to divide us permanently or to prevent justice from being carried out. From the very beginning Parliament has based its existence upon Christian principles as well as the principles of democracy and the rule of law. When these principles are abandoned the authority and the respect of Parliament will be undermined, and the rights and freedoms of individuals will be abused. The parliamentary government of this country has brought us this far, and it is my hope that the members of this Parliament who are deeply concerned and conscious of the fundamental rights and freedoms of all our citizens will work assiduously toward making Canada a just, united and prosperous country.

The throne speech, in my opinion, goes a long way toward accomplishing this dream, toward making it a reality. The proposals put forward truly represent a change of direction for Canada as we enter the 1980s. It is good for all of us to hear that consultation and co-operation will be the hallmarks of the new era. This will be a pleasant change, I submit, from what we have known in the past. We saw evidence of the type of consultation and co-operation which will exist when this Parliament opened on Tuesday. The time has come to reconcile our differences and to work together to realize fully our country's potential. By building for the future we can renew the dream of Canadian federalism. We can renew our faith in Canada. We can restore our pride in this country. We can be glad to stand up and say "I am proud to be a Canadian".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: In the throne speech this government is demonstrating that it is a government of compassion, for it proposes to extend spouse's allowances in circumstances where they are now denied. It will amend legislation respecting veterans, whose wants for all too long have been overlooked, despite the fact that they have made untold sacrifices on behalf of this country. It plans to establish select committees with the resources and powers necessary to inquire fully into the special needs of our handicapped and disabled citizens. One needs only to visit these people in their homes or in the senior citizens' establishments which have been set up across the country to realize that their needs are genuine and worthy of every consideration.

There could be no question that the greatest immediate challenge facing Canada today is to restore growth, confidence and jobs within the Canadian economy. This can only be done by the government and the people working together as a team. The government has pledged to reduce the load on the backs of Canadians through an expenditure management system within government which sets over-all spending limits on all ministers. I am pleased to see that in the throne speech because it was a proposal put forward by the present Auditor General, Mr. James Macdonell, during a period when I served for two years as chairman of the public accounts committee. It is a measure which is long overdue and should bring about great savings for the Canadian people.

This government plans to offer for private purchase and ownership those Crown corporations operating in areas where direct government intervention is no longer necessary. I think this is a good move for, as Conservatives, we believe that government should not be doing for the people those things people can best do for themselves.

Most important of all, we are going to establish sunset legislation, which will provide Parliament with a regular opportunity to judge whether government programs and agencies should be continued or phased out. As a Nova Scotian I have great respect for that type of legislation because it was in 1918 that Halifax experienced a great explosion, and it was only a few years ago that the mechanism set up to administer funds provided for those injured in that explosion was disbanded. This is what we mean by sunset legislation: examine these Crown corporations and agencies to determine whether they have a job to do, and if they have let them continue doing it; but, if not, disband them and save some of the taxpayers' money.

These moves are only a beginning. We believe individual initiative must be encouraged so as to generate growth and job opportunities. In furtherance of this aim, research and development will be expanded in Canada to promote the export of Canadian goods and services. To help the individual Canadian build a stake in this country we plan to establish a program of tax credits for mortgage interest and property taxes. This one measure alone will go a long way toward stimulating our housing industry while providing new job opportunities for young Canadians.

Unlike the previous speaker, I have read the Speech from the Throne through thoroughly, not once but a number of times, and I believe it gives special recognition to the needs of Atlantic Canada. I say this because it proposes to bring in a white paper on the future of our fisheries resources prepared in consultation with our fishermen, a large number of whom the previous speaker represents and many of whom I represent. There is to be consultation with the fishermen, the fishing industry and the provinces.

As most members are aware, the fishing industry is of fundamental importance to Atlantic Canada and to the well-being of a large segment of our people. In my view, there are very few primary industries which at the present time offer opportunities comparable to the fishing industry. Given the right opportunities by way of licences, quotas and markets, for example, our fishermen are capable of doubling their present landed values in a few years. I hope the government when preparing its white paper on the future development of our fisheries resources will give careful consideration to all the problems which presently surround this important industry.

For example, there is a need for extended lines of credit at reasonable interest rates, something the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) will have to examine, to cover the present inflated interest rates brought on by the exorbitant spending of the outfit which was in power before we took over, as a result of which the cost of ship construction and replacement has risen to exorbitant heights. Provision of investment allowances or tax write-offs go a long way toward stimulating ship construction, and while this will be helpful to all classes of operators, the needs of our inshore fishermen as they apply to the construction of public marine works must not be overlooked. In order to ensure that value is received for money expended there must be close liaison with the fishermen and other users, as well as with provincial and local authorities, to ensure the most practical use of wharves, breakwaters, slipways and docking and handling structures. In some areas there are already adequate wharves but unfortunately, due to the action of the sea, they have become silted in and are usable only at high tide. So we have to consider whether further dredging is needed in order to make existing services usable.

I would also point out that it is not sufficient to consider expanding the fishing industry without providing adequate surveillance capacity over our marine resource areas, together with an adequate research and rescue capability to ensure the safety of our fishermen. I hope the white paper will deal also with the need for a better utilization of our shore and sea-based freezer industry and will consider its expansion. If more fish were frozen, processing plants could operate year-round, thereby providing additional employment. I submit we should also examine the need for developing freezer trawlers to preserve catches of presently underutilized species such as silver hake, argentines, offshore herring, mackerel and squid. With oil increasing in price almost monthly it makes no sense whatsoever for our fishermen to throw away these soft species, to throw them back into the sea, especially when they are incidental to a groundfishing operation.

In my constituency one enterprising fishermen has applied for a licence to build a 64-foot freezer trawler so that all the species of catches can be kept in A-1 condition prior to landing. When we talk of freezer trawlers we sometimes think only of huge ships 300 feet or more in length, ice-reinforced and operated on the Hamilton bank off the coast of Labrador. But there are other possibilities for freezer trawlers. It is possible to build a 64-foot freezer trawler and use half the hold for wetfish and have the other half equipped with a freezing unit so that any species caught as incidental to a cod-fishing operation can be put into the freezer section instead of being thrown back into the sea. Everything the fisherman has caught will be utilized and this, I submit, will be vitally necessary as the cost of fishing, especially the cost of oil, continues to escalate.

I submit that the building of these ships will go a long way toward rejuvenating our shipyards and the ancillary business connected with them, while at the same time providing new opportunities for many of our people. This type of program, coupled with the proposals to develop an effective Canadian merchant fleet, should spell the dawn of a new era for all shipbuilding in Canada, and of course this will be vitally important to Atlantic Canada.

It is gratifying to note that the government is committed to making Canada self-sufficient in energy by 1990. That is a start, of course. This government, under the leadership of our new Prime Minister, has already given to Atlantic Canada the right to royalties from any offshore oil and gas developments. We do not know at this stage what this means to our future, but I submit it bodes well for that future.

Due to Canada's national oil policy as announced in February of 1961, Atlantic Canada's energy supply was dominated by imported oil to an extent unequalled in any other region of Canada. In fact, in terms of net energy supply, imported oil accounted in 1976 for an 82 per cent share of our needs compared to 54 per cent in Canada as a whole.

While the problems facing the Atlantic region are apparent, there has been little regional agreement on appropriate solutions. One of the early projects of the Council of Maritime Premiers was the creation of a Maritime Energy Corporation which was supposed to adminster most aspects of energy development in the region. Established on February 16, 1979, after signing a comprehensive agreement covering, among other things, the development of Fundy tidal power, the purchasing of the Point Lepreau nuclear unit and a preferred federal credit rating on all MEC contracts, the whole agreement would now appear to have been scrapped by all parties. I hope, now that the federal government is in new hands and in light of the throne speech promise to stimulate and distribute energy in all its various forms, that we will soon see a reassessment—I direct this request to the new Minister of Finance—a new reassessment of the federal government's role as it applies to the Maritime Energy Corporation. I believe that the strengthening of MEC is important to the development and distribution of electrical energy in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

We need it in order to stimulate tidal power beyond the pilot project presently proposed by the Nova Scotia Tidal Power Corporation at Annapolis. The main purpose of the Annapolis project is to test a proposed new design of turbine which, if successful, will reduce the cost of the main Fundy tidal project by some 10 per cent. However, in my view too much time has already been wasted on studies of tidal power development. While I do not believe it is the final answer to our energy needs, we must utilize every energy source available to us in light of our over-all dwindling oil supplies.

In the past six years, our position has worsened and we are dependent on a few producing countries, not all of them friendly to us for various reasons, and on a thin line of oil tankers stretching half way around the world whose cargoes may not always reach their destination in Canada. This is why I say that Fundy must be developed. In fact, we must look at all possible energy sources. We have plenty of coal in Canada and those responsible for the development of energy self-sufficiency in Nova Scotia have indicated that there is a need for the opening of a new coal mine in Cape Breton.

Until this is done, our economic prosperity is endangered by constantly rising power costs. The opening of a new mine at Donkin is a measure that should be given the highest priority by the federal government, in my view. Even if a new mine were opened today, it would be several years before it operated at capacity. Our premier, the honourable John Buchanan, faces a very difficult problem at present. He is well aware of the need for the opening of a new mine in Cape Breton, and I hope, as I said a moment ago, that this project is given priority treatment by the government.

In addition to this, we must take a new look at the use of wood for the generation of electricity, and must re-examine our peat resources. Peat as a fuel for the thermal generation of electric power is an established energy form. In the Soviet Union, for example, peat-fuelled electric power generation plants have a planned capacity of 6,000 megawatts in 1980. By comparison, 5,225 megawatts of power are generated at Churchill Falls. Canada—this is a fact not generally known—ranks second in the world in terms of peat resources, having well over 23 billion tonnes at 44 per cent moisture, compared to the Soviet Union's 180 billion tonnes.

In the Atlantic region peat, for example in Newfoundland, is quite plentiful. About 17 per cent of the land surface in Newfoundland is composed of peat. The other Atlantic provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, have about 10 per cent of their area in peat resources.

Despite the abundance of this resource, Canada's production of peat for its various uses is very small. In light of the high and increasing cost of oil, interest in peat is increasing, and it is my understanding that Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are undertaking today active peatland inventory programs. These are all forward steps, and I believe it is inevitable that, in the very near future, peat will play an important role in power generation in Atlantic Canada.

We hope that through conservation and the proper use of our coal, as I mentioned a moment ago, of our wood, our tidal power, wind, solar energy, hydroelectric energy and now Canadian propane gas, Nova Scotia will be able to come close to becoming self-sufficient in energy by 1990.

In closing, I commend the Prime Minister and the cabinet for their proposals and I hope that the suggestions I have made will be given fair consideration, with the hope of early implementation of the proposals regarding energy which would be very helpful to Nova Scotia.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to address my first few words to the Chair and join all previous speakers in congratulating the Speaker of the House and also the Deputy Speaker on their appointments, which clearly prove the confidence all hon. members have in the quality and the competence of those who were chosen, or rather chosen again, as both held those offices for several years under the previous government.

Secondly, I should like to take this opportunity, after seven years spent in this House, to thank the electors of the riding of Outremont, who for the third time have given me their support in ever increasing majority. Naturally, I take pride in those results which I also accept with considerable humility, for being chosen to represent as large a proportion of the people obviously means added responsibility.

I do rejoice in that support and also noticed, with some measure of humour, on examining the results in my riding that there were nine or ten candidates, unless I am mistaken, going from the Liberal, Progressive Conservative, New Democratic Parties, to Marxist and Leninists of all hues and the Rhinoceros Party. It struck me as quite humorous the day following the election to notice that, in my riding, the Progressive Conservative Party had managed the feat of achieving lower results than the Rhinoceros Party. That, I think, gives a pretty good idea of the popularity of that party in the province of Quebec, and the work that awaits it. That is indeed quite a hurdle to jump.

I should also like to thank the people of Quebec for the support they once again gave the Liberal party in that election.

● (1650)

Not only did Quebeckers give the Liberal party a large majority of seats—indeed the largest number of seats ever obtained in Quebec—they also gave us a record percentage of votes, that is, more than 62 per cent. There is no doubt that this is due in the first place to the outstanding qualifications of our leader, the member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau). This is also undoubtedly due to the devotion and efficient work performed by the Liberal members of Quebec for several years in the House. And I am pleased to note that as a result of the election those Liberal members were reinforced by the addition of a substantial number of new, able, experienced and dynamic members who are joining those who sat during the last session and will make of the Liberal team of Quebec in the House a group that will promote the interests of all Quebeckers and also, of course, of all Canadians, since for us there is no contradiction in being both a good Quebecker and a good Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues and the Canadian people, I was eager to hear the first Speech from the Throne made by the first Progressive Conservative government in 16 years. I thought—and I was quite wrong—that my colleagues on the other side had benefited from this long sabbatical period of time spent on the side of the opposition and that they would propose a political and economic program which would ease the difficulties our country is experiencing at the present time, because after a period of reflection that had lasted for over 16 years—in fact, it seems that that is more than enough for any party to prepare itself to govern a country—the people of Canada had a right to expect the Progressive Conservative government to act immediately. They also had a right to expect that action to be coherent and responsible. Coherence and a sense of responsibility, the two things the Speech from the Throne we are discussing today obviously lacks. But could it have been otherwise when we know that the Progressive Conservative Party has badly lacked those two qualities for the past 16 years?

Unfortunately, it was easy to foresee that once in power, this inefficiency, while being its trademark, would nevertheless remain inexcusable in Canada's political and economic context. This Speech from the Throne is nothing more than a bunch of spur-of-the-moment campaign promises. It is nothing more than half-baked policies, clearly unsatisfying for all Canadians, men and women alike. Ultimately, this Speech from the Throne reflects the stubbornness and obscurantism of the Progressive Conservative government in the economic field in general, and in the energy field in particular. As a result, instead of facing a so-called responsible government, Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression, of facing a government that is unable to take decisions, that has lost all sense of its responsibilities, that is juggling with complex problems whose outcome be of vital importance for the country and that makes one contradictory statement after the other, and this has been going on for almost five months now. Let's recall, for example, its decision to move the Canadian embassy in Israel and the disastrous consequences it had for Canada on the domestic as well as on the international front. And all the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) could come up with afterwards was that he had underestimated the extent of the Arab protests. Meanwhile we have lost contracts worth billions of dollars and Canada's name has never fallen into such disrepute as it has in the past few months.

Let us not forget that since the beginning of June this government has governed—and this is a figure of speech of course—in a vacuum, without calling Parliament. In fact, this is the first time in our history that our country was governed without Parliament for so long and it is not surprising that after such a long delay we should feel disappointed when we read what is referred to as the Speech from the Throne.

Let us see on the other hand what President Carter did meanwhile, last summer for example. After realizing that the energy crisis in the United States was as serious as it was here in Canada, he did not lose five or six months procrastinating and making general statements on this issue. He interrupted his schedule for ten whole days, shut himself up with his advisers in Camp David and then released a specific energy statement to the American people. And this was done last summer, at the beginning of August.

Meanwhile, our government again vainly tried to review fully the question, met in Ottawa, in Jasper, at Lake Mousseau and here and there in Canada, met with the provinces, we are told, yet no conclusion has been reached after all those months in a field which is crucial indeed. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I have to note that in politics ridicule is not a terminal disease because those across the way would be a very sick bunch indeed.

I would like most of all to deal with the energy question, specially with Petro-Canada. The Speech from the Throne remains oddly silent on the energy question, whereas the government itself had recognized that this would be the major issue which the House would face from now until Chrismas. The throne speech contains merely one paragraph dealing with energy where they keep on uttering the same platitudes we have heard since early June. Yet, we would have expected the government to take this opportunity to state exactly its intentions. But in fact, although the name Petro-Canada is nowhere to be seen in the throne speech, it has to be noted that it is hinted at here and there in the speech where there is mention of Crown corporations and their sale to the private sector.

The Conservative government's resolve, its determination to destroy at all costs, Canada's major oil company, has no solid nor reasonable ground. Arguments such as "make room for free enterprise" or "government has no business in that field" are false arguments in the case of Petro-Canada, because, first of all, they fail to take into account past experience in the field of energy and, in particular, of oil. Second, they underestimate the specifics of the present energy situation both in Canada and abroad. Third, if the government is successful in achieving its objectives in this regard, it will be bringing Canada back on the road to foreign dependence.

Let us take the private enterprise argument. There is no lack of private concerns in the oil industry in Canada. That sector even boasts over 700 private businesses involved in oil. There is no lack. What is also interesting to note is that they are not all small and weak. If one looks at the 500 biggest companies in Canada for 1978, one realizes that among the top ones there is a whole series of oil companies: Imperial Oil, fourth, Shell Canada, tenth, Gulf Canada, twelfth, Texaco Canada, twenty-first, BP Canada, fifty-first, and so on.

What is also interesting to note, on the other hand, is that in this area, if you look at all the companies I mentioned, this is a sector which is mostly, excessively under foreign control. All the companies I mentioned are American or European multinationals which control the oil market in Canada. In fact, those companies have assets and sales of billions of dollars and indeed together as foreign companies control 91 per cent of assets and 95 per cent of sales in the oil industry in Canada.

In light of that, the existence, the complete continuation and expansion of Petro-Canada are essential to this country if we no longer want only to appear to have control over our resources but also really increase Canadian ownership over resources which belong to Canadians in the first place. In suggesting this I am not saying the role of the private sector is not important—as I have already said, there are 700 of them—and I am not saying either that there is no role for foreign businesses; they have made their contribution in the past, they should continue to do so in the future. But in an industry where competition is as doubtful, in an industry where uncertainty and instability are factors we must continually be taking into account, in an industry where any increase in our dependence on OPEC countries and multinationals will only make the situation worse that it is primarily important that Canadians have, particularly in the oil industry, an effective and disinterested tool—and that tool is Petro-Canada.

In that respect, the operations of Petro-Canada since its creation by the former majority Liberal government is more than adequate evidence of the increase of Canadian participation in the oil industry. We have only to look at the latest annual report of this corporation to realize it.

In 1978, Petro-Canada took part in the drilling of 16 of the 26 wells drilled in the most isolated parts of Canada. Off the shore of Nova Scotia, it took part in the drilling of five wells, and under its own initiative or through its interest in Panarctic Oils Limited it took part in the drilling in eight of the ten wells drilled in the Arctic islands. Finally, in western Canada, Petro-Canda drilled 44 exploration wells.

Petro-Canada also places great importance on the development of our enormous tar sand and heavy oil reserves, and thus it is involved in various projects including that of Syncrude in western Canada. Also, agreements have been reached with Saskatchewan Oil and Gas and Gulf Canada, and there has been an agreement with the government of Saskatchewan concerning projects for the exploration, the development and the accelerated recovery of heavy oil in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker, how can a government which claims to be responsible deliberately put an end to all this? Who, for instance, successfully carried out exploration operations in the area of Sable Island after Mobil Oil and Gulf gave up? It was Petro-Canada. Who took up the challenge of prospecting in the most hostile and hardest to reach regions of Canada? Petro-Canada. On whom can the government depend to estimate available reserves and gather the information it requires in the energy field? Petro-Canada. Who, at the height of the Iranian crisis, when Imperial Oil and Exxon were diverting each day to the United States 20,000 barrels of oil from Venezuela which were supposed to come to us, negotiated an agreement with Mexico? The Canadian government, with Petro-Canada.

While wanting to abolish Petro-Canada, the Prime Minister and the minister of energy (Mr. Hnatyshyn) have told us that their ultimate objective was Canadian independence in the field of energy by 1990. Well, this is what they have been telling us since May 22 and even before, but we are still waiting for their plan, that famous plan, and the specifics on how they are going to do it.

I have before me the figures published by the National Energy Board, which is not supposed to be a partisan body, of course. These figures show that in 1978 imported 192,000 barrels of crude a day, net imports after exports, after deducting our foreign sales. The board forecast that we will have to import 826,000 barrels of crude a day in 1990, and 905,000 barrels a day in 1995. As I say, this government is either having delusions when they speak of self-sufficiency within 11 years, or peculiar arithmetic, and I must say, unfortunately, that I often think they have both.

Mr. Speaker, we may believe that if the present course is maintained by the majority of industrialized nations, the oil producing countries will soon demand interstate, intergovernment negotiations. I was pleased to note this very day that the president of Petro-Canada had this to say before the Empire Club in Toronto, and I quote:

● (1700)

[English]

The sitution is no longer one in which private oil interests can be expected to always obtain and deliver oil. Each transaction directly or indirectly involves a government presence. Not one drop of oil moves today from the Middle East without a government agreeing to it, and almost every sizeable oil importing nation has its government in the act.

[Translation]

Who then will be representing the Canadian government if Petro-Canada no longer exists as a true oil company? During the crisis in Iran, when the price of oil on the free markets was reaching disproportionate figures between $30 and $40 a barrel, Walter J. Levi, a leading American expert, an economist of repute, a consultant to both governments and private corporations, was interviewed on the program "Meet the Press" over the NBC network early in 1979. He said:

[English]

To avert international crisis, governments will have to step in and recognize that big oil companies and free enterprise programs are just nonsense and would not work.

[Translation]

This is in agreement with the remarks made recently by a Canadian, an expert of repute in Canada, a man with a long experience in energy matters, Mr. Bruce Wilson, who indicated in the Toronto Star, and I quote:

[English]

It should be apparent to the new government, which now has the responsibility for ensuring the viability of Canada as a nation and for protecting the interests of the citizens as a whole, that the primary objective of the private sector resource-exploiting industries to maximize profits is incompatible with the need to provide assured supplies of energy for the engines of the economy at reasonable prices.

A decision by the federal government to emasculate Petro-Canada, solely on the basis that it was an election promise, does not give one confidence in the quality or objectivity of the new administration. Rather than disposing of Petro-Canada, the government should be developing comprehensive energy policies and plans designed to head off the bleak future now confronting the nation in the energy field. A much stronger, rather than weaker, federal presence is required.

And I say "amen" to that.

And above all we should not believe that, however the emasculation of Petro-Canada might be achieved eventually, no great harm will be done. Indeed, if the government stands by the public statement made in early September, we would be left only with a skeleton firm, emasculated of its most essential functions and whose profits would not allow it to expand, indeed to continue its exploration and development efforts.

The net result of that absurd proposal will be that we will have two Canadian firms of medium size. One will be non-viable, unable to serve the true interests of Canadian society, and every year it will come and bow before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) or the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) to get the money it will need, while the other firm will be viable and will be owned by a number of shareholders who will of course be more concerned with profits and dividends than with the security of our supplies.

Indeed, even the Conservative government of Ontario rejects the approach adopted by the present Progressive Conservative government in Ottawa. I am referring to the paper entitled "Energy Security for the Eighties: a Policy for Ontario". Here is what the government of Ontario had to say in that regard:

● (1710)

[English]

Petro-Canada supplements the job being done by the private sector and takes appropriate risks where the private sector is reluctant. Petro-Canada provides Canadians with a better insight into the complexity of finding and developing new oil and gas reserves. Petro-Canada can and should, along with the private petroleum industry, play a leadership role in achieving crude oil self-sufficiency for Canada by 1995. This is the conclusion: Ontario urges the federal government not to reprivatize Petro-Canada but to retain essential functions within a national petroleum company.

Premier Davis is not the only premier with that view. It is shared by a lot of other premiers. It is shared by the premier of British Columbia who, on a CBC radio interview on September 16, said quite clearly that in his view it would be wrong for the Government of Canada to try to follow with Petro-Canada the approach that he had followed with British Columbia Resources Investment Corporation. That is the view of the premier of British Columbia himself, and he had very, very good reasons which anybody could understand to justify that distinction and that argument.

Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a tour in western Canada where I met representatives of and spokesmen for the oil industry. I was surprised to see the large number not only of ordinary citizens but also of spokesmen for that industry who say, "Now, listen. Petro-Canada is there. We are accustomed to live with it so why touch it? Let Petro-Canada live and work with us; we can work closely with Petro-Canada which, as a Canadian corporation, has been of much service to us even if at the start we had some doubts about its usefulness."

And this view is shared by a great many citizens. I urge all my colleagues opposite to read their correspondence and they will see to what extent Canadians are preoccupied by the whimsical policy of the present government. They should read the results of a Gallup poll that have been published today, a poll made throughtout Canada. Its obvious conclusion is that Canadians are for maintaining Petro-Canada. Seventy five per cent of Canadians want Petro-Canada to continue its operations in the prospecting field. And 57 per cent believe that Petro-Canada should pursue its purchasing activities on the international level, and 54 per cent say that Petro-Canada should be involved in retail sales. Those who think otherwise represent only 7 per cent, 18 per cent and 20 per cent respectively. For a government that pretends to be listening and consulting the people, I must say that I never saw a government as deaf as the one before us.

[English]

This government has at least one member from Imperial Oil, and a national director of the Conservative party from Imperial Oil, and assistants in ministers' offices from Imperial Oil, but I cannot imagine the members on the other side perceiving themselves as being also members for Imperial Oil. This is a view in which they are completely isolated, isolated from the view of the vast majority of the population. I urge this government, if it believes what it has been preaching, to reconsider its approach and its policy and realize that Canada needs Petro-Canada more now than it needed it in 1975 when it was created.

I would like to say a few words about our motion and the amendment put forward by the NDP. I think that our motion yesterday put the situation and our stand quite clearly and quite adequately when we suggested that the address be amended by adding the following words:

—and this House condemns the attempt of the government to undermine Petro-Canada and supports the maintenance and expansion of our national petroleum corporation, as the property of all Canadians, as the largest Canadian-owned corporation in the petroleum industry and as a major instrument of Canadian energy policy.

The NDP in their amendment stated:

—and this House calls in particular for the corporation to be designated as the sole importer of off-shore oil, and for the corporation to open retail outlets to serve the people of Canada from coast to coast.

When we set up Petro-Canada in 1975 we gave it very wide-ranging powers, and we were right in doing so. Petro-Canada is engaged in all aspects of the oil industry since its creation, through acquisition in particular of ARCO and Pacific Petroleums. It is interesting to see that the retail sales of Pacific Petroleums have increased since the acquisition by Petro-Canada, proportionately more than all of their other competitors. I think that it says something, and that is that the public feel that they would like to support an integrated Canadian oil company.

While in Calgary recently I was flabbergasted to meet the president of a Canadian oil company who informed me that he had now switched to Pacific Petroleums for purchasing the gas for his own car and that he was not buying it any longer from other companies. We are not objecting to Petro-Canada having retail outlets. It is within its powers. The question that arises is whether or not this would be the wisest investment for the company to make at the present time.

I do not think that anybody would argue very strongly that we are short of service stations at the present time and that we need to build more service stations. If Petro-Canada has $1 billion to invest perhaps it should be invested in exploration and development of the resource rather than into adding to the number of service stations, or purchasing existing service stations. Be that as it may, that power is in the act, and Petro-Canada is in a position to take the appropriate decision as to the wisdom of undertaking such a development in due time.

The area in which I question the amendment proposed by the NDP is the proposal to designate Petro-Canada as the sole importer of offshore oil. This question was extensively debated last spring when we put forward the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979. That same proposal came from the NDP at that time. The House debated it for several days and rejected it by a margin of 190 to 13. I believe that there were very good reasons for the proposal being rejected. We do not need a monopoly on the foreign supply of oil. It is essential that Petro-Canada be there and that there is an agency to deal with countries that want to deal with a state agency. But it need not be the exclusive purchaser of oil in all countries, however. Canada is better served if there are several sources rather than a single one. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this line should be maintained.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have tried to allow the hon. member some additional time to complete his remarks.

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and also offer my congratulations to you, sir, on your reappointment to the Chair. In the last Parliament you had the respect of all hon. members and I am quite sure you will be taking your two new assistants, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) and the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott) under your wing to make them as efficient as you have been over the years.

We have seen a great start to the debate on the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker. There have been a lot of wild statements and charges this afternoon, but very few facts. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) said that the government will do away with CMHC. I should like him to present some evidence of that, Mr. Speaker. This government will do no such thing, as we believe CMHC has provided excellent service over the years. It will remain intact.

If some hon. members wonder which party introduced the first unemployment insurance plan in this country I am delighted to inform them that it was a Conservative government in 1935. There was some delay in implementing the plan because of a Liberal filibuster but it eventually went through. This government is interested in the unemployed, Mr. Speaker.

I should also like to speak briefly about the mortgage interest deductibility plan, Mr. Speaker. There has been a lot of negative criticism of the plan, especially from the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry who apparently is the housing critic for the official opposition. This policy was introduced by the Progressive Conservatives in 1965, Mr. Speaker, so it was not something dreamed up in the middle of the last election campaign as was the New Democratic Party plan. The Liberals now claim to be concerned about homeowners and renters, but I would point out that they had 17 years in which to introduce a mortgage interest deductibility plan that would do something for the country. Of course they did nothing. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) while in opposition made a major announcement on this subject on September 21, 1978. If the Liberals are so interested in housing and renters they should have introduced their own policy at that time. If a bill had been presented to the House the legislation would be in place by now.

The present economic conditions in the country will present certain difficulties in the implementation of this policy, but it is going to be done, Mr. Speaker. I should like to allay the fears of some hon. members and the Canadian public regarding the program, Mr. Speaker. There have been some wild charges to the effect that renters will not receive any benefit, but I would point out that in the last few years there have been considerable benefits for renters due to the action of the provinces and cities.

For many Canadians renting is viewed as a temporary state of affairs until they can afford to purchase housing. According to a recent survey 90 per cent of young Canadians want to own their own homes. The initiative of this government will make it easier for them to achieve that goal. The Liberals had 17 years in which to make that dream come true but they did nothing about it. They have developed a great interest in it now, however, since we have introduced the plan. As mortgage interest and property taxes are a deductible business expense for landlords, renters are receiving similar benefits already. In some provinces rents have been kept down through means of rent control but very little has been done to make home ownership more affordable.

The plan has some spin-off benefit for renters. As more Canadians, encouraged by the Progressive Conservative tax credits, move into their own homes, more rental accommodation will become available, thus taking pressure off those who chose to continue to rent.

It is impossible to meet the needs of all Canadians with one government program. The old age pension, for example, does nothing for the young, while the child tax credit does nothing for people who do not have children. If it becomes necessary to provide subsidies to renters, this will be done through other means, such as shelter allowances.

The federal government is already involved with provincial governments in the delivery of subsidized housing for low income families and senior citizens through the non-profit housing assistance program, the co-operative housing program, graduated payment mortgages for landlords, and other CMHC programs.

This program is being financed by passing the benefits of the government's restraint program on to Canadians. Renters are not being asked to pay higher taxes to assist homeowners.

It would have been much easier to implement the program in 1965 when this party first introduced it, or even in 1978 when it was again introduced by this party.

At the present time the province of Manitoba, recognizing that rising rents coupled with fixed incomes put terror into the hearts of senior citizens, has wisely designed a rent subsidy program to help 9,000 elderly people. This will cost the relatively low sum of $3.5 million. The province of Ontario has allotted additional moneys to assist senior citizens who are renters or home owners.

We could do a lot more for renters and homeowners and indeed everybody else were it not for the totally irresponsible actions of the previous so-called government over the last 17 years, and particularly the last 11 years. Anyone who wants to challenge that statement should read some of the reports of past Auditors General and also the report of the Lambert commission. The Liberal government was spending $1 billion per month more than was collected in revenue yet Liberals have the audacity to criticize this government and offer advice. With their record they should not even open their mouths.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: It could have been expected that something would have been done to correct the situation after one of those bad reports, but the situation continued year after year. Things did not get better; they got worse. The Lambert commission brought in 151 recommendations in an effort to clear up the mess created by 17 years of liberalism, and stated that Parliament must insist upon full government accounting. That is something this government can promise, Mr. Speaker. The Liberals did not believe in being accountable to the people.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

One reason that we cannot do more for renters and home owners is that the interest charges alone on the irresponsible borrowings made by this so-called government that has been replaced, cost taxpayers $23 million per day. This government, of course, now has to pay those bills. That is not an excuse; it is a fact. The bills have to be paid and that is why we cannot give more for everybody. We are stuck with paying Liberal bills.

This government will implement the report of the Lambert commission and bring back control over expenditures. This all came about because the Liberal government changed the rules in 1968 and 1969. The Auditor General has stated he can only account for half the $50 billion budget and that he does not know where that $25 billion is going. A government which has created a situation like that does not need to offer adivce or criticism. They had 17 years to perform miracles, to help everybody out and to get oil and all the rest of it.

We have heard a lot of criticism about health care, and accusations that the Conservative party is opposed to it. That is an out and out lie, Mr. Speaker. It was this party that introduced health care to Canada. The terms of reference were laid out in 1961 by the Diefenbaker government. All the recommendations contained in the Hall commission report at that time were implemented and, as a result, first class health care was introduced in Canada. A Conservative government introduced all these health care plans in conjunction with the provinces. All the terms of reference are here. All were investigated and the recommendations were implemented.

I was happy to read what the current health minister said to the provincial health ministers. He said, "I have been casting about, in my own mind, for the most appropriate person to conduct such a review into health care to make sure these standards are going to be maintained." He stated, "We are extremely fortunate, I think, that the originator of the Hall commission report, Chief Justice Emmett Hall of Saskatchewan, has indicated to me a willingness to take on this job." I understand Mr. Hall will once again review health care in Canada and make any recommendations that are required.

Our health minister has stated that he is proposing to create a national health care institute of Canada. He has already sent a note to the health ministers concerning such an institute, and additional copies of his note will be passed out. We are very much interested in health care in this country because we are the political party that introduced it in the first place.

The New Democrats and the Liberals in Manitoba have spent considerable time attacking the Manitoba government with regard to health care in that province. I want to read this into the record to give an example of what the provinces are doing under difficult times. Health expenditures in Manitoba have risen from $459 million in 1976-1977, to $503 million in 1977-1978, to $525 million last year, and to $570 million this year. There are not the cutbacks that the NDP and the Liberals are raving about, Mr. Speaker. One-third of the provincial budget in Manitoba is spent on health care.

I would like to point out the percentage of increase for health care in Manitoba. Hospital insurance and medicare payments in Saskatchewan are budgeted to increase this year by 4.8 per cent and 8.3 per cent, whereas in Manitoba they are rising by 10 per cent and 8 per cent. Health care will deteriorate in Saskatchewan if that is only the percentage increase they are giving to their hospitals and to the rest of their health care plans. I hope Mr. Justice Hall will start in a province governed by the NDP where they have serious problems.

In the last federal election we were treated to some of the most irresponsible statements I have listened to by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) over national television. He was on TV just about every second night saying that doctors are opting out only in provinces where there are Conservative governments. He left out the province of Saskatchewan which has an NDP government. There are three different schemes in Saskatchewan under which doctors can opt out, and they have allowed doctors to opt out for the last 16 or 17 years. So the NDP says, "We don't like opting out in Conservative provinces but it is all right if the NDP government of Saskatchewan allows opting out." That is an example of irresponsible statements that we get from the NDP, completely misleading the Canadian people.

The NDP got quite a bit of support in the last federal election. They picked up a few seats. But a lot of Canadians have been wondering what on earth they did voting for that party, after hearing statements by a former president of the NDP in Manitoba, Mr. Frank Syms. I have known Frank Syms for many years. He is a harmless little socialist. He has run many times for the NDP unsuccessfully, but finally he has seen the light. Mr. Syms quit the NDP because of a "Commie" takeover.

I will read a report from the Winnipeg Tribune. The article reads, "Long-time NDP member J. Frank Syms has turned in his party card in protest against what he describes as a takeover of the NDP party by apologists for communism and communists." How do you like that? Mr Syms says in the article, "There are too many high profile New Democrats who find nothing good in our system but who entertain no criticism of communism. Over the past five and more years, I have watched with concern and opposed the takeover of the Manitoba NDP machinery by a coalition of militant, radical groups and individuals. They include the more militant of the Status of Women advocates, anarchists, Revolutionary Workers, Party adherents, sympathizers and Trotskyists" and on and on.

An hon. Member: It sounds like your cabinet.

Mr. McKenzie: Those are words from a member of the NDP party for many years, who was a past president of the NDP in Manitoba. He was an NDP appointee, being the head of the liquor board for eight years.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry has stated in the House today with regard to deteriorating health care in Manitoba, that its social programs are declining. Obviously he is not acquainted with the facts, and apparently has no intention of getting the facts. I have an example of what one province is doing, and I am sure the others are doing the same thing.

In Manitoba a $138 million program has been undertaken to renovate the health sciences centre. That is a lot of money for a province the size of Manitoba. Breast cancer victims are now eligible for rebates on breast prostheses. Major financial assistance is now available to families purchasing hearing aids for children under 18. A $4 million expansion to the Manitoba Cancer Treatment and Research Centre has been completed. An expanded dialysis unit costing $583,000 has been opened at the health sciences centre. The government has assisted in expansion of the open heart surgery unit at St. Boniface Hospital. Construction of the $32 million Seven Oaks hospital is nearing completion. We did not stop that. It was started by the NDP administration, which is fine. We could have stopped it but we didn't. Extensive fire safety upgrading has been undertaken at a number of Manitoba hospitals and personal care homes. Since 1977 $36.4 million has been committed to provide 1,291 personal care beds, and $10 million of this figure has come from the private sector. Seventy-five per cent of pensioner home owners have been provided with full school tax relief.

On and on it goes, and yet these people have the audacity to stand up in this House and say we are against senior citizens and against people who are sick. One-third of the budget is being spent on health care, and as you can see by the items I have just put on the record they are completely misleading the Canadian people when they stand up in this chamber and make ridiculous statements.

The NDP and the Liberals have used this chamber to attack the Manitoba government on other issues. This practice was started in the last Parliament. In Manitoba most of the federal election was spent on debating policies of the provincial government. The NDP did not have any of its own so it started attacking the present Conservative administration with a lot of false information. The economy was a popular subject. In the last two years under the Conservative government, 11,000 new jobs have been created. This is nearly triple the rate of the NDP. All of these jobs have been in the private sector and do not represent a burden on the taxpayer.

Another interesting announcement was made last week by a minister in the Manitoba government that four of the government Crown corporations that they had sold to the private sector are all thriving and have all hired more employees. They are doing a great job now that the government has its sticky fingers out of it. This past summer 8,631 summer jobs were created for students by private industry. In 1978 private capital investment, the real generator of jobs, increased by 22 per cent. Manufacturing investment is going up by 34 per cent in 1979, double the national rate. Yet members opposite say the economy is terrible there. Commercial building permits in the city of Winnipeg in 1978 increased 3,800 per cent. That is an indication that things are going very well. Just imagine if the NDP came back in. That sends shivers up and down my spine. In the last Parliament I read many statistics into the record which I obtained from financial institutions which were assisting businesses in moving out of Manitoba when the NDP was in power there. The loss was staggering. The amount of money leaving and the number of jobs lost were staggering.

Manitoba has the third lowest unemployment rate in Canada. Exploration spending in the mining and the oil industries has almost doubled. Mining exploration under the NDP in Manitoba came almost to a grinding halt with the minister they had in charge of northern development and mining.

Leadership has been shown in Manitoba. Hydro rates have been frozen for a period of five years in order to assist the people of Manitoba. Since July, 1979, Manitobans have enjoyed the third highest minimum wage in Canada. The eight years the NDP were in power in Manitoba were disastrous for us. It was a very costly experiment. We saw the NDP in the Chinese food business. I like Chinese food, but I certainly do not want to buy it from any NDP government. That went bankrupt. Then they got into the aeroplane manufacturing business. The last thing in the world a provincial government should get itself involved in is manufacturing aeroplanes. Another $40 million to $50 million was lost by the people of Manitoba. On and on it goes.

I want to get back to health care for a moment. Not all members of the NDP are irresponsible. I have here a statement by a former NDP leader, Mr. Tommy Douglas. He was referring to the Hall report back in the 1960s. He said it was one of the finest reports ever written on the subject. He credited Mr. Diefenbaker and his Conservative government with laying the foundation stone for medicare. I think Mr. Douglas should be given credit for recognizing that fact. I do not expect that he would be going around the country making such irresponsible statements as those made by his NDP colleagues. According to them, our party is against medicare, hospitals, senior citizens, and all that irresponsible nonsense.

I do not know what kind of constructive criticism we will be receiving from the Liberal party, now that it is in opposition. Liberals seem constantly to be squabbling about leadership. There are many newspaper articles being released by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). He came here in 1972, the same time I did. He writes letters stating that he wants his leader replaced, or that he has some other complaint about his party. I have never heard him say anything good about his party. I do not know why he wants to stay in the Liberal party when he has so many complaints about the way its members conduct themselves. He is concerned about Liberal caucus members who have been given specific responsibilities. The hon. member for Vaudreuil complains that his colleagues are making public policy statements without any discussion in caucus. The Liberal party is very disjointed. There are articles: "Trudeau under attack", "Disgruntled Liberals urge end to former PM's reign". They are certainly having their problems over there.

I would like to speak briefly about Petro-Canada. I do not know what everybody is getting all excited about. Petro-Canada has certainly become a very emotional issue. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has stated that we are going to be keeping many parts of Petro-Canada. He has stated that the negotiation of state to state contracts for the importation of crude oil, where necessary, will be looked after by us. He has stated that there will be promotion of exploration in frontier areas with increased Canadian participation and at a pace which cannot be expected of the private sector alone. We will work with them.

I was in Calgary recently at a Canada-U.S. parliamentary meeting. We met with Petro-Canada officials there. They showed us films of some of their developments which are being undertaken in conjunction with the private sector. We have no objection to that at all. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has stated that promotion, along with frontier exploration, of tar sands and heavy oils research and development will be done by Petro-Canada. I do not know what the Liberal energy critic is getting so excited about. Those are things he is concerned about, and we are not going to abandon them.

The energy critic pointed out that there are 700 oil companies in Canada. I do not know how many oil companies we need, but that seems to be an awful number of oil companies; plus we have Petro-Canada. I am sure the task force, when it turns in its report later on this month, will be making its recommendations. Whether we implement them or not I cannot say right now, and neither can the government. We have to wait until the task force files its report.

I would like to give hon. members an idea of the size of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Perhaps there are a number of branches of that department in existence which could perform the same functions Petro-Canada performs. There are over 300 branches, divisions and agencies employing some 4,000 people. Just look at the government telephone directory—11 pages! What are they all doing? Perhaps they could be performing many of the functions of Petro-Canada. I think we must look carefully at duplication. We are taking a responsible position. There is nothing wrong with reviewing a federal government department or agency. There are 400 others which we have to review to find out what they are doing. They will have to justify their existence.

We are acting in a responsible manner in reviewing all these various government departments. We are not just going to close our eyes and let them operate on their own. We do not know whether they are operating efficiently, or whether they are required, or anything else. We have a responsibility to Canadian taxpayers to find out if all these 400 Crown corporations and the hundreds of divisions and branches in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources are required. We are taking a responsible position. Because we do that we will be criticized. We should be praised for checking to see if taxpayers' money is being spent properly. I do not see anything wrong with doing that, but that is the kind of thing that we get from the Liberals and the NDP.

The Conservative party was interested in energy long before the Liberal party even thought of it. I remember when the roads to resources program was introduced in the fifties by the Diefenbaker government. That was ridiculed by the Liberals. Canada would be well on the road to being self-sufficient today if that program had been carried on when the Liberals came back to office in 1963, but they disbanded it and made a lot of smart aleck remarks about our building roads from igloo to igloo, and that sort of thing.

I would like to quote from a speech made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), who has been involved in energy for many years in this country and who worked with our former leader, Mr. Diefenbaker, with respect to the roads to resources program. He spoke at the opening of the Dempster highway, which was delayed for about seven or eight years by the Liberals. He said:

> Actually, the Dempster highway was one of the main anchors of the whole concept of the roads to resources program. If one looks at a map of Canada on a conic projection, it will be seen that Canada from Labrador to Yukon is a part of a circle of land that centres on the Arctic Islands.
> These islands were once part of the tropics of the earth. From Stefansson's time, the eyes of the world's explorers were focused on this potential treasure house of resources. Stefansson named several of the islands after ministers of the cabinet that sponsored his explorations. This angered Mackenzie King who proceeded to name an island after himself.

That is typical. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain also stated:

> When I became minister in 1957, I immediately tried to pull all the information together on how we could get a road through to the Arctic coast as fast as possible. From my analysis of the Paley report of 1952, based on U.S.A. resources, I knew that Canada should have access to Arctic Islands hydrocarbons by 1980.

This was back in 1957. Just imagine what would have been the result of continuing that program.

We are very concerned about energy. Energy has been a priority of the Conservative party for many years. The hon. member went on to say that when he became a minister he found a map by some unknown civil servant in the old department of the interior which projected generalized routes to the Arctic. He added:

> I found oil and gas regulations which gave everything to the finder. The regulations were obsolete. The department had no real resource people left in it so I went to resource people in industry, Dr. Link, Dr. Sproule and my brother, all of whom had then retired, and they assisted in the roads to resources program.

I just want to make it clear that we are the party which has shown leadership over the years in introducing the unemployment insurance plan and mortgage deductibility. We introduced the roads to resources program years ago, and these constant references to us by Liberals and spokesmen for the NDP as a party not conscious of people's needs are entirely unfounded. Mr. Speaker, we are more conscious of people's needs in this country than the NDP and Liberal parties put together. Back in 1973, even in opposition we were pursuing a natural resource policy for Canada. I have in my hand a number of documents we put out in 1973 with regard to oil supplies and all the rest.

I hope this will straighten out the position to some extent, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for your indulgence.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, first, I should like to congratulate you on your reappointment to your office. I would like to say how pleased I am to be elected as the member of Parliament for the constituency of Cape Breton-The Sydneys. As such, and on behalf of my constituents, I should like to thank Senator Robert Muir for his 22 years of fine service to the people of that constituency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLellan: As well, I should like to congratulate Senator Muir on his elevation to the Senate. I can truthfully say I share in his success.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacLellan: I am somewhat reassured during the first three days of the sitting of this, the Thirty-first Parliament, because I believe that once the news of the weather in Ottawa this week reaches Cape Breton I may be unopposed in the next federal election.

With reference to the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) said yesterday that Canadians should raise their expectations. From what we have heard since May 22 the only Canadians with any expectations are those who form the present government. Certainly we in Atlantic Canada cannot have any expectations as long as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) is running loose. Prior to May 22 certain areas in Atlantic Canada were promised assistance in the form of the decentralization of various government departments. But following the May 22 election the President of the Treasury Board decreed that this should not take place and the excuse he gave was that the government had to save money, but that money should be saved only in some of these constituencies.

In Nova Scotia decentralization plans were cancelled only in two constituencies represented in this Parliament by opposition members. This is more than just a coincidence when one considers that there are only three constituencies in Nova Scotia represented by opposition members and that decentralization plans had not been made for the third constituency.

In Cape Breton-The Sydneys decentralization was to take the form of almost 400 jobs for the area. Land was purchased and the architectural work for a new building was well under way. There is no question but that in addition to providing jobs decentralization would have revitalized the downtown area of Sydney, from which there would have been a spin-off effect evident in new stores and buildings.

I feel the fact that the government has broken most of the promises it made during the election campaign—and kept the ones it should have broken—is unacceptable to the people of Canada. It is certainly even less acceptable to break the promises of the previous government. The actions of the President of the Treasury Board amount to nothing more than petulant vindictiveness and I appeal to the hon. gentleman to reconsider his action of cancelling decentralization in the Sydney and Antigonish areas. Decentralization planned for Sydney has an importance to that region which far outweighs the cost involved.

The Cape Breton economy cannot withstand the cancellation of these decentralization plans. The latest figures given by the department of development in Nova Scotia showed an unemployment rate of 17.4 per cent in industrial Cape Breton. We are not asking for charity but merely seek an early investment by the Government of Canada in the future of our area. We have no doubt that if our economy follows the course it should take, our economy will be viable in the future. However, we are presently trying to keep our communities intact until such time as the modernization of Sydney Steel, the opening of new coal mines and a more enlightened approach by Canadian National Railways and CN Marine put the Cape Breton economy in a positive position.

With respect to Sydney Steel Corporation, the situation is serious. The British North America Committee has stated that the cost of producing basic products is increasing at three times the rate of inflation and if governments such as ours fail to take positive action there will be a shortage of these basic products by the end of the twentieth century. One of these basic products is steel. Despite this very sobering information, the government has chosen to do nothing to aid Sydney Steel Corporation financially. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay), who during the last Parliament was very vocal in trying to right the wrongs of this country, is suddenly very quiet. I guess he has found that things are very different when you get on the other side of the investigation.

The minister responsible for DREE has promised that substantial aid will be forthcoming. He has not said how much, or when, but he has gained the faith of the people of Cape Breton. Steel workers and merchants alike genuinely believe the minister when he says substantial aid for Sydney Steel is forthcoming. Let us mark this moment, Mr. Speaker. Let us hope that the minister, who in the past has been so much on the side of the individual, will keep his word to the people of Cape Breton who have placed their faith in him. Of course he will need to obtain money, and this brings us back to the President of the Treasury Board. I say to him that Sydney Steel can be profitable and urge him to have some faith in the people of Cape Breton.

It would seem that the government is fast becoming elitist and the Speech from the Throne reflects this. However, I do take some heart from the comment that the government will build upon the strength of the regions. Sydney Steel is a strength in eastern Canada, and if the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or the President of the Treasury Board has any doubts on this question, I would be very glad to inform them of why this is so. In fact I have been trying for over three months to see the Minister of DREE, and now I think he is in danger of giving me an appointment for next week, for which I am very grateful.

• (1800)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Why don't you just walk across the floor?

Mr. Alexander: It is easier; why don't you?

Mr. MacLellan: No, thank you. The penalty is too high. You have a good sense of humour.

Coal is our strength, and everybody in Nova Scotia realizes that. Even the Nova Scotia government has come to realize that. Nova Scotia suffers from extremely high energy costs and wishes to use thermal coal to generate electricity. The Nova Scotia government is constructing two generating stations, and plans for two more, but there is only one problem, namely, a shortage of coal.

Can we possibly believe that in an area with a 17.4 per cent rate of unemployment, and with coal deposits which have already been confirmed, there can be a shortage of coal? The reason for this predicted shortage is that the federal government has not yet decided whether it will open new mines. If we want to know why there is unemployment in Cape Breton, we only have to look to the government which is not investing in Cape Breton even when investment there is a sure thing. I am asking the Minister of DREE and the President of the Treasury Board to get out of neutral and to give the financing to the Cape Breton Development Corporation that would see the development of the Prince mine near Sydney mines, and the Donkin mine, and which would bring it to completion. This is too urgent a request to be denied.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but it being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.05 p.m. the House took recess.

• (2000)

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, there is an urgent need to develop coal mines, mainly because of the ever increasing cost of oil and the time needed to bring a coal mine on stream.

As I said earlier, I think the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the President of the Treasury Board are stuck in neutral. If they are stuck in neutral, then certainly the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) and the Minister of State (Transport) (Mr. Howie) are stuck in reverse. Canadian National Railways and Via Rail are downgrading their services in eastern Nova Scotia. Of course antiquated and inefficient services will not be used, and when they are not used CN in its typical fashion will use that as the reason they are not needed and should be abandoned. I ask the Minister of Transport to look into CN and Via Rail services in eastern Nova Scotia. This is a serious matter which demands immediate attention.

I should like to close on the most incredible note of all concerning the situation which exists in the Cape Breton area. We have an unemployment rate of 17.4 per cent and we have CN Marine operating between North Sydney and Port-aux-Basques, Newfoundland. Because of the unemployment rate, one would think the federal government would upgrade that operation so as to get the maximum benefits of this operation for industrial Cape Breton. Wrong!

Clarke Transportation Canada Ltd. receives a subsidy of approximately $16 per ton to ship from Montreal to Newfoundland. CN Express has given a commitment to Federal Commerce and Navigation Co. Ltd. which operates between Halifax and Newfoundland to ship a guaranteed number of tractor-trailers, all of this to compete with a fellow Crown corporation and deny jobs to an area which greatly needs them. This is contrary to the fact that the fastest route to Newfoundland is through North Sydney. The Department of Transport and Canadian National, with the acquiescence of CN Marine, are giving the cream of the cargo to private firms to the detriment of CN Marine and the North Sydney area.

The right hon. Prime Minister said that he is committed to the small community lifestyle. To that I say small communities cannot exist without jobs. There is a systematic and routine procedure by the Department of Transport and CN Marine to make the facilities at North Sydney so bad that no one will want to use them. If the facilities are not used, the abandonment will be justified.

There is very little advertising of the CN facilities between North Sydney and Port-aux-Basques. As far as average Canadians know, if they want to go from North Sydney to Port-aux-Basques, they would have to put their luggage between their teeth and swim. I appeal to the Minister of Transport, and the Minister of State (Transport) to look into the injustice of the CN Marine operation and to upgrade the North Sydney service as should be done. The subsidy to Clarke Transportation Canada Ltd. and the agreement with Federal Commerce and other private companies are wrong, and I urgently request their termination. People of North Sydney are being unjustly dealt with, and this injustice should be corrected. In addition, cancelling the subsidy to Clark Steamships Limited would greatly aid the President of the Treasury Board, because with the money saved he could proceed with decentralization in the Sydney area.

• (2010)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question, or shall we wait two or three minutes?

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take this opportunity of joining in this debate on the motion in reply to that very excellent and welcome throne speech His Excellency the Governor General delivered earlier this week. It was a throne speech unlike many others I have heard in that it was devoid of a lot of what one columnist called purple prose. It was in fact a terse description of the plans and programs of this government for the coming legislative term.

Some members on the opposition benches have decried the fact that there was nothing new in the throne speech. Several members of the media have said there were no surprises. It was not intended that there should be any surprises. We campaigned earlier this year outlining the programs, policies, and activities or actions we would implement as a government, and the people of Canada by their vote approved of that program. We are now carrying forward our promise to implement it.

The government has clearly indicated it intends to fulfil its commitment to reduce government involvement in the lives of individual Canadians, and its involvement in the economy. We intend to reduce the profligate and wildly extravagant spending patterns that have become the norm in Canada. We intend to reduce the $12 billion deficit, and balance the budget. We do not intend to continue the practices of the previous government of saddling future generations with our extravagances.

The government intends to reduce the involvement of government in the lives of Canadians in other areas. It is the government's intention to reduce its involvement by regulation, and thereby reduce the burden that imposes. We intend to reduce these involvements that result when we have a government, as we have had in the past, which assumes it knows what is best for Canadians, and knows better than the individual what is right, what is proper, and what will lead to a great future. We recognize and have confidence in the ability of Canadians as individuals. We recognize that it is the Canadian citizen, the Canadian individual who is most important, and that if we look after the interests of the Canadian citizen the country's interest will be looked after very well indeed.

That was the thrust of the throne speech. It was not intended to be surprising, but to contain those things we committed ourselves to a long time ago. There was nothing secret. We explained our programs to the people of Canada, they cast their ballots, and now we are going to follow through with those commitments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: I take a certain amount of pride in certain parts of the throne speech and the reiteration of those commitments, particularly those aspects dealing with the area of Crown corporations, an area in which I involved myself to a very large degree while in opposition. I am delighted to note the progress which has been made in this very important area since May. I am delighted to note the actions already taken by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens). I was delighted to note the commitment in the throne speech that we will soon have a Crown corporations' bill presented to the House to put in place a structure that will assure us that never again will an auditor general be able to say, as was said two years ago, that the degree of financial management and control of Canadian Crown corporations was significantly below minimum acceptable standards.

We are going to stop that wastage. We intend to make sure the Crown corporations which remain in federal government hands are run efficiently, effectively, and in the best interest of Canada and Canadians. We are also going to take a look at all these corporations and ask a very simple question: if these Crown corporations were privately owned, would there be any good and compelling reason to nationalize them? If the answer to that question is in the negative, the government will examine the ways by which they might be put back into private hands, thereby fulfilling our commitment, a commitment of which we informed the Canadian people and of which they obviously approved.

I could go on at great length on this subject, Mr. Speaker, but, not wanting to foul up other schedules that may now be in place, I will sit down.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): After the privilege of serving in this House for five years, Mr. Speaker, obviously I cannot come here at this time and pretend to make my maiden speech. But even after some 200 interventions during the last Parliament I am still in a sense making my maiden speech this evening since I now represent the newly named area of Crowfoot rather than Battle River.

I should like to take a few minutes to reflect on my constituency, something I did not do the first time I took part in debate in this House. I do so because this will provide a nice lead to a concern I should like to share with the Parliament of Canada this evening.

Chief Crowfoot was one of Canada's great men. He took a group of people through that very devastating period from 1860 to 1870, a period during which the Indians of the prairies lost everything they depended upon for their livelihood. They lost their source of energy, their source of food, their source of housing, and their ability to maintain a certain lifestyle. All this disappeared with the disappearance of the buffalo. Chief Crowfoot saw the obligation of leading his people through that tragic and devasting period.

It was during that period of time that Chief Crowfoot lost his entire family to smallpox. He was cited by the first prime minister of this country for his tremendous nobility, wisdom, and vision of the future. Chief Crowfoot rebelled against Sitting Bull in Montana and refused to fight with him in Canada. He resisted the Crees and opposed them during the Riel rebellion. Chief Crowfoot has left his mark on early western Canadian history through his fine ability to lead, to speak, and to make his point.

Let me quote directly from what Chief Crowfoot said at the time of the signing of Treaty 7. At that time, an aging man, he said, "In a little while I will be going from amongst you. Where I have come from and where I shall go, I do not know. What is life? It is like the flash of the firefly in the night, it is like the breath of the buffalo in the wintertime, it is like the little shadow that races across the grass and loses itself in the sunset." A person who would say those lines is obviously a man of the land, and it is to that subject that I wish to address myself tonight.

We have heard with just cause concerns tonight and in previous days about energy. We cannot diminish the fact that there is an energy problem, but I submit that the energy crisis in this country as painted by many is so minuscule, so infinitely small in proportion to another greater problem to which Canadians must very quickly address their attention, and that is the rapid disappearance of our agricultural lands.

Four-fifths of the world's population suffer from malnutrition. Approximately 12,000 children a day under the age of 5 are dying from starvation, and some 70 million human beings suffer permanent and irreversible brain damage every year from the lack of protein. In terms of a world perspective there is no crisis so important as that of retaining our source of food production.

The fact of the matter is that there are only two sources of food. One is soil and the other is water. Our water is basically established. Fisheries supplies will increase and decrease in accordance with their management. But the fact about our soil is that we are not making it any more. There are of course some exceptions, and I will come to those a little later in my address.

Half of the agricultural lands of Ontario are now permanently gone, and they are not coming back. There are a great number of acres of additional Ontario land that is tremendously threatened. I come from the province of Alberta. It is a fairly large province, not the largest in Canada but it would encompass most of the countries of Europe. While we are looked upon as a province that has traditionally had agriculture as its number one industry, the truth of the matter is that of the seven classes of soil, our province has only one per cent of class one agricultural soil.

There are some very interesting and important facts that we should recognize. One is the agricultural pattern of how our country was established. Three members of my party and three members of the official opposition party last November had the privilege to join in some good friendship and in some sincere hard work. We had the occasion to visit in the Middle East. While we were there I noted the rich fertile valleys of Egypt and some other Middle Eastern countries, and to see the villages on the rocky hilltops and the larger cities on the tops of mounds amid the rocks. The first thought I had was of the great wisdom of the forefathers of those countries who decided to build their cities there. But it did not have to do with wisdom at all in the sense of agricultural lands. It had to do with the fact that culturally they defended from the top of the mount down. It was easier to shoot a bow and arrow and a cannonball down than it was to shoot upward.

Likewise, here in Canada, we established this country basically on the principles of agrarian society. The old pioneers who came west knew something about fertility. They knew that the deep, rich, black soil was where the poplar trees grew tall and straight. So it is not without coincidence that the cities of Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Regina, Lethbridge, Red Deer, Edmonton and Grande Prairie are all built in the middle of old geological lake beds of silted out soil, the best of our agricultural lands. Of the cities of the prairies that I have just mentioned, I have included every one of the important cities except for Calgary and Medicine Hat. That brings us to the very serious fact of agricultural land uses.

Of our class one and two soil, 50 per cent of all that remains in Canada today is within 35 miles of our largest 22 cities. When we take a look at the program and planning of urban acreage sprawls across the country, we can see that we are facing a crisis situation of paramount importance because our agricultural lands are decreasing at a rate that is far, far too rapid.

Let me put this into perspective. In the world today there is one acre of agricultural land for every citizen on earth. In Canada there are three acres of agricultural land for every Canadian. By the year 2005, if we make no change in our agricultural land policies in this country, we will have three quarters of an acre of agricultural land for every Canadian. As I began my talk about agricultural land tonight, I mentioned that there were some 12,000 children a day under the age of five dying of starvation. That is yesterday, 12,000; today 12,000; tomorrow, another 12,000; and by the year 2005 without any jurisprudent change in the direction that we are going, we will have less agricultural land in Canada than the present world average for world citizens. That is totally and absolutely unacceptable.

I have raised this concern because I see in my own province the city of Edmonton, a fine and a beautiful city, now making application to expand its boundaries by some six times its present size. That cannot go unchallenged. More important, when I mentioned earlier tonight that the cities of Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Lethbridge, Red Deer, Edmonton and Grande Prairie were all built in the middle of old geological lake beds, the fact of the matter is that every one of those cities has all kinds of ample room to expand without going on to agricultural lands, except for the city of Regina. I submit that it is not a question of whether we have acreages nor a question of whether or not we have lawns. Canada does not have to live in concrete towers. We have the second largest land mass in the world. The problem is that there is only 7.5 per cent to 8 per cent of our land in the class one and class two soil zones in climatically favourable areas.

That means that we have to begin to pick and choose where we put our transport systems, and where we put our cities. We have to put a priority on food production in the recognition that today when we eat a meal 40 per cent of what we pay for came from some other country. We think of Canada as a country that is rich and able to produce and export food because we sell a great deal of wheat and we have a red meat market that exports from the country.

But we also depend very heavily on green vegetables and fruits which come from elsewhere. When we consider the simple fact that 40 per cent of what we pay goes somewhere else, then this soil is not something to be wasted. Unfortunately I will have to pass by this subject without dealing with it in the kind of detail that I would like tonight because I do not have my notes with me.

I want to share with the House what some other countries are going through today because of the realization of what the land is worth. In Holland, 21 per cent of the whole country is recaptured land. They are now building a dike that will take 1,600,000 acres of land from the North Sea, but it will be 11 years before it comes into full agricultural production. Many people in Holland live in boat houses on the canals because the land is too precious to use for building.

Throughout Peru, throughout Asia and much of India, the mountains have been terraced up one side and down the other, the steps honed by human beings with shovels. Much of the soil is infertile; it contains no nitrogen, no phosphorus, no potassium. They start from bedrock and build animal dung and fibre up to the surface in order to develop the land. Throughout much of the subcontinent enormous draining programs are being established in order to try to recapture that little bit of the vital element that produces food, namely, soil.

We in Canada have grown up thinking that soil is dirt, not recognizing that all through the history of mankind every advanced culture has started from the foundation of a ready supply of food and a cheap source of energy. The sources of energy were not always oil and gas, or an adequate coal or wood supply. In the Greek or Roman period the energy source was mainly the slave trade. That is not a condition that any of us in the House today would endorse, but nevertheless they had cheap energy. Interestingly, an analysis of the history of cultures that failed shows that everyone of them fell as a result of war or the loss of their food rather than lack of an energy source.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have no energy crisis; we have a systems crisis. We have all the pulp we need to make energy from wood; we have the sun, we have the wind, we have nuclear. Like it or not, it is there; we may not want to use it but that is a decision for Parliament to make. There are an infinite number of ways in which we can develop energy. What we need, Mr. Speaker, are the systems. There is no infinite way to develop a food capacity, however, if we destroy one of the two things that produce food.

I submit an activity like the plan of the city of Edmonton to expand its boundaries is not something about which we can say, "Shame on you; you should not be doing that." No mayor is going to ask the people to re-elect him saying, "Look what I have done. I stopped all the growth in this city. Because I stopped the growth I have saved agricultural land; therefore, you should re-elect me." That is not going to happen and no one can blame city fathers for wanting their cities to grow.

If we are to take a responsible attitude toward agricultural land use, then policies must be developed by one of the two upper levels of government in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: That means that the provinces and the federal government ought to play a more significant role than they have in the past. In this chamber we must realize that resources are obviously a provincial right. Because I believe that agricultural land use is such a very important long-term issue, I would encourage this House to do what it can to persuade the provinces to co-ordinate and concentrate their efforts on something that is going to be vital for our children, our grandchildren and, indeed, our great grandchildren. It is of paramount importance that we do not continue to let other countries with less developed resources than ours, spend virtually all their human energy in the search for some adequate form of food production such as moving back dikes into oceans, or carving away at mountains, while in this country we use some of the best soil in the world as backfill for basements.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, all the aforementioned cities on the prairies, except Regina, have alternatives from which to choose. The city of Edmonton wants to expand its boundaries and, as I said, we cannot blame them for that. Fortunately, however, a move of about 15 or 20 miles to the northeast of Edmonton opens into a large area of solonetzic soil which could easily accommodate a city of vast size.

We have an obligation to get the message out clearly, to get it out often, and to never cease realizing that soil is something we cannot waste today and make again tomorrow—that it is somehow like energy, and when the oil is gone, we can use coal, and when the coal is gone, we can use nuclear. We cannot eat coal and we cannot eat nuclear and we cannot eat sunrays, Mr. Speaker. We need food, and food comes from soil or from water.

We hear of young people in the farming communities of this country who want to go into farming. Sometimes when they are asked what their plans are they reply, "I am going to be just a farmer." Mr. Speaker, farming is the business of food production, the most important business in the world. No society ever advanced that did not have that as its first industry either through the ready production of food within the society itself or very ready access to food purchased fom neighbouring societies.

We in this House must recognize this as a matter of immense, long-term consequence. We must view it in the perspective of the ancient societies where land ran out. In the districts of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers of the Middle East people did what most other cultures of that time did when their food ran out—they moved somewhere else. That is basically what has happened in modern societies; when we ran out of food we moved to a new, fertile land to find a food supply. Then, Mr. Speaker, some fool found that the world was round, and now that we have occupied it all, there ain't no more. This is all we have and it is limited.

I want to conclude by saying that in representing the constituency of Crowfoot I am following a man who as an Indian leader of the prairies recognized very clearly the importance of food, the importance of nature and of living in harmony with it. I would hope that we can somehow imprint upon the minds of parliamentarians and of all Canadians that we must give much greater recognition to the one sure thing we know about soil: they are not making it any more and, by golly, we need it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate and thank the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. We must admit that it is not easy to shed some of the apprehensions we feel when we stand and speak in the House. We all feel a little nervous. Now that I have congratulated them, I should like to tell these hon. members that tradition compels us to be extremely polite with those who make their maiden speeches in the House and that we will tend to be less and less polite as time goes by.

I should like also to congratulate you and your colleagues on your appointments Mr. Speaker, and wish you the best of luck during this Parliament where debates will no doubt be dramatic at times. Finally and more especially, I would like to say how much I am grateful to my constituents of Ottawa-Vanier who were kind enough to re-elect me as their member. It is an honour which I accept in all humility and, in addition to expressing my thanks, I can assure them that I will try to fill that important position by using my few qualifications with the appropriate dignity.

The part of a member, Mr. Speaker, as we know quite well, is to serve as an intermediary between the individual and the government machinery, that enormous and anonymous institution managing public affairs. Each of us tries to follow and understand the problems and decisions which directly affect him while that enormous anonymous machinery takes decisions for us. In addition to the many requests which they receive, members of parliament write to ministers and officials to obtain information that they will pass on to their constituents. This means that while they listen carefully to get acquainted with the views of their constituents, they must also try to think it over before taking a position which will be that of most of their constituents.

As a member of Parliament, all matters of concern to Canadians concern me. But, Mr. Speaker, my first duty lies with the concerns of my electors of Ottawa-Vanier. I love all Canadians, but I also love dearly the electors of Ottawa-Vanier, and I shall allow myself a few comments on my riding.

The city of Ottawa, Mr. Speaker, and the national capital region have become economically dependent because it is the seat of the federal government. It is quite natural that the main industry of the capital of a country should be the government of that country. However, to ensure economic stability, and bearing in mind the impact on the local economy of the measures announced by the present government, we will have to seek and find, here in the area, a greater economic stability based on a policy of diversification and growth, in order for the city to have fewer of the characteristics of a one-company town or more of the several-companies town. The cities of Ottawa and Vanier must in the future take fuller advantage of the facilities found in the area. The national capital area must in the future make better use of the natural resources and its partly developed possibilities. There is need for closer co-operation between the numerous municipalities, the various levels of government in the area; the aim should be to draw them all together.

In Ottawa-Vanier, the sustained revival of the lower town area, the city of Vanier and other sectors of downtown Ottawa, will make of it an important centre of attraction for the area. The development of Rideau Centre—God knows it has been discussed in this House—will encourage promoters and small business whether it be restaurants, theatres, both cinema and legitimate, or boutiques. It is a healthy thing for downtown Ottawa to have a shopping centre as a counterpart of the shopping centres which in the last few years have multiplied in suburban areas. City cores should perhaps be given new life in order for our large centres to offer spots where life is worth living. We are also all aware of the fact that the city of Ottawa and the surrounding area are dominated by a private sector which is oriented towards services, many of which are related to the federal government. There is no doubt that if the federal government wants to reduce the number of civil servants—which is the present policy of this government—more entreprises will disappear or run into financial difficulties. So it is very urgent to take measures to alleviate that dependence on the federal government and to endeavour to find other economic generators.

The national capital area offers tremendous opportunities. It can become a research and development centre of first importance. The Government of Canada and the universities in this area—we have two—do a lot of research, especially in agriculture, natural sciences or communication techniques. The activities of the federal government and those institutions of higher learning give Ottawa and the surrounding area the opportunity to attract a private sector in research and development in an area which can hardly be compared with other areas in the country. So we must attempt to diversify, while attracting new industries to Ottawa and the national capital region.

That is why any proposal aimed at growth and diversification opens promising perspectives. The surest way to growth is the development of existing opportunities, and I am not going to speak of all opportunities, because I would not finish tonight. I am thinking of tourism, light industry, small factories, and the like. Mr. Speaker, there is enough potential here to give our region the economic vigour it once had. These ideas, Mr. Speaker, could easily be pursued or implemented through planning and co-operation procedures, action which would involve the private sector, the regional government, the regional municipalities and the National Capital Commission. Meetings to this end have already been held. One in particular was held last August with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) at which time a resolution was passed to have the President of the Treasury Board set up a panel of experts to study the impact of government decisions on the stability of the local economy. The President of the Treasury Board promised to set up this panel before the end of September. Nothing has yet been done, or at least nothing has been said publicly which would show that he has kept his promise. Since he is made to bear the responsibility for public service cutbacks, one is led to believe that he either is not as interested as he should be in this region or else he does not live up to his word. We shall see!

[English]

I would like now to turn my attention to other matters dealing with what the Conservative party has led us to believe is their social policy. As Liberals, we on this side are dedicated to the individual. Our dedication to the individual extends to just and equitable treatment of all individual Canadians in matters of human rights and social policy. Pensions, unemployment insurance, universal health insurance coverage, and housing are examples of social policies which respond to the needs of individual Canadians. The government, on the other hand, has spouted only rhetoric about its commitment to equitable social policy.

One minister of the Crown has stated that the government will remove the universality inherent in the national pension scheme. Another minister talks about reforming unemployment insurance and, in doing so, he has advocated drastic cuts which would affect expectant mothers, single individuals, and Canadians in economically underdeveloped regions. Still another minister of the Crown has advocated and implemented measures which will give tax credits to home owners while totally and unforgivably forgetting the poor and those who rent. The government's professed commitment to the individual must be qualified. The government is committed only to some things for some Canadians.

Already the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) has redefined the criteria for the Canada Works program to exclude a number of legitimate potential participants in my riding. Under the Liberal government my riding was eligible under the Canada Works program because the labour surplus rate was in excess of 7 per cent. High unemployment was concentrated in small areas of my riding, especially in lower town and Vanier. Today, because of redistribution, several thousand constituents have been added, and my riding became ineligible under the Canada Works program. There are just as many unemployed as there were before. There are just as many unemployed individuals who have not changed except that they have now become statistics. Because of the increased number of people in the riding they have lost their importance under the Canada Works program and are not eligible for any more grants.

The government says it is currently undertaking a review of the unemployment insurance program. The government's lack of concern for individuals in this domain has been striking, as if somehow they did not count as unemployed. They have been denied eligibility for unemployment insurance. Unattached individuals will be penalized because they are unattached. It does not seem to matter very much that statistics show that unattached individuals are in fact the very people who are in need of unemployment insurance.

The average family income in Canada last year was $20,101, while the average individual was earning somewhat less than $8,254 annually. Is the government aware of the number of working women between 55 and 65 who would suddenly be ineligible for unemployment insurance? How many of our youth will be told that they might as well move back home because now they are ineligible for unemployment insurance even though they have made determined but unsuccessful efforts to find or create employment for themselves? The government will have to answer all these questions in the months to come.

We welcome the measure mentioned in the Speech from the Throne which commits the government to a review of retirement policies and pensions for the aged. We hope, however, that the government will not introduce new measures which would in any way tamper with the universality of the Canada Pension Plan. Madame Pelletier in my riding of Ottawa-Vanier should in no way be penalized because she and her departed husband had the foresight to provide for retirement. There will be no justice for Canadians in any such scheme which removes universality.

I would like to speak briefly about the measures the government has announced to allow mortgage interest tax credits for homeowners. While it is to be applauded that some taxpayers are getting a break, the government can only be condemned for its failure to provide similar breaks for other Canadians. The government gives some money to a select few, and pays for it by taking it away from all of us. The vast majority of constituents in my riding are renters. Are they to be penalized because they are too poor, or because they rent, or because they have decided not to own homes? One hon. member on this side pointed out yesterday that since high interest rates have come in with this government, the $1,500 tax credit on mortgage interest has been completely offset by higher mortgage interest. Young Canadians will have no home at all to look to in the future with such contradictory policies.

My point has not been to criticize the government unduly or unfairly. The government speaks consistently of wanting to cater to the individual and to allow the individual to grow and to prosper. I suggest that the abandonment of a social policy designed to provide a respectable standard of living to those who cannot provide for themselves would be an inequitable and unconscionable act.

As Liberal critic on Treasury Board and on personnel matters as they relate to public servants, I would like to comment now on some of the directions the government has taken. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and his colleagues are trying once again to give the impression to Canadians—and it is the wrong impression—that the rapid growth of the federal public service is something which has got out of control. The fact is that from 1968 to 1978 the federal public service, including Crown corporations, grew at an average yearly rate of 3.1 per cent, in response to demands from a growing economy. In the same period the Canadian economy grew at an average annual rate of 4.4 per cent, after subtracting the effects of inflation. In other words, the federal public service grew less rapidly than the economy.

The Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board are trying to hide from the public the fact that the real growth in bureaucracies has been in provincial and municipal governments. Even before the last election the growth of the federal public service had been reduced to zero. Contrast that with Alberta, where the provincial public service grew on an average by 7.4 per cent a year from 1974 to 1977, and in Saskatchewan by 6 per cent. Municipal bureaucracies in Alberta grew by 5.7 per cent yearly during the same period, and in Saskatchewan they grew by 7.3 per cent. The record, of course, is held by a fellow by the name of Lévesque, who sponsored a growth of 13.5 per cent in Quebec's public service in the first year of his administration.

Neither the Prime Minister nor his hatchet man, the President of the Treasury Board, have made it clear yet how reductions in the federal public service can control the growth of these other bureaucracies. Indeed, with their disposition to give away federal responsibilities they may only be adding to these already large bureaucracies. Is this new government trying to make the federal public service pay for the sins of other governments?

Mr. Friesen: Or the previous government?

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): During the recent campaign we were assured that reductions would be made by selling off Crown corporations and by attrition. How will the government avoid lay-offs when it has implemented a blanket cutback of 2 per cent? We are told in press reports that next year it will be 10 per cent, so evidently people will be directly affected, laid off and looking for work.

On the subject of attrition, in recent times Manitoba, which has one of the only governments which has succeeded to some extent in cutting back on public servants, did it, but it maintained—and I think it was right—that it should never use attrition as a way of reducing its public service. The hints and leaks in recent times about major cutbacks in federal programs and personnel suggest that this new government may be preparing to abandon attrition. With 2 per cent cuts, 10 per cent cuts and all kinds of special interest groups, the word "attrition" will be redefined. It doen't mean attrition any more. Mr. Speaker. They have redefined the word "attrition". I wouldn't be surprised to hear the President of the Treasury Board get up some day and say, "Well, we've abandoned that policy, just as we have abandoned other things such as lower interest rates, the embassy move, parliamentary secretaries who were not going to be named—what's another promise here or there?"

It has become increasingly clear that the new government has a very low opinion of its own public service. One of the joys of their rigid ideology is that they need not allow facts to stand in the way of their prejudices. Never mind the opinions of well-informed people across the world who think Canada has one of the best public services there is. Public servants in Canada, in my experience, discharge their responsibilities with the greatest of efficiency. I must admit, though, that having read the Lambert commission report I accept most of its recommendations, but if the President of the Treasury Board intends to adopt some of the measures proposed by Mr. Lambert, he must put in hand a policy for the development and training of public servants, especially if he continues to go the route of attrition. I say this because an approach through attrition takes for granted that all positions are equal. But that is not the case.

If you let attrition take its course through the years how can you tell any public servant that he will not be relocated urgently to replace, for example, an inspector on the east coast who has retired, or died, or decided to quit? How does the minister account for the lack of a training or development program, a global approach to look after the staffing of positions which become vacant? I cannot see any logic in the policy of attrition if it is continued without some assurance from the minister, some admission that it does not work and, second, an undertaking that he will try to put forward positive measures of training and developing new talents in the public service.

The government has for several months had its hands on the final report of the Lambert commission on financial management and accountability which was recently made public. It is to be hoped the D'Avignon report on staffing will also become available in the near future. These reports, taken together, might well call for a far-reaching change in the way the public service operates. Can we expect some response from the government to these recommendations in the present session? Or perhaps the government feels the management of the public service is not sufficiently important to merit its attention. We shall see, and we shall constantly remind the government of the importance of review and of putting forward good recommendations to make the public service more efficient and a more efficacious organization.

I should now like, Mr. Speaker, to deal with a question which deserves urgent consideration from a government that would like to be responsible and attentive to the actions of individuals who have at heart the major national objectives.

Yesterday in his speech the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) dealt with an important question, namely, that Canada means much more than ten provinces, five regions and thousands of municipalities. He said and I quote:

> The way to build a whole nation is to realize that Canada is more than the sum of its parts; it is more than just ten provincial feudalities which are warring together; it is more than just a piece of geography. Canada exists if there is a national spirit and a national will.

I shall add that that community of individuals which is Canada must also have a common ideal that reflects the aggregate of the values, brings about satisfaction and gives a meaning to the aspirations of the heart and the mind.

Mr. Speaker, this national unity must be achieved in the respect and dignity of the individual. We need enlightened leadership, sensitive to the aspirations of all individuals. What the population needs is strong leadership. The public recognizes that problems exist, but it demands precise indications as to the direction to be taken.

If we read the Speech from the Throne, we find a rather general mention about the various elements constituting our country. I quote:

> Confident local identities are emerging—rooted in language, custom and community—and yielding a cultural vitality unique among nations. My ministers believe that the way to build a whole nation is to respect our individual parts, and you will be invited to consider measures to build upon the diverse regional and cultural strengths of Canada.

We may honestly ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker, what measures the government will introduce to reach this objective. The laissez-faire attitude of the Prime Minister as concerns linguistic minority groups is certainly more than reason for concern. In a few words, the Prime Minister has often repeated that he would leave to the provinces the full responsibility of rectifying 112 years of indifference and neglect as concerns the development of these communities, whether in the field of education, of health, of justice or of social services. The Prime Minister says, "Let us leave all that to the provinces." Of course, several members on this side of the House must oppose this attitude, and we shall constantly raise the issue of national interest with the Prime Minister to make him understand the importance of the mandate that he has received to speak for all Canadians, wherever they may be and whatever their position. We are all Canadians first, whether our official language is French or English, and our whole nation is based on the fact that most Canadians speak one or the other of these languages. Nearly one million Canadians outside the province of Quebec speak French. There is no need for me to relate the epic battles that have been fought in various provinces, such as in my own province of Ontario, in New Brunswick, in Manitoba, in Saskatchewan, and so on. I believe all of the provinces could be included. Apart from Quebec, I believe that their history is rather dark on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, we shall not allow this Progressive Conservative government to ignore the minority groups of one official language, any more than we shall allow it to forget other important minorities, because the fact remains, as we have learned rather painfully in Canada, that when you want to destroy a minority, you have only to ignore it, because when you ignore a problem, you are hoping that it will disappear. Indeed, this is what has happened in many provinces. The existence of French-speaking Canadians has been ignored and they have been left to be assimilated without any qualms. These minorities have been allowed to survive with difficulty in spite of conditions which were initially well established in 1867: two founding people to be able to develop in a united Canada. This is not the way it happened.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton)): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired. He would need unanimous consent if he is to continue. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for this gesture. I will be as brief as possible.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, we could not opt for an egalitarian approach, a just and equitable approach, without the approval of the Canadian people itself since the strength of the majority must be put to use to help the vulnerable minorities, be it the poor, the handicapped, the linguistic groups, the native or all of them. I think that the majority of Canadians are aware of the present problems and that they will generously give their support to remedy the situation and help these people survive in this great country of ours which has been partly built on this very diversity.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude my remarks. I still have a lot to say but I will be very brief because I would like to deal with two or three subjects which have to do with federal-provincial relations. However, I will wait another time to do that.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I think it is time for the Secretary of State (Mr. MacDonald) to shed some light on the programs he is considering implementing with respect to the development of minority linguistic communities, and more particularly I would like to hear from the Secretary of State that he is going to renew the federal-provincial agreements having to do with the matter of the support of the federal government in linguistic matters, that is, encouraging the teaching of official languages in the provinces. Yet I insist at least that there be a formal method of reporting so we, Canadians, in every province will know how the provinces are spending the funds the federal government is giving them to encourage them and support their efforts in the field of education.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that federal-provincial relations will really improve only if one day this government can understand the importance for us Canadians living in a minority situation to have a constitutional amendment enshrining rights and liberties, including linguistic rights.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take too much of the time of the House but, very simply this is something I am very interested in, and I will come back to it from time to time.

• (2110)

[English]

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): First, I wish to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your election to the position of Speaker of the House.

Second, I wish to pay tribute to the memory of the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker, the man who walked alone ahead of all of us, always with his head held high and a hand stretched out to the common man, a man who strolled across the face of this nation with an unfaltering gait and a glint in his eye, the glint of eternity. My loss is that I have not had the opportunity to see him perform in this House.

Third, I wish to thank my constituents for electing me to the highest elective office in this country. Democracy is the most brilliant jewel of an evolving civilization. In the course of just 24 hours it reversed the roles of the "ins" and the "outs" in this House. To the official opposition who, just a few months ago, were the government, I dare to quote the last words of Robert Frost's poem entitled "Reluctance". They read:

Ah, when to the heart of man
Was it ever less than a treason
To go with the drift of things
To yield with a grace to reason
And bow and accept the end
Of a love or a season.

I get the distinct impression that some people on the other side of the House still think they are in government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: I sympathize with all those who have been humbled by democracy. At times I have enjoyed working with them, and indeed I hope to enjoy working with them again.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to say something in regard to the former prime minister, now the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), who is not in his seat now. I will simply say this, that the people of western Canada have judged him very harshly.

An hon. Member: They were right, too.

Mr. Yurko: I am glad the hon. member said that because I am quite certain that history will judge him with greater kindness and greater objectivity, and in my estimation, deservedly so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: To the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) who sits on this side, and to all of us over here, I say: congratulations, we have done well and we should pat ourselves on the back.

However, we must remember something, and that is the fallibility of human leadership. We should remember that very well as we wrestle with the swift currents of opinion and the tide of progress. We would be wise to remember that the troika that leads all good governments consists of honesty, husbandry, and humility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: When I resigned from the ministry which I enjoyed in the province of Alberta after literally ten years as an MLA in that province, I wrote to the premier saying "I seek a greater challenge," among other things, to bring regional concerns to the national capital. I had tried to come here some ten years earlier, but this was made impossible by a skinny fellow from Edmonton North, at that time called Steve Paproski.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Yurko: He dared to win the nomination, and he has been here ever since.

An hon. Member: Resign!

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate to say something about one's constituency in one's maiden speech in this House, so let me, first of all, thank my constituents for electing me. My riding resembles the United Nations. Literally, it represents people from every major country in the world. It is the seat of the provincial government and of the municipal government of the city of Edmonton. It was the home of the recent Commonwealth games, that magnificent spectacle of human interaction from almost all the Commonwealth countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: It is the home of the new National Hockey League team which is coming to Edmonton and to Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: It is the home of the mighty Eskimos who recently overwhelmed an eastern team, but not to embarrass them, I shall not name them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: It is the home of finance, technology, management and sheer enterprise of every kind. It is the home of some 90,000 Canadians possessed of western dynamism who have repeatedly asked me to bring their message to this House. They repeatedly said to me "Let us build a city, a province, a nation of people from every corner of the earth so compatible and magnificent that all the world shall note and follow our example." They said, "We can do that because we are endowed with such gifts, we are a land so big and so bountiful, a people so diverse and talented, with a history so young, invigorating, and so lacking in paralysing dogma." Indeed, if you find a fifth generation Albertan, you are lucky, like my son, and my grandson who is sixth generation. Repeatedly they have said, "Let us be free to determine our future, free from overtaxation and too much government; get the government off our backs".

• (2120)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: Also they said, "Let us be united in prosperity, in diversity, and in seeking the future of brotherhood between different cultures, solitudes and races". Amen.

Some hon. Members: Amen!

Mr. Yurko: I do not believe I can relate to the House what they tried to get across to me, what I saw in their eyes. They sent me to this House of conversation.

An hon. Member: Hallelujah!

Mr. Yurko: Hallelujah! I will get to the hon. member a little later. My concern relates as much to the world society as it does to the Canadian one. It has been my distinct privilege to be a member of the Canadian delegation to Stockholm, the population conference in Romania, Habitat, and the conference of northern nations in Japan. Thus I have developed what I hope is a small appreciation of the world. I look upon the world society and I see it adrift. There seem to be no over-all goals, no consistent philosophy, except that some people would make us believe that it is socialism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: There seems to be no inspiration, no over-all meaning, not even any hope. The global society seems apprehensive and confused. It was an experience for all of us to witness on television in the last few days the reaffirmation and the restatement of a few humble absolutes by the Pope, a world figure who came to this continent and excited it like no one else has in the last hundred years.

The courage of our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) in propounding the concepts of fundamental human rights and freedom from war and the ascension of universal democracy recently at the United Nations, was another beam of hope in these turbulent times. I congratulate the minister for her courage in doing so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yurko: I am a man of the newer technologies, having cut my teeth on neutrons, electrons, and nuclear energy.

An hon. Member: That explains it.

Mr. Yurko: If one could perch oneself above the earth as one can today—

Mr. Rodriguez: You are blowing.

Mr. Yurko: Some time I will tell the hon. member how much radiation I have had in the last while. If one could witness the growth of technology, its application, its use and its pervasiveness in the interdependency and interrelationship of individuals, groups, communities and nations in the world itself, one would witness in the unfolding situation the revelation of science to a receptive human mind and the growth and spread of technological application which has accelerated to such vast proportions in the last 50 years or so. Technology has produced serious aberrations in man's own concept of himself and his ultimate destiny and purpose. He has begun to see himself as the ultimate master of his own destiny, as I am sure some socialists have over the last 25 years.

The pervasiveness of technology is so vast and so encompassing that governments at local, intermediate and national levels have increasingly done three things: moved to regulate and control technology, moved to tax the benefits of technology, and moved to redistribute the wealth produced by technology. In doing so governments worldwide have increased all forms of secular authority. In doing so governments and their attendant bureaucracies grew in size explosively and almost irrespective of their political philosophies, whether they be democratic, totalitarian, liberal, conservative, or socialistic in character.

A recent analysis shows the growth of governments in the free nations of the world in the 20-year period from 1955 to 1975. I will not run through all of them, but I should like to refer to a few examples. In the Netherlands the government's share of the gross national product in 20 years grew from 31.5 per cent to 54 per cent; in Sweden from 16.5 per cent to 52 per cent in 20 years; in Ireland from 28 per cent to 50 per cent; in the United Kingdom from 32.5 per cent to 45 per cent; in Germany from 30 per cent to 44 per cent; in Italy from 28 per cent to 43 per cent; in France from 33 per cent to 42 per cent; in Canada from 25 per cent to 40 per cent, now over 42 per cent.

Mr. Rodriguez: What about the United States?

Mr. Yurko: In the United States it grew from 26 per cent to 36 per cent.

Mr. Rodriguez: What about Holland?

Mr. Yurko: I gave the figures for Denmark. In Australia it grew from 22 per cent to 32.5 per cent; in Japan from 17.5 per cent to 25 per cent. This growth in the authority of governments over people's lives has been explosive in just two decades. Indeed a whole new climate of social regulation and cohesiveness developed rapidly. The old authorities of family, community, church and human conscience itself have increasingly been traded and transgressed by the authority of the state. It was and it is a relentless process in virtually all democratic countries. The last 25 years have seen the triumph of de facto socialism and a major concentration of authority over people's lives by governments and their attendant bureaucracies.

It is no wonder that a revulsion has set in throughout many nations as a matter of necessity, indeed as a matter of survival. What is now necessary is more production rather than distribution, more frugalness rather than wastefulness, more initiative and incentive rather than doling out the fruits of technology.

Therefore I agree with the trend in Britain and the statements in the Speech from the Throne. I should like to refer to some of them:

> The basic purposes of that change will be to enhance the rights, freedoms and opportunities of individual Canadians—
> First, my ministers will reduce the burden of government on the economy by better controlling expenditures.
> Second, my government will place greater reliance on individual initiative to generate growth and jobs for Canadians. You will receive proposals for regulatory reform, designed to ensure that the certainty and nature of government regulation encourages individual initiative and planning—
> Measures will be placed before you to assist small and medium-size enterprises—
> Fifth, my government is committed to making Canada self-sufficient in energy by 1990.

Basically that will be achieved through the private sector. These wonderful statements lead the nation in a direction which is absolutely vital after 25 years of de facto socialism which has encumbered each and every Canadian in this vast country of ours to the extent of literally 45 per cent of the gross national product being directly controlled and spent by governments of this nation.

This brings me to the topic of energy. Let me say first that recently because of technology and its complexities a number of hybrids have evolved linking the public sector with the private sector. I have been responsible for some of these myself. One of the most encouraging directions was the formation of the Alberta Gas Trunk Line in Alberta which has become an enormous success, an efficient and imaginative private enterprise tinged with just a bit of government. Indeed, the Alberta Energy Company is an example of the tying together of private enterprise with a bit of government. It is enormously successful and I do not doubt that a few members in this House have a few shares in that company, shares which have gone up quickly from $10 to $40. Indeed, the British Columbia Resources Corporation is another example. There are many examples which have evolved as a result of the power given to a few people through technology. That is what the multinational oil corporations have, a vast pool of technology that gives them access to capital in unlimited proportions enabling them to go anywhere and increase their riches.

• (2130)

Let me say this about Petro-Canada, Mr. Speaker. Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation does not need to be engaged in the operation of service stations, in marketing, in refining, or in LPG plants. Indeed, it does not need to be involved in some of the transportation systems. Petro-Canada can be converted to an instrument of national cohesiveness for the assurance of self-sufficiency in energy in partnership with existing oil companies in Canada, or in partnership, for example, with the provinces, or even through partnership with Canadians, as has been the case with the Alberta Energy Company.

There are a variety of ways that Petro-Canada can be adjusted and tailored to become far more effective in assuring self-sufficiency in energy down the way than in the manner in which it is structured today. I have had a lot of experience with Crown corporations provincial in scope, and they are not the most responsive type of vehicle for creating wealth.

The industrial world has built a vast productive machine almost totally dependent on what used to be $2 or $1.85 a barrel oil. This made the OPEC cartel not only possible but powerful. That cartel raised world oil prices ten to 12-fold in just six years, and thereby placed in motion an effective system of world wealth redistribution and financial power reallocation. A similar phenomenon is occurring within Canada itself.

Each industrial nation was faced with converting its industrial base from low-cost energy to high-cost energy. During the transition period each nation had to act quickly, and I pity the nation that did not or does not move as fast as it should at the earliest opportunity.

Each nation had three choices in adjusting its economy. The first choice was to do nothing and become poorer, with the people of the nation becoming poorer primarily through inflation, which is nothing more than that process which makes all of us poorer whether we like it or not.

The second choice was to live on debt. They could borrow and borrow and borrow, which the United States and Canada have done, to the extent that we have mortgaged our future with the inflation rate now causing considerable hardship in these nations.

The third choice was to produce more. We could produce more, become more competitive in the world economy, competing with some of those nations that are far more productive.

What this government is trying to do is follow that third approach. It is not following the second approach because we have exhausted our ability to live on debt. This nation has mortgaged its future to the extent that the foreign debt, I believe, is no less than $5,000 per capita.

Inflation is no mystery. The United States delayed its inflationary rate by not becoming poorer for a while and now they are suffering a 14 per cent inflation rate. Canada accepted the brunt a few years ago and now suffers a lesser rate of inflation. As I said, inflation is nothing more than a process for making us all poorer. We have been living beyond our means. The resistance to becoming poorer results in a vicious process of government versus government, community versus community, union versus government and management, corporate entity versus corporate entity, and man versus man. The weak suffer the most. Unemployment relegates many to the redundancy heap, and it is perhaps the most vicious way of making people poorer; the aged on fixed incomes, the sick, the weak, those with the least wealth, power and authority; they are the ones who suffer the most. This is the Canadian situation created by the previous government and inherited by the present government. It is not a rosy situation. It is a most difficult situation, Mr. Speaker.

World oil prices will rise. I spent three days in Washington, and every official I talked with there indicated to me the vulnerability of Mid-East oil. Indeed, some pretty serious projections of the instability in that part of the world were made behind closed doors. World oil prices will rise to between $30 and $50 per barrel before substitutes for conventional oil become economically feasibile.

The United States has little choice. It has to become involved with substitutes through liquification and gasification of coal, and that nation has something like 24 per cent to 30 per cent of the world's coal reserves. There is that potential there, but what the United States will have to do is convert the entire society which was built on $2 per barrel oil to $30 per barrel oil. This will cause a major upheaval in the United States and I can assure all members in this House that the effects will be felt in this nation in a serious way.

The incentives, indeed the requirements for moving this country toward oil self-sufficiency are therefore paramount. Indeed, it is imperative to reduce our imports. The price of petroleum must rise. Oil pricing is now established by the forces of supply and demand in the world. There is a much greater demand than the present supply can meet. The Iranian situation has proved that. Saudi Arabia has cut back a million barrels a day. This winter will give us another example of the supply not meeting the demand.

Oil is a peculiar commodity. It is very difficult to place a value on it. It was produced by nature over a billion years. Man came along in the last 100 years, dug a hole and took it out of the ground and said it was worth $1.85 a barrel. Who is to say that is right? This is one of the most vitally important commodities the world has ever known. What is its value? Does man produce it? He can produce it from coal and from biomass which indirectly is solar energy, and the costs are in the area of the equivalent of $30 to $50 a barrel. The appetite for oil is insatiable. In the United States alone the consumption tripled in a mere 25 years.

Earlier this year I wrote out the four points of what I thought to be a national energy strategy. Let me just read them for you. The first is security of energy supply to all parts of Canada with the potential for no less than 50 per cent of total energy needs for any region from Canadian sources. The second is Canadian energy self-sufficiency, that is, zero net oil imports, because the nation is self-sufficient in energy today. It is not self-sufficient in oil. It is oil that we import, because we are self-sufficient in energy—self-sufficiency within a maximum period of 15 years or by 1990 if possible from diversified energy sources. Three is a Canadian deliverability of oil and gas to all regions of Canada; oil or gas. Four, maintaining a healthy, competitive and expanding primary and secondary manufacturing industry in Canada through appropriate energy pricing policies. However, it should not be to the extent that productivity decreases and the competitive spirit is killed. There should be a small advantage to Canadian manufacturing, but only a small one to make it efficient and productive, because that is the key behind the revival of the economy.

I also laid out six points forming a national energy plan. In it I included the fact that we need a major thrust in energy conservation through price adjustments and waste use elimination, major new initiatives in increasing conventional energy reserves and supply capabilities including oil, gas, nuclear, hydro, coal, oil sands, heavy oils, enhanced recovery and others.

The third point in my national energy plan was substantive extension of Canada's energy deliverability to and within all regions of Canada; fourth was a program of extensive energy supply and use redeployment on a regional, and use-cost basis. My fifth point was an accelerated program of research, development and the construction of demonstration facilities of new energy forms like gasahol, solar, tidal, wind, biomass and so forth. Finally, my sixth point was a total review and reassessment of present and possible future Canada-U.S. energy intertwinement arrangements. The question which must always be asked is are they always in the Canadian interest?

I do not know how much time I have left. I believe it is very little, but I had hoped to have something to say about the province of Alberta. What does the province of Alberta want? It wants its rights under the constitution. Under those rights it wants to build and to be a dynamic and vibrant part of Canada. It has opened its borders to young men and young women from all across the nation to come and find employment, opportunity, and a future.

In the United States capital and labour move across the face of the land almost unimpeded. In our nation we have a formula process which I support, but it can get out of hand. It is a process called equalization where people are literally forced through economic handouts to stay where they are.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired, and due to the fact that there will be a vote in four minutes and the fact that another member wishes to participate, I regret that I cannot give the hon. member an extension of time.

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, given the lateness of the hour and the importance of the issue we will decide at 9.45, I would like to take an extract from my speech which deals with the important amendment to the address from the House to His Excellency, that deals with Petro-Canada. I strongly support the amendment which was moved yesterday by my leader. However, with regard to the amendment to the amendment which was introduced thereto, I have strong reservations.

The issue raised in the subamendment was already dealt with by the House on March 20, 1979, and was soundly rejected by a vote of 190 to 13. As the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) said this afternoon, "We have no objections to the retail aspect. The power is currently in the act that governs Petro-Canada but with regard to the importer aspect, we have several problems."

First of all why should we put all our eggs in one basket? Canada's energy flexibility would be greatly reduced as a result. Secondly, we have many existing contracts which would undoubtedly have to be renegotiated, and ultimately at much higher prices for Canadians. Finally, we now have a system which works for Canada, and to alter this system radically would jeopardize rather than enhance Canadian energy security. For these reasons I do not intend to support the amendment to the amendment moved by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent).

If I could, I would now like to start my prepared text. At the outset I would like to add my name to those who have congratulated the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) on the manner in which they moved and seconded the reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I would like to preface my remarks by stating my sincere appreciation to the people of Ottawa Centre for the confidence they demonstrated in me on May 22. Ottawa Centre is indeed a unique riding, and I am honoured to represent its electors. The Parliament Buildings are located within its boundaries, thereby creating a federal presence known nowhere else in Canada. There is another dimension which I believe is characteristic of few other ridings. Ottawa Centre is to me a microcosm of the country itself. It has a wide range of cultural, social, economic, and political groups, making it a true reflection of the the vertical mosaic which is Canada, a mosaic in which each individual contributes in his or her own unique way to the strength and vitality of Canadian society.

The people of Ottawa Centre also represent a group of Canadians who, I believe, are better informed than their peers on matters of public policy and their implication. They feel the intimate presence of the four levels of government and have demonstrated their ability to voice reasoned opinions on the issues of the day. However, while the pervasive federal presence has certain advantages for Ottawans, there are also very real disadvantages.

The advantages are of course the many amenities which accompany the physical location of the seat of government. The Parliament Buildings, the National Arts Centre, the Museum of Man, the canal, the National Art Gallery, the Supreme Court, the National Library, the Garden of the Provinces, the Postal Museum, and the Bank of Canada are all located in the riding of Ottawa Centre and are a source of pride and enjoyment to the people of Ottawa Centre and, indeed, to all Canadians who take the opportunity to visit our beautiful city. May I call it 9.45, Mr. Speaker?

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 38(3) to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment that is now before the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment in the name of Mr. Broadbent. All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR FULL-TIME MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that the throne speech made mention of amending certain legislation respecting veterans, and given the absolute desire on the part of Canada's veterans to have their own, sole minister of veterans affairs instead of presently having the Departments of Veterans Affairs and of National Defence downgraded to a dual ministry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Lamontagne):

That the Prime Minister immediately pay proper respect to the veterans of Canada by appointing a minister whose specific responsibility will be the Department of Veterans Affairs, and at the same time give the members of Canada's Armed Forces their own full-time minister.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to that Standing Order, would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA WORKS

REQUEST FOR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on an urgent and pressing matter.

In light of the changes made by the Progressive Conservative government to the Canada Works program, and in view of the injustices that such changes have produced in many ridings where there exist wide economic disparities, as in Saint-Henri-Westmount, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Mrs. Killens):

That the present government abandon this bad policy and that the Canada Works program be reinstated in its original form so that communities and the unemployed who are really in need may benefit from it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion put by the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR CONTROLS ON INTEREST AND PROFIT MARGINS OF BANKS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that with every increase in the Bank of Canada's interest rate, the chartered banks use this opportunity to increase the margin between what they pay depositors and what they charge borrowers, and in view of the fact that these same banks in the third quarter of this year were paying taxes at a rate of just over 10 per cent on ever-spiralling profits, thus increasing the burden on the working taxpayer, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House call for immediate controls on interest and profit margins in the banking industry, and the imposition of a surtax on the banks to bring their effective tax rate to 50 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to that Standing Order, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOOD AID TO KAMPUCHEA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, having recently returned from southeast Asia, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the starvation, war and inhuman suffering vested upon the unfortunate people of Kampuchea, formerly Cambodia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That the Government of Canada encourage and assist non-governmental organizations and other voluntary groups, the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization and the International Red Cross, in delivering humanitarian food aid to Kampuchea.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

PETRO-CANADA

CONDEMNATION OF PLAN TO DISMANTLE CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the multinational oil companies have consistently operated in violation of the public trust, as witnessed by a recent court case and investigations by the federal Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs under the Combines Investigation Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde):

That the House condemn the government plan to dismantle Petro-Canada and that it instruct the government to cease any actions which would jeopardize the ability of Petro-Canada to operate in the interests and defence of all Canadians and as an instrument of public policy.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR REFUGEE STATUS FOR SIX POLISH SAILORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of the utmost urgency.

Given the plight of the six Polish sailors who have jumped ship in St. John's, Newfoundland, in the hope of being granted refugee status in Canada so as to escape the burden of oppressive dictatorship in their native Poland, and given the fact that this matter was brought to the attention of both the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) more than two weeks ago, with no action having been taken, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan):

That this House call upon the minister of immigration to exercise his ministerial prerogative and immediately issue permission for these sailors to remain in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be made only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA WORKS

FUNDING FOR PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) has unilaterally cut off Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba from Canada Works funding, including many regions like the Churchill constituency which has areas of unemployment exceeding 80 per cent, and has justified his actions by counting only the number of UIC beneficiaries rather than the number of unemployed people to determine the qualifying rate, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration consider the actual number of people who are unemployed in a riding in determining which ridings in Canada are eligible for Canada Works funding, instead of using the deceptively low figures of the labour surplus rate.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with unanimous consent, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ATLANTIC CANADA—UNEMPLOYMENT CAUSED BY FREEZE ON FEDERAL ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to debate a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the government decided to freeze and cancel federal construction projects in Atlantic Canada this past summer and terminate hundreds of jobs of term and contractual federal employees, and freeze vacancies, causing inferior government service in vital areas, resulting in rising unemployment during the short construction season, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey):

That the government reverse its decision to freeze federal activities in areas of high unemployment like Newfoundland, and reverse its policy toward the federal civil service in Newfoundland of fire and retire.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robert Bockstael (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

Considering the effect of high interest rates on small businesses and food producers in this country and the potential resulting unemployment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Phillips):

That the Minister of Finance immediately bring down a budget with measures contained therein to alleviate such adverse effects caused by these high interest rates.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House, in accordance with Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LOCATION OF CANADIAN EMBASSY IN MIDDLE EAST

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Before asking the question, however, I should like to congratulate her on taking over the leadership of a great department of government. I have had the experience of serving in that department and know what a dedicated and professional staff is at her disposal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: My question concerns the decision of the government to move the Canadian embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. I should like to ask the minister, now that she is settled into her job and shows increasing confidence, whether she has been able to reverse the misguided policy of the Prime Minister who has stated that he moved too early, that he moved without being briefed on all the nuances, and that it was a mistake. Is she now able to tell the House that she has succeeded in getting her colleagues to reverse this misguided decision of the government?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member has been spending much of his time in Cape Breton, but I am sure that is not beyond the reach of news of what has been going on in this area.

I should like to inform the hon. member, if he is not aware of it, that the government has appointed a very distinguished Canadian in the person of the Hon. Robert Stanfield as its ambassador at large to look into this question along with many other factors that apply to Canada's relations with countries of the Middle East. He will make recommendations to the Government of Canada on how its relations with those countries can be improved, can be upgraded and, in fact, how we can contribute to the development of peace in that area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I appreciate the minister's commentary, but she has not told the House whether the policy on moving the embassy will still stand. I take it that policy is still the policy of the Government of Canada, namely, to move the embassy to Jerusalem. I ask the minister if that is right. Will she tell the House and the country—and this is the first time we have really had a chance to ask—what Canadian interests are served politically and economically by pursuing this very misguided policy?

● (1120)

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, in appointing the Hon. Robert Stanfield to look into this question and to make his recommendations to the Government of Canada, the hon. member should be aware that there were no restrictions placed on Mr. Stanfield's inquiry as to the people with whom he consults, the countries he visits or the recommendations he makes to the government. When those recommendations are made, the government will then further elaborate on that facet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the minister has failed twice to answer whether it is still the decision of the Government of Canada to move the embassy: the answer has not been given.

I ask the Prime Minister whether it is still the decision of the Government of Canada to move the embassy, or has that decision been suspended? I ask him, further, are the terms of reference of Mr. Stanfield—an undertaking of what we regard as quite an unnecessary mission—broad enough to allow him to recommend against the movement of the embassy and the recognition of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel? Are the terms of reference that broad, or are his terms of reference only relating to timing and modalities? Please tell us what the minister has failed to tell us, whether it is still your policy today, never mind hiding behind your former leader, to move the embassy.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the shock of moving across the floor has affected negatively the former minister's ability to understand information transmitted across the House, even if it has not reduced his verbosity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has replied to the question. She has indicated that there were no conditions set upon the recommendations that will be made by the Hon. Robert Stanfield as a result of his inquiries in the Middle East. We would not, naturally, send a man of his stature on a mission of this importance if we had told him what to report before he went. We are going to base our decision on the report that he gives when he returns.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Miss MacDonald.]

MANDATE OF HON. ROBERT STANFIELD

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he confirm that the cabinet has given special envoy ambassador Stanfield an entirely free hand in deciding whether to meet, or not to meet, the PLO representatives as confirmed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and reported in The Globe and Mail dated October 11?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear, and has been clear since the terms of reference of ambassador Stanfield were released, that he is free to meet all groups, all spokesmen who can contribute to the development of an efficient Canadian policy on the Middle East.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The right hon. Prime Minister knows Mr. Stanfield holds the rank of ambassador; does he not then realize that such a meeting could be interpreted as recognition of the PLO?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the position of Mr. Stanfield is that of ambassador extraordinary and I underline the importance of the word "extraordinary". He was appointed ambassador to investigate a very specific situation. Because of the adjective "extraordinary", there can be no implication of official recognition, by the Canadian government, of any group with which he may have consultations, except in the sense that he has the right, the duty to meet such persons as hold enlightened views with regard to the development of a strong and efficient Canadian policy on the Middle East.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASE OF NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. First, I would congratulate the minister on his appointment and wish him well.

In view of the recent foreign policy review announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will the minister reconsider his own position and introduce a white paper on defence before going ahead with the $2.3 billion new fighter aircraft purchase?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes and I extend the same to him as the defence critic of the NDP. As to other defence critics, I hope you will do as well as your predecessors.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: In so far as the new fighter aircraft are concerned, I have been in correspondence with the hon. member and have made my position rather clear to him, that we intend to go ahead with the purchase of the new fighter aircraft as scheduled.

Mr. Sargeant: In view of the government's welcome initiative on freedom of information, will the minister confirm that a report entitled "DITC, Industrial Benefits Evaluation Report, July 1979", was prepared by members of the negotiating committee in his department regarding the new fighter aircraft and, if so, will the minister table this report in the House of Commons?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I will table the necessary reports when the final decision has been made and the contract signed. At that time I will give all the information I possibly can without endangering national security.

Mr. Sargeant: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since this report, of which I have received a copy, clearly indicates that the so-called plane competition is nothing but a gigantic charade, will the government follow the advice of Dr. John Shepherd, vice chairman of the Science Council of Canada, and delay the purchase of this plane for a limited period in order to avoid placing a major, serious and expensive burden on the people of Canada?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the philosophy of the defence critic for the NDP that this is going to be something that will not be absolutely necessary. We do not enter into these purchases lightly.

As far as the report is concerned alleging that the competition was a sham, I believe the report was not quite the one that it is purported to be. It was leaked some time ago. I did not find it worth while commenting on at the time. It was turned down at the first level of review. I am sorry the hon. member has taken it so seriously. The leaking of reports on a serious matter like this makes it more difficult to carry on negotiations, but negotiations have been carried on in a fair and competitive manner despite the leaking of that report.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SUGGESTED RELOCATION OF CANADIAN EMBASSY IN MIDDLE EAST—REACTION OF COMPANIES

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my question to the Minister of State for International Trade. I wish to ask if he is aware and if he can inform this House how many companies have expressed their objection to the proposed move of the Canadian embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a precise number as to how many companies have spoken to me or my department on the question of the move of the embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. A number of companies have expressed some concern. We are keeping in close contact with them in order to be able to monitor the commercial impact of any policy adopted. This is a policy that is of considerable importance to our department.

• (1130)

Mr. Herbert: I should like to ask the Minister of State whether he is aware that contracts between Bell Canada and the Arab nations worth in excess of half a billion dollars are presently in suspense. Is he aware, also, that Canadian companies need no longer bid on Iraqi projects, more specifically on a major aeroport facility?

Mr. Wilson: The whole question of bidding on contracts in the Middle East, as well as the status of existing contracts in the Middle East, is not entirely clear. There is no question that there has been some hiatus as a result of the announcement in June—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Wilson: —but, on the other hand, a number of contracts have been successfully concluded and as far as we are aware no contracts have been cancelled.

SUGGESTED RELOCATION OF CANADIAN EMBASSY IN MIDDLE EAST—EFFECT ON TRADE

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. It concerns a telegram which he has received from the telecommunications trade fair in Geneva sent to him by Mr. Don Cruikshank, president of the Canadian Telecommunications Carriers Association, in which he says that doors are being slammed in the faces of Canadians and that Arab delegates are telling Canadians that contracts worth literally billions of dollars and thousands of jobs will not be negotiated or renewed if Canada does not quickly resolve its position on the possible removal of our embassy from Tel Aviv.

I am aware that the Prime Minister has sent Mr. Stanfield on a mission, but that sort of thing takes a long time. What is the right hon. gentleman doing in the meantime to ensure that Canadians will not lose out to their competitors who, as he knows, are taking advantage in this area at this international trade fair because of the government's stand concerning the removal of the embassy to Jerusalem?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): I have not seen the telegram to which the hon. lady refers. I will check my files and look at it and, of course, I will reply to it as required.

With regard to the more substantive part of the question, we believe it is now broadly understood by Canadian businessmen and others dealing abroad, as well as by the countries and traders with whom they are dealing, that the mission of Mr. Stanfield has a very broad mandate, that Mr. Stanfield intends to report as quickly as possible, and that the government intends to act very quickly once we are in receipt of his report. We hope that any suspension of contracts to Canada which might result from the present situation will be brought to an end as quickly as possible.

COMMUNICATIONS

PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN BELL CANADA AND SAUDI ARABIA

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Communications who seems to be just as complacent as the Prime Minister who, two days after receiving that telegram, said that everything was fine and would be settled and that especially Bell Canada, now busy carrying out a very important $1 billion contract in Saudi Arabia, "were sleeping low".

I understand that not only "they are sleeping low" but they are skating on thin ice, because things are not as satisfactory as the government suggests and immediate action is required. I want to ask the minister whether he knows if the contracts already signed are still being carried out, if payments under existing contracts already signed are made and if negotiations about new contracts worth at least $1 billion are going on at the same pace as before the untimely statement of the government?

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I have had an opportunity on occasion to speak to representatives of Bell Canada with respect to their contracts in the Middle East. I do know there has been some difficulty during the course of the summer. I had meetings with the president of Bell just before his most recent visit to the Middle East and I expect to be seeing him again shortly. The government will certainly do everything possible to facilitate these important contracts.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT REACTION ON RETURN OF HON. ROBERT STANFIELD

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton): The Prime Minister indicated a few seconds ago that he would react very quickly following Mr. Stanfield's return. Could he be a little more specific and explain whether quickly means ten days, 15 days, or what? Will we have to wait until next spring? And has he already received from the Secretary of State for External Affairs some elegant words to create the impression that he is going forward when in fact he is backing up?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I need elegant words, I look for them myself. Some ministers are indeed endowed with elegant eloquence. I can reply directly to this question by saying that no specific timetable has yet been set up. Mr. Stanfield, I think, is about to leave the Middle East. He is expected here in a few days. I hope he will be able to provide us with a report on his mission within the next few weeks and, having looked into it, that we will be able to take concrete measures as soon as possible, maybe before or immediately after Christmas.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS UNDER COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I should like, first, to congratulate him on his appointment and wish him well in carrying out the duties of this portfolio in addition to his other responsibilities.

The hon. gentleman is aware that his department has recently referred two cases of possible criminal violations under the Combines Investigation Act to his colleague, the Minister of Justice, involving the Western Transport Association, based in Alberta, and the Household Goods Company. Will the minister confirm, first, that a meeting took place this morning involving himself, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Transport and, second, that the Minister of Transport is attempting to intervene personally in this possible prosecution by the Minister of Justice?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I thank the hon. member for his good wishes, and I would inform him that the source of his information is completely and totally erroneous.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): The minister did not tell us whether, in fact, a meeting did take place this morning. Did a meeting take place with the three ministers involved and, if such a meeting did take place and the Minister of Transport is attempting to squelch any possible prosecution, how does this accord with the concern expressed by his colleagues about the involvement of former Liberal cabinet ministers in the judicial process?

Mr. Lawrence: There has been a whole series of ongoing meetings at both the officials' level and at the ministerial level. At that ministerial level there is on many occasions, obviously, a need for real consultation among the ministers about departmental concerns. There is no question there was a meeting this morning about this matter, but nothing has been squelched by any means, by anybody. It is one of a series of ongoing meetings.

INQUIRY WHETHER FEDERAL CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS IN QUEBEC WILL BE IMPLEMENTED

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): My question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the announcement yesterday by the president of General Motors of Canada of a $2 billion investment in Ontario, and the great hopes the Minister of Supply and Services has raised of an imminent major investment by this firm in the province of Quebec, which now seems to be an illusion, could the right hon. Prime Minister indicate whether he will amend the policy of his government and allow the immediate completion in Quebec of important federal construction projects which are all systematically paralysed just now?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are two aspects to this question. The first deals with the decision of GMC. I understand that this corporation has not finalized its decision concerning alternative investments with major implications in the province of Quebec and this is something the federal government is currently encouraging through its Department of Regional Economic Expansion and other government agencies. As to the second aspect of the question, we want to examine very seriously all major projects in both Quebec and the rest of Canada to make sure they are worth while and useful before committing considerable amounts of public money to their realization.

Mr. Pinard: If we come back to reality, it seems almost evident now that, in the short term at least, GM will not invest a significant amount in Quebec. And the government has been elected for five months and a half. Can we expect that work will resume in a near future at the Guy Favreau complex in Montreal, at the research centre in Boucherville and at the penitentiary institutions in Donnacona, Drummondville South, Mirabel, at the cartography centre in Sherbrooke, and dozens of major construction projects, federal projects which would ensure a federal presence in Quebec and which are systematically paralysed, as indeed confirmed publicly and shamefully by the Minister of Supply and Services?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it has not been established that GM will not make any major investments in the province of Quebec in the short term. There has been no official announcement to that effect. I cannot confirm whether such investments will take place, but there has been no such decision concerning investments either in the short term or in the long term.

As for the projects mentioned by the hon. member, it is essential for us not only to ensure a federal presence in the province of Quebec, but also to get efficient projects under way in that province which will answer real needs. That is why we are currently reconsidering the projects the hon. member has talked about as well as others. We hope to be able to come to a decision very soon and then we will implement these projects as soon as possible in a way that will have a true impact.

CANADIANS HELD IN MEXICAN JAIL WITHOUT BEING CHARGED—REQUEST GOVERNMENT PROTEST TREATMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I join with others who genuinely offer her good wishes.

My question arises from the fact that Kirk Thomas and Mark Rollin were arrested in Mexico last June and held in jail for three months without charge under circumstances which John Howard, the prison reformer of the eighteenth century, would have found deplorable and inhumane even in England at that time.

My question is very simple. Would the minister, through the proper diplomatic channels and through her department, once again on behalf of the Canadian people protest this illegal process and abuse?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and tell him that we have already initiated action in that regard.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY WHETHER GM DECISION TO INVEST $2 BILLION IN CANADA HAD GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister relating to the announcement that was made by GM to invest $2 billion in Canada. First, I would like to know if that decision of GM was approved by the government and, second, considering that when Ford Company had also announced important investments they got a generous subvention from the federal government, I want to ask the Prime Minister if in the case of the investments announced by GM there was a contribution from the federal government.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that was not a decision which involved support or opposition from the government. It was a private decision by the company. There is another decision which is going to be taken by GM concerning the province of Quebec, and in which the federal government, particularly the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, is deeply involved. That is the kind of decision which is similar to the one concerning Ford Company in the case of Ontario.

INQUIRY WHETHER GM RECEIVED SUBSIDY TO INVEST IN QUEBEC

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): I have another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to address a very precise question to the Prime Minister. Is this $2 billion project financed by the federal government in any way?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think so. As I am not sure, I can look into the matter and give a more precise answer on Monday. According to the minister, the Canadian government had absolutely nothing to do with the decision announced yesterday by GM.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the new Secretary of State. On this my first opportunity to question him, I would like to congratulate him on his new responsibilities.

In view of the Secretary of State's own statement back in November of last year, during a budget debate, that our institutions of culture are starved for funding, that such neglect of culture can only seriously jeopardize the well-being of this nation, and that we must bring a new vigour to federal responsibility, can the Secretary of State now bring vigour or even adequately cope with the very complex and troubled cultural field when his responsibilities also include communications as well as inner cabinet responsibility for the whole onerous area of social policy? Surely, no individual can do justice to any one of these while carrying responsibility for all three.

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his kind comments and for his encouragement. I am delighted that he is rereading some of my old speeches. Many officials have been rereading my old speeches, as well, in the past few months.

I welcome the support of the hon. member, particularly in his important role as spokesman on behalf of his party with respect to cultural responsibility and Secretary of State matters in this country. I very much share with him the important concern we all have with respect to adequate funding for artistic activity. The hon. member will know that we have already moved to restore the $2 million which was cut from the Canada Council by the former government last summer.

FINANCE

DETERMINATION OF MONEY SUPPLY BY BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister is purported to have expressed some frustration—which I suppose is understandable—but with regard specifically to the fact that interest rates are continually increasing and yet consumer spending, borrowing and credit expansion seem to be ever present—in other words, we have a circumstance where there appear to be high interest rates but we do not have tight money—I am wondering whether it would not be appropriate for the Minister of Finance to discuss with the Bank of Canada the question of revising, among other things, the monetary aggregates which are currently being used to determine money supply.

I understand that the bank is still adhering to M-1, and it seems that in periods of high interest rates such as we are experiencing there is a tendency to move into term deposits included in M-2, so could that matter be taken up with the governor of the Bank of Canada to determine whether new criteria might be introduced at this time?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, the Bank of Canada pays particular attention to the M-1 category of monetary aggregate. I will certainly discuss with the governor and the Bank whether they think there is any change needed or whether they should consider any other ranges, M-2 or whatever. However, at the present time the Bank does not see any need to consider anything other than M-1, which is its primary target.

By the way, I had my regular weekly meeting with the governor of the Bank of Canada this morning, and we discussed this and other issues.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AVOID DISRUPTION IN POSTAL SERVICE

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. I should like to take the opportunity of this first question to congratulate him for his appointment and at the same time wish him the best of luck. I hope he will demonstrate in his negotiations both firmness and tolerance, as we have done in the past.

The Postmaster General is undoubtedly aware of the fact that we are rapidly approaching the deadline when most collective agreements in the Post Office come to an end, that is December 31, 1979.

In view of some statements, press releases and comments to the effect that negotiations are dragging on and considering that in some circles the possibility of a strike has been raised, and also in order to reassure Canadian businessmen for whom postal service is essential and vital in certain cases, not to mention the general public—

[English]

—do the hon. Postmaster General and the government intend to take vigorous and responsible measures, before it is too late, to ensure that there will be no slowdown or disruption of postal service at such a crucial moment? If so, what form will that action take?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank my hon. friend, the former postmaster general, for his kind congratulations. I want to assure him that those problems with which he wrestled before being moved to the other side of the House are being attended with considerable diligence by his successor.

Specifically, there are pre-negotiations taking place with several of the unions. The contracts in a number of unions expire December 30. There is an issue of importance, and that is that probably this will be the last contract negotiated under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

I have suggested to the unions that possibly they would want to enter into short-term contracts to carry over into the period in which the Crown corporation would be established. My discussions with the union leaders have been amicable. I am sure the hon. member would want me to go into negotiations with a note of optimism, as I am sure he would be doing if he were in my place.

FORTHCOMING VISIT OF PRESIDENT CARTER—CONSIDERATION OF SALT II AGREEMENT

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Regarding his announcement yesterday that we will be honoured with a visit by the President of the United States and Mrs. Carter to Canada, and that he will be addressing a joint session of Parliament, obviously the government will be evolving appropriate receptive initiatives.

Is any consideration being given to formal endorsation of the President's initiative with respect to the SALT II agreement? If yes, perhaps it may even be appropriate for such endorsation to come from both Houses of Parliament.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is an excellent suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: But I know—

Mr. Allmand: You have set aside time for that.

Mr. Clark: I know hon. members on the other side, accustomed to other habits, will not believe this, but that question was not arranged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me say, on the serious question of substance, that shorlty after the conclusion of the arrangement I wrote on behalf of the government and the people of Canada to President Carter expressing my support for the initiative he had taken. I think it would be a very useful initiative for the House to consider, on the occasion of his visit, having the letter which I sent as the head of the government endorsed by unanimous resolution of both chambers.

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING DISPOSAL AND TRANSPORTATION OF CHEMICAL WASTES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment. Can the minister tell the House what the intentions of the government are regarding the urgent problem of establishing a policy respecting the disposal and transportation of dangerous chemical waste? Specifically, my concern is for the people of Winnipeg and Birds Hill who, like people in other cities, have the main line of a railroad running through their neighbourhoods. Does the government intend to bring back for passage the transport of dangerous goods act and, if so, when?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, yes, and soon.

Mr. Chrétien: That is the first answer we have had today.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION BY McDONALD COMMISSION—ACCESS TO DOCUMENTS

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I should like to welcome him to his responsibilities by directing this question to him: it arises out of a reply given by the Prime Minister to the hon. member for Leeds-Grenville on Wednesday concerning the custody of Privy Council documents. The House will recall that the Prime Minister stated at that time that he was satisfied with the order in council passed by the previous government and also satisfied with what he called the arrangement in place with respect to the transmission of documents to the McDonald royal commission.

In light of this statement by the Prime Minister, may I ask the Solicitor General if it is still his intention to try to change the arrangement for the transmission of documents to the McDonald royal commission and, in particular, what is now the role of the cabinet committee which he allegedly informed the press was set up to make recommendations on this matter?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his good wishes. In respect of the production, accessibility and declassification of all documents outside of those physically under the control of the Privy Council office, we are devising new schemes, a new methodology as far as procedure for the declassification.

I may say I have been terribly disappointed and surprised to learn that there was no regular system whatsoever in respect of the previous administration's policy, or lack of policy, regarding declassification of documents. We are attempting to set up a streamlined procedure for that type of document outside of the control of the Privy Council office, that type of document which does not fall within the bounds of any constitutional convention so that these matters can be discussed in a sensible way instead of there being an ad hoc decision which I gather has been the practice in the past.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, there might be some dispute as to whether there was not an arrangement in the past for doing the same thing. May I ask the Solicitor General whether he intends to attempt to declassify documents of the previous government?

Mr. Lawrence: Is the question, am I attempting to declassify documents of the previous government?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Lawrence: The answer is most emphatically yes.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DECLASSIFYING OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there are many new parliamentary and constitutional theses being put before the House. First we have the Prime Minister telling one of his backbenchers that perhaps we should endorse a treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union which has not been endorsed by the United States Senate. Then we have the theory that an ambassador—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Trudeau: —because he bears the title "extraordinary", does not talk on behalf of the government.

I think the most urgent question, from the point of view of parliamentary practice, is to the Solicitor General to inquire if his answer about declassifying documents of previous governments or administrations will go counter to the undertaking given by the present Prime Minister to myself, by Mr. Pearson to Mr. Diefenbaker and by Mr. Diefenbaker to Mr. St. Laurent to respect the confidentiality of documents of previous administrations, and that they be made public only with the consent of the previous administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if that was a question and if it was directed to me, I am sure the previous prime minister appreciates that documents covered under the constitutional convention, which the present Prime Minister has directed will be explicitly honoured, cover cabinet documents, judgmental opinions of cabinet ministers and matters such as that, which certainly I feel—and I believe my cabinet colleagues feel—we have no business inquiring into. There is no question about that.

• (1200)

But when we are talking about other types of administrative and governmental documents, if the Leader of the Opposition is now indicating to me that there was a very set procedure for the declassification of documents in the past, then I must admit to him my failure, after having attempted now for about three months to find out what that procedure was, in finding no case or very few cases in which there has been legitimate declassification of entirely redundant and unnecessary documentation within that previous administration. If he can tell me that there was a system, I would very sincerely appreciate his outlining to me some day what that procedure was.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there was a system, and I suggest to the Solicitor General that he get the information from his officials, particularly from the secretary of the cabinet. If he is indicating that he is going to respect the undertaking given by the Prime Minister, which does cover the documents that he seemed to include in his declassification process, by his answer to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, I am satisfied with that undertaking.

REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CERTAIN RAIL LINES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport who is the first one in 11 years that I could call friend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: I hope he will remain that way and will become a friend to the millions of travelling public in this country. I hope he is anxious to undo some of the outrageous doings of the previous minister of transport.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Will the minister undo the act of the previous administration in that they agreed to the abandonment of daily VIA Rail transcontinental passenger service between Capreol and Winnipeg, and either order the permanent retention of that route, or at least extend the present order in council that expires at the end of this month which has prevented the abandonment of that route? Will he do that at least, and will he order the CTC to hold the hearings that were never held in respect of that 930 miles of track where there is no alternative form of transportation available?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his kind words. I presume that his actions will back up his words.

The matter of northern Ontario rail passenger service to which the hon. member referred is being referred back to the Railway Transport Committee and I understand it will be dealing with the issue next week.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

REQUEST LEGISLATION BE AMENDED TO ALLOW FARMERS PREFERENTIAL INTEREST RATES

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. We know that the Farm Credit Corporation is now celebrating its fiftieth anniversary of foundation; there is, however, a lack of available funds to grant loans to farmers because, of course, of increasing farm selling prices and increasing plant building costs in the hog industry. Could the Minister of Agriculture tell us if he intends to introduce soon a new bill to amend the Farm Credit Corporation Act in order to help farmers borrow money at preferential rates for the good operation of Canadian agriculture?

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the hon. member's question and his interest in the agricultural industry, particularly as it relates to the Farm Credit Corporation. I am sure he is aware that employees from across Canada met last evening at their convention and to celebrate their fiftieth anniversary.

I appreciate the hon. member's interest. We are studying the situation very carefully. I can indicate to the hon. member and the House that within a matter of days, hopefully next Monday or Tuesday, I will have some very positive things to say on behalf of the Farm Credit Corporation to the agricultural industry.

PORT OF MONTREAL—INQUIRY WHETHER CORPORATION WILL DELAY PAYMENTS RESPECTING THOSE ADVERSELY AFFECTED BY STRIKE

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the minister take action to help farmers, particularly in Quebec, who are being seriously prejudiced by the strike in the port of Montreal and who have to pay $30 to $35 more a ton for grain and thus suffer losses of $20 to $25 on the production of each hog? Could the minister tell us if he intends to ask the Farm Credit Corporation to delay the payments the farmers have to make since they are now producing at a loss?

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's supplementary question, though it bears little relationship to his first question. He refers to a very serious situation that has been with us for quite some time.

I want to assure him that I have met on a very frequent basis with people affected by the strike at the port of Montreal, including the Canadian Livestock Feed Board. In addition, that strike not only affects livestock producers in the area serviced by the Montreal elevators; it also very severely affects feed manufacturers and even domestic millers.

Let me indicate to the hon. member, as I did in response to his first question, that because of the importance and the priority this govenment places on the agricultural industry, I hope to be in a position next week to have some positive things to say with reference to the livestock people who have suffered so severely over the past number of months as a result of that strike.

Introduction of Bills

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—EXPLANATION OF ANSWER GIVEN DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order simply because the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) may quite probably have misinterpreted something I said in response to a question by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko). What I indicated as having done as the Prime Minister of Canada immediately after the meeting with Mr. Brezhnev and Mr. Carter was to send a letter to both Mr. Brezhnev and Mr. Carter approving and endorsing the initiative that both had taken.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I of course think this is proper and correct, and I myself have done the same thing in the past. However, I was indicating my surprise when the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) indicated to his backbencher that the suggestion of having both Houses of this Parliament endorse that treaty, to use—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No, he did not say that.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question was, would the Prime Minister consider having this House and the Senate endorse the SALT agreement? That was the question and the Prime Minister said it was an excellent suggestion. He may not have understood the question or he may not have understood his answer, but I indicated my surprise at that answer.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Thursday, October 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Trudeau) (p. 37).

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repeating myself, I would like again to add my name to those who have congratulated the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) on the manner in which they moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I would also like to preface my remarks by stating my sincere appreciation to the people of Ottawa Centre for the confidence they demonstrated in me on May 22. Ottawa Centre is indeed a unique riding, and I am honoured to represent its electors. The Parliament Buildings are located within its boundary thereby creating a federal presence known nowhere else in Canada, as I mentioned last night.

There is another dimension which I believe is characteristic of few other ridings. Ottawa Centre is, in my mind, a microcosm of the country itself. It has a wide range of cultural, social, economic and political groups making it a true reflection of the vertical mosaic which is Canada, a mosaic in which each individual contributes in his or her own unique way to the strength and vitality of Canadian society.

The people of Ottawa Centre also represent a group of Canadians who I believe are better informed than their peers on matters of public policy and their implications. They feel the intimate presence of four levels of government and have demonstrated their ability to voice reasoned opinions on the issues of the day.

However, while the pervasive federal presence has certain advantages for Ottawans, there are also very real disadvantages. The advantages are, of course, the many amenities which accompany the physical location of the seat of government. The Parliament Buildings, the National Arts Centre, the Museum of Man, the canal, the National Art Gallery, the Supreme Court, the National Library, the Garden of the Provinces, the Postal Museum and the Bank of Canada are all located in the riding of Ottawa Centre and are a source of pride and enjoyment for the people of Ottawa Centre and, indeed, for all Canadians who take the opportunity to visit our truly beautiful city.

Much credit should be given to the National Capital Commission which has played, and continues to play, a vital role in the beautification and maintenance of the region. However, the actions of the National Capital Commission have also created in the past problems arising as a result of the commission's taking decisions without fully involving the citizens who are affected. To overcome this problem, Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to direct the National Capital Commission to establish an effective consultation mechanism and to take essential decisions on land use or other matters only after full and extensive consultations have taken place with the municipal and regional governments.

I also urge the government to follow the lead of the former minister of finance and to bring forward much needed amendments to the Municipal Grants Act. This is a matter of great concern to the municipalities in the National Capital Region, as well as to municipalities across Canada where there is a federal presence. However, the inadequacy of current grants in lieu of taxes is of paramount importance here in Ottawa due to the degree to which the federal government permeates our lives. Ottawa is heavily dependent on these grants for operating revenues, and local property taxes, which are among the highest in Canada, reflect the extent to which the federal government has failed to pay its fair share. Let me again urge the government to move expeditiously on this matter in order to alleviate the unfair financial burden which has fallen on the citizens of Ottawa.

Turning to another point, one of the main concerns of the constituents of Ottawa Centre is the government's intention to cut the public service by 60,000 jobs over the next three years. This is a part of the government's austerity program, and I cannot emphasize strongly enough the need to approach this matter carefully. This action by the government will not only affect public servants in Ottawa but those across the country. My riding in particular will be hard hit due to its large percentage of public servants. This, in turn, will have a spillover effect on the private sector in Ottawa. The small businesses in my riding are heavily dependent on the purchasing power of public servants as well as on services obtained by the government on a contractual basis. The unemployment figures in Ottawa will, without question, rise significantly under this policy and it will take years for the city to recover its present financial base.

The people affected, some of whom have been in the employ of the federal government for decades, will never recover. We are talking about people; they are not merely numbers to be thrown around at the whim of the government. These are people who have dedicated their lives to providing valuable services to their fellow Canadians, and this is hardly the thanks they deserve. The citizens of Ottawa Centre, my constituents, represent the backbone of the federal public service. It is the responsibility of the government to ensure that their efforts are recognized and that they receive fair and equitable treatment. This is not accomplished by perpetuating uncertainty about their employment future nor by implementing poorly conceived policies in the name of restraint.

The lack of certainty about job security is having a very real negative impact on all public servants and certainly is affecting the quality of service provided to the public. The prospect of unemployment during these difficult times is serious indeed.

In the Speech from the Throne, the government indicated its intention to bring forward special measures to assist youth, women and native Canadians. I urge this government to expand these measures to include assistance to the public servants who will be affected by these reductions and who will require retraining to ensure continuing employment opportunities. It is the very least they can do for those who have proven their loyalty and their commitment to the federal government and the people of Canada.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) has met with all local area members of parliament as well as with the representatives of the cities of Ottawa and Hull, the regional municipalities of Ottawa-Carleton and the Outaouais and the local business community. At this meeting, the minister publicly acknowledged the adverse effects which the government's restraint program would have on the region and on public servants. He also stated that a compensation program would be established to offset these effects. Further, he agreed to form a task force to identify problems being encountered by the business community and to aid in preparing a plan of economic diversification for the region.

This task force was to have been established by the end of September. To date, we have heard nothing further from the President of the Treasury Board. I wish to remind him of his commitment to the people and local governments of the region. He must assume his responsibilities immediately. He must establish the promised task force and he must clearly define the nature of the financial assistance he is prepared to grant to affected communities and their citizens. To this end, Mr. Speaker, I call upon the President of the Treasury Board to act now. I also urge the President of the Treasury Board to reintroduce the equivalent of Bill C-12, which was introduced in the last session, dealing with public service pensions. This would provide a safeguard for indexed public service pensions and an opportunity to examine the feasibility of the indexing of pensions in the private sector.

The question of public servant involvement in the political process is also a matter of concern to my constituents. It is my strong belief that public servants should be entitled to the same rights as other Canadians and should be permitted to support and work for the party of their choice. This would involve amending the Public Service Employment Act, and I call upon the government to do so at the earliest possible opportunity.

I listened with anticipation to the Speech from the Throne for new things to come for Canada, for the promised "new directions" in economic policy which would bring forth growth and development. While I was heartened by the promises of an early introduction of freedom of information legislation and reforms to improve the efficiency of Parliament, I was totally disappointed in the lack of direction shown by the government in the economic area. After 16 years as the official opposition and four and one half months as government, it would seem reasonable to expect a clear definition of the economic policies which the government intends to employ in leading us to the "promised land".

However, what was said indicates without a doubt that there is no new economic policy to be introduced and no economic leadership on the horizon. The government appears to be experiencing technical difficulty in forming any clear ideas, as witnessed by their reluctance to bring down a new budget. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) indicates that the earliest he could bring down a budget is at least a month away, which will mean the government will have been six full months in power. This is a sad commentary for a party which when in opposition boasted of having all the answers.

The global community is experiencing hard times, Mr. Speaker, and Canada is no exception. Canada needs specific policies, not the vague generalities presented so far by the government, policies which will provide the leadership necessary to ensure that the 1980s is a period of economic growth and prosperity.

Canada needs specific policies today, Mr. Speaker, not in months or years after endless study and consultation. The government has decided that, rather than explore new ideas and give priority to the economy, it is far more beneficial to spend its time undoing what has already been done in the interest of all Canadians. Examples of that to which I allude are Loto Canada, Petro-Canada and offshore mineral and petroleum rights. In all cases, the government's actions represent, to my mind, a total disregard of the rights of all Canadians in an attempt to placate the provinces. This is closely related to the stated promise of provincial status for the Yukon. Does this mean the tiny population of 23,000 people will be given full ownership and control of the vast resources of the Yukon, resources which up to now have belonged to all Canadians? If so, Mr. Speaker, it is the greatest sell-out of all time and a total derogation of the government's responsibility to the nation.

Mr. Speaker, this government does not appear to have a vision of Canada as a unified whole; rather it sees Canada as a conglomerate of fractional parts. In the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, this government raises serious questions as to its grasp of the dynamics of nationhood, how, in fact, all parts of the country should strive to work together in harmony, to achieve its collective as well as individual goals.

I sense a growing uneasiness, Mr. Speaker, among Canadians over the apparent lack of concern by the central government for the interests of Canada. Its concern seems to be for the parts rather than for the unified whole. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this dangerous lack of national perspective is leading to policy formulation which will seriously hinder the ability of the central government to speak effectively for all Canadians.

I am in full support of consensus rather than confrontation when such consensus is possible and consistent with the national interest. As an example, Mr. Speaker, I will draw upon energy policy. This is a matter which touches all Canadians. It is a case of such pressing importance that whether or not consensus can be reached with the provinces, the federal government must, as the representative of all Canadians, take action. With this government, Mr. Speaker, I have yet to see any indication of a willingness to take such action, even though it is becoming abundantly clear that a consensus is likely to be impossible to achieve. Indeed, it may not be possible to reach any multilateral solution.

Mr. Speaker, there is a train of thought which appears to permeate the Speech from the Throne: that is, a lack of confidence by this government in themselves and in their fellow parliamentarians' abilities to represent the needs of their constituents. As members of parliament, we represent ridings from all regions. Our role is to represent the interests of our electors within a national context. These same electors vote for representatives in the provincial legislatures to represent their interests falling under provincial jurisdiction. It puzzles me that this government appears to have come to the conclusion that provincial representatives and premiers can better appreciate and serve the needs of Canadians than can federal representatives and the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), even in areas of federal jurisdiction.

Under this illusion, the government is apparently prepared to extend rights to the provinces which will undermine the effectiveness of the federal government and reduce the mandate given to it by the Canadian electorate. Mr. Speaker, I totally reject the notion of decentralized power when it will compromise the work being done by Parliament on behalf of all Canadians.

Another point which indicates the undoing philosophy of this government, Mr. Speaker, is found in a recent speech given by the minister of social programs. He indicated the new direction the government is planning to take with regard to pensions. He said and I quote, "We will be placing more emphasis on selectivity than on universality". Mr. Speaker, this raises a whole host of questions and demonstrates a naive view of the operation of social programs. Does he realize, Mr. Speaker, that it is often less costly to run a universal program than a selective one, due to the substantial cost of administration, monitoring and policing? Apparently not, since no mention of these considerations was made in his speech.

My estimation is that in the case of pensions, a regulatory body would have to be established which would all but eliminate any potential savings, not to mention the invasion of privacy which would result from monitoring and the concern which would be caused senior citizens. These are who are having a difficult time now and who may be short-changed with the introduction of a new system. Senior citizens must be assured financial security. I have already heard from many senior citizens in my riding on this matter. Their concern is great, and they are extremely worried about their future under this government. Mr. Speaker, to harass the elderly with such off-the-cuff statements is not only irresponsible but cruel. Our senior citizens have given the best years of their lives to the building of this country. All they ask is basic financial security in their retirement years. Mr. Speaker, I implore the government to rethink this whole matter.

I also call upon this new government to bring forward legislation in the competition field, especially as it relates to corporate mergers. Canada must have effective competition law, especially in view of the heavy private sector emphasis of this government.

The lack of a clear policy on energy in the Speech from the Throne is of deep concern to me. With the inevitability of rising energy prices the serious question of transfers of wealth and their implications for the economy comes to the fore. How does the government intend to offset increased prices for low income groups and small businesses whose expenses are often dependent on the price of oil, and how will they ensure the availability of renewable substitutes? Mr. Speaker, it is hoped the government will in fact take an aggressive stance with regard to research and development in the energy field, a stance which will not rely totally on the private sector, which has lacked the motivation in the past.

My final point, Mr. Speaker, relates to language training for newcomers to Canada. This has become a matter of some concern to me. A large number of my constituents speak neither English nor French. It is my belief that the government of Canada has a responsibility to such newcomers; a responsibility to ensure that adequate facilities and training are available to allow their learning of one or the other official language. Language training is essential if people new to Canada are to feel at home in their new country and are to participate fully in Canadian life. I call upon the government to review the situation and to bring forward policies to resolve the problem.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state again what an honour it is to represent the people of Ottawa Centre in this House. Ottawa Centre has had a tradition of good, solid and effective representation and I intend to do my very best to maintain that tradition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate you on your selection as Deputy Speaker and compliment you on the work you have done in the past. I am sure it will be of a comparable standard in the future.

I should also like to compliment the mover and seconder of the motion in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I have heard several of these speeches and I feel their calibre and their recognition of the significance of their position deserves special mention. When they read the records of this House I am sure they will read what they have said with pride compared to maiden speeches by other members of the House with the same responsibility. Their constituents have every right to be proud of the manner in which they conducted themselves.

One of the things which seems to be typical of this House at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is an assumption by those on your left that there is absolutely no problem in the government placing itself in a firm position; that every minister should have every policy in place and ready to proceed; that everything should be running exactly as members opposite think it should, as if no change had ever taken place and as if it were not necessary to become acquainted with new responsibilities. Of course, such is not the case. I believe that exploiting the problems of the short period the government has been in office does not do credit to those who make such comments.

Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker, of the complete lack of attention to important affairs which was exhibited by the former government. Perhaps those who criticize will then show more consideration if everything does not happen exactly at the moment they think it should.

During the summer, members of the government were plagued with problems. Backbench members of the government were the communicators of these problems to the responsible ministers. My first problem arose from the fact that in my constituency there is a laboratory structure, Huntsman Marine Laboratories of St. Andrews, which is not an arm of the government but which does operate in fisheries research as a contract agent for the Government of Canada.

In December, 1978, after long negotiations, it was agreed by the then minister of fisheries, by the Huntsman Marine Laboratories and by the research branch of the department of fisheries that the Huntsman Marine group should go forward with their experimentation in salmon, particularly genetic research. This research included trying to trace down where salmon will best propagate, where it will best spend its summers, how it winters in the sea, how we can get salmon to return to its spawning grounds, and to find out what are the hardiest and healthiest species of salmon that we can develop. In May this group had not been assured that money was available and were having to go to the bank to borrow money.

Bear in mind that this contract was completed in every detail in December. It was approved by the minister of fisheries. In June I received a call from the director of that branch and he said, "We have not received any money from Ottawa." He told me they had had to go to the bank to borrow money because the money was not voted by the government prior to the election call. The money may have been in the budget, but what had not happened was that necessary applications had not been made to the Treasury Board. Therefore, the actual expenditure was never authorized by the government for a contract negotiated in December, and the government went out of office on May 22.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hate to interrupt the hon. member but there is a precedent being created in this House at this time. One of the members who has responsibility for the chair is taking part in a partisan debate. There is nothing in the rules to stop this, but as the member has been nominated to a position of quite some importance in this House as Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House, I would like to caution him. In order to protect the integrity of the Chair, he should try to constrain his remarks and express them in a non-partisan manner.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, we are aware of this situation. We did consult with the Chair and we put the hon. member ahead of a previous speaker in order that he could speak before taking his place in the Chair and not after. This will not be followed as a general practice. The hon. member had asked to speak in the debate before his appointment and we decided to let him do that.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it quite clear that there is nothing personal in the intervention I am making. Mine is an endeavour to protect the position of the hon. member, who now has the floor, in future debates which will be taking place when he will be sitting in the chair occupied by Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, concerning the worry expressed by the opposition whip, may I say that for many years I have expressed serious reservations about the role of the Deputy Speaker—and I say this without any comment or reflection on the present incumbent—in that in his usual role the Deputy Speaker occupies the chair during much of second reading debates and is not necessarily involved at the Table. Unfortunately, it has been the practice of this House, to me a matter of serious regret, that the Deputy Speaker votes in a partisan way.

I hope that one of the reforms of the House this year will include a clear indication that if he is to preside in the chair rather than presiding at the table as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, on those occasions the Deputy Speaker will not vote as does Mr. Speaker. It is better to appear to be fair than to be fair and yet come down and vote in a partisan way.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that this is the second time in two days that we on this side of the House, and especially two members from the province of Quebec, who are the ones who have stood up to defend a British tradition. Yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board tabled some estimates without recommending them. This is not in the British parliamentary tradition. We have to remember that the party in power follows the British tradition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Maybe those remarks are partisan too.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West with respect to the difficulties which I know are difficulties that you share. I think all of us in this House want to ensure that the position of the Chair is inviolate in this House. I am certain that view is shared as well by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte. I hope my friend, the opposition whip, understands the significance of the remarks made by the government whip and our willingness to abide by those traditions.

While we are talking about traditions, I understand that Mr. Speaker is prepared to rule on the point of order raised yesterday with respect to the estimates. Perhaps the opposition whip could find the opposition House leader and that matter could be dealt with now.

An hon. Member: He is here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre), I must say that as much as I appreciate the concern of all members for the protection of the Chair, including its incumbents, as the hon. member has said there is nothing in the rule book. There is nothing other than what Standing Order 10 says, which I will read to the House:

10. Mr. Speaker shall not take part in any debate before the House.

Of course, in the process of our debate hon. members always address themselves to the Speaker, whoever is the incumbent at that time—either the Deputy Speaker, Deputy Chairman of Committees or Assistant Deputy Chairman. Precedent has been created to the effect that incumbents of the chair refrain from speaking. However, there are other assemblies where they do. Perhaps this is something for the House to resolve if members want this question to be decided and included in the Standing Orders.

In the meantime, I know that the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte was aware of the situation even before the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle made his remarks. The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte insisted on making this speech before stepping up to the Chair to support us in our work. It is for that reason that I have to allow him to complete his remarks.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACEACHEN—SUBMISSION OF ESTIMATES TO THE HOUSE—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) before he starts his speech, but I had overlooked earlier today resolving a point of order that had been raised yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen). I was reminded of it and I thought I should try at this moment to regulate it because the House, I believe, depends on some resolution of the problem in terms of future business, perhaps even later this day.

The point of order raised concerned the tabling yesterday of the spending estimates by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) and the absence of having a declaration by the President of the Treasury Board that he recommended the estimates to the House. The estimates carried with them the usual recommendation from His Excellency but no statement was made by the President of the Treasury Board upon the tabling of the estimates.

When the point was raised yesterday, there was participation in the discussion by the President of the Treasury Board who indicated that he was confirming his action specifically. His action was an intentional one of tabling the estimates and taking no further action.

During the course of the discussion, one of the participants was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who suggested something that would have been somewhat an inevitable course in any research of the matter, that is to examine what had been done by previous finance ministers. From research going back 20 years, I can report to the House that on several occasions, in fact on most occasions, a statement was made by the minister of finance on the tabling of the estimates. That is to say, during the tabling of documents, the estimates have been tabled by the President of the Treasury Board and then followed by a statement.

Under our present practices, upon the calling of "Statements by Ministers", a statement was made by the minister which had some explanatory effect in respect of the estimates. However, I am not able to discover in any of those that those statements contained the recommendation of the President of the Treasury Board that these estimates be accepted by the House, certainly not in a formal way. While that may have been inferred from some of the statements, it was not done in a formal way.

Furthermore, and I am going from memory here, I believe that upon the change of government in 1957, the President of the Treasury Board or whoever was acting at that time, on the tabling of the estimates, did precisely the same as was done yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board. I can be more specific here. It was the Hon. Donald M. Fleming, then minister of finance, who, as reported on Tuesday, October 15, 1957, took precisely the action that was taken yesterday on tabling the estimates, taking no further action.

Whatever arguments that may lead to in terms of discussion or debate, of course, remains open. I only have the responsibility to deal with the point of order as to whether it is a requirement and an essential part of Parliament and its practices and parliamentary responsibility for the finance minister or the President of the Treasury Board, upon the tabling of estimates, to indicate at that time in a specific declaration that he asks for the approval of the House of those estimates. I cannot find any authority for that proposition. Therefore, in regulating the narrow point of order which was raised yesterday, I have to set it aside.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I accept fully everything that you have said. There is no difference at all between us. I believe the situation that developed yesterday is quite different from any situation to which you have alluded, namely that we had a message from His Excellency recommending the estimates to the House. The simple point is that I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) whether he recommended these estimates to the House and he would not tell us. That puts in doubt whether the message of His Excellency in recommending the estimates to the House carries with it the advice of his ministers. That is all.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) missed the point also, because the point arose when the question was asked and no answer was given. Today we do not know from any member of the government whether this message came from Government House, as it were from His Excellency, without the advice and recommendation of the ministry.

I have raised that question and I am asking why it is that yesterday the President of the Treasury Board would not say that they were recommending the estimates to the House. Are they or are they not, or is His Excellency acting on his own? That is the only point.

The position is as clear as crystal in Erskine May, which says that the Crown, acting with the advice of its responsible ministers, makes known to the Commons the pecuniary necessities of the government. Yesterday the Crown made known the pecuniary necessities, but we have not yet been told, and it arose when the question was asked, whether he was acting with the advice of his ministers. If he is, of course, it means that the ministry is recommending these estimates to the House.

May I say that I am not going to pursue it procedurally and ask Your Honour to do anything further, but I intend to pursue it at a later stage when it comes to putting the estimates to committee, because we do not intend to accept any procedure until we know whether the government is recommending these estimates to the House.

I accept fully what you have said, Mr. Speaker, but I must say respectfully that it does not deal with the political question that I raised of how the House can receive estimates until it knows whether they are recommended by the responsible ministers.

An hon. Member: Nit-picking.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member talks about nit-picking. This is a very fundamental point that will become apparent to members opposite as we go on into this session.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With respect, I think the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso capsulized the matter. It is a political matter, not a procedural one. The procedural one has been regulated and he will have opportunity to do what he says he will do, pursue it when the matter is again touched upon. In any case, the point of order is now resolved and we can now return to the continuation—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might set something clear. The point of order has been resolved. The estimates are now appropriately tabled. It has been the custom in this House when that occurs, and I understand that custom is to be observed on this occasion, that the estimates are referred on consent to the standing committees of the House. I spoke to my learned friend with respect to whether that would be appropriate following whatever Your Honour's decision might be on these estimates.

Are we now in the position of having to obtain the consent of the House in order to move that motion, because it might be appropriate if we did move the motion to send the estimates now tabled to the appropriate standing committees. Is the House prepared to give its consent, which has been normal in every session that I have been here—I have been here a number but not as many as my friend, of course—in order that the House can properly deal with the expenditures of government, that the estimates go to committees? Can I ask for the consent of the House, and if I ask, will that consent be received now and I can go ahead and do that?

Mr. Speaker: It would appear that the President of Privy Council (Mr. Baker) is exploring the possibility of consent, first of all, to start committees and then to refer the estimates to them, because at the moment the committees have not been established. Since both these things have to be done it would seem to me that consent might be explored while we continue with the debate on the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to give consent the moment the ministry accepts its constitutional responsibility and tells the House it is recommending the estimates to the House, and that it put the words in the mouth of His Excellency that this House take the estimates and pass them. If that is done we will be very co-operative.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we, too, are quite prepared to give consent to the making of the motion to refer the estimates to the standing committees provided the condition to which Your Honour has referred has been met, namely, that the committees have been established. I understand that the report from the striking committee is ready—obviously I understand that because I am a member of the striking committee. If that report can be made some time this day and approved, then the estimates could be referred to the various committees. Perhaps that could be done at two o'clock or at five o'clock or at some time today and we would give the required consent.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I feel I must say a word about some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen). We are often on the same wave length, but whatever wave length he is on today I think he is drawing an awfully long bow. After all, if it were true that His Excellency the Governor General, without the approval of the government of the day, was recommending estimates to this House, we would have a constitutional revolution on our hands. The Governor General whose capacities some of us know quite well, has no way of communicating a message to this House except through a minister.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) has tabled the estimates and has given with them a message from His Excellency the Governor General approving those estimates. That surely implies that the President of the Treasury Board or somebody else in the government asked the Governor General to do so. He could not do it on his own.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall be able to clarify this matter. With all due respect to the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), I felt he was being overly technical when this point was raised yesterday. I was relying on a ruling by yourself, Mr. Speaker, on February 18, 1976, when the then president of treasury board, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), in the process of doing precisely what I was doing yesterday, namely, tabling estimates, went on to elaborate on the tabling. Your Honour interrupted him and said:

> Order, please. I feel the hon. President of Treasury Board is making a statement as a minister and this calls for an answer from representatives of all political parties in the House. In addition, there will be a question later. If such is the minister's intention I urge him to continue. If not, we shall have to remain at the document-tabling stage.

Your Honour went on to say:

> I have an indication, now, from the minister that it is not his intention to make a statement at this time but simply to table the document.

Some hon. Members: That is not the issue!

Mr. Stevens: Yesterday when I was asked whether I recommended the estimates I felt I did not wish to make a statement and had no further comment other than to say I had tabled the main estimates.

If I might deal now with the point which has been reiterated, I would draw Your Honour's attention to Standing Order 62(1) which requires that the House not deal with supply matters without the proposal first being recommended by the Governor General. This indicates that the President of Treasury Board must transmit the message from the Governor General to the Speaker to be read to the House, which I did yesterday. There is absolutely no indication, constitutional or otherwise, that we have to recommend the estimates or make any comment at that stage.

Perhaps I might briefly outline the process. I might add I am very surprised that the hon. member, with his long experience, is not aware of it. I did sign the letter to His Excellency the Governor General in Council in which I said:

> The undersigned has the honour to submit to His Excellency the Governor General in Council the estimates of sums required for the service of Canada for the year ending on the thirty-first of March, 1980, and advises that His Excellency may be pleased to recommend these estimates to the House of Commons in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867.
> Respectfully submitted

That letter was signed by myself and I am willing to table it. In due course the Governor General did respond with the message which I transmitted to Your Honour yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: The matter is now fully resolved. The question of consent both to the reception of the report of the striking committee and then, in turn, to the motion to send these estimates to the committees will have to be dealt with by consent on returning to those separate aspects of our routine proceedings, which consent I am sure the House will facilitate at the appropriate time.

Mr. MacEachen: All I say is this, Mr. Speaker. If the minister would say to the House what he has said to the Governor General, namely, that he recommends the estimates to the House, we would be happy to give consent now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me we are continuing to discuss something which is resolved.

In fairness to the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), I should say to him that either he should begin his speech now and take two or three minutes, or call it one o'clock and start it at two o'clock.

Mr. McCain: I would prefer to call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 12.58 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Trudeau (p. 37).

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I hope the opposition whip will not mind if I say that he and I have known each other for a while. We have both carried out our partisan duties, but one of the capabilities which must be inherent in a member if he is assigned a responsibility in the chair is that he must shed his partiality while sitting in that chair. I wish to assure the government whip that I am capable of that, and I will do that.

Mr. Lefebvre: "Opposition" whip.

Mr. McCain: Old habits die hard, and I guess I am in some ways a slave of habit!

Mr. Evans: Don't get out of the habit.

Mr. McCain: Let me come briefly to the subject matter I was touching on before, the difficulties of the takeover and the delays which sometimes occurred. The instance which I have already cited can again be exemplified by three others, one at the port of Saint John, and another with respect to the dredging of the Miramichi.

It is the habit of government to say, "Yes, we will do a job". Having said that the job will be done, the final proof that it will be done is when the order of the Treasury Board which actually authorizes the expenditure of the money for the particular project has been passed. That money was not authorized for the port development in Saint John, nor was it completely authorized for an expenditure by the Treasury Board for the dredging of the Miramichi. I would like to draw to the attention of the people of New Brunswick that while a promise of a government had been made, it could only be kept by the actual authorization of expenditure and approval of that expenditure by the Treasury Board. This was not done, yet the people of New Brunswick are under the impression that the money indeed had been authorized, and it should indeed be.

There are a number of problems in Atlantic Canada. I was very interested in listening to the hon. member for Humber-Port-Au-Port-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour) yesterday when he suggested that Petro-Canada should take over the refinery at Come-by-Chance. I think that can only be considered in light of the fact that in the six eastern provinces of Canada there exists today a refining capability of 750,000 barrels in excess of Canada's consuming capability.

If Petro-Canada were to assume responsibility for Come-by-Chance at this moment in time, where is the market to be found? I submit that one of the objectives any government of Canada should have had historically and must have in the future is to arrange for transfer of some energy between Canada and the United States, including the transfer of that energy which can be refined in that excessive refining capacity which exists in eastern Canada. Then and only then can Come-by-Chance become viable for Petro-Canada or any company.

I might say in passing that one of my concerns about Crown corporations in any sphere is that public and political pressures to take on non-viable operations may very well strangle Crown corporations. They may very well get into the heavily debt-ridden position experienced by the CNR. It may be necessary down the road, if we succumb to the political pressures expressed in this House, for a corporation such as Petro-Canada to have to rely on taxpayers to bail it out as we bailed CNR out last year and as we bailed it out on two earlier occasions to the extent of something in excess of $2 billion in total. I think this is the result of political pressures to have Crown corporations meet political needs. This is not the way to serve the nation effectively and efficiently.

The agricultural industry of Canada has experienced a great many difficulties. One part of that industry which is experiencing a very serious difficulty at the moment is the potato industry, which has over-produced on a national basis, according to Statistics Canada, and which may be deprived of a part of its export markets by virtue of a decision made by some authority in the European Economic Community. That decision was that Canada should not ship seed potatoes to Italy from this crop year's production. This has been a market which has been taking an increasing quantity of seed potatoes from Atlantic Canada, and if this market is denied us for phyto-sanitary reasons, that will simply add to the surplus which must be disposed of in Canada.

I implore the Government of Canada to use every possible effort to get a renewal of the privilege to export seed potatoes to Italy this year and also to undertake ongoing negotiations to get a long-term and not an annual permit for their shipment. This decision has a very serious impact upon Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick production, but it also has an impact on Ontario, Quebec and perhaps even Manitoba production because what does not leave the shore as seed will most certainly have to be marketed as table stock or dumped.

This is a very unfortunate picture, but it is precisely the way it is. I understand that there are ongoing negotiations, that Italy is making the strongest possible political representations to the European Economic Community to have it accept Canadian seed potatoes into that market, and that there will be a meeting within the next ten days to two weeks between the trade officials of this country and the community. Along with the influence and the expertise of the Department of Agriculture, I hope that the trade representatives of Canada will be able to get the concession needed to ship seed potatoes to Europe.

An hon. Member: Send the minister.

Mr. McCain: The minister is a very competent guy. I would be happy to entrust the potato industry into his hands. I hope he will have time, and if it becomes that serious, I am sure he will go.

The plight of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada is rather serious in many ways. As a result of over-exploitation and a failure to supervise the catch of many species in adjacent waters to our shores, the population was depleted to the point that it was very difficult to make a livelihood. It became necessary to impose catch and licensing restrictions upon the industry. These licensing restrictions have been carried to excess. As the stock is replacing itself as a result of more controlled catch, I believe the time has now come when licences must be issued to more fishermen.

I want to compliment the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) on his remarks yesterday in the House. There is no man in the House who has as practical a knowledge of the fishing industry as the hon. member for South Shore. He epitomized that in his remarks—his expression of interest and his pursuit of a more generous treatment by the Department of Fisheries of the fishing industry.

How serious is this situation? In the last ten years the cost of boat replacement has risen threefold. That is out of all proportion to the inflation rate affecting Canada in general. The cost of gear and equipment has risen an equal amount or more. On top of those factors, today the fisherman is faced with an interest rate—and has been for the past two years—which, if he must finance the boat by means other than his own catch, pyramids the cost of that boat by another one, two or threefold depending upon the terms of the financing. Then it becomes a very expensive operation. Coupled with that is the fact that young people are not allowed to get licences because there are restrictions and limitations upon those who can be licensed. Also there is a restriction upon the transfer of the licence from an older fisherman to a younger one.

These restrictions must be re-examined. As we have attempted to keep young people on the farms, there must be some way to attempt to keep young people in the fishing industry. But under the regulations which we inherited, this is virtually impossible. If we are to replace the existing generation of fishermen, there must be a relaxation of the licensing procedures. In view of the tremendous increase in the cost of boats and equipment, it is imperative that some kind of reasonable financial operation be set up to make it possible for fishermen to buy boats and make the necessary payment arrangements without interest as burdesome as it is in the open market.

As I have suggested many times in the House, we must have a Central Mortgage and Housing or a Farm Credit Corporation-type of lending agency in government which will permit young fishermen, and even some of the older ones, to obtain short-term financing for the improvement and replacement of their equipment and boats. I beseech the government to give this serious consideration in its future deliberations.

There is a particular problem in my constituency respecting transportation. The commitments of confederation were that products in any part of Canada should have transportation costs which would permit that part of Canada to trade with the rest of Canada. Recently freight rate increases on the roads and by rail have risen to the point where many commodities are no longer competitive in what were the historic markets in Canada when rail rates were at a different level. This requires serious examination as does the transportation of wheat. On a smaller scale it is as vital to the Atlantic economy as is the transportation of wheat to the western economy.

Earlier it was said in the House that if there is a weak section in Canada economically, it weakens all of Canada. As long as transportation costs remain at the present level, or as long as by international trade agreements we have to trade within Canada and not overseas or with the neighbouring country to the south on a basis which would be competitive with them, then we must have transportation structures and costs to allow us to resume the trade which was historically ours in this nation.

In particular I should like to refer to the ferry service which runs from the mainland of New Brunswick to the Island of Grand Manan. Historically the Government of Canada assumed quite a large responsibility for ferries operating in salt water. Except in the St. Lawrence and in one or two of the Great Lakes areas, it did not assume any financial responsibility for ferry services required in fresh water. Some years ago an agreement was signed between the Government of Canada and New Brunswick that the Grand Manan ferry would be subsidized to the extent of $150,000 by the province of New Brunswick, in round figures, and $267,000 by the federal government. But there was no clause for indexing the cost of the federal subsidy. As inflation has stormed down on us, the cost of operating that ferry has risen immensely. Since there was no indexing in the federal subsidy, there has been no increment in the payment to the province of New Brunswick. The province of New Brunswick will find itself in a position this year where it will probably pay $1,600,000 as subsidy. That is a tenfold increase from the original $150,000 subsidy, partly as a result of inflation and partly as a result of an increase in Grand Manan fishing and its fish processing industry.

This matter must be reconsidered. I will not take the time of the House to go into all the details, but if the Department of Transport will examine its records it will find that subsidies are paid for comparable ferries in other Canadian provinces in a much more generous fashion. That much more generous fashion should be applied to this particular ferry. When one looks at CN Marine, one will find that not only have we assisted by tax dollars the operation of ferries in Canada, but also the operation of an international ferry on the Bay of Fundy. I submit Grand Manan should come first; the province of New Brunswick should come first. The burden of financing this service certainly should be assumed to a greater extent by the Government of Canada.

There has been a great deal of discussion about the maritime energy commission. It was a proposal by the former government based on the philosophy that certain gains could be obtained by co-operation on the part of the commission and the maritime provinces. Initially it was hoped that it would be the Atlantic provinces, but that was not going to work out. I urge the government of Canada to take a very long and hard look at the possibilities of developing electrical energy in the maritime provinces. It is absolutely imperative that every Atlantic province seek the lowest possible cost of energy.

The Government of Canada has in the past seen fit to extend the credit rating of the Government of Canada to developments in Canada without subsidizing them, but by merely guaranteeing a loan or by borrowing and lending the money to the operation in Canada. This happened initially with the Beechwood dam on the Saint John River and resulted in a very extensive saving for the province of New Brunswick without costing the Government of Canada a dime.

It is from this base that the Government of Canada should commit itself, not necessarily to gifts to Atlantic Canada, which is not what I am asking and not what I am proposing. I am proposing that it would be propitious for the Government of Canada to guarantee to the maritime energy commission the loans it would have to float in order to build the projects which are available.

One of the things which I think might very well be profitable to Canada, and particularly to the maritimes, at this moment in time is the construction of enough generating capability that some of this energy could be exported to the United States eastern seaboard. I propose this because I believe there is a market there and a fair profit to be obtained from this, a profit which might very well make a major contribution to the reduction in energy costs both for the New England seaboard and for the maritime provinces. I think we should take a look at this as a business proposition.

I have heard members of this House and people in New Brunswick scream about the idea that we would export electric energy or that we would build in excess of immediate demand, but in every instance where this has happened, and it has in three or four instances in New Brunswick, the exporting of energy has in the long run contributed to a lower cost supply of energy for New Brunswick.

I believe it is along this course that the Government of Canada should move in a serious way with negotiations for the establishment of the maritime energy commission, and that it should plead with the premiers of the maritime provinces to sit down around the same table in order to arrive at a common goal, and thus save money both for Canada and for the provinces.

The forest industry in eastern Canada to a greater degree than in the rest of Canada, but also the forest industry in all of Canada, has had a very heavy withdrawal of capital resources by cutting, which has been excessive in some areas. Coupled with this it has had an insect and bacterial infestation which is reducing the live and useful wood in this country. I plead with the minister responsible for forestry and the minister responsible for the environment to act in consultation particularly with the province of New Brunswick, which has had no choice but to spray, and to arrive at the best possible scientific way to control the infestation which is depleting our forest resources in Canada. This is a matter for research and it may be a matter for financing.

There has been circulated to all members of the House of Commons a very definite and detailed picture of the depletion of this industry, showing the necessity for protection from fire and pests and the necessity for reforestation. In view of the fact that it is our largest single employer and our largest single exporter, and in view of the fact that it is one of our largest taxpayers, paying directly or indirectly to the Government of Canada almost a billion dollars, and paying to the municipalities and the provinces of Canada more than a billion dollars in taxes, it is a vital aspect of our economic picture, both to the workers in the field and to their representatives in the House of Commons.

An industry of this magnitude must receive more attention and more consideration by the Government of Canada than it has in the past. I have been encouraged by the remarks I have heard to date from this government, and somewhat discouraged by some of those I have been accustomed to hearing over the past few years.

I will not bore the House any longer, Mr. Speaker, with the needs of my constituency or with things I feel the government should do. I very much thank the opposition whip for his tolerance and I assure him that I will respect the recommendation he made earlier in the day.

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): On a personal note, Mr. Speaker, may I say what a pleasure it is to be back in this House. It is a particular pleasure to be here as a British Columbian and as a member of the NDP, and to follow my distinguished predecessor, Stuart Leggatt, in both respects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: I had not yet seen the light in either respect when I was here before, although on looking again at my first speech given in May, 1963, I thought how close it came to the NDP position on almost all matters. Of course, those were the days of relatively enlightened Liberalism, days long since past as the events of last evening once again showed.

That first speech of mine was also made during a throne speech debate. Like the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz), I moved the address in reply. I hope I acquitted myself as well as he and the seconder, the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald), did the other day. Not that they had much to work with. They were robbed of guidance in many fields, those relating to the economy, the constitution, the Quebec referendum and the entire field of international affairs, and it is the latter I want to say a few words about, first, this afternoon.

I believe there has been no occasion, certainly in my memory, when international affairs has not been mentioned in a Speech from the Throne. Not only was this subject not mentioned in this Speech from the Throne, it was not mentioned at all in the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). As I say, surely this is the first time in a very long while that this has happened.

It may well be that the difficulties the government got into by making too early, too premature and too unthought-out pronouncements, particularly in the matter of moving the embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, caused it to shy away completely from the whole field of Canada in the world today. Surely this cannot be because the government does not know that Canada has a position. Members of the government talked about this, not so much during the election campaign but on many occasions during the last Parliament. It must be because of the premature move they made and to which once again today in question period they could not either say, "Look, it was a mistake. We do not intend to move the embassy", or "Yes, we have this ambassador looking at everything, but as I, the Prime Minister, remarked right after the election, it is only the timing of the move that is in question". Surely the government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald), who did her best to help the Prime Minister on an earlier occasion, could have said one or the other.

This government wants very much to restore confidence. It wants very much to restore the faith of the private sector in which it very strongly believes, in the Government of Canada and in Canada itself. How can it restore that faith when it does not make clear to business concerns what its position in relation to the move of the embassy is. It should not be made some time down the road, but now. The government's lack of position, obviously, is creating uncertainty. The answers of the minister and of the Prime Minister this morning, although they may have been further amplified at a press conference since then, have not been satisfactory.

The other reason why the government made no mention of international affairs must be that the government does not know, particularly in the fields of aid and perhaps I should also mention peacekeeping—two of the cornerstones of foreign policy in the past years—in what direction it wishes to go. There are conflicting signals. In her speech at the United Nations, my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I know would have been here this afternoon because I told her I would be speaking but has been otherwise engaged, said that Canada was still concerned about the human rights of all people; that the human rights of all people were what mattered more than anything else; that specifically as we look into the decades before us, it is the countries at the bottom end of the economic scale which face the bleakest future and the lowest growth.

I believe she spoke at that time in her compassionate, humanitarian, progressive spirit about the problems of the poorer nations and the need for respect for human rights everywhere. That was expressed in the minister's speech at the United Nations. A few weeks later in a speech to the Empire Club, the minister did a complete turn-around. She then suggested that it was not the poorer nations that needed our continued compassion and concern, but it was those nations on the brink of development which were breaking through and which would soon become established as strong economic units. She suggested that we had not been taking into sufficient account the economic returns which Canada could expect in both the short and the long term. She suggested that we should also look very closely at our political and economic relations before we decided with particular countries whether aid should be extended.

The minister said in her speech at the Empire Club:

> Is it really the right thing to do, to divorce aid policy entirely from the rest of our relations, both political and economic, with the country concerned.

In the speech which the minister gave a few weeks before at the United Nations she said:

> There is growing recognition that development assistance does not imply the foisting of one country's economic and social philosophy on another.

What had caused the change in the intervening weeks?

Mr. Rodriguez: The slasher.

Miss Jewett: The slasher's friend.

Mr. Rodriguez: The tough guy.

Mr. Nystrom: The happy hacker.

Miss Jewett: The Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) at a meeting of the IMF and the World Bank spoke out very strongly against Canada's aid policy. The minister suggested that not only should aid not be increased, but that it should be diminished. Somehow or other the message got to the Secretary of State for External Affairs because her speech at the Empire Club might well have been written by another hand—

Mr. Rodriguez: By the slasher.

Miss Jewett: —compared to her speech at the United Nations. In any event, the message got to her or, to mix the metaphor, a terrified mouse came into her office pursued by the financial cat from Newfoundland to tell her that it was no longer possible for Canada to continue its aid policy of the past, and that it must now only look to countries on the brink of self-sufficiency.

In this proposed switch the Secretary of State for External Affairs has bypassed CIDA's own twin objectives, the assistance of countries in the achieving of self-sufficiency and the meeting of basic human needs; in other words, concentration on the poorest in the poorest countries. These CIDA priorities were approved by the Science Council, the International Food Policy Institute and donor countries such as Sweden, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom.

She also ignored the recommendations of the Pearson Commission, OECD, the North-South Institute, and her most knowledgeable colleague on these matters, the hon. member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), who is now also her parliamentary secretary. She ignored, as a friend of mine said, the many Canadians who are not ashamed to proclaim their humanitarian priorities, and whose support is so necessary if Canada is to live up to her proclaimed objectives.

She tried to excuse this change of approach toward the Third and Fourth World countries by accusing many Third World countries of having branded us as imperialists and, therefore, not worthy of Canadian interest and concern. Even if this were true, that they had branded us as imperialists, I hardly think that this should be the reason for deciding to no longer care about the poorest in the poorest countries. But I am told that her comment that Pakistan led the attack of the non-aligned countries in Havana is not in fact true, that Pakistan did not lead the attack on the so-called imperialist countries. Even if the remarks were true, it is a pretty feeble reason to give for changing one's full approach to foreign aid.

The minister also indicated, as had the Minister of National Defence (Mr. MacKinnon) some time earlier, that we should take another look in our role in peacekeeping, presumably also to save money, presumably also because we are a nation that cannot afford enterprises such as peacekeeping any more than the level of aid that we have been giving. To suggest that we take another look at peacekeeping, particularly in Cyprus where there are 30,000 Turkish troops at present, is to me highly irresponsible.

It is because of these conflicts among members of the government on matters of foreign aid and peacekeeping, as well as on the embassy question, that the government presumably decided to say nothing about international affairs in the Speech from the Throne and the Prime Minister decided to say nothing about it in his own speech. We are told that a standing committee of the House of Commons will have a report from the Department of External Affairs referred to it. I certainly do not deplore that; on the contrary, there will be useful discussions. That does not save the minister from saying now, in October, what direction we should be moving in—preferably not conflicting directions. We want a foreign policy not only for the 1980s but right now. We want some indication of where the government is going.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Jewett: Some time ago I wrote to the minister to ask what the government was doing to help in the reconstruction of Nicaragua. This is a country which has had a democratic revolution, the very kind of country that Canada should befriend after it has gone through this democratic process. At that time we had provided only three Hercules aircraft, I think—

Mr. Friesen: Six.

Miss Jewett: —three Hercules flights to carry the economic aid and other supplies provided by the private sector in Canada, chiefly by the Canadian labour movement. I received a letter from the minister yesterday saying that this aid has now been increased to five flights carrying $400,000 worth of material, again mainly provided by the Canadian labour movement. She said:

> I had hoped to be able to provide you with details of planned reconstruction efforts in addition to our emergency relief activities but I am not in a position to do so yet. I can assure you, however, that officials in my department, in co-operation with those of other departments, are working strenuously to determine what further assistance can appropriately be given.

The letter is dated October 10. I ask the minister, as a friend whose progressive and humanitarian views I know well, what has happened in the last few weeks that she should abandon all her enlightened, progressive and humanitarian views in a speech to the Empire Club?

Mr. Fraser: She is a lady of abandon.

Miss Jewett: Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to say on a happier note how very kind and generous with their time were the embassies in Tokyo and Peking when I recently took a trip there under the leadership of Tommy Douglas. We thought very highly of the staff of the embassies in those two capitals. On our trip we discovered that there is a marvellous opening for Canada in trade with these two countries.

It is my own feeling that the government has not been pushing our trade with Japan very strongly and has not made any inroads at all in what will become a huge market in China except, of course, with wheat and rape seed. Trade is a two-way street and there are many kinds of goods that the Chinese could provide to us, but at the moment, as hon. members know, we export far more to China than they export to us. Not only should we encourage trade with China, a country that should appeal to the minister because, although it has a very low standard of living, it is on the brink of self-sufficiency, but we should extend our relations in one particular and important area, that of our scientific and technical knowledge.

The Chinese spoke to us about this a great deal and gave the example of gold mining, which is only half as efficient in China as it is in Canada, as well as oil extraction and reforestation. They would also like to develop even further the program now under way of exchanging students, scholars and experts between our universities. I would ask the minister to facilitate this program by ensuring that exchange scholars from China can have their health certificates approved quickly. I talked to one Chinese scholar on September 21 who was two weeks overdue at his post in Canada because he had been waiting three months for final approval of his health certificate from our mission in Hong Kong. Why does everything have to go to Hong Kong, already a very busy mission? Surely it would not be too difficult to attach a medical doctor to our embassy in Peking. If we are serious about this interchange of students and scholars, that is what should be done.

I hope that when the standing committee is established a coherent set of policies will be placed before it, policies in which all members of the government concur. I hope to play as constructive a role as I can on that committee and, through its efforts, to see Canada take an even greater lead in its relations, in its aid, in its trade with other countries that are on the brink of self-sufficiency as well as those that are still poor.

There is one other matter of importance to me and, I hope, to all members of the House, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to address this afternoon. At least there was one sentence about it in the Speech from the Throne, which is better than nothing at all. It was promised that there will be an employment strategy for women. I was very glad to hear that and will be glad to see it fleshed out.

It concerns me, however, that during the four and one-half months the government has been in office it has not done any of the things it promised in the election campaign. When the government referred to women in the public service during their election campaign they promised that the reduction in the federal public service would have no disproportionate effect on women, as had been the case under the Liberal government. In February, 1979, the number of women laid off was greater than the percentage they formed of the work force in every single branch of the public service. The same seems to be happening now although it is too early yet for all the details to be known. I mentioned one case yesterday where 12 women in the agricultural stabilization board have been laid off. One can find examples everywhere. What did the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) mean when he said yesterday:

> Our guideline is no lessening of the number of women working in the public service.

[Miss Jewett.]

That is simply not what is happening. Obviously he does not know what is happening to women in the public service. Perhaps he does not care.

A second example is women and the unemployment insurance amendments. Referring again to the campaign literature of the Progressive Conservative Party, and I am speaking of its document about strategy for women, it refers to the previous government, and I quote:

> The government's changes to unemployment insurance eligibility discriminated significantly against women at the same time as the level of benefits received by persons such as single parents was reduced.

According to this article the Progressive Conservative Party will

> (a) keep the existing eligibility criteria for part-time and seasonal workers, who are disproportionately women, and
> (b) maintain the existing level of benefits for men or women with dependents.

That promise was violated immediately after the election.

I am particularly concerned in what this government is doing, following in the footsteps of the previous government, in eventually eradicating the Outreach program as it affects women. The outreach program has been one of the most successful programs we have had. It is a program designed to meet the special needs of women entering or re-entering the labour force. It has trained, counselled and placed a large number of women who had been on social assistance most of their lives. There is one Outreach program in my own constituency, called AWARE, which has trained, counselled and placed hundreds and hundreds of women. Indeed, in British Columbia and the Yukon together the number of women reached by the Outreach program is 6,000. They have been trained and placed at a cost of $250 per job placement while the Canada Employment Centre cost is $700 to $800 a person. The Conservative party have said:

> A Progressive Conservative government will restore the necessary funding ($3 million) cut by the Trudeau government from the Department of Employment's Outreach program for women.

The government has restored $300,000. It has said that there will be an additional amount up to $1.3 million, but the government will not say whether this is for the Outreach program for women, the special program for women and their special needs. The government has said nothing that I am aware of about the remaining $1.7 million.

So many of these programs have been cut back that there are only about half a dozen left. One is in my constituency and I believe there is one in the constituency of my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller). No one knows whether these programs will be retained or not. What is so incredibly shortsighted about this is not only the unfairness to women, but the fact that the government will pay more for social assistance and unemployment insurance—if it does not cut back unemployment insurance even more—than it would pay to train and help these women enter the labour force. Even on the sort of "hacker grounds" you would not abandon this program.

The government also promised, again in its pre-campaign literature, that it would strengthen the role of the National Advisory Council on the Status of Women. On page 5 of that literature the following is to be found:

> The advice of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women is frequently ignored by government, most recently on the changes to unemployment insurance policy. We will first improve the credibility of the council by seeking nominations to its board from national women's organization.

I have inquired and there are still—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that her time has expired. In order that she may continue, she must have the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Miss Jewett: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I shall not crave your indulgence too much longer.

There have been no new appointments yet to fill the vacancies on the National Advisory Council. I respect very highly the Secretary of State (Mr. MacDonald), another good friend, and I know he is personally sympathetic to strengthening the role of the council. I am sure he is sympathetic to developing the Outreach program and genuinely changing the unemployment insurance amendments. Is he having any influence, inner cabinet or no inner cabinet, when he has not yet been able to change those matters or to put people on the council? Nor has there been any additional money granted to the council, as I understand was promised them some time ago.

The government also said in its election campaign literature that it would further provide that the council report directly to Parliament on any legislation or lack thereof which it feels is of importance to the status of Canadian women. Nothing has yet been said about that.

There are a number of matters I could raise. One need only read the recent report on women and poverty to learn that 16 per cent of adult women in Canada live in poverty. This government said it would address that problem so as to bring about genuine equality of women. Next week is persons' week. This is the week commemorating the famous persons decision when the judicial committee of the privy council said that "women" were "persons", yet the backward steps that seem to have been taken by the government set us back further even than in the last few years under the Liberal administration, which really gave up doing anything after international women's year. As members of parliament we must address ourselves at last to treating women as persons, not as secondary wage earners, not as uninterested people that you can push around, as was done recently in Ontario. Of course, the Tories are in power in that province and that government has just voted that domestics should not come under the minimum wage regulations.

I hope that the minister and the other ministers concerned, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) and the President of the Treasury Board, will at last give substance to their campaign rhetoric.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate you most sincerely on your re-election as Speaker of this House. It is a most happy precedent for the House to have decided to re-elect a member who served it so well in the previous Parliament. I would also like to offer my most sincere congratulations to the officers of this House and to yourself, Mr. Speaker, and my best wishes in your new responsibilities. I also wish to congratulate the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Nearly 16 years ago, when I was a new member, I myself had the opportunity to play the same role and I was very proud for the voters of my constituency to have been chosen to make a speech and to be able to represent them in the House in the first moments of a new Parliament. I also wish to congratulate all the new ministers who have been appointed by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). During the last 12 years I was able to sit on the treasury benches, and I believe that we should give members opposite an opportunity to prove themselves. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) said, their task is certainly not an easy one and our role in this House is not necessarily to make their life any easier. For my part, I intend to co-operate with my hon. friends on the treasury benches, but it is to be expected that I might be somewhat mischievous at times because we have often seen in this House the people who are now on the treasury benches and who used to be on this side of the House take a malicious pleasure in keeping me in the House for hours and days at a time on points of order, questions of privilege or debates which took longer than I could give them in view of the work I had to do. I have no intention of being as extreme as they were and I will let them do their work as, having sat on the treasury benches for 12 years, I am well aware that ministers have a very difficult task and that we should give them as much sympathy and assistance as possible.

[English]

It is a tremendous pleasure and privilege for me to take part today in the throne speech debate. I must admit that for me and for many of my colleagues it is a strange experience to be sitting on this side of the House. I intend to enjoy completely this experience while I can, because the government's record to date suggests that we will be put back on the other side very quickly.

The Prime Minister told us that Canadians voted for his party because they wanted a change. That is exactly what they got. No political party ever changed so fast as the Tory party did between May 22 and May 23.

Do hon. members opposite remember something called the stimulative deficit? The people of Canada remember hearing about the stimulative deficit in the months preceding the election. The present Prime Minister told the electorate of Canada that the only way to revive the economy was to have more government spending and bigger tax cuts. He said that was the only way to produce the larger revenues which would eventually reduce our deficit. In other words, we could not hope to balance the budget somewhere down the road if we did not drive up the deficit now. I objected to that. I am very pleased that today they have come to realize that either they did not know what they were talking about or they were trying to mislead the population. Within two months of their election victory, the stimulative deficit was no more. It was an idea whose time had come and gone. Suddenly we need cutbacks.

I am sorry the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) is not here because, being from the province of Newfoundland, he was always on his feet complaining about the bad effect of cutbacks on that province. However, we suddenly need cutbacks in unemployment insurance and federal transfers to the provinces. We need to eliminate the universality of old age pensions. I could go on and on with the programs being slashed by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens).

In spite of all the great speeches made by the President of the Treasury Board over the past four months about all the programs he was going to slash and how he would bring everything under control, the headline in this morning's paper read "Ottawa deficit will jump by $500 million". For months we have been told that expenditures were being brought under control. The President of the Treasury Board blames this on the increase in the price of oil. We knew that last winter when the OPEC nations raised their prices.

In July the President of the Treasury Board made a pronouncement on the deficit. In August he did the same. Today we realize he did not know what he was talking about. Either he did not know how to forecast expenditures, or he has already lost control over the bureaucracy. Today he is telling us the deficit will be $500 million more than he said before.

Despite the fact we were facing an election, I stood in my place as minister of finance and stated that I was not going to try to buy the votes of Canadians, that even though we might be going to the polls we were prepared to face reality. The then leader of the opposition and all his friends talked about stimulative deficits, not cutting unemployment insurance and so on. Now that they are in power, they have completely changed their policies.

I cannot criticize the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that much. He has now seen the truth. After waiting for months, I was pleased to see him rise in his place yesterday and say that he supported the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Under the act, the minister has to assume full responsibility for the actions of the governor of the bank. Despite the pressure I was under, I never tried to create the impression that I was not responsible. I always said that I subscribed to the policies of the governor because monetary policy comes under the government.

I wish the Minister of Finance well. I know he is finding it quite difficult. However, I was a bit embarrassed when he said that Mr. Bouey had his absolute confidence, that he had perfect confidence in the governor, because I am sure that Mr. Bouey is not yet out of the woods. The last person in whom the minister had perfect confidence was the former deputy minister of finance. As the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) informed this House only yesterday, it was only a couple of hours after the minister expressed complete confidence in his deputy that the Prime Minister fired Mr. Hood.

As the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas stated, the minister was reduced to apologizing to his senior staff for having to place on them the burden of a new deputy minister, a man the minister did not choose, a man the minister did not want as a deputy minister. I like the new Minister of Finance very much, but to see him being humiliated like that in the first days of his tenure in office was unbelievable. I do not know of any minister of finance since I have been around, or even before, not Mr. Fleming, for example, who would have accepted being humiliated in that way by his prime minister.

You know, they used to talk about our Prime Minister's Office—there were supposed to be a lot of people in there who were running things and the ministries were not running things. In fact the new administration have increased the number in that office by 25, or something like that, and ministers nowadays do not even have the freedom in some cases, I am told, to choose their own executive assistants. It is unbelievable that a minister with responsibilities to discharge should be told by some guy from the Prime Minister's office whether a certain person is or is not acceptable to be in his office.

I was glad to see that the Minister of Finance took responsibility for the increase in the interest rate and gave his full support to the governor of the bank. That is the right decision. It reflected the position he had to take. He is responsible. If he does not agree with the governor he can write him a letter and give him instructions. There were a lot of people in Canada who, during the election campaign, gave credence to a speech made at his first press conference by the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister. During that conference he said that in the future a government under his leadership would rely not on monetary policy but on fiscal and budgetary policy—monetary policy would not be used to cure inflation. But the government has no chance. Today, after five months in office, the President of the Treasury Board has to admit that the deficit will be $500 million more than predicted. That leaves the government no room; the business community and the market will see that, despite all the great speeches he made about cutting expenditures, he has failed miserably.

I congratulate the government for permitting the opposition to raise this question in committee, because I should like to ask a few questions on the subject. But I hope the Minister of Finance will be given the free hand he needs in order to discharge his responsibility. This business of imposing upon him a deputy minister he did not want, creates a very bad precedent in the history of the ministry. It is one of the frustrations besetting a minister of finance to find that he has very little control over many of the problems with which he must deal. Nevertheless, it is his responsibility to create the proper climate of confidence, a sense that matters are under control, and nothing could be more dangerous in any administration than to see the prime minister pull the rug out from under his minister of finance.

Of course there is no way in which a minister of finance can deal with inflation overnight, notwithstanding those who, during the last campaign, said there was. I went through that for two years. I do believe that, in order to give confidence to the nation, the Minister of Finance has to be in control of his ministry, and not be forced to have a deputy minister who was not his choice, not be forced to go to the senior people in his department and tell them "Sorry, but I don't control the department," to the point that even in his own office, I am told, an executive assistant or an assistant had been imposed on him. This is the way to destroy a minister of finance, and I urge the government to act more sensibly in this regard.

The minister has not produced a budget, and that is a big mistake. When I brought down my budget last November I did so in very difficult circumstances. We were going into an election within months—there was no choice—and I put forward a budget which was seen by many people as being very dangerous politically for a government in power. The leader of the opposition at that time was talking about a stimulative deficit and what not, but I stood firm. Since then, good results have flowed from that budget. We have seen the unemployment figures falling from month to month to a point which is the lowest in many years. We are reaping the benefit of the two budgets which were brought down, one in April, 1978, and the other in November, 1978. But I must tell the Minister of Finance that there is a big time lag between new initiatives and the point at which they are felt in the economy.

It was a great mistake for the government not to bring down a budget earlier adjusting to the new circumstances because, since my last budget, inflation in the world economy has risen sharply and there has been a huge increase in the price of oil bought from the OPEC nations. This increase has been much larger than was anticipated by most observers.

I remember being at a meeting of the World Bank in Washington almost exactly a year ago, and talking to my colleagues there. The feeling was that the price of oil would probably increase by some 10 per cent or 15 per cent, perhaps by 20 per cent. It was much more than that, and there were wide fluctuations in the open market which pushed the price very high, in some cases 40 per cent higher. This meant a big change in the economic postures of all the nations concerned, and the effect has driven the United States economy into what some people regard as deep recession. In this situation the government hesitates and cannot make up its mind on anything.

I feel sorry for the poor Minister of Finance who has to prepare a budget this month while the Prime Minister and the minister of energy are unable to agree on the price of oil as they attempt to please either Mr. Davis or Mr. Lougheed. And the poor Minister of Finance has to write a budget not knowing what the compensation to offset the price of that commodity in eastern markets will be. We do not yet know what the policy will be. I recall I was involved in changing the pricing policy a year ago for the month of January, when I felt it was my duty to ask the government of Alberta and other producers of oil not to increase the price of oil by $1 because we were under too much pressure from inflation. I talked with them, and eventually they agreed. Of course, there were some rumblings. Of course, there were unfavourable editorials in some parts of Canada. A lot of people gave me hell, but I didn't give a damn because I felt that the job required someone who was a bit thick-skinned and could "take it". But I would point out that we are now in October.

I heard the Prime Minister on television the other day. He did not know what was going to happen. I guess he had a plan—he was to come out last Sunday with news of a big agreement after he and Mr. Lougheed had met in Montreal. The meeting failed. There can be no doubt that, when you are the Prime Minister of Canada, when you are the leader of a national government, you have to arbitrate the differences which arise in this land. There is no way in which consensus will be reached, because it is not in the nature of things that Mr. Lougheed should say he doesn't want a higher price for Albertan oil—after all, he has to get elected in Alberta—and it is not in the nature of things for Mr. Davis to say he does not want a lower price. Eventually, the leader of a national government has to take a stand in the best interests of the nation as a whole. Of course ministers opposite have not done this, so the poor Minister of Finance will have been operating under my 13-month old budget before he brings in another.

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that these are the same people who were asking me last March when a budget would be brought down. As I say, we are already in October. They hope to give us a budget in a month or two, but the poor Minister of Finance has no clue about the probable cost to the treasury of maintaining the government's compensation program for oil imports. I hope he and his colleagues realize it is not possible to study these problems ad nauseam.

Mrs. Thatcher did not like the policies of the previous government in England. She moved, in the first week after her election, with a speech fron the throne. There was a budget within a month. I do not know whether it was a good one or a bad one, but she had some convictions and she showed them. Here we have the contrary.

For me it is rather a pleasure to be standing up here after so many months. Hon. members opposite have not found a way to change the policies we enunciated. They have fed for the last five months on my budget, which was supposed to be terrible. This is fun for me, but it is not fun for the nation. I know that there is a time lag of six months to a year before the effects of fiscal or budgetary measures are felt in the economy. Results do not happen overnight. On the night of a budget big pronouncements can be made, but it takes six months or a year before millions and millions are affected by the implementation of measures.

By the time we have a new budget it will already be too late, because we have known since the month of April that the Americans are in a recession.There was a big debate among all the economists of the world as to whether the Americans were or were not going into a recession. Now it is evident that they were. Perhaps the Tories will be happy to see the Canadian economy go into a recession, but I would like to tell them that it is not necessary. Even if there is a recession in the United States now, for 27 months during the last recession in the United States we managed to maintain some growth in the Canadian economy. It was not enough, but there was some growth.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister promised that there would be an average rate of growth of 5.5 per cent should he come into power. Yet right away we are told that it looks as though, next year, growth will be under 2 per cent. Hon. members opposite were going to reduce the deficit, but it will be $500 million higher. It would be better for hon. members opposite to tell the truth to the people.

During the campaign we said that there was no room to make promises. That was not easy. I wish we could have made promises. Perhaps we lost the election, but I am proud that, despite the fact we did not make many promises during the campaign, we got more votes than the present government, and we kept our respectability. I do not see much respectability in the present government.

[Translation]

And now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to devote a few minutes to federal-provincial relations, a new field assigned to me by the Leader of the Opposition. I was pleased to accept, because I believe that we are now going through a very dangerous period in Canada. However, I am somewhat discouraged when I see the government believing that with appeasing policies, they will succeed in solving problems in the area of federal-provincial relations, especially when we Canadians in Quebec where most of us are Canadians know that in a few months we will have to vote in the referendum. In addition, we are being told by the Prime Minister of Canada that since he may have concluded an agreement on Loto Canada—it has not yet been ratified—that problem of relations between Quebec and the remainder of Canada will be solved. It is a big joke, Mr. Speaker. What was the matter with Loto Canada? It is an organization which the federal government had set up specifically to help the province of Quebec because of the Olympic Games deficit and which, therefore, is not a provincial responsibility. In order to make the first lottery possible in Canada, the Parliament of Canada had to introduce legislation and amend the Criminal Code to allow Jean Drapeau to hold his Olympic lottery, and as this scheme was to expire in the month of August following the Olympic Games, I personally introduced in the House a bill calling for the continuation of the scheme. And now the government is talking about turning it over to the provinces and trying to negotiate a return of the money from the provinces to the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I hear that one of the stumbling blocks which is delaying the signing of the agreement—I can hardly believe it—is the fact that the province of Quebec, although willing to take part in a lottery with the other provinces, does not want it to be called Loto Canada, because the word Canada is there. And the Progressive Conservative government agrees on that. It is Loto Canada. I am not ashamed to say it. I am a Canadian. I like the word "Canada", and most people in Quebec like it; it represents the obstacle to the settlement of, that little problem.

I could talk about the other so-called successes of the right hon. Prime Minister in the area of federal-provincial relations, namely, offshore rights. He made a nice gift to the provinces. He kept six or eight jurisdictions for the federal government. Furthermore, it will be necessary to amend the constitution. In another case either they give or they do not. And why have that debate which is going to create all kinds of controversies while governments concerned, besides the federal government, found a formula which avoided the conflict of jurisdictions, and which was found to be very favourable by the provinces? Even today, the Conservative premier of New Brunswick, Mr. Hatfield, says he is not convinced that the action taken by the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada is really in the interest of the maritimes, because even if they have oil revenues they are going to lose on equalization payments. So as the saying goes, they will have changed "four quarters for a dollar". They may not have gained anything. But in the meantime there are oil companies that want to search for oil at this point in that area, and they find themselves in the situation where one holds a provincial licence, while another holds a federal licence for the same area. There will be no oil finds there for quite some time because of that hassle. And if they are in doubt because of a constitutional amendment we will have to go to London and have the agreement of all provinces because the Prime Minister stated he would never amend the constitution without agreement from all provinces. So that situation will prevail for months. People in Newfoundland will believe they got a gift, but the Prime Minister will be unable to deliver.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will have an opportunity to come back on this. First I would extend my best wishes to the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis). This is a very difficult task, and I know he is committed to devoting all his energy and talent. So I wish him good luck. However, as I said on the oil situation, that kind of problem will never be solved through some kind of meeting where everyone is in agreement. This is impossible by the very nature of things. If you are the mayor of a community and have a problem, you blame the provincial government. If you are a provincial premier and have a problem, you blame the federal government. But we up here, Mr. Speaker, we cannot blame the Queen of England. Occasionally we blame the Americans, when we have a chance. All that is in the nature of things. So I wish him good luck, but at some point he will have to face the facts and say, "We are the government, and must take a decision in the interest of all Canadians".

I should like to deal for a few minutes with one of the attitudes of the party in power which concerns me greatly. We held a debate in this House before the election on the bill we had introduced dealing with referendums: the bill gave the federal government the power to hold referendums. Both the Progressive Conservatives and the New Democrats supported the measure, the Conservatives saying, "We do not want the bill in that form but will accept a referendum on the Quebec issue". Today, the Prime Minister claims that by withdrawing his own plan for a referendum, he has done what was needed to incite Quebeckers to remain Canadians. Come on! That is sheer naïveté. What is the number one priority of the Parti Québécois program? What is it? To separate Quebec from Canada. They are trying to find some formula or other, just the way they did in the last election, to trick the voters. They got themselves elected then by saying, "Now, we will give you good government." Then, they spent the last three and a half years talking only about separation and getting ready for it. Now they are free. We set them free and enabled them to put the question they want to ask. They want a mandate to negotiate something or other. Only after the election will Mr. Lévesque tell us exactly what that mandate is. What worries me is that I have heard several hon. members opposite say that they have a plan. That plan, believe it or not, is that if the question is not the right one, they will come in at the last minute with a bill. That will be provocation of the worst kind! For months they will have worn the mask of the jolly good fellow, of the pleasant guy. Then, when there is maximum tension in Quebec, without notice, without warning, they will club them with a federal referendum. Why not be honest with the people of Quebec? If Mr. Lévesque asks an honest question, there will be no problem.

An hon. Member: He will be beaten.

Mr. Chrétien: He will be beaten. But the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. LaSalle) knows full well that he will not ask an honest question. He knows that and I am happy to hear him say so.

But get ready, because there are millions of citizens in Quebec who want to stay in Canada. There are some 680,000 to 700,000 Anglophones there. I met a few in Montreal recently who were telling me that they felt totally abandoned, that they at least had the hope that the Government of Canada would assume its responsibility to protect them in this debate, where they feel like floating in a nutshell over a stormy sea, but that now, in an attempt to smooth things over, they were being totally neglected. There is nothing wrong with having a bill here, at the federal level, which, if Mr. Lévesque's question is honest, can be left dormant, but to come at the last minute, underhandedly, that is dishonest towards the people of Quebec.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Chrétien: There is only one thing that matters: to be honest with the public. That is all I ask of the government.

[English]

Mr. Don Cameron (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to address this august House. First I should like to congratulate Your Honour on your appointment to position of Speaker. It is a high office, and it goes without saying that I will abide by Mr. Speaker's rulings. I am sorry the last speaker, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), has left so soon because I have a message for him.

Mr. Chrétien: Who, me?

An hon. Member: He is right here.

Mr. Cameron: He spoke about our Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie). He cautioned him about the rug being pulled out from under him. I want to assure the House that there is no one in Canada who would know better than the man who was the minister of finance in the last government. He has more experience than anyone.

Mr. Chrétien: Merci.

Mr. Cameron: I should like to speak for a moment about the Speech from the Throne. We have heard comments indicating that it was not much of a speech, that there was nothing in it. I was delighted with it. It was a positive speech. It emphasized what we on this side said during the election campaign. Throughout my remarks I will bring that out.

Canadians today are looking for credibility. In short that is what defeated the last government, the lack of credibility. Canadians are looking to a government which will set policies that will be carried on for some time in the future, so that industrialists and entrepreneurs can make their plans and go ahead with them. That will be a change from what they have had in the past.

The riding of Kamloops-Shuswap was named for its two beautiful lakes. I should like to thank personally the voters of that constituency for choosing me to be their representative here and for the confidence they have placed in me, confidence which I do not take lightly. Kamloops is the regional centre of the south central part of British Columbia. The Trans-Canada highway and the Yellowknife highway pass through it. Also it is a divisional point on both the CN and CP railways. It has a large shopping centre or district upon which 130,000 people depend. Approximately 60,000 people live in the town of Kamloops itself. Salmon Arm is a small town on the banks of Shuswap Lake. It is a beautiful spot, it is a beautiful lake. The active industries in that part of the country are forestry, mining, agriculture, ranching, tourism, and some light industry. I should like to spend most of my time talking about these industries.

There are three producing mines in this area. In the case of two mines they export their concentrate, and in the case of the third one it is smelted down and they export approximately an 1,100-pound ingot. The primary metal is copper. There is molly, as it is known in the industry, or molybdenum, with something more than trace elements of gold and silver in the area. Since May 22, which is an interesting date to note, one new mine has started. At present they are stripping overburden, pouring concrete, erecting steel, and putting up a new concentrater. The new mine is bigger than any two of the three operating at the moment. Also heavy equipment is moving into the area to begin construction of another new mine which will be larger than all the others put together. This shows the confidence industrialists have in the present government. They have known of this ore for several years. It has sat in the ground, it has never been developed. Studies have been done on it and there have been drilling reports which have sat there for years. Since May 22 the industrialists have confidence in the government because they know its policies, and they are going ahead.

I should like to refer to a newspaper clipping which I received today from the area. It reads as follows:

Anderson, formerly Afton Mines mine manager, estimates that full development by all four copper mining companies would mean a combined annual payroll of $56 million for 2,600 persons employed in the mining industry in the Highland Valley by 1982.

Also I should like to refer to some specifics respecting what these mines produce. The milling capacity of Afton Mines Limited is 8,500 tons of ore per day. Its annual production is just over 57 million pounds of copper. Also it produces just under 58,000 ounces of gold and 290,087 ounces of silver. In the case of Bethlehem Copper, its milling capacity is 20,000 tons per day. Its annual production is 47,761,191 pounds of copper and just under 500,000 pounds of molybdenum.

In the case of Lornex, its mining capacity is 48,100 tons per day. Its annual production is 135,422,000 pounds of copper and 3,985,000 pounds of molybdenum. Perhaps these figures do not seem like very much, but in the industry what that adds up to is quite substantial and relieves some of our balance of payments.

British Columbia produces over $450 million worth of the copper which is sold on the export market per year. It produces over $45 million worth of gold a year. It produces just under 30 million pounds of molybdenum which is worth over $160 million a year. This has a very good effect on our balance of payments.

● (1540)

In this country we have so much in the way of resources, in greater quantities than in almost any other country in the world. We have the skills and the know-how to develop and to extract those resources, whether they be timber or minerals. One of our problems is that most people, and I say "most", cannot see the trees for the forest. It is to be hoped, now that we have a change in government and that more positive, long-range plans are in effect for the industrialists, that we will have greater participation by them in these industries.

[Mr. Cameron.]

The forestry industry in our area is a primary economic producer. We have ten large sawmills and one pulp mill employing a force of about 9,300 people. This industry produces an export commodity that we ship in great quantities, helping to relieve our balance of payments.

We also have tourism in the area. It is a great hunting, fishing, skiing, and sports area. I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) is not here as he would be interested in this. A couple of years ago he was out in our area and skied at a place called Todd Mountain. Two entrepreneurs have taken over this area and spent $1.5 million improving it this year. They started out in a business-like manner. They had Snow Engineering carry out their study, the same people who designed the Aspen, Colorado development. They found that we have greater potential on Todd Mountain than in Aspen, Colorado.

These people have located and marked 21 ski runs on the mountain. I am pleased to say that the mountain will not be denuded of its trees. The course will be cut down the mountain with trees left between the different runs. There will be slopes for beginners, for the average person, and for the expert. They are also planning to build a lodge at the foot of the ski lifts to accommodate people while in the area. They have installed a third lift in there this year. I had the privilege of driving over the new ski run with them. They have cleared an area some 200 feet in width which is tapered on both sides and curves down the mountain. This is an excellent area. It has been raked free of boulders by hand, and sown in grass, so that with three, four or six inches of snow people will be able to use the runs.

That is the kind of thing I want to see developed. I am not interested in handout projects for the riding. Much more is to be gained through private enterprise, with government-set stable conditions so that entrepreneurs can go ahead and make their plans. Let us put private industry to work, as I am sure this will pay great returns.

I am sorry the hon. member for Saint-Maurice is not here as he had some direction in respect of what I wish to talk about now. There is a railway relocation problem in the riding of Kamloops-Shuswap. This is a problem that goes back a number of years to when the then minister of transport, Mr. Lang, decided there should be a rail relocation study. Certainly in respect of railway relocations Kamploops and Regina are the two worst cities in the country.

The former government said we should go ahead and conduct a study. The former minister said to spend up to $200,000 with the government paying half and the area paying half. That was fine, and we went ahead with the study. As it was nearing completion we experienced one of the customary restraint programs, and there was no more money. Within a month or so the former government made another promise, saying there would be money and we should complete the study. The former minister said that we were so near to completion and that this was such valuable information we should go ahead and the money would be forthcoming. We went ahead, completed the study and turned the study over to the government. Again we experienced a restraint program, and again no money was forthcoming. To this date that small city of Kamloops is stuck with that cost of $100,000, the federal government's share of the bill which the former government left hanging. Surely that is a poor way to establish any kind of co-operation or to get negotiations going. This is a very sad situation.

Let me make a few remarks about a prison that was to be established in the area. This was first suggested some four or five years ago. A former solicitor general came out and announced that the government was going to build a prison in the Kamloops area. There is nothing else in the world that we need like we need a prison. We were told to pick out a site, and a site was chosen. The government purchased 38 acres up on the west hill just at the edge of Kamloops. They could have chosen a site a lot further out and still been within the city boundaries. In any event, the government bought this 38-acre site for $160,000. It did not seem to make any difference that there was a crude oil pipeline running through the area. Nor did it matter that there was a natural gas pipeline running through the same area along with a hydro line. We were told this was no problem and the government would have them moved. The federal government moved them and paid another $200,000.

I would like to know who owned that land. I did not bother to find out, but I could pretty well tell you who it was. We were told many times during the election campaign that the prison was to be built there. I am not all that enamoured with a prison in the area; I could live with it, or do without it, but certainly it should not be that close to the town. I am sure the people who made the decision in years gone by to establish the prison a number of miles outside New Westminster have now had after-thoughts. It is now located within city boundaries, and the people do not like it. There are many better places where a prison could be located than at that spot in Kamloops.

Another matter I should like to refer to, Mr. Speaker, relates to the airport at Kamloops. We have our problems at the airport. Kamloops is situated in the bottom of the river valley in that area. We have a pulp mill on one side of the airport and a refinery on the other. We do experience some air inversion in winter, and quite often we have over-flights. I think there were 29 in the month of December last year.

This matter was judiciously brought up during the last election campaign. We were told we were going to get some improvements to our airport almost immediately. We were given to understand the improvements would be started even before the vote. The amount involved started at $1.1 million, increased to $2 million, then to $2.5 million, and finally $2.95 was settled on. We heard other figures up to $5.5 million and $6 million. Needless to say, nothing has been done. The money was set aside in the budget but, as a previous member, the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain), has said, what the government failed to do was go to Treasury Board and obtain approval.

Those are some of the facts I picked up when I took over in the area. Another situation that was brought to my attention relates to the Thompson River system. This system includes the two lakes for which the riding is named. It also includes the two Thompson rivers. The North Thompson flows generally from the area of Jasper, and joins the South Thompson at Kamloops. The South Thompson flows from Shuswap Lake. The river then flows down to Lytton where it joins the Fraser.

Studies have been done on the Thompson River system for as long as we have had studies, and I think we could produce almost any type of study you would care to see. The thing that the people of my riding are concerned about is the condition of the water in the Thompson and Fraser rivers all the way down to the coast.

In B.C. most cities are unable to get water by drilling. They pump their water out of the rivers. At one time it was good drinking water, but today most of the towns along the Shuswap, Kamloops, and most of the towns down along the Thompson and Fraser system, dump their sewage into it. It was announced during the election that we would have a $60,000 pre-planning study done on the problem. We are in the throes of receiving that report now, and if there is one point I would like to make today emphatically it is that we do not need any more studies on the Thompson River. In the first place, we did not need studies to tell us not to dump sewage into the rivers, we needed action.

That river system is also the run for the famous Pacific sockeye salmon. They come up the Fraser River into the Thompson River, into the Shuswap and into the Adams River and Adams Lake. It is one of the largest sockeye spawning runs in the world. In fact there is a sign along the run that advertises the one section of the run as the world's richest 300 acres. So, not only are the citizens of the area in danger, but the salmon are facing the danger of being wiped out.

I would like to speak for a moment about the Yellowhead highway system. I was pleased when the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) said that he was interested in having some of that highway system upgraded. The part I am interested in runs from Tête Jaune Cache down through Kamloops, on down to Merritt and over the whole Hope-Princeton highway. Generally speaking, it is a good highway, but there is a section from Kamloops north for some 40 miles to Barriere, and in particular a 15-mile section within the boundaries of Kamloops, which is now approaching an unstable condition at speed levels of 30 miles per hour. This is from the Pacific Rim highway study. The traffic on that road is not ordinary traffic. The grades on that highway for truckers going to and from the prairies are the best we have through British Columbia. There is only one bad hill to pull in the whole system. Consequently all the heavy freight trucks use it, to say nothing of the log trucks, approximately 100 of them a day, and I would venture as many chip trucks in a 24 hour period. These trucks carry in the vicinity of 80,000 to 90,000 pound loads or, in other words, 40 to 45 tons. To have loads like that travelling a highway which is approaching an unstable condition at speed levels of 30 miles an hour is hardly a situation we appreciate.

I would like to say a few words now about energy, and in particular Petro-Canada. We have heard on several occasions from both parties opposite about Petro-Canada. It is only right that they should explain their side of the coin, but there are two sides to every coin. I would like to take a moment to run over our side now.

If my memory serves me correctly, and I believe that it does, Petro-Canada was originally set up when we had a minority government. In fact only yesterday they were talking about a paternity suit over it, and maybe there will be a divorce later and an alimony suit later. When PetroCan was set up with the use of taxpayer's money in the amount of approximately $1 billion, I can remember reading the reports each year in Hansard before I came to the House, and the government of the day would seem to come at budget time for $200 million to $250 million for running expenses. That was fine. Then they started acquiring some properties. The first thing that was done was that Petro-Canada began buying up shares in pipeline companies or oil companies, shares which you and I or some senior citizen might well have had and from which they could get a small dividend, while some portion of it flowed to the treasury. However, we do not have that today. The company bought up the shares and they are going into a conglomerate. The NDP are always talking about multinationals and conglomerates. This company is approaching that size.

The NDP also talk about having a window on the oil industry in order to know what is going on. From what I hear from the NDP and the Liberal party, when they get down to have a look in that window they must have their rose-coloured glasses on. I have not heard any reports about the oil Petro-Canada is producing. The purchase of Pacific Petroleums has not produced one drop of oil for Canada, and it is the same with the other oil company which was purchased. Petro-Canada has not produced any oil for Canada in order that it may have shares in the pipeline, shares away from which the government of the day pushed some poor little senior citizen. That has not helped Canada.

I am interested to hear from the NDP spokesman on what that party's policy is on uranium. During the election they said that there would be no mining of uranium in British Columbia. I guess the party has taken a different position in Saskatchewan, but that is their problem. Their leader went across the country on what he called a crusade, but I noticed that he was always speaking to the committed, the unions and so on, saying that Petro-Canada must be kept. It is interesting to note that one of the subsidiaries of Petro-Canada is busy in B.C. exploring for uranium in the area of Peachland, Penticton, and up toward Merritt. Apparently they are also interested in buying claims in the Adams Plateau. I am sure that we over here would all like to know just what their position is on that matter.

There is another angle to Petro-Canada with which I am not happy. No Canadian would object to the taxpayers' money being spent to find oil in the north or on the heavy oil in the sands on the Saskatchewan-Alberta border, nor do they particularly object to the importing of oil from other countries. But I am sure they do object to their money being spent through Petro-Canada on drilling for oil in Pakistan, off the Norwegian coast, or in China. It will not produce one drop of oil for Canada. Those are some of the things on the other side of the coin, and the things which the parties opposite missed when they were looking through the window on the energy industry.

[Mr. Cameron.]

I have emphasized some of the characteristics of the Kamloops area, the beautiful climate and the once beautiful farming country. I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) about the agricultural lands, particularly the better classes of soil which are fast disappearing. Kamloops is a prime example. We once had on the north shore of the Thompson a beautiful flat that was all in orchards producing beautiful crops. But today there is only one small orchard of some 15 or 20 acres left. The whole area is now housing. I certainly think that the hon. member's remarks were to the point and worth considering, and I agree with him.

Lastly, I would like to say that my riding of Kamloops-Shuswap is proud to be part of this great Canada, this Canada from sea to sea, and we certainly believe that it should and will stay as one country.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the House to revert to presenting reports from special and standing committees?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose standing and standing joint committees of the House, notwithstanding Standing Order 65(1), if the House gives its consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1600)

Mr. Speaker: The House consents to receive this committee report at this time. The House, I am sure, will want to know that it is in the usual form. As we know, it is a lengthy report containing the names of all members on all of the standing committees. Does the House insist that the entire report be read at this time?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling):

That the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the standing and standing joint committees of this House be concurred in notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 65(1).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I assume that the list will appear in Hansard at this point even though the minister does not read out all those names.

Mr. Speaker: The House can be assured that upon passage of this motion the report will be printed as it has been tabled and as though it had been read.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the House has now struck the standing and standing joint committees of the House of Commons, one of the purposes of which is to deal with the estimates. There are estimates on the table. Now that we have struck the committees, I think it would be appropriate if we made the work of the committees worthwhile. With that in mind I wonder if I have the consent of the House to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: No.

Mr. Speaker: The House could revert to motions at this time only with unanimous consent. I understand there is not unanimous consent according to the expression I have just heard. There is therefore no alternative but to revert to orders of the day, which is the resumption of the debate on the address in reply to the Speech of the Throne.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Trudeau) (p. 37).

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was beginning to feel a little like a jumping jack, getting up and down. If the other business has been concluded I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and all the members here because it is a genuine honour to give my first address in this chamber. It is a chamber with a great deal of history. Anyone coming here feels that history and cannot help but be honoured by the process that brought him. In my case I want to thank the voters of Vancouver Centre for the landslide victory they gave me. I had 94 more votes than I really needed to be elected and I appreciate every one of them. I want to assure all the voters of Vancouver Centre, even the 65 per cent who voted against me, that I am going to do my best for them in this chamber.

I understand it is traditional to speak about one's riding at this time and tell everyone what a fine place it is. As a former mayor of Vancouver I certainly know the riding well. I love it and I enjoy speaking about it. I see the former mayor of Toronto sitting opposite as a minister of the government, and I am sure he shares these feelings.

I have found, however, that it is not a good idea to tell people of all the virtues of Vancouver. When we do that we find that easterners somehow descend on it. We refer to anybody beyond the Rocky Mountains as easterners, of course. Those from Alberta are mid-easterners, and I think the House is beginning to understand, as is the country, why we refer to them that way. People who live beyond Alberta are referred to as far easterners. When all these people find out the truth about our city, they flock to it. They crowd our beautiful, unpolluted sandy beaches, and Stanley Park which is partly in my riding. They jam the ski slopes just 15 minutes away from my riding which, unfortunately, are represented by two members on the other side, the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Huntington) and the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson). They will be ably represented, I am sure. In any case, Mr. Speaker, visitors come flocking. The virtues of Vancouver attract them too well, so the best thing is to say nothing. For that reason I will say no more about it tonight.

I should like to speak about a part of my riding that is of great national importance, and that is the port of Vancouver. I see the Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser) who represents Vancouver South, and other members who represent parts of greater Vancouver, in the House, and I am sure they will agree, as would members from the prairies and other parts of Canada, that the port of Vancouver is a national institution of great importance to us all. During the time I was mayor of the city, and since, I have wanted to see changes in the administration of the port. Unfortunately, it has been a long distance administration over the years, coming under the authority of the National Harbours Board in Ottawa. That is simply not the best type of administration for a local port which should have more local input and more local autonomy. There is a very fine port manager, but the port needs to have more control over its own affairs in the area, and this is one of the interests I propose to pursue in this House.

I know bills have been brought before the House in earlier days which would give a great deal of local control to the port of Vancouver, but they have not been passed. I hope that members from the other parties will join with those who represent the greater Vancouver area in trying to bring about this important and necessary change at the port of Vancouver for the benefit of the city of Vancouver and for the benefit of all Canadians. We feel saddened when we see the port of Seattle taking away some of our container business because our port has lagged behind in development. We feel we can do better. In my judgment this is a non-partisan issue and one that I would like to pursue with the other parties in this House. I believe there are many occasions in this House when members can pursue issues in a non-partisan fashion while representing regional interests. I should like to do more of that myself as it fits in with my municipal background.

I believe we should be providing this type of constructive opposition. Our leader has commented many times that our role is to provide such constructive opposition—criticizing when there are things to criticize, and certainly the government has given us many such occasions so far, and there will be others—but offering constructive suggestions and positive proposals from the position of opposition.

The Liberal opposition has been organized in the form of a number of caucus committees. It is my great pleasure to be chairman of the committee on resources and small businesses. The resources involved, mining and forestry, are of great importance to British Columbia and western Canada. The small business aspect fits in very well with my personal background in business, small business and finance. I am delighted to represent those areas in the opposition and look forward to participating in the debates.

The hon. member who spoke ahead of me referred to mining and forestry in Kamloops, the area he represents, and said that both industries are strong. It is true that both are doing well. In the case of mining, however, stable taxation policies are needed so that those involved in it know where they stand and do not have surprises sprung upon them.

The forestry industry is also in good shape. It is true that the lower Canadian dollar has helped it a good deal, as has the task force established by the previous government. There is a great need for further reforestation programs, Mr. Speaker, if this country is not to run out of timber by the end of this century, and plans should be laid for them. You cannot suddenly just plant 100-foot trees. This is an area in which I want to see the government take further action. There was considerable improvement as a result of the task force initiated by the previous federal government. Joint federal-provincial programs are catching up part of that backlog, but more needs to be done.

I want to talk about small business for a moment. Small business is growing and flourishing in Canada. What many of us forget is that two-thirds of the job growth in the last five years has come from small business. Small business has been doing well. There has been quite an upsurge in the feeling of entrepreneurship among young people in their late twenties and early thirties. What you are seeing is the "do your own thing" generation reaching an age where they want to do their own thing, but they also want to earn a good living doing it. There is no better way of doing your own thing and earning a good living while doing it, than being your own boss and in your own small business.

I am delighted to see people taking a greater interest in running their own businesses. There is a shortage of entrepreneurship in this country, but this is improving. There is a great interest in the colleges and community colleges in courses designed to help people run their own businesses. We must encourage that and ensure that sort of thing is easier for people to do. There is no greater freedom, creativity, pure fun as well as opportunity than one can find in running one's own business. However, it is tough to get started.

About 60 per cent of small businesses fail in their first try. Small businessmen starting something usually fail, and that is a great pain. Instead of giving government handouts to people in order to encourage them to go into business, because that type of thing is almost impossible to administer at the very small business level, we can ease that pain to some extent. We can do this by looking at better capital loss right-offs for small businessmen initiating their own small businesses—starting their own businesses and failing. That is part of the process. A lot of us have scars to show that we have started some businesses and failed. If we can ease that pain, we could get many more people started in the system at relatively low cost to the treasury.

I have seen proposals for a $5,000 tax credit for investment in small businesses. I have seen proposals from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Chamber of Commerce, and others. We on this side concur with that idea. The former prime minister suggested in the last election campaign a $5,000 tax credit for people investing in their own businesses, for example by buying shares in their own businesses for employees. This is easily extendible to people starting in a new business of their own, and is a worth-while idea for the government to pursue.

The Federal Business Development Bank has been an instrument of great benefit to small business people. It has not made money because its mandate is not to make money. It has broken even, which is what it should do. It has taken on high risk loans, made money available to small businessmen, and enabled them to grow. It has been one of the primary sources of financing for small business.

I hear disturbing rumours that people want to cut back on this program. There is talk of privatizing part of it, of restricting it and making it into a much more profit-making organization. I suggest all this would destroy the mandate of the Federal Business Development Bank, and I do not want to see that happen. We on this side will fight any threat to restrict, cut back, shrink or privatize the Federal Business Development Bank. This is not because we are against privatization. We are not against privatization per se. We believe that the whole process of looking at government Crown corporations should be a selective one. We should look at corporations that have either been acquired or developed by the government and ask, are these still serving a function for the government, or are they not, and if they are not, would they be better sold to private enterprise in some way? We should look at this question selectively and not dogmatically. In that way I think we will find there are some cases.

The former government had intentions to return to private investors some of the companies that it owned. It bought Canadair, and a good thing it did too. Canadair was a very successful investment. It saved many jobs in Canada and it developed a viable industry. But there may come an occasion when it is sensible and when an appropriate buyer is available when that can be turned back to private industry. We have no objection to examining those sorts of things on their merits, and I think they should be examined.

There is one company we have examined on its merits and that is Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada should not be privatized. Privatizing that company is all wrong, and we oppose it in any form.

Petro-Canada has been a huge success. As the hon. member from the opposition who spoke before me mentioned, about $1 billion in taxpayers' money has been invested in Petro-Canada. True. That investment is now worth approximately $2 billion to $3 billion. Petro-Canada has been a fine investment and a fine use of taxpayers' money. In only four years it has grown to be the largest Canadian oil company operating in Canada. This company has taken high risks in the Arctic, offshore Labrador and so on. It has done very well. It has produced new fields of oil and it has helped solve some of our energy problems. It has been incredibly successful, no matter how you look at it. This company has even helped small business, Mr. Speaker.

Petro-Canada has come to the rescue of many independent retailers, particularly in the province of Quebec, who are being squeezed out of business by the large multinationals. It has come to the rescue and helped many independent oil producers in the province of Alberta who could not afford to participate in drilling syndicates under normal circumstances but who were pulled together by Petro-Canada, and assisted. It would be a tragedy to privatize Petro-Canada. It has been too good, and it is needed under government ownership.

The previous speaker mentioned that Petro-Canada had been started by the minority government. This is not so. The bill was initiated, and royal assent was given under the majority government in late 1974, early 1975. The company was created by a majority Liberal government, expanded by a majority Liberal government to where it is now, and it has been one of the most successful undertakings of the previous Liberal majority government of the last five years.

I want to talk a little bit about the proposals to privatize Petro-Canada. There have been several proposals, and we are not sure where the government stands, whether it is to privatize part of it, all of it, to cut it up, keep the unprofitable parts for some obscure reason and sell off the good parts that turn a profit. All these sorts of plans have been heard and the question is now in the hands of a committee which, I understand, reports next week. One of the suggestions that I think will come out of this is to what we call "BCRIC" it.

Those of us who come from British Columbia know what "BCRIC" means. It refers to the British Columbia Resources Investment Company. This company was a corporation owned by the provincial government containing mainly forest products companies, some minority shareholdings, Westcoast Transmission, some oil and gas rights, and so on. It was a profitable, mature package, and it was turned over to individuals in the province of British Columbia by the provincial government in two ways. First, free shares were given to each resident of British Columbia, even to newly born babies; then each individual was given the right to buy up to approximately $30,000 of the stock additionally. This type of venture has been a tremendous success in British Columbia, and I personally applaud this whole approach. It was a success in two ways.

The investors poured in money far in excess of what people had expected. Almost $500 million came in when about $100 million was expected. Eighty-seven per cent of the citizens took advantage of their free shares. More than that, it has been a dramatic educational experience for residents of British Columbia. Every school child owns shares in BCRIC. They talk about it in the classrooms and thousands of citizens have, for the first time, become shareholders and investors in a viable corporation, namely, BCRIC. It has been an outstanding success.

This is a success that could be applied at the national level, but for PetroCan it is all wrong. For Petro-Canada this whole idea makes no sense, for a couple of reasons. Once a company is a shareholder company, it is a different kind of company. The interests of shareholders must be thought about and concern over potential dividends become important. A company is much more cautious once it becomes a shareholder company. It cannot afford to take the kinds of risks that this government-owned company has taken. It simply cannot do that. It requires government clout behind it to give it the kind of strength it needs to offset the fact that our oil industry is so totally dominated by foreign multinationals.

We do not need just another Canadian owned company. We need a company with clout. That is what we have. We now have a company that is an instrument of national policy. That is most important to remember at all times. This is an instrument of national policy. It has been highly successful.

Even Premier Bennett, who is not part of our party, said just the other day during a radio interview that to "BCRIC" PetroCan would make no sense. It makes no sense to "BCRIC" a company that is an instrument of national policy. Those were the words of Premier Bennett, and he knows of what he talks in this case. His advice should be heeded by members across the aisle when it comes to PetroCan.

I suggest there is a candidate for "BCRICing," the Canada Development Corporation. An article in the Journal a day or so ago suggested that this company is being considered for privatizing and turning back to private investors. I commend the government for considering that. It makes sense. This company is diversified in mining, petrochemicals, oil and gas. It has 32 per cent of its shares now held by individual investors. It is a shareholder company, not an instrument of government national policy.

The intention of the government at all times with the Canada Development Corporation has been to turn it back eventually to the private sector, reducing the government holding from 68 per cent to 10 per cent. They have embarked on that course. I suggest to the government that "BCRICing" PetroCan makes no sense, that it would just be a way to get out of an embarrassing commitment which all of us know is wrong. The public knows it is wrong, we know it is wrong, and you know in your hearts it is wrong. Do not "BCRIC" PetroCan. "BCRIC" the Canada Development Corporation. That makes sense.

If the government wants to add some other corporations that should be returned to the private sector, do so. That makes sense. You have a perfect vehicle; use it. The Liberals will support intelligent privatization. We will examine the Crown corporations to see which, if any, should be returned to the private sector. However, we will not support a dogmatic, narrow-minded approach which says that everything owned by the government should be privatized.

In the case of PetroCan every sensible observer, even Conservative observers such as the Globe and Mail, recognize that this company should be kept together, kept strong and an instrument of national policy. Don't "BCRIC," dismember, sell off or mess up PetroCan in any way. Show some vision. Have some pride in Canadian ownership of an outstanding Canadian enterprise. Keep PetroCan and expand it.

Mr. Tom McMillan (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by congratulating most heartily the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) on being chosen Speaker in this Parliament. His is a most difficult responsibility, which he performed admirably and with a great deal of distinction and grace in the previous House. I am sure all hon. members join me in wishing him well as he faces the substantial responsibilities that are produced because of our minority government situation.

I congratulate as well the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon.

member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald). Theirs were first-rate speeches which set a very high standard for every member of this House. If I may be allowed a personal note, Mr. Speaker, I was particularly delighted with the speech given by my friend and colleague from Prince Edward Island, the hon. member for Cardigan. His address was a credit not only to himself, his constituency and the Island, but indeed to Parliament itself.

It is a great honour for any member to sit in this chamber where sat also the great parliamentarians of modern Canadian history, men like Arthur Meighen, M. J. Coldwell, and Ernest Lapointe. It is a pleasure to be seated in this House, and much more a pleasure to be making a speech here for the first time. I am particularly delighted to be standing here in this Parliament as the successor to a distinguished Canadian, Dr. Heath Macquarrie, who represented Hillsborough with enormous distinction for over 22 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan: I acknowledge his presence in the House and am delighted both to succeed him and to see him here today. He made a most valuable contribution to Canadian affairs, to Hillsborough, to the Island, to Canada, and indeed to the world community through his interest and expertise, and his knowledge in the field of international affairs. I am glad that the Parliament of Canada will have the benefit of his formidable talents in the Upper Chamber, as a result of his appointment last week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan: The riding of Hillsborough of which I am the representative is essentially the greater Charlottetown area including West and East Royalty, Sherwood and Parkdale. It is not only the capital city area of Prince Edward Island, it is also the cradle of confederation itself. It is small geographically and by population, but its contribution to national affairs belies its very size and small population.

Hillsborough has a long and distinguished tradition of excellence in the field of higher education. It boasts a relatively new university, the University of Prince Edward Island, which was fathered by two established institutions, St. Dunstan's University and Prince of Wales College, which were older than Canada itself. Hillsborough has a first-rate community college for vocational and technical training, Holland College, and good primary and secondary schools. A special interest of mine is architecture and restoration and heritage, and my riding has some of the finest examples of early Canadian architecture to be found anywhere in the country.

I might mention also that the Confederation Centre of the Arts was built in 1964 as a result of taxpayers' contributions from every part of Canada, all ten provinces, the territories, and the dominion government. The Centre is now, and has been for some time, producing original Canadian musicals that are excellent by world standards.

We in the riding of Hillsborough, and in Prince Edward Island in general, enjoy perhaps a simpler life than Canadians in many other parts of the country. But it is a good life. It is a community where natural beauty, clean air and strong community ties are taken for granted. Our values are inherited largely from our Scottish, Irish, Acadian, and English ancestors. They have been enriched, however, by the contributions of people from all over the world who have given us the benefit of their cultures. My riding will be further enhanced by the arrival of some 500 new families from Ottawa following the relocation of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

• (1630)

An hon. Member: Aren't you lucky?

Mr. McMillan: We are, indeed, lucky. And I want to emphasize to those public servants who may feel some trepidation about having their families uprooted, that Islanders are looking forward to their arrival and are doing everything possible to make them feel welcome in their new community.

The whole business of the relocation of the Department of Veterans Affairs is a practical application of the principle of decentralization endorsed both by the previous government and by the current government. It is a principle which holds that the benefits to be derived from government itself as an industry should be spread as widely as possible across this great dominion. Mr. Speaker, it is not etched in stone that our national institutions or departments or agencies of government should, a priori, be ensconeed in the national capital area or in central Canada for that matter. I stress the importance of this relocation of the department to my riding. I think it is important, also, to the department, which I am sure, will be well accommodated in the city of Charlottetown. But to any public servants who may still have some reservations or hesitancy, some fears or anxieties about the reception they will find when they move to our community, I stress that those fears can be put to rest.

A moment ago I talked about educational opportunities in my riding—the fine university, an excellent community college, the first-class primary and secondary schools. I hope and anticipate and pray that by the expiry of this Parliament, whenever that may be, the city of Charlottetown will also be able to boast a first-class veterinary college. At present, we in Canada have only three veterinary schools, one in Guelph, one in Ste. Hyacinthe, and one in Saskatoon. There is none to serve the whole of Atlantic Canada. The only English-speaking veterinary school in eastern Canada, including Ontario, is in Guelph. And it is incapable of accepting more than six students from Atlantic Canada each year.

It is a fact that, each year in Canada, we are falling behind by some 100 trained veterinarians, the numbers required in the private and the public sectors alike. It is a tragedy, a national scandal, that we should be going outside our own country for trained veterinarians at the very time when our own qualified young people are being refused entrance to veterinary schools in Canada.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from a report prepared by Dr. R. G. Thomson, planning co-ordinator for the proposed Atlantic regional veterinary college.

> In both agriculture and veterinary medicine there are acute shortages in Canada of professionally trained men and women for specialized posts in government and industry.
> In certain fields the shortage is so critical that Government agencies are having to hire a significant proportion of their professional staff outside Canada. At present Agriculture Canada is sponsoring a number of professional employees in full-time studies at foreign graduate schools. While this may be commendable in terms of promoting Canadian participation in international scholarship, every Canadian should be embarrassed that we are relying on foreign schools to train a significant proportion of the country's highly qualified personnel in agriculture and veterinary medicine—two fields of education in which, given our natural and human resources, we should be providing world leadership rather than imposing upon others.

Mr. Speaker, I have for some time now, been a proponent of a fourth veterinary school for Canada. I would especially like it to be in my own riding. In any event, I certainly want it to be in Atlantic Canada because of our great regional need. As I go about making speeches, attending meetings, consultations and so on, I am sometimes asked whether Canada can afford another veterinary school. Sir, we cannot afford not to have one. The savings from improved animal care and from the prevention of animal and fish diseases would far exceed the cost of establishing a school. The Government of Canada under the previous administration committed itself to the establishment of a fourth veterinary school. The Maritime Provinces Higher Education Commission recommended that there be a fourth school in Canada and that it be not only in the Atlantic region but in Charlottetown, for good, sound academic reasons. Unfortunately, the project has now become bogged down because, I must say with regret, we maritimers have been arguing unduly among ourselves about the question of a site. Whether it is established in Truro, in Wolfville or in Charlottetown, I would urge the Council of Maritime Premiers, the forum in which a decision will have to be reached in the first instance, to put aside whatever parochial interests they may have for the good of the Atlantic region as a whole, and especially for the good of our young people.

I have stressed the need to decrease our reliance on other countries for highly trained personnel. I have underlined the need for a veterinary school because it is a project which is dear to my heart and close to the interests of the Atlantic region. But the dire situation I have described with respect to our dependence on other countries for highly trained personnel is prevalent in a host of areas in higher education and in other aspects of our national life. The fact is we are graduating many hundreds of highly qualified Canadians, including Ph.Ds, who are unable to find suitable work or employment while, at the same time, we are going outside Canada to hire people who in many cases possess lesser qualifications. I am alarmed at the situation to be found in the universities in Canada especially in the light of their track record in hiring their own personnel. In case I may be misunderstood, misquoted, or quoted out of context, I want to stress that I am not suggesting that universities should propagandize for anything, or that they should proselytize for any cause. They are by definition international institutions and must not be circumscribed or restricted in any way by geographic or cultural factors.

But in Canada—and this is true of every country—we must have universities which address not only our international obligations but also our obligations to ourselves. Many Canadians believe strongly—and I share this view—that such a balance is somehow out of whack in their own country. Our Canadian universities have hired, and are continuing to hire, a greater proportion of non-nationals than are universities in any other country in the world.

If I may again quote a statistic or two, the ones I have are for the academic year 1976-1977, the year for which we have the most up-to-date figures—others will be forthcoming, and I am sure the picture will not be changed as a result of them—almost 30 per cent of our total university faculty was non-Canadian. That picture compares unfavourably with the situation in every other country. The corresponding figures for such great international universities as Harvard, Princeton, Yale, Oxford, Cambridge, the Sorbonne—any of them—hardly ever exceed 5 per cent, 6 per cent or 7 per cent.

In some disciplines in Canadian universities the situation is particularly dire. I regret that those are often the very fields in which our young people are most strongly motivated in their perception of themselves and of Canada as a whole. For example, in archaeology and anthropology, in 1976-77, almost half the faculty at Canadian universities was non-Canadian. In philosophy, almost 35 per cent of the faculty was non-Canadian; in geography, 35 per cent; in sociology, more than 35 per cent; in history, 30 per cent; in political science, 30 per cent; and on and on. Last year 35 per cent of new appointments at our universities went to non-Canadians. In the west the figure was 40 per cent, and if we exclude Quebec the picture was even worse nationally. I do not think I would be exaggerating if I said that this is a national scandal. It is a disgrace of which every concerned Canadian should be ashamed.

I realize that my time is limited here today, but I would like to mention two particularly harmful effects of the situation I have described. First, we are denying our own young people opportunities for positions in higher education, teaching positions, research positions and others. Second, and just as seriously, we are unduly exposing our young people's minds to teaching priorities and research interests which reflect other peoples' cultures.

I am not suggesting that we should erect a Great Wall of China around our country, around our universities or around our young people's minds. I am saying, though, that there is a significant neglect of Canadian studies because our faculties and our researchers are giving undue attention to priorities which they brought with them from other countries. Is it any wonder that we are graduating students, from every level of education, from primary and secondary levels through to community colleges, higher education, and universities, who lack a basic knowledge about the history, politics, sociology and science of their country?

If one wants to identify one of the root causes of our national unity problem, I think one need go no further.

I bring to the attention of hon. members an excellent report published by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. This document was sponsored by them and written by Dr. T. H. B. Symons, chairman of the Commission on Canadian Studies. The report is called "To Know Ourselves" and it thoroughly documents the situation I have been able only to touch on. I highly recommend it as required reading for every concerned hon. member.

I recommend too the synopsis of that report for those who consider the size of it forbidding, a synopsis by the Book and Periodical Development Council of Canada, which is published as a public service by that council, and is readily available.

I will conclude my remarks by expressing apology for any undue emphasis on the importance of higher education and research. But, with the indulgence of the House, I would like to mention one field in which I think there is a particular need for research and development, and that is the field of energy. As some will know, the province of Prince Edward Island is probably the most energy deficient piece of territory in all of Canada. We are 90 per cent dependent on conventional sources of energy, particularly oil, which is to say foreign oil. This has many implications for the cost of living and for our ability to cope with Canada's harsh winters. The implications are, however, particularly serious in terms of the haemorrhage of energy dollars from our region which this represents and, indeed, from our country.

I want to say that every one in this House has a natural interest in the question of energy, the cost of living and attendant issues. But, I think we have to realize, as certainly the people in Prince Edward Island do, that we must do something about the high cost of energy and the ever escalating cost of that product. Too often we have been relying, I fear, on short-term measures and ad hockery. But, more seriously, perhaps, from the point of view of Prince Edward Island, the approach has too frequently been in the direction of global solutions, and this has been at the expense of looking at opportunities afforded by local situations, including climatic and geographic characteristics. I am not now going to enter into a debate as to whether nuclear energy is a good thing or a bad thing. I have no interest today in talking about the morality of that particular issue. I will address that question on another occasion as, I am sure, other members will.

Let me say, however, that the very heavy investment Canada has made in nuclear energy has practically elbowed off the stage altogether any attention to renewable energy sources. I am thinking in particular of the development of the technology of alternate energy. No one would suggest—and certainly I would not suggest today or at any other time—that alternate energy will ever replace totally, or even substantially in the foreseeable future, conventional sources of energy such as oil. But I do think it is possible to do a great deal more than we are in directing research toward wind, solar heat, and wood-burning in particular.

In the province of Prince Edward Island, for example, it is often suggested that we are the million-acre farm. I think we are somewhat better endowed than that, for in our tiny piece of territory we have more than 600,000 acres of wood lots alone. This valuable resource could be cultivated, harvested and exploited, in the best sense of that word, for energy purposes now and for future generations.

I am not specially pleading, I hope, for Prince Edward Island, but I do suggest that our province constitutes an excellent potential laboratory for research and development in the renewable energy fields. As I already mentioned, we have an excellent university and other research facilities, some of them associated with government itself. There was created by a previous provincial government of a different political stripe from my own—I do not hesitate to give credit where credit is due—a superb Institute of Man and Resources devoted to the whole area of research and development in the renewable energy fields. That could constitute the nucleus for a first-class, impressive, massive investment by Canada, on a pilot project basis, in the renewable energy enterprise.

The fruits of such research would be particularly beneficial to the people of Prince Edward Island. Equally, I am convinced, the products and the benefits derived from such an enterprise could be shared by all Canadians. For example, I am thinking of the applicability of such research in northern Ontario, where conditions are very similar.

I should like to conclude on a positive note. I think all hon. members will join with me in suggesting that ours is an enormous challenge. Huge problems are facing our country, every province of Canada and every territory—in the energy field, in transportation, in regional development, in all aspects of the economy, in cultural affairs, and in many other fields. The challenges are formidable.

As the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) suggested earlier this week, ours is a new Parliament. Canadians have high expectations of this Parliament. They expect imaginative and courageous measures from us. We must not let them down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, together with my colleagues I extend to you my best wishes for your reelection as Speaker of the House. I am confident the wisdom you have shown during the last parliament demonstrates beyond any doubt that the choice made by the House in nominating you will give to this Parliament the strength and the necessary power to operate in an equitable manner. Your task will certainly not be easy, Mr. Speaker, but I am convinced that you will show all the competence your position requires and that this 31st parliament will be proud of its Speaker.

I would also like to congratulate the member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and his colleague the member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) for having sponsored the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and I want to underline the remarkable manner in which they both have carried out this duty for it is not easy for a new member to take the floor for the first time in this House so filled with memories and where so many speeches have been delivered. I am convinced those two new colleagues, even though they are not on the right side, will be excellent members. Furthermore, I would like to congratulate the Prime Minister and all new cabinet members and assure them I will always be on their heels, not to be crushed, but rather to bite occasionally if Argenteuil were forgotten. For being elected I want to congratulate all those who like me are serving their first term in this Thirty-first Parliament. We joined battle in the last election, some fell and we, the newly elected, are proud of the mandate we were given by our respective people.

I would also like to extend my congratulations to all those who were re-elected, some not for the first time, and I understand the work they had to do because the work of a parliamentarian is to look after parliament's business in addition to an election period—it is not an easy thing. So I want to reiterate, Mr. Speaker, my congratulations to all those former re-elected members.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who waged an excellent battle and who would also probably make a great Liberal. His team—and I remember my NDP opponent during the last campaign—stood for what we Liberals had put forward. That is why I had to congratulate the Leader of the New Democratic Party. But I would not want to forget a French-speaking colleague, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy), who is also sitting in this parliament for the first time. I am convinced he will be an asset to this House. We were able to see that yesterday when he showed us his oratorical talents. Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday at eleven o'clock in the morning, pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REASON FOR SMALL NUMBER OF TENDERS ON FUEL OIL FOR SCHOOL BOARDS—POSSIBILITY OF COMBINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a very urgent matter.

Considering that the Outaouais regional school board, regrouping some 20 high schools from Fort-Coulonge to Gatineau, has experienced major problems with its call for tenders to meet its fuel needs in 1979-80; considering that in recent years the same school board always made such an invitation at the same period of the year and always received bids from four large companies; and considering that much to its surprise, only one bid with oil prices 30 per cent higher than last year has been received, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre):

That an investigation be launched as soon as possible to consider what appears to be a cartel at the Outaouais school board and other school institutions in western Quebec as regards the limited number of oil companies interested in bidding.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

RAIL ACCESS TO PORT OF VANCOUVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43.

In view of the very recent marine accident which has damaged a key railway bridge providing CN access to the port of Vancouver, in view of the potentially dire consequences for the port as a result of this accident, which may cut capacity by 15 per cent and cause millions of dollars in lost business, and in view of the backlog in grain shipments already causing congestion in the port, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger):

That the Minister of Transport intervene personally with the CNR to ensure that direct rail access to the port of Vancouver is restored as quickly as possible, and that temporary alternative means of access are put in place during the time that the damaged bridge is out of service, if possible.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

STATUS OF WOMEN

DESIGNATION OF PERSONS' WEEK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity which I hope will be unanimously approved by this House.

In view of the fact that today is the first day of the week commemorating the recognition of women as persons in Canadian public life, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House warmly and unanimously supports the active participation of women in public affairs and officially recognizes the designation of this week as Persons' Week.

Mr. Speaker: I hope hon. members will not think that I am being unduly restrictive in saying that this motion gets very close to the kind of supportive or congratulatory message which I think invites a proliferation. In any case, since it is so early in the session I will give the benefit of the doubt to the advocate in the circumstances.

The House has heard the motion. It cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

S.O. 43

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by Miss Jewett and seconded by Mr. Knowles. Shall I read it?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REASON FOR IMPERIAL OIL TAKING OVER LA SOCIÉTÉ PÉTROLE MODERNE LTÉE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Imperial Oil, which is the largest oil company in Canada, is 70 per cent owned by the American multinational Exxon; given the fact that that company has already shown that it has no desire to serve the interests of Canadians, as evidenced by the transfer by Exxon of Venezuelan oil which was intended for Canada during the crisis in Iran; and given the close links which seem to exist between the government and the Progressive Conservative Party, on one hand, and Imperial Oil, on the other hand, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle):

That the House ask the Prime Minister to state immediately the reasons which have led the cabinet to approve the Imperial Oil takeover of Pétrole Moderne Ltée, a wholesaler of oil products for independent retailers, thereby increasing foreign control and more particularly that of Imperial Oil over the oil industry.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion may be put for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF CAMPAIGN PERIOD—ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT VOTERS' LIST—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43 I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an extremely urgent matter.

As the mandate of the government is that of a minority government, and as we could soon find ourselves in the midst of an election campaign; as all hon. members who have lived through an election know that campaigns are unduly long; as there is no permanent voters' list and as the Chief Electoral Officer has already submitted a study suggesting solutions to that problem, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster):

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to study the various means by which the time span required before holding a federal general election in Canada could be shortened, and more particularly, to look into the advisability of setting up a system for updating the voters' list on a continuous basis.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, that motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON MONTREAL GRAIN HANDLERS' DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a very urgent matter.

Since the strike in the port of Montreal has been going on for several months, as a result of which supplies for our flour mills have gone up in price and feed grains for agricultural needs are several dollars more a ton, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House order the federal Minister of Labour to spare no effort in speeding up settlement of that conflict, and to report to the House without delay.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, that motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ENVIRONMENT

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): I wish to move the following motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that in the areas of health, safety and environment in the workplace there is, at the federal level, administrative confusion, weak law enforcement, lack of initiatives and political game-playing while Canada loses 80 million working days a year due to health, safety and environmental problems—six times that lost by strikes and lockouts—I move, seconded by the member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the Prime Minister either broaden the terms of reference of the special committee on nuclear energy to include environment or set up a special committee on the environment.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENERGY

HEATING OIL SUPPLY THIS WINTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the major oil companies have refused to bid on heating oil supplies for the North Shore district Roman Catholic Separate School Board, due to the uncertainty of oil supplies, and considering that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has not established the energy supplies allocation board by appointing the people to serve on it, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Penner);

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have this matter investigated immediately, to determine the heating oil supply situation for this winter, with a view to taking action to ensure that there are adequate heating oil supplies for Canadians this winter.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

CALL FOR ENFORCEMENT OF PROVISIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the increasing rumours since this government took office five months ago of the move by Northern Telecom to the United States, and the decision a week ago Thursday by Northern Telecom to sell their heavy-cable division to Phillips Cables, a British company—Northern Telecom has been heavily supported by the Government of Canada in procurement policy—I move, seconded by the member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House request the government to enforce the provisions of the Foreign Investment Review Act so that their approval of the giveaway of Canadian industry is at least not subsidized by the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PETRO-CANADA

FUTURE OF CORPORATION

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It relates to the reports about the task force recommendation concerning the future of Petro-Canada, but my question is independent of that report itself.

• (1115)

I ask the Prime Minister the following: Can the Prime Minister give this House the assurance that no change will be made to the corporate structure of Petro-Canada without coming before Parliament with amendments to the Petro-Canada Act? In particular, can he give us the assurance that he will not resort to the devious technique proposed by the task force of using Petro-Canada's main subsidiary, Petro-Canada Exploration Inc., as the vehicle for turning the corporation over to private shareholders, thereby avoiding facing Parliament on the issue?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be our intention to have parliamentary approval for any significant action that is taken with regard to Petro-Canada.

REQUEST NO DECISION MADE WITHOUT AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources advise the House whether this reply means that there will be no change without an amendment to the Petro-Canada Act, that the government agency being considered will be concerned with research and development in frontier areas such as offshore Arctic, and more specifically that if the necessary funds are not coming from the successful operation of Petro-Canada, they will come from public funds, which will increase even more the government's deficit or the taxpayers' burden?

[English]

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Outremont, the critic on energy, is not the recipient of a draft copy of any task force report, so I can understand his interest in what may be contained in that document.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why didn't you lend him a copy, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: I will send him one.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Possibly he could communicate with the Leader of the New Democratic Party about the brown envelope syndrome.

In all seriousness, the questions posed by the hon. member are, in a sense, premature because the process, as I have indicated on a number of occasions, is that we will receive and table at the earliest possible date the task force report. After that, the government will consider the report and consider the position it will take. The hon. member can rest assured that if there is any legislation to be brought forward, it will be brought forward at an early time so that the hon. member can address these specific questions during the course of that debate.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister is missing the point. I am not referring, necessarily, to the task force report; I am referring to his statement in September in which he said that he would create a government agency that would be responsible for carrying out frontier exploration. My question relates to his statement of a month ago, not some future task force report that we may or may not see. The question is: Who is going to pay the cost of those expenditures by that government agency? At the present time they are financed by the profitable operations of Petro-Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I see the spokesmen for Imperial Oil muttering on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Lalonde: Is it not the case, then, that under this proposal the agency he is talking of creating will have to be financed out of taxpayers' dollars, and this means either increasing the government deficit or increasing taxes of Canadians?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the question clearly indicates that the hon. member does not understand exactly what I said or what the process is.

An hon. Member: Who does?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He would do well to read and to listen to what is being said and written. What I indicated in that press release were the guidelines. The guidelines were set up with respect to the task force's investigations, which clearly indicated certain elements were to remain in the public sector. Once we have received the task force recommendations we will be in a position, on the basis of that advice and our discussion within government, to come forward with specific proposals.

I want to add that the analysis made by the hon. member is simply wrong: it is simply not a valid conclusion to draw with respect to Petro-Canada and what our intentions are concerning the areas of frontier exploration, research and development. The fact is that at the present time, and under the previous administration, very great amounts of money have been put into Petro-Canada—public money, taxpayers' money, enormous amounts of money. Therefore, it does not lie in the mouth of the critic of the Liberal party to tell us how much money is involved with respect to this particular corporation.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY RESPECTING PRIVATIZATION

Hon. John C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister: it relates to the whole question of privatization.

Can the Prime Minister advise who speaks for the government relative to this whole question? We have experienced the President of the Treasury Board in an elaborate press conference speaking on the question of privatization. We have observed the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the other place answering similar questions with regard to the whole question of privatization. We have seen some vigilante committees of the Conservative party. Who does speak for the government on this important question?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I speak for the government on this question, the Minister of State for Economic Development speaks for the government on this question, and the President of the Treasury Board speaks for the government on this question. Unlike the previous government, we all say the same thing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to hear the Prime Minister say that he speaks for the government. Perhaps he will enlighten the House. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated in the Senate the other day that the provinces may very well be entertained as purchasers of some of these Crown corporations. The President of the Treasury Board, in his elaborate press conference two weeks ago, indicated the government would not entertain bids from the provinces with respect to the purchase of these corporations. What is the policy of the government with respect to this question?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to suggest to members opposite that if they want reliable advice on what is said in the other place, they might want to consult Senator Everett. I might also point out that what the President of the Treasury Board and what the Minister of State for Economic Development reaffirmed is that it would be the preference of this government not to have agencies privatized by the federal government pass to provincial hands. That would be the preference, but there would be no prohibition: that was the statement by both ministers.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, that hardly clarifies the situation. Does the Prime Minister not blanch at the prospect of the provinces submitting bids and purchasing all our profitable Crown corporations, while the federal government hangs on to those which do not make a profit?

Mr. Clark: Unlike members opposite, Mr. Speaker, I do not blanch at the prospect of change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PETRO-CANADA

FUTURE OF CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. He just said that he, appropriately, speaks for the government in these matters. Considering that in a Gallup poll that came out last week, once again the vast majority of Canadians indicated that they do not want Petro-Canada dismantled, and considering that his party in the election on May 22 obtained only 36 per cent of the popular vote and that he, as Prime Minister, noted that he wants to govern according to the wishes of the majority, something he stated publicly, does he in any sense consider that he has a mandate from the people of Canada to dismantle Petro-Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this government will not be governing in accordance with Gallup polls. We will be governing in accordance with what we think the requirements of the country place before us.

An hon. Member: What about Parliament?

Mr. Clark: I can understand why Liberal members would be asking about Parliament, since they only recently discovered it. As I indicated earlier today, there will be no significant action with regard to Petro-Canada without the approval of Parliament. We believe it is our responsibility, as a government with a mandate for change, to bring before the people of Canada and the Parliament of Canada proposals that will allow us to carry on more effectively in a number of domains, including the relation of the state and the citizens of Canada to ownership of the Crown corporation, Petro-Canada.

We shall be receiving later today—and I hope to be able to table officially, later in the day—a final report from the task force established to look into the question of Petro-Canada. As the minister has indicated, once that report has been tabled in the House—and it will be tabled immediately upon receipt—the government will want to review that report and consider its position. I hope there will be an opportunity for members of all parties to consider that final report, to consider their positions and then to consider proposals the government might bring forward.

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister has implicitly acknowledged that the vast majority of the people of Canada are clearly on the other side of the issue than the one he is on: I take that to be the clear implication of his answer. I put that aspect to one side, though, and would like to ask him whether he accepts the principle that in breaking up Petro-Canada the private sector should be allocated that which is profitable and the public sector, paid for by the taxpayers, should assume responsibility for the high-cost exploration and research development work which it is likely will never be profitable or, if it is, will only be profitable very much in the long run.

Mr. Clark: The Government of Canada has been paying for that kind of activity for some time under existing arrangements. I read in the newspapers that a report will be coming forward to me later today which will open a wide range of opportunities for individual Canadians to take part directly, as owners, in the Canadian petroleum industry. My government will naturally consider a proposal of that kind very seriously.

Mr. Broadbent: With all due respect, the people of Canada now are shareholders in Petro-Canada: every Canadian owns Petro-Canada right now. In the days when the right hon. member was leader of the opposition, he used to castigate the former prime minister when he did not answer the question put to him. I suggest to him, now, that he did not answer the question which was asked.

The question concerned the principle of division. Will the Prime Minister assure the House that whatever course of action the government does propose with regard to Petro-Canada, it will not accept the principle that the private sector should be given that which is profitable, or potentially profitable, and that the people of Canada should be saddled with long-range public debts?

Mr. Clark: The hon. member is asking me to rule out the possibility of the people of Canada taking a direct ownership role in the direction of a major corporation. I will not, of course, rule out that principle.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

FUTURE ROLE OF CORPORATION

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister has stated that he takes full responsibility for questions concerning privatization, I would address my question to him. It concerns recent newspaper reports which have indicated that the Conservative party has raised questions about the future role of the Canada Development Corporation, a corporation which has established a solid record of achievement since its inception.

Do the committee's recommendations constitute government policy? Are we, for example, to assume that the CDC is to be among those additional Crown corporations which the President of the Treasury Board states are being reviewed for sale?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Again, if I can count on the newspapers, I have most recently heard of that proposal coming from the Liberal member for Vancouver Centre. But there was, as I understand it, a document prepared by a working group of my caucus which did consider the question of the CDC. That paper, as well as other material prepared by our caucus, will naturally be considered by the government when we determine to which corporations we might apply the principle of privatization.

• (1130)

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement that he has assumed responsibility for all questions relating to privatization, I remain somewhat confused about who is responsible for questions regarding the Canada Development Corporation. The senator who is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce issued a press release attempting to clarify which Crown corporations report to which minister of state, but the Canada Development Corporation is not among them. Who is the nexus in this House between the ministry and the Canada Development Corporation?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Canada Development Corporation reports to this House through the Minister of Finance.

INDUSTRY

OPPORTUNITY TO SELL CANADAIR TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister, who is responsible for economic development in Canada, and it concerns the development of Canadian aeronautics within an industrial strategy.

In view of the phenomenal success of Canadair since its acquisition by the previous government—and I take this opportunity to congratulate its president, Mr. Fred Kearns, and all the employees involved for this success, which was evidenced once again by the announcement of an expansion of $25 million for the tailpiece of the Boeing 767 and the CL 215 tanker, the manufacture of a simulator and the renewal of Department of National Defence material—does the government consider it timely to sell this important economic sector to the private industry? If so, when will this be done and does the government intend to establish a joint aeronautics corporation in Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we clearly showed that this is one of the corporations on the list of those for which we are considering having privatization. Is this the right expression?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Clark: This is the right word in French? Thank you. This corporation is on the list of agencies for which we are considering privatization. We have published a list to try to create a real demand in the private sector for the corporations mentioned.

Mr. Roy (Laval): I have a supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

During the negotiations for the transfer of Canadair to the eventual purchaser, will the government guarantee that the funds for research, design, development and planning are maintained and will not be transferred outside Quebec in the case of Canadair?

Mr. Clark: I can assure the hon. member that this will be a major consideration.

ENERGY

PRICING PRACTICES OF OIL MULTINATIONALS

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On Wednesday, I asked the minister if he intended to launch a full investigation into the pricing practices of oil multinationals, in view of evidence of gouging in Nova Scotia by Imperial Oil. The minister indicated that his department was constantly reviewing the area and that he knew of no such evidence.

Last Thursday I presented the minister with a copy of a decision of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in this matter, a copy of which I have in my hand. In view of this evidence, is the minister now prepared to launch a full-scale investigation?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for letting me have that rather lengthy judgment for my weekend reading, but I want to tell him that I think it would have been more appropriate for him and his colleagues to raise this matter with our predecessor government, because it took place some two years ago when the Leader of the Opposition was prime minister of this country.

My understanding of that judgment is that it is a legal interpretation with respect to charges to be made to the power corporation in question. The fact is that after the conclusion of that decision which was against Imperial, the decision in fact being in favour of the power corporation, they have continued their relationship with that company and seem to be satisfied with the result of that particular decision.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement on Thursday by the minister that there is close consultation between the members of the cabinet, is the minister aware of other evidence of nefarious pricing practices which are known to his colleagues, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and, recently, the Minister of National Revenue; and, if so, is the minister now prepared to ask his department to collaborate with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of National Revenue and undertake a full-scale investigation of these practices by oil companies?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I indicated last week that we have a process in place by which we monitor the question of profits with respect to pricing matters and keep a very close eye on it with respect to the operation of the department and the oil import compensation fund, amongst other things. We are always vigilant with respect to pricing.

I know my two colleagues referred to by the hon. member are carrying out their responsibilities. There is collaboration and co-operation in every respect but if the hon. member wants to make broad, sweeping allegations without substantiation under the protection of the House of Commons, he should consider exactly what he is doing, go outside the House and make specific accusations so that we can take the matter up with the appropriate authorities.

SUPPLY OF GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL THIS WINTER

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given National Energy Board estimates that in Ontario gasoline reserves are down 18 per cent and heating oil reserves are down 20 per cent over the same period last year, at which time there was a very tight supply situation, can the minister assure the House that there will be no shortages of these commodities to consumers in Ontario this winter? If he cannot, can he tell us what contingency plans have been put in place?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question because it is a matter of serious concern to all of us. We have been watching the situation very closely over the summer months and are constantly watching developments with respect to supply. Our present information is that we will be able to get through the winter. This has been a very fragile situation. I do not want in any way to mislead the House.

Mr. Lalonde: No problem.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal critic keeps interjecting. I wish he had interjected when he was in the cabinet. If he had, we would not be in the position we are in today.

I simply point out that we are in a fragile situation. Hopefully, we will make it through the winter. We will continue to monitor, and we hope there will not be any exceptional or unusual interruption of supply. As the hon. member will know, there is available to us a number of possibilities both on a voluntary and a mandatory basis in the event there is any shortage; but we are continuing to monitor and watch the situation and I assure the hon. member that I will give this matter continuing interest and concern.

Mr. Lalonde: That is about all you do, watch.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, those bland assurances are small comfort to consumers in Ontario. I asked what contingency plans are in place.

In view of the fact that for the past six years the combines investigation branch has been investigating oil companies on the suspicion that they have been manipulating supply and price in Canada, and given this most recent revelation of potential shortages, will the minister instruct the NEB to make public these reports so that we may judge for ourselves what the real cause of this shortage is?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, responsibility with respect to the investigation which is taking place does not lie with me, but with my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Breau: He is not in the inner cabinet.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member has made reference to an investigation which is going on. His leader has referred to it as well. That investigation is proceeding, and when a conclusion is arrived at we anticipate that it will be made public.

TRANSPORT

GRAIN DELIVERIES FROM PORT OF VANCOUVER

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the disastrous effects of the bridge-ramming in Vancouver harbour on Friday night and the effect that will have on the capacity of the port of Vancouver, which will be cut by 15 per cent, can the minister tell the House what measures he is taking to preserve Canada's international reputation for delivering grain?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to reply to this very important question, and I appreciate the motion under Standing Order 43 which was moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

I have been in touch with officials of the CNR and the Canadian Wheat Board, and as of this point in time the CNR has requested and received tenders for the repair of the bridge. It appears that a contract will be awarded some time this afternoon. In the meantime, other contingency measures, such as the moving of grain down the BCR, are being put into place. It is going to affect some 3,000 cars a month, but we intend to utilize the South Shore to a greater extent. We hope to utilize the port of Prince Rupert to a much greater extent.

● (1140)

Also, discussions will be held with the officials of labour. Because of the inconvenience and the additional costs, we are hoping there will be utmost co-operation between labour groups so that we can ensure sufficient labour capacity to put on additional hours. I think the Canadian Wheat Board at this very moment is meeting and putting some contingency plans in place. It is the number one item on the agenda. I want to compliment both Canadian National and the Canadian Wheat Board for their prompt action in this unfortunate incident.

SUPPLY OF HEATING OIL FOR SCHOOL BOARDS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I want to ask him if he is aware of the fact that the North Shore District Separate School Board at Blind River, Ontario, has put out tenders calling for heating oil for this winter but that all major oil companies have refused to bid on it. Is the minister aware of this situation, and what action will he take?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have to be quite frank and say that I am not aware of that exact circumstance, but I would be glad to receive particulars from the hon. member and I will investigate what is happening and see what can be done.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated that he is in a fragile position and that fuel oil is in short supply this winter. Can he explain why he has not appointed members to the energy supply allocation board to deal with the problem?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Because of the fact we are in the process of planning for this winter, we are indicating that we think we are going to be able to make it through this winter, with respect to this matter, on a voluntary basis and other initiatives that might be taken by the government.

As the hon. member knows, we have reduced our exports of light crude to the United States in order to better handle the circumstances in Canada during the course of this winter. We have also taken other initiatives. I have asked NEB to look into the whole question of the allocation on the interprovincial pipeline and to let me know what their recommendations are with respect to the type of allocation that is made. Until now it has been on an historical basis, as the hon. member knows, and we are taking these initiatives.

The purpose of meeting the requirements of this year again reiterate the fact that, while the situation is fragile, we are hoping that we will get through this winter and be able to carry on expanding our supply situation in Canada and carry out the terms of our national energy policy with which this government wants to make progress. I hope the hon. member will allow me to deal with these matters and will bring to my attention these circumstances so I can look at each individual case.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REASON FOR SMALL NUMBER OF TENDERS ON FUEL OIL FOR SCHOOL BOARDS—POSSIBILITY OF COMBINE

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary to the question asked by my colleague to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The commission scolaire régionale de l'Outaouais has just faced similar difficulties because normally it always got its supplies around the end of September and asked for bids from the four large companies. This year, only one company made a bid, and it is 30 per cent higher than last year, in order to meet the fuel needs.

Considering that this happened in the national capital area and that the minister has his office in the very heart of Hull, thus being supposedly aware of the problems, I wonder if he would be prepared to make an inquiry, precisely to know why a limited number of companies answered the tenders put out by the commission scolaire régionale de l'Outaouais. It seems it is a problem which multiplies throughout the province and throughout Canada.

I wonder if the minister wants to make an inquiry on that matter, namely, to see whether there is a monopoly situation or not.

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yes, I am aware of those circumstances and of several others. I am aware of a number of allegations that have been made to me and to the government about it, and I have referred these matters to the director of investigation in the competition bureau who has reported back to me that, in respect of the difficulties of obtaining evidential proof and motivation that is necessary to prove in a court of law respecting what I consider some rather large gaps in the Combines Investigation Act, he is almost powerless to deal with the situation that exists now.

As I understand that act, one has to have proof in regard to price-fixing in such a manner that it would not be applicable where there is a shortage of supply only or that the supplier would be able to allege that that is the reason for it. Under those circumstances, the director, who has far more experience in this than I have, has indicated to me that under the relevant section, or what he considers to be the relevant section of the act, we are pretty powerless to move on it.

[Translation]

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I was not referring so much to price-fixing but I was wondering, rather, how it is that four companies always used to bid when the Outaouais regional school board called for tenders and that this year, probably because this phenomenon is also taking place elsewhere, perhaps fuel oil is being distributed in a somewhat less equitable way; I do not know. That is what I want to know. Why is there only one company instead of four? Here again, I am told that this is going on pretty well everywhere.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: The answer is pretty obvious. There is no law requiring somebody to put in a bid for an invitation to tender.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Lawrence: Certainly if there was some way in which I could utilize the Combines Investigation Act and have an investigation under it carried out and attempt to do something under these circumstances, believe me, I would. But, as I say, we have already referred a great number of similar inquiries, and I hope the hon. member is not blaming me for the deficiencies in that act.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RESIGNATION OF COMMISSIONER OF YUKON

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and it relates to a statement he issued on October 10 in response to the resignation of the commissioner of the Yukon territory.

According to the minister's own statement, the commissioner did not in any way disagree with him that responsible government should precede any move toward provincehood. That being the case, I wonder if the minister would be so kind as to take the House into his confidence and to explain to us precisely what were the main points of disagreement between himself and the commissioner of the Yukon which led to her resignation.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will indicate to the hon. member again what is the intention of the government. The Yukon territorial government is a body of elected people who have the responsibility to look after the day to day affairs of the territory.

With regard to the commissioner, there were certain responsibilities which the commissioner had held previously which, under the terms of the Yukon Act, could be transferred to the elected representatives in the Yukon. The former commissioner felt that the move toward responsible government was coming too quickly. We do not believe that it was coming too quickly; in fact, we favour the elected people of the Yukon obtaining more responsibility.

What should also be stated clearly to the hon. member is that we have indicated that, in terms of provincial status, this is not a move toward provincial status in the sense that the Prime Minister clearly indicated during the election campaign that responsibility would be transferred to the Yukon and that after full consultation with the various groups, with a responsible government in place, the people of the Yukon would be asked for their opinion on whether or not provincial status was agreeable to them. That was the position of the government, and we have not changed it.

Mr. Penner: Quite apart from the minister's explanation of what constitutes responsible government, can he confirm to the House that the main concern of the commissioner of the Yukon territory was her ability to carry out her statutory obligations to the Government of Canada and to the taxpayers?

Mr. Epp: No, that is not correct, Mr. Speaker. I have stated in the House, and so did the Prime Minister last week, that the statutory obligations have not been violated; those responsibilities are retained by the federal government. There has not been an amendment to the Yukon Act, but the Yukon Act allows these transfers. In fact, I should indicate to the hon. member that the request came from the people of the Yukon, specifically the elected members. It is also included in the position of the small Liberal minority in the House in the Yukon; and the point of contention here is not responsible government but, rather, when it should take place. This government is committed to transferring that responsibility to those who are elected.

FINANCE

MORTGAGE INTEREST DEDUCTION PROGRAM

Hon. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it arises from a call which I received from a concerned constituent. This constituent pointed out that during the course of the election campaign, the Conservative leader went across this country saying that it would be his intention, if the government was formed by his party, to put in place a mortgage interest deduction program which would make housing more affordable and more available to the average Canadian. This constituent also went on to point out that since the election of this government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. If the hon. member for London West has a question, he will have to put the question.

Mr. Buchanan: Since the election, Mr. Speaker, the interest cost of carrying a first mortgage in Canada has risen by an unprecedented 25 per cent. The question is, Mr. Speaker, since the cost of carrying a $50,000 mortgage has gone up by $150—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member wish to put a question?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, the mortgage program put in place by his colleague, the Minister of Finance, will give $32 a month rebate. How does this make housing more available and more affordable to the average Canadian?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after the introduction and the passage, if the House decides to pass the proposal for a tax credit on mortgage interest and on property taxes, housing in this country will be less expensive than it now is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ACCESS OF EASTERN CANADA TO MEDICAL SERVICES

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should first like to congratulate the minister on his new role in government, and I would not want him to feel that we are neglecting him.

In view of the fact that the government of Newfoundland is now considering deterrent fees in financing medicare in the province, would the minister indicate to this House what specific action he plans to take under the Medical Care Act to ensure that Newfoundlanders have universal access to medical services in their province?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his best wishes and for his question. The hon. member may be aware that at the recent federal-provincial conference with provincial health ministers we established a review of our medical care services in the country under the auspices of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall. That report is due in the springtime. At that time recommendations will be coming to all members of this House, and I hope hon. members will give them the serious consideration they deserve.

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of the fact that a plan has been put into effect to study the future, but I would like to suggest that once the gate is open and the cows are out, it is too late to close the gate. In view of the fact that in addition to the situation in Newfoundland, over 40 per cent of the doctors in Prince Edward Island have opted out of medicare and 18 per cent to 20 per cent of doctors in Ontario have done likewise, will the minister now bring legislation into this House to reverse this serious cutback in health services in Canada and allow the former 50-50 formula to be reintroduced in order to avoid the current crisis?

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, the study that Mr. Justice Hall is undertaking is rooted in the principles of not only the Medical Care Act of 1968 but, indeed, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act of 1958. Those are the two basic acts that underpin the whole of medicare. Those two acts also involve fundamentally four principles, and those principles are reiterated in the Emmett Hall commission terms of reference. When its report comes forward it will be making recommendations specifically with respect to opting out, extra billing and guidelines to make sure that those principles are achieved.

I am sure there is no member in this House who would like us to proceed without appropriate guidelines. Those guidelines were undertaken by the previous minister, but were not forthcoming to the ministers in the provinces. Every provincial minister with the exception of one indicated that the study was appropriate. I believe it is appropriate and I think Canadians think it is appropriate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON USER FEES FOR MEDICARE

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, it is all very nice to have one more royal commission after a "tiny perfect" federal-provincial conference, but I am very disappointed with the answer of the new Minister of National Health and Welfare. I would like to ask him if he will impose, in light of what has just happened in Newfoundland, a moratorium on user-fee charges in the province until the publication of the Hall report.

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for the question. Indeed, my job would have been an awful lot easier in that regard, with relation to her question, if she had carried out her promise to the provinces to provide them with guidelines respecting those principles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: There was an undertaking of the former minister and, indeed, the former government to do so. They did not do so, and the purpose of the Hall commission is to provide this House with those guidelines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, when we had the transition of power in June, I offered the new minister what I think all Canadians want, which is a complete non-partisan approach to save the best institution in Canada for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: The guidelines were undertaken in March. Why does the minister not send them to the provinces? Why does he hide behind a royal commission?

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I again thank the hon. member very much for the question. If, indeed, a non-partisan approach is available, then I would be the first one to accept it. Secondly, those guidelines which the former minister indicated were available were clearly not available to the provinces and, indeed, not available publicly. If she says they were, then I think perhaps she ought to consult the previous notes she had.

HARBOURS

CONTAINER PIER AT HALIFAX, N.S.—REPRESENTATIONS TO NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport or the Minister of State (Transport). Will the minister indicate the status of the National Harbours Board call for proposals to operate the new container pier at Fairview Cove in the port of Halifax-Dartmouth and at the same time would he tell the House whether longshoremen, marine workers and others will have an opportunity to make representations to the National Harbours Board before a decision is made on proposals?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, in response to the public call for proposals to provide an operator for the new Fairview Cove container pier at Halifax, one proposal was forthcoming. It is now under investigation by the National Harbours Board, which has the responsibility for naming the operator. I feel it would be very useful for the longshoremen and all the workers at the port and, indeed, all members of Parliament for the Halifax area to have an opportunity to have input to the National Harbours Board in respect of more efficient operations of that port, and I will be very happy to arrange such an opportunity for them.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SAFETY STANDARDS OF HOME INSULATION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the increasing interest by Canadian home owners in conserving energy and reducing their heating bills by insulating their homes, it is particularly important that consumers have confidence in the safety of the products they use.

We now have a situation where Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation first withdrew approval from certain products after flammability tests and then reinstated that approval, while the doubts continue. Is the minister in a position to make a clear statement about safety standards?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in so far as they affect my responsibilities, the member knows, or I suggest she should know in her position, that the whole question of standards in regard to the flammability of cellulose insulation is a matter that was considered by the previous administration for a period of something like two years.

• (1200)

This year we have had to tackle the subject by transferring the standards which were utilized by CMHC, the standards set by the Canadian Government Standards Bureau and the same standards and the same tests that have been in operation in the United States for, I believe, about three years, into the Hazardous Products Act so that we can introduce some meaningful enforceability of those standards. The orders in council for doing that were passed last week.

ENERGY

TANKER TRANSPORTATION OF CRUDE OIL ON WEST COAST

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I feel very much, at times, like the Queen Charlotte Islands, at this end of the House.

I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the complete opposition in British Columbia to further transport of crude oil along our coast by tanker, given the National Energy Board's refusal to examine the Foothills' application, and given the government's statement in the September 28 aide memoire to the U.S. government indicating that the NEB processes would be necessary for Canadian approval, can the Prime Minister indicate to the House if a supplementary aide memoire has been sent to the U.S. government indicating that this type of environmental and economic blackmail is unacceptable and that further time is required for our regulatory process to assess the options placed before us?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the very strong opposition in British Columbia, an opposition which I share, to tanker traffic. My understanding is that the Foothills' application will be heard by the National Energy Board.

TRANSPORT

ESTABLISHMENT OF MERCHANT FLEET

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of State (Transport). Before doing so, I would like to offer my congratulations and good wishes to him in his appointment at least to the part-time cabinet. The throne speech debate reads in part:

My government will ensure an even flow of work to Canadian shipyards—

Then it says we will develop an effective Canadian merchant fleet. Will the minister be elaborating on this promise during the Speech from the Throne debate and, if not, when can we expect some details on this proposal?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from New Brunswick for his good wishes, and congratulate him on his parttime occupation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howie: Cabinet has given approval in principle to proceed with the gradual development of a Canadian deep sea fleet and to develop measures designed to make Canadian shipowners more competitive . Suggestions have been received from the industry and labour and these various measures are being studied in order to identify the most effective methods of assistance.

Further consultations will take place in the next two or three months in order to get views from all interested groups. Measures retained will likely be of an incentive nature, rather than direct subsidies, leaving the decision-making to the private sector. After discussion and identification of the most appropriate measures, the government will take appropriate steps to implement them, including legislation if required. I thank the hon. member for his question.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I will try to make my part-time position busy enough so that the Prime Minister will give the minister a full portfolio. Will the minister tell the House exactly when we can expect to receive the appropriate legislation to which he has referred? Will it be this year, or next year?

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, the appropriate legislative measures are in the process of study and consideration and an ultimate decision on their introduction and the manner in which we proceed gradually in the direction of the deep sea fleet depends upon the response to consultations that are now under way.

I can assure the hon. member that I will give him ample notice so that he may make a full contribution to the subject, which would be most welcome.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BROADBENT—REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) earlier in the question period, if I heard him correctly, said that he planned to table the report of the task force which was looking into the question of Petro-Canada. As I did not hear him precisely, would he clarify his answer? Did the Prime Minister say that he would table the document if he gets it, or that he would definitely be tabling the document?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to rise on a point of order, because I will have to seek the unanimous consent of the House at a later time in the day for permission to return to the place in the proceedings that will allow us to table the report, which I have not received. According to my understanding, that report is not in translation, it will be available to the task force in both French and English later this day and it will be made available to both the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and myself later in the afternoon, probably very late in the afternoon. It would be our intention to seek the unanimous consent of the House to table the report, in both official languages, at that time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, would the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) indicate to the House whether he has an intention of making a statement, or will he merely table the report?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it will simply be my intention to table the report, without a statement.

MR. WILSON—CORRECTION OF ANSWER IN "HANSARD"

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to correct my answer to a question by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) on Friday. I stated at that time, as it is recorded on page 123 of Hansard, October 12:

—as far as we are aware no contracts have been cancelled.

Since making that statement, my officials have made me aware of three contracts which have been cancelled, one in the amount of $4.2 million and two other smaller ones, one contract for approximately $350,000 and the other one for approximately $60,000.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, in reference to the comment made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker), can we have a clear and unequivocal confirmation or otherwise from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) that he takes his responsibility for making recommendations on these estimates to Parliament?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I understood that the matter had been dealt with rather conclusively by the Chair on Friday. A parliamentarian of the standing of the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Andras) should know what that position is. The situation now, sir, is that before this House there stands a motion in my name to refer the estimates to the committees which were established by this House, by consent, last week. That motion is neither debatable nor amendable. I suggest we get on with dealing with the motion so that the committees can get to work.

● (1210)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council has referred to a procedural ruling made by Your Honour, which we accept. He has proposed that the estimates go to committee. We will deal with that motion when it is put to the House.

[Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).]

Let me tell my hon. friend, however, that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) will not be able to escape his political and parliamentary responsibilities in recommending to the House of Commons expenditures of over $1 billion. He will not get away in the House with the comment he made to the press, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen, to the effect that he was not going to recommend programs or figures that he had no hand in drawing up. If that is his attitude, he is going to have a tough time getting these estimates through the House.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Stop threatening.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 59, the motion which has now been moved by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) is properly before the House. The form of the motion is the rather standard one. Since these estimates have to be moved to various committees, which has been the practice of the House in the past, rather than using the time of the House to read the various estimates and votes and the particular committees to which he referred, a list has customarily been attached to that effect. Therefore, I would take it that the sense of the House is that the motion is in the usual form, and it is the intention of the House to deal with that aspect as though the list attached to the motion had been read with the motion.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Trudeau) (p. 37).

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, for all those who were here on Friday during the last five minutes I dealt with congratulations, and now I would like to go into the crux of my reply to the Speech from the Throne. I want to thank my leader and my party for giving me the opportunity to make my maiden speech in the House—it is an honour for the riding of Argenteuil that their representative be chosen for such an occasion.

Mr. Speaker, the riding of Argenteuil has been part of the history of Canada since the beginning of confederation, and judging by recent events, Argenteuil will be heard from even more this year at this time of crisis on national unity.

But furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this riding has lot to offer in terms of culture and economic development potential. The riding of Argenteuil is divided into five distinct areas: first, the Petite Nation where unemployment at times reaches the scandalous rate of 33 per cent; that is why, Mr. Speaker, I find the Speech from the Throne of the Progressive Conservatives very conservative in its measures to improve the unemployment situation. Then there are Lachute, Brownsburg and the surrounding areas which used to be the industrial nerve centre in Argenteuil and which are being eroded to the point of nearly disappearing. All sorts of corporations are leaving behind huge, unproductive and empty plants. In this regard also, Mr. Speaker, I deplore the lack of incentive given in the Speech from the Throne to small and medium business which in my riding is the only means of survival in the industrial sector.

[English]

The region of St. Adolphe, where nature is at its best throughout the year, has become a natural paradise for tourism all year long. It is so agreeable that both the leader of the national Liberals and the leader of the provincial Liberals has taken up residence in this beautiful sector of Argenteuil.

I was pleased to see in the Speech from the Throne that provision was made for a strategy to be developed, but I am amazed, Mr. Speaker, that at a stage where the provinces are concerned, we are only talking of strategy when we all know it is time for action.

Mirabel! Mirabel! I am pleading directly with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), Mr. Speaker. It is unthinkable that such a potentially rich area should be paralysed because of administrative bureaucracy. I am therefore asking the minister to involve himself directly in this matter so that a rapid transit system can be developed between Montreal and Mirabel which would benefit over a million people and would facilitate the development of this airport complex which is the gateway to North America. The economic expansion of Mirabel would also benefit the Oka and St. Placid region.

Mr. Speaker, that is the brief overview of the situation in Argenteuil that I wanted to give the House. I am convinced that, the government willing, I will not have to quote what the hon. member for Chapleau said in this House on August 16, 1946. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), both in his press conference and here in this House, spoke of co-operation with all members of Parliament.

I wish to congratulate the government which is concerned with the fate of our cultural industries. Unfortunately I note, Mr. Speaker, that such concern is misdirected because it is centred on the accessory and ignores the essential. Who are, in the first place, our cultural producers? The authors. Now, those authors are barely protected under a single law already more than half a century old. Nowhere in the throne speech has the government shown that it is fully aware of that issue when throughout Canada the authors are loudly demanding to the Prime Minister himself that vigorous political action be undertaken.

What is hindering the settlement of the matter? First, an interdepartmental committee met without knowing exactly what it was going to do, because nobody assumed responsibility. Then, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) who is responsible for the administration of the Copyright Act is not concerned with the interests of the authors, since he is dealing with those who exploit the works of the authors and not with the authors themselves.

The solution, Mr. Speaker, is quite simple, and I fully agree with the many authors and artists who are begging the government to transfer immediately responsibility for that sector from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the Department of the Secretary of State which is in a better position to undertake as soon as possible the most important review for safeguarding the Canadian culture, that is, of the Copyright Act.

Mr. Speaker, what the government is prepared to do for our Canadian artists seems to me to be too little and too late, and by breaking up Loto Canada it is missing an opportunity to support them since part of the revenues of that agency could have been used to subsidize our artists. Mr. Speaker, my slogan throughout the campaign was "Speak up, Argenteuil", and that is exactly what I intend to do in the face of this government which, from the start, seems at a loss to know what to do with its power and already shows indications of growing dullness.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, why this government of our Tory friends, who fiercely denounced the budget introduced by the former finance minister, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), has not found time in four months to produce any fresh ideas. Instead, it has raised interest rates once again to penalize the population and help the big and powerful friends of the Tories grow wealthier. True, I was about to forget the provision to help landlords, only to the detriment of tenants. These are the not so fresh ideas, Mr. Speaker. We have in front of us a government of novices whose internal wranglings are paralysing the good administration of our country. Those super-ministers of pseudo super departments, who became super-salesmen, proved to us who they really were with the sale of Candu to Argentina, which once again, Mr. Speaker, will penalize the Canadian public.

I cannot refrain from saying a few words about the embassy case at a time when all nations are attempting to solve the problems faced by Israel and Egypt. Our government, Mr. Speaker, is taking up the whole matter again only for tiny political gains. Those are, Mr. Speaker, the views of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) on a strong and respected Canada. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I must say that, as the member for Argenteuil in the opposition, my intention is to observe carefully the sayings and doings of this administration and to look after the interests of my constituency.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ken Binks (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate you on your election as Speaker of the House of Commons. In the past you accomplished your historical duties in such a way that you added dignity and respect to the parliamentary process. I join other members in congratulating also the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I wish them much success in their careers in the House and in the service of the public.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I rise today with what I can assure you is a great deal of trepidation but a heart full of pride. Like so many members of this House, and those that have gone before me, I have spent a lifetime in the shadow of the Peace Tower. From the nearest public school to these buildings, our teacher often brought us here to sit in the gallery. My grandfather photographed the great fire of February 1916, and sent photographs of it to the four corners of the world. My uncle welded the gargoyles just beneath the great clock on the Peace Tower itself.

When I was a young man, it was my privilege to work within the walls of this great building for two years as a library assistant in the Parliamentary Library. My wife was the private secretary to the leader of the CCF. She came to the library to borrow a book one day and, needless to say, my love for the Library and, indeed, for the whole institution of Parliament has never diminished. I still have the same faith in and awe for this House of Commons as I did as a schoolboy in the gallery.

[Translation]

When Mr. Arthur Meighen was asked the secret of his rapid rise in the House of Commons, he would simply reply, "The Parliamentary Library."

[English]

Senator Gratton O'Leary once wrote that if he were asked by a young member of Parliament for his advice, he would say unhesitatingly to him, "Study, listen and wear a path to the Parliamentary Library, and reverence always the House of Commons". So for many years I have watched the various Parliaments, our great leaders and the many hundred worthy members who have gone before.

On this auspicious occasion, I say it is an honour for me to represent the electors of Ottawa West, a riding which has been represented by Sir John A. Macdonald and by Sir Robert Borden, to mention only two of the distinguished statesmen who have represented this riding and who have reverenced the House of Commons. I want to thank the people of Ottawa West for sending me here to represent them. I am proud and deeply grateful for this high honour. I will strive to serve them, all of them, in the fullest way.

I wish to pay tribute to the greatest House of Commons man of this generation, and a close personal friend, the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker. It is not my intention to deliver another eulogy to Mr. Diefenbaker. The Prime Minister already did that beautifully at the graveside in Saskatoon.

When Mr. Diefenbaker made his maiden speech in this House in 1940, we were suffering the very darkest days of the war. What was it that we were fighting for in that war? What was it that so many Canadians laid down their lives for? What is it that has brought so many people to our shores since the war? If we can answer these questions it may help us with the problems we have in dealing with the future course of this country.

Surely the war was fought, great sacrifices made and millions of new people came to live in Canada because our Canadianism is thought to be worth living for, as so many proved that it was worth dying for.

All the people who have come to Canada have come to build, not to destroy. They have come to practice tolerance and not prejudice. We do not have to undo 500 or 1,000 years of injustice here, but in saying this, Mr. Speaker, we will be wise to give deep thought to our essential Canadianism. It was one of Mr. Diefenbaker's greatest gifts that when he spoke about Canadians, they felt two feet taller. There is still room for builders in Canada notwithstanding perplexing problems both domestic and international. There is still room for growth. I disagree with those who say we can no longer grow in Canada. I believe the reason this party was elected to form the government is that most Canadians still believe this.

• (1230)

There is a danger of taking our country for granted. The government should constantly remind Canadians about their Canadianism. There should be statues here on Parliament Hill of Canadians who have contributed to the glories of Canada, as there should be statues and reminders elsewhere. I would like to see monuments erected near these buildings to C. D. Howe, J. S. Woodsworth, and some of our prime ministers not now honoured, to other Canadians not only in politics but in all fields of endeavour.

We often talk about putting Canadian content into the CBC. We are concerned about the difficulties faced by Canadian writers and artists. It is time to put Canadian content everywhere in this country. Recently, an American teacher visited Kingston. She was a professor of French and Canadian studies in Cleveland and was attending a seminar in the Kingston area this past summer. She was well equipped with the usual tourist brochures when she went hunting for Sir John A. Macdonald's resting place, among other attractions. She said she found the Hockey Hall of Fame and the Steam Museum in five minutes, but it took her nearly 1½ hours looking at gravestones to find Sir John's in Cataraqui cemetery, and she only found it by stumbling across it. This American citizen left $10 to help with the upkeep of the grave. She said if the grave of an equally important national figure was located across Lake Ontario on the American side, it would probably be under an eleven-storey monument.

In coming to this House of Commons for the first time, I considered making some remarks about what has happened to the public service and to the city of Ottawa over the past decade by reason of policies which I consider to be wrong, and also to discuss some of the positive steps that I believe should be taken to diversify the national capital area and improve its economic prospects. But I have decided that I will make these statements in this House on another appropriate occasion.

I do want to speak about a matter which arose during and since the election. I refer to the refugee problem. The refugees have been described as boat people. Apart from aboriginal Canadians, there is a sense in which all Canadians throughout the course of our history have been boat people. We are all descended from boat people; in fact, the first boat people here were with Cartier when he sailed up the St. Lawrence.

I am proud to represent so many people in Ottawa who opened not only their hearts but also their pocketbooks to the boat people. In doing so, they have responded to one of the oldest traditions in Canada, that of helping those from other lands to find a new life with us. I would hope the government would be able to devise ways and means of coping with the international refugee problem in some permanent way, because I fear that other dictatorships in the South Pacific and elsewhere may use the same means to get rid of dissenters.

Many of our statesmen, artists and writers have attempted to define what it means to be Canadian. Sir Wilfrid Laurier expressed this Canadian identity as follows:

[Translation]

As for me, I do not want French Canadians dominating anybody and I do not want anybody to dominate them. Equal justice, equal rights. It has been written that the grains of sand of the seas have been counted, that not one hair may fall from our head without the intervention of an eternal and wise Providence. Isn't there reason to believe that, when the supreme battle was waged on the Plains of Abraham and we lost, Providence had intended the two races heretofore enemies to live in peace and harmony from then on upon this continent forming a single nation? There—

—said Sir Wilfrid Laurier—

—lies the idea which presided over the creation of Confederation. When the British provinces were united under the same constitution, the then openly admitted hope was to give to all its scattered components the same national ideal, offering the world the image of a nation diverse in its origins upholding among all its elements the respect for family traditions and ethnic pride, but hereafter providing to all a single and common aspiration.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the people living in this country today should be, I repeat, the envy of all. They have better opportunities for full and rewarding lives, more so than ever before, and very few places in the world can match these opportunities. But I say to you, sir, that it will be our responsibility to ensure that Canada and Canadians remain the envy of all.

I look forward to being a part of this new government which the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) said here this morning is a government with a mandate for change. I look forward to working under the dynamic leadership of the Prime Minister and his cabinet. We have all inherited a rich endowment of wisdom and nature. May we never forget it. Let us Conservatives remember, as Lord Hailsham so wisely pointed out, that we are not curators of a museum, but cultivators of a garden.

[Translation]

In those words, Mr. Speaker, I say: Evil be to him who evil thinks.

[English]

Mr. Blais: Would the hon. member permit a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the new member for Ottawa West (Mr. Binks) has indicated his support for the minorities and for the linguistic diversity within our country, I would like to ask the hon. member if he would agree to make representations to his leader in order that the latter address those same representations to the government of the province of Ontario and encourage them to reconsider their decision not to grant the people of Penetanguishene a French high school.

Mr. Binks: Mr. Speaker, I understand that question was raised last week in the House and received an answer then.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, in following the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Binks), who has just delivered his maiden speech, I should like to congratulate him not only on his election to the House of Commons but on his spirited first appearance in this chamber. At the same time, I should like to congratulate the Speaker on his re-election as Speaker of the House, a re-election which was based upon his performance in the last Parliament, one which was such that his selection was the unanimous choice of this chamber.

The mover (Mr. Fretz) and the seconder (Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan)) of the address performed extremely well and I congratulate them, too. Of course, I congratulate all the new members who have been elected to this chamber, as well as the older members who have survived the election and who once again appear here, as a large number of us do.

However, it is not an encouraging period for re-elected members on the other side of the House. It seems that in the selection of his cabinet, the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has placed very low priority on service in the House of Commons and a very low priority on a distinguished record in this chamber. How, otherwise, could one explain the exclusion from the cabinet of such persons as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin)—unfortunately, he is not in the House today—the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), and a whole list of members on the other side who, had they been added to the cabinet, would have performed much more capably than those we have witnessed falter through the question period demonstrating their lack of grasp of our procedures?

All of us have come through an election which was conducted under the electoral reforms approved in the last Parliament. Basing my judgment on my experience, the general framework of these reforms, especially the norms applied to spending, collection and assistance from the public treasury in the running of the election, proved to be sound, although there may be changes which ought to be implemented, and added a much needed reform to our electoral system. We on this side welcome the indication made by the Prime Minister, first in the Speech from the Throne and later in his address, that the procedures of the House of Commons are to be examined in the Committee on Procedure and Organization. We on this side will participate constructively in that re-examination and strive to improve the operation of the House where that is possible.

We need, of course, the fresh views brought into the House by new members who sit in this Parliament in all quarters, and I hope the process adopted in the effort to improve our rules will be such that the contribution of new members will be heard and that they will have an opportunity to give expression to fresh and independent opinions after some experience in observing the operations of the House.

I listened with great interest to the Prime Minister's comments on Parliament. Listening to him, one would almost think that this was the first Parliament of Canada rather than the thirty-first. One got the impression that the world had begun the moment he assumed office. That is not the case, of course. We have a lot of experience in the House of Commons and not all of its operations are bad. I believe we ought not to leave the impression that everything we do is wrong, though there is obviously room for improvement.

The Prime Minister referred to what he called the historic role of Parliament to control the public purse, and went on to say that this role had been eroded by guillotine rules which meant that each year millions of dollars in public spending went unscrutinized and unchallenged. Mr. Speaker, that statement is certainly an indictment of the official opposition, now the government, while they were sitting on this side of the House. "Unscrutinized and unchallenged", the Prime Minister says about spending proposals. We shall show the country, if he was not able to show the country, how that scrutiny can take place under this particular opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I will go further and remind the right hon. gentleman that when he talks about the erosion of Parliament, it is an erosion, if that be the case, in which members of the Conservative party participated fully. I say this because I have before me copies of the Journals which show that in 1968 our current rules were adopted unanimously by every member of the House including the Prime Minister's party, led then by the gentleman who is now promoting a new policy for the Prime Minister in the Middle East. So, if there are complaints about the current procedure, let the government take its responsibility for the role members of the Conservative party played in implanting it upon the House of Commons. I shall have more to say about that later, Mr. Speaker.

Of course, the media, especially, are obsessed with the possible length of this Parliament. I am often asked how long the Thirty-first Parliament is going to last. I say that it does not depend mainly upon the opposition; it depends mainly upon the government. It depends on how well and how skilfully the government manages the affairs of this House, how sensitively it reacts to the moods of the House of Commons and how carefully it assesses public opinion in this country.

● (1250)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We are in for four years.

Mr. MacEachen: If it is able to do these things, its prospects for existence are much greater than if the conduct exhibited so far by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) becomes the model for members of the government.

We have before us now a very important issue which will permit the government to show the qualities it wants to bring to bear upon the operation of the business of this House, and that is the matter of Petro-Canada. Here it has an opportunity to demonstrate whether it is willing to conciliate or whether it wishes to facilitate, by its stubborn insistence on an ideological position, its own demise.

We have had a list of bills put forward by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker), and it is interesting to look at it because obviously it is the first result of the long summer. It is a very lengthy list of bills, about 90 in all. We have succeeded, in past sessions, in passing about 40 to 60 bills, and I wonder how this enormous amount of business is to get through the House unless the government proposes to impose upon the House an even more severe form of guillotine to which the Prime Minister took exception in his speech.

The list is lengthy, but unimpressive. It is mainly concerned with administrative matters and is very weak on policy-oriented bills. In fact, many of the bills are drawn from the leftovers or holdovers from the last Parliament of Canada. There are very important omissions. There is no bill on the referendum, which is a remarkable omission. There is no bill on the international economic boycott. Remember the vigour and passion with which hon. members now sitting on the government side demanded that we proceed with a bill dealing with the international economic boycott? There is no mention of it in the list.

There is no mention of a bill on public service staff relations but, of course, there are such urgent matters as income tax international conventions, Montreal and Quebec port wardens, a Canada-France champagne agreement, a migratory birds convention and matters relating to caribou migration. If the Prime Minister was serious about getting 90 bills through the House of Commons, why did he not call Parliament much earlier?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Why was Parliament not called? Why have we witnessed the longest adjournment or absence of Parliament probably in the history of Canada or, certainly, in its modern history? This government has taken a very leisurely approach.

Early this year hon. members opposite were clamouring for a budget. They were asking the former minister of finance to bring in another budget following the budget he had brought in in November. Today is October 15, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) has not bestirred himself yet to bring in a budget and we have not been told when that budget will be brought in, except that it will be brought in before Christmas.

There has been absolutely no urgency exhibited by this government in calling Parliament or preparing a legislative program for this House of Commons. Having said that, I want to add a further comment. In the light of that record it ill behooves the government to put pressure on the House of Commons to move quickly. If time were needed and if matters were urgent, then it was open to members of the government to call the House, to have at the present time brought forward its bills and to have had behind them five to eight weeks of legislative work.

We know what the immediate agenda is to be. We have to complete this debate. We have to deal with the budget bills which were uncompleted in the last session. They now become the budget bills of the new government. It will not be the former minister who will move these bills and recommend them to the House; it will be the new Minister of Finance, seconded by a member of this government. This government must get through budget bills. That is a big second item. Maybe, as has been the case in the past, the bringing on of these bills will initiate a very important economic debate. Who knows?

Then we have the spending program of the new government put before the House last Thursday by the President of the Treasury Board. Then we have the first budget, hopefully before Christmas, of the new Minister of Finance. After having dealt with all of these matters, how much more can we do? Maybe the freedom of information bill before Christmas or in the early part of the session, maybe conflict of interest legislation, but let me say that working very hard, in the light of the delay the government has imposed upon this House, it will be very difficult to stack up an impressive list of legislative achievements in the early part of the session.

I want to make reference to the spending program, the main estimates and the supplementary estimates tabled by the President of the Treasury Board. These estimates were tabled unchanged from those which were tabled by the former president of the treasury board. Remember, when they were tabled by the former president, the words of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to the House of Commons in commentary on those estimates? They were "cooked". They were "deceptive". They were "dishonest". We were "concealing things". Lo and behold, despite these strictures, after 4½ months in government the same estimates are brought forward by the new government. Hon. members opposite had plenty of time if they wished to alter those estimates.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The distinguished hon. member would not want to misquote me. He referred to Calgary North instead of Calgary South. There are directions in Calgary. I am sure I never at any time referred to those estimates. If I did, I stand corrected. Perhaps the hon. member means Calgary Centre instead of Calgary North.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I obviously would want to accept immediately the words of the hon. member. The hon. member to whom I ought to have referred is the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre).

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much.

Mr. MacEachen: I certainly would not attribute to the hon. member for Calgary North the reckless remarks which were made by his colleague, the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

The House resumed at 2 p. m.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment at one o'clock I mentioned the estimates that had been tabled by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) last Thursday which have now been referred to the standing committees. In leaving that subject, let me just say that the President of the Treasury Board and the individual ministers who are seeking these expenditures for the public business of Canada will have to take their responsibility before the House of Commons for recommending these estimates before they will receive an easy passage by the House of Commons. We do not intend to vote moneys which ministers do not want, we do not intend to vote moneys which ministers are not prepared to defend, and we do not intend to vote moneys for expenditures for which ministers will not take responsibility. I just leave that thought with the President of the Treasury Board with the expectation that upon reflection he will take a more co-operative attitude with the House of Commons as he asks us to vote more than $50 billion for the purposes of the government without being prepared to say to the House that he really wants them and takes responsibility for the amounts of money that are requested. I leave that subject there because it is a matter to which we can return later.

Now I want to say a word about the structure of the cabinet and particularly the fact that the representative of the province of Nova Scotia in the Government of Canada is excluded from the main decision-making body of this country. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) is not a member of the inner cabinet; he is not a member of the main decision-making body of this country. I want to tell the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) that that situation is unacceptable to the province of Nova Scotia, and I ask the Prime Minister to restore to Nova Scotia the position in the Government of Canada that it has occupied since confederation.

In my lifetime seats have been occupied in the cabinet by such people as the late J. L. Ilsley, the late Robert Winters and the late George C. Nowlan, and I wonder whether either one of them would have accepted the situation of being left cooling his heels in Ottawa or some other part of Canada while the big boys were in Jasper making the important decisions. That is the question that is agitating the interests of the people in my province and, I am sure, the people who have supported the Progressive Conservative candidates in Nova Scotia in the last election. Why is it that our minister is not in the inner cabinet? Why is it indeed that Newfoundland with seven members in the House of Commons deserves two ministers, one of whom sits in the inner cabinet, and Nova Scotia with 11 members deserves only one minister who is not entitled to sit with the big boys when they make the decisions? I am not complaining about the generous treatment given to Newfoundland, but I am asking that equally generous treatment be given to the historic province of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The Speech from the Throne talks about strengthening the mandate of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Well, that is idle talk. The way to strengthen the mandate of that important department is to put the minister in the inner cabinet. The fact that the government, so it is said, has placed such high priority on questions of regional economic expansion and yet has excluded from the decision-making body the Minister of DREE defies description. I ask the government to bring forward their bill which is intended to strengthen the mandate of regional economic expansion and we will use that occasion to urge the government to make the first start in strengthening the department by putting its minister where he ought to be.

I know a little something about representing a small province in the cabinet of Canada and I am telling you, Mr. Speaker, that it is tough enough to represent a small province and achieve its objectives in the cabinet when you are present; it is quite impossible when you are absent. I could go on and cite instances, in my opinion, of inaction, wrong actions or inordinate delays affecting the province of Nova Scotia, which I attribute to the absence of the minister from the main decision-making body of the cabinet. I will return to that subject later as I want to say just a word or two about an incident that happened during the question period last Friday when we were talking about the policy of the Government of Canada on the Middle East.

The unsureness of this government has been demonstrated time and time again by confusion and uncertainty, and that is especially true in the field of foreign policy. Confusion and uncertainty are the order of the day. It was added to, heightened and strengthened last Friday when we put questions to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) asking them to tell us what their current policy is on the moving of the embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

The day after he was sworn in as Prime Minister the leader of the government said, referring to the question of the embassy, that "these questions are now beyond discussion as to their appropriateness". He said that these questions are now beyond discussion, but on Friday neither the Prime Minister nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs would tell us what their current policy is. Is it still the intention of the government to move the embassy? You can imagine the confusion that existed in our embassies throughout the world when the message went out on the weekend telling them what their minister and their Prime Minister said. What would they say to an inquirer on Monday when asked what the government is now thinking about the matter of the embassy and the recognition of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel? In one answer the Prime Minister not only cast doubt upon the status of the decision to move the embassy, he cast doubt upon the policy of the government toward the Palestinian Liberation Organization and, thirdly, he cast doubt on Mr. Stanfield as an ambassador. It requires a master of uncertainty to achieve those three objectives in one single answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: We do have a master of uncertainty and confusion in the field of foreign policy.

I have already talked about the lack of clarity on the movement of the embassy. My colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), asked the Prime Minister whether Mr. Stanfield was free to talk to the PLO and the Prime Minister said: "Of course, he is free to talk to anybody". We know of the experience the United States has had in this regard. Their policy was not to talk to the PLO and when Andrew Young talked to them he was fired. There is no such strict attitude here. People are free to talk.

Then the hon. member asked whether that does not imply a recognition of the PLO by the Canadian government and the Prime Minister said: "Well, no, because I have created a new international creature called 'an ambassador extraordinary', and because he is an ambassador extraordinary he is not a representative of Canada, in some way because his presence with others does not imply the presence of the Government of Canada." I wonder what King Hussein thinks now, being told by the Prime Minister that Mr. Stanfield really was not what he said he was, and is not what the order in council says in both languages he is, that he is a special representative of the Government of Canada and an ambassador at large. The word "extraordinary" does not appear in either French or English.

Will you please tell us, Prime Minister, when you get the first opportunity, what is the status of Mr. Stanfield? Is he a representative of the Government of Canada or is he not? Is he half a representative, thereby earning the description "extraordinary", and will you tell us whether, because he is only half a representative, or less than a full representative, when he speaks to bodies like the PLO he does not imply any recognition of those organizations? These are all confusions that were created during one single question period last Friday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. In order for him to continue he must have the unanimous consent of the House. Does he have that consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): I recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys and Canso.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I know that the city of Sydney has an excellent representative already in the person of the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan), and I would not attempt to replace him in the House. My constituency is Cape Breton Highlands-Canso. I just want to give this piece of advice to the government. Why not end the uncertainty now? Why not do what you know you are going to do down the road, and that is revoke the decision to move the embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Do that now and end what the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) so eloquently called the "hiatus". That is a new Conservative word for "economic depression" in our commercial relations with the Middle East. The minister in response to questions from this side did admit there was a hiatus in those commercial relations. End this hiatus. If any of you were in doubt about the gravity of the situation you must have had your minds clarified by listening last night to Minister Yamani on television when he made it very clear that Saudi Arabia was waiting for clarity from the Government of Canada on this particular, so-called, unnecessary Stanfield mission. It is not needed. I wonder why the Prime Minister would ask Mr. Stanfield to go on this mission to collect facts which are known already and to furnish information which is presently available in the Department of External Affairs. Let us end this charade and get on with the serious business of making decisions soon.

Let me turn to another phase of our foreign policy, and this has to do with the pronouncements of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There are two voices now for external affairs speaking from a single throat. There was one voice which spoke at the United Nations making a clarion call for human rights. Certainly in that call the minister has our full support. Indeed, she went on to say that full human rights cannot be achieved in the world unless there is provided to the poor and those in want the basic necessities of life—food, clothing, health care and shelter—and certainly with that we agree. That is the position we took when we were in government and we support it today.

The minister made that statement of principle. She appeared as "Lady Bountiful" before the United Nations. We supported her there, but she later appeared before the Empire Club in Toronto where she made a change in emphasis. Why did she put in question before the Empire Club some of the traditional and still cherished principles of international aid policy?

Miss Jewett: Read my speech of Friday.

Mr. MacEachen: I not only had the pleasure of reading the speech of the hon. member, but I had the pleasure of watching her on television Friday afternoon, and I heard all that she had to say. There were some valid comments, which I intend to pursue at the present time. The minister took an entirely different attitude at the Empire Club in Toronto. In fact, this particular red Tory took on a very bluish tinge before that club.

Since I do not want to take advantage of the latitude of the House, I would like to conclude by mentioning two particular matters. The first matter has to do with the question, asked by the minister. She asked the question, "What is Canada doing in certain parts of the world?" The press informs us that the original text said, "What is Canada doing in Africa?", but I am not quarrelling about that. She may have wanted to blunt the strength of her policy or her suggestion by saying, "What is Canada doing in certain parts of the world?"

Indeed, what is Canada doing in certain parts of the world? What is Canada doing in Africa? Canada is in Africa because in Africa live among the poorest people of the world. What is Canada doing in Asia? What is Canada doing in South America? What is Canada doing in the Caribbean? The minister said that we are not there because of trade, and because we do not have trade we are not there because we are a colonial empire. That is true.

Does the minister not realize that we are there because basically we believe in a humanitarian approach to the solutions of the world's problems, that we believe that peace and stability in the world cannot be achieved unless we alleviate misery and poverty, unless we give full human rights to these people? Why is the minister uncertain? Why is she casting doubt on the fact that Canada is directing large parts of its aid to the poorest countries of the world? I hope that she will take a very early opportunity to clarify this question because there is great concern in this country and elsewhere that Canada is receding from its commitment to these poorest of the poor.

I could go on and quote statements made by the Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition or statements made by the parliamentary secretary to the minister which contradict totally the new posture which the minister has given to international development questions. I can tell her right now that we disagree on that question. If the minister is questioning the necessity of providing lots of aid to these countries, if she is questioning our emphasis on the Commonwealth, our emphasis on Francophonie, then we disagree with her, as do many others in the country.

I now come to my second point. In her speech at the United Nations, the minister opened a subject which had never been opened by a Canadian foreign minister or a Canadian Prime Minister at the United Nations. She made a relationship between foreign aid to the underdeveloped countries and their political attitudes and political views. In fact, the minister singled out Pakistan as a very large recipient of Canadian aid and implied that that aid is in jeopardy if Pakistan freely expresses its opinion, as it did at the conference of the non-aligned countries.

An hon. Member: Damned right.

Mr. MacEachen: An hon. member says "damned right", and we know who he is and his views. He confirms my interpretation of the speech, that the minister is attempting to link foreign aid with the political views and the political opinions of the recipient country.

An hon. Member: About time.

Mr. MacEachen: Another hon. member says "about time". When the Prime Minister was leader of the opposition, he clearly stated in this House that at no time would he relate foreign aid to the political opinions of the recipient country.

There is another dangerous policy. When aid is given to Pakistan, for example, are we not trying to help the poor of that country? Are we not trying to give them the type of human rights which the minister called for at the United Nations? I certainly oppose a policy which would say to Pakistan or to any other country, "You line up and vote and agree with Canada at international fora, and then you will be considered eligible for Canadian aid".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I hope that the minister will take an early opportunity to clarify her position and that she will reject the suggestion which emerged so clearly in her speech in New York and which was supported so vociferously by two members on the Tory benches today, that she will at the earliest opportunity tell us that she has made a mistake.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) has indicated, and rightly so, that I should wind up my speech. I want to do that because I do not want to take advantage of the House.

I am grateful to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for her speeches because she has helped us to understand more clearly what Toryism, whether of the blue variety or the red variety, is all about when it comes to questions of international economic development.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would—

Mr. Knowles: Is this your maiden speech?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, this is my maiden speech, and I hope that all the maidens of Canada will listen to it. I am always very happy to listen to the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), because if there is one thing that he is never short on, it is rhetoric and oratorical ability.

Before I turn to a few words of introduction, I think that there is a difference between the government of today and the last government which I sat and listened to in this House. I think our government shows that we are masters of our destiny and the destiny of Canada, while the former government were spectators at their own downfall. I think that puts it in a nutshell.

As a matter of tradition, I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and incorporate in my remarks all the nice things that have been said about those two distinguished members of Parliament by others. They have fulfilled that tradition and in congratulating them, and I do it genuinely, I wish also to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the members of his cabinet.

I think I am making history today, Mr. Speaker, as a native son from western Canada reminding this House of Commons that Canada today has its first western born Prime Minister. There have been other prime ministers from other provinces, such as Bennett from New Brunswick and Diefenbaker from Ontario, who lived most of their youth and mature lives in western Canada, but we have today reached maturity in confederation with the first Prime Minister born and raised in western Canada, in the historic centre of High River.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I have an answer to the criticism of the distinguished member from Cape Breton who worries about an inner and outer cabinet. There is no cabinet minister from Calgary but that problem has been solved. Calgary has just grown so large that High River is now a suburb, so the Prime Minister really comes from the city of Calgary.

I should like to remind the House leader for the official opposition of the words used by his leader in his speech the other day. I know the rules about quoting from Hansard, Mr. Speaker, but there are only a few lines and I hope members as distinguished as those across the floor from me and who are very experienced will excuse me for quoting from a speech in the same debate. The right hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) said, as reported at page 30 of Hansard:

> I should like now to touch upon the manner in which, as members of the Liberal party, we intend to play the important role of representatives of the official opposition. There is no doubt that the people of Canada have given the Progressive Conservative party a mandate to govern Canada and want us to give them the chance to administer our country without being exposed to political interference and chicanery. Not only do we accept and respect the decision of the people, but we will take seriously the responsibility with which we have been entrusted to co-operate constructively in the preparation of Canadian policies.

To me that means the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, at that moment of truth, informed the House that he and his party intend to give the government a chance to govern. For this I congratulate him.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to turn to the subject of my speech today which is confined to one issue and one issue alone. The debate in reference to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne gives every member the opportunity of expressing their views on a crusade which they have been waging and, in addition, gives them an opportunity to set out grievances and recommendations to remedy the crusade as it affects the nation and the constituency.

For ten long years I have been pressing the Canadian government—now it will be governments—and various ministers of the day, namely, the secretary of state for external affairs, the solicitor general and the minister of justice, for some action regarding the treatment that young Canadians have received when arrested in Mexico.

At the outset, let me say that no matter how evil the conduct of a human being, or how low he sinks in society, no matter how degrading that conduct may be in reference to the standards set by society, such person is entitled to be treated with dignity as a human being, to the full protection of the law and, indeed, kindness, charity and understanding. They should receive punishment only after due process of law. While awaiting trial such persons should always be regarded as innocent because of the presumption of innocence under our system.

Like many others in this House, I have spent my lifetime trying to assist people who have run afoul of the law so as to assure that the rule of law as we know it, whether applied in Canada or elsewhere, should govern the conduct of the process of law rather than have people governed by the rule of people. People who are arrested legally, and sometimes illegally, need head and heart concern. Those who have had the privilege of being moulded in a good environment—an environment of the home, the school, society and other institutions—do not often suffer the horrendous trauma of law enforcement. This can be due to their appreciation of responsibility to society or because they are entitled to the best counsel. That is not to suggest for one moment that those who have enjoyed those privileges do not at times flaunt society's rules and regulations; the law should be applied equally to all.

On October 12 last, I put the following question in this House:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I join with others who genuinely offer her good wishes.
> My question arises from the fact that Kirk Thomas and Mark Rollin were arrested in Mexico last June and held in jail for three months without charge under circumstances which John Howard, the prison reformer of the eighteenth century, would have found deplorable and inhumane even in England at that time.

My question was very simple: Would the minister make a protest? Had I been permitted—and I am not going to say anything about that at the moment although I may later—to ask one further short question, my point would have been made clear. I should like to put on the record the question I would have asked at that time. I would have asked the minister if she would further protest that dozens of Canadian families in Canada are being ripped off to the tune of thousands of dollars, and in this particular case $10,000, to get the youths home from Mexican jails. On the face of it, in many cases there would appear to be a fraudulent conspiracy—and I do not say this lightly—among Mexican officials who obtained this money for the release of these young people through our embassy, through action which is not acceptable by our standards. In this particular case the youths were held for three months without charge.

In brief, this is one of a dozen examples I have raised in this House and others that have not been mentioned. Kurt Thomas and Mark Rollin, aged 19 and 20 respectively, of Sherwood Park, Edmonton, Alberta, were arrested in Mexico on June 30 last because they went joy riding in a boat in Mexico without the consent of the owner. I do not defend their actions. Even in this country that would be illegal. I am, however, condemning what occurred following their arrest, which was a duplication of what happened in many cases with Canadian citizens visiting Mexico as tourists. In Canada this offence would just result in a summary conviction.

They were arrested on June 30 and held in a jail at La Paz for three months without charge, without medical attention, without dental attention and in the most filthy cell, and were forced to eat out of a dish that no respectable Canadian or citizen of the western world would consider suitable.

The parents, Mr. and Mrs. Gerd Thomas, made one or two trips to Mexico and at first put up $4,697.67 payable, as I understand it, to our embassy for lawyers' fees and restitution for a boat which was not damaged and was returned. In addition and inclusive of that amount of money, they paid out almost $10,000 for one expense or another, most of which under our system or that of any civilized nation would be unnecessary. It would be neither condoned by the law societies of Canada nor by the law of Canada.

After some time in jail the Thomases were allowed to see their son. He had not had a bath for many months; his hair was down past his shoulders; he was unwashed, unkempt and unclean. His parents brought pressure to bear on everyone they felt had some authority to do something. Finally, after paying the sum of approximately $10,000 for expenses of one kind or another, their son and his friend were released. Charges were withdrawn which had been laid only during the last part of the three months in order to make legal what was illegal.

I might add that I have raised my voice before in reference to matters of this kind. To come to the point, when young people are arrested in Mexico—I have ample evidence, not only from reading the report of the special subcommittee of the Senate of the United States but also from facts concerning other cases in Canada where the incarceration of Canadian and American youth takes place in Mexico—a method is followed. This method, and I have no hesitation or reservation in saying this, is to extort money from parents to the total of their bankroll. Many of these people are hardworking folk, perhaps earning small salaries. After something like this occurs, these people are left bankrupt or in debt.

Let me mention another case in passing which took place on October 22, 1976. This case was reported in The Globe and Mail. I quote from this article:

> Jane and Ray Bethune have been trying since January to free their daughter from jail.
> Longshoreman Ray Bethune, 56, says he has spent $18,000, wiped out his savings and taken out a bank loan during the past eight months trying to get his 22-year-old daughter out of a Mexican jail.
> He says that Canadian government officials told him to keep quiet or his daughter Sharon would suffer at the hands of the Mexicans.

I might pause there. If hon. members look at a report of the special subcommittee of the United States Senate, they will see page after page of evidence which shows that what I have said is correct and that what was written almost three years ago in The Globe and Mail is accurate. Mr. Bethune in his interview with The Globe and Mail reporter went on to say:

> We just don't know what the hell to do any more—it's been a nightmare.
> You have to remember that in Mexico you are guilty until proven innocent; that is where the slowness in the system comes.
> Mr. Bethune said his daughter had nothing to do with the alleged crime and her boyfriend had testified to that.

As a result, Mr. Bethune's daughter was finally released. I can read more about that case but it only illustrates the point I am making, which is that none of us endorses Canadian people going to foreign countries and breaking laws. On the other hand, none of us endorses—whatever the facts are in reference to these cases I have outlined and dozens of others—a neighbouring state permitting the extortion of money from innocent parents because of love and affection for their offspring which drain savings and borrowing power just to get a release from these horror jails and holes.

On March 2, 1977—and in this respect I congratulate the previous government which I kept pressing with questions—a treaty was signed among Mexico, Canada and the United States in reference to the exchange of prisoners. The bill I pressed for and the treaties flowing from the bill were to serve as a prototype for Canada in negotiating similar treaties with other countries. The United States and our own government accomplished an exchange of prisoners following conviction and sentence; that is to say, after a certain time, the exchange would take place. Mexico bypasses this agreement. The question is why. Canadians are held in jail without charge, without a court appearance and therefore without any process of law that would put the agreement into effect so that the international legal exchange can be properly made. This issue has been raised by me on many occasions.

With respect to the Thomas case, after the parents' visitation, the two accused held in jail for three months, they were finally charged to legalize the illegal and the charges were withdrawn. After much frustration and after the Thomases had borrowed money from the bank, their release did take place.

I have a letter from a former solicitor general, the hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox), now a member of the opposition, dated March 28, 1977. In this letter he states:

> I must remind you that such a treaty would not include people awaiting trial but only those under sentence or on probation. Those awaiting trial will still have to request assistance from the Canadian embassy which has been quite efficient in certain cases.

Was he right? The agreement was there. However, on April 10, 1978 Mr. Don Jamieson, the former minister of external affairs, pointed out the act would be proclaimed and the treaty for exchange of prisoners approved as a result of negotiations carried out by the government, and indeed as a result of the position others in Parliament had taken. All have protested but without effect. The United States protested. I say to the House, read the report of the special committee of the U.S. Senate.

Canada has protested this. In answer to questions I put to former ministers of external affairs they told me they had protested and they did protest. Our present minister has protested, but the illegal process goes on. However, it is the extortion that I object to most. Let us bring it to an end. Let us agree that this treaty does not help much, because no charges are laid, no counsel is permitted, no communication is allowed and no accounting of property seized is given. In reading the Senate report I see it says airplanes and automobiles have been taken. These items just disappear. In many cases no reputable attorneys are at hand. In this particular case, $4,600 or more was paid in lawyer's fees which the Thomases say did nothing.

I hear my hon. friend say it is not according to Canadian standards. I say this to the hon. member, that if a lawyer charges a fee and does not act, or he acted in this fashion, under the rules of the law societies of Canada and the law of Canada he would be disbarred. I say to members that if they have constituencies with rotten lawyers, that is their problem and not mine.

Surely it is not too strong to suggest that there is abusive arrest, abuse of the process of law, abuse by extortion, abuse and confiscation of property without compensation, and abuse of what the United Nations has suggested. The testimony given before the special committee of the United States dealing with the same abuse that Canadians have been subjected to—and this is the Senate's finding, not mine—includes, first, physical torture. There is clear evidence of physical torture on the prisoners, such as broken ribs, or electronic shock devices attached to various parts of the prisoners. Second, there is extortion. In this case huge amounts of money were required by lawyers and prison authorities in order to give prisoners bare necessities; amounts average $10,000. Third, there is Mexican inmate involvement. Mexican prisons appear to be run by other prisoners who share in the "take" from American and Canadian prisoners. These people are again in league with local lawyers, prison officials and the police.

The Senate committee finds in some cases that there are conspiracies. There must be a conspiracy for this kind of thing to occur. The requirements are whatever local authorities say they are. Two years is almost standard for investigation purposes.

When one criticizes, one must make some recommendations. I ask what shall we do? A very careful report should be prepared and sent to the proper department in the United Nations dealing with civil liberties and human rights, pointing out that we and other members of the United Nations protest any further abuse in this regard. The United States has done that. Is that too much to ask?

Second, a study should be made in Canada, instead of our always relying on studies done in the United States. Our study could be similar to that of the United States Senate. This job could be taken on by our Senate or possibly by justice and legal affairs. Witnesses could be subject to the terms and conditions I have pointed out this afternoon in this House. In their evidence they could describe how they have suffered under these conditions and how they were dehumanized. Above all, they could describe what money has been extorted from their parents.

Third, the strongest protest possible should be made by our Department of External Affairs through proper diplomatic channels. As the American subcommittee recommended, a list of reputable lawyers should be kept by our embassy in Mexico. This should be done in light of evidence that came out before the United States subcommittee that lawyers were receiving payments without acting. I already referred to the Thomases where $4,600 was paid to lawyers who did not do anything until the parents went there and visited.

I want to read from these letters. Again I have the letter dated March 28 from the former solicitor general, the hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes. I will not read all of it. He emphasized, and I quote:

I must remind you that such a treaty would not include people awaiting trial—

I pause there. Why are they sometimes held three months, six months or a year until the last dollar is drained from the parents? That is really what the solicitor general was saying in very diplomatic language. He continued:

—those awaiting trial will still have to request assistance from the Canadian embassy—

It is time for the Canadian embassy to do as the Americans have done, namely have part of their staff trained in legal matters to understand and comprehend after study the jurisprudence of Mexico in order that they can assist those who get into this plight.

On April 10, 1978 I received a letter from Don Jamieson pointing out that the treaty had been signed. Bill C-21 to which our party, the NDP and all members of the House gave their approval regarding the exchange of prisoners is now being bypassed. This has not been an easy fight; it has been going on for a long time. I wish to read some of the findings of the committee in the United States. I quote:

Similarly, it is difficult to verify complaints of confiscation of personal property when receipts have not been given, or of confirming extortion by an attorney in the absence of a written contract or agreement. Despite the fact that the evidence or lack thereof in this category is "inconclusive", it should be noted the panel believes that these complaints and allegations have some merit since they form a credible pattern. This conclusion is reached even though another pattern similarly emerged from this review indicating that a large number of complaints resulted from self-serving efforts by the prisoners—

In spite of that, they found evidence to the effect that those facts were correct. After summarizing the evidence, the committee said this:

Most of the substantiated cases of denial of access have been protested. Some have been protested formally, by note, to the Mexican government. Other cases, usually outside Mexico City, have been protested to local authorities. Those cases which were not protested represent either an unwillingness on the part of the prisoner to have his name included in a note of protest—often for fear that this might jeopardize his case . . . In some jurisdictions there has been noticeable improvement in the notification process; in others, there has been little or no improvement. This is clearly an area in which efforts must continuously be made.

The Senate committee further stated:

Corrective Action Taken: Substantiated findings refer to instances of infrequent visitation by consular officers which occurred mainly between early 1974 and February 1975. During this period the posts were hampered by insufficient funds to permit travel to outlying jails. It is noted, however, that some of the valid complaints in this category were also made by prisoners who were incarcerated in jails nearby, which indicates that visits were irregular and infrequent. Since February 1975 all American prisoners in Mexico who so desired have been visited on a regular basis—

I hope that would be a finding of any one of our committees.

Corrective Action Taken: No action has been taken nor does any action appear to be feasible, since determination of guilt or innocence is a proper function of the Mexican legal system. While a number of cases reflect a vigorous dispute as to the verdict and the manner in which evidence was secured to determine it, the Mexican legal system does provide a forum for the resolution of such disputes.

Therefore they remain in jail without charge.

Substantiated instances of abuse at the time of arrest were protested orally and by note to the Mexican government and/or the local jurisdictional authorities when the prisoner indicated he desired to have a protest made. In many cases the prisoner believed it to be in his best interest not to register a protest, although he did inform the visiting consular officer that he had been subjected to mistreatment.

I am reading this evidence to show how necessary it is for our committee to study this and maybe to set up a similar special committee of our Senate.

In several cases the embassy or the various consulates in Mexico have been successful in obtaining a return, or at least a partial return, of confiscated personal property.

They go on to say that personal property disappears because they issue no receipts, as is the case in jails in Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom. These people have no protection whatsoever.

Although a few of the substantiated cases occurred elsewhere, these would appear to be somewhat isolated incidents rather than the general pattern of prison life.

It goes on to point out that where there is a local authority, prisoners are better treated. However, in a city like Mexico City where the jurisdiction is of wider scope, this treatment is still continuing.

In a majority of cases, however, the prisoner chooses not to have a protest made in his behalf. This may be from fear of reprisal from the "mayores" or their "commandos", or from fear of being transferred to another cell block and thereby losing many of the privileges the prisoner has already paid for.

These are findings of a committee that studied this situation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. He may, however, continue with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I thank the members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that he does not have the unanimous consent of the House. I will ask again. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): The hon. member may continue.

Mr. Woolliams: I suppose everybody is entitled to one enemy. As the former leader of the New Democratic Party said, who has not got an enemy? When he asked that, a fellow stood up at the back of the hall and said "I have not got any enemies". When Mr. Douglas asked him why he had none, he said, "I outlived them all!" I continue:

Despite Mexican constitutional provisions that no one may be held incommunicado and that everyone has the immediate right to an attorney, such provisions are usually ignored or blurred in practice by prosecutors and police.

This violation of constitutional rights does not invalidate the case under Mexican law.

In conclusion, I would hope the recommendations I have made this afternoon asking that a strong petition be delivered, asking that the matter be brought before the human rights and civil rights bodies of the United Nations, asking that we ourselves should make a study of the situation in a white paper, will be accepted by the government and endorsed by all members of the House. I am certain that if presented in the right light the grievances I have outlined, grievances which affect many young Canadians and Canadian families, will be remedied by goodwill and international understanding.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, this is an historical moment in my life, naturally. It is the first time I have had the privilege to speak in this chamber. In a way I feel partly at home because of the general ecclesiastical look of the place and from the fact that the traditional place of holding Parliament was an old abbey. I have not seen anyone beginning to say their brevaries here but the feeling of being in an abbey is part of this place. I have noticed that a few things are not carried through in the traditional ecclesiastical way, though; one is that the choir, which I would say is above you, Mr. Speaker, gets very little chance to sing, and another is that the congregation in general is not as well behaved as in most churches I have attended.

Historically again, I would like to say that I am the first person from my family, which emigrated from Ireland some 150 years ago, who has had this privilege to stand here. It is also historical in the sense that I am the first representative to speak from the new riding of Saskatoon East, which is cut off from the old riding of Saskatoon-Humboldt. That riding and its former member have both disappeared into history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: Saskatoon East is a small riding territorially. It takes in only that part of Saskatoon that lies east of the Saskatchewan River, and a little fringe of rural ground around the city. Many hon. members, like myself, availed themselves of the free ride the Canadian government offered us to attend the funeral of our former prime minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, who is buried now within the riding of Saskatoon East. Many tributes have been paid to Mr. Diefenbaker in these last days, and rightly so. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) suggested his spirit was still within this room. That, I am sure, is true. But I should like to lay aside, once and for all, a rumour which was quite widely circulated in the west. The rumour that something would happen at the tomb on the third day is completely false. I can vouch for that because I actually live only about 250 yards from the tomb of Mr. Diefenbaker. I am watching it carefully.

Hon. members visiting Saskatoon that day, including many who were doing so for the first time, were in the centre of one of the institutions that our province holds in high esteem, the University of Saskatchewan. At the present time there would be at the University of Saskatchewan something like 10,000 students who come not only from Saskatchewan but from many areas of Canada. We are proud of our university, we are proud of its staff and we are proud of those who go to classes there.

I would like also to say that in Saskatoon East I do not want anybody to think that we are lacking energy simply because the minister of energy represents Saskatoon West. As a matter of fact, we have plenty of energy and the minister of energy himself lives within our constituency. Now, I am old enough to know, and I like to think I have faith enough to believe, that there is always the possibility of a conversion, and although the minister of energy and the member for Saskatoon West (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has been a long-standing friend of mine for many years, I do believe that at this time he should have a bit of a conversion, particularly with the stand he is now taking with regard to the dismantling of PetroCan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: In my nomination speech and all through the campaign that I carried out for many months I stated in that first speech, and many times afterward, that it was my intention to defend human life from its conception until its natural end. In doing so I tried to lay down quite simply the fact of my basic belief in human rights which has been expressed by many members of this House already in this session. My basic belief is that each human being has been given the right to life and that this right continues until they naturally die. These rights are sometimes of an individual nature and sometimes of a collective nature. They ought not to be infringed upon at any time.

Now, both in our country and in the world infringement of human rights continues. During that short space of time that we human beings have to live on this planet, you and I, Mr. Speaker, and all others have somehow or other to struggle and fight to see that the rights of all human beings are safeguarded, and one of the rights that I consider to be basic to each of us is the right to health. That right encompasses and takes into account all the other human living conditions that are necessary to make it possible for a person to live as a healthy person. And when I speak of health I speak not only of the physical health which we all hope to have, but also of the psychological, moral, spiritual and emotional health which makes it possible for a human being to live as a human being and, more important, makes it possible for a nation to live as a healthy nation and the world to live as a healthy community of nations. So when I speak of health, I do not speak merely of the medical state which so frequently is used as the whole standard; I speak of the whole integrated reality that makes up the well-being of all people.

As I have said, it is one of my basic personal convictions that the right to health is one of the most important rights we have as human beings, and that if we as Canadian citizens want really to make a mark at the United Nations it is important that we show the way with a model of ourselves rather than with a pointing of the finger at others who have so far not reached that level of health.

It was basically because of this that I was disappointed in the Speech from the Throne. I found quite quickly that there was not a single mention of health or the social principles and bases which are needed to bring about a healthy society. The question of health and more specifically the question of medical care have in no way been totally settled in this country. A former member of Parliament of my party, Tommy Douglas, said this past weekend in Toronto that he believes that there is a grave danger for our country because the medical care system we now have is under serious pressure and could, in a sense, disintegrate. In the next few minutes I would like to direct some of my remarks to that particular problem and crisis. I agree that it is one of the main problems in our country today.

In passing I will say that the right to health is not listed as such among the rights of the United Nations, but in article 25 a much broader stand, what I like to think of as rights across the board, was stated as follows:

> Every human being has the right to a standard of living adequate to ensure his health and well-being, as well as those of his family—particularly as regards their need for food, clothing, shelter, and medical care, as well as the necessary social services . . .

In May, 1977 at the World Health Assembly our country went on record when it adopted the global health goal, which is as follows:

> That the main social targets of governments and the World Health Organization in the coming decades should be the attainment by all citizens of the world by the year 2000 of a level of health that will permit them to lead a socially and economically productive life.

I personally feel we should keep that goal before ourselves all the time.

In the coming years there will be many areas of health about which I would like to speak. One of them will be the whole question of human nutrition and food. I have lived part of my life in the developing world. I have lived with starving people whose main problem was lack of food, but I think that we and people like ourselves who live with bounty but who many times are overfed and undernourished must seriously look into the whole question of food as it is used and eaten in our country. We must look critically at artificial foods and ingredients which make "natural" food anything but natural food.

On the question of medicare once more, I have heard various speakers in the past week in this House refer to medicare. Many of them claimed that they had a great deal to do with its founding, but I personally had the experience of living very close to the heart of the medicare crisis of 1962 in Saskatchewan when the first universal medicare plan in North America came into effect. The battle began on July 1 of that year and continued until July 23. There was a basic tearing apart of many people because of the intensity of that head-on struggle, but it finally resulted in a signed declaration in Saskatoon on July 23 which gave the province of Saskatchewan the first medicare plan in North America.

At that time I was younger than I am today, of course, but by a particular accident of fate I was living directly between the two sides. The government of Saskatchewan was headquartered in the Bessborough Hotel, and the medical profession was headquartered in the medical building just a few hundred yards down the street. Directly in the centre of that was the old Catholic Centre of which I used to be the director. During those 23 days I literally lived in no man's land.

However, at the end of the 23 days there had been a basic social change in the history of our country. I feel now that those 23 days had a great influence on my life in relation to many other social questions. It was an education to be there and to see that finally social change of a basic nature came about only when a group of people had in themselves a vision and, more than a vision, the courage to bring about that vision even though everyone seemed to be against them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: From that beginning in Saskatchewan in 1962 the notion of a medicare scheme spread to other provinces. However, that came after. Because there was a problem of magnitude—medicare would affect everybody—a former prime minister, now deceased, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, made an historic decision and appointed in 1961 Mr. Justice Emmett Hall to study the health needs of Canadians. I believe the resulting report should seriously be looked at again by all Canadians because that document outlines the basics of medicare.

Some of the recommendations in that report have been put into effect, but many have never yet been attempted. There are visions in that document which have not really come to light anywhere as yet, but I invite one and all to look again at that document. In the document there were four basic principles which were necessary to have a medicare scheme function. The first was that there should be comprehensive coverage; everyone should be in the scheme. The second principle was that there should be universal availability; that it would be possible for everybody to receive health care. The third was that there should be portable benefits; one could travel from one place to another and still be taken care of. Finally, it should be administered by a central, non-profit administration. That has worked, more or less, in different places and in different ways, but in the last year or so I feel that obvious cracks have begun to appear in the system. Doctors are now opting out, which has a different wording in different places. There is double billing or something else, which is to say that the system is not being followed. Premiums are now going to be charged in Newfoundland, for instance, which again goes against the very basic nature of the medicare idea.

When things like this begin to happen, we have a dangerous situation on our hands. To draw an analogy, the four principles to which I referred could be regarded as something like the legs of a chair. If one leg of a chair was shorter than the others, the chair would be wobbly and a very uncomfortable place to sit. If one began to cut the legs so that a balance could be obtained by giving up a part of one of the legs, the chair really would not become balanced. A more critical situation would develop, finally causing the person sitting on the chair—and I do not know what words I can use in the House—to fall to the floor. That is what will happen with the medicare scheme and plan unless something of a drastic nature is done to stop the erosion that is taking place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Ogle.]

Mr. Ogle: Now I should like to quote from the speech which Tommy Douglas gave in Toronto this weekend in which he expressed ideas that are very close to mine. I should like to state the ideas of a person for whom I have great respect and who, in total truth, can be called the father of medicare, namely, Mr. Douglas. He said, and it is true, that the majority of doctors across Canada are operating under medicare plans. He said also that if fee schedules are not adequate under provincial plans, then fair schedules should be negotiated between the provinces and the doctors. There is no point in saying that all doctors are unjust, that is just not true, but they should be given fair fee schedules.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Douglas also said that there should be no opting out. That was a very clear principle in the Hall report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ogle: Another thing that Mr. Douglas said, and which I feel is a very good point, is that if a doctor wants to opt out, then he should be allowed to do so, but he should opt right out and not use the scheme to get part of what he wants and something else to get some more of what he wants. The vast majority of doctors will remain with the scheme and receive an adequate income for their services, but if they opt out, then, I suggest, they should do without the public services which they frequently use under the medical care plan. That is a very serious point and one which I hope this government will take to heart. I hope that the government will ensure that that practice stops under the present legislation.

There are certain areas of health care which I think deserve special attention. I will pass over them quickly. I feel that health care in the whole area of industry is a point to which this government will have to pay special attention. In the area of health care, psychiatric care in the penitentiary system, special notice will have to be taken by the government. Odyssey, a group of inmates at Millhaven working for constructive, non-violent change, produced a working paper in August of this year alleging that medical and psychiatric neglect and abuse are rampant in Canadian penitentiaries. That should be dealt with immediately by the government.

Then there is the whole problem of the Indian native population. A serious injustice is being done to these people because of the appallingly inferior level of health care being provided to the native communities. The average life expectancy is 10 to 20 years less for a native; health and mortality is two to three times as high as the national average; their caloric intake is well below the national average; the number of doctors and nurses caring for them is well below the national average.

In the new charter which Mr. Hall produced the following is stated:

> There is clearly an overriding national interest in the health of Canadians wherever they reside. We are a mobile people and illness knows no provincial boundaries nor other differences... What the commission recommends is that... as a nation we now take the necessary legislative, organizational, and financial decisions to make all the fruits of the health sciences available to all our residents without hindrance of any kind. All our recommendations are directed toward this objective.

That paper is 15 years old but it is still extremely relevant.

As I only have a few moments left, may I recount a story in summing up and leave with the House something on which to reflect. The story has to do with neighbourliness and who is our neighbour. I will tell it as it is oulined in the Gospel according to Saint Luke.

The question of who is my neighbour and how must I care for him is an old one. According to the Gospel, a lawyer asked Jesus one day, in an attempt to justify himself, "And who is my neighbour?". Jesus replied that a man was once on his way down from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell into the hands of thieves. They took all he had, beat him and then made off, leaving him half dead. Now, a priest happened to be travelling down the same road, but when he saw the man, he passed by on the other side. In the same way, a Levite who came to the place saw him and passed by on the other side. But a Samaritan traveller who came upon him was moved with compassion when he saw him. He went up and bandaged his wounds, pouring oil and wine on them. He then lifted him on his own mount, carried him to the inn and looked after him. Next day, he took out two denarii and handed them to the innkeeper. "Look after him," he said, "and on my way back I will make good any extra expense you have." Which of these three do you think proved himself a neighbour to the man who fell into the thieves' hands? The lawyer answered, "The one who took pity on him." Jesus said to him, "Go, and do the same yourself."

It is an old story, a new story, the same story about three groups of people involved. The first group consisted of the thieves who came upon this person. Their principle of life was: What is yours is mine. So they took all he had.

An hon. Member: That is the NDP all right.

An hon. Member: No, the Conservatives.

Mr. Ogle: The second group of people consisted of the priest and the Levite, officially good people going down to the temple to pray. They saw the man, but he had a problem, he was half dead and this might make them unclean so that they could not pray, the law would not let them pray. Their principle of life was: What is mine is mine. But the poor Samaritan did not know all those rules; all he knew was that there was a person in distress, a person in need. So he stopped, and not knowing it all, picked him up, put him on his animal and looked after him. The last person's principle of life was: What is mine is ours. That is what I believe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, let me add to those who have already joined in this debate my congratulations to you on your election as Speaker in the House of Commons. Should I ever transgress the rules in the House, please be assured that it will only be because of my unfamiliarity with the rules and customs, not because of any intention to violate the established procedures or to challenge the dignity of the House or of your office. May I also add these same sentiments in my congratulations to the Deputy Speaker on his preferment.

[Translation]

Indeed, I intend to do my utmost to avoid weakening and in fact to enrich the traditions and attainments of the House of Commons, which not only represents but embodies the very right to freedom. Even though, as can be seen in another important historical document, we feel that right is self-evident, a large segment of the world thinks otherwise. In fact, some of us have seen the rights of individuals savagely crushed in the Nazi holocaust. A calculated and meticulously executed genocide took place in that part of the world which claimed to be the cradle of culture. Six million Jews, and many more millions of non-Jews, perished. The most fundamental right of the individual, the right to live, was trampled massively and scornfully.

[English]

Many of the people who live in Canada today have tasted bitterly of that catastrophe of the holocaust either by the loss of loved ones who were its victims or who died sacrificially in the course of efforts by the armed services to swamp out this monstrous evil which inflicted such vast insult upon the dignity of the human person.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, mankind's torments did not end with the holocaust. On the contrary: the Nazi holocaust marked the starting point for a series of diabolical communist genocides, to which must be added the abominable carnages of reactionary rightist despots who were just as rapacious and cynical about the freedom and rights of man. We witnessed with horror the spread of contempt for the foundations of freedom and democracy. Because of that, the House of Commons constitutes a challenge of the spirit of man against those forces which, on this earth, would scorn the right to life and its sacred nature.

[English]

To be a member of the Parliament of Canada, Mr. Speaker, is therefore the highest privilege that one's fellow Canadians can bestow upon one. I am proud to be included among my distinguished colleagues in the House. I am grateful for this privilege which the people of Eglinton-Lawrence have bestowed upon me, and I am mindful that I am walking in the path and in the footsteps of individual predecessors, predecessors from my riding including the Hon. Donald Fleming, a former minister of finance, and more recently his successor, a distinguished former minister of finance, secretary of state for external affairs and, latterly, president of the privy council, Mitchell Sharp. I shall do my best to represent all of the people of Eglinton-Lawrence in the same way as my predecessors did, irrespective of the political affiliations of my constituents.

In speaking to the resolution expressing our appreciation to His Excellency the Governor General, I should like to pay my respects to the mover and seconder of this motion. I should like to add to their observations that, as I heard the Speech from the Throne, I saluted its reference to the intention of the government to take certain steps which I believe would add to a series of reforms to parliamentary government which have been under way for years. I make particular, favourable reference to the government's announced intention to provide members of parliament as individuals with additional opportunity to work more effectively on behalf of their constituents by giving greater attention to private members' bills. The last government had already done much to help members be more effective parliamentarians by making it possible for them to improve their facilities and staff and by allowing television to report the events which take place in this House.

I was also happy to see reference in the throne speech to the establishment of a select committee to enquire fully into the special needs of handicapped and disabled Canadians. The human rights of these fellow Canadians are easily passed over because all too often they are out of sight and, therefore, out of mind.

I also was pleased to note that special attention was paid to strengthen the role of the voluntary sector in our society. Although I have worked in the fields of commerce and finance myself, most of my subsequent career has been dedicated to service in non-governmental organizations, or N.G.O.'s, as they are called; in the service of the church; in the League for Human Rights of B'nai B'rith, and so forth. I have personally witnessed the tremendous contribution such voluntary organizations make, at no cost to the taxpayer. These organizations deserve encouragement, whether their orientations are spiritual, humanitarian, cultural, athletic, philanthropic, or whatever.

Although I rejoice to hear these references in the Speech from the Throne, it disappoints me that many of these reforms will lead only to the setting up of committees rather than to action. It sounds like "committees" rather than "commitment". It is, therefore, with deep regret that I have to say that although I wanted to be optimistic, although I had hoped against hope that I would discern some real progress, some real direction, I must now admit to profound disappointment.

The so-called program presented by the government of what it has in store for us fulfils my previous fears of what might happen if we had a Tory government. My analysis and conclusions have not had to be hasty. As members of Parliament we have had a long time, five months, to make our observations, albeit from a distance and through a glass darkly, but now with the throne speech at last face to face. What we see is a government of evasion; it is bland, it is blank, it is empty and void. I have searched deeply into my soul. I have asked myself, is this the kind of Speech from the Throne worthy of a new minority government? Is this speech adequate enough as a basis for legislation or for policy, or as a guide or a plan, or even an outline, as we cross the threshold of the 1980s? What I find is a vapid, vacuous evasion of the problems of the world and of the challenges to our nation.

At a time when the world is shaken by revolutions and genocide, by oil shortages and arbitrary price hikes, by monetary instability and inflation, by international power plays and Third and Fourth World hunger and destitution, and at a time when our country, under pressure from these external forces, is in need of reassurance of sound policies on energy, interest rates and employment, we listen to the throne speech and wonder whether we are listening to a government that is on another planet. I have been searching my soul, as I know millions of Canadians have, and have wondered, after this long time of waiting since the election, whether the intervening time has possibly been used for anything more than to allow the pirates to divide up the political spoils at the captain's table while our Canadian ship of state is floundering on a troubled sea of world tensions in violent economic storms.

Imagine my amazement—our amazement as parliamentarians—to hear the pledge of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) in the Speech from the Throne that his policy is "to make my ministers more responsible to you". What inconsistency, what irony, what a paradox! How can they be more responsible to us when for months on end they did not call Parliament and would not give account to us? During all this time the ministers have not been responsible to us in this House nor in the other place. Does this long abstinence from parliamentary government set a precedent, or give any example, or lend any credibility to the principle of making "my ministers more responsible to you"? Hardly, do we feel, have they been responsible to this House.

As was the case for many hon. members, October 9 was the first time I ever laid eyes on many of these ministers since the election on May 22, and we had dissolution of Parliament in March. It has taken from May to October before we get our first chance to ask these responsible ministers to give an account. This is a jest. It is a travesty. Some of the ministers still have not had their first turn to speak, to give any account, and we are half way into October.

Most of the backbenchers will not have a chance to ask questions regarding problems in their ridings to these "accountable ministers" until next year. Is this consistent with the stated intent in the speech "to make my ministers more responsible to you", ministers who have not had to give account since May 22, except to the media which has nobly tried to squeeze from this dry rind some content which members of Parliament have yet had no chance to do? Is that a sincere and genuine concern for parliamentary reform, to keep the House closed down and shut while we get government by secret meetings behind closed doors in remote and comfortable retreats where the prying eyes of the dangerous press and members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition could not hear or speak, question or get a reply?

Yes, I am worried by the Speech from the Throne, and I lack confidence in the government that authored it. For example, what are we told will be the government policy for energy? While in opposition, those hon. members who now form the government had endless months, nay years, to formulate such a policy. But they frittered that time away, those years and years and years, tearing down the policy of the last government, criticizing, nagging, carping and complaining. Their energy went into tearing down the energy policy. No wonder all they now have in their hands are reams of notes on how to tear down and destroy. Destroy PetroCan. Destroy our arrangements with Mexico and Venezuela. Destroy our federal international responsibility and involvement in offshore rights.

Since the election they have had months to do their work, and what do we learn from the throne speech? There is not a word in the speech about PetroCan, the single most important agent the Government of Canada possesses to protect us with regard to the most critical issue we face. This would be a forgiveable oversight if the government had not broken our energy mast in the conflicting orders that have been shouted from its crew members as to whether to raise or drop the sails—sale of PetroCan, no sales, half sales, have a sale, but only where crew members can buy—and as the sails go up and down they are being torn to shreds. They will not catch the wind and take us anywhere but down into the deep. It is a profligate destruction of our heritage. Our country is up and down for sale.

Yes, it is a policy of evasion. They evade the issue with smiles and chuckles while we flounder and our energy mast is splintered and broken. We are a country divided and confused about PetroCan, about energy prices which are not resolved. For this reason prices have already been set and have soared for our winter fuel for homes, transportation and industry, because the middlemen could not wait. It is too late now. The government has failed to chart its course and everyone else has had to make up their own minds. They have taken to the lifeboats to save their medium and small-sized fuel companies. They had no choice, with no guidelines, but to jack up the prices.

Evasion leads to licence. The rich get richer, the powerful more powerful. No wonder we have monopolies like the policy of evasion, of "no decide", of laissez-faire. They can rip us off unfettered, because the government has no policy or, rather, has a policy to evade, to pass, to make no bid. But how can you win the game if you keep giving away your cards and keep on passing? Evasion.

And what does the Speech from the Throne have to say about our foreign policy? It is amazingly evasive through its silence. Just as in the case of silence in the throne speech on Petro-Canada, so there is silence on foreign policy. There is total silence by the government on the handling of the issue of the Middle East. All we know is that a special study is under way, a study triggered by the most blatant and destructive fumbles in Canada's foreign policy for as long as my mind can recall.

The present Prime Minister, seizing upon what appeared to be a popular and meritorious yearning on the part of many, if not most, Canadians to move the Canadian embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, which is the capital of Israel, during the election took this ultimately desirable and even sacred issue and dragged it down into the realm of partisan election politics.

What all those who love Israel want, whether we are Jews or non Jews, is that the issue of the moving of the embassy be based on the merits of the case, and be timed and effected in a way that contributes to the peace process. Jerusalem is a holy city and it should not have been a brick-bat for partisan argumentation. The ultimate objective of moving our embassy is too important to have hastily thrown it into an election contest which gave Canadians the impression it was done for votes instead of on merit. And worse yet, after we warned over and over again of the delicate nature of this matter and of the need for education, information, preparation and understanding, our advice was spurned, and in cavalier fashion the issue was pressed, without the needed resolve to see it through, which resulted inexorably in total débâcle.

It was no favour which the captain of the election strategists did for Israel by making such a self-serving promise and dragging the sacred name of Yerushalayim—the city of peace—to the level of vitriolic argument. That damage can never be fully undone, because try as one might to rectify it, the discussion of the embassy has been totally removed now from the merits of the case itself. And the irony of it all is that the good reason and the only reason that the embassy should ultimately be moved is based entirely on the merits of the case. The timing and the setting and the motives were all-important. And it all was trampled upon for the sake of pledges made for opportunistic reasons and timing seemingly unrelated to the justice of the cause at stake.

The result of this lack of policy, and then of vacillation instead of swift, decisive action one way or another, has been to compound our troubles. It has thrust us into a situation where Canada now appears to be susceptible to blackmail, bullying and belittling. We have desecrated the name of Jerusalem, lost our honour, and now we decide that it is time to find out, not only what to do, but also how much damage we did; how much tribute we will have to pay or how many compromises we will have to make to regain lost friends or contracts. What ignominy! Is this how we protect human rights in the world? What was the message in the Speech from the Throne on the Middle East? Was it that we were not going to be susceptible to backmail, that we have our own policy? Or was it silence or evasion, as with PetroCan?

What do we hear about human rights in the world in this speech? Is there anything at all about genocide or about the hungry in the Fourth World crushed to death by OPEC oil costs and inflation? There is nothing in the speech except that we will be getting a committee on foreign policy. But we do get ministers telling us from the flora side that human rights will come up like flowers, while the fauna side forages upon the money pastures which alone could make our promises to the Third and Fourth Worlds a reality. How sad to see our reputation in the field of foreign affairs, built up so assiduously and patiently by past hon. members like Pearson, Sharp, Jamieson, and the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), brought so swiftly to the level of infamy in the Year of the Child—un enfant terrible? Our foreign policy mast has also been snapped by the hoisting and dropping of sails in a cacophony of discordant orders from the captain and his first mates.

But, Mr. Speaker, these are but a few illustrations of how large and important areas of national and world concern, which have been in the headlines for months, are now passed over by silence and by evasion. The policy—and it is delivered—is evasion; the plan is that the way you keep the citizenry happy is by handing out the new Tory confectionery—Smiles and Chuckles, and snickers—while they divide up the spoils. And can you blame them for chuckling? If you managed to squeeze into power with the second largest popular vote, with a minority of seats in the House, propped up by hon. members belonging to another party which you are meanwhile privately and publicly seducing, and with a minority of seats in the other place, getting aid and comfort from the fact that you are doing so little that the media cannot get a target on you, you would chuckle too, Mr. Speaker.

Who could ask for more than a throne speech without commitment and a media that is left open-mouthed and speechless? The Speech from the Throne is amazing, not for what it says but for what it does not say. Never has so little said so little in so few words to so many.

Mr. Speaker, I have had to save till last my deepest concern. It frightens me the most. It has to do with the survival of this country, with the Canada I love. I see under this government the division of this country into satrapies like Chinese provinces under the war lords of the Kuomintang, each war lord reigning sovereign in his province, resulting in a confusion of policies, in competitive wars between provinces for businesses, head offices and investments, in raising barriers to migration of workers from other provinces, like the wars between the war lords of old.

What is the philosophical justification for a federal government that in the name of "less government" really means almost no federal government and more and more provincial government, which means more inequality and more divisive forces unleashed? This laissez-faire policy which sells out Canada comes under the confectionery name not of "Chuckles" but of "community of communities". Behind this exercise in semantics is the insidious suggestion that the way we can get unity is to stop the confrontation, and to hand over, in the interests of dialogue and understanding, those rights and responsibilities which our constitution and our Supreme Court state this Parliament, the Parliament of Canada, is expected to exercise. Some dialogue!

Mr. Speaker, let me say that I think I know something about dialogue. The dialogue that has come about through ecumenism has been the greatest event in this century. Religious wars and hatreds have given way to respectful dialogue between Catholics, Protestants and Jews. The ancient walls of contempt have fallen away through dialogue. And all this has been premised upon the concept that in dialogue you call people into being rather than to cease to be. It is right, and one thing to call the provinces into being. That the Fathers of Confederation more than did. But it is another thing to say that the federal government should not have that same right, which was the central goal and objective of the Fathers of Confederation—a strong central government.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot of pious criticism from others about the danger of confrontation. But, Mr. Speaker, dialogue is called confrontation. One speaks of the "confrontation of dialogue". It means that in dialogue one does not evade the issues. One does not dissolve oneself. One does not diminish oneself. One does not assimilate, capitulate, surrender. So at present we are not getting dialogue. In fact, the terminology "community of communities", used in conjunction with the criticism that in the past we have had too much confrontation between the federal and provincial governments, is being used as a cover in the retreat from a federal system to a confederation of ten states, or is it twelve now? It seems to be part of the grand design of the Conservative party to hack us up. First we had the blueprint of "two nations"—deux nations. Now it has proliferated. Now it is a "community of communities", maybe something like "ten nations"—dix nations ou plus. And if you throw in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, maybe 12 tribes—douze nations—ou presque!

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, it is on a dangerous course that our ship of state is floundering. It is no course at all. It is not a dialogue. It is not a discussion out in the open. It is not a facing of issues and facts. There are secret discussions where the media are not present. There are, worse yet, secret deals. It is not just once or twice; it is the way things now are done. The war lords put down their demands, linked often with their political interests, and the federal government in private agreements gives away to them what belongs to the family of Canada and describes this process as a "community of communities". Mr. Speaker, that is not a community. Let us not hide behind the subterfuge of words. Canada is at stake. Evasion is not dialogue; evasion is anti-dialogical. It is unhealthy. Dialogue means confrontation. It means that the federal government, this Parliament and all of us who are members have the right to hear, to listen, to be in the dialogue. It means to have open deals openly arrived at.

Ontario has the right, not just the premier and his minority party but the majority of the people, like the people of my riding, the people of Toronto, the people of the province, to hear what those deals are that give away our future as Canadians. Our heritage, our offshore energy and mineral rights for 200 miles, our resources, belong to Canadians. We have to be at the table where all can see the hands and learn to share. The federal government has the right, nay, the duty, the responsibility, to stand for all of us, to protect all of us. Rather than for this government to appeal to the greedy hopes of war lords in each province that their area might strike it rich, we have to make sure that all Canadians strike it rich.

Instead, Mr. Speaker, we have evasion. We have silence. We have paradoxical phrases like "community of communities" which sound a lot too much like "sovereignty-association", an "Alberta heritage fund for Canadians"—Albertan Canadians, that is—and "humble pride", or is it "proud humility"?

The Speech from the Throne bodes ill that the government will continue to be passive, will avoid difficult decisions and evade responsibilities. It will continue to play hide and go seek with the press, to make agreements secretly arrived at, to pass out goodies to some provinces that they have no mandate from Parliament to pass on. They seem to hope to appeal to some greedy impulse of some provincial leaders that they just might strike it rich, rather than appealing to them that through co-operation as Canadians they might strike it "equal". They offer to sell or give away some of our Crown corporations, appealing to the profit motive, instead of holding them in sacred trust for all Canadians for this and future generations.

Mr. Speaker, what we have seen so far is not dialogue by the federal government. Rather, it is a policy of passing out the goodies, and it fits all too well into the mentality of cynical machine politics, of political patronage, of how they keep them happy. But what will they do tomorrow when all has been given away from the federal store and there is nothing left, when they all start to fight with one another? Mr. Speaker, at present I see no dream. At present I sense no vision. I see only each of us being sent into self-centred solitudes and the dark night of reaction is setting in.

Ultimately we will have to go back to statesmanlike, courageous leadership that will resume the dialogue, which by definition involves confrontation, to leadership that on behalf of the federal government will speak the truth in love to this nation, singly and in its parts, and say "Our heritage fund is Canada".

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I can guarantee to the House that I will speak no doom and gloom such as we have just heard from the the hon. member for Eglinton-Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille).

• (1600)

My colleagues, the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald), are to be congratulated for the superb manner in which they moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I join with other hon. members in endorsing the Speaker's election to his high office. Having watched him on television for quite some time and now being in this great house and watching him in person, my long-time admiration for his abilities has been more than reinforced. I offer my best wishes to him. We on this side of the House will try to make life in this session pleasant for him. To the Deputy Speaker and to the hon. members for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) and Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott), I offer my best wishes as well.

I represent the riding of Brampton-Georgetown, comprised of Brampton, a community in the region of Peel, population 125,000, and the old town of Georgetown, now a part of Halton Hills, a community in the region of Halton, population 19,000. Both of these communities have growing populations. My riding is the fourth largest in Canada in terms of electors. The mayor of Halton Hills, Peter Pomeroy, and the mayor of the city of Brampton, Jim Archdekin, lead two very active and fastgrowing communities.

The past two members of the Ontario legislature have given honour to the community of Brampton, both being worthy members and both being premiers of the province of Ontario. Colonel Tom Kennedy was the provincial member for Peel from 1919 to 1959, forty years, with a brief break between 1934 and 1937. Our member of the provincial legislature is the hon. William G. Davis, the present premier, who just celebrated 20 years in the legislature serving Peel, Peel North, and now Brampton. He was honoured Friday past by his constituents, former constituents and friends. These are large shoes for me to fill federally—names like Sam Charters, Richard Blaine, John Pallett, Ellwood Madill and, yes, such liberals as Bruce Beer and Ross Milne. But the man I idolized, and who was lost to Canada at a relatively young age, the man who first attracted me to politics, was Gordon Graydon, who graced this House from 1935 to 1953 and was opposition House leader. His widow, Daisy Graydon, still lives in Brampton and is a great help to me and I appreciate her support.

Georgetown citizens have had excellent representation in the Ontario legislature, for instance, the hon. Jim Snow, the hon. George Kerr and Julian Reed. Federally, names like Sybill Bennett, Sandy Best, Terry O'Connor and across the House I am sure hon. members remember Dr. Harry Harley and Dr. Frank Philbrook. Now I have the honour to represent the riding. I would sincerely like to thank the citizens of Brampton-Georgetown for their votes. I will do all within my power to justify their support.

I am proud of both Brampton and Georgetown, Brampton being my home town, Georgetown being my father's home town. My great grandfather came to this country, a tea merchant from Glasgow, and opened a general store in Georgetown. My grandfather was postmaster in Georgetown and my father a United Church minister, who served the congregation of St. Paul's United Church for 26 years in Brampton.

Brampton and Georgetown have expanding and new businesses; for example, CN's new Malport, Dominion Glass Co. Ltd. which just opened a $10 million expansion, Ford's national parts depot, American Motors, Northern Telecom, Kitchens of Sara Lee, Neilson's, Smith and Stone, Abitibi Paper, and many many others all contributing to the economic well-being of the two communities.

There is still a small but significant rural area in Brampton and Georgetown. There are productive dairy farms, beef farms and produce farms which grow some great apples. The Gray brothers, two young farmers, have just invested over a quarter of a million dollars in a computerized milking parlour in my riding. This sort of investment shows great faith in the future of Canada and in the field of agriculture in the area. It is the home of the world famous Armstrong brothers standard bred breeding farm, which is the home of the Armbro horses who win their share of purses at standard bred tracks around the world. In memory of the late Elgin Armstrong and Ted Armstrong, the founding brothers, a new multi-million dollar facility was opened recently just north of Brampton by the premier. Elgin Armstrong's son, Charles, is now running the Armstrong business and was named businessman of the year this past week by the Brampton board of trade. My congratulations to Charles.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, that I represent an exciting and growing part of the province of Ontario and I look forward to representing it for many years. Seated geographically to your left—and, I might add, well placed, because that is where they all are politically—are a group of hon. members who like to talk about redistributing wealth, a very worth-while ideal. But all of them want to redistribute the wealth before it is made.

The new Government of Canada clearly recognizes that we cannot redistribute what we have not first created. The previous administration tried, heaven knows they tried, and in doing so, plunged this country into a deficit that is costing every Canadian taxpayer $700 per year just to pay the interest, never mind paying back the capital that is owing. It is the fastest rising cost in government. What a legacy to leave the young people of Canada! We in the government plan to rectify this situation so we can proudly say to our young people, "Here, take this country, we pass it on to you in great shape without that albatross, that huge debt, to drag you down."

There are a number of items on my checklist that this government and the people of Canada must do to reduce the debt and tackle inflation. We must realize that there is something decidedly illogical about demanding at one and the same time more and more government services, less and less taxation, higher and higher living standards and the adoption of a zero growth economic approach. We must tackle our balance of payment problem by recognizing that we are a trading nation with a pressing need for a healthy, vigorous and productive manufacturing sector. We must recognize the crucial role of profits and of other forms of savings in making this possible. Profit on this side of the House is not a dirty word. We must create a fair and just environment for the foreign capital which, like it or not, we are going to require in the future. Most important of all, we must create the type of domestic climate that will provide individual Canadians with the incentive and ability to furnish more and more of their country's capital needs. We must recognize that we cannot allow our unit costs of production to get out of step with those of our major trading partners, and we must realize the irreparable damage which indiscriminate and irresponsible use of the strike weapon—whatever its short term gain to the participants—will do to our ability to survive in the international marketplace.

We must move quickly to reduce significantly our per capita consumption of energy through appropriate conservation measures. We must now tap our frontier resources and mount a massive effort to develop alternative energy technologies.

Above all, and I say this for my friends on the socialist side of the House, we on this side will not stop apologizing for the enterprise system, as they like to do. Any economic system that can deliver what ours has, despite the roadblocks that have been consistently thrown in its way, has a great deal going for it.

It is trendy and chic in certain quarters to continually castigate our economic way of life for the way in which it supposedly favours the privileged at the expense of the underprivileged. Any objective and unbiased analysis of Canada's social development policies and income redistribution programs, however, will quickly give the lie to such an assertion. Furthermore, I would remind those who persist in perpetuating this myth that there is probably no greater injustice that a society can perpetuate on the weak and helpless than to erode the will and initiative of the enterprising and the strong.

I must also confess to some degree of bewilderment at the proposition put forward by the opposition parties that the road to economic salvation lies in ever-increasing government involvement in the workings of the competitive enterprise system. It is well established that the highest living standards are enjoyed by nations where the enterprise system predominates. On the other hand, countries where state capitalism is the vogue are certainly not noted either for their high standard of living or for the efficient and equitable distribution of goods and services. In an article outlining the superiority of the market economy, Gottfried Haverler, professor of international trade at Harvard University, asks:

> How else is one to explain the wide difference in living standards that exists between West and East Germany; between Greece and Yugoslavia; and between Austria and Czechoslovakia, bearing in mind that the paired in each case enjoyed comparable living standards in the pre-communist past.

Certainly our competitive enterprise system may have its faults and shortcomings, and we should not hesitate to move in order to correct them, but let us not lose sight of our system's strengths—its respect for the dignity of human achievement, its rejection of the indignity of human enslavement and its uncanny ability to harness the power of human endeavour toward the realization of common goals. It is these basic and fundamental strengths that provide the competitive enterprise system with its aura of perpetual relevance, which in turn forms the core of its superiority over all other forms of economic endeavour. And this human achievement, the strengths of our system, will be allowed to flourish under this government. That is what the message is in the Speech from the Throne delivered so capably by His Excellency the Governor General.

There are many other aspects of the Speech from the Throne that please me, and in particular the statement that "in co-operation with the provinces and industry, a national tourism strategy will be developed". I have had the pleasure of chairing a caucus committee on tourism this past number of weeks. We met with the Canadian government office of tourism, provincial government officials of tourism and many members of the private sector involved in this important business, and it is important. Tourism in Canada is a $11 billion business, accounting for 5 per cent of the gross national product and employing over one million people. Eighty per cent of the tourist businesses are classified as small business. For far too long this important sector of the economy has been virtually overlooked by previous administrations and this must be changed. It was obvious to the committee after hearing the various presentations that duplication of efforts was being experienced in Canada. It was also obvious that the foreign travelling public was confused in that they are being bombarded by the federal government and the provincial governments in marketing of all types without apparent co-ordination in their efforts.

The Tourism Industry Association of Canada or TIAC, an association which is the umbrella organization in Canada, is actively promoting a tourism plan for Canada with the Canadian government spearheading the activities. After many hours of discussion the committee agreed it was a very necessary component if we in Canada are to improve our tourism deficit position. The committee's presentation was made to the minister responsible, the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). It was agreed that this was vital to the well-being of tourism in Canada and would become the policy of this government, and there is no dust settling after that decision. At the federal-provincial meeting of tourism ministers this week in Newfoundland this matter will be discussed.

The objectives of the plan will be to maximize the contribution to the national economy, keeping in mind the following: our international balance of payments; the quality of life and development of the community; the conservation of the environment of the country; the preservation of the nation's cultural heritages; the special contribution tourism can make to regional economic expansion; and the optimization of Canada's rich resources capable of supporting a tourism industry. The objectives are to be reached by dividing the tourism industry into two areas, marketing and industry development. The task is great but our government is dedicated to the upgrading of the tourism industry and to co-operating much more fully with the private sector and the provinces in achieving this goal.

Many other recommendations have flowed from the committee's work, such as an awareness program for Canadians of how valuable tourism is to the economy and to them directly; that the attitude of government staff who come in direct contact with the travelling public be improved; that a closer liaison between Parks Canada and the tourism industry be achieved; that a faster, more efficient method of tourism statistics gathering be devised; and last but not least, a recognition of the importance of the tourism industry be expressed by the government in adding the title of "tourism" to the Minister of State for International Trade's title. The industry has asked for their own minister and ministry. It would be irresponsible of me to recommend another ministry when in fact we are trying not to create but to streamline various departments, but I would urge the Prime Minister and his government to give very serious consideration to this request so that tourism's importance in our Canadian economy will be given due recognition.

As a new member, may I publicly thank everyone, the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues, my constituents of Brampton-Georgetown, my colleagues from all sides of the House, the staff on the Hill and in the various ministries, and my own personal staff for helping me over the first few months. It has been an exciting and educational period in my new chosen profession, and I look forward to a very productive session.

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I am quite pleased and honoured to take part today in the throne speech debate. First allow me to take this opportunity to congratulate you for the trust shown in you by the House of Commons and especially by the government party which recommended your appointment to the position that you now hold. Your sense of responsibilities, your integrity as well as your fairness are the qualities recognized by all members of the House. At the risk of repeating what has already been said, I wish to point out that the role you will play in the months to come will surely not be without any difficulty. I therefore wish you much success in your duties as Speaker of the House.

I also extend my congratulations to the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman and the Assistant Deputy Chairman of the Committees of the Whole House. I am also pleased to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Undoubtedly it was for them the best possible way to begin this new legislature.

My preamble, Mr. Speaker, would not be complete if I failed to pay tribute to my predecessor in this House from 1962 to 1979. I refer to Mr. Albert Béchard, a man who always represented with dignity the constituency of Bonaventure from 1962 to 1968 and that of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine from 1968 to 1979. I wish him well in his new job as Canada's Consul General in Louisiana. Finally, I would like to thank most sincerely the voters of the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine for the faith they have put in me during the last general election. I will do everything I can not to disappoint them as they expect a lot from their federal representative, considering their remoteness from large centres as well as the many communication difficulties they face.

On this first opportunity I am given to address this House, Mr. Speaker, I will not describe the great resources and beauties of the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine. I will do rather like my eminent colleague from Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) and invite all my hon. colleagues to come and visit the Gaspé area and the Îles-de-la-Madeleine, as thousands of tourists from this country and all around the world do every year. However, I would like to point out two particular aspects of my riding. First, the diversity that exists within the riding itself. The people in the area are mostly Acadians, Loyalists and people who came from the Jersey Islands as far back as 1750. Ever since that time, Mr. Speaker, Francophones and Anglophones have managed to live in harmony and thus show the whole people of this country that linguistic and cultural duality can get along very well in the same territory. I believe I can say that the people of the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine could serve as a model for Canada as a whole by showing it is possible for the two founding groups of this country to live in close co-operation and mutual assistance.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal for a few moments with the difficult problem facing part of my riding, namely the territory of the Îles-de-la-Madeleine, located 180 miles from the centre of the riding of Bonaventure. Indeed, the Îles-de-la-Madeleine was a riding in its own right since 1940 but it disappeared during the general election in 1968. The islanders never quite accepted that decision and indeed showed it during the last election by massively staying away from the polls. It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that it is extremely difficult for a member to represent adequately two territories so remote in a single riding. Often the member finds himself in obvious contradiction between the two parts of the territory on certain policies. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I plan to establish in this House the validity of the request made to me by the people of the Magdalen Islands. I will examine every possible solution to give these people their own constituency so that they may be truly represented in all areas particular to their territory.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to the main subject of my speech. I must admit that after listening last week to the Speech from the Throne delivered by His Excellency the Governor General and after reading it carefully, I have a great deal of difficulty in seeing any desire on the part of the new government to give priority to certain problems which concern Canadians in general and more particularly the citizens of my constituency. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the vast issue of fisheries, which is a major sector of our economy, does not seem to concern greatly the new government. The only mention of this industry is that the government party plans to prepare a white paper on the subject. I listened carefully last week to the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) who, in his speech in support of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, said the following:

> I believe that we in Prince Edward Island have a stake in the expansion of this important industry, and I am pleased that this Parliament will be working to create a fisheries policy which will maintain Canada's position as the number one fishing country in the world. I look forward with great confidence to expansion of the fisheries industry and more year-round employment for our processors and fishermen.

Mr. Speaker, I think I can say that I fully agree with my colleague for Cardigan in these matters. However, I have the impression that the hon. member was able to read many things between the lines of the Speech from the Throne since there were few lines on the subject, unless our colleague has much more liberal and realistic views than the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath). Mr. Speaker, the government must not hide behind studies and the preparation of white papers to forget the very important area of fisheries, especially the grants for small harbours and boat construction and the delays in granting licences to fishermen.

On the other hand, we have been able to see that, in the five months the government has had before facing the House, this same government has made decisions concerning fisheries that I consider completely inconsiderate and irresponsible. In fact, in a decision announced on August 27 last, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans authorized vessels of 100 feet or more to take 6,000 metric tons of cod in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Such a decision, Mr. Speaker, annihilates all the work done by the previous government to improve the management of ground fish in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

We really wonder if the new government and particularly the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans does not encourage large companies rather than the small inshore fishermen. And when we think that, according to the information I have, this decision has been made without any consultation with the government of the Atlantic provinces! So what about the decision, the comments by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) last week about that new era of negotiations with the provinces? If this is the kind of negotiations mentioned by the Prime Minister and the way that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is acting, I really wonder where we are going.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to the difficult problem that will arise in our region because of that decision since all our fishermen are inshore fishermen. And for the information of the hon. member for Cardigan I shall say that nothing in that decision will promote the creation of more year-long employment for our fishermen. And it is true as well for those of Prince Edward Island, Quebec or New Brunswick. I have already made my comments to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on that subject and I hope he will take them into account.

Another important problem, Mr. Speaker, that I hope will be promptly tackled by the new government, and that affects not only the region where my riding is located but also a large part of the population living in eastern Canada, is the difficult problem of air transportation. The Speech from the Throne did not mention the subject. In that speech, the government expresses no willingness to grapple with that difficult problem and suggests no answer. Knowing the current difficulties in that field, I wish to attract the attention of the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) to urge him to consider a solution proposed by his predecessor and which, I think, would solve the schedule and transfer problems between various airlines.

That solution, Mr. Speaker, would be to have one regional air carrier in eastern Canada, as is already the case in other areas. This would avoid the enormous deficits incurred by airlines currently serving the area, and give a better transportation network to the various districts in eastern Canada. Hopefully the sale of Nordair will be a step in that direction. And I take this opportunity to invite the Minister of Transport to speed up this matter which has been under consideration long enough.

As I emphasized earlier, the new government has no apparent concern for the vital segments of our economy. Farmers were expecting a lot from the throne speech. They were greatly disappointed. Not a word, not a policy statement pointing to this government's approach in that area. What will our dairy producers do in the face of milk quota auctioneering? How is the problem of the astronomical cost of transporting produce into the large centres going to be solved? It is my hope the new government will not do as they did in the case of the Montreal harbour strike, when they waited for months before acting, letting disputes drag on and on. Mr. Speaker, our farmers deserve better treatment. I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) will take strong action, I hope that agriculture will become as much a priority for this government as energy and fisheries.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me turn to a significant omission in the throne speech, the constitutional crisis now facing the nation. Like my hon. leader, I am far from believing that the new leadership the right hon. Prime Minister is apparently trying to establish is capable of solving the Canadian crisis. I doubt that the constitutional problem can be solved by granting every provincial demand. Indeed the right hon. Prime Minister does not seem to pay much attention to that most urgent and serious problem in Canada, if the press conference he gave last week is any indication. The Prime Minister stated the significance of the referendum should not be exaggerated. He felt that it was much more important to ensure a permanent federal presence in Quebec.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like the Prime Minister and his colleagues to tell us how saying no to the decentralization of various departments within Quebec will ensure this presence in Quebec. Those are some of the questions I am directing to him. He also stated, and I quote:

—that the referendum was in fact only one of many events to take place in 1980.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this fails to recognize the importance of the situation in the province of Quebec and the seriousness of the constitutional crisis we are going through. What is still worse, Mr. Speaker, we have heard his Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis) indicate that the government's participation will be minimal. How could it be otherwise, for they have only three hon. members in the House of Commons and two ministers in the Senate? So, how can that presence make itself felt strongly? Obviously the minister had no other argument to plead in that regard. But there is worse when he says, and I quote:

In addition, we do not have the strength to wage a big campaign in Quebec. One must recognize one's weaknesses.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, that is implicit recognition of the fact that the Progressive Conservative government does only represent the nine other Canadian provinces and does not represent the province of Quebec in the House of Commons. As I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, we are now up against a secessionist government in Quebec, which will not hesitate to resort to all the means necessary to achieve its ends, and by handing it certain powers the Canadian government will not allay its hunger.

In the face of the gathering storm in Quebec, I feel that those who hold deep convictions about Canadian federalism, and specially the members of Parliament, must see to it that this country remain a model of unity despite the diversity of its parts. Finally, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that some of the suggestions of the opposition, in particular with regard to Quebec, will not be turned down in order that the unity we all hold dear might be strengthened.

[English]

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, for the past several days in this House and for the past several months out on the hustings and in the media the Liberals and the NDP alike have been exclaiming and proclaiming the virtues of Petro-Canada. Never before on any one issue have we heard such righteous indignation and such hyperbole. What it all boils down to is state ownership versus ownership by the people of Canada. When did one single taxpayer outside the board room of Petro-Canada have any say in its operation?

An hon. Member: Or any benefit.

An hon. Member: Or any interest.

Mr. Brisco: Or any interest. When did the taxpayers' representatives right here in the House of Commons have any say in Petro-Canada after its creation? How often has Petro-Canada appeared before any standing committee of Parliament? I can remember once. Perhaps there were other occasions, but they were exceedingly few. Once in 1977 the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works was dealing with the estimates, and hon. members who have served on standing committees will know there is a host of wide-ranging questions which can and are asked. I wonder if anybody on that occasion in 1977 asked about the president of Petro-Canada, the only oil company executive in Alberta being driven around in a chauffeur-driven limousine, the highest paid oil executive in Canada. That is the kind of aura which was established then and is continued now. That is the kind of aura which would be furthered and fostered by my socialist friends across the floor.

When have we had any opportunity to comment on the expenditure of $1.5 billion of public funds to purchase Pacific Petroleums? Was it necessary to purchase the whole thing? We hear exclamations that we want a Canadian identity. I could not agree more, but some 30 per cent of Pacific Petroleums—indeed, a little more—was already owned by Canadians, and it was just bought out lock, stock and barrel. Canadian money was used to buy Pacific Petroleums. I do not know whose philosophy that was, but it surely is not the philosophy of this government.

Canadians need the opportunity to share in the successes of Petro-Canada and in the policy of Petro-Canada. If there had been any policy in Petro-Canada, the uranium exploration now taking place in the southern Okanagan through its subsidiary, Pacific Petroleums, would have been halted, at least until the Bates commission of inquiry in British Columbia was completed.

That is an issue which finds the NDP on all four sides of the question, one federally, one Saskatchewan, one British Columbia and, I suppose, one somewhere else. Members of the NDP have a policy for every province and another one which they toss out federally. It will be interesting to hear what their plan is. Hopefully they will appear before the nuclear energy inquiry which we as a government intend to establish.

If there had been any say by the taxpayers of Canada in the policy of Petro-Canada, certainly the taxpayers of southern British Columbia and in my constitutency would have asked Petro-Canada to lay off, at least until the Bates commission of inquiry was completed. We never had that kind of conversation.

The impression which has been left by hon. members opposite is that a Conservative government would tear asunder and rip the guts out of Petro-Canada and trash it. When did this party say that? We have never said that. Where does that story come from? It comes from hon. members opposite.

I heard the eloquent although supplicated speech by the leader of the NDP at the weekend. He made comparisons about Chargex and Master Charge and told Canadians how to operate their accounts. The New Democratic Party is so bankrupt it would have trouble getting a Master Charge card. The task force report will probably indicate to all Canadians that the word "dismantling" does not exist in our vocabulary. The government has $1 billion in equity in Petro-Canada, and Petro-Canada has $1.5 billion of debt. That is $2.5 billion for starters, and it has a profit picture of a few million dollars.

● (1640)

Two hundred and fifty per cent of the equity of PetroCan is an added equity, and you could not give it away under the present circumstances and framework, so we have to turn that around. Canada and Canadians need their own private oil company, aided and abetted by a strong energy policy, a policy that is now being developed by this government. What is PetroCan, sir? It is a government-owned company with confused purposes and, at times, questionable management.

An hon. Member: It's a shell.

Mr. Brisco: I do not like throwing into question the management of any corporation, but I can remember the time a month and a half or two months ago when, in Calgary as members serving on the Canada-U.S. interparliamentary group, we were presented with a very slick presentation by PetroCan at the Glenbow centre. They would have us believe that by 1985 Canada will have icebreaking LNG tankers that will ride up on the ice, crash through, rise up and again crash through, and they will carry Canada's natural gas from the Arctic to the Atlantic seaboard. That was a remarkable proposal, remarkable because we do not yet have the ships. I do not know whether or not they are in the design stage—perhaps they are. I asked them where they are going on the seaboard, where they are going on the Atlantic coast with that LNG. Nobody wants them because the stuff is so highly explosive.

I must say that, in an environmental sense, LNG does make sense. It is environmentally so clean that once it explodes, nothing is left. So in that sense it is non-polluting. But when I asked a senior official of PetroCan about the explosive qualities of LNG, he asked, "What explosive qualities? It does not explode." Why do you think they kept them off the Pacific coast? The man had not done his homework.

Then PetroCan would have us believe they are going to establish pipelines on the islands, run them under the oceans in the Arctic and they would have pick-up points along the way. The official did not say anything about ice scouring of the ocean bottom and how they would place those pipelines below the level of scouring. I do not think he knew there was any scouring being done up there. Hon. members will know that the Beaufort sea in the Arctic ocean is a very shallow body of water and that scouring is probably the major cause of concern. So if I say that the management is questionable, I hope I can be forgiven but certainly the slick presentation we received at Calgary left a great deal to be desired.

The Germans did it with Volkswagen, the Alberta government did it with Alberta Gas Trunk, more recently BCRIC did it in British Columbia, the most successful new equity issue put on the market in recent history. How well I remember the remarks, when flying back to my constituency, of the former member for New Westminster who has gone to his reward in the provincial legislature in B.C., sitting in the wings ready to devour the present leader of his party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Quite a mouthful!

Mr. Brisco: Quite a mouthful is right. He will suffer from acute indigestion before he has finished that task. I remember the former member's remarks because he said to me, about BCRIC, "What an excellent move, what an excellent idea, and we do not have anything with which to combat it." They announced, as a party out there in British Columbia, that if you have a few shares and you are a member of the party, send them to the NDP, they could use them. Well, I wonder how many members have sent their shares to the NDP, those free shares that were issued at $6 and went up to around $8.25. I am not sure what they are worth today, but I am sure there are many people from all parties in British Columbia today who check BCRIC on the stockmarket every day.

What Canada needs and what Canadians want is a Canadian-owned company with a clear direction and able to compete with the multinationals, a company with the financial structure to stand on its own feet, a company not politically oriented, not an empire of bureaucrats but a company of Canadians in every sense of the word.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I do not subscribe, nor does my government, to the socialist philosophy that only a small elite, either here in Ottawa or out west in Calgary, can run anything and everything. So I say: Let us get on with the task of energy self-sufficiency and, at the same time, destroy the myth created by the opposition that we would hand PetroCan over to the multinationals. I know there is concern across Canada about the destiny of PetroCan and I can understand that concern, particularly in light of the stories of the Liberals and the NDP. Canadians are opposed to having PetroCan turned over to the multinationals, and I do not blame them at all. So are we, and that is the point that the people opposite fail to recognize.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: I wonder just where the opposition believes we should be going with PetroCan now. Do they feel we should leave it as it is?

An hon. Member: Expand it.

An hon. Member: Put money in it.

Mr. Brisco: We hear all kinds of hoots and cries from the brainless ones, sir. But if that is the case, are we going to have any kind of guarantee that they will be responsible to Parliament? The outfit across the way would not want it responsible to Parliament. They never had it that way and they surely would not want to begin now.

Forty-four years ago, which is nearly half a century ago, Kootenay West was represented for the last time by a member of the government. That is a long time in the doldrums. In that interval, three members have represented Kootenay West until my election in 1974, and all three of them, regardless of their political philosophy, have served that constituency to the best of their ability. There was Billy Esling who served from 1925 to 1945, a man who resigned in 1945 because he became virtually blind. He was succeeded by Bert Herridge, a fine gentleman. I am sure there are many members in the House who have been here for a long time, particularly the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who remember him. We called him the squire of the Kootenays. He was succeeded by Ran Harding who came to the House after 23 years of representing his constituency in the provincial House. Each of them in his own way worked with diligence on behalf of the constituency.

I do not think anyone would deny that, in some respects at least, it is harder to represent a constituency when you are on the government side. Certainly I think we would all recognize that in opposition there are those frustrations which rest on the failure to fulfil everything you would like to fulfil in your constituencies that might possibly be accomplished in government. I have some reservations today whether many of the aspirations of members on the government side, let alone the opposition, will be fulfilled in terms of hon. members' own constituencies until we are able to shed ourselves of the financial chaos and disaster, the reign of fiscal terror perpetrated on Canadians by 11 years particularly, and 16 years generally, of Liberal policy.

I note that in the throne speech reference is made to a freedom of information act. I only suggest that the government consider implementing that measure before considering a national uranium inquiry. If the experience in many provinces, Saskatchewan, Ontario, British Columbia and Quebec, is any example, it is important that we have a freedom of information act in place before we start asking questions in terms of a uranium or nuclear energy inquiry.

I note, sir, that there is provision for improvements in spouses' allowances. Certainly members on this side, and my colleague on the other side, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, recognize the time spent both in this House and in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Human Resources trying to persuade the government of that day to remove the inequities in spouses' allowances.

I am also pleased to see in the throne speech a recognition of the concerns and problems of Canada's veterans. It is, indeed, unfortunate that in the last government we had an apologist for a minister, a man without clout in government in terms of representation of our veterans. Again there are those in this House who should be mentioned particularly as having fought for the welfare of Canada's veterans. I think of Jack Marshall, who has gone to the other place, Bill Knowles, who is no longer a member, having retired after many years of service, our own member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie), our present Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. McKinnon), and, yes again, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I note also in the throne speech a concern about FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review Agency. I share that concern, a concern which certainly existed when we were in the opposition, and nothing has happened since to relieve that concern. In fact, I suppose my concerns have been reinforced.

I can remember when Salmo Forest Products Ltd., an American company sold to an American company operating in Canada, had an application before FIRA. The application was rejected because the proposition was not going to provide any significant benefit to Canada, particularly in terms of new employees. What did that company do? It laid off 50 employees on the excuse that some kind of legislation in the United States obliged it as a small company—and I question that—to follow certain rules which provided that they could not have more than 500 employees, or something like that, on their total payroll and still be involved in the forest industry cutting logs from a national forest in the state of Idaho. That company laid off 50 employees and re-submitted an amended application to FIRA stating it was going to hire 50 employees. You can imagine what happened. The application was approved and the shift that was laid off was hired again. Does that strike you as responsibility?

We are also going to be asked to extend the powers of Parliament. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), now the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, once remarked that parliamentarians at one time did have power in this House to take the kind of actions that Canadians deserved, to take positive steps and to assume responsibility. That power disappeared and we know when that happened. What did we get in place of that power? We got a raise in pay. Everyone got a raise in pay in the hope that that would keep members happy and quiet. It was felt members would not bellyache after they had received an increase in their salaries. The government then just took away parliamentary powers. What a disastrous trade-off that was.

Another concern that is touched on in the Speech from the Throne relates to spending restraint. During the last election campaign I said on more than one platform that the people should elect the party which promises that it will endorse and implement the recommendations of the Lambert commission and the recommendations of Auditors General. Did we hear members of the opposition say they supported this? With their kind of policies and their expansion of the bureaucracy how could they support economic accountability and efficiency? How could these people support that? Is the record of the last 16 years any evidence that they could support it?

The Auditor General makes certain recommendations in his report to members of the House, but who hoots, hollers, jeers and denies the whole thing? I suggest it is those members across the way. If a party promised no other thing to Canadians but that it would implement recommendations of economy, efficiency and accountability, it should be elected by the people of Canada. They have done that and we will fulfil that promise. Before the end of two years we will terminate that period we have seen from the other side of monetary madness and financial irresponsibility.

Work is already under way to restore accountability to the people who pay the bills; the people in the galleries, the people out there across this nation, more particularly the people of Kootenay West who had enough perception, in spite of the fact that they elected a couple of socialists provincially, to know that a socialist federally is not going to serve their purposes.

Mr. Clark: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I might have the consent of the House to revert to the tabling of documents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) to revert to the tabling of documents for the purpose of presenting a report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Brisco.]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table, in both official languages, copies of the report of the Task Force on Petro-Canada.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Trudeau) (p. 37).

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize a Miss Jasmine Hubjer in the gallery.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Flis: I am sorry, I am learning the rules, as you know, Mr. Speaker. The young student, whose teachers are on strike in Peel County, is here in this classroom to get a first-hand education.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flis: In this, my first speech as the representative for Parkdale-High Park, I would like to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) on his reappointment as Speaker of this House of Commons. The wisdom of the members here in showing this confidence in him has been demonstrated amply in the past, as it will continue to be in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I extend similar congratulations to you as the Deputy Speaker. Congratulations are also in order to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), and I am very honoured that he is here in person to hear my maiden speech. Though the criticism from this side of the House will oftentimes be pointed and harsh, I need not remind him that we share the ultimate objective as members of this House of Commons which will guide us in our deliberations, that being the good government of this nation.

Parkdale-High Park is situated in the west end of Toronto and was created out of two federal constituencies, High Park-Humber Valley and Parkdale. Our constituency houses the Canadian National Exhibition, Ontario Place, Sunnyside Swimming Pavilion for which we hope the new government will give us some funds to restore its historical nature, and the famous High Park.

For my own part, I very much identify with the mosaic concept of Canada as it is often described by our leader, the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau). Boasting more than two dozen identifiable ethnic strains, Parkdale-

High Park easily touches all corners of this planet. Its inhabitants include Canadian Indians, English, Polish, Ukranian, Germans, Austrians, Lithuanians, Maltese, Italians, Spanish, Serbs, Croats, Slovenians, East Indians, West Indians, Chinese, Japanese, Koreans, Greeks, Portuguese, Irish, Scots, Filipinos, Latvians, Estonians, French, and many others, including Inuit. There are Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Moslems, Hindus, Buddhists, and other religions too numerous to mention. There are some that are very wealthy and some not so wealthy. I have so far enumerated only the differences.

What binds these people together? They are bound by a common bond of being Canadians. They each have a personal identity based on their ethnic heritage which they have been encouraged to preserve. My identity happens to be Polish. I am proud to be a descendant of a culture that has a 1,000 year history of Christianity, and a culture that has been blessed with producing today's Roman Catholic Pope, John Paul II.

To answer the question further what binds these people together, I would like to quote from a speech made in this House 22 years ago by a gentleman who now sits in the other chamber after many years of distinguished service. The hon. Senator Stanley Haidasz said of the constituency which I now represent:

> This enviable mosaic, composed of different shapes, sizes, and colours is, may I assure you, strongly cemented by a common allegiance to the Crown and a common Canadian citizenship but also by convictions of loyalty, pride, and faith in the past, present, and future of Canada.

As the present member for Parkdale-High Park, I would not hesitate to offer my riding as a model of co-operation amidst diversity for all of Canada. Racism is a reality in many communities today, a reality based on ignorance of the changing nature of Canadian society. Co-operation and living in harmony such as I see in Parkdale-High Park are based on knowledge, understanding, appreciation, and respect for each other.

I would be remiss if I did not at this time offer my congratulations to the community of Parkdale on this, the occasion of its centennial. The Parkdale crest bears the words "Progress and Economy", words which will be a guiding influence for the community during its next 100 years. Perhaps the present government would consider adopting them as its motto also.

A Speech from the Throne in essence is a blueprint for the future. The role of the government is therefore to lead us into that period. I regret that the Speech from the Throne which opened this Thirty-first Parliament is long on verbiage and magnanimous exhortations, but lacking in genuine commitment to action by this government.

One province is about to vote on its continued existence within the Canadian federation. This is not considered important enough by the government to require mention in the Speech from the Throne. We have a promise to amend the preamble to the Immigration Act to acknowledge the multicultural reality of Canada. If the government is serious about a commitment to multiculturalism, I challenge it to entrench the principle and support of multiculturalism in a revised Canadian constitution, and I challenge the new government to bring the constitution home where it belongs. My constituents and I are insulted that a mature country such as Canada does not have ultimate authority over its own constitution.

The Prime Minister has said that he has contributed more to federalism since coming to power than the right hon. member for Mount Royal accomplished in 11 years. Ignoring the dubious nature of this statement, I would urge the government to put forth proposals leading toward the renewal of the federalism so as to convince Quebeckers that there is a new image and new substance to federalism as the Prime Minister indicated in Montreal last month. The time for action is now, in this Parliament.

The intent of the government with regard to Petro-Canada remains a puzzle even after the Speech from the Throne. Its fate was a major plank in the electoral platform of the present government, but no mention of it appears in the speech. The persistent equivocation which has been the hallmark of this ministry is most clearly demonstrated in regard to PetroCan. Let me read a few quotations. As quoted on March 24, 1977, in the Calgary Herald the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) stated:

> Obviously, if it's a thriving operation, we'd be crazy to shut it down.

Given the multi-million dollar assets of the firm at this time, Mr. Speaker, I will resist the temptation to editorialize on that observation. On April 6, 1979, in Winnipeg, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, now the right hon. Prime Minister, stated, "I believe that it's a dud". Well I believe that we have a "dud" of a government if that is his assessment of PetroCan. On July 20, 1979, in the Calgary Herald the headline read:

> Andre easing PetroCan stance.

Again from the Calgary Herald on August 11, 1979, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) was reported as follows:

> The minister said that the concept of the need for a state oil company had changed dramatically since 1974 when Petro-Canada was created. Since then, dwindling oil supplies have underscored the need to ensure security of supply, he said.

Pity the Montreal Star. Two days after reporting the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as saying "PetroCan will stay", the Prime Minister said "PetroCan still goes". Who's on first? What's on second? The Canadian taxpayer—out at third! The new government had better stick to football.

One wonders why myopic party dogma should stand in the way of Canada maintaining its own national oil company, just as Britain and most other industrialized nations do. The multinational oil companies that would control our energy future in the absence of Petro-Canada have demonstrated that their supply objectives do not coincide with those of the Canadian people. Petro-Canada must answer to its owners. Its owners are the Canadian people.

The leaders of our new government have expressed a concern in the past over an alleged abrogation of the powers of Parliament during the last few years. This is certainly an impressive statement to make inasmuch as no democratically minded person would argue that the elected legislature should be anything else but the focus of initiative and review in government policy. Is the new government acting in accord with this lofty ideal? I think not. The reason given for the longest delay in Canadian history between election day and the summoning of Parliament was for the ministers to become expert in their respective portfolios. Judging from the responses that we have been hearing to opposition questions in the last few days, one is left to wonder why it was assumed that five months would be sufficient.

By the appointment of a freshly defeated and unproven, novice politician to a senior economic portfolio, the Prime Minister has made a blatant end run around Parliament and the democratic process as we know it.

Had Parliament the opportunity to debate it in advance, perhaps the government could have been dissuaded from its unfortunate policy on the Israeli embassy question. Under the guidance of prime minister Trudeau, Canada acquired a reputation of considerable stature in foreign affairs. This reputation has been seriously eroded in an ominously brief period of time, and all before a single member of Parliament was afforded the opportunity to ask who, what, where, when or why.

The revelation of budgetary substance by way of a press conference is an unacceptable affront to Parliament. The House of Commons is very jealous of its primacy in the knowledge of such matters. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), who is as quick with his wit as he is slow with his answers, continues to mock the intelligence of all members with his evasiveness. Perhaps he was named to that portfolio because of his dexterity at passing the buck. Only last week we witnessed confusion by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) over responsibility for the estimates after presenting them on behalf of His Excellency the Governor General. The lack of organization apparent within this government is alarming.

The formation of the several parliamentary committees is a positive step. Parliament should have accurate data when reviewing the estimates, and it should have a major voice in the determination of such major policy areas as foreign investment, nuclear energy, cultural policy and the several other important matters cited for examination. To broaden the activities of Parliament, however, is not necessarily synonymous with broadening its powers. I truly hope that in this session we begin to witness a convergence of the two.

The importance of instilling confidence in the Canadian economy was stressed in the Speech from the Throne. The behaviour of the Toronto Stock Exchange last week suggests that this objective is not within reach at the moment. If the government wishes to restore confidence in the economy, it must withdraw such misdirected and hackneyed schemes as the mortgage interest and tax credit plan. Though conceived with an honourable motive, the plan is inadequate, as many Canadians such as renters and full home-owners cannot participate. Given the impact on increases in the interest rate permitted by the present government, all benefits of the plan have become extinct. Unfortunately, the costs of the plan will outlast the benefits by several years.

In other matters pertaining to the economy, it is heartening to see the effects of the last budget continuing to moderate the inflation rate and unemployment. I believe that governments should channel a great deal more resources toward youth and their interests than has been the case in the past in Canada.

In 1976, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development—we see it in the media as OECD—completed a study on educational policies in Canada. Our system was harshly criticized for lacking unity of purpose or any orientation toward the future in the face of overwhelming arguments in favour of some kind of central direction. The report made the following points in favour of a national authority to involve itself in education:

> Education is a right of each citizen, due to each system irrespective of his place of residence . . . The standards maintained by schools, community colleges and universities are of national interest, because a large part of scientific-technical achievement, and hence, economic and social well-being may depend on them . . . unity of the educational system is a national interest, in order to maintain and guard the freedom of choice (via mobility) of citizens . . . the educational philosophy of an educational system and the principles underlying its operation are matters of national interest, because cultural and national consciousness depend on it.

No political party in Canada has had the guts to infringe upon the provincial jurisdictions in education, but I believe the time has come to amend the constitution to allow for a federal ministry of education which would set national goals and national standards.

I applaud the initiatives of the government in assisting young Canadians in the work force. My own background is heavily oriented in education—equipping young people to cope with situations that they will encounter outside school. In this Thirty-first Parliament there are at least five dozen others who have been involved with education either through teaching or through school administration. As an educator I have witnessed first hand the value of, indeed the need for, a positive esprit de corps, be it a school spirit or a national will. Just as a winning team enhances the spirit of a school, a strong national pride enhances a country.

The Liberal government provided strong leadership based on winning ideas such as Petro-Canada and the plan of national health care. Both of these ideas are being undermined by the current excess of Tory governments in Canada. By shedding all of its powers to the provincial governments, this federal government is neglecting its responsibility to act on behalf of the national fact known as Canada.

My parents emigrated from Poland at the height of the depression. The fact that they settled in Saskatchewan as opposed to Manitoba or New Brunswick was only incidental to them—they considered their destination to be Canada. As a citizen of Canada by birth, I cannot help but be alarmed when I see the federal government jettisoning its responsibilities, left, right, and centre, to the provincial governments. These several provincial governments are answerable to and must act on behalf of the residents of their respective provinces. None of them appear incapable of acting on their own behalf, but this federal government, this Prime Minister, under the guise of co-operation, is handing over lock, stock and barrel, the very elements that bind these provinces as one country.

The notion of regional interests is not alien to the concept of Canada; in fact, the presence of a federal government that bends like a willow in the wind to provincial demands as this government does, causes worry for my constituents and, I am afraid, for all Canadians.

It is Premier Lougheed's job to fight for Alberta's interest, Premier Lyon's to fight for Manitoba, that of Premier Davis for Ontario. I pray that the Prime Minister gives serious reflection as to what constituency he should be fighting for.

I would like to thank the residents of Parkdale-High Park for bestowing upon me the greatest honour I, as the child of immigrant parents, could ever hope to achieve. To this role of member of parliament I bring with me experience as a farmer, small businessman, labourer, and educator.

I cherish the opportunity to convey the interests of my constituents to the federal government—constituents such as Dr. Ven who advised me on the maximization of research moneys. Mr. Czubak advises Mr. Clark that if he must sell off PetroCan, to sell only 45 per cent to the private sector, and retain 55 per cent control in federal government hands. This is not my stand; this is the stand of one of my constituents and I feel it is my duty to share it with you. Mr. Primicius, who comes from the Philippines, recommends that the new government call a constitutional convention. I bring to this House Mr. Wotton's concern of using foreign designers for publicly funded Canadian projects. Mr. Field, Mr. Szymanski, and over one hundred other constituents are irate over the present government's immigration policy. Several petitioners wish me to draw to this Parliament's attention that Canadians do not want the legalization of marijuana use.

● (1720)

The constituents of Parkdale-High Park whose parents come from Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, the Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Bulgaria, and other eastern European countries want this government to challenge the Soviet Union's dual citizenship policy.

Another constituent, Mr. Cozzi, helped me appreciate the contribution made to Canada and the world by our senior veterans and the present personnel in the armed forces.

Miss Milne requests that the External Affairs Department disband Canada House or force it to improve its service to Canadian travellers.

Mr. Bosley, like many other residents of Parkdale-High Park, is furious over the misuse of our social welfare services. Many people are worried about the low morale in the immigration department caused by public statements made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey).

Mrs. Plesha, Mr. Hanzlik, Mr. Tiwari, Mr. Previlon, Mr. Palaniandi, Mrs. Paech, Mr. Singh, Mr. Halaby and Mrs. Baptista would like the ministries of immigration and external affairs to get off their bureaucratic high horses and allow these people to reunite with their families while immediate families, sons, daughters, sisters, brothers, and parents, are still alive, and not after they are dead.

Mr. Kolev wants to know why the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) refuses to meet with him to discuss the release of his ailing 69 year old father from a Bulgarian concentration camp.

Mr. Manat wants to know why he has to pay $3,000 for a patent on an energy saving engine which could save Canada millions of dollars in lowering fuel consumption.

In the past it was often assumed that elected officials were more knowledgeable than the constituents in many strategic areas. My brief experience as a member of Parliament has demonstrated to me that this is not the case now, if in fact it ever was. As the elected representative, I depend on the collective expertise of my constituents. It is my responsibility to convey their opinions, suggestions, needs and know-how into this House of Commons. Upon reflection, we must all realize that no one of us has a greater responsibility than this.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne in broad general terms is a speech designed to outline the government's proposals for the session. It is my view that the speech of a member speaking in the throne speech debate should outline that member's intention, his philosophy, and how he proposes to act during the parliamentary session.

I was a member of this House in the Twenty-ninth Parliament and spoke many times during that time. But in a sense this is my maiden speech because at no time in that Parliament did I really have an opportunity to talk about some of the matters that I would like to talk about in this address.

I bring to this House some basic principles which I think are important in the way that I will perceive my role as a member of Parliament and which I think are important in outlining to members here how they can understand the member from Mississauga South.

There is only one kind of Canadian, a very ordinary Canadian. That is my first principle. There is nothing special about being a black Canadian, a yellow Canadian, a red Canadian, or a white Canadian. There is only one kind of Canadian.

I am perhaps slightly colour blind. A lady came to my constituency office the other day and asked me if I knew she was a black Canadian. I thought she was chocolatey-brown, but I told her that I didn't care what she perceived her colour to be, I perceived she was a Canadian. I told her that that was all I was concerned about, and that she was entitled to the same rights and privileges in Canada as anyone else, no more, no less.

Over past years we have had a tendency to develop a description of Canadians by calling them Francophones, Anglophones, Irish Canadians, French Canadians, and Polish Canadians, and so on. By doing this we have got away from the spirit of the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker who stood up and said that there was but one kind of Canadian, in Canada, an unhyphenated Canadian. My executive assistant in my constituency office was born in Hungary. She told me the other day that it was not until Mr. Diefenbaker said to her—and her name was Berkovits at the time—"you are a Canadian; you did not have to be born here and you don't have to have a WASP name, you are a Canadian," that it was not until that point that she felt she really belonged.

Throughout the election campaign a candidate opposed to me from a party on the other side of the House proposed that there were four kinds of Canadians, namely, French-Canadians, English-Canadians, native-Canadians, and immigrant Canadians. That is not the kind of Canada I will speak for, nor should it be the kind of Canada that this government should speak for.

It should not matter when we, in government, appoint people to offices in the civil service or wherever to make our country work, whether the person is a Baptist, or a Moslem or a Jew, a woman, a Francophone or from an underprivileged minority. Surely we should treat all our citizens in the same fashion without attempting, by virtue of colour or whatever, to say that one is better than the other.

Since the election, some members in this House may have said things in certain letters with regard to a letter I wrote to the president of the National Indian Brotherhood. The president replied by saying "your white immigrant government this, and your white immigrant government that." I had the opportunity of sitting on a white immigrant airplane with him. Each of us were enjoying a white immigrant alcoholic beverage. I put my fist up against his and discovered that my colour was a little browner than his. Perhaps he has been under the colour of the neon lights too long.

Our attempts to try to balance race, religion and sex are in many cases an attempt at reverse discrimination so we have the nominal woman, the nominal new Canadian, or the nominal WASP on a board. That is reverse discrimination, and my actions will be to oppose that type of thing. In the very same way I will be opposing anything that insists that because you were born as a UEL and can trace your heritage to indicate that, somewhere along that line you may have some privilege in Canada. That is the kind of thing members of this House must convey to all of Canada.

Last evening I was at the home of the Consul General for Poland. I was at a reception in connection with a mutual exchange between a Polish city, and I am having a hard time pronouncing it, Wroclaw, and North York. A gentleman there told me he had been in Canada seven years, that he was a Polish and Canadian. I said, "No you are not. If you are a Canadian you are a Canadian and Polish is your culture, and that culture is part of Canada. That is the kind of thing we must preserve." I told him that just because he had a Polish culture that did not make him Polish because he had decided to be a Canadian. Culture, whether it is Polish, Ukrainian, or Italian, preserved in its panoramic sense, makes Canada the kind of place in which we want to live. Differences of culture and race cannot be allowed to be the basis for differences between our people. They must be the uniting force for our people because we have one Canada, one people.

My second principle is that we in Canada are over governed and the least government we can have is probably the best. In that sense I am in agreement with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) when he says we have been expecting too much. Canadians have been expecting far too much from government. No organization of government can do anything other than try to regulate and control in human terms the activities of one person to another.

Too often we ask government to do the impossible. We ask it to regulate, control, and redistribute. To a large extent the efforts of government have not proved very satisfactory. In the 25 or 30 years since the last war we have been trying to eliminate poverty in this country. Massive redistributions of money have not done very much to equalize between wealth and poverty. Despite all our efforts, despite government in action, not very much has been done to alleviate some of the questions the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has brought to this House on many occasions concerning veterans and people of native origin on the reserves I sometimes call Bantustans. A great deal of the effort by government has been nothing but a waste of money and a waste of administration, without any real effort at bringing forth a better standard of living for the disadvantaged in our society.

The late John Kennedy said it is not what you can get from your country but what you can do for your country. What we have to inculcate is a sense of individualism in Canada, a sense that people individually can do things for themselves and that big brother government cannot accomplish, indeed it has proven unable to accomplish, those social aims and objectives that had been placed before it. It is essential as we go into this Thirty-first Parliament that the direction of bigger and bigger government being asked to accomplish more and more be turned back.

I am reminded of a speech made in this House by the former member for Crowfoot. He mentioned Hardin's law. I do not know where Hardin or the law came from. It went something like this. If you have a problem and you pass a law to solve it, often what you do is create three more problems which require three more laws that require and require and require, and your problems are never solved.

This House has directed the problem of interest rates to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. All of us are upset about the astronomical rates of interest charged by our banking system. We see young people being forced to pay 13¼ per cent on mortgages, and small businesses paying 15 or 15½ per cent interest just to stay alive. We see the destruction that high cost money will cause to employment opportunities. We have a right to be concerned.

What do we do about high cost interest? Do we pass a law like foreign exchange control? Do we make more wage and price controls mandatory? What do we do to break this country away from the North American high interest costs imposed on us by the banking system in New York and elsewhere? When our committee meets on this matter it is essential that we bear in mind that we cannot have it just the way we want it, that sometimes passing a law only creates the problem of more and more laws and more and more control over the life of the individual.

I have looked at government, particularly since I have come back and have had much more experience in the private field, in manufacturing, construction and so on. I look at where we spend the taxpayers' money.

The other day I was in a manpower office, a glorious place with three or four floors of booths and people in Mississauga trying to work within the manpower requirements of the present legislation. I asked how many of the unemployed they would place. I was told there are probably 5,000 jobs in Mississauga right now, that they would probably fill 1,000, and the rest would be filled by people never even bothering with their service.

I looked at the cost of that operation. I began to wonder if we did not have the operation at all whether more people would find jobs than presently find jobs with the assistance of that operation. It is important that members of Parliament look critically at the activities of ministries. Do we really need the service we are paying for? Is the service supplied by a government really worth the effort?

The hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) mentioned tourism. I understand in that committee a senior bureaucrat was asked what do you really do, do you really bring more tourists to Canada, can you show what you have accomplished? The witness was a bit taken aback. He said, "Well, you know, we co-ordinate things between the provinces, you know, and that sort of thing". We have to really examine the functions of government, some of the things we are attempting to do for Canadians, to see whether they need to be done.

I could give other instances. I talked with someone in the National Farm Marketing Products Council. Their budget started off at $300,000. This year it will be $1 million. They co-ordinate marketing boards in all the provinces. I asked one of the employees whether they really accomplished anything. She said you could probably get rid of the board as there is enough expertise in the ministry to handle all the marketing problems, but the board was created by statute. She said their big job was dealing with the ministry. Therefore we have a ministry dealing with a ministry dealing with a ministry all over the province, and all over the country. What does that man who is raking asphalt for a construction company and paying 30 per cent or 40 per cent of his dollars in income tax think about an agency or a board which is accomplishing nothing for him? That is part of the concern I bring to this House and I shall act as a member to seriously cross-examine our government activity.

The next thing is this: I shall be bringing to this House a very high respect for private ownership. Look at farms throughout the world and then consider the kind of production we get from prairie farms and from our farms in Ontario where we raise some of the finest Holstein cattle in the world. This is done by people privately working on their own property, building on their own activity and initiative. They own the property. We look at the people who are retiring. We look at the ones who own their homes when they retire and we look at their ability to look after themselves and not come to the state for a handout or extras. We look at the people who never own property and what their condition is at the time of retirement and we must, over the years, acknowledge ownership of property, the wide distribution of ownership in Canada, to be very important to the social structure and fabric of the nation. That is why I am proud of our government for its decision to make interest charges on home mortgages recoverable from tax, recognizing that home ownership is a method by which individuals can acquire a personal stake in the ownership of Canada.

A proposal was tabled today with respect to Petro-Canada, a proposal to distribute broadly individual shares in that corporation so that individual Canadians can own a bit more of Canada. What we need are laws which will enable corporations in this country to distribute their stock to their employees. One of the advantages of the privatization of Crown corporations is that it will enable the distribution of shares in those corporations to the employees of those corporations to give them a chance of feeling they really belong, that they really have a place in Canada. When people feel they belong, when they feel they own the soil they farm or the backyard where their home is, when they own an interest in the firm for which they work, they have a sense of security, a sense of belonging. That is the purpose of this government, the aim I shall be working for this session.

Next is the question of individual liberty. All too often big government has meant erosion of the liberty of the individual. So we have seen efforts to reverse the burden of proof under the Income Tax Act to allow people to come in and seize a company's books and records without even a court order, or garnishee a person's wages or property because some official says money is due to government. There have been situations where people have been allowed to place taps on telephones, spy, and find out about an individual, or force an individual to use his social insurance number just to get a ticket on a Sun Tour charter. Respect for the individual and the individual's right to privacy is essential in Canada, so I shall be working on that kind of issue.

Last, when speaking as a member of Parliament I deem it my job to represent my constituents. Sometimes in representing my constituents and speaking on their behalf I may say things we are not supposed to say as members of Parliament. The other day the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) and the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) suggested I should be kicked out of the caucus of my political party because I said some things of which they did not approve. Perhaps some of the people in my own party did not approve of what I said either. Surely, though, it is essential that I, along with other members, should be entitled to state opinions for and on behalf of constituents, which might not be popular with others.

Sir, it is not the job of a member of Parliament just to stand up and bow to you at the appropriate time on an appropriate vote. It is the job of a member of Parliament to seek out the opinions of his constituents and to represent those opinions on the floor of this chamber, and in carrying out my duties here it will be my policy to do that. It will be my duty to find out what my constituents think and desire and to advise you, Mr Speaker, and other hon. members, as to the opinions of the people of Mississauga South. Sometimes their opinions will not agree with my own at which time I shall be paying more attention to their opinions than to my own because, after all, I am their representative—they cannot all come here and speak for themselves; they must depend on me to say for them what is in their minds. It is my job then, to distil and generally organize what is in their minds for them and bring their opinions and needs to the attention of this chamber.

The job of a member of Parliament is a difficult one, sir, but with your help and the help of the other members I shall endeavour to do my best to represent my constituency.

[Translation]

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate my colleagues, the hon. members for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald), on their speeches last week as movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Using the same opportunity, I want to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, as well as your colleague, the Deputy Speaker. Finally, I extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Binks) for the speech he gave this morning.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, in my first speech in this House, to pay homage to my predecessor who sat in this chamber for 16 years. Mr. Gaston Clermont, who sat as member for the ridings of Gatineau and Labelle, built himself a reputation as a parliamentary fighter, an untiring worker, a totally honest man with a true sense of fair play both in the House and in committees. In 1973, he was nicknamed the "beaver of politics". He was respected by all and I wish him well in his new responsibilities.

Prior to being elected to this House, Mr. Speaker, I had often said that I wished to replace him and occupy his position with the same dignity and strength, for the best interests of my riding, of my province and of my country.

I would also like to pay tribute to the late Right Hon. John Diefenbaker whose memory will remain alive in the hearts of all politicians regardless of their party. It was an honour for me to be able to greet him the day I took the oath, and after speaking with him for a few minutes he said to me,

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

• (1750)

[English]

"Good luck, and I can say that with much sincerity." I had much respect for the old fellow, and I was looking forward to being here in this House at the same time as he to hear him speak and to see him point that famous finger of his accusingly at the colleague who had merited his intervention.

For those who might not know where Gatineau is, my riding is right across the river.

[Translation]

I hope to prove to the people of Gatineau, whom I represent and whose concerns are mine, who gave me an overriding majority on May 22, and who trusted me, that they were right to do so.

[English]

I am one of the privileged members of this House because I can reach my home and family in a matter of minutes, unlike most hon. members who will have to settle for a weekend or visit twice a month to see their families and loved ones.

Even though the majority of the population of my riding is concentrated in the town of Gatineau, of the same name, my riding has a large rural area and is a paradise for fish and game. If any hon. members in this House travel that way, I hope they will not hesitate to try their luck in moments of leisure, if they are not too busy and have time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, given the fact that my constituency is near Ottawa, I should like perhaps to talk geography, for the benefit of the new hon. members. It can be identified easily as we have the Gatineau River to the west, the Ottawa River to the south, the town of Thurso to the east, the nice little village of St. Sixte to the northeast which is always very hospitable. To the north is the municipality of Notre-Dame-du-Laus and it, together with the municipalities of Val-des-Bois, Bowman and Notre-Dame-de-la Salette, is a fisherman's and a hunter's paradise. To the northwest is the municipality of Val-des-Monts, which is another fisherman's paradise. By the way, the Ottawa mayor, Mrs. Dewar, honours me with her presence in my constituency—not every weekend as she is too busy to do so—in the Saint-Pierre de Wakefield and Poltimore section where she has a cottage in that part of my constituency.

Mr. Speaker, the main employers in my constituency are the federal government and the pulp and paper and newsprint industries. I am pleased to stress to the House, for those who are not aware of this, that you can find there the largest newsprint machine in the world, and I invite hon. members to go and see it because it is a worth-while experience.

In spite of those two big employers, there is unfortunately too much unemployment. It would be important to encourage tourism more and more in the Lièvre Valley so that it could benefit from Highway 50, half of which is subsidized and paid by federal funds, if the provincial government can at last complete its construction and administer it, of course. Unfortunately the home building industry in the cities of Gatineau, Buckingham, Masson and Thurso is idle. Our tradesmen suffer awfully from that situation. There are but few small and medium enterprises in our region. The industrial park of Gatineau is almost empty. The city council of Gatineau and the Société d'aménagement de l'Outaouais urged the former government many times to consider that region as a designated area, thinking it was the only way to attract industries to the region. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) will take a stand on this matter as soon as possible so that we know whether or not our region will be designated and so that the people concerned within the Société d'aménagement de l'Outaouais and the city council of Gatineau know where they are going.

In that regard, Mr. Speaker, he allegedly stated to a local newspaper that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of State for Economic Development (Mr. de Cotret) has recently met with Mr. Landry, a minister in the Quebec cabinet, and that following that meeting it is possible that the Quebec side of the Ottawa region will be considered as a designated area. Could I ask the ministers who are the colleagues of the hon. senator—I do not know who is responsible for delivering messages to him, because it is not the first nor the last time—to repeat my comments to the senator so that in the first place he would confirm that such a meeting has taken place and such a discussion on the designated area has been held? Second, does the senator intend to discuss with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion the advisability of considering that region as a designated area?

Mr. Speaker, during the election campaign the Conservative candidates pointed out unemployment and inflation in the country, especially in the Outaouais region in Quebec. The Liberal candidates recognized the problem and did not conceal the facts. However, the Conservative candidates stated and promised that they would solve the unemployment problem. Well, Mr. Speaker, the last government set up the Canada Works Program to help eradicate unemployment and it was highly successful and appreciated by the constituents and the communities.

In my constituency for the year 1978-79 Mr. Clermont obtained subsidies of $1,240,000 but for the year 1979-80 that amount was reduced to $501,000, a 50 per cent cut, Mr. Speaker. It is a strange way of providing assistance to the unemployed because in 1979 in my constituency the number of unemployed was unfortunately almost the same as in 1978. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock and resume my speech at eight o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may resume his speech at eight o'clock. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

• (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Cousineau: Mr. Speaker, may I signal the presence of ministers on the other side of the floor? This afternoon they were conspicuous by their absence. Knowing that they are very busy, I can understand that.

Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted this afternoon at six, I was speaking about my riding's problems which are not different from those of the rest of the country. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) has decided to add some more to them by promising massive personnel reductions in the public service that will affect 60,000 employees.

[English]

After the election there was a meeting with the President of the Treasury Board, to which reference was made by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans), on Friday, October 12. At that meeting it was clearly stated that a task force would be created to study the impact of the cutbacks in the civil service. A month passed, two months, now nearly three months, but I still have not heard anything. I even tried to obtain a copy of the minutes of that meeting which were promised. My secretary tried on several occasions, but unfortunately was given the same answer and no copy of the minutes was sent to my office. How is it that no study was made before the decision to cut 60,000 jobs was taken? Supposedly this expert minister did not think there might be such an impact.

[Translation]

To these two questions, Mr. Speaker we did not get an answer. I have not yet received one and the reason is very simple. The minister himself does not know either. Since May 22 the Progressive Conservative government has been much more concerned with setting records. Never in our history has a period of five months elapsed without the Houses being recalled, when they had all the answers during the election campaign. Never have we heard so many contradictory statements by ministers of the Crown. Never in my political career have I heard a minister tell the Canadian people that an election promise does not have to be kept if later on one discovers that it is nonsensical, unrealistic or impossible. Never in the history of this country has a federal government been seen in such a short period of time to lose its authority, its powers as well as its perception of the country as a whole.

Since May 22, Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed irresponsible decisions and statements as in the case of Petro-Canada, the lotteries, the sale of certain Crown corporations, the deduction of mortgage interests, and as if it were not enough, the ministers are now contradicting each other regarding our aid policy of the Third World.

No wonder a young member of this House, and I am not speaking only for myself Mr. Speaker, who sees all this day after day, week after week, is a little bewildered if he expected specific and well defined decisions and policies on the part of the government.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, there was absolutely no reference to national unity in the Speech from the Throne, and no comments whatsoever made of what would happen in case the referendum procedures of the PQ government were unfair to the people of Quebec. There is a situation in which the government will have to think about the unity of this country, and this should not be postponed. The government of Quebec is now thinking of borrowing money from Alberta, money necessary for the expropriation of the Asbestos Corporation.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cousineau: Instead of saying "hear, hear", the hon. member should just listen. The premier of Alberta has declared that Alberta will not dictate to other provincial governments what the loans should be used for. These words worry me, and I appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and to all my colleagues from Alberta to express their concern about this matter, and to attempt to ensure that the government of Alberta make the loan for a specific purpose and not for the discussion of the PQ government to facilitate the vile intention to dismantle and break up this country.

[Translation]

It seems that the Prime Minister will not take part in the referendum campaign and that the Quebec referendum should not be the government's only concern during the year. According to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, the economy and energy matters are equally pressing. I fully agree with the Prime Minister that those matters are equally pressing, but they should not be dissociated; unity and economic matters must be faced together, not separately. If this country's unity were to be broken, there would still be energy; that is not lost, but in what state would the Canadian economy be?

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has the tools at hand, but for how long I do not know; the fact, however, is that the House will have to know one day, not in 1981, what he intends to do to help us, from Quebec, fight against that separatist ideology.

Mr. Speaker, there are in my riding a good many residences for senior citizens built through assistance provided by the former government, but, unfortunately, the number of people on the waiting list who want to reside there is increasing weekly. There is mention of pensions in the throne speech, but the question of old age housing has been omitted. The throne speech mentions the creation of committees to study the needs of the handicapped and the invalid. I congratulate the government for that initiative, but there is no question of a committee to study the needs of senior citizens.

There was a lot of talk about the mortgage interest deduction plan recently. Several of my Liberal colleagues made remarks in that respect which I strongly support. The deduction, I should say this discriminatory deduction, of mortgage interest will cause senior citizens a serious prejudice because most of them do not have a mortgage on their house.

For nearly five months, Mr. Speaker, there has been very negative talk about the National Capital Commission and the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Some ministers are talking these days of abolishing them. At other times, they talk of reducing their roles and, finally, they talk of reducing their staffs. I dare believe, Mr. Speaker, that regardless of the decision made by the government in this matter, the presence of the federal government will continue to be felt on the Quebec side of the Ottawa area.

Over $1 billion was spent by the federal government in the past few years on the Quebec side of the Ottawa area, and this had very favorable and positive effects on my riding. It is my firm intention in this House to keep on working to maintain the presence of the federal government on the Quebec side of the Ottawa area, whatever government is in power in Quebec. Living in a healthy democracy where the majority rules, the majority decides. I have no doubt that this is what my people told me on May 22 and what the people of Hull also told my colleague. The May 22 vote was an order to serve and to make sure the presence of the federal government continues to be felt on the Quebec side of the Ottawa area.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude by inviting the right hon. Prime Minister to take a look at my riding every morning from his residence at 24 Sussex. He will see the fine steeple of the St. François de Sales Church in Pointe-Gatineau, the fine CIP plant as well as the beautiful mountains which form part of the Laurentians. I must ask him to give special attention to a place that has unfortunately, owing to the force of circumstances, become the city dump for the city of Gatineau for a period of four to five years. The government, through the National Capital Commission, should give support to any organization trying to find a use for the place that we call the Kettle Bay and Island problem.

During this Thirty-first parliament, I plan to bring this up in the House, before the population, and in the various committees of which I shall be a member, as often as possible. Various studies have been made and many opinions have been given. I think that the time has come for action. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in the House may think that the problem of Kettle Bay and Kettle Island is a municipal or provincial problem, but for my part, I insist on saying in the House that it is a national problem. This part of my constituency is within the area designated as the national capital region and if Canadians want to be proud of their capital and its region, whether they are English-speaking or French-speaking.

[English]

It does not make a difference to what ethnic group he belongs. All Canadians should be proud of the entire capital region, and not proud only of one side of the Ottawa River where there is a beautiful and tremendous tourist attraction which is Rockcliffe Park and Sussex Drive, while on the other side of the river, as I said in French, there is such a contrast, with such disparity between the two sides of the river, and where a municipal refuse dump has been used in such under out of the ordinary circumstances.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is no short-term solution, but we must come to an agreement and make a collective effort to show to our children and their children that men and women came to Ottawa from throughout Canada to serve their constituencies and their country.

Mr. Speaker, I ask all those people to work even harder with one common thought, that of love for their country, a country represented by a capital and a national capital region of which all Canadians can be proud. Thus, they can show true patriotic feeling.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go over the time allotted to me. I thank you for having allowed me to say these few words and I hope that there will not be too many problems cropping up during the Thirty-first parliament and that you will continue to preside over the debates of the House with the impartiality that we all recognize and admire.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the throne speech debate, as I have done on a number of occasions over the years, but this is the first time I have done so from the government's side. I should like very much to congratulate the mover and the seconder. They have much to offer, as do all new members of this House. I am sure the new members will appreciate the generosity and good will of individual members regardless of their parties. Although parties are necessary in this democratic process, still much can be accomplished on an individual basis, and a lasting understanding of all regions of the country can be shared.

Like you, Mr. Speaker, I am one of the class of '68, as is one of the hon. members from Hamilton who is present, and I should like to congratulate you on your re-election as Speaker. Over the years you have been, in my opinion, a reasonable and impartial Speaker, and you have expedited the business of this House. I think it can safely be said that you have carried out your office with dignity and justice. I wish you the best during this minority Parliament.

The election of May was significant in that it ended, for the moment anyway, an apparent domination by central Canada of the periphery, and now western Canada will have a chance to exert some effort in the executive, instead of indirectly, in attempting to change legislation designed specifically for the central region. In fact, with the enlargement of the House, western Canada has finally come of age and will be enabled to exert on its central neighbours a much greater influence, regardless of which party is in power.

The redistribution carried out in the last Parliament based on the 1971 census, with the enlargement of the House, has largely brought this about. Had the redistribution based on the 1971 census been carried out with no enlargement of the House, with the proposed redistribution of that time, the old order would have held so that for another decade western Canadian representation would have been reduced in relation to other regions.

As one who served on that redistribution committee at the time I should like to pay tribute to one who has since departed but who contributed so much to our political life, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. It was his consistent questioning regarding representation in Saskatchewan that moved the prime minister of that day, now the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), to cause a re-examination of the electoral process and redistribution. I believe the result enhanced the political influence of western Canada markedly, and as well to some extent improved the influence of the eastern provinces and Newfoundland, so that our various regions have now become more important in actual political influence on the executive decisions of this government.

It has been obvious that for over 100 years Canada has been a compromise of the two large provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and when their economic influence was threatened they tended to influence the federal government to take positions that, of course, benefited them but were often inimical to western and eastern regions of Canada. I am hopeful that this Parliament will for a time give a better balance to all regions in the country.

There are many things to speak on in this throne speech debate, but I would like to confine any remarks largely to an area which affects my own constituency as well as the prairie region of Canada. That is the grain industry.

For some time we have had a discussion regarding food policy for Canada, but it is a fact that policies and suggestions have been piecemeal. It is also a fact that we import a great deal of our food from the southern United States and the tropics. This has been offset by the export of cereal grains and oilseeds. With our high standard of living and our high consumption, there are fewer and fewer agricultural products that we can export to other parts of the world efficiently enough to sell to countries which have a lower economic level than our own. At one time we were a significant exporter of beef, pork and apples, but we seem to have lost that position and have not been able to meet the competition from other exporting nations around the world.

The problem of food exports was the subject of a pamphlet issued by the Toronto-Dominion Bank from their department of economic research, and in it they detail something which is known to most farmers. It was suggested that exportable wheat could rise by 50 per cent by 1990. Since wheat exports pay for some 50 per cent of all food that we import, this is highly desirable because, as our population grows, so will our demands for those imported foods we ourselves do not produce. In the pamphlet they point out the importance of the government, the Wheat Board, the railways and the terminals, all of which are necessary for Canada to be a reliable world supplier of grains.

In 1978 Canada's over-all food and agriculture trade surplus was $1.9 billion, but if imports of food and agricultural products continue to grow at the rate they have in the past 12 years, then a trade deficit in this area would appear within five years. This would result in grain and oilseed exports reaching $6 billion by 1990. Yet, for those who give a critical analysis of the industry of grain growing, there are reservations as to whether or not the projection of the increase in grain and oilseed production will occur.

Once the grain is grown the product follows a long and tenuous pathway to the ocean terminals, passing through many hands. It is therefore very susceptible to interruptions by the many different unions and groups who are vital to the movement of this grain. It has been suggested that there are some 30 different unions, any of which could interrupt the flow to the terminals. The grain transportation system has been relatively free of strikes in so far as any single union is concerned, but there have been frequent interruptions. I do not feel that these interruptions have been unduly restrictive, but they have certainly had their effect, on occasion.

There are many problems within the industry which are perhaps not as well understood as they might be. From the producers' point of view there has been a steady drop in the number of grain farmers producing grain and oilseed. This slow attrition will likely continue, causing the production to fall to fewer farming units. A new influence in this circumstance might be the rising cost of energy which is now being felt throughout the world. It is significant that for many decades there has been a stable relationship between the price of oil and the price of wheat.

The American balance of payments problem can be directly related to the fact that the grain exports of that country have not kept pace with the world price of oil. Before 1973 a bushel of wheat paid for a barrel of oil. I make this comparison based on the imperial system and not the metric system, which we are slowly adopting and which is such a bad system for agriculture. At the present time it takes approximately three to four bushels of wheat to pay for one barrel of oil.

Historically the relationship of the export price of wheat to oil has existed for many decades. Until the economy of the world corrects itself and brings the prices closer together, Canada and the United States are in for a bad balance of payments. When the economic forces do correct it, it is obvious that the world price of food will rise dramatically and pose new problems for those countries that import food. At the moment the world price of grain and oilseeds can be described as being at rock bottom.

The price received by Canadian farmers has reflected the low price of grains and oilseeds and, although energy costs have been kept artificially below world prices, the continued low price of wheat and cereal grains has been a definite deterrent to production. The initial price paid by the Wheat Board has not changed for three or four years, except for a slight increase in initial prices announced by the minister in charge of the wheat board. Indeed, the initial price this year was slightly below the price of one year ago. Unless world prices rise, producers will not reach that goal of a 50 per cent increase in grain exports in this coming decade.

As well, there are the increased costs of farm machinery, transportation, fertilizers and fuel, which will have to be offset by a general increase in real return to the farmers before they can reach this increase of 50 per cent. Agriculture has become a very big energy consumer but, I believe, a very efficient user of energy.

The necessity to increase production brings into sharp focus the question of whether the wheat board and the grain commission are pursuing the best policies with regard to increasing the export potential of our grain. We have, up to the present time, attempted to give preference to the export of classes one and two grade wheat, hard spring and high protein wheat. This is the result of a deliberate effort on the part of the wheat board over the past two years in order to get the most dollars for our farmers. Unfortunately it has left in limbo a number of grain producers, particularly in the northern parts of the prairies and my own region, the parkland region.

The introduction of this new grading system has tended to force the parkland grown wheat into the number three grades and lower. The Wheat Board has not been able to move this number three wheat and equivalent quantities of barley. Indeed, many producers of number three wheat and barley have merely sold the minimum quotas, and there is certainly no way in which a viable grain operation can be carried on with the sale of quantities such as that.

Indeed, barley grown in 1977 which is now moving into the system will not have its final payment made until 1981, almost four years after the growing of the grain. Small wonder then, that having to wait four years for payment of the grain to the producer, with our high inflation rate, does not make for a prosperous grain producing industry. If we are to have a large increase in volume of wheat exports, consideration will have to be given to the growing of lower protein wheats and whether, this is in our best interests or not. I do not believe that the grain growing area where the high protein wheats can be grown is large enough to bring the needed increases, at least without sacrificing other crops, and then there is always the problem of tillage in a low rainfall area.

The Wheat Board and the grain commission will have to tackle this problem and decide whether to continue with the high quality Marquis type wheat or do as the Americans have, who increased their exports by some 70 per cent in the last six years by producing a low protein wheat. Apparently many countries buy this for milling.

Much has been said about grain rates and transportation of grain. Protected by statutory rates, the grain has moved to ocean ports at modest charges compared to the equivalent American rates. Although the railways have complained bitterly about their losses on this grain movement, it seems that at least until 1973 returns to the railways were reasonable. They were reasonable because although the railways' wage structure was rising, their efficiency was increasing. Since 1973 the railways have claimed a marked deterioration in their position, as the Snavely report indicates. To increase the statutory rates this time, while meeting the railways objectives, would impose on the producer a price differential that would be too great for him to support. As well, there is real evidence that higher rates on grain necessarily has the railways moving it. For instance, in North Dakota, railway rates of 56 cents per bushel have not produced an entirely satisfactory movement of grain nor have they kept the railways in the position of keeping up their lines to modern standard. It seems significant that trucking costs as quoted for U.S. grain, are close to what the rail costs are, and it does seem to me that trucking will enter into grain transportation more in the future. While everyone would concede that a properly optimum loaded grain train, such as a unit train, with the proper locomotive power, is a very efficient way of moving grain as opposed to truck transportation, still, in small amounts and in shorter distances, trucks would seem to have their place. They lend themselves to versatility, to individual ownership, and give a great deal more flexibility.

I believe that this individual ownership would do much to enhance our transportation system. I think we should look at the fact that the railways are also in the trucking business although, generally speaking, I do not believe it is good to have such large monopolies as the railways also being able to control their trucks. It seems to me that we could improve facilities for unloading and transporting grain by truck, particularly for those grains that are not under quota or where quotas are of lesser importance in relationship to volume. We have high quality grains with high unit potential being trucked out of Manitoba as far south as Minneapolis thus reducing the strain on our existing transportation system.

I would like to reiterate my support for Churchill as the export port for the northeastern prairies. While in the short run an immediate reduction in the movement of grain out of Churchill might give some more slight movement in the south, it would discriminate against the northern areas of the eastern prairies. But these areas are already the farthest from Thunder Bay or Vancouver and so are already disadvantaged. It is widely said, and it has not been refuted, that at the present price, wheat brings some 40 cents a bushel more and barley 25 cents more when shipped out of Churchill, as opposed to the St. Lawrence Seaway. Under the pooling system, of course, all producers share in this benefit, but the producer whose grain goes via Churchill has to wait almost a year to deliver his grain even at the earliest. This, of course, is because the shipping season is over before the grain harvest is ready to be sent to Churchill.

The Wheat Board should make some effort, I think, to see if they could not reward producers who must wait this long time for delivery of their grains for Churchill shipment, and must hold back some grain for this purpose. It seems to me that they should be rewarded in some manner, and I would bring this to the attention of the minister in charge of the wheat board.

The value of Churchill has always been that it acted as a brake for excessive demands of interests in the lake system and St. Lawrence Seaway. We have experienced the four-month long strike of grain loaders in Montreal who, incidentally, are likely to make more income than the grain producers themselves. For all the people who handle the grain the wage structure is based on the prevailing rates of our internal economy. But the producer of grain does not get an automatic index in the world market. He has to take what the markets of the world pay him. His final payment for his product is the world price less what is involved in the handling and transportation of the grain. At the moment, world prices are such that the producer is finding his returns squeezed by the cost of moving grain from his farm to the world market.

I close with the thought that the typical permit holder with something like 600 acres, who is a good producer and gets a good crop, will be lucky to gross $35,000 to $40,000 from the sale of his crops. Many of the people handling this product from the time it leaves the farm until it gets on the boat for overseas, will make almost as much. We have to ask ourselves how we can expect production of grains to increase in the next decade, and what our future pattern will be.

Our domestic wages are high, but we must increase the amount of grain available to export in the 1980s if we are to keep the balance of payments in food at their present level. Indeed, I believe it is doubtful if we can do that by the end of the next decade. The grain industry is probably facing as severe problems as any food industry in the world. It means that the historic relationship between oil and wheat must be restored if grain farmers are to become prosperous and make their contribution to the economy of Canada as they have done in the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

● (2040)

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the twelfth time in this chamber to take part in a throne speech debate. I wish to thank the good people of Bellechasse for their ever renewed support which enables me to sit in this House for a fourth term. I wish to welcome the entire population of the provincial riding of l'Islet who for the first time, due to the redistribution of the electoral map, took part in the election of May 22 last as electors of Bellechasse. In effect, those people became full-fledged citizens of the electoral riding of Bellechasse. I thank them as well as my organizers who worked hard to help me cross the "Red Sea".

Mr. Speaker, let me assure every citizen from this new part of my riding that they can count on my fullest dedication to defend their personal interests as well as the interests of the South Shore which has never been recognized in the past, and I ask the new government to take good notice of the fact that this region called the South Shore does exist, is located in the province of Quebec, and the riding of Bellechasse forms a part of it. I wish there would be more justice in the distribution of funds from taxes paid by Canadian taxpayers. Of course I regret that the parishes of Beaumont, St. Charles and St. Anselme, which have always supported me, have been cut off from my riding.

I thank all those people for their great co-operation. If we consider the great honour of being elected, of being one of those 282 members who form this House, and the fact that the population of Canada is now near 24 million, it is plainly obvious that from that honour flow responsibilities as well as duties that we must fulfil objectively and in the interest of our country, if we are going to prove without failure that our democratic system really means something. Indeed a democracy is a government of the people, by the people and for the people. Being convinced of those basic truths, I tried hard to live the parliamentary life I like very much.

Following the example of other members, I would like to congratulate His Excellency the Governor General who has presided with humility and dignity over the opening of the first session of the Thirty-first parliament. I would like also, through you, Mr. Speaker, to send His Excellency and his charming wife my best wishes for good health and success in their mission that is to favour harmony in all the country.

At the election of May 22, no political party succeeded in having enough members elected to form a majority government. Therefore, all parties in this House are minority groups and for the first time in the history of the Canadian parliament, a member from the official opposition has been unanimously chosen Speaker of this House. The coming into this parliament of a third and even a fourth group is not new. Indeed, when we read history, we see that in 1921 there was a minority group. If I had time I would relate the history of that group. Maybe some day we shall have the opportunity and the obligation to go over past decisions which would help us reflect seriously on the problem that has been facing this House recently, as well as on civil liberties enunciated in the Bill of Rights so that those rights and liberties may continue to form the basis of our democratic system.

I understand that it is not an easy task to be Speaker of the House. After all, this role is assigned to a human being who can, obviously, make mistakes. Errare humanum est, it is true and will always be. To err is human. I wish to emphasize that in his acceptance speech he reminded us that according to the custom an hon. member proposed as Speaker accepts that obligation only under protest. This is why Mr. Speaker, as he was led by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), showed some reluctance and we saw the left foot of the former Prime Minister now Leader of the Opposition get close to his rear end—this is what we call to give a kick in the pants. There are other words for it, but it is always at the same place!

Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote the remarks of Mr. Speaker:

> I say that so that my reluctance in coming to the Chair will be understood, and I have no illusions that on many days during the course of this Parliament that would be a fate which would seem quite acceptable as far as most members of the House of Commons are concerned; and in fact, on some days there will be some who will be glad to take a hand at the axe.

The image with which he recalled the tradition of the use of the axe makes me shiver when I think that it might be pointed towards one or two members of the House. I want to extend my congratulations to Mr. Speaker on his appointment and I want to assure him of my collaboration; saying that I mean working together in the spirit of parliamentary tradition and with respect for our democratic system. On this matter, I think we should all study the history of our parliament, the history of traditions in the life of British parliamentarian to help us carry out our duties in a better way under possibly difficult circumstances.

Also I would like to extend a cordial welcome to the member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) who sits in this House for the first time as a member and as leader of a national political party, namely, the Social Credit Party of Canada, whose existence has been entrenched for many years in the Canada Elections Act. The member for Beauce has been a member of the Quebec National Assembly for many years where he demonstrated exceptional abilities as a parliamentarian. He devoted himself to the interests of all people, and more specifically of those who could not speak up for their rights and claims. Now that through the will of his electors he works at the national level, I have no doubt that he will discharge his duties with dignity and firmness, and that my colleagues in the House will recognize not only that this democratic system of ours accepts diversity as well as equality of rights and privileges within our Parliament, and that they are also willing to live up to them in practice because, whether we like it or not, we will have to get used to parliamentary life in which several political groups live side by side, as is the case in several European countries.

Mr. Speaker, our democratic parliamentary system demands that the political group with the greatest number of elected members is called upon to form the government, and therefore to constitute the executive whose duty it is to implement the laws passed by Parliament. I congratulate the Prime Minister on having acceded to that office. I wish him good health and all the energy he will need to fulfil those duties efficiently for the greater good of Canada. I also wish fortitude to all the hon. members who have been called upon to become members of the cabinet, and wish them every success in their mission, especially the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) who always had a supply of excellent formulas when he sat in the opposition.

Amongst other things, I remember that when the Bank of Canada increased its rates, the present Minister of finance had rather embarrassing questions to put to his predecessor. Today, the roles are reversed: the former minister of finance now puts questions to the present minister about similar situations. The situation has really not changed that much. I do hope the new government will be able to tackle those problems and give this country the best possible administration. This being a minority government, I have no intention of causing it any useless trouble. On the contrary, I am quite aware of my responsibilities and am willing to co-operate in giving our country the best possible administration.

There were times when I was sitting on the other side of the House and supported government measure, and some of my Progressive Conservative friends would say that "the Social Crediters are voting red". On the other hand, whenever we supported a motion introduced by our NDP friends, some people would shout, "Same old gang! The Social Crediters have turned socialists or vice versa!" These are some of the inconsequential remarks hon. members will make; in any event, however, when the hour of decision comes, I am sure there will be no need to call upon the conscience of any of them: they will assume their responsibilities.

This being said, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the government has a difficult mission to carry out, and I feel more than ever that no contemporary problem of today will be solved through traditional means. We shall have to turn aside from the beaten track. We shall have to innovate. We shall have to cease looking tailside at so-called "new" solutions which proved inadequate when first considered headside. No matter the effort we shall put into it, a pike will remain a pike and a pickerel a pickerel, no matter how you show it to the customer.

Mr. Speaker, a little after the election I had a message published in a newspaper to thank my constituents for the confidence they had put in me. In that message, I said, "Unless the government make deep changes in the way of financing the public sector and bring forward amendments to the Bank of Canada Act, the plagues of inflation and unemployment will continue to ruin our economy and our society". And I am convinced of that today more than ever.

I was sorry to note that the Speech from the Throne shows no intention from the government to set new ways of financing the public sector. It means that on such matter the new government will act just like the former government did. One should not forget, however, that the same causes produce the same effects. Therefore, Canada will still have budget deficits of $10 billion or $11 billion as was the case in recent years; the national debt will continue to increase and absorb a high proportion of government revenue which now comes from taxes, and that will prevent the government from getting the necessary funds for the undertaking of public works which would create jobs for thousands of unemployed people and at the same time realize useful projects requested by the public for a long time.

The Speech from the Throne contains practically nothing regarding the lowering of voluntary retirement age to 60, yet this would be a valid solution to the problem of unemployment among the young and would allow our country to use this vast reservoir of human potential to increase the gross national product, thus reducing our trade deficit, and it would also be a means of preventing delinquency among the young.

The throne speech is also practically devoid of anything on the establishment of a guaranteed minimum annual income, yet the federal government has spent considerable sums of money on studies of all kinds on this subject. When will we go ahead with it? I do not want to press the government too much, but since it has many studies on the subject, which we paid for, I want to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) to consider seriously the possibility of introducing before Parliament legislation to implement this policy which will help in the administration of the country, namely as regards unemployment insurance, but also in the area of social welfare.

I am nonetheless happy to see the intentions of the government regarding parliamentary reform which it wants to introduce in Parliament, as well as its proposed legislation on the rights of Parliament and of the public to information. We shall certainly support the measure when the moment comes if it is really positive and if it really aims at getting to the bottom of the problem.

I would like to talk about many other things, but time is short and I do not want to impose on the House. However, I am convinced that all our colleagues in the House, and even the members of the press and the Canadian people are interested in knowing what will be our position this evening concerning the amendment proposed to the main motion. We have wanted to act responsibly and we have reserved our decision before announcing here in the House and justifying it to prevent speculation throughout Canada. I want to be very clear, Mr. Speaker. The amendment on which we are asked to vote represents a false problem at this time. In my opinion, in its present form, as a question concerning Petro-Canada, the motion is unjustified. It is imbued with petty politics and partisanship. We are asked to defeat a government which has just come into power and which has inherited all sorts of business, financial and economic failures. Mr. Speaker, we believe that we must seek the common good and go beyond such manoeuvres. In summary, the vote is on one question: do we want general elections or not? Do the people want them?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): It is easy to shout yes, but it is the people who must answer. Do the people want two months of electoral campaign? We have just come out of an election campaign and of five months of waiting for Parliament to be convened so that we may study seriously the problems and the administration of our country. Do the people want expenditures of $50 million and several months of uncertainty? It is a known fact that minority governments are generally the best for our country. We had the proof of this when the Trudeau government held a minority and when for many months this administration was to the liking of the people and every bill introduced in the House received serious consideration. We were able to do in-depth studies. The population wants responsible people. They do not want us to play tricks on them. They made a democratic decision and we must live with the results.

Let us look now at Petro-Canada, a corporation constituted by a vote of this House. The House made that decision. I will say very carefully, Mr. Speaker, that when the government makes a policy statement, we will take a stand on this issue. Meanwhile, it is a waste of time. Let us rather move to the most urgent matters: unemployment, inflation, deficits, instead of putting things off by studying the wrong solutions. In due course we will be able to voice our position on precise projects. I hope that this government will be able to present us with specific projects. We will put them under scrutiny and we will pass judgment on them at that time. And rest assured that we will voice it as strongly as we are usually known to do. But these traditional non-confidence motions are a formality stemming from the British system of Parliament. It is quite normal to present motions of non-confidence. It is within our parliamentary tradition, but that does not entail that the whole opposition must necessarily support them. At a given time last week, for instance, a sub-amendment moved by the New Democratic Party was rejected by the official opposition group which thereby supported the government.

The same goes for our party. So, tonight there will be a vote and we will see the result. Everyone is going to vote according to his conscience and responsibilities. It is indeed interesting, Mr. Speaker, to note tonight the absence in the House of several members of the official opposition. Of course they still have time to make it. It is not up to me to say when our colleagues should or should not be in the House. But I am merely making an observation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, those very people who would be interested in supporting the motion are not in the House at the moment. Let us stop showing off. We must stop showing off. If they really wanted to defeat the government they only had to support the motion introduced by the New Democratic Party last week.

So, Mr. Speaker, let us deal with the urgent matters. I want to make something clear. We are a political group determined to take our responsibilities, and on votes that are brought before the House we will consider first the substance of the matter. Our concern is not to support the Progressive Conservative party or the Liberal party but the public good. Our vote on the amendment to the motion on the Speech from the Throne is not a partisan vote in the same spirit that has guided our attitudes in the past. So, we do not have to make a choice between the two political formations—Liberals or Progressive Conservatives—as we have our own political formation. And as I said at the beginning of my remarks, we are going to have to get used to living with different political groups in this House, understanding one another and having a procedure that will enable us always to be in a position so as never to bog down the business of the House, that will enable every member to voice his opinion and will enable at the same time the executive to carry out the will of Parliament in running the business of the country. And if the government makes a slip-up and persists in going against the will of Parliament, then we will have the responsibility of taking the necessary means to let it know it is going against the wish of the people.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think everyone understood and we for all those reasons are going to vote tonight, not for the government or against the opposition, but against the amendment that is brought forward until we know what the policy of the government is on this whole energy issue. I hope it will be courageous enough to state its policy when the time comes and then it will be judged according to its performance. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Roy (Laval): May I ask the hon. member a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. member. It has nothing to do with their next vote but I think, Mr. Speaker, that such information should be provided to the Canadian people. Each time a member of the Social Credit Party of Canada rises in the House, Mr. Speaker, he always refers to the possible or eventual recognition of the party because they have a certain number of electors. I would like to ask the hon. member whether the choice—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question would he please ask the question?

Mr. Roy (Laval): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the hon. member, I say quite sincerely that he is a true federalist, but I would like to ask him whether the member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) was chosen as the leader of their party as a result of a vote at a national convention or by a certain number of members in—-

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): The remarks and the question do not relate to the debate. I will recognize the hon. member for St. Boniface.

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Bockstael (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like in the first place to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) for their speeches as mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Also, I wish to congratulate the Speaker of the House of Commons, the worthy member for Subdury, (Mr. Jerome) although he is not in the House at this moment and the Deputy Speaker, our colleague the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel). I pay tribute to their reputation and acknowledged ability to fulfil their duties fairly and efficiently. To the constituents of St. Boniface who elected me to this House, I express my appreciation for their trust, committed as I am to serving them to the best of my abilities.

It is indeed an honour and a privilege to represent the historical constituency of St. Boniface. St. Boniface, east of the Red River, is the southeastern district of Winnipeg, made up of the twin cities or communities of St. Boniface and St. Vital to their municipal limits.

Following the redistribution which took effect for the 1979 election, the constituency of St. Boniface lost the community of Transcona in the northeast, and the majority of its farm territories in the south and in the east of the constituency which are now in the riding of Provencher. In the area we fondly call the old St. Boniface, Bishop Provencher established the first church in the west, where we find the basilica, St. Boniface general hospital, which was founded by the Grey Nuns, the University College, as well as a concentration of our most important social and cultural institutions. The winter festival of Manitoba, the "Voyageur" Festival, takes place in St. Boniface.

St. Boniface is recognized as the cradle of French civilization in western Canada and it remains the rallying point of French-speaking people. This gives the impression that the constituency of St. Boniface should have a French majority. However the population of that constituency can be divided roughly as follows: 40 per cent have British ancestors, 27 per cent French ancestors and the remaining 33 per cent represent native and ethnic groups, namely, Ukrainians, German, Dutch, Belgian, Polish and Scandinavians, as well as a scattering of citizens from all over the world. Thus St. Boniface is a Canada in miniature; it is multicultural and multilinguistic. After that brief comment on my beautiful constituency of St. Boniface, I should like to comment on the throne speech and its import which, according to me, leaves much to be desired.

As a member of the official opposition policy committee structure I have undertaken some particular responsibilities. Coming, as I do, from the prairies, I have a special interest in the health and vitality of the western grains economy. This sector of industry is crucial to the prairies and is a key, positive aspect of our national economy as well. That is why I am pleased to be serving on both our agriculture and our transport caucus committees.

I must say that I was dismayed that the Speech from the Throne did not contain a specific proposal of policy directed to the advancement of agricultural production in our nation.

As I begin, I want to extend congratulations to the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), who is also the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Admittedly, he has a tough job to do, so in the interests of the west, particularly farmers, and in the interests of all of Canada, we wish him well in his assignment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: We expect to have much good advice to offer him along the way. So far I believe he has generally been on the right track in the steps he has taken. I can say that quite confidently, since the announcements from the minister to date, namely, about the Prince Rupert terminal and about more hopper cars and the repair of boxcars, are a continuation or an extension of a policy initiative already put in place for the new minister by his predecessor.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: He is following the pattern established, confirming that the pattern was a good one. Indeed, I hear that the new minister now says there really was not very much wrong with the western grain transport policy ideas of his Liberal predecessor, even though he vehemently criticized the former minister prior to May 22. It is my understanding that the new minister is most likely to pursue virtually the same policies as those pursued by the former minister except, and I hope the public recognizes the fact, that these policies will now be sold or marketed more effectively across the west by a flock of backbenchers out there who previously could only express criticism for same.

What has happened to our grain transportation system since Parliament last met in March? Newspaper reports around Christmas time indicated that the start-up problems affecting grain movements in the 1978-79 crop year had been overcome, so farmers could expect a shipping performance close to the record set in the previous year. I remember the mood of optiminism which emanated from that much publicized meeting in Winnipeg early last February when the premiers and key federal representatives looked forward to a reasonably good level of grain movement by the end of the crop year on July 31.

In the latter part of February some statistics reported in Hansard showed that our grain-moving performance to that date at Vancouver was 13 per cent ahead of the previous year, and that at Thunder Bay it was 6 per cent ahead in terms of cars being unloaded. I ask, if this was the case at Christmas-time and through February, what happened from March through to the present time to put us so far behind for 1978-79 and, to date, for the 1979-80 crop year?

An hon. Member: The weather, I suppose?

Mr. Bockstael: If things looked so good in the spring, what transpired to cause a shortfall of one million to two million tonnes compared with our exports a year earlier? Why are there almost as many ships waiting at Vancouver and along the St. Lawrence as there were during the most difficult periods the previous government had to face?

Let us look at the more serious political point. Why do we not hear anyone among the Conservatives complaining about this situation any more? How their practices change when the shoe is on the other foot! It is an outright display of a double standard.

For the immediate future, to the middle 1980s, the major challenge for the grains industry will be to produce and move ever-increasing volumes of grain just to maintain our share of the world market. Since the demand for grain in the world is likely to grow by some 30 million tonnes per year, Canada, according to the expectations of the Canadian Wheat Board, might anticipate a 50 per cent increase in our level of exports by 1985.

Farmers will want to take advantage of this opportunity through advanced methods of tillage, through the use of fertilizer and chemicals and less summer fallow. Once farmers and prairie producers have done their job, we need a grain handling system to move grain efficiently to world markets. In 1977-78, for example, when the system took in a record volume of grain deliveries, in excess of one billion bushels, a corresponding record export of 830 million bushels stretched and strained our facilities to the limit.

To meet the challenge of exporting over one billion bushels annually the Liberal government initiated the purchase of 8,000 grain hopper cars, and it is encouraging that the new government is continuing to modernize the grain fleet. The previous Liberal government undertook extensive boxcar repair programs, and the new government is following that lead. The previous administration, through its prairie branch line rebuilding program, was committed to upgrade western rail lines to modern hopper car standards.

Liberal action to boost grain-handling capacity included an improved quota system, the block shipping system, the Mants report on grain car allocation, the appointment of port co-ordinators for Thunder Bay and Vancouver, reciprocal railway routing agreements, incentives for line upgrading through the Rockies, the groundwork for a terminal at Prince Rupert, expansion of terminal space at Vancouver, and improvements at and on the way to Churchill.

It was disconcerting to note that rather than pursue that latter policy, the spokesman for the task force on grain transportation, made up entirely of Conservative members, declared that the port of Churchill was a luxury we could not afford. As a member from Manitoba, I was appalled that an experienced Conservative member of Parliament and a fellow Manitoban, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) who complained that he was passed over for a cabinet post, could express such a damaging opinion on the welfare of his constituency province.

Could it be that he was only following his own leader's example? The Liberal members of Parliament from Manitoba, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) and myself—

An hon. Member: That's it, pal.

Mr. Bockstael: —will fight to make sure Churchill receives the wherewithal to attain future record-breaking results. The Tory caucus have their task force's report. It is time they revealed their ready answers which seemed so obvious to them a few months ago.

• (2120)

We intend to be far more constructive than they ever were when they sat on this side of the House and made it incredibly difficult to pass into law such beneficial measures as the two-price system for wheat and the western grain stabilization plan, both of which stand to the everlasting credit of the previous government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: Grain is likely to be one of Canada's greatest growth industries of the 1980's. Already there is hardly a more positive element in our balance of trade picture. Grain is crucial to the west, and vital for the national economy of the country. The future for grain is bright, if we get the added production, about which I am confident, and if we get the added capacity to move it. This is where the new government's responsibility lies.

Western farmers, Canadian producers, small business operators, are concerned about fuel and energy costs and about their heating costs. They are wary of sleight-of-hand proposals advanced by this government to put a little money in one pocket of the people who have a mortgage, while at the same time picking the rest of their pockets for twice as much to operate their vehicles, their implements and their machinery, and to heat their homes and their buildings. These people must realize that this government's headlong race toward world prices for oil and gas will primarily serve to make the rich province of Alberta, the oil companies, and many speculator financiers so much wealthier. As is stated in the words of a song, "the rich get richer and the poor get poorer," ever widening the class disparities, while this government spouts pious phrases advocating the nation of Canada as a brotherhood of communities.

The people of Manitoba are concerned with the great exodus of doctors, architects, engineers and many other professionals who have found themselves obliged to move from Manitoba to seek out an opportunity to earn a decent living in a more favourable environment.

The citizens of St. Boniface are industrious and hard working, employed in the multiple and varied industries that are located in this constituency which is also the work place and residential domain of the owners of many small businesses. Recently workers from my area were adversely affected by the announced closing down of the Swift Canadian Co. Ltd. Meat

Packers in St. Boniface where 600 hundred or more jobs are being eliminated in favour of more modern facilities elsewhere. Other branch plants of industries located in Winnipeg are also announcing their intended closings. This will further tarnish the employment picture. In most cases these people seem to be the victims of policies embraced by a provincial Conservative government. They have reason to fear that this federal Conservative government might not only emulate but surpass their provincial counterparts in stifling the whole of Canada. The electors in my constituency are fearful of joint federal-provincial cutbacks in the area of health and social services.

In conclusion, I want to repeat my earlier inference that the Speech from the Throne was more significant in what it left unsaid than in what, in fact, it stated.

We in the opposition share the concerns of Canadians working in industries related to the Department of Agriculture, such as livestock raising, poultry raising, dairy farming, cheese production, production of diversified specialty crops, and other food production industries. It is noteworthy that the new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) had nothing to add in favour of these tremendously important industries in what can be termed a rather short Speech from the Throne. That is further tangible proof that this government is only prepared to continue, sustain, implement and expand the policies initiated by the Liberals. The attitude of the government members must reinforce the opinion which the people of Manitoba hold of them. Throughout the general election the people in my area were amused at the Conservative slogan "Let's Get Canada Working Again".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bockstael: Consider that in England, although she had to deal with far greater numbers, the right honourable Margaret Thatcher convened Westminster in less than two weeks after the election. In Canada, it took 140 days for the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) to reconvene Parliament. This long delay logically raised everyone's expectations. One of the famous quotes of the Right Honourable Sir Winston Churchill, in reference to the Battle of Britain in 1940, was, "Never in the field of human conflict was so much owed by so many to so few." I am sure the great gentleman will forgive me for altering it and applying it to our situation today after hearing an extremely shallow throne speech by saying "Never in the Parliament of Canada have so many waited so long for so little."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, let me congratulate you, as everyone else has done, on your election as Speaker, but, what is more important on this occasion is my wish to pay a special tribute to the democracy and freedom of our great nation of Canada and to commend our Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the government on the Speech from the Throne, particularly as it relates to new opportunities to restore the House of Commons, so that it may become an even greater arena of freedom and opportunity for members of Parliament.

As a child of the Second World War I remember attempts, on Remembrance Day, to teach me the value of freedom and democracy. As an adult I remember trying to teach my students in school about freedom and democracy. I felt at that time that I had some measure of understanding of the meaning of freedom and democracy. Having returned just recently from southeast Asia, I appreciate this great land and great democracy even more.

Recently, in Vietnam, after a long conversation over a dinner in Ho-Chi Minh Ville, my elderly Communist host said to me, "I was born in war and have lived my whole life in war—will I live to know peace?" I responded that if any of us are to know peace in the world, we must first start by knowing truth. He then asked, "Ah, but what is truth?" This in turn led to further definitions and a philosophic interchange, but my conclusion following my trip is that the question "Ah, but what is truth?" is that this is truly the dilemma of southeast Asia and it is one of the prime reasons that I travelled there.

• (2130)

Later in a discussion with a group of Vietnamese intellectuals I posed the question, "Are you free? Do you know freedom?" Again following a long exchange a Vietnamese woman with a doctorate from Harvard said, "But, Mr. Wenman, how do you define freedom?" I responded, "I see freedom as the absence of coercion", and she responded, "Yes, but that is only one part of freedom that perhaps comes following freedom of security of food, shelter, and provision for health and education."

I might well have added that freedom of security of food, shelter, and provision for health and education is an extremely limited freedom without the absence of coercion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. It being 9.30 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Section (4) of Standing Order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the amendment now before the House. Accordingly, the question is on the amendment of the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Call in the members.

DIVORCE

CALL FOR COMMITTEE STUDY ON QUESTION OF ENFORCING MAINTENANCE PAYMENTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): In view of the reports from the Law Reform Commission that as many as 75 per cent of divorced spouses are unable to enforce a maintenance order made by the courts, and in view of the fact that there are at present no reliable statistics covering the number of defaults in payments under maintenance orders in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin):

That this House order its Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to undertake an immediate review of the problem of enforcing maintenance payments ordered under the Divorce Act, to review the history of defaults and to consider the advisability of instituting public means of enforcement.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL AGREEMENT BE REACHED WITH PROVINCES ON TEACHING OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion concerning an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that the federal-provincial agreements supporting the teaching of official languages ended on March 31 last; considering that the federal government has morally and financially supported the provinces in their endeavour to teach the official languages by giving them additional funds; and considering that the provinces badly need those additional funds to maintain some programs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert):

That the House state its complete support of the Secretary of State in his negotiations with the provinces to sign multilateral agreements on the teaching of official languages and that failing the unanimous approval of the provinces about accounting procedures and public disclosure of those accounts, the Secretary of State give the reasons to this House and make a public statement indicating the government's position on that very important program.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the unemployment rate is high in the main areas of our country, that there is every indication that it will get higher within the next few months, and that inflation eats away at the people's purchasing power, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy):

That the House urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take forthwith all necessary steps to introduce legislation calling for the establishment of a guaranteed annual income of universal application and without discrimination, with a view to ensuring the economic safety of all Canadians generally.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

REQUEST THAT EMERGENCY DEBATE BE HELD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact, first, that the Foothills Pipe Line application for an overland oil route will not now be heard by the National Energy Board and, second, that the Secretary of the Interior in the United States, Cecil Andrus, has given support to the northern tier route, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell):

That an emergency debate be held on this matter in the House of Common; that the government immediately send a strong diplomatic protest to the United States stating unequivocally our opposition to tanker traffic which will endanger the Canadian west coast.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENTAL RATES FOR MARRIED QUARTERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the government's decision to increase accommodation rental rates of married quarters for DND personnel across Canada on November 1, in some provinces by as much as 50 per cent to 75 per cent, in view of the fact that this will widen the gap between take-home pay of personnel in Atlantic Canada compared to that received by personnel in provinces which have lower taxes and rent control boards, forcing personnel to ask for transfers to the provinces in which they receive more take-home pay, and in view of the fact that the pay increase scheduled for this month is being reviewed and may now be phased-in over a period of time, I move, seconded by the hon. member from Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae):

That the government cancel this cruel and unwarranted rent increase to DND personnel and assure the armed forces that the pay increase announced by the previous government will be honoured in this month's cheques.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION INCREASING PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Armand Caouette (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion concerning an important and urgent matter.

In view of the precarious position of our veterans, who defended this country with great courage, like the Socreds did yesterday by preventing an expenditure of $50 million for a general election, and in view of the fact that a great number of them have no other income outside their pension and are living in poverty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House direct the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce in the House a bill to amend the existing Veterans Act and to increase the pension in order to ensure a decent and human level of income for those who defended our country and our values.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the hon. member's motion. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity concerning the importance of marine and rail services to eastern Canada.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen):

That the government take action to correct the eroding rail services in eastern Nova Scotia and CN Marine facilities in eastern Canada and put a freeze on all reductions on facilities and employment until the completion of such action.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

LAND CLAIMS NEGOTIATIONS WITH YUKON INDIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Foothills Pipe Lines stated that the slow pace of negotiation with the Yukon Indians is a reason for their withdrawing their application, in view of the fact the American government has imposed a deadline for us to settle this question, and in view of the fact that the new federal government cancelled negotiating meetings with the Yukon Indians in September and again in October, and again attempted to delay and stall negotiations for the rest of this year, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar):

That the government stop stalling on land claim negotiations and immediately commence intensive and high-level negotiations with the Council of Yukon Indians.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONSULTATIVE PROCESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The failure of the former government to discuss with representatives of public employees changes in legislation affecting the public service has damaged labour-management relations and demoralized some public servants. Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House request the President of the Treasury Board to consider establishing a process whereby public service representatives will be consulted on legislative changes affecting public employees and their employment.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINES

WITHDRAWAL OF APPLICATION BY FOOTHILLS OIL PIPE LINES LTD.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the news that Foothills did withdraw their application from in front of the National Energy Board is obviously shared with concern by both parties on this side of the House.

My question would be to the Prime Minister. We heard just last Thursday that his government had sent an aide memoire to the United States, supporting Foothills. Yesterday, we heard that Foothills had withdrawn its application. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us when his government sent this aide memoire and what contacts were made with Foothills during the course of the summer to establish the government's interest in this major project, which would mean many jobs for Canadians, and which would also clear us of the danger of tanker routes off the west coast.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have at hand the date of the aide memoire that was sent to the United States. I can get that and report to the House. I can also have prepared for the Leader of the Opposition a detailed list of the contacts that were made by ministers of the Crown and representatives of Foothills. That might be easier to table, rather than try to respond orally in the House. I will get back with the detailed information as soon as I can.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it has to be very detailed. I am interested in a date. I want to know since the five months after the election whether there has been dithering, or action, by the government. The Prime Minister will know that last spring our government advised the President of the United States—and we made a public statement to that effect—that we wanted Foothills to be given preference and we supported that route. Now we hear that they are withdrawing in favour of a competitor.

Really, the detailed meetings are not important. It is the dates and the question of whether the meetings were recent and, particularly, whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources met with his counterpart in the United States or with the Secretary of the Interior of the United States who is obviously favouring the northern tier route. That route will not only create jobs for Americans over Canadians, but will cause increased tanker traffic which is a concern to Canadians.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, if the question of the Leader of the Opposition is whether there was dithering, the answer is no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think that is a matter of judgment. The country will be able to say whether it is yes or no when we hear the dates. The Prime Minister does not even seem to be aware of this question. Perhaps he should ask the Minister of the Environment, who dealt with it on Thursday but gave us no date.

Mr. Clark: To repeat my undertaking in response to the first question of the Leader of the Opposition, as soon as I have those dates—and I can, perhaps, have them sent to me in the course of the question period—I will communicate that to the House of Commons. He is speaking, I gather, of the date of the aide memoire. I will get that for him.

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Clark: Now I am told by someone else that there are other dates. That is what I indicated in my earlier response. What I will try to do is provide the House of Commons, the Leader of the Opposition and his various spokesmen on the other side an indication of the various contacts that were made by representatives of this government with Foothills or with the United States in relation to this proposal.

I will also try to have, perhaps before the end of this question period, the date of the aide memoire sent by this government to the government of the United States.

PROPOSED OIL TANKER ROUTE ON WEST COAST—EFFECT ON ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, and it is also on the Foothills subject. Last Friday, the Minister of the Environment said publicly that a proposed oil tanker route off the British Columbia coast has some merit in it.

Did this backtracking on the government's previous position, which opposed oil tankers down the coast of B.C., indicate a change of policy, or was it just a coincidence that the statement was made last Friday and the proposal was withdrawn yesterday?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): It certainly indicated no change of policy, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I am trying to deal seriously with the question, which I think was posed seriously. There was no relation between the statement made by the Minister of the Environment on Friday and a decision announced later about which he did not know on Friday.

I should take this opportunity to tell the House that, in light of the decision by Foothills, which we regret, the government will be reassessing the communication that we should be making to the United States. It is our intention to send, at the earliest possible time, another communication to the United States on the question of the pipeline route.

An hon. Member: Send Stanfield.

Mr. Phillips: The Minister of the Environment was also quoted as saying that there are more than just environmental considerations to take into account on this question. Can the Prime Minister tell us what non-environmental considerations worked against the all-Canadian Foothills proposal which, as the Prime Minister knows, was primarily sponsored by Westcoast Transmission Co. Ltd., of which the largest shareholder is PetroCan, and involved a construction project primarily in Canada with no tankers?

• (1120)

Mr. Clark: It is my understanding that the representatives of Foothills indicated a series of reasons for reaching the decision they did with regard to their application.

Mr. Phillips: My question did not really refer to the reasons for which the Foothills people withdrew; it had to do with the statement by the Minister of the Environment about "non-environmental considerations" which, apparently, did not favour an all-Canadian route. Can the Prime Minister tell us what non-environmental considerations worked against an all-Canadian route?

Mr. Clark: Well, Mr. Speaker, it is well known to the House that there were concerns, for example, on the part of the Council of the Yukon Indians and there was concern in the United States about which would be the more viable route from the point of view of the economic delivery of energy. A wide range of considerations was taken into account. Naturally, we were concerned mainly, as we remain concerned, about the environmental implications of any sort to Canada, particularly tanker traffic along the west coast.

PETRO-CANADA

STATEMENT OF PREMIER DAVIS ON POSSIBLE DISMANTLING OF CORPORATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Premier of Ontario, Canada's largest oil-consuming province, expressed the view that it would be folly to break up Petro-Canada for the reason it is good business sense for Petro-Canada to have a profit-making component to help finance the unprofitable part.

In the light of that serious statement by Premier Davis, added to those of other important people on the subject, will the Prime Minister assure the House that he will accept this principle of integrating the profitable with the non-profitable when the government reaches its conclusion on the task force report introduced to the House yesterday?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): The government and the people of Canada have received a very valuable and imaginative proposal from the task force on Petro-Canada. The government will be considering that proposal very seriously and we hope to be able to make an announcement of our response as quickly as possible.

Mr. Broadbent: I am not asking the Prime Minister for a detailed response, because I understand it will presumably take at least a few days for the government to reach a decision on the recommendations. I am asking the right hon. gentleman, however, to indicate to the House a basic principle in approaching his conclusions.

Does he agree that a large, integrated, Canadian-owned firm with a profitable and non-profitable aspect has to be maintained on the ground that it is good business to use the profits of part of the firm to finance the non-profitable part?

Mr. Clark: I can certainly assure the Leader of the NDP that among the factors which will guide our decision in responding to the task force on Petro-Canada will be to arrive at a conclusion which will make good business sense.

Mr. Broadbent: Well, Mr. Speaker, the way this government has performed so far, that would be a contradiction in terms. Considering that the government seems to be moving willy-nilly toward the break-up of Petro-Canada on the basis of some doctrinaire predisposition against public enterprise, will the Prime Minister acknowledge that by breaking up Petro-Canada we shall be left with two smaller firms in an industry dominated by multinationals?

• (1125)

In that context, will the Prime Minister tell us what he is going to do about the assertion yesterday of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that, even as the law exists today, his government is powerless to intervene in the supply and price practices of the multinationals?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there were two questions. Let me deal with the second first. We are reviewing the powers of the Government of Canada in relation to being able to respond to some of the problems cited yesterday by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He was speaking of legislation inherited from the former government, and we are going to take a look at that legislation and see if there are ways by which we can make it more effective in dealing with problems which are now becoming familiar to this House of Commons.

In relation to Petro-Canada generally, we are very much attracted by the proposal put forward by the task force which would allow individual citizens to participate directly in a significant Canadian oil company with the capacity to operate in a very major way here and perhaps beyond here. We are very much attracted by that idea.

We are going to take a very serious look at all of the implications of the task force report, and hope to be able to indicate the formal response of the government to that report at the earliest possible date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PURCHASE OF OIL FROM MEXICO

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. In January of this year the previous minister of energy, mines and resources made an agreement with the Mexican government whereby we would purchase $5 billion to $6 billion worth of Mexican future oil production for an equivalent amount of Canadian goods and services. This deal was initialled, I believe, in early May.

Has the expected visit of the President of Mexico in September to sign this agreement been postponed, or has the deal fallen through?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can answer, in October, that the visit for September has been postponed. It will be rescheduled, I believe, for May of 1980.

Mr. McRae: Mr. Speaker, can we assume that we have not been outmanoeuvred by the Japanese? Can we assume that the deal is still on? Why do we have to wait until next May or June for this particular meeting and signature?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will make what assumptions he wishes, and then they will bear their usual relation to reality.

The visit of the President of Mexico was postponed until May because that is the first opportunity which he will have to be able to come to Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of Privy Council. In view of the tabling yesterday of the D'Avignon committee report, can the minister inform the House of both the procedure and the timeframe for coming to decisions about that, the Lambert commission report, and so on, and reference to a parliamentary committee and/or legislation, if any? Can he give us an indication of procedure, process and particularly the time in which legislation or other policy decisions might reach Parliament?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question, I indicated yesterday and am pleased to indicate to the House that the D'Avignon report will be going to the cabinet committee of the public service chaired by the Prime Minister, where it will be considered along with the implications for the public service and the Lambert report.

With respect to the question of time-frame, I hope there will be sufficient time allowed for consultations with the public service unions involved and public servants generally who are involved in the course of that consideration. I will be in touch with the public service unions directly to invite them to comment with respect to that report. It is difficult to say how long that consultation will take, but given the importance of the subject, I want it to be complete. I have no objections at all to considering the involvement of Parliament in any draft legislation which might be required or the results of the considerations of the cabinet committee.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, can the minister not be a little more precise? I fully agree with the idea that there has to be full consultation with the representatives of the public service employees, but can the minister not give us a little more precision as to the time-frame in which decisions will be made and presented to this House?

● (1130)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I would like to be able to do that in terms of a specific date. I think it would be unfair and perhaps unrealistic to do that. I hope the hon. member will accept my assurances that we will be doing it as quickly as we can having regard to the importance of the subject not only to the Government of Canada but to the public servants who serve the people of Canada.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, in view of that comment, or answer, and in view of certain press reports that there might be legislation next spring or next fall, I ask the minister if he is really satisfied with the rather leisurely pace of progress toward decision, in face of the fact that the public servants of Canada, not only here in Ottawa but in communities all across the country, have now hanging over their heads profound changes proposed by the D'Avignon committee, profound change proposals in the Lambert commission report, a 60,000 cut in the federal public service, rumoured changes in the federal public service pension act, with even hints of retroactivity, and rumours of changes in the collective bargaining process. Is there not more urgency to get all this resolved so our public service can settle down and go to work?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I see no difficulty with the public service settling down and going to work. As a matter of fact, despite implications to the contrary from the hon. member, I think the Public Service of Canada is doing a relatively good job for the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Given the importance of the subject to the public service and to the government, and given the real importance of the consultative process which the former government denied the public service when it brought in Bills C-22 and C-28, I do not want to repeat the mistakes of the former government.

[Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).]

RECOMMENDATIONS TO IMPROVE THE LOT OF WOMEN, INDIGENOUS GROUPS AND THE HANDICAPPED

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): I, too, should like to refer to the D'Avignon report, Mr. Speaker. I would like to address my question to the President of the Treasury Board who, I am sure, is well aware of the degree of confusion and anxiety that his remarks have created among public servants, particularly among the women in the public service who are very concerned about the lack of opportunity that his statements seem to make even worse.

Can the minister, unlike his predecessor who has just spoken of the lack of urgency, assure the House that the recommendations contained in this report for the betterment of women, indigenous groups and the handicapped, will be pursued with vigour and with a great deal of urgency?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, I would indicate that I read chapter 7 of the D'Avignon report yesterday with great interest and I thought many of the observations contained therein were pertinent. As you know, there were about 50 recommendations. But I would assure the hon. member that the actual proportion of women in the public service has risen this year from December 31, 1978, when there were 34.4 per cent, to 34.7 per cent today.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I am really appalled at the insensitivity just displayed by the President of the Treasury Board. I can assure him that it is no great comfort to the women of Canada to know that more of them are doing menial jobs in the public service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: My question to the President of the Treasury Board is, what is he going to do about these very positive recommendations contained in the D'Avignon report in order to afford more opportunity and much more security to the women in the public service?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, I would indicate, as I mentioned previously, that I have read the chapter to which she has referred and I thought it contained some pertinent observations. As my colleague, the President of the Privy Council, has indicated, we will bring in suitable legislation in due course to reflect not only some of the recommendations in the report to which she referred but also some of the recommendations in the Lambert report.

IMMIGRATION

CALL FOR RESCINDING OF NEW REGULATIONS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Last Thursday, the minister tabled regulations in the House tightening the general criteria for immigrants coming to Canada. In his press release, he gave as one of the reasons the increased inflow of boat people as refugees.

I want to ask the minister if he realizes the resentment that this decision causes to other groups wanting to bring their families into Canada. Will he rescind the regulations, bearing in mind in particular that the Joint Senate-House Committee on Immigration unanimously recommended that refugees not normally be included in the general immigration levels?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member opposite for his first question in his new job. I should tell him, also—and I am sure he is well aware of it—that the ten-point penalty is merely reinstating a rule that was imposed by the previous government. That rule was in effect until the spring of this year, when that rule was suddenly taken off mid-way through the election campaign, the policy reasons for which have never been clearly explained to me.

That ten-point penalty, as the hon. member well knows, is a flexibility device to permit the government to meet its preannounced target for immigration levels, which in 1979 was 100,000 as established by the previous government. The special movements dealing with refugees by which Canada hopes to take up to 50,000 by 1980 are in addition to the particular target of 100,000.

I want to assure the hon. member opposite that the Indo-Chinese refugee program is in addition and will not mean a cutback in any way of other immigrants allowed into Canada in the normal way.

Mr. Kaplan: The press release which the minister tabled last week states very clearly that the larger number of refugees was one of the considerations for introducing these tougher criteria. I want to ask him whether he has consulted the provinces, and did they approve of this retrograde step which he took last Thursday?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: There are ongoing consultations with the provinces, most particularly consultations having to do with the report that I will table in the House on November 1 establishing the level for 1980. Quite obviously, the provinces' concern about employment opportunities have been made known to me and they will appear evident in the report filed on November 1. The hon. member will have full opportunity to see the implications of the ten-point penalty which has been reimposed, a policy of the previous government, so we can meet the particular target both for 1979 and, as he will see, for 1980.

REQUEST MINISTER ALLOW POLISH SAILORS TO REMAIN IN CANADA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Given the plight of six Polish sailors who jumped ship in Newfoundland in the hope of escaping from an oppressive regime in their native country, and the fact that a deportation order returning them to Poland, and probably to jail sentences and other forms of harassment is imminent, is the minister prepared at this time to issue a ministerial permit which will allow these men to remain in Canada?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member opposite for his first question in the House and, of course, I refer to the fact that we have had discussions on this very delicate situation. The six individuals who deserted the various Polish fishing trawlers have had a degree of due process already. I should indicate that they have been before the special refugee committee and were turned down. They have had, of course, an opportunity to go to the Immigration Appeal Board.

Right now I have ordered that no further action be taken pending my personal review of each individual's situation. This review includes searching for a third country which might be willing to take these unfortunate individuals caught in the present circumstances.

THE ENVIRONMENT

POLLUTION BY ACID RAIN—MEASURES TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Given the evidence reported yesterday on the damage that has already occurred to the North American lakes and future damage, as well as the resulting economic impact that will occur on our agriculture and forest industries if the acid precipitation problem is not brought under control immediately, what extraordinary measures has the minister recommended to his cabinet, to Environment Canada and to his American counterpart?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the question. As the House knows, the provinces and the federal government agreed in June to strike a committee to attack the acid rain problem, and in July a joint communique was issued by the government of the U.S. and the Government of Canada indicating their desire to co-operate.

● (1140)

On October 8, I returned from Washington with agreement by my counterpart of the Environmental Protection Agency, Mr. Costle, that joint action on both sides of the border was the only way in which the problem would be solved. On September 25, the first full meeting of the provincial-federal committee was held. Two working groups have now been established, one on control strategies and one on the scientific program.

Yesterday, the House had the release of the report which, while we had some indication of what was in it, we were waiting for. The problem is extremely serious. Of course, the problem is understood to be serious by the government and by my department. That is why we have called it the most serious environmental problem Canada has ever faced.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, it is all very good for the minister to give us a rundown through his speech of what has been talked about. What we need now is action. I specifically address my supplementary question to the same minister. What instructions has he or his department given Inco, which is the largest single producer of sulphuric acid in acid rain fallout in all of North America? Because this is an interprovincial and international problem, the government cannot hide behind the Ontario provincial department of the environment.

What specific instructions has the minister given to Inco and other, similar industries to cut back drastically on their emissions so that we will then be in a bargaining position equal to that of the United States, equal to their much more stringent standards, when it comes to hammering out the pure air or clean air treaty?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose of the provincial-federal discussions now taking place, and the control and scientific strategies being worked out, is to enable us to know exactly where and in what place the most stringent controls must be placed.

The hon. member has mentioned one particular emission source which is a very serious problem in Canada and it is a known source in the United States, but that is not the only source; there are many of them. Now we are working together to identify the sources and to define a control strategy which will work. We are not moving unilaterally against any single, particular emission source.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DECLASSIFICATION OF TASCHEREAU PAPERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs with reference to the so-called Taschereau papers on national security which were due to be released several years ago, but which were seized by the then prime minister's office and subsequently, on the orders of Michael Pitfield, were sealed for a further ten years in the National Archives.

Is the government reviewing this decision? Is there a possibility that these papers will be made available to Parliament and to the Canadian people?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am having what I hope to be a pretty intensive investigation into the whole question of the authority, the statutory jurisdiction or even the legality of actions taken which prevent public access to those papers now in the hands of the National Archives after what I understand to be the statutory period of 30 years.

EMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY AS TO DATE GOVERNMENT WILL PUBLICIZE CURRENT PROGRAM

Hon. Francis Fox (Blainville-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, because one of the top priorities in the Speech from the Throne is job creation; because of the slowdown in the American economy and its effects on our own; because of the successive increases in interest rates, I should like to ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) whether he is aware of the urgency of the situation, and whether he can tell the House exactly when he intends to reveal to Parliament and the Canadian public his employment strategy for the current year?

[English]

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his first question in his new job.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Atkey: The details of the government's employment strategy were referred to in the Speech from the Throne. The employment tax credit plan will be expanded; training opportunities for Canadians will be expanded.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Atkey: There will be an opportunity for a national youth service corps. Most of the details of these programs will be announced in the budget since they may involve budgetary matters; so they will be announced at the time of the budget.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for congratulating me on my first question. I wish I was in a position to congratulate him on his first answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: I wonder whether the minister, in preparing his employment strategy, has had economic studies made in his department on the impact on the job market of successive increases in the rate of interest, and whether, in keeping with the Prime Minister's stated intention of making all pertinent data available to the Canadian public, he would be willing to table this economic impact study, if it exists, in the House of Commons at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, we are looking at all economic data, including interest rates. Also, we are looking at the current rate of unemployment, which is at the lowest level in three years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PUBLIC WORKS

FUTURE OF HARBOURFRONT, TORONTO

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the great success of Harbourfront in Toronto, the fact that the project was visited by 1.3 million Torontonians in the past 12 months, and that the minister is responsible for whether Harbourfront continues, I should like to ask him if he could give some indication of whether the project is being scrapped. Certainly, we have heard rumours that part of it is being sold or leased on long-term leases. Could the minister inform the House what is actually taking place?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member would never ask.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I can assure the hon. member and the House that there is no intention to scrap Harbourfront. There are ongoing discussions with the directorate to work out arrangements to regularize the previous operations of the commission.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Public Works tell us whether it is true that a major part of Harbourfront is being let on a long-term lease to private interests, following the guidelines of this government of privatizing public projects?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am awaiting now recommendations by the board of Harbourfront.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

DREE COMMITMENT RESPECTING SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Last April, there was a commitment made by DREE of a $50 million expenditure for the Sydney Steel Corporation; $32.5 million to be allocated initially, followed by $17.5 million upon completion. This was confirmed by the Prime Minister during the campaign, that he would agree to this.

Last Friday, the minister and the Premier of Nova Scotia announced—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Hogan: I am putting it now, Mr. Speaker. The minister announced last Friday that approximately $7.2 million would be given. What happened to the pledge of $50 million? The steelworkers in Sydney are wondering.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the member opposite will know, because of his interest and knowledge in Sysco, that considerable moneys in the past which were allocated were not managed or used too wisely. Expensive equipment was bought which remained for months in crates.

At this particular point in time, several million dollars have been made available for the rehabilitation and renovation of Sysco. The board of directors has been strengthened, new management is there. In the future we will be guided in fulfilling these commitments by the management and by those most affected to provide aid as needed and which can be usefully implemented.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the commitment still stands. Specifically, I want to ask in my supplementary question whether some of the money which was announced to be spent will be spent on the submerged injection process technology in the open part of the Sydney Steel Corporation. That was tried before and failed.

Therefore, I would ask the minister, though the matter is primarily of provincial jurisdiction, if he would guarantee to the House that Stelco, which has already turned down this technology, would oversee and evaluate this process, if it is to be introduced into the Sydney Steel plant, so that we do not have the continuous, useless expenditures of the past to which the minister has referred, and that that plant will be put into a viable position.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, that is a very perceptive question. I cannot tell the hon. member the answer now, but I will undertake to do that.

Most of the funds which have been allocated to date will be used to improve the open hearth furnaces and to rehabilitate the plant, as I have said. I will undertake to inform the House and the hon. member exactly what fate, if any, awaits the SIP process that has been tried before.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENTAL RATES FOR MARRIED QUARTERS

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister had an opportunity to review the substantial rent hikes scheduled for November 1 for married quarters of DND personnel across the country, and if he has had an opportunity to review those hikes, what action will he be taking?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I had a short opportunity to review the hikes yesterday. The rent increases vary depending on the location. I must say that the location of Gander is the worst of those which I saw in my review. I have asked my seatmate, the minister responsible for the CMHC, to review Gander particularly, and he has promised to do that.

I might say that the rent increases are due on November 1. The pay raise will be effective on October 1, and I have issued instructions that there be no increases in rent until after the pay raise is in the pockets of the servicemen.

Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister of National Defence for his review of the Gander situation. Could the minister tell the House, with regard to the pay increases for DND personnel, whether or not the personnel will receive the total pay increase which they thought they would be getting, or is that pay increase going to be phased in?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what pay raise the personnel thought that they would get. The matter is under discussion between Treasury Board and my officials at the official level right now. The President of the Treasury Board and I have had a few words on the matter, and I think that any differences which we have will be straightened out in the next few days. I hope to be able to make the announcement as to the amount of the pay raise within a couple of weeks.

I do not intend to phase in the pay raises. They will become effective October 1, although I am not quite certain when we will get the raise into the serviceman's pocket.

Mr. Lefebvre: You had better watch Sinc, though.

AGRICULTURE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON CHICKEN IMPORTS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency has been set up and negotiations are being held with the United States government on the amount of imports which will be allowed into Canada, and due to the fact that there is a tremendous surplus of chickens in the United States which is having the effect of forcing the price of chickens in Canada down below the cost of production, could the minister tell the House how those negotiations are proceeding and when the Canadian chicken producers can expect some relief?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. Because of the hon. member's experience in the poultry industry over the years, he will appreciate the fact that this is not a new problem: this problem has been with us since 1974. There was some delay, of course, before the proclamation of the national agency, which was proclaimed on December 27.

I can assure the hon. member that after assuming the office of Minister of Agriculture on June 4, we encouraged the national agency to move forward and to resolve all its problems. Prior to the national agency receiving its certification from the council, we were communicating with our counterpart in Washington so that we would not lose any time. We have had one round of negotiations in Washington, and the second round was in Ottawa. I hope to be able to make an announcement on that level within ten days.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

CO-ORDINATION OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, whom I wish to congratulate for his many congratulations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. de Corneille: How can the government justify its rigid departmental envelope spending policy, which has both immigration and employment programs in the same envelope and which will use an estimated $117 million to process Vietnamese refugees, which comes under emergency needs, while having ostensibly to take away from the same envelope funds for employment programs for Canadians this winter and spring? Does this not already prove that the rigid envelope system for departments does not work?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, very, very simply, they are different envelopes. Immigration is in the social affairs envelope, and employment programs are in the economic development envelope.

Mr. Andras: And never the twain shall meet!

Mr. Atkey: I can tell the hon. member, and in fact I will give him some degree of assurance, that there is not going to be a severe cutback in any way whatsoever on either item. They are too important.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAS REACHED DECISION ON SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport and ask him whether he would kindly advise the House of the progress achieved in the negotiations on the transfer of the Nordair shares to the groups that are interested in taking it over. We know that several groups have made offers. Is the minister now in a position, or will he be in the near future, to tell the House and the Canadian people what group will benefit from its decision?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct; there have been a number of proposals submitted. I indicated to all interested parties that I wanted to receive their latest update by last weekend. Transport Canada officials and I are currently reviewing the various proposals and I hope that I will be in a position to make a recommendation to cabinet within the next 30 to 40 days.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. It has been said there may be a new group. Three groups have already been identified; they themselves have said they were interested in buying Nordair, but according to rumors in recent days it seems that a new group we have not yet heard of has, in fact, filed an offer to buy with the minister. Is it true that a new group, as yet non-identified, intends to be the buyer, and who are they?

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the so-called unidentified or identified group to which the hon. member refers is, or is not, in the proposals which we have received. We have a number of proposals before us and we did attempt to give all interested parties the opportunity to present their proposals and to modify the previous proposals which they originally submitted.

Since we have eagerly desired to bring this matter to a head, we did attempt to contact all those who had expressed an interest in sufficient time to have their proposals in our hands by the end of last week. I am certainly prepared to look at those proposals with every degree of earnestness. My officials are currently doing just that.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT RECOMMENDATIONS TO PROVINCES ON PRICES OF OIL AND GAS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the government's intention to allow the public more information, and the government's intention to increase the role of Parliament, could the minister tell the House what price he is recommending to the provinces in his latest discussions with them as to the prices that will be implemented on oil and gas?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can only tell the hon. member that in the course of the negotiations with the provinces a number of options with respect to pricing, and the regime, were discussed. These discussions with the provinces have been carried on in earnest.

● (1200)

The hon. member will understand that there has been a lot of speculation. There would be no purpose served in giving all the various options that have been discussed with the provinces. We are working to meet a deadline for an early consensus with respect to this matter, and I hope we can come to an agreement. We will work as hard as possible to meet that objective.

Mr. MacLellan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's answer, I should like to ask him if the House can be privy to these conversations with the provinces in the very near future.

Will the minister tell the House as soon as possible what price he is recommending to the provinces, and the point of view of the provinces with regard to that price?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, once the consultation has taken place, the House will know immediately.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE PROSECUTION UNDER COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—ROLE OF TRANSPORT MINISTER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On Friday, the minister confirmed that a meeting had taken place that morning which involved himself, the Minister of Transport and the Attorney General of Canada to discuss the possible prosecution of two tariff bureaux under the Combines Investigation Act.

Will the minister explain, first of all, why the Minister of Transport was involved in this meeting and, second, the nature of the representations made by the Minister of Transport at that meeting to discuss possible prosecution?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, quite gladly. First of all, this was one of a series of meetings that take place quite frequently in regard to various prosecutions recommended by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the Minister of Justice. To my mind, these briefings obviously have to include the relevant ministers in respect of the operating departments. For instance, we have a recommendation now that certain activities take place in regard to the petroleum industry.

I conceived, as part of the ongoing consultation within government, that I should bring the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources up to date on these matters. It is an information-giving type of meeting. In regard to the trucking industry in the west, the same situation applies; this was an information-giving briefing to the Minister of Transport, but no representations were received from the minister at that time. Indeed, I believe this was the first time the minister had been to that type of meeting.

As far as the status of the recommended prosecution is concerned, the matter is now in the hands of the proper minister, the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the right hon. Prime Minister, who is well aware of the very sensitive constitutional role of the Attorney General of Canada in considering possible criminal prosecutions.

Will the right hon. the Prime Minister outline to the House what action he intends to take, in view of the statement made by his colleague that there has been ministerial involvement in discussions of possible prosecution? Will the right hon. Prime Minister also confirm to the House that there will be no further such involvement, particularly by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in discussing possible charges of price-fixing by oil companies under the Combines Investigation Act?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I properly interpret the question put by the hon. member, he is asking that I guarantee that before the government takes action, ministers who might have a particular interest in an action that would be taken should not be consulted. Naturally, I am not going to give that kind of guarantee.

PRIVILEGE

MISS NICHOLSON—ANSWER OF MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the answer given to my question yesterday by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

In that reply, the minister stated that regulations had been made under the Hazardous Products Act concerning cellulose insulation. When I checked with his office later, I was told that the orders were passed on Friday but the information will not be published in The Canada Gazette until October 24. This means that the information is still not in the public domain. I am sure that the minister did not mean to imply that it was in the public domain, when it was not. Perhaps he would be willing to clarify that by making a statement.

The second part of my question of privilege concerns my discovery that the minister issued a press release on Friday. Yesterday afternoon, after two or three telephone calls, my staff succeeded getting a copy of it. I trust that the minister can reassure the House that in the future, on matters that are so very much in the public interest, he will not bypass the House but will ensure that members of Parliament as well as the press are informed of his intentions.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): If that is a question of privilege, I will be glad to respond, Mr. Speaker. First of all, it was fairly widely reported in the press on Friday that orders in council had been passed earlier in the week. The hon. member waited until Monday to ask me a question which I assumed, in her position as critic, she already knew the answer to.

Certainly, if all hon. members wish to receive the many press releases that emanate from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that can be arranged and it might be useful, although I know a lot of them go into my wastepaper basket. We are trying to control some of the paperwork, but if the hon. member wishes to have them, she shall; although I think she is already on the distribution list for that type of material. If that is not the case, I will see that her name is added to it.

MR. FLIS—ANSWER OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The constituents of Parkdale-High Park and I have been very offended by false information given to the House by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey). He said that the six sailors who want to remain in Canada cannot because they are exploring asylum with third countries.

The minister knows very well that the third countries have turned this request down because the minister would not give the third countries the guarantee that these sailors could return to Canada. Furthermore, the minister told me in person that he is waiting for word from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald), who is not paying attention this morning. I have a letter from the Department of External Affairs stating that this is a matter for the Department of Immigration.

Would the Prime Minister please clarify, for his ministers, which ministry will be handling refugee problems, and would the minister please give us an accurate answer as to whether he will—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize, I am sure, that he is raising a disagreement and a matter of debate with the answer of the minister and is seeking, frankly, to extend the question period, a temptation to which all hon. members would be delighted to succumb, but which is a luxury we cannot afford.

POINT OF ORDER

PRIME MINISTER—DATE OF AIDE MEMOIRE ON NORTHERN PIPELINE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am in a position, now, to respond to the question put today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), if that would be agreeable.

The government responded to the President of the United States in a formal statement of our position on September 28. There had been ongoing discussions during the summer with the United States government and Foothills, during which we indicated our support for Foothills and our opposition to the effects of tanker traffic.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, was the date of the aide memoire September 28? Perhaps I could reserve for a further question period supplementary questions on this, such as the nature of the ongoing discussions.

Mr. Clark: For clarification, Mr. Speaker, that was the date of the aide memoire.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BLACKBURN—ANSWER OF MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This relates to a question, but I will not put another question during this question of privilege. My question of privilege relates to the question I asked today with respect to the acid rain fallout in Ontario, the United States and Quebec, and specifically to a report drawn up by a team of American and Canadian scientists.

● (1210)

My question of privilege relates to a piece of paper that I have here entitled "Bulletin". It comes from Environment Canada. The headline is "John Fraser to comment on the acid rain report". I feel that the minister, particularly when dealing with a matter of such urgent and pressing importance as the acid rain fallout, should not be making a statement to the press first on this matter of acid rain, and specifically this report released yesterday afternoon but that, rather, he should be making a statement on motions or a statement directly in this House to hon. members so that the critics on this side of the House may respond, instead of manipulating the media to do so.

I might also add that it was his party which was so critical of the Liberal administration for doing exactly the same thing, that is, running to the press first and answering questions in the House afterwards.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am not exactly certain if that was a question of privilege. I am prepared to tell this House and the hon. member that I am prepared to make a statement on motions concerning this particular matter on Thursday, which will give members opposite a chance to respond. That is a commitment I give to the House at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Just to keep the record straight, since the hon. minister has made reference to it, the practice of making statements is a practice which is within the authority of the minister to choose whether to do so here or not. While the House may express a preference and raise the point as a grievance, the matter does not constitute either a question of privilege or even, for that matter, a point of order.

MR. FLIS—ANSWER OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) has made an allegation that I have placed false information before this House. I would ask him to retract that allegation, and clarify for the record, if it requires clarification, so that he might consider a withdrawal of such an allegation.

As I have advised the hon. member, just as I have advised the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism (Mr. Paproski), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), and the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan), who have also made representations in this case, that I have deferred action on the case of the six Polish ship-jumpers pending a further review by me personally of their situation. Part of that responsibility which is mine is to investigate the possibility of third countries to which those persons might safely go, as other persons in similar situations have done.

I hope that clarifies the record, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw his allegation of false information.

Mr. Speaker: The House will realize that I have set aside the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis). However, I wish to advise him that he was on unsafe ground in attempting to extend the question period to pursue a matter which was essentially one of disagreement.

I did not go on to point out that, while he did not say that the minister has deliberately misled the House, he did use the words "false information." The hon. member will come to realize that that is a very dangerous accusation to make and he almost turned what was a non-procedural point into a question of privilege by the minister.

I would take it that further study of the matter might benefit the hon. member, so that in future he will be more careful in his choice of language.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to correct what may have been a possible misunderstanding in answering the question raised by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker), who unfortunately is not in the House.

He asked if we were planning to bring in an increase in pay for the armed forces in stages; I believe those were his words. It did not register with me that what we are planning to do might be considered as introducing a pay raise in stages. However, what we are planning to do this year is to change the basis of the pay year and the annual pay increase. This will now be effective from the end of March, so that the pay raise will coincide with the fiscal year instead of a year that begins October 1 each time.

This is being done in no way to save money for the Treasury Board or anything of that nature. I hope this will clarify the situation beyond any doubt.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, October 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, last month, in a discussion with a group of Vietnamese intellectuals in Ho Chi Minh ville, Vietnam, I posed the question, "Are you free; do you know freedom?" A Vietnamese woman who holds a doctorate degree from Harvard asked, "But, Mr. Wenman, how do you define freedom?" I told her that freedom, to me, is the absence of coercion. She responded by saying, "Yes, but that is only one part of freedom that perhaps comes from freedom of security of food, shelter and provision of health and education."

Following a long conversation at dinner in Ho Chi Minh ville, my elderly communist host said, "I was born in war and have lived my whole life in war. Will I ever know peace?" With this simple question and the earlier remark of the Vietnamese scholar, the dilemma that is Southeast Asia was aptly portrayed. Ironically, the search for peace and economic security has only led to more war, more starvation and some of the most inhuman brutality ever known to man.

The Soviet Union establishes spheres of influence in Vietnam, Kampuchea, and Laos to assure their own security against the threat of China. China establishes spheres of influence in Kampuchea to assure their own security against the threat of the Soviet Union. The U.S. seventh fleet cruises offshore to provide security for a "proper" international balance of power among these three major world powers—all, of course, in the name of international peace and security.

Vietnam, after a series of border disputes and living as neighbouring witness to the slaughter of two million out of six million people in Kampuchea, invades Kampuchea with the lofty motive of liberation but, even more important to them, to establish a sphere of influence to assure their own security against an historically-perceived and real threat from China. Malaysia fights communists in southern Thailand to assist Thailand but, even more important, to protect its own northern border and maintain internal security. Thailand tries to display an image of even-handed diplomacy, again in the name of international peace and security.

• (1220)

It is all a very curious display of multilevel conflict of nations and cultures making war on each other in order to maintain their security against each other. It is easy to condemn in Southeast Asia. Condemnation is indeed appropriate as we see victim after victim flee or fall in the face of man's inhumanity to man, as individual rights are trampled under the heavy boots of inhuman military machines. It was easy for all of us in this House, through television, to watch and sit and condemn Malaysia for pushing those boats laden with the victims of this repression back into the ocean, watching the boats tip over and the people drown. We condemned Malaysia for that.

It was easy in the case of Thailand, after they received over 100,000 refugees and took 43,000 men, women and children and pushed them back across the border into Cambodia or Kampuchea. They pushed them back across the border and the world press and world politicians knew that those 43,000 starved to death in the jungle along that border. We watched that and we condemned Thailand for pushing those 43,000 back into the jungle.

It is so easy to feign pious, self-righteous indignation when we see this human tragedy. Really, who is more guilty, the country which received, in the case of Malaysia and Thailand, hundreds of thousands of refugees and finally said no, or the rest of the governments of the world, including ourselves, who in fact said, "No, we will not accept refugees from the Third World." We only said the same as Malaysia and Thailand.

Before we proceed with this self-righteous indignation, let us recognize that a group of people is in the middle of the ocean in a no-man's land, with no way back and no way forward: they then become a responsibility of the entire world. That responsibility is to be shared. That sharing, while late, was seen in the Geneva Conference on Refugees, where Canada along with other parts of the world agreed to take 50,000 people. This condemnation that we make of other nations and other human beings—and we must make it when we see man's inhumanity to man—must be followed with understanding and action, action that must be humane, fair and corrective.

Three weeks ago I talked with walking skeletons called refugees fleeing from Kampuchea. They told me how severe monsoon conditions destroyed the crops, how starving people were dying all along the roadside as they walked by, or maybe I should say crawled by in some cases because of the deprivation. Certainly, it was a fine noble and humane gesture that Canada should accept some of these victims of starvation, war, racism and genocide. However, unless we recognize that these refugees are but the symptoms of a more complex, more deeply-rooted problem, the 350,000 refugees now in camps in Southeast Asia will grow into millions.

Canada's acceptance of 50,000 refugees is, by any standards, a generous gesture toward humanity. It is, as well, of considerable assistance in relieving social pressure on our ASEAN friends. But unless Canada and the rest of the world want to face the pressure of new waves of refugees, the problem—that is, the cause of the refugee exodus—must be understood and treated with as much vigour and concern as the refugee flight itself is being treated in the world, because the refugee flight is not the problem but the symptom. The problem is economic, political and social instability of the entire region, perhaps at this time with particular reference to Kampuchea.

On the economic side, which must be looked at first, basic needs for food and water must be satisfied. Vietnam is experiencing considerable food shortages, with an estimated three million-ton shortfall this year in spite of good prospects for a satisfactory harvest expected in the next few weeks. Vietnam is unlikely to get by without experiencing considerable difficulties that you and I cannot imagine. The Vietnamese ration for food for their people is 13 kilograms of rice per month per family, and one pound of meat per month per family. Certainly, they will suffer. There are shortages. However, it appears they will make it through to the crop end without a substantial degree of starvation.

Kampuchea has suffered severe genocide under Pol Pot, with estimates, as I mentioned before, of up to one-third of the population bludgeoned or hacked to death under the auspices of the Pol Pot regime. Last year, severe weather conditions badly damaged crops. The sparse crop that resulted was largely destroyed in the January offensive which saw Vietnamese and Heng Samrin forces and the Pol Pot forces pillage the land in war. This series of events led to massive starvation, and it is estimated that while we sit here today 2½ million people in Kampuchea are starving to death.

I have no way of explaining to this House or the Canadian people the feeling when you meet a father in a camp who is holding his starving son and he tells you his story. He said that the crop was poor, "We saved what rice we could until the next crop. We put it in two piles, one pile for eating and the other pile to plant. Soon the first pile was consumed. I looked at the little bit of rice left for planting. I said, 'What shall I do; plant the rice and watch it grow while my family starves to death, eat it or take it and flee for the border where we hear there may be an opportunity for some form of food?' "

What do you say to that father? In Canada I hear so many expressions of greed amongst our wealth. How can you describe the look on that father's face as he holds the skeleton of his son? There is no way to do it. But I tell you it is real; it is true; it is the tragedy of 1979 and 1980. It is a tragedy to which everyone in this House has an obligation to respond.

I was very disappointed when I put my simple motion asking for just a small amount, just encouragement and assistance to the NGO, not to give more food because there is an adequate resource available, but just to assist in the delivery of that food. I am sorry to say that this House of Commons turned down that motion. I have to believe it is not because they have less humanity than the United States, which just yesterday gave $7 million. Of course, not all our members have had an opportunity to visit, to share and to really know. I cannot believe those who said "no" could face that father and that child who had been reduced to skin and bones.

Kampucheans told me last month that they would return to their homes and farms if returning did not mean the prospect of their death by starvation. Surely, some level of economic aid to Kampuchea is a better alternative than further massive influxes of culturally dislocated and uprooted refugees seeking asylum in Third World countries. The seemingly universal tool of using starvation and isolation as pressure to force political change is a brutally cruel and inhuman method which will result in our generation being condemned in history.

In the short or long range, is it wise to treat Vietnam, Kampuchea and Laos as lepers in the world community? The absence of western nations up to now has created a vacuum into which the Soviet Union is only too anxious to step. It would seem to me that the Vietnamese do value their freedom and independence and want to preserve those values from the Soviet Union, yet at present they have no choice but to receive the Trojan Horse.

Neither the Vietnamese forces nor the Heng Samrin troops can be starved out of the region. We may well have to accept their reality in the same way as we accepted the reality of communist China. For that reason, I have called for food aid for Kampuchea and the beginning of the process for normalization of relations with the nations of Vietnam, Laos and Kampuchea.

This is a substantial statement I am making and it is a substantial step. It should not be assumed that in proposing them I support communism in Southeast Asia as a liberating force or as a better way for the people of this region. Communist regimes in Southeast Asia have participated in the most inhuman acts of barbarism and human rights atrocities in this century. Communism has meant less food, less shelter, less health protection, less education, more war, more starvation and more suffering than the region has known in many centuries. That is what communism has brought.

We used to say it was a struggle between communism and the forces of free enterprise, but that old dogma does not apply any longer; that excuse no longer remains. It is a struggle between communism and communism. It is of the utmost importance to realize that the key to the success of communism in these areas is its very promise of a richer economic future. Until the west recognizes that the people of Southeast Asia require food first, and then political liberties, our hopes for a more democratic future for that unfortunate area are bound to be disappointed.

Of equal importance to the region is the stability of our ASEAN friends—Malaysia, Thailand, Indonesia, Singapore and the Philippines. The failure of communism in Vietnam, Laos and Kampuchea stands in stark contrast to the increasing living standards of the ASEAN nations. Thailand is actually an exporter of food—the only one in the region. Real economic growth in Malaysia stands at 10 per cent, one of the highest rates in the world. The Philippines and Singapore, too, all have sound financial futures and are worthy of the support of this House, in my opinion.

An hon. Member: Singapore is a police state.

Mr. Wenman: I would suggest to the hon. member that he take a trip to Vietnam and Singapore and then tell me where he would prefer to live; tell me where there is more freedom, more security or health and education services. I am not talking about particular governments; I am talking about systems. The answer is obvious. I ask the hon. member to think about it; he does not even have to pay a visit. Communism has not worked in Southeast Asia to the benefit of the people.

Though expected by some to fall apart because of social and political pressures caused by instability within the region, the ASEAN nations have strengthened their alliances and, correspondingly, their security and economic potential as they move into the 1980s. As the ASEAN nations move from underdeveloped to developing and finally to developed status—and they certainly seem to be heading in that direction—they become increasingly a potential market offering trade opportunities for Canada.

Canada should seize the new opportunities provided by our acceptance of 50,000 refugees from these countries and begin a new trade initiative. I suggest we should pick up on the renewed interest of the prime minister of Thailand in a new Pacific community organization by organizing a Pacific Rim conference. In so doing, the Government of Canada could recognize that the Far East is really the near west and introduce a Canadian face into these markets. British Columbia's request for a trade and convention centre should be accepted as a first step in this direction. Such a centre should not be an exposition area for Pacific Rim imports but, rather, an exposition of the productivity and potential of Canadian manufacturers and producers, emphasizing Canadian exports. It should emphasize Canadian exports and provide a meeting place for the nations of the Pacific Rim generally within the region of Southeast Asia.

We must recognize that the major markets of the world are there in the sense that they have the major populations. These are growing markets, markets which are expanding. In Europe and in the United States we must compete in mature markets where competition is more intense. Opportunity is greater in the Pacific Rim because the countries there are maturing and developing. It is important that we move in at this stage, get in on the bottom floor of the trading process. This would be of mutual interest to both Canada and the countries of Southeast Asia.

Mr. Speaker, my eyes have been opened as a result of my visit to the region. I hope the eyes of Parliament will be opened, as well, as the region reaches out to Canada, not just the ASEAN nations but the nations of Vietnam and even of Laos and Kampuchea. All the nations of Southeast Asia are opening to us. It is up to us to respond and accept the challenge of the 1980s in Southeast Asia.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I enter the debate today with a little bit of—

An hon. Member: Reluctance?

Mr. Whelan: —reluctance maybe, and maybe not; but I do enter it with some hesitancy because of the things which have been said, especially by the member who spoke just before me. I could not help but be impressed by the things he said, and I will touch on them later on. However, it seems that the hon. member may be trying to convince someone who is already convinced, especially on this side. After having read what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) said, and after having read what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) said, I have some reservations about how the government is getting its point across to hon. members opposite who are backbenchers.

I want to congratulate Mr. Speaker and the new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), whom I have known for some years.

He has been in this House for five years as a member of the opposition. It has been a long time since members of this House sat, and when I was contemplating speaking in the House, I was worried about how to act. After going over some records, I found that since confederation this government has taken the longest time between dissolution before an election and reconvening this House to do the business of the country.

The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) said that we should not rehash the election campaign. After having gone through the campaign, I find that rather startling. I can understand why the Prime Minister does not want to rehash certain parts of the campaign. We were the ones who were supposed to have no use for Parliament; Parliament was something we did not want to be bothered with!

I ask hon. members here, or anyone in the country, to ask themselves who has respect for Parliament. In one of the last public statements I remember his making before his passing, even the right hon. member for Prince Albert said that this House should be resumed in August of this year to get on with the important decisions this country and this government were faced with. This House was not resumed. We waited and waited, and finally the decision that the House would be reconvened in early October was made. As a long-time member of this House, I find that to be something of an affront to elected members.

We can wait an eternity for some government ministers whom we have the right to question, but we will not be able to question them as elected members of this House because they are in the other place. There are three of them. I have responsibilities to my constituency for things other than agriculture. I represent a large number of auto workers who are concerned about industry and trade; but where is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? He is in the other place.

I read the other day that one of the members of the other place said that they have more time to question those ministers because they do not have to be bothered about electors. Some members of the other place think they represent electors in some fashion or form, and they think they can question on my behalf cabinet ministers who are administering the business of this country. Never can they question them on my behalf. As far as I am concerned, no one can question them on my behalf. I do not want members of the other place to be doing so, because the people of Essex-Windsor sent me to question ministers on their behalf, but I cannot do it when they are in the other place.

I find that to be an affront to Parliament. Who has the real concern about Parliament? In the election campaign we were supposed to be the bad guys; we had no use for this place. The people told the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that they did not want him as their representative, but he was put into the other place. At one time I put down a private member's bill in this place to abolish the other place. I never thought the other place would be used to this extent. If I had known it would, I would have supported the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who brings in a bill nearly every session to get rid of that place.

The other place was never set up as an elected assembly, as some people seem to think. There are countries—and the hon. member who spoke before me mentioned some—where non-elected people govern. Surely we are not going to allow that to continue here. Surely those brilliant members of Parliament from Toronto and from Ontario—and there are many of them—and those brilliant members from out west or from all over Canada, could fill those positions just as well, but the Minister of Justice, the Minister of State for CIDA and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce do so from the other place. Boy, oh boy; democracy runs wild!

The right to question those people was taken away from those who are obliged by their electors to do so. I am not saying that those three people are not capable, but they are not in this place. They are not in this democratic institution which we all know. In a democracy people are elected. In light of such use of Parliament, we should ask ourselves who has respect for Parliament. By your actions you shall be known, and I say this government shall be known by its actions in the election campaign.

Lord knows, I was confronted with this in the about 62 constituencies I visited. We were the ones who abused Parliament; we were the ones who had no use for it. We were not sitting for so long that for a while I thought the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) discovered he could save money by not having Parliament convene at all. He might have been recommending to the Prime Minister just that kind of thing, because he talks about saving money all the time.

The new Minister of Agriculture has had four months or so to get things in working order, if they were out of working order. It is obvious that he likes the programs the former government and the former minister of agriculture were carrying out for agriculure in Canada, because he is carrying them on. I will touch on that more later on.

The Minister of Agriculture tells of how many committees of cabinet he belongs to. I say congratulations to him. I was a member of only two full-time committees and three ad hoc committees of cabinet, but one of the ad hoc committees of which I was a member was more time-consuming than the full-time committees because it dealt with trade and tariffs and the Geneva trade negotiations which were going on. It was rewarding and educational to be on that committee, because I discovered some of the problems in trade to which I thought I knew all the solutions.

I did not have all the answers, but the committee continued to fight for the things it thought were best for society as a whole. Members had to give a little and take a little, and that took a long time. It took four years, and in the last two there was not a month and sometimes not a week in which meetings did not take place. Sometimes there were two or three meetings a week. Our chief negotiator, Mr. Warren, would return and say, "I must meet with you. No matter what you are doing, you will have to cancel it". We met with him. The Geneva trade negotiations were very important, perhaps the most important negotiations in many years.

The new Minister of Agriculture must agree with me because I saw his press release telling how much those negotiations meant to agriculture and how important they were, but one would almost think he was responsible for them. We on this side were, Mr. Speaker. Those negotiations were completed before the election was called. Not everything was published, but long weeks, months and years were spent in multilateral trade negotiations. I must say that they were tiring, but it was rewarding to know that we made gains for agriculture. We got some protection for certain commodities which we did not have previously. It was necessary to encourage that kind of production.

I was asked the other day about what I thought, because there was some discussion. I have not seen anything official about it publicly but apparently the government was asked to remove the tariff protection which we had gained for tomato paste. They asked, "What do you think should be done about that?" They should make sure of the supply of paste in Canada at present because we raised it previously—I am not sure of the exact figure—to 13 cents a pound or to 13 per cent, in accordance with what the tomato growers and the processing industry wanted. So the government should make sure there is enough of that product in Canada to take care of the needs, and it must make sure that some trader is not given an unfair advantage over the processor who may be enlarging his or her facility at this time to take care of future supply from the tomato industry.

Southwestern Ontario shows a great potential for the production of that product: it seems to be unlimited in the view of those of us who have been associated with that industry. There is no reason, for instance, why some of the big chains, restaurants or whatever, should have to use an imported product to serve the people whom they are licensed to serve. In my view, Canadian products should always be used.

They say that when I was minister of agriculture I devoted too much time to agriculture. They said the former minister of agriculture, the member for Essex-Windsor, devoted the majority of his time to agriculture. Sadly, but proudly, I say that I accept this uninformed criticism that Whelan was, and is, always concerned about farmers, agriculture production, food, farm incomes and the like, because I say that in any country you want to check in the world—I am sure the hon. member opposite must have found that during his trips—those who neglect agriculture make the rest of society suffer for that.

According to the facts that I have, no ministry ever took over a healthier agricultural industry than the present Government of Canada. That is why the minister has so much time. I think he said he is on five cabinet committees. It is because of all the work I did. He is reaping the benefits of it. I have not yet received a "thank you" letter from him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Whelan: He said that he is seeing three to ten farm groups a day; and he is also on five cabinet committees? There are not any cabinet ministers in the House. I do not know how long their meetings are and what they are dealing with, but to be on five cabinet committees and to see three to ten delegations a day is quite something. I do not believe I ever saw ten groups in a day, although I saw several in a day. Say he averages seven a day in the four months, and he works seven days a week, that is 49 a week. He must have seen every farm organization that exists in Canada, if he sees that many a day.

That would be pretty well working like some of the doctors who abuse medicare. You come into the doctor's office and he says, "How are you?". He tells you to take an aspirin or a 222, and then he opts out. That is what he would say at the end of it, because he would send me a bill with an increase of 15 per cent or 20 per cent.

But, you know, this is all well and fine because Parliament has not been sitting and you can see more people on farms when Parliament is not sitting and you can be more often around the country in those circumstances. But I never neglected my job when I was minister of agriculture, because I travelled on Wednesday nights, Friday nights and weekends, and the record will show that at those times I was most often busy in many parts of Canada and many cities, no matter how big or small.

The new Minister of Agriculture is a farmer, and that is an asset. I think one has to get out and see the country from coast to coast and understand the people because agriculture in our country is so diversified. I want to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Elgin, for being bright enough, smart enough and intelligent enough for the Prime Minister to have appointed him Minister of Agriculture over such outstanding members as the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), or the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees).

The Prime Minister had no other political choice but to select his Minister of Agriculture from Ontario, because it would have been bad in Ontario had he not done so. I think the Minister of Agriculture from Ontario is well qualified, but let him not waver in his determination to get the things that are needed in agriculture to make it healthy. Let him not waver in continuing on with the Farm Credit Corporation to raise funds from farmers themselves. It has been over four months, and farmers need this. But let us not forget that the farmers' net income from 1977 to 1978 increased 30 per cent. That was contrary to anything the economists had said would happen. But it did happen and the farmers' net income increased by 30 per cent in 1978 over 1977.

The cost of land increased by 14 per cent. This, in itself, underscores the tremendous need for increased funding of the Farm Credit Corporation. This government should practice what it preaches and put up the money for an industry which benefits all Canadians. It is ripe for expansion. In fact, the agricultural industry has been left in very good shape. As I said, it has been expanding so profitably that even banking institutions are lending farmers more money than they ever have before, and they are investing in land.

Let us hope that land does not exceed the price of gold, but I heard a banker say the other day that the cost of land is practically the same as the cost of gold. Perhaps you can find more gold—that is the difference, he said—but you cannot find more productive land in the world, and land is much more important. You could die in this chamber if it were filled with gold and there were no food here; but with food here, we could live and talk forever. Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker?

So when the bankers are taking this attitude toward farms, and the records show that for the last three years some of the leading banking institutions in this country have taken a real step forward in lending money to the agricultural industry and to our farmers, I say that in itself is a glowing tribute to the previous Liberal administration and to the former minister of agriculture. I have to say that, humble as I am, but I want to say again that we saw a press release which said that the farm improvement loan administration has been turned over to the Minister of Agriculture. That was done before the election, and I want to correct the record on that.

I want to encourage the government, but I do not know which minister is handling the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I saw some confusion in the previous government, but it is even worse in this one. You have three ministers handling that department. Two of them said they would answer questions here, and one is in the other place. We are one of few nations in the world who do not look after agriculture the way we should, apart from what the Minister of Agriculture does. This government has not changed that much. Otto and I used to fight all the time about the Wheat Board and who should have control of it, but when we went to world meetings I was embarrassed when I had to say that the minister of transport handles wheat, or the minister of justice handles wheat. The same thing will happen to the present Minister of Agriculture. That is ridiculous and as asinine as could be.

We have made a decision to establish the Agricultural Export Development Corporation made up of people who know the agricultural business, and 51 per cent of which would be made up of producers. Some people ask, what do producers know about agricultural export? Well, they know as much or a lot more than some city slicker who is in the bond market or works in some stock exchange. Or an economist might know more about it, when he goes to talk about it in some other part of the world.

As minister of agriculture, going to many different parts of the world, such as the World Food Council meetings, FAO meetings, etc., I was appalled on seeing some of the people who really tried hard but who had only limited knowledge, not the knowledge they needed to understand really what those people were talking about when they were talking about trading in agriculture.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for lunch I was talking about some of the matters I thought were important in agriculture. I was reminding the House and anyone interested of some of the things we should be doing, some of the things we are doing, and some of the things the government should be doing.

I should like to return to the Speech from the Throne and express my sincere disappointment in the little mention of agriculture. The only thing mentioned in the entire Speech from the Throne which had anything to do with agriculture was Prince Rupert and hopper cars. Was there anything new about the agreement concerning the Prince Rupert elevator being turned over to a different authority? No, Mr. Speaker. That agreement was well on the way when the election was called. Is there anything new about hopper cars? No, Mr. Speaker. Already we have purchased 8,000 hopper cars for the transportation of grain in Canada. I am disappointed in the government, in the party which makes itself out to be a friend of rural Canada.

I should like to remind the House how many good rural members of Parliament there are opposite. I knew some of them but not all of them before they came to the House. When I look at the front bench opposite, I only see one member who is a real farmer, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise). The Conservative party has many capable rural people elected to the House who know farming and agriculture. One would have thought that at least two of those members would have occupied the government front benches. When the Liberal party formed the government, we had two members in cabinet who represented rural constituencies, yet supposedly we were not a friend of rural Canada. One member of the Liberal government was the former minister of agriculture from Prince Edward Island who was the acting minister of agriculture when I was not present, the Hon. Dan MacDonald, the former member for Cardigan. He was a farmer in his own right, a war veteran, minister of veterans affairs and acting minister of agriculture when I was absent. I had his strong support at all times in cabinet.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has already made a slight noise. Some people call it a shuffle because he gave one minister who had no authority some authority. May he do that with one of his rural backbenchers in the very near future. We all remember the morning Parliament opened. When we arrived in Ottawa, it snowed outside. When one looks at the Speech from the Throne and what it contains for agriculture, one realizes the biggest snow job was in the other place because the Speech from the Throne contained nothing about agriculture.

Earlier today I said that we ought to get on with the Canadian agricultural export proposal. We promoted this idea. For over two years it was in the making. Several months have passed and nothing seems to have been done about it. The only thing I heard in the House yesterday was that we lost a small agricultural export contract to the Middle East for poultry products. The minister did not elaborate on what that was, except to say that it was lost. This is an area we must really sell. We require people who are knowledgeable in agriculture, not stockbrokers who are saying to the farmers, "You have the greatest know-how of probably any group of agricultural producers in the whole world. You produce and we will sell for you, even if we know nothing about your products".

When I was minister of agriculture I was almost of the idea that one can be the best cattle breeder who knew and used the best genetic breeding programs in the world, etc., who can show his wares and we will sell them for him. The same would apply to other agricultural products. We were saying that farmers did not have the intelligence to enter into the market. Those days are long gone. For a farmer to be successful today, he is as much a businessman as any other person in the business world. He is required to be many things in order to make his farming operation a success.

While I am dealing with matters of international concern, I should like to mention the hon. member who spoke before me, the hon. member who had visited Vietnam. On these matters of international concern, opposition members of the House were relieved to hear, via the press in September, that Canada would not have to hang its head in shame for lack of commitment in the world food council. It gave me great personal satisfaction to know that the moral leadership Canada gave to this organization, a branch of the United Nations, in 1978 when I had the honour to lead the delegation, would not be frittered away for a "messy potage". But since then the ungalvanized—some say heartless—but certainly rigid, if not cruel, speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) has the population of Canada worried about our commitment to international aid.

Although I do not quote from The Globe and Mail very often, I should like to refer to a letter to the editor which expressed the anxiety of Canadians toward the ambivalence of the government in matters of external aid. The letter indicates that the policy of the government is very much like telling a patient dying of cancer, "I cannot help because I have a cold". If this government has any heart, knows anything about international politics or has any business sense, it should clearly come down on the side of international assistance and not on the side of those who would have a balanced budget at the expense of international aid.

When I hear what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) has had to say at world meetings and so on, I am of the opinion that the economy in this country is good. Then I read what such a noteworthy person as Lord Thompson said when he was bidding for that big enterprise in Canada, that he knew of no other country in which it was better to make an investment, and he went on to elaborate on the economic strength of the country. Then when I see that the government is intending to cut back our aid, I wonder.

And talking about expenditures, members on this side of the House applaud the $18 million guarantees finally released for this year to producer organizations under the Advance Payments for Crops Act brought in by the previous Liberal government and proclaimed on August 15, 1977. All I can say is that the present Prime Minister took an awfully long time to call this House together on the pretence that his cabinet team was working to learn their jobs and to deal with the administration of their country, as I said earlier today.

The Minister of Agriculture must have been too busy with all those cabinet committees to give the impression of any dispatch in agricultural matters in this throne speech. We also applaud the $1 million of federal financial assistance released to help build increased feed grain capacity in eastern Ontario and Quebec this summer under the previous Liberal administration.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) has talked about how long the strike at the port of Montreal by the grain handlers has been going on. I wonder if the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. La Salle) is having any input into that. The strike is certainly having an effect in terms of extra cost for the feeders in la belle province and it has been going on I believe since May. As of today it has not been settled, and the shipping season is almost over.

I also encourage the government to continue the Liberal government's program of assisting the Canadian dairy processing industry expansion and, more particularly, exports. I am heartened to see that the hard work the previous administration put into helping the evaporated milk processing plant in Ste. Claire de Dorchester, belonging to la Coopérative Laitière du Sud de Québec, along with the storage facilities at the port of Quebec to export production from the co-operative, has been approved of by this government. That was our policy. The dairy industry in this country has never been healthier. Hon. members may remember that some months back it was said that the industry was in chaos. There is not a dairy industry in the world run better than the dairy industry of Canada, and we can take credit for that. I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture for continuing with that program.

In the minister's press release he said that the industry was dead on, that they were .3 per cent off production guidelines. If all other industries that do not deal with biological entities such as a cow could only be so good! If Chrysler in my area could be so good, imagine what their financial position would be. I can remember when people were saying that these policies which I proposed and propagated were bad, but they are now successful and are costing the government less and less all the time. I was one of the few ministers of agriculture who in his term did not give taxpayer dollars to the poultry industry. That industry is an efficient operation and is below the anti-inflation board guidelines.

If all other things in our society were in the same position as the poultry industry, we would be even more so the country of admiration and the country that most people would like to be part of. I refer to that great country we call Canada.

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I think it has now become obvious that a new and far more effective approach must be taken to stimulating the economy without increasing inflation. We must find a practical way to make available the jobs that are needed to overcome the serious unemployment which exists in the country today and which is costing the country $4.5 billion a year in unemployment pay-outs. These pay-outs are a completely unproductive expenditure because the people who receive them do no productive work and make no contribution to the economy. To stimulate the economy and create the jobs we need, we must greatly reduce our annual trade deficit of more than $12 billion a year in fully manufactured products—the ones that produce the jobs—which is increasing each year by more than $2 billion. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association has stated recently that if we can overcome this very large annual deficit, we can produce 800,000 new jobs.

In recent years the former government tried to stimulate the economy in two ways. The first was introduced by John Turner when he was minister of finance, and consisted of making a very large reduction in corporation taxes. This was done in the hope that industry would use the money to buy the new plant, equipment and production systems necessary to increase productivity, and by so doing lower costs and selling prices and increase sales. The plan failed because industry had three alternatives for spending the money. They could either buy the necessary new equipment; pay out the money in extra dividends; or put the money into company reserve. Unfortunately, a great deal of the money was spent in the latter two ways.

More recently, the former government tried to stimulate the economy by cutting sales and income taxes, in the hope that the money would be spent on buying more Canadian products. This plan failed because the people had four alternatives for spending this extra money. They could either buy more Canadian products; buy more foreign-made products; take trips to the United States and abroad; or put the money into savings accounts or government bonds. A great deal of the money was spent in the latter three ways, and these plans failed to stimulate the economy in any appreciable way on each occasion when they were tried.

It has now become clear that production and employment in Canada can only be increased substantially by convincing a great many Canadians and people living in other countries that Canadian products are a better buy in price, quality and design than the ones they are now buying. I believe that the only way the job can be done is by offering incentives to reduce costs, and thereby selling prices, and to improve quality and design. If we can do these things, we can increase our share of the existing buying power in the hands of Canadians and potential customers abroad, and increase production in Canada without increasing inflation.

The kind of incentives I have in mind are those which will induce substantial improvements in the following fields: lowering labour costs on potential new business; increasing productivity; increasing research and development; expanding export trade; processing more of our primary products in this country.

First of all, what must be done to reduce labour costs on potential new business to levels which will enable Canadians to compete successfully for that business? There is a great deal of business which Canadian companies are unable to compete for because of low labour costs in countries such as Japan, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Korea, and many others. These low wages are made possible by government subsidies paid on housing, food, clothing and other essentials of every day living. Labour costs in many of these countries are so low that their products can sell in Canada at prices which are well below the Canadian cost of production and still provide a satisfactory profit to the foreign producers.

If Canadian companies are to be able to compete for a good proportion of this business, and thereby obtain additional employment for Canadians and additional profits for their shareholders, they must have an incentive which will enable them to reduce their labour costs on this potential new business to a level where they are within striking distance of these low foreign rates. Then, by accepting a lower than normal margin of profit on this extra business in order to get started, they can compete for these orders and stand a good chance of obtaining a reasonable proportion of them.

First, let us take a look at the money which is available for use in reaching this objective. As I have said, we are today paying out $4.5 billion per year in unemployment insurance benefits to people who cannot find work. Of this $4.5 billion, the Canadian government has been contributing $2.2 billion per year, because it is responsible for meeting the total cost of all unemployment insurance benefits when unemployment exceeds 4 per cent per year.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, people receive 60 per cent of their former pay when they are receiving unemployment benefits. It would be very practical indeed for the government to draw on the $2.2 billion per year it is now paying out as its share of unemployment benefits, to contribute toward the wage costs of new products which are not now produced in Canada, and which could be produced if a reasonable subsidy were made available. In this way, useful and satisfying work would be made available to our unemployed people at a cost which would be lower than the cost of unemployment insurance. People so employed would then make a positive contribution to the Canadian economy, instead of the negative contribution which is the case today. They would also start paying income tax to help ease the strain on our overstrained finances.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce would examine each application for assistance in competing with the kind of foreign products I have mentioned, and would decide what percentage of the wage cost of the potential new product should be paid by the government to enable this new line of production to start up in this country.

I believe that the wage subsidies which the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce would decide are justified in each individual case should be paid for a two-year period in order to allow the new line of production a fair chance to get started. During this two-year period, the company would be allowed to write off the cost of all machinery necessary to bring the new line into production. The wage subsidy should then be gradually phased out over a reasonable period, during which it would be up to the producer to steadily increase his productivity to take up the slack.

As soon as the new policy is announced by the government, Canadian businessmen should immediately start surveying the Canadian market to see what imported products not now made in Canada could be produced and sold here if wage subsidies such as I have outlined are made available. They should also travel abroad to find out what products are being bought in the export market which such a wage subsidy would bring within reach.

The second matter I would like to deal with is the need to induce greater productivity in our economy, so that we can further lower costs and selling prices and become increasingly competitive in the market place. To do so, we must offer incentives which will persuade producers that they will be able to pay for the new plant, machinery and production systems they will have to buy in a reasonably short space of time, and in this way make it as easy as possible for them to make the usually high expenditures involved. The kind of incentive I have in mind would be one whereby, first, all capital expenditures may be written off in one year and, second, a plant would be rewarded in the form of a tax rebate at the end of the year in proportion to its increase in productivity during the year compared to the base year—the last full year before the plan goes into operation.

This form of incentive has been very effective in increasing productivity in such countries as Japan and West Germany, where spectacular results have been achieved since the end of World War II. There is no reason why such an incentive would be any less successful in this country.

Next, I would like to deal with the steps which I think should be taken to increase the amount of research and development work which is carried on by industry in this country. One of the reasons we have had to rely so heavily on foreign investment in the past is that investment brought with it technology which was produced by research done in the country where the capital originates. To be less reliant on foreign investment, to capture new markets which are looking for new and better designed products, and to lower costs and become more competitive, it is obvious that we must carry out a great deal more research and development in this country.

To bring this about, we should allow industry to write off 200 per cent of the cost of current and capital expenditures on research and development in excess of those made in the base year, the last full year before the program is introduced. In addition to writing off the full cost in one year, it will put a considerable cash reward in the pocket of the company undertaking the additional research.

This kind of program has been successful in significantly increasing the volume of industrial research in countries where it has been introduced, and will prove equally effective in Canada. The former government's plan to allow a write-off of 150 per cent, which was announced a year ago, was an exact copy of the plan which the Conservative government introduced in 1961 and which worked very well indeed. A 200 per cent write-off will be even more effective.

The fourth incentive which I suggest is one designed to promote greater sales in the export market. Because of this country's great dependence on the United States market—70 per cent of our export sales—and the steady move of that country toward protectionism, the development of additional markets has become particularly necessary if we are to increase our volume of exports, or even maintain our present level of export sales.

Making sales in other countries depends to a very large extent upon doing four things successfully. First, going abroad and making personal contact with potential buyers; second, finding out what is required to meet the competition in those markets; third, returning to Canada and producing a product which can compete successfully; and fourth, displaying the product effectively before potential customers.

The incentive, I suggest, would allow producers to write off 200 per cent of all expenses connected with, first, making sales trips abroad; second, displaying their products at foreign trade fairs; and third, any other expenses incurred in sales promotion in the export market. These expenses would be in excess of those made in the base year, the year before the plan goes into operation.

Not only would all such expenses be completely written off in the year when they are made, but a considerable cash bonus would accrue to the company for its additional sales promotion activities. The kind of incentive I have mentioned will greatly encourage the kind of activity which is essential if increased sales are to be made.

Another thing which the government should do to help increase the sale of Canadian products abroad is to organize "Fly and Buy" missions, whereby the important buyers from the principal markets of the world would be brought to Canada once a year to see Canadian products displayed in giant trade shows in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and view our heavy machinery in the factories where it is made across the country. Such operations produced spectacular results when they were used in Canada between 1961 and 1963, and they paid for themselves many times over by the additional business which they generated.

Mr. Beattie: The minister then was a good salesman.

● (1430)

Mr. Hees: Finally, I would like to discuss the need for this country to process more of our raw materials to their finished state, and what should be done to bring this about. For too long we have been shipping out of Canada a far too large a proportion of our primary products to be processed to their final stages of production in other countries. These countries thereby gain the many advantages of employment, taxes and profits which accrue from this further processing.

In Canada we have the skilled manpower, the managerial skill along with comparatively cheap power, and excellent transportation facilities. These things are needed for this further processing, and it is about time Canada started doing something about this. Now, what should and can be done? Thirty years ago the government of Ontario introduced a plan which has been largely responsible for the spectacular expansion of the pulp and paper industry in that province during the intervening years. Ontario required companies to process a far higher proportion of the logs which were cut, a large proportion of which had been shipped in their raw state to paper mills in the United States.

What has worked so well in the case of the pulp and paper industry in Ontario can work equally well in other primary industries across the country. For instance, it should apply to all raw materials being shipped to other countries for further processing because of the great dependence of other countries on our primary products to feed their manufacturing processes.

It is obvious that a certain proportion of the raw materials we produce must be exported in the raw state, but not nearly the proportion that is the case today. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should now undertake an intensive study of our primary industries to determine what proportion of the primary products we produce can reasonably require to be processed to their finished state in this country.

Having decided what proportions of our various primary products should be further processed in Canada, we must produce an incentive sufficiently attractive to persuade those who normally export our raw materials that it will be profitable for them to build the plants necessary to carry out this additional processing.

It has become painfully obvious that the grants now provided by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, although useful, have not proved attractive enough to bring to areas of slow growth sufficient new industry to reverse the dangerously high rates of unemployment that have persisted in those areas for many years.

As well as the DREE grants now available to areas of slow growth, we must also make available an additional incentive to permit new plants processing primary products in areas of slow growth to pay no federal taxes in the first 15 years of profitable operation. Starting with the sixteenth year, the company would pay 10 per cent of full taxation, and this would increase by a further 10 per cent each year, until the company is paying full taxation in the twenty-fifth year.

My conversations with leading businessmen across the country have convinced me that this incentive, added to the present DREE grants for slow growth areas, will prove sufficiently attractive to accomplish what has to be done. It is obvious that this 15-year tax-free period, and the following ten years of gradual taxation, will involve no loss of tax revenue to the government, because these taxes are not being paid now and will not be paid in the future if potential producers of finished products are not persuaded by this incentive to build the necessary plants in Canada.

In conclusion, the five incentives which I have outlined will pay for themselves many times over in the following ways. First, we can drastically cut the present far too high expenditure on unemployment insurance by stimulating the economy and enabling people to find work; second, we can greatly increase tax revenues, because more people will be working and paying income taxes; more commodities will be sold, and thus additional commodity taxes will be generated; and the increased volume of business will lower unit costs of production and make available more profits to tax.

It should also be borne in mind that tax rebates are not paid until July 1 of the following year, and by that time the improvements in the economy, which these incentives are aimed at achieving, will have been felt for some time. For this reason, these incentives will not bring about a "stimulative deficit".

I am convinced that if we can bring into operation a plan such as I have outlined, we can stimulate the economy without increasing inflation, make an important start on overcoming that $12 billion a year trade deficit we have in fully manufactured products and start creating the 800,000 new jobs which the CMA tells us can be created if effective incentives to increase production are introduced. The time to start introducing those incentives is now.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, like those hon. members who spoke before me in this debate, I want to congratulate both members of my family, that is the new generation of politicians, as the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) put it so well, on the remarkable way in which they sponsored the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

In the first speech in this House, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) defined the direction and the purpose of our role in the opposition as being positive and constructive. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) himself in his speech urged hon. members to participate fully, candidly and with conviction in all debates and recognized that his opponents could have different approaches and priorities from his.

Mr. Speaker, I am in this House today to rise for the first time as member of the wonderful riding of Laprairie, fully aware of the tremendous vote of confidence the voters put in me on May 22 and the responsibilities that arise therefrom, because it is a task requiring a total commitment which I accept with gratitude, and I will endeavour to meet the expectations of my constituents and serve them faithfully.

It is in this context, Mr. Speaker, that I rise today—my birthday, incidentally—to share with this House and the people of Canada my impressions on the Speech from the Throne, the policies of this government, as well as my vision of this country.

[English]

Some specifics of the throne speech pleased me. If I may be permitted, I wish to examine these aspects as frankly and as sincerely as I am able.

First, Mr. Speaker, freedom of information legislation is urgent and fundamental. Canadians have a right to know not only how a decision is taken, but also what grounds the decision is based upon. Unfettered access to information, with strictly limited exceptions, encourages all Canadians to participate in the decision-making processes of government. If such legislation is conscientiously adhered to, our electorate will become more responsible. Such a bill would be a fitting testament to the concept of participatory democracy, as espoused by my leader when he first became prime minister.

Second, I praise the efforts of this government to extend the power of Parliament, and I hope to encourage all measures which hasten this end. Two areas demand attention: the role of private members must be augmented, and the standing committees of the House of Commons must be strengthened.

● (1440)

I am among those who envy the influence of the American congressional committees, although I have no desire to follow everything I see there. If this government is truly sincere in implementing its avowed intentions, it will not interfere with the right of committees to set their own agendas and summon any witnesses which they wish to hear. This will allow all members to explore and evaluate various policy positions prior to the time party commitments and rivalries become involved.

May I test the good will of members opposite by making one sobering observation? One political participant has set forth the argument that, following a vigorous campaign waged on the pressing issues facing the electorate, the Prime Minister might be tempted to engage "in a ploy to sidestep the real issues facing the country by talking about such things as parliamentary reform". I trust that this observer now feels that this government's preoccupation with parliamentary reform will not preclude addressing other more pressing social and economic problems, for he is now serving as Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). His remarks were reported in Hansard on October 11, 1974, when he replied to the Speech from the Throne of that year.

Yes, Parliament needs reform. However, I am sure that the Prime Minister does not want to insult the intelligence of Canadians by implying that Parliament only began its tumultuous descent with the arrival of my leader, for such is simply not the case. There is a myth, protected by this government, perpetuated by their ignorance of history, that there was once a golden age of Parliaments where wit and wisdom flourished in an atmosphere of gentlemanly camaraderie and public spirit. Such a golden age never existed. There is, in the respected and learned Lord Bryce's seminal work entitled Modern Democracies, an entire chapter headed "The Decline of Legislatures". Only the ill-informed can claim parliamentary reform to be solely a contemporary concern, or solely a Canadian problem, since Lord Bryce's treatise was published in 1921. Although now seized by the Tories with envangelical fervour, parliamentary reform will remain a periodic concern of parliamentarians everywhere.

Nor can it be claimed that the Liberal party has a newly found respect for Parliament now that we are in opposition. Let me remind the members opposite of our party's heritage, starting with the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which was the first government in the commonwealth to extend a special sessional allowance to the official leader of the opposition. That was in 1905.

Third, I applaud in the Speech from the Throne all the references made to consultation, co-operation, harmony, information, and right to dissent as a real effort to govern. I qualify all of these as processes. But one must bear in mind that this country is faced, on the one hand, with severe limits on its economy while still having to give more rights to its people, and this positive approach can only succeed if it leads to real and meaningful content.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I must admit that notwithstanding the few points that I have mentioned, I am very disappointed with the Speech from the Throne. I did not expect that a government which has been so long in the opposition would take a band-aid approach in its first throne speech. When I say that I am disappointed, I am thinking partly about the complaints of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hargrave) who, in his comments on the throne speech to the Medicine Hat media, said that he could not explain the fact that a government elected largely by rural residents did not even mention the word agriculture. However, I am thinking even more about the attitude of the Progressive Conservative government in international affairs. I am thinking about the image of Canada, which has gained throughout the world a reputation of which we can be proud, thanks to the efforts first of Mr. Pearson, and then of our present leader. Mr. Speaker, who among us is not proud to pin the Canadian flag to his buttonhole when travelling abroad? This reputation is now being threatened. In spite of this, the Progressive Conservative government does not even talk about international affairs in its Speech from the Throne.

When I say that I am disappointed, I mean that the Speech from the Throne does not even say that there is in Canada a government committed to separate Quebec from the rest of the country, and that all Quebeckers, like myself, will soon have to vote on that issue, Mr. Speaker. It seems as though this problem does not even exist for the Progressive Conservatives.

Mr. La Salle: You are the ones who created the problem!

Mr. Deniger: As a matter of fact, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. La Salle) agrees with me. However, these are only three examples and I could give many others, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

I cannot explain why a party so long in opposition would bring such a narrow-minded view to the Speech from the Throne. I have tried to understand. I have tried to read everything that the Prime Minister has said and I think I now understand.

In a well-written article in the September issue of Saturday Night, Sandra Gwyn recalls an interview she had with the then leader of the opposition three years ago. She was struck by the fact that he had no sense of personal destiny, and that he mistrusted the words "vision" and "grand design". Well, three years have passed. The member for Yellowhead is now Prime Minister of Canada, and there is still no vision, no grand design.

Mr. Nystrom: No PetroCan.

Mr. Deniger: How long must Canadians wait? There are people on this earth who cannot see the forest for the trees. The more I read the Speech from the Throne, the more I witness their present policies, the more I realize that their approach is to avoid confrontation at all costs. I am greatly disappointed in the Tories. This approach is irresponsible, and even if the Tories had such an approach in opposition, I had hoped that it would disappear with the advent of power. I can only conclude that I was wrong.

[Translation]

In such an atmosphere of co-operation proposed by our leader and accepted by the right hon. Prime Minister, I would like to explain in this House why I am a centralist, and why I am very concerned by this government's approach. Political history in Canada shows that the central power becomes more important when there is a crisis such as the First or the Second World War, or the depression of the thirties. There is decentralization in times of peace and prosperity only.

Mr. Speaker, never has this nation been so threatened. Many people may think I am referring only to Quebec. It has always been my view that regional disparity coupled with blind regionalism possibly were Canada's biggest threat. Why is it, Mr. Speaker, that in the year 1978 there are governments like the one in British Columbia to stop the sale of MacMillan Bloedel to Canadian Pacific Investments, because the latter have their head office in Montreal rather than Vancouver? Why is it that the government of Ontario, in its transport supplies, chose to buy in Ontario at higher cost rather than accept the significantly lower bid of a Quebec corporation, namely Bombardier MLW of course? Why is it that Quebec blocked the sale of Crédit Foncier because majority control would have been held by Nova Scotia interests? Why is it that Alberta, in order to attract industries, offers its energy below the Canadian price?

These are only examples, Mr. Speaker, but who in Canada speaks for Canadians? You remember, Mr. Speaker, when the Ford Company chose to establish in Ontario, some people in Quebec accused federal members of betraying their province, notwithstanding the fact that Ford was considering two sites only, one in the United States and the other in Canada. Rather than fighting Ford's choice, I was proud to say there was nothing wrong with it. They had not chosen Ontario, they had chosen Canada.

• (1450)

[English]

Canada is threatened with disintegration. An eminent authority, Mr. Ronald Watts, describes the sources of strain as "regional divergences of political demands, weakness of inter-regional communications, the evaporation of transitional inducements to union, and external influences." I am worried by what I see. That is why I am called to serve here, for I am a Canadian nationalist.

I am grateful, Mr. Speaker, for this rare opportunity to speak freely, unhampered by the usual strict procedural limitations. I first came to Ottawa in 1973 as a civil servant and became a ministerial aide in 1976. It is now my pleasure to represent the constituency of Laprairie in the House of Commons. Originally, I thought of Canada solely as a country divided into two camps, one French-speaking and the other English-speaking. I saw this as a grave problem and I still do. Today, however, I regard the urgent problem presented by regional disparities as being even more pressing. If we are to surmount the crisis facing us we must work out our common problems together; we must recall the shared experiences, good and bad, which have brought our people together in the past and we must draw upon those experiences to facilitate further co-operation and common effort.

Last weekend, in Winnipeg, I attended a meeting of concerned Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Deniger: I am surprised that when the time comes for free and open discussion members opposite question its very existence.

Mr. Epp: What do you mean by "open"? We were not invited.

Mr. Deniger: Several of those I met at that meeting had freely devoted years of service to public life despite discouragement. I witnessed and sympathized with their feelings of alienation. I pledged to fight to overcome their despair. I pledged to fight all regional alienation, be it western alienation, Atlantic alienation or Quebec alienation, until my enemy is vanquished.

Such a war cannot be waged through decentralization, for we would surrender the most important weapons in our arsenal. We need all the ammunition at our disposal to combat economic inequalities between regions, without abdicating to parochial demands.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a great pleasure and an honour to be speaking in the House of Commons for the first time, and I take this opportunity to convey the respectful sentiments of my constituents in Nunatsiaq. I congratulate the respective members of the House on their election and you, Mr. Speaker, on your re-election to the chair.

I also congratulate the New Democratic Party on being receptive to having a member from the eastern Arctic among their number. When my riding is included the NDP represents a good one third of the geographic extent of Canada.

I would also like to commend my predecessor, Mr. Walley Firth, for his hard work and dedicated service as member for the Northwest Territories, including the western Arctic, during the six years preceding the Thirty-first Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, the Northwest Territories, and especially my riding of Nunatsiaq, traditionally and historically occupied by Inuit, has been terra incognita to the rest of the world. Unknown, menacing and certainly too cold for civilized habitation, it is only recently, in the last few decades, that something of national interest in the north has taken place. This is not because of the people who live there but because the possibilities of economic development in the extractive industries promise to be profitable.

In this light, it was only in 1960 that the Inuit were given the right to vote in Canada and we have that great gentleman and parliamentarian, the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, to thank for that inestimable right. Perhaps I might put this attitude toward relations between my people and the Government of Canada in its true perspective by quoting two people. The first is the former commissioner of the Northwest Territories, Stuart M. Hodgson, who said:

> The emergence of the Northwest Territories as a political and economic force promises to be the twentieth century's greatest saga. It will include industrial development on a scale suited to the size of the land, giving employment to thousands of modern pioneers. It will be a modern re-enactment of old frontier days—accelerated and magnified by world pressures of population, increased commercial demands and heightened by competition for mineral resources. It will be rocketed ahead by computer-oriented technology.

These immortal words were uttered in an atmosphere of prophetic elation in 1970. I would like now to quote one of my own people on the same subject and please understand, Mr. Speaker, that the use of the word "white" is not meant in a derogatory sense. Please do not feel slighted.

> We very much dislike white people taking our land for granted. It seems they feel they can destroy our land any time they feel like it without even asking for permission. We want to have freedom of conservation with the animals. They steal the raw materials without even consulting us or giving the Inuit a percentage of what they are taking. We need to get power to control the land.

These were the words of Elijah Takkiapik spoken in 1974. The desire for control is very real today among the Inuit of Canada.

My riding of Nunatsiaq is the largest in Canada and also one of the most distinctive. It is one of only three ridings—perhaps soon there will only be two—in which the people who were born there, and who make it their home, have virtually no democratic voice in the management of their affairs.

• (1500)

While it is true that we have a territorial council situated in the western Arctic in Yellowknife, this council is subject to the authority of the territorial commissioner who is not elected and is himself under the authority of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp), and I see him across the way. How do you do?

I wish to spend the next few minutes outlining some of the specific regional problems faced by the people in my constituency. At a time when one can fly to Paris, France in less than ten hours, it often takes two days to travel from Ottawa to my home in Rankin Inlet. This increases the feeling that northern people have of being isolated from the rest of their country, but it also has serious economic consequences. The unusually high cost of living is due to increasingly high transportation costs and inadequate transportation services. A review of northern transportation is greatly needed. I am sure a review would lead to the implementation of a northern transportation subsidy or alternate means of alleviating the burden of these high costs.

To give some idea of the costs in the north, I am going to quote a couple of prices given to me yesterday from Frobisher Bay. Frobisher Bay, by the way, is the first port of call for air and sea transport in the Northwest Territories, so these would be the least costly consumer items in all Northwest Territories communities, aside from the western Arctic. Bread costs up to $2 a loaf. Reconstituted milk in Frobisher Bay costs $3.40 for two quarts and the bargain price of $6.98 for four litres. I dare not mention the price of home heating oil or gasoline because that is a joke.

Concurrent with the high cost of living is the fact that native employment is disproportionately low. The administration, which attracts many outsiders to high-paying bureaucratic jobs, has been inadequate in the area of job-training programs for local residents. Poor education and lack of adequate job-training leads naturally to low employment rates. At the same time our traditional livelihood—hunting, fishing and trapping—has been jeopardized by haphazard development and such regulatory controls as the Migratory Birds Convention Act, the northwest territorial government game ordinance, and so forth.

One point I would like to emphasize is that the Inuit are not generally opposed to development per se. What we are opposed to is the rapid, untimely development which has been externally imposed on us; development which endangers our land, our people, our way of life; development which benefits the residents of southern Canada and which benefits even the country of West Germany in the case of uranium mining—or at least they propose such development with the help of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—and finally, development which leaves the residents of the Arctic to deal with the social and environmental consequences on their own.

I would like now to quote a former prime minister of Canada, Mr. Louis St. Laurent, who stated:

> It has been said that Great Britain acquired her empire in a state of absence of mind. Apparently, we have administered these vast territories of the north in an almost continuing absence of mind.

This absence of mind has been demonstrated in the past by an attitude which sees the north as a boundless storehouse of resources just waiting to be exploited. This attitude has resulted in political and economic development which has ignored the cultural, social and political rights of native people and has denied them the opportunity to participate fully in the processes which are shaping their future.

The creation of the department of northern affairs and national resources in 1953 officially placed control of the north in the hands of bureaucrats, and this trend has continued through the devolution of the present Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The creation of the territorial council has done little to change this, as most major decisions are still made in Ottawa. Current government policy regarding the north seems vague and full of contradictions. At least, this is my interpretation after listening to the Speech from the Throne and a number of comments made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I would like for a few minutes to comment on the push for mining development as mentioned in the throne speech. In fact, that was all that was mentioned in the speech about the far north. Let me retrace our steps for a moment. The northern mineral advisory committee was formed under the auspices of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of the old Liberal government. It consists of 15 members chosen exclusively from government and the mining industry.

Its mandate was to advise the minister in formulating policies and strategies for the development of the mining industry in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It is, therefore, an instrument of the previous government and was to be used in the formation of Liberal policies. The present government has promised early action on the recommendations made by this committee in its recently released report. The Conservative government has therefore presumably adopted what would otherwise have been Liberal policy and has done so despite many inadequacies in the committee's recommendations, some of which I would like to point out.

This report ignores the broad implications of its mandate in favour of the narrow, vested interests of the mining industry. No discussions were held with members of any of the native organizations or any other special interest groups in the territories—and there are quite a few—and although participation of northern residents is given token consideration, the report states that, and I quote:

> —its achievement must be coupled by an equally strong effort by industry to adapt the particular characteristics and strengths of northern people to the needs of industry.

I hesitate to say what the people up north would call that.

Furthermore, the report ignores the fact that a dispute over uranium mining in the Baker Lake area is now before the courts and that little information is available about the nature of industry-government negotiations concerning Cominco's proposed Arvik mine on Little Cornwallis Island. The uneasy conclusion is that policy is being formed by industry and government behind closed doors. Such approaches to development decision-making can only heighten suspicion and mistrust, and that is the process going on now.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to certain inconsistencies and inaccuracies which cast further doubt on the validity of this report as a basis for government policy. The report states, and I quote:

> Mining can be a most effective vehicle for increased economic activity and opportunity for employment and training for all people now living in the north or wishing some day to settle there.

Unfortunately, the record of native employment at such mines as Pine Point, Cyprus Anvil and Nanisivik has been dismal. Also, mining in the territories has to date been an export-oriented activity and has generated little in the way of secondary economic activity. History, therefore, contradicts this report's claim that sustained, long-term benefits will accrue to northerners.

The report also recommends, and I quote:

> Economic development of the north must proceed with full recognition of the legitimate interests of northern people and the protection of the environment.

Yet, in several places the report states that mineral rights should remain vested in the Crown regardless of future agreements with native people. This idea makes one wonder just what the committee considers to be legitimate interests.

While saying on the one hand that industry wishes to protect the environment, the report questions the continuing validity of the Thelon Game Sanctuary, a region which the uranium mining industry wishes to explore. The report also recommends that if economic development is to be prohibited on certain lands, the area of these lands should be kept to a minimum and that selection of lands take into account their potential mineral value. This seems to say that land set aside for environmental protection should be located where there are no minerals rather than where there are important wildlife populations or environmentally sensitive features to be protected.

If mining is to make a positive contribution to the long-term development of the north, I feel that it must be taken in its proper perspective as only one of several elements which can contribute to the benefit of northerners. It must not, for example, be allowed to interfere with management of renewable resources which are essential to the continuing survival of northern culture and economic well-being. Above all, the mining industry must not be permitted to supersede the legitimate rights and aspirations of the people of the north.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ittinuar: In the Speech from the Throne reference was made to the diversity of Canada as a national asset, and yet the thrust of northern policy seems to offer the native people only one alternative, that of assimilation. The throne speech made no reference to the Inuit or to the constitution, it made no reference to political development in the Northwest Territories, and in fact if recent developments in the Yukon are any indication, the present government is not really interested in involving native people in political change, except in a token way after the fact.

● (1510)

During the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) promised to let Yukoners decide through a referendum the question of provincial status. However, last week the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development took steps which bring the Yukon Territory government dangerously close in form to provincehood, and there was no referendum before that. I say "dangerously" for two reasons. First of all, the move was made without prior consultation with the Council of Yukon Indians whose outstanding claims are susceptible to the whims of politicians and political moods, and perhaps I should include myself in that circle. Secondly, with the framework of a provincial government already in place, the question of a referendum becomes academic. Residents of the Northwest Territories and Yukoners alike may, and do, desire responsible government, but we feel very strongly about being a part of the democratic planning process of such a government.

In the search for solutions to the question of political development in the north, the logical place to look is in the aspirations of the population itself. We believe this is the democratic way. The aspirations of the people in this case are embodied in the desire for a new province named Nunavut. This desire has been well thought out. It divides the Northwest Territories into manageable proportions, each of which has enough homogeneity to make public administration more efficient. The summary report of the advisory commission on the development of government in the Northwest Territories in 1966 recommended that Yellowknife be made the capital of the Northwest Territories. I wish to quote one of the reasons given. It reads as follows:

> It would be an appropriate location for the present political unit of the Northwest Territories or for the western part of a divided territory.

The Government of Canada, in creating the constituency of Nunatsiaq, has already recognized the natural boundary separating the eastern and western halves. Nunatsiaq is a culturally and geographically distinct area north of the tree line.

I now call upon the Government of Canada to recognize the legitimate aspirations of the people of Nunavut to become equal participants in the Canadian confederation. These aspirations are not in the least radical. It was only 30 years ago that Newfoundland joined confederation. At a time when national unity is being tried and tested, the people of Nunavut wish to be welcomed by their fellow Canadians into the fold of confederation.

On principle, I should like to speak in Inuktitut and say—

[Editor's Note: At this point Mr. Ittinuar spoke in Inuktitut.]

[Mr. Ittinuar.]

What I have just said is that I have been welcomed in the most cordial manner by members of all parties, except perhaps the Social Credit members. I thank them and I hope we can come to understand each other.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to extend to you personally my warmest greetings, as a friend and as one who can do an excellent job and assume his new responsibilities. I also want to take this opportunity to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the entire cabinet for the trust they have put in me. It is a great honour for me and for my constituents that I should be a member of the cabinet. Mr. Speaker, I hope to live up to the expectations and to serve the best interests of my country.

I also want to take the time to commend the Speaker of the House on his appointment to the office he has served with such excellence thus far and where he has shown his characteristic wisdom. I therefore want to wish him all the success he deserves and I might add that I truthfully would not want to be in his place, especially when he must give certain rulings. By the same token, I would not want to leave unmentioned the motion of the co-movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, two newcomers to this House who join us for this Thirty-first Parliament. That reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of my first years or first days in the House of Commons, some 12 years ago. I also want to congratulate all members on their reelection, in some cases, or their election, in other cases, especially the right hon. Prime Minister who, in less than three years, rose from private member to leader of his party to first citizen of Canada. It is a great honour for me and I think it should be felt by all Canadians.

Finally, I should like also to congratulate the new opposition leader (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the Leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada (Mr. Roy) and wish them too the best of luck. I should like to spend a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to thank especially the people of my constituency of Joliette for sending me for the fourth time as their elected representative in the House of Commons. I am aware that this is a great honour and I have every intention of living up to their expectations. I have always been faithful to them, Mr. Speaker, in spite of difficult circumstances. I have always held the mandate received from my constituents as something extremely precious, and I feel that their testimony has still more significance because the right hon. Prime Minister has now asked me to be part of his cabinet. Mr. Speaker, this is an honour I share with all my constituents.

I have been sitting in the House of Commons since 1968 and I have made it my duty to be sensitive to the needs of the electors in my riding. Despite the new responsibilities entrusted to me as Minister of Supply and Services, I shall certainly not neglect my own riding; I shall see to it that my electors benefit from some economic fall-out. I represent a riding that is in need of a new impetus in the economic field, and as the representative of the riding of Joliette in the House of Commons, I intend to spare no effort in helping to set the economy of my area back on track, as well as that of the whole country, which is not incompatible with renewed economic activity in my own area.

My electors have been patient. Some will recognize that. They have waited almost 12 years to be represented in cabinet. I certainly have no intention of disappointing them on that score, Mr. Speaker; I shall participate more than ever in consultations and the implementation of programs designed to improve the quality of life. Mr, Speaker, I would also like to take a few minutes to explain briefly the responsibilities of my department. My department, I am sure, as well as most public organizations responsible for purchases have always endeavoured to obtain the best value at the best price in deals concluded on behalf of the government.

The federal government has long since recognized that its purchase policy could promote economic development in Canada. Several provinces have acted likewise, each in its own way. Current financial conditions require that we grant more importance to our purchases to stimulate the Canadian economy and I would like to deal briefly with this matter. The public organizations responsible for business play an important role in the economy. In recent years, for example, the Department of Supply and Services has purchased goods and services worth annually some $3 billion. It is a substantial amount which represents only 15 per cent of the $20 billion spent annually at all levels of government for the purchase of goods and services.

We must not underestimate the economic repercussions of these expenses. Of course, governments are becoming ever more conscious of the fact that they have to exert the economic influence they have as buyers of goods and services, but it is also obvious that in order to obtain maximum advantages for Canada as a whole and for every province, we have devised a more co-operative working scheme with a view to making our buyer status more widely known.

No government or department can permanently play a pioneering role in that field. Which brings us down to the fundamental question, namely how to achieve unanimity among governments to rationalize and integrate our activities as much as is necessary. We have to achieve that unanimity within the limits of our objectives of integrity and profitability. Moreover, my department's policy is to give preference to companies whose head office is in Canada provided that the competition is sufficiently strong to assure us we will get our money's worth when time comes to negotiate contracts. The effect of that policy is to give Canadian enterprises more than 80 per cent of the total value of the market the Department of Supply and Services represents. As for the rest of our purchases from foreign companies, which represent 20 per cent of all our purchases, they generally concern military equipment which is of great technical complexity and which is not produced in Canada. The federal government tries to pull out of these purchases beneficial repercussions on the Canadian economy.

That is done by subcontracting and through the investments of suppliers in Canada. With respect to regional purchases, the policy of my department requires that goods and services be bought in the region involved provided there is enough competition. Consequently about 30 per cent of the purchases of my department are made through regional offices located all over Canada. As to the remaining 70 per cent, my department tries to make sure that all qualified Canadian corporations are invited to tender. The federal policy requires that certain products, like textile products, clothing and ships, be purchased exclusively in Canada. In addition, the scientific and technical products acquisition policy as well as the policy dealing with ammunitions give preference to Canadian corporations.

My department has tried to promote the interest of small and medium businesses. On average, it has given some 71 per cent of the number and 40 per cent of the annual value of those deals, worth $585 million, to small businesses. This percentage compares favourably with the over-all contribution of small businesses to the Canadian economy which is estimated to be between 25 and 30 per cent of the gross national product. This brief outline of the accomplishments of my department shows that worth-while efforts have been made to help Canadian industry but I believe we can still do much more.

In this respect, I believe it would be appropriate to rely more heavily on certain initiatives to get the most for our money while at the same time seeking to increase our help to Canadian industry through closer co-operation between three heavily involved departments, namely the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and my department. I believe we could consider in future studies on ways to make ourselves certain products we have to buy abroad which would enable us, along with those two other departments, to attract those industries to those so-called soft areas where unemployment is high. As I see it, perhaps that would dispel the concern voiced by the premier of Quebec last night in Hull, since he aims at establishing equity of purchases proportionally to the population of the provinces. Mr. Speaker, I am committed to try to meet this objective with the co-operation of these two departments so that my province may finally be treated equally and so that the purchases may be made throughout the country with the same equity, with which all hon. members on the other side as well as my colleagues would certainly agree.

If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I shall take this opportunity to express my personal satisfaction at the fact that the Speech from the Throne refers to certain measures aimed at stimulating the Canadian economy.

In my capacity of a member of the cabinet, I insisted as early as the Jasper meeting that some emphasis be placed on economic revival, and I am pleased to see that my message was understood. The reinforcement of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the original program, it must be recognized, of tax credits for mortgage interests and property taxes, the development of a national tourist industry development strategy in cooperation with provinces, assistance for small and medium businessess, Mr. Speaker, these are all clear indications of the will of our government to take direct action to put the Canadian economy back on its feet. And I would not want to forget to mention the intention of the government to establish a national assistance program for the handicapped.

Our decision to hold a national conference on economic development with all our partners, that is business, unions, co-operatives and other groups in all the provinces, shows that we intend to consult those involved before deciding on any course of action. This conference, which is a sort of summit meeting of all economic development officers in Canada, reflects the new spirit of co-operation that the right hon. Prime Minister wants to instill in our country.

In this regard, I would like to underline, like the right hon. Prime Minister, that it is no longer a few members of the elite who decide on the direction to give the policies of Canada, but members of parliament elected democratically and representing all the provinces. This is a good illustration, Mr. Speaker, of true federalism which goes from the bottom up instead of what we have suffered for too long, a federalism shaped like an inverted pyramid which suffocates any private initiative. I am also happy to note the open mind with which we intend to conduct federal-provincial relations. This will be our trademark, Mr. Speaker, and not only until the Quebec referendum, but also afterwards.

Personally I have always spoken openly in favour of a renewed and decentralized form of federalism. It is not without regret that I have witnessed for the past ten years this battle waged by the commandos of the former minister in charge of federal-provincial relations and which has only resulted in hardening the positions taken by the provinces, Quebec in particular, toward the federal government. I therefore rejoice at the announcement made by the Prime Minister with regard to this matter wherein he urged all members of the House to adopt a more open minded stance, more directly geared to economic realities and our differences which should be better understood in order to better unite us. This spirit of co-operation pleases me and I for one certainly intend to put it into practice openly, Mr. Speaker. I would like to add right now that in my case this is not a sudden conversion to a new style because it has been a point of view that I have held ever since I started representing my riding in this House.

However, I understand that the attitude suggested to us by the Prime Minister will not be easy for everyone. Nevertheless I think that the time has come to bury the hatchet. From now on, we shall see the start of a new era. It is the end of fruitless battles, the disappearance of scarecrows that were used to frighten everyone. It is also the end of propaganda. Everything has been said and it is now time for action.

Since May 22, the date of the election of our party, an easing of minds has replaced the stress maintained for too long and deliberately created by our opponents. In the last four months we have tried to emphasize the aspects which draw us closer to the provinces, particularly Quebec, rather than underlining points of divergence. I really believe that we shall have to develop the approach which consists of listening to the desires of other people.

Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed for too long a dialogue of the deaf between the federal government and my province in particular. I think we are going towards more openness. We live in a tremendously rich country with considerable wealth. It will be to our advantage to share all we have at a time when the economic situation invites us to think of our fellow citizens.

The government of which I have the privilege to be a member refused to choose national unity as its platform in the last election and I am happy it did. In fact, on this side of the House, we believe that there are many other priorities requiring immediate intervention and if the re-establishment of an economic climate is achieved, we should not neglect the importance of constitutional changes that would be much easier in a climate more favourable to discussions and negotiations with the provinces.

I have always considered that it would not be very advantageous to create a confrontation with partners which form the Canadian nation. But I still believe we have everything to gain by finding together, in a spontaneous research effort, better ways of living where all Canadians, French and English alike, will live in unison.

Mr. Speaker, our opponents too often demonstrated that a common ground will not be found by accusing others, especially not our Quebec partners. More flexibility, some open-mindedness, less arrogance and intolerance seem to be called for if we are to start on the road to reconciliation, especially on the eve of the forthcoming Quebec referendum to be held next spring.

I noticed that some hon. members opposite were outraged last week—they may still be today—that we put aside what I would call an instrument of confrontation and aggression, the referendum bill, which I fought vigorously last spring. Our party, our government also realized this was not the way to treat people in Quebec. We believe in the maturity of Quebeckers. We are confident that, with proposals and above all with an attitude of concertation rather than confrontation, we will prove to all Quebeckers that their future and the numerous benefits offered by this country still lie within a constitutional framework, albeit much more flexible that anything we could invent until now. Therefore, when I listened to the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger), who earlier raised questions:

• (1530)

How come Ontario and British Columbia pay more for goods when they could get them cheaper in Quebec? How come our economy is almost at its lowest? How come this country is divided? I forgive him, Mr. Speaker, he is a new member. He may not have followed what his party did in the last ten years. How is it that a government made up of about 60 Quebeckers that has ruled for 16 years has put the country in a situation like this? How is it that they have been unable to provide Quebeckers with the message they were expecting?

How about the co-operation Quebeckers expected from them? The member should know that the number of people in Quebec dissatisfied with federalism as advocated by his party has increased I do not know how many times. They have failed and they should ask themselves how it is that our country is in such a poor economic state. How come his own party has let unemployment soar from 200,000 to 1,500,000 in less than ten years? That is the kind of questions the member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) should ask himself instead of interrupting those who have points to make like me today.

I suggest that this adaptability on our part and, as I said, our willingness to listen to our counterparts in the various provinces will greatly help us build the foundation of a rejuvenated federalism much more in line with the provinces' aspirations. I am not inventing anything, Mr. Speaker, simply watching what is going on in Canada. Over the past 12 years which I have spent sitting in the House as elected representative for the Joliette riding, I have witnessed a great many confrontations which could have been prevented, in my opinion, if only the previous administration had demonstrated greater understanding.

Need I remind my hon. colleagues, for instance, of the sales tax imbroglio when I was deeply ashamed to hear my Quebec colleagues fly in the face of the most evident aspirations and interests of the province of Quebec. These are the people who are now accusing us of selling out to the provinces. Yet, they are the very people who are responsible for Canadian unity being put to the test, because they enjoyed these confrontations with the provinces; now they are wondering what essentially we mean when we talk about a greater need for understanding and adaptability with the provinces.

This desire to allow the provinces to participate in the major national decisions, this deep desire on the part of the Prime Minister and all my cabinet colleagues to give the provinces the opportunity to discuss important decisions having direct implications on their own economy: here is the kind of federalism and the kind of administration we want to establish, Mr. Speaker. They charge that we are willing to sell out to the provinces and yet they are the ones who, after 16 years in power, have succeeded in tearing the country apart as is the case today, Mr. Speaker. I feel no sympathy for that kind of argument which they use too often.

Even the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin), last week in Winnipeg together with a few Liberals, of course, are looking for a side track, a more secure way. I understand them because I have gone through that myself if it can make you feel better. I have experienced that but now they are going to go through it for a while, and I do not mind at all. Don't worry. Last weekend, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton went to Winnipeg to say—he was taking the words out of my mouth—that the time has come to go toward a flexible federalism. Flexibility, adaptability, those are not their inventions. Of course, the reporter could not do better than say: The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton has taken up the statements of the present Prime Minister of Canada. I was happy to read that. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton after what he had to do, and he is probably not always at ease with his party, considering the recommendations he made, still understood, and we are aware of it and very pleased about it, that some flexibility is necessary. Do not forget that, boys. Flexibility is important; you have not understood anything for a long time. Mr. Speaker, the degree of frustration of thousands of Canadians, of Quebeckers in particular, is only equalled by the morbid tenaciousness and the spirit of persecution developed by our opponents with a high degree of refinement to try to find opportunities to multiply confrontations and altercations with my province in particular, which is also their province.

We do not intend to dig up the hatchet of the Liberals, Mr. Speaker, but rather, as I said earlier, to begin a sustained dialogue. Today we are harvesting the results of the storm created by the former government. We intend to head for brighter skies, Mr. Speaker, by being more open to the claims of Quebec and of the other provinces on this side of the House. In this instance also, patience and time can do more than—

Mr. Olivier: —force and rage.

Mr. La Salle: —than force and rage. The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) knows that. But I am surprised that he has not put it in practice more often.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to say a few words about our concerns in another area—

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): The hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) on a point of order.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I regret to interrupt the minister and member for Joliette. I commend him for his speech but I would ask him to restrict his judgments. I would also ask him, when he judges another member of this House, to tell us where he is quoting from and where he draws his examples. I am quite prepared to put them in practice, so long as he tells us where he draws them from. Mr. Speaker, the results of the May 22 election prove unquestionably that Quebeckers rejected his party, as they always have.

Mr. La Salle: I could certainly give the hon. member some examples, but I do not recall hearing him speak in the House and I cannot draw anything from his actions.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will not give the examples the hon. member requests because there are not enough—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I request that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. La Salle) carry on with his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to. In another connection, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say two words about a daily concern, namely that of the development of agriculture in Canada and in Quebec in particular. Concern has been expressed because no specific mention of agriculture was made in the Speech from the Throne, but you may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that agriculture will be taken care of because that industry is of capital importance in our economic forecasts. Let no one worry about that. In this House I represent a riding whose economy, for the major part agricultural, depends on the resources of the soil. My riding of Joliette is an area whose production is largely agricultural in nature.

The situation of the dairy industry as a whole is also of major concern to us. It has experienced difficult years. My hon. friends across the way will remember that. We were not in power, Mr. Speaker, but I remember well what happened. I merely want to point out, for the guidance of my colleagues, that the Progressive Conservative government authorized, within a few weeks after May 22, an increase in the quotas of milk produced for export by some three million hundred weights, which represents sales of some $39 million for dairy producers. In the near future we also expect to increase by 1 to 2 per cent the quotas of milk and its by-products for consumption. The 20 cents previously withheld and recently reimbursed to the producers amounted to $26 million of which $13 million went to Quebec alone. To my mind, those figures prove our consideration for agriculture. Last month, my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), had the opportunity of inaugurating a processing plant at Sainte-Claire; the project had been initiated by the previous government. I am very happy to say the plant opened recently.

That was part of an investment amounting to $2 million which also allowed the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to spend $500,000 in the port of Quebec to store about 100,000 tons of products. That will bring into the economy of the greater Quebec City area investments amounting to $50 million. Another project of that type is in progress in Saint-Alexandre, near Rivière-du-Loup, which calls for an investment of around $7 million for the establishment of a processing plant.

These were, at least for the moment, some of our achievements, would it be only to show how interested we are in agriculture. I believe that my party, considering that its members are much more representative of the rural sector than people were inclined to think so far—and I personally have an important role to play, Mr. Speaker, because I have already received countless submissions from farmer groups with which, just like with my friends from the other side, I will be very pleased to co-operate in order to improve the conditions of farmers in my province—will be very pleased to support any legislation which would allow our country as a whole, whatever province it may affect directly, to benefit from subsidies or policies which would answer current needs, considering the present circumstances.

I think, Mr. Speaker, my time is running out. I wanted to take this opportunity to remind the House that we are looking forward to an excellent session, and that we also expect to achieve certain objectives, including two which are fundamental: restoring the economic climate in this country, and of course decreasing unemployment with, hopefully, some help insofar as one would want to be objective enough. I think our friends opposite will have to show a minimum of objectivity and co-operation to help the government realize those good intentions.

As for the unity of this country, we will spare nothing to realize the fundamental objective of all Canadians, that is to recognize their differences and then accept them and strive together to build a wonderful country which can assure equity, equality and justice for everyone.

• (1540)

[English]

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, may I join in congratulating you upon your appointment to your high office. I share also in the tradition of this House in congratulating the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) upon their speeches. Perhaps I may be permitted a personal note of congratulations to the hon. member for Cardigan, since I suppose in a way he is my member of parliament, representing as he does a beautiful area where I am happy to say I still have the land on which my ancestors settled some 200 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I represent a new constituency in metropolitan Toronto, Etobicoke North, a vital area where industry, particularly light and high-technology industry, leads our constituents to take a lively interest in economic policies pursued by the government, particularly those relating to industrial stategy. Etobicoke North is a constituency of hard-working, diligent citizens, many of whom have only recently become Canadians, and all of whom are eager to see new opportunities created for Canadians to participate in the development of their own country, to realize their pride in Canadian initiative and capacities.

It is partly for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to say something this afternoon about trade and industrial development in Canada and about our assistance to developing countries.

The GATT agreements, completed last spring in Geneva, are the most recent stage in the long, difficult progress toward freer trade which began in the late 1930s. The recent so-called Tokyo Round was in several respects the most demanding in that prolonged process. The easier tariff reductions had been made as the result of the earlier negotiations; by 1973, when the Tokyo discussions began, the ingenuity of man had devised such a panoply of non-tariff barriers to replace traditional tariffs that growth in international trade was becoming increasingly trammelled.

Against this background, it is remarkable that so much was accomplished in Geneva. Much more, however, remains to be done here at home if Canada is to benefit fully from these marathon trade talks. Much of the task remaining concerns our relations with the United States. I take as my starting point certain implications for Canada from the GATT agreements, but Canadians should be under no illusion that we really have before us a much more fundamental question: our ability to order our future economic relations with the United States so that we can pursue our own unique social and cultural needs—so that, in short, we can give greater expression to our Canadian values, practices and traditions.

Canada and the United States are now committed to virtual free trade at the end of eight years, in the broader context of global reductions in tariff and non-tariff barriers. This is a development which, at least in theory, is to be welcomed.Freer access to world markets, and freer access to one of the largest and most prosperous of such markets, the United States of America, should help Canadian industry to rid itself of that persistent deterrent to greater productivity and international competitiveness: the hitherto limited size of the market for Canadian products.

The question of the actual costs and benefits of freer trade is a complex one, Mr. Speaker, but it is now one which requires prompt attention. In the past, the discussion has been a somewhat leisurely one; with the conclusion of the GATT agreements, it becomes an urgent one. If my advocacy of early action appears to have any partisan overtone, I should like to draw the government's attention to a recent plea from Mr. Robert Stanfield. In April he stated:

> In view of the importance of economies of scale, can we continue to thrive without a wider area of free trade with the United States? On the other hand, can we preserve sufficient independence if we do have a wider area of free trade with the United States? The question of entering the European Common Market was a difficult one for the United Kingdom, but no one country dominates the Common Market as the United States would dominate any partial or total common market between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Stanfield went on to say:

> These questions are crucially important to Canada and to Canadian politicians ... However, there has been little political debate yet about such a move ... It will be interesting to see whether Canadians try to halt further economic integration with the U.S. and accept the resulting economic difficulties, or on the other hand try to secure increased access to the U.S. market and to build in the necessary safeguards. The debate must soon begin in earnest, and at the highest level of Canadian politics.

I have noted some theoretical benefits of free trade. Reality is, unfortunately, somewhat different from economic theory. Canada is unique among non-communist nations in that the country to which 70 per cent of our trade, including 82 per cent of our manufactured exports, is directed, is the same country that controls a majority of our manufacturing sector and significant segments of our resources and related industries. The uniqueness of this Canadian situation is underlined if one recalls that, in the post-war European experience of free trade, there has been, as one observer has noted, "the union of more equally sized industrial economies and/or ones whose industry is not dominated economically by the branches of one neighbour."

Today United States corporations dominate manufacturing in Canada despite tariff walls. Tomorrow we shall have virtually no tariff walls or non-tariff barriers with the U.S.A.

The extent of foreign investment in Canada, mainly from the United States, is familiar. In any assessment of the net benefits and debits of this investment, it must be recognized that this has brought in its train a degree of foreign indebtedness again unique among industrialized nations. During recent decades there has been an increasingly large outflow of royalties and dividends and a parallel perceived need to keep Canadian interest rates above those in the U.S.A., with all the implications that this has for our own fiscal policy.

Second, given the fact that the United States is both our major trading partner and controls significant sectors of our economy, much of what is described as "trade" between our two countries is, in fact, intra-company movements of components or finished products within a single U.S. corporation, not deals at arm's length and not necessarily governed by market forces.

Third, with regard to exports, while some subsidiaries in Canada have received "global mandates" for their products, others are either assigned restricted export territories or excluded altogether from exporting. As an additional method of achieving greater profitability for the parent corporation, limitations are also in many cases placed on research and development, product development, or manufacturing diversification.

I was interested to note that, in a recent speech, the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) deplored, as he should, the lack of export freedom of some subsidiaries in Canada. I regretted however, that he was silent about what should be done. A report recently made to his colleague, the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Grafftey), by the ad hoc advisory committee on research and development sets out a promising review process with subsidiaries restricted in their export freedom. I recommend that the Minister for State for International Trade read that report. There will, I hope, be opportunities to pursue this point at a later stage.

Against this background, it would be idle, in light of the recent GATT agreements, to regard tariff or non-tariff barriers as being effective tools in any long-term industrial strategy for Canada. To achieve our dual goals of greater industrial development and Canadian control, we must look elsewhere. In selecting our tools, first let us attempt to visualize what the principal adverse effects of free trade with the United States may be.

As the possibilities for increased profits resulting from free trade are fully recognized by U.S. corporations, presumably they will review which manufacturing subsidiaries in Canada might be profitably shut down and moved to a U.S. factory, in a continental rationalization to achieve greater productivity, including economies of scale. The size of U.S. investment in Canada would be no blanket deterrent to such a trend, although transport and other costs might be in some cases. The current migration of certain U.S. manufacturing activities from New England to the lower cost southern states readily suggets the mobility of such investment.

Further, as both Canada and the United States increasingly feel the impact of higher energy costs and especially the competition of low-cost manufactures from the Third World, bringing heavy pressure on labour-intensive manufacturing, presumably the first jobs to be preserved by U.S. corporations would be at home rather than in Canada, whenever such a choice had to be made. Finally, even if a branch plant is left in Canada, it would become fully integrated into a continental operation, reducing the need for senior management talent in Canada.

While this migration was occurring, Canadian firms presumably would concurrently attempt to take advantage of free entry into the U.S. market and overseas. Although the U.S. reaction to free trade which I have described is likely to be successful for the corporations involved, since it would accord with the simple laws of the marketplace, it is not at all as certain that Canadian initiatives to benefit from free trade will be equally successful. Indeed, multinational corporations are, by their very nature, more likely to have the resources and flexibility required to take full advantage of the opportunities offered by free trade. It would, for example, be a reasonable, if broad, assumption that, unless adjustment assistance, including assistance in meeting capital costs in reorganization, were provided to small Canadian firms, they will be decidedly less likely to make the transition to free trade than a major U.S. corporation already familiar with both the U.S. and Canadian markets.

Given the fact that significant sectors of the Canadian economy are dominated by U.S. corporations, the Canadian government will be the only entity large enough to take a lead in attempting to select industrial sectors capable of competing in international markets, especially in the United States. Although governments, with the possible exception of the Japanese, do not seem to be very good at foreseeing the industrial future or predicting the course of technological change, and although it would be an uphill struggle against dominant U.S. corporations, the Canadian government should attempt to foster the emergence of viable Canadian players in the U.S. economy and beyond.

The necessary industrial development policy to achieve this will be found in several respects synonymous with a policy promoting investment by Canadians in Canadian companies or the acquisition of foreign-controlled subsidiaries.

The creation of the Foreign Investment Review Agency resulted from the growing realization on the part of the federal government of the day that ad hoc measures to deal with foreign investment were inadequate and that more was necessary to meet public concern over the disadvantages from the growing foreign investment in Canada.

It may be that FIRA has increased the benefits to Canada of such investment, but the fact remains that through both reinvestment and acquisition foreign control has continued to grow. I for one regret that the governments of Canada since the Second World War have found themselves incapable of doing more to ensure benefits to Canadians from foreign investment and to promote investment by Canadians in Canada.

The previous government did put into place several policies aimed mainly at promoting Canadian entrepreneurship in small and medium-sized businesses, a sector not so dominated by foreign corporations. These policies have contributed in varying degrees to the recent growth in new Canadian businesses, the more rapid growth of existing ones and the acquisition of foreign-controlled firms. They also represent the degree to which both the federal and provincial governments have already intervened in substantial ways to assist the private sector in dealing with structural problems, particularly in the manufacturing sector.

However, an overly interventionist approach on the part of government may well lead to greater inefficiencies and have little real effect on productivity. There is a vast difference between policies such as free trade, both internal and external, a more effective competition policy, particularly on mergers and monopolies and tax incentives, on the one hand, and government procurement policy, enforced mergers, and protection against imports of technology on the other.

The government should define a role for itself that encourages, without interfering unduly in the private sector; that promotes co-ordination between levels of government and among industries; that builds a positive relationship with business and labour and supports a nationally based industrial strategy emphasizing employment opportunities and Canadian ownership.

For some years now, the phrase "industrial strategy" has been much in vogue. At its most simplistic, the strategy has been put in military terms: a grand plan which, if once devised and followed consistently, would surely lead to victory. In these terms, the search for an industrial strategy has been as barren as the search for the Holy Grail.

There cannot, in fact, be such a thing as a single, grand industrial strategy. Residual tariff protection may, for example, remain important for some sectors and the very last thing that other sectors require. Recognition of the fact that for Canada there cannot be a single strategy but rather a number of co-ordinated sector strategies led the previous government to establish the Board of Economic Development. It in turn worked with labour, business and the provincial governments to begin the elaboration of 21 sector strategies.

● (1600)

We must continue to develop more specific sector policies and instruments. We must begin to categorize our industrial activity according to the potential that it offers this country in the immediate and longer term. Those industries and sectors which have high potential for producing internationally competitive goods should receive priority in industrial incentives.

Other sectors of the Canadian economy are in need of adjustment assistance to meet the challenge of increasing imports, particularly from the Third World. Any sector strategies worthy of the name will necessarily raise questions of investment priorities of both Canadian and foreign-controlled corporations in Canada and the incentives of both the federal and provincial governments to encourage them in certain agreed directions. The provinces have, for example, significant powers regarding mergers and acquisitions; their full participation will be essential.

Within this framework of a co-ordinated industrial sector strategy, the role of FIRA would be enhanced. It could then realize its potential as a tool of industrial strategy. If the federal government, in consultation with other major players in the economy, were able to develop genuine, as opposed to self-serving, industrial strategies for major sectors, a foreign takeover or expansion could be judged by FIRA on the criteria of its compatability with designated internationally competitive sectors, and industries within those sectors. I am pleased that in a special committee of this House there will be opportunity to develop additional thinking about foreign investment, including FIRA. I am sure that the committee will be ably chaired by the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Jupp).

I have said that additional measures are required to promote Canadian ownership, an essential development if we are to achieve that degree of economic independence necessary to enable us to pursue our own fiscal needs and to reduce the unacceptably high outflow of dividends, royalties and other invisibles which so bedevils our attempts at responsible economic management. There will, I understand, be occasion during the budget debate and when the GATT agreements are placed before this House to advance proposals in detail. Accordingly, I shall merely touch upon a few today.

Although tax measures can sometimes be rightly attacked as socially inequitable, they can, if implemented wisely, be an effective means of encouraging Canadians to invest in Canadian equities. Tax shelter provisions have directed considerable amounts of additional investment into specific areas. There appears to be no reason why this tool should not be applied, as appropriate, to Canadian-controlled ventures in other sectors.

The establishment of business credit insurance companies, as proposed by the Board of Economic Development, should help to open additional major pools of capital, including pension funds.

With regard to the vital area of research and development, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has rightly urged tax incentives to make such investment more attractive in comparison with other investment opportunities. Share ownership by employees and additional activities for the Canada Development Corporation offer further opportunities to promote Canadian ownership and to assist Canadian companies in equipping themselves for the formidable challenges facing Canada as we enter a world of freer trade.

These are but a few instances where progress can be made in encouraging Canadian investment in Canada. There will be occasion to develop this thinking further. But if Canadian exports and ownership of our own industry are to be successfully extended, with all the attendant benefits for Canadians, three fundamental steps must be taken without delay. First, the establishment of a consultative forum involving business, labour and federal and provincial governments is long overdue. Second, federal efforts must be intensified to reduce regional preoccupations and to promote a freer internal market in Canada. Third, agreement must be reached soon with the United States on the terms of mutually beneficial government purchasing and on limiting the use of countervailing duties.

As Canada adjusts to free trade with the United States over the next eight years, the implementation of a comprehensive industrial strategy should help to put us in a position to compete more effectively in the U.S. market, as well as with U.S. imports at home, and to encourage Canadian ownership. In this evolving trade situation, there are both new opportunities and new challenges for Canadians. But we should also recognize that there are limitations arising from historical trends and certain geographic factors which will determine the scope and nature of those opportunities and challenges.

So it is, Mr. Speaker, in the yet broader area of Canada's external relations of which trade relations are such an important part. It was both a surprise and a cause of regret that while the throne speech raised several issues with a foreign affairs dimension—for example, oil pricing—there is not one word about Canada's foreign policy in either the throne speech or in the Prime Minister's (Mr. Clark) subsequent speech in this debate. Not a word about our relations with the United States, NATO, the United Nations, the commonwealth and la Francophonie, peacekeeping, disarmament, development assistance. Not one word, yet paradoxically during the many months which passed between the calling of the election and the calling of Parliament, it was foreign affairs which absorbed much of the time of the Prime Minister. The Tokyo economic summit, the Commonwealth conference in Zambia and the profound silliness of souring our hitherto good and growing relations with the Moslem world were issues to which the new government devoted much of its first months in office. And yet in the throne speech, not one word about foreign policy.

After more than four months Canadians have little more information on the approach of the new government toward our foreign relations than the two recent speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald), one at the United Nations and the second in Toronto. Additional clues, albeit vague and contradictory, may be gleaned from the speeches of other ministers.

Given the confusing character of these various statements, there is ample opportunity to speculate about how the government intends to contribute to international peace, disarmament and prosperity. Time, however, is limited, so I shall restrict myself to the questions of development assistance and, by implication, our relations with the Third World.

Since coming to office, the minister has stated that government policy is to concentrate Canadian aid on those countries approaching what several decades ago became known as economic "take-off", or self-sustaining growth. What is one to make of this curious statement? For example, if one does oneself what one would have others do, who then would remain to assist the poorest of the poor countries? To take another instance, is one to assume that Canada in a search for "take-off" countries will now direct its aid to the OPEC countries, countries which are achieving capital inflows adequate, if wisely employed, to ensure "take-off"?

If it is now the minister's intention to attempt to accelerate their "take-off" process by directing our aid toward the OPEC countries, she may be disappointed in her ambitions. Many of these countries are the same which have been alienated by the government's gratuitous and hapless intrusion into the long-vexed question of Jerusalem. The minister must accordingly look to other regions for those more affluent developing countries where Canada is to concentrate its aid, perhaps Latin America. Yet the minister's recently stated misgivings about human rights in Argentina and the consequent deplorable failure to develop our trade relations there would seem to exclude Argentina. Many of the other Latin American countries, such as Brazil and Venezuela, are rich in resources; can she really have them in mind? On the other hand, few countries of Africa have yet achieved the circumstances attending economic "take-off", so presumably they do not qualify. In any case, Africa is excluded, since the minister stated in Toronto that Africa is no longer an area of commitment for Canada. The fact is that southern Africa, especially Namibia, represents one of the most inflammable areas of the world today, but the minister asked in her Toronto speech, who cares?

One more example: Pakistan, a country singled out for having said some things which, in the minister's view, were unfriendly. Now our assistance to Pakistan is brought into question. Here indeed is a new doctrine for Canadian aid: "You will receive aid only if you agree with us, with our policies, even if Canadians themselves consider them to be singularly wrong-headed".

[Mr. MacLaren.]

I have spent a few minutes on this review of recent bizarre statements on development assistance by the minister because their cumulative effect has been to spread confusion. Our links with many developing countries have their roots in shared history. The countries of formerly British Asia and Africa are tied to us through a common link with Britain, which has become an enduring connection through the institutions of the commonwealth. Our relations with French-speaking Africa are made closer by our shared membership in la Francophonie. These are not ties to be dismissed lightly, as they have been by the minister.

We maintain these connections with the Third World for reasons that have as much to do with international stability and security as with international charity. We cannot therefore dismiss countries because they are not about to "take off" economically. While many of the poorest countries are not yet in a position to offer commercial opportunities to Canadians, our assistance is not therefore wasted. In our volatile world, links between developed and developing countries play a stabilizing role. The intense north-south debate of the past few years should at least have taught us that developing countries are more articulate and more united than ever before, and that their participation as members on a more even footing in the international economic system is essential if we are to be able to preserve a mutually advantageous equilibrium.

We cannot afford at this point in north-south relations to be parsimonious and unimaginative. Even the poorest developing countries have an equal voice at international gatherings. And their comparatively more wealthy allies, countries such as Mexico, Nigeria and Indonesia, have been supporting their demands. Can it really be to Canada's benefit, I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to cut off the ties which have been laboriously built up over time in the hope of obtaining some undefined and possibly unrealizable benefits for Canadian exporters?

We must continue to act upon the principles that underlie our involvement in peace keeping and development assistance around the world. Canada's contributions to world peace and more harmonious relations between north and south may be quantitatively small, but they continue to have an impact as evidence of our willingness as a prosperous nation to contribute to the advancement of others. We must not reduce foreign policy to a daily or monthly balance sheet. Our contributions, whether in the form of peace keeping troops or development projects, do not necessarily result in immediately tangible rewards. Yet we are undoubtedly contributing to security and economic growth on a global scale.

Let us have done with cant and compounded contradictions. Let us again, drawing upon our Judaeo-Christian traditions, drawing upon the skills and knowledge of our commonwealth and Francophone background, continue the task which all the governments of post-war Canada have set themselves. Let us continue to demonstrate the imagination and perseverance which has marked Canada's approach to external aid throughout the past decades.

Mrs. Diane Stratas (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct privilege to be present in this House today. I am proud to be the member for Scarborough Centre. I am here with humility, remembering that my presence in this chamber is the end result of the support of many good people in Scarborough Centre whose judgment it was that I should be their voice in Parliament. It is my responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to work hard for them six full days of each and every week. I do so with great joy. On the seventh day, I rest and recharge my batteries to renew myself mentally, physically and spiritually. Then, too, the seventh day I spend with my family, with our three boys of whom we are very proud, and with my husband.

With your permission, sir, I will pay tribute to my husband. It was he, when I was asked to consider declaring as a candidate for nomination, who acknowledged that the time was right for me, on behalf of our family, to offer our community of Scarborough Centre the ultimate service one can give: to serve as a member of Parliament. It was he who added his strength to mine during the extended and indefinite pre-writ period. It was he, with his superb sense of humour, who kept me and those around me from losing a sense of perspective during the election campaign. And now, Mr. Speaker, it is he who willingly fulfils the role of parliamentary spouse concurrently with that of husband.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Stratas: Tribute, too, should be paid to you, Mr. Speaker. Congratulations have been extended to you by other members here. I add mine, combined with tribute, because it is fitting to do so to one who has displayed such reason, moderation and wisdom while exercising his duties. Congratulations are also due to the Clerk of the House. He comes from Saskatchewan, the province of my birth, so I feel a particular warmth as I extend best wishes to him and to his colleagues at the outset of the Thirty-first Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I stand in this august chamber eager to participate in this session of Parliament, clothed in the innocence of a neophyte. I aspired to come here for many reasons, the main motive being to represent the people of Scarborough Centre. During the campaign I was asked what class of people reside in my constituency. My reply was: "The salt of the earth class." We are ordinary folk, Mr. Speaker, the kind of folk who built this great land. We live in town houses, bungalows, apartments; we have churches and schools; we are young, middle aged and elderly; we are small business and light industry; we are right in the centre of Scarborough. We are the hub of Scarborough. I was eager to represent these people because I could see at the time that the administration—now the former administration—was intent on eliminating the middle class, eradicating it from Canada. My concern was acute because a thriving middle class is one of the main elements of democracy.

And I sought to come to this august chamber, Mr. Speaker, because in my former life—my pre-political life—I had known the frustration of being mute. So I sought to come here to speak for those who were mute, to speak for the poor, to speak for the young, to speak for those who wish me to speak for them, to speak for the ordinary folks. The Master Maker exercised His creative genius best when he made us, the ordinary folks. That is why he made so many of us.

He made us all so different, yet the more we are different the more we are alike. We have the same pain, fear, joy and hope. We have the capacity, when necessity demands it, to change from ordinary folk and become extraordinary folk, to rise to a challenge and overcome adversity. Above all, we have the same innocence, and it is this innocence which makes us shy away from something we know little about.

Thus, I was delighted to hear in the Speech from the Throne which His Excellency delivered last week that freedom of information was the first of what I call pillars of progress to be contained in the speech. Citizens and Parliament can control government if information is public, and citizens can come to know government. For our own sakes we must know government, and then and only then will the erosion of democracy be curtailed.

I come here as an idealist. Someone once defined an idealist as a person who knows that a rose is more beautiful than a cabbage and therefore believes that a rose will make better soup. I come here, as I said, as an idealist. I believe that the ideal is possible, if one works hard enough for it, but I have made soup. I know that cabbage makes better soup, so it is the ideal that I will strive to achieve here as a member of Parliament, ever mindful of the fact that it is soup which we need in Canada, cabbage soup. Ordinary folks' soup is what we need.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Stratas: With the last government it must have been very frustrating to cope with the publicly enunciated commitment to wrestle inflation to the ground while living with an administration which followed another policy altogether. That policy was to govern by headline, to govern on an ad hoc basis and to remember political expediency above all else. However, I can assure hon. members of the opposition who have experienced the frustrations and the dilemma of toeing the party line while trying to maintain their integrity, and their credibility too, that with this government those frustrations do not exist; nor will they exist because in this government ad hockery is non-existent. Headline hunting is not the main motive of this government. Integrity exists in government now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Stratas: This is very obvious in the Speech from the Throne. It is a first things first speech. In it is demonstrated that long-term planning rather than short-term political expediency exists in government now.

As I said earlier, I am a novice member of this House, so I consider it fitting that I come here during the International Year of the Child. I am a child in some respects compared with some of the more senior and very respected members of the House, but I am not afraid to admit that I have much to learn, and I believe that sometimes innocence is an advantage. This is a new government; our slate is clean.

It is a particular honour, too, to take my seat in the House of Commons in the month of the fiftieth anniversary of the "persons" case. As I look around the House, it occurs to me to point out that at the present rate of increase the House will be half filled with women in 842 years! It is like a marriage; the first 100 years are the hardest. One consideration of a novice member in this House is the fear of losing credibility through, I am told, ill-advised or ill-considered espousement of a cause.

When the novice is like me, a woman, and the cause is women's rights, the fear is more than justifiable. No parliamentarian can afford to be branded, not if he expects to make any serious contribution to government. To speak too forcibly too soon for women's rights would be to brand myself as a feminist, which is pretty low, so to speak, generally on the credibility scale.

However, 50 years after the BNA Act came into effect women were not constitutionally recognized as persons. Women were not "persons in matters of rights and privileges but only persons in matters of pains and penalties". Moreover, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that it would be dangerous to assume that women could be considered persons in terms of the BNA Act wording that the government summon "qualified persons" to the Senate. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of Britain, at that time Canada's final court of appeal, overruled the Supreme Court decision, and I would like to quote exactly the words of the Privy Council decision.

> The exclusion of women from all public office is a relic of days more barbarous than ours, and to those who ask why the word "person" should include females, the obvious answer is, "Why not?"

Fifty years ago I would not have been considered a person. Today I am a member of this very worthy House. Nevertheless, the fact remains that women form only 2.8 per cent of the complement of this House, although they form more than 50 per cent of the population of Canada. The fact remains, according to the national council on welfare report tabled just last week, that 16 per cent of adult Canadian women live in poverty; that is, one out of every six women manages to survive somehow on incomes below the Statistics Canada poverty line. The fact remains that in Canada two out of every three elderly widows have incomes below the poverty line, and less than one widow in four can expect to receive any regular benefits from her deceased husband's employer. The fact remains that 68 per cent of single mothers under age 35 have incomes below the poverty line. "I do not mind refusing them potato chips and cookies," one spouseless mother said, "but it really bothers me when I have to say no when they ask for a banana".

A traditional comment about women members of Parliament is that they tend to concentrate only on "soft" issues like health, social welfare, culture and the family, but it is my belief that these so-called soft issues are the very fabric of society.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Stratas: If the fabric is rotten or of inferior quality, then all the seams in the world will not hold it together. The facts prove, moreover, that women have shown interest, expertise and leadership in widely diverse areas of legislation and jurisdiction in the House. Private members' bills introduced by women have dealt with such matters as amendments to the Criminal Code, modernization of the Copyright Act, the creation of a department of consumer affairs and the regulation of election expenses as well as bills affecting women and maternity benefits, abortion and equal pay.

Much remains to be done in terms of legislation concerning women's rights. It must be remembered too that legislation must be implemented to be effective. Ambiguous or unenforcible legislation makes a mockery of law. This must be avoided above all else. What must also be avoided is the impatient shelving of women-related legislation on the ground that more urgent and weighty measures must be dealt with. What is more urgent than the lives of 50 per cent of the population of Canada? I do not advocate hasty, radical action, nor do I want to see legislation which is rhetorically admirable but practically unenforcible.

Long-term ramifications and ricochet reactions must be considered. It is no good to deal with today and to let tomorrow take care of itself. History has shown that tomorrow is notoriously unable to look after itself, partly because of shortsighted legislation which may have served the day but encumbered the future.

The Canadian suffragette movement was quite free from violence, believe it or not, compared with the United States and Great Britain. Canada witnessed a very quiet and orderly struggle for female suffrage, with many colourful, intelligent women lending their talent and their wit to a potentially explosive cause.

• (1630)

As I look around this House, I am reminded of Nellie McClung's mock parliament in Winnipeg in 1924. As "Premier McClung" she denied men the vote by turning the anti-suffragist arguments around. She concluded with: "Men's place is on the farm!"

It is in our best interests as parliamentarians, as Canadians and as human beings, to lead the way with just, equitable legislation on women-related concerns. Let us not wait for model legislation from other countries. The research has been done, the rhetoric spoken and the groundwork completed. This House has the authority, the talent and the power to be a world leader in this field.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has assigned to me the duties of Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State. I am deeply honoured and

I very much look forward to working with the minister. I reiterate words which he once spoke:

> We have a burgeoning potential for cultural expression. Yet Canadian culture today is a state subsidized activity on the margins of economic enterprise. Canadian culture tomorrow could be the growth industry of the decade. It goes to the root of our philosophy as a party that workable incentives are a more efficient and acceptable alternative than state compulsion.

I should like to quote as well the words of Mr. Raymond Moriyama, the architect and planner who designed the beautiful Scarborough civic centre of which we in Scarborough are so proud. Mr. Moriyama said:

> A man needs dignity to remain human, but personal dignity cannot sustain a man unless there is social recognition of this need. Freedom is accepting responsibility for one's action and caring for others, caring about questions and caring about answers. Life is full of contradictions, some intolerable, some to be transcended. One must be passionately disinterested to find a balance, committed yet neutral. Everything is important and nothing is important. There is a God-like potential in every one of us, and every child born is a new opportunity for this potential to emerge.

I believe in Canada. I believe in the people of Canada. I believe in the potential of this country, its natural potential, its cultural potential, its people potential. I believe in the traditions of our past as exemplified by generations of Canadians from many backgrounds and origins. I believe in our courage as a nation, and I believe in the integrity of this House. It is a privilege for me to join my good colleagues as the member for Scarborough Centre in this Thirty-first Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. Before recognizing the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chenier), it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy)—Industry—Opportunity to sell Canadair to private sector; the hon. member for Winnipeg-Bird's Hill (Mr. Blaikie)—Environmental affairs—Government policy respecting disposal and transportation of chemical wastes; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell)—Environmental affairs—Protection against oil spills in west coast waters.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Ray Chenier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Being myself among the newly elected, as indicated by the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald), I want to assure you of my unreserved loyalty and complete dedication to the task which, as a member of parliament, was assigned to me by the electors of the constituency of Timmins-Chapleau. I should like to congratulate you for your appointment as Speaker of the House, with the heavy responsibilities you fulfil with such dignity and wisdom.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the riding of Timmins-Chapleau was formed just prior to the last election and is now made up of parts of the former ridings of Timmins, Cochrane and Nickel Belt. It is a large riding, 450 kilometers by 320 kilometers. The eastern boundary is at the town of Iroquois Falls, a very progressive pulp and paper producing community, which can and will only survive if the present government continues the strategies developed by the former to encourage and ensure reforestation access to resources and incentives for modernization.

To the west of Iroquois Falls is Timmins, the regional centre of the riding and one of the important cities in northern Ontario. A federal presence must be maintained and expanded in that city, through Air Canada, through improved and additional federal services, and with the help of federal corporations such as CDC, FBDB and DREE.

Continuing west on a lonely stretch of highway one encounters a village called Foleyet which owes its existence to the CNR and to the woods industry. Care must be taken to maintain basic services in such small settlements as Foleyet and Gogama. Because of the curtailment of daily passenger train services, they face a very serious reduction in postal services.

Sixty miles further, on route 101, is Chapleau, a lumber town on the CPR mainline. Here reside the typical northeners who, against almost insurmountable odds, have carved a permanent if difficult existence, never giving up, always striving for improvement while maintaining the perpetual optimism so typical of northern people.

Near beautiful Wawa which lies in close proximity to Lake Superior is a small hamlet named Hawk Junction which, through the lack of sensitivity of the present government, has lost the opportunity through a Canada Works program to move and erect a building which would have served as a recreation centre and fire hall.

Finally, one arrives in Wawa, a mining and tourist centre where hospitality and friendliness permeate the atmosphere. This small town is nestled in the pre-Cambrian shield. At times it has had more difficulty to identify with the rest of Canada than some of the communities of the Territories. The former government established national communication links with Wawa. It now remains our task to permit it to identify with its region through special arrangements between the CBC and local television stations.

[Translation]

When you go from Timmins to Sudbury you can visit all kinds of small communities such as Gogama, Cartier, Biscotasing, Kormac and Westree. Those people are independent. They do not ask much of the federal government. However, it would seem that on behalf of budgetary restrictions, those Canadians, those humble and simple people, will become the forgotten people of our nation.

[English]

The riding of Timmins-Chapleau has five reservations. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has indicated that measures would be presented to the House for the improvement of the plight of our native population. I welcome this promise and I hope that, as other promises, it will not disintegrate in confusion and retraction.

[Translation]

Northern Ontario is my country. I live there and I have devoted most of my career to it. I know its people: they are optimistic, energetic, independent and proud. Whether of Canadian, European or Asiatic descent, we live there in harmony and unity. The northern Ontario inhabitants of the Timmins-Chapleau riding are a model for all the people of Canada of the flourishing of unity within diversity, of a unity based on respect and mutal acceptance.

I suggest that the parliamentary committee on multiculturalism which will be set up soon should come and visit us in order to observe the results of such an attitude. Maybe we can pass on our spirit of unity to the rest of Canada.

This government is less than six months old and the citizens of Timmins-Chapleau have strong misgivings and mistrust in their first evaluation of the new administration, and for very specific reasons. The government had been in power less than two months when it decided to cut off our communities from job-creation funds which had previously been available through the Canada Works program.

This brings to mind a couple of issues the Tories advocated during the federal election and repeated in the Speech from the Throne. On the one hand the Speech from the Throne indicated that the government will introduce "measures to strengthen the role of the voluntary sector in our society", while on the other hand it arbitrarily cut off voluntary groups in all of Ontario from their noble task of creating, sponsoring and selecting community-spirited job-creation projects by shelving Canada Works in many parts of Canada.

Canada Works was an important tool to deal with seasonal unemployment especially in areas with little economic stability. It is my hope that the new government will understand that many smaller communities will constantly live or die at the mercy of the economic indicators of more prosperous and larger communities. For example, it is not fair for the government to decide that such areas as Gogama, Cartier and Foleyet will not benefit from Canada Works, because Timmins, Iroquois Falls, Chapleau and Wawa industries are operating at full capacity in the mining, forestry and pulp and paper sectors. In everyday life Canada Works was the only tangible link the people of these smaller communities in Timmins-Chapleau riding had with the federal government. The program provided useful jobs while at the same time offering essential services which otherwise would not have been possible.

Permanent jobs were created in some areas. Now these communities have reverted to the style of the early sixties where these people will contribute to the federal coffers via taxes but will get little in return. It is my hope that the right hon. Prime Minister will rethink his perception, which is certainly not shared by myself. If the new government pursues this vision of Canada, of course, our country will be a community of communities, but communities strongly divided between large, prosperous one like Timmins, Wawa, Chapleau and Iroquois Falls, and small abandoned ones like Foleyet, Gogama and Cartier, communities which will have been left to fend for themselves by a central government that will have given away most of its power to keep the communities together. We have yet to see which better programs the Prime Minister intends to introduce in order to encourage young Canadians to serve their communities.

[Translation]

Hardly three months after the new government came into power, my riding took another beating, since the new administration decided to scrap the decentralization program of the previous Liberal government and thus eliminate 109 jobs intended for Timmins. In my view, it makes good sense to break up the centralized machinery of government and make it more accessible to Canadians, and I believe this Liberal decision justified every dollar earmarked for this purpose.

The city of Timmins and the private sector in the region had been waiting since 1976 and there had been discussions regarding the integration of these jobs into the downtown renewal program. The people who had welcomed this move as a unique opportunity to diversify employment and as a means to ensure greater economic stability in a region which is closely related to the mining industry, cannot understand why the government has persisted in this decision. It seems to me that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) is obsessed with the idea of eliminating jobs and cutting expenditures inconsiderately and regardless of the impact on the municipalities and those concerned. We can almost foresee the day when government spending will be so strictly controlled by the minister responsible for the Treasury Board that the Canadian people will laugh at the Progressive Conservatives' good intentions of placing greater reliance, to quote their very words, on individual initiative to generate growth and jobs for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I remind the new government that the decision to eliminate 109 jobs in Timmins was taken without consulting the parties concerned. Is that the kind of consultation and co-operation to be expected of the new government, as convincingly stated in the Speech from the Throne?

[English]

As if the Timmins-Chapleau riding has not suffered enough already since this government fumbled into office, judging from the Prime Minister's statements prior to his ascendancy to the highest office in the land I suspect that northern Ontario is in for further hardship at the hands of this government. I refer to the former opposition leader's remarks concerning air transportation in Canada and the role of Air Canada, our national airline and unifying national symbol.

As the former opposition leader may be aware, Timmins is a community of major importance in Canada with a population of almost 50,000. It is serviced by Air Canada, a service which is essential to the citizens in northern Ontario. Air Canada provides three flights a day both to and from Toronto, two of which make stopovers in North Bay. Although these stopovers are an inconvenience, we recognize Air Canada is at least trying to provide an adequate service to northern Ontario. All efforts to bring Timmins into closer contact with the larger centres in Canada will go to waste if the Prime Minister intends to keep another of his interminable, ill-advised pledges.

It was November, 1978 when the then opposition leader told the House the following:

> Air Canada has been unwilling to give up its routes in southwestern and northern Ontario, where regional carriers should be operating.

In the same speech concerning his air transport policy the present Prime Minister, in a statement which may have set the precedent for such gems of conviction as "We will move our embassy to Jerusalem" and "We oppose raising interest rates," made the following declaration:

> We will significantly increase the routes open to regional and third level carriers. It makes sense to have major trunk routes served by national carriers; it makes no sense to allow them to dominate regional and local services. Our general approach will be that regional routes of up to 300 miles and turnaround routes of up to 500 miles will be reserved for regional and third level carriers.

Unless the government remains consistent in its fickleness to promises made in the heat of battle and ignores but another policy brainchild, Timmins will be the victim again of this government and will lose its Air Canada service. I caution the government that the people of my riding will not stand still while the government robs it of an essential link with the rest of the nation. I will seek a guarantee that Air Canada service to Timmins will not be sacrificed as a part of this government's apparent commitment to privatize, abandon, sell or dismember the institutions of government which provide a sense of national homogeneity and common purpose. I warn the government to tread lightly if it has any intention of slipping Air Canada service away from the citizens of northern Ontario. I take some small encouragement from the fact the government chose to refrain from mentioning air policy in the Speech from the Throne. Perhaps it did this after having given further consideration to some suggestions made prior to the election.

[Translation]

Along with several crucial and vital questions, another matter of concern to the constituency of Timmins-Chapleau, in northern Ontario, as well as to several other parts of Canada, was left out of the Speech from the Throne. I refer to the forest industry which is one of the most important sectors of the Canadian economy and the livelihood of thousands of people in the northern part of the province. I represent a region where the pulp, paper and lumber industries are the economic basis of several communities. Those industries are extremely sensitive to export markets, production costs as well as to supply and demand. For instance, the people of Chapleau depend on six lumbermills for their livelihood. Thanks to the initiative of gifted entrepreneurs from northern Ontario, Chapleau has become a major supplier of wood products in both Canada and the United States. I do hope the future of the forest industry in my area and other regions as well will not be jeopardized by the measures the new government intends to take.

● (1650)

[English]

But I am alarmed at the prospects for the lumber industry in my riding and all of Canada if the government persists in the policies it contemplates. I refer to the hiking of interest rates and the mortgage deductibility scheme. I am told by an official of the Canadian Construction Association that for every percentage point the interest rate on capital is raised, the demand for housing drops by 10,000 units. If we are to believe that the mortgage deductibility goody will increase demand for capital, it will raise mortgage interest rates to even more intolerable levels. Does the government realize what impact these policies will have on the construction and lumber producing industries?

In addition to the soaring interest rates on capital, there are other serious problems facing the construction and lumber industries that this government must address itself to. The cost of lumber has risen 95 per cent since 1975. In the last two years alone, lumber has leaped 40 per cent in price. This has been due to the heavy demand for Canadian forest products in the United States and an almost 50 per cent increase in production costs. The danger in the present situation is obvious. Should the cost of capital and materials continue to rise at the rate they have been, the demand for housing will drop, regardless of the mortgage deductibility gimmick, and in so doing put lumber producers in peril.

I urge this government to consider the real consequences of its actions for the home buyer, the construction industry and the lumber producers if the cost of acquiring housing is driven out of the reach of the average citizen. I urge the government to ponder its actions carefully before another election promise made in desperation backfires and renders severe damage to these sensitive industries of northern Ontario.

[Translation]

Because of the policies implemented by the former government, the mining industry is healthy today. Our mines are flourishing and going ahead with major expansion projects. Texas Gulf, which mines zinc, copper and silver, is buoyant and is in the process of completing a refinery. The iron ore mine of Algoma Steel, located at Wawa, is operating at full capacity. For over a year now, the mining industry inspires confidence in the future. If we want that climate of full employment to extend throughout the mining industry, it is essential for the federal government to introduce measures that will sustain the current impetus and ensure even more investments in all fields of operation and development.

[English]

The riding of Timmins-Chapleau is very large indeed. It is a microcosm of Canada. It strives on diversity—diversity of language, diversity of culture, of race, of belief. Each small region lives on a particular industry different from the others. Each town, each village, each hamlet, prides itself on its achievements, its hopes, its participation in the Canadian mosaic.

We also believe that there must be a federal presence among ourselves, a presence that symbolizes that our diversity is not adverse to unity, that all parts of Canada make up the Canadian people, that none must suffer to remain Canadian if all are willing to give a little. Canada will not survive if all the parts demand special status or special privileges. I plead with the Prime Minister and the cabinet to ponder their present approach to bonne entente. Do not let political expediency take precedence over the need to keep Canada as one strong nation.

Mr. George Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my first duty upon rising is to convey my very sincere congratulations to the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker upon their appointment, and to you, sir, as Deputy Chairman of Committees, upon your appointment. I can say as one who is new to this House but who has had the opportunity over the years to view the proceedings of this House of Parliament on television that the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker, and you, sir, have the loyalty and the support of each and every member of this House, and that that loyalty and support is very well deserved indeed.

My second very pleasant duty is to convey my heartiest congratulations to the other two members of Parliament who spoke first as the mover and seconder of this motion, the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald). I can say, speaking again as a new member, that they set for me, and for all of us as new members here in Parliament, a very high standard indeed, one which I hope one day we will be able to attain.

[Mr. Chenier.]

I am very glad to have been elected as the member of Parliament for Halifax. Indeed, I might even say that I am relieved to have been elected as member of Parliament for Halifax. I think that I have the distinction of being the member in this House with the smallest majority in all of Canada, 15 votes.

Mr. Knowles: You have 14 more than you need.

Mr. Cooper: My distinguished predecessor, the Hon. Robert L. Stanfield, said something very similar. He said to me, "Fifteen votes, don't you think that is overkill? You only need one, you know." I will be talking in a minute about the hon. Mr. Stanfield. My present point is that whether it be one vote, 15 votes or 15,000 votes, it will be my privilege, duty and honour to serve all of the people of the constituency of Halifax, whatever party they support, to the best of my ability, and I look forward to that task very much.

Tradition requires a new member of parliament making his maiden speech to say a few words about his constituency, and I am happy indeed to do so in the case of Halifax because in all this world there can be few communities, I suggest, which are so civilized and yet so close to wild and beautiful nature, so respectful of tradition and yet so eager to look ahead, so lively in the clash of ideas and yet where people are so tolerant of one another.

I could talk about the physical aspects of Halifax, the fact that we have the world's best natural harbour, standing astride the world's busiest shipping lanes, sitting virtually on top of the world's richest fishing grounds. I could talk at length about the historical facts, how Halifax was founded in 1749 and came to be the bastion of British imperial power, military and naval, in North America, how it carried on in that way for a century and a half, and as Canada's major naval station carries on that role today. I could talk about that symbol of Canada which is known the world over, the Halifax Citadel and the old town clock which, incidentally, constitutes the most visited historical site in all of Canada. In that same vein I could talk about how Halifax's social history has been inexorably linked with peace keeping and war making.

• (1700)

I could tell how in 1917 the largest man-made explosion in the history of the world until Hiroshima occurred as a result of a collision in Halifax harbour of a munitions ship and a supply ship during the First World War and killed 2,000 people from the city of Halifax, almost as if they had been at the front lines. I could talk about the convoys of allied merchantmen and fighting ships of World War II, most of which used Halifax as their base from which to build a bridge from the new world to the old. Rather than take refuge in the dull facts of geography and dry dust of history, however, I want to talk about the people of Halifax, and particularly about the most famous adopted son in the history of Halifax, the Hon. Robert L. Stanfield.

Robert Stanfield, a man known to all in his former constituency of Halifax and to everyone in this House as well as to all Canadians, is an example of the very best we can offer in political life. He is a great man, a humble man, a strong man, a magnanimous man, a proud man, a compassionate man, a man who has done more than any living Canadian to bring us together as a people and to heal the wounds of division in this great country.

If, in due time, I were able to become the kind of representative in Parliament that my predecessor, Bob Stanfield, was, I would then regard myself as a fitting representative of the people of Halifax. I promise to them to work toward that goal and I thank them profoundly for placing their confidence in me.

Parliament is an institution that Bob Stanfield loved. So did another great Canadian and another leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, the late Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker.

I was personally delighted to hear in the Speech from the Throne, which is the subject of this debate, that the new Progressive Conservative Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Clark) plans to restore to Parliament its true role in our democratic system by making the government and the bureaucracy more accountable to Parliament than before. There can be no doubt that in the last decade or two Parliament has been gravely weakened in relation to its powers to control government and bureaucracy. The result has been a corresponding strengthening of those two elements in our lives. If we, as Canadians, are going to keep the power we now have to control government and the bureaucracy, and if we are going to wrest away some of the power that has been taken from us in the past few years, then I suggest that all members of this House must pursue the government's stated goal with vigour and with determination. I see that vigour and determination on all sides in this House, Mr. Speaker, and I see it in every party. If I may say so, I see it especially in many of the new members who have come to this House. All of them are here, I believe, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Cardigan said in his speech seconding this motion, to try to make Parliament work.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I was frankly very disappointed in the opening remarks of the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) in this debate, in which he said he found it humorous that the Rhinoceros party, the joke party from the province of Quebec, had done so well in his constituency in the last federal election, as it did across that province. I do not find that situation humorous at all, Mr. Speaker. To me, it is rather a sign of just how far Parliament has fallen into contempt in the eyes of many Canadians as a result of eleven years of government guided by the hon. member and his friends. I say with great sincerity to the hon. member that he should change his attitude, and join with those of us who have come to Parliament to try to make it work in following the suggestion of the Prime Minister that Parliament be given new life in this thirty-first assembly.

There were a number of aspects of the throne speech that will be particularly appealing to the people of Halifax. The first was the promise by the new government to re-establish the spirit of partnership in confederation—to replace a policy of confrontation with one of co-operation. We sorely need a change in the climate of federal-provincial relations. The new government got off to a good start, as far as we in Nova Scotia are concerned, when it offshore announced that Nova Scotia would have jurisdiction over its offshore mineral resources from now on.

Some hon. members on the other side have asked why this is so important to us in Nova Scotia. They point to the understanding reached by the former government and the maritime provinces whereby 75 per cent of the benefits of the offshore resources would accrue to the coastal provinces, and the federal government would take 25 per cent. They point out, and I think quite fairly, that the cost of administering that offshore resource, which would have been borne by the federal government under the previous proposal, would probably eat up the whole of that 25 per cent.

I certainly agree that the net economic benefits in terms of royalties to the coastal provinces under the new arrangement, which has not yet been worked out in detail but which has been promised in principle, may not be all that different from the previous agreement.

In my view there are two very good reasons for dropping the proposal of the former government and adopting the proposal of the new government in relation to offshore resources. First of all, Nova Scotia has a vital interest in being able to control and direct the economic development that will inevitably come to the province as oil and gas are discovered offshore, in a way that best suits the needs of the people who live there. These needs can be assessed and acted upon by the people on the spot, the provincial government of the province of Nova Scotia, and not by bureaucrats, or even politicians from the province, who happen to be here in Ottawa.

The second and more important reason is that jurisdiction over the offshore resources gives to the province of Nova Scotia a new hinterland to exploit and develop. In my view it will help us to acquire a sense of pride and confidence in ourselves that is so essential if we are to realize the economic and the community spiritual values that we ought to be able to attain, as this resource is developed.

The second major thrust of the throne speech that will be particularly well received by my constituents, the citizens of Halifax, reads as follows:

> The greatest immediate challenge facing Canada today is to restore growth, confidence, and jobs to the Canadian economy.

In setting out its five-part strategy on this matter the government emphasized its proposal to build on the strengths of the various regions in the country. It talked in particular, in relation to the constituents of Halifax, about shipbuilding and about a Canadian merchant marine. I can say without any hesitation that there could not be two proposals better construed to help put the unemployed back to work in Halifax and to create a sound economic future than those two. I would like to explain to the House that only two years ago as many as 1,600 men and women were employed in the Halifax shipyard. As a result of a slowdown in work and a change in ownership of the company in question, the number dropped to 300 at the lowest point.

The Prime Minister has obviously recognized, in the 200-year tradition of shipbuilding and the pride of craftsmanship that exists in the city of Halifax and the Atlantic provinces, that there is a regional strength upon which to build those particular industries and upon which to build the Atlantic region of Canada. For that reason I commend the government for recognizing this strength and for its proposal to build on it.

My constituents will also be happy to see the government's proposal to strengthen the mandate of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. When the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) became Prime Minister in 1968 he raised great hopes in Atlantic Canada that at last we would be able to begin the long climb toward economic equality with the rest of Canada as his concept of the just society took effect. And, to his credit, he did set up DREE giving it the job of working with provincial governments toward that equality.

● (1710)

What is the state of affairs in Atlantic Canada today, ten years after DREE was established? Unfortunately, DREE has not worked entirely successfully, Mr. Speaker. Yes, it has pumped hundreds of millions of dollars into the economy of Atlantic Canada. Yes, it has provided much needed infrastructure for our towns, cities, industries and commercial ventures there. Yes, DREE has provided many millions of dollars to commercial enterprises to help them get under way. But since 1969 the average income for Canadians living in Atlantic Canada has risen from 70.2 per cent to only 74.1 per cent of the Canadian average. At this rate it would take us a full 60 years to catch up. And, what is worse, if you take from those figures the portion attributable to transfer payments to individuals, such as unemployment insurance, the percentages show that we have gained hardly at all compared to the Canadian average. The figures have risen from 65.6 per cent to only 66.8 per cent in one decade. In short, our net gains in Atlantic Canada have come from feeding out of the government trough. By far, we would rather have work than have to live on unemployment insurance. As it is, we are in grave danger of becoming a dependent society incapable of acting on our own, and able to carry on only because of a permanent "fix" of federal funds.

This state of affairs must end. It must end not only because of the financial drain on Canadians who live elsewhere in Canada who are required to sluice their money in great quantities, in ever increasing amounts, to Atlantic Canada. But also it must end because of the spiritual and social malaise that this kind of dependency brings about in those who receive this kind of money as gifts.

I believe that we in Atlantic Canada, a once proud people and a still proud people, are in danger of losing belief in ourselves, belief in our own ability to get on with the job, without which we will not only stagnate but stagnate unhappily. I do not believe that anyone who is in a permanently dependent state is happy.

[Mr. Cooper.]

How do we in Parliament move to end this state of affairs, Mr. Speaker? As I said, the previous government, in good conscience, tried to solve the problem of regional disparity by creating DREE to deal with it. But it was in those times a weak sister. There were always other, bigger, departments of government whose concerns overrode DREE. They often wiped out at a stroke, often times unintentionally, or unthinklingly, all the good that DREE had done. What is the use of spending millions of dollars on manufacturing plants in Atlantic Canada if a national policy of user-pay is adopted by the Department of Transport in such a way that it is no longer possible for our manufacturing plants to ship goods or sell them competitively in the markets of central Canada? What is the use of spending millions of dollars for infrastructure to assist commercial and industrial development in Atlantic Canada if the Foreign Investment Review Agency is set up to screen out foreign investment, not only in central Canada where such screening may make sense but also in Atlantic Canada where there is hardly any industry to begin with?

It is not enough to continue to dole out more and more money to the needy provinces, cities, towns, companies and individuals who live there, and hope to solve our problems in that way. To be sure we need to have this money in the short term just to stay alive. But in the longer term we must instead put regional concerns at the very centre of policy-making in this country. We must examine each policy and each program of each department of government, not only DREE, and we must apply to those policies and programs this test: how will this policy or that program affect the economy of every region of this country? Then we must tailor-make those policies and programs to fit the particular needs of each region of Canada.

I believe our new Prime Minister understands this point very well. He has lived in every region of Canada. He was born and raised on the prairies. He lived for a year in my own constituency of Halifax. He has lived on the west coast of Canada, and of course he has lived in the central region of the country. He has seen at first-hand the diversity of this country and the differing needs of each and every part. The Prime Minister understands that we here in Parliament in Ottawa can only attain Canadian unity and economic strength by respecting those differences and by building on the strengths of each of the regions.

When the Speech from the Throne refers to strengthening the mandate of DREE, and about taking into account regional needs, I hope and believe that the Prime Minister and the government have in mind a mechanism for ensuring that these regional concerns will be reflected in the policies and programs of all departments from now on.

In 1878 Sir John A. Macdonald, Prime Minister of Canada, proclaimed his famous "national policy." This policy was founded on three programs: a coast to coast railway; large scale immigration from the old world to Canada; and a tariff barrier to protect and develop central Canadian industry. This was a good policy for Canada. Indeed, it was an essential policy. Without it we would never have become a large scale manufacturer of secondary products, of manufactured goods nor would we have been able to build the rich and modern land that we have today. Yet this national policy was unashamedly directed at building up the central region of this country to the exclusion—one might almost say at the expense—of another, the Atlantic region.

In 1878 Atlantic Canada had a highly developed commercial sector. Atlantic Canada carried on a sophisticated trade with our natural north-south trading partner, the United States of America. While there were many goods we did not make ourselves, we could import those goods cheaply from the United States and other countries without any tariff or customs duties. Sir John A. Macdonald's national policy changed all that. The new tariff barriers cut off cheap imports from the United States. And the retaliatory tariff barriers raised against us made it difficult for Atlantic Canada to sell goods abroad. Nevertheless, I do not complain about Sir John A. Macdonald's national policy. I praise it. It was a necessary policy in the interest of developing the great Canadian hinterland, even if it did hurt Atlantic Canada.

The time has come to try to redress that balance once and for all. Let all of us in this Thirty-first Parliament set ourselves a goal. Let us adopt a new national policy, unashamedly directed at building up those regions of Canada which remain economically deprived 101 years after Sir John A. Macdonald's national policy. Let us not think of these programs as being regional ones. Rather, let us think of them as being national ones, designed to build on the strength of the deprived regions for the benefit of all Canada. Let us know and believe the truth, that it is only when we have strong and healthy economic regions in Canada that we can have a strong and healthy nation.

In closing, I wish to thank the people of Halifax for sending me here as their representative. I look forward to working closely with members on all sides of the House as together we serve the country we love, Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I echo the good wishes and congratulations expressed by the previous speakers. I would like to comment briefly on the statements made by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) who considered that the fact the speech did not refer to the Quebec problem was not per se a serious omission. To me, this shows that the hon. member for Joliette is just a little like his party, either irresponsible or naive.

An hon. Member: Both!

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows, 75 per cent of Quebeckers polled recently on behalf of the Quebec government said they would insist on a renewed constitution as the only condition to remain within Canada. Is the Progressive Conservative government going to negotiate sovereignty-association as it did for natural resources? Will its preoccupation to please the provinces go that far? On May 22, Quebeckers did not trust the Progressive Conservative Party and maybe they were right, because they do not feel this party understands them. It offers no clear action on the constitutional issue, no guarantee for the survival of French Canadians, as there was in Bill C-60. No mention of the human rights bill, no mention of patriation of the constitution or of amendment formula, no linguistic and cultural guarantee. In short, Quebec is still waiting and will probably wait forever for the Progressive Conservative government to take a precise stand on the constitutional question.

Just last night, Mr. Speaker, Mr. René Lévesque, speaking in Hull, promised to absorb federal public servants no more than two years after winning the referendum. How does the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis) intend to counter such assertions? Is he going to negotiate the transfer to Quebec of federal public servants? Perhaps this would enable him to implement the promises made during the electoral campaign about cutting manpower. Does the Clark government show a sense of responsibility when it abdicates in favour of the provinces without demanding anything to maintain some kind of equilibrium at the central level? Indeed it abdicates its responsibilities in the field of economics by leaving to the private sector the task of planning the future of Canadians. It abdicates its responsibilities toward all the minorities, be it on a cultural or social level. The only voice from the minorities that it seems to pay attention to is that of the multinationals. They may represent a numerical minority but they certainly do not when it comes to power. When will the Clark government start governing in the interest of all Canadians? When will it be through paying off its electoral debts?

After hearing the proposals contained in the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the housing issue, I am left asking myself some serious questions such as to whom is this policy directed? Is it designed for the majority which dwells in expensive houses and whose taxes take a large share of the budget already higher than those who will also have to foot the bill? Where do we find measures which will help workers buy their houses? Where do we find a housing credit for single mothers or the elderly? Where do we find a sense of equity in the housing policy of the Progressive Conservative government?

In the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, there is also a commitment to reduce government expenses. Who is going to pay for those reductions? People who get old age pension, family allowances or unemployment benefits? Once again, Mr. Speaker, I wonder who the Progressive Conservative government is governing for.

We could only be pleased with that promise to reduce expenses in the public service, since the former government itself had come forward with major budget cuts last year. However, we notice that during the six months since this government was elected, so many people have been hired to work in the office of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) that a new bureaucracy is obviously growing within his cabinet. Some public servants who are not very high in that hierarchy and who are in a position to speak without fear, even told us that there have been more favouritism and political appointments in the last six months than in the last ten years before this government took power. How many more political appointments are they still planning to make, Mr. Speaker? While there is an indication in the Speech from the Throne that there will be a reduction in the number of public servants, I do not know of any mention about an increase in the number of friends of the party in power within government.

May I remind them that the last CROP poll, which was published yesterday, still gives them the support of only 37 per cent of the voters, compared with 41 per cent to the Liberals, and that it would be dangerous to govern only for those 37 per cent. I urge them to have faith in the public service, which has no partisanship and which always considered that it was its duty to serve all Canadians. What does the Progressive Conservative Party want to do with Canada? A society with more justice, or a society which will follow the dictates of Gallup polls?

For young workers, Mr. Speaker, this Speech from the Throne contains a very important measure, namely, the promise of jobs. How does the government intend to carry out that promise? By opening new offices, thus creating jobs for those who will be working in those new offices? There are now, Mr. Speaker, hiring centres like Canada Manpower Centres on campuses and I think there are quite enough of them. I would rather urge the Progressive Conservative government to go and see their business friends to ask them to hire those young people.

For large and low income families, for older people, who is going to pay the bill for their food basket which is going to increase substantially, at least 10 per cent, if the oil pricing policy of this government is implemented? For them, one only has to know that it represents up to 27 per cent of their income and one wonders whether that amount and percentage can be further increased without any thought of rebellion on their part. Personally we are going to fight relentlessly such inequity because the social impact of such a move is such that it can lead to a general downgrading of the quality of life for the Canadian people, in addition to affecting seriously the health of the aged.

Mr. Speaker, with respect to the freedom of information act, we can only be pleased with it. And we hope it will be fully implemented on the basis of objective criteria that will give all groups, as well as parliamentarians, access to government information. However, that kind of legislation should not be a cover-up for such intentions as revealing to officials the conclusions of a report even before it is written. The Middle East issue is an example.

[Mrs. Hervieux-Payette.]

With the perspective of encouraging individual initiative and promoting private enterprise, because these are the principles of modern liberalism, I intend to propose a bill to promote profit sharing. Within the state of actual fiscal policy there does not exist any mechanism to instil in private enterprise the wish to return to the employees their share in the profits made in the fiscal year, other than pension plans, and these too are limited.

I propose using the tax structure to provide an incentive to companies to return a portion of their profits to their employees, by reducing their actual rate of taxation for that portion. On the other hand, for the employees who receive these benefits the tax structure would be amended in such a way as to reduce the rate of tax on their portion of the profits, adding to their net income. The goal of this measure would be to initiate a positive dialogue between the company and its employees in order to reach the common objective, which is the financial success of the enterprise.

This measure would help to demystify the question of profits and remove from it the immoral character it has received at the hands of socialist ideology. Moreover, this profit sharing scheme would enhance co-operation between employer and employee, which in turn should lead to an increase in production. An additional asset of this plan would be to reduce the number of strikes by making employers and employees partners instead of opponents.

[Translation]

The Progressive Conservative government promises in the Speech from the Throne to look after working women, with an employment strategy, and I can only welcome that. However, what do they intend to do for women who stay at home and who are now at the bottom of the social ladder? According to a recent report released by the National Council on Social Welfare last October, 1,219,000 women in Canada, one out of six, lived below the poverty line. In that category are included 44 per cent of women who are heads of families with dependent children. That latter category includes 50 per cent who do not receive alimony or who must get it by fighting in court.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to introduce a bill on the compulsory collection of alimony on behalf of those women, since they are not represented in this House. We shall not accept the jurisdictional argument which was used for too long as an excuse for inaction. Canadian women with dependent children should be given priority by the Canadian government in this period of low birth-rate. Why punish a woman who wants to stay home to raise her children by forcing her to live on welfare? The federal government has a responsibility in this matter since it contributes 50 per cent of the provincial welfare funds. It has therefore a direct interest in this matter. These funds could be used to improve the lot of the community as a whole and of the needy, and could be reduced in the years to come.

If the Clark government would only see in this a means of relieving the taxpayers' burden, they might understand that they could achieve a dual objective by taking such a measure. On the one hand, they would reduce the amounts appropriated for social programs and increase the national productivity as all those in receipt of alimony payments guaranteed and collected by the state in case of default by the husband would not be automatically deprived of part-time work. Of course, this measure would also apply when the father must stay home to take care of his family.

This is why I ask that the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs meet urgently to discuss this matter and prepare immediately a proposal for the next federal-provincial conference for the approval of the provinces in principle. The spirit of co-operation which prevails in this government should ensure the passage of such a measure in the interests of all Canadian men and women.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I should now like to deal with my special concerns for the Montreal area. The economic propects are rather gloomy at present. The strike in the port of Montreal may well have an indirect impact on food costs in the forthcoming season. The province of Quebec, with an adverse balance in agriculture, cannot afford to see food costs rise unduly. We hope that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) will take the necessary steps to solve this conflict before freeze-up.

Furthermore, the work at Place Guy Favreau is progressing very slowly. We ask the minister responsible to speed up the work, particularly in view of the problems facing construction workers every winter.

As concerns the chronic problem of public transportation, after the 8-month strike in Quebec City, the current Montreal strike is causing serious prejudice to the economy of the province. So we call for a study on public transportation in large centres in consultation with the provincial governments, because we keep in mind that the users of public transportation cannot express their views, particularly older people and students.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my deepest gratitude to my constituents for the confidence they put in me on May 22 last. I consider it as a very great responsibility and I shall strive in the coming months to serve the interests of all. As you may know already, Mr. Speaker, my riding is located at the far end of the island of Montreal. It is largely made up of workers who are now suffering from an unacceptable unemployment situation for an urban area, at a rate of 9.5 per cent. However, since for the Progressive Conservative government there is a national average and another standard for job-creation programs, I must say that we are very concerned with the coming of winter. The Canada Works program has been reduced by half, but no alternative has been proposed to deal with the problems that will crop up this winter. So we are most eager to see the economic development strategy that the Clark government intends to adopt in metropolitan Montreal. Let me say that we already have an interesting industrial infrastructure. What is lacking above all is the confidence of investors.

What steps does the Clark government intend to take to ensure eventual investors in Quebec that they have no particular problems to fear in Quebec in the present state of things? Is the Progressive Conservative majority, which was elected mainly out of Quebec, willing to give the guarantees necessary to ensure the fulfillment of Quebeckers in Canada? After more than ten years of reflection, has the Progressive Conservative government found the magical words which will bring all Canadians together without abdicating its responsibilities? This afternoon the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) said that the former government was the cause of all our problems. Allow me to have a different opinion than my distinguished colleague and let me say that the former government certainly made every effort to bring Canadians together in a new direction towards a new Canada. The citizens of Mercier who have elected a PQ representative for nine years now expect more than a vague promise when it comes to future commitments.

Instead of dealing hastily with the energy problem, the Progressive Conservative government should plan the development of all national resources, without penalizing provinces that are poorer in raw materials, by diversifying renewable and non-renewable resources. In Eastern Quebec in particular, we are counting on the forthcoming development of the natural gas system, as well as on measures to promote increased development of that resource that is being underutilized in eastern Canada. We therefore recommend early studies to develop the gas potential in Baffin Island in order to shorten the Eastern provinces' supply lines.

In the energy area, and development in particular, I would point out that the former Liberal government did not hinder development in the western provinces, but rather promoted it. We expect the western premier will do the same for the eastern energy potential. On the issue of community housing for the underprivileged and the aged, we invite the government, in view of the throne speech, to plan its intended actions in that area carefully. The constituency of Mercier does not have a population of executives living in houses worth $100,000 and up, but rather a population of workers and pensioners who need housing at reasonable cost.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me invite my colleagues opposite, and especially the cabinet ministers, to visit the province of Quebec and get acquainted with the problem there. As a member of Parliament elected to maintain Quebec in Confederation, I urge hon. members to realize the urgency and seriousness of the situation. I speak on behalf of Francophones, Anglophones and newcomers who also are expecting concrete actions from a government that has almost no representation from Quebec.

We are waiting for a sign in English-speaking Canada, for friendship, for the rebuilding of a new country in which equal rights are recognized for both groups. If I am here today, Mr. Speaker, it is to make sure that this dream cherished by most Quebeckers will come true.

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, may I add my felicitations to those of other members who have congratulated you upon your re-election to the chair. I am pleased to speak in support of the motion, to thank His Excellency the Governor General for his most gracious Speech from the Throne.

I would also like to compliment the hon. member who has just preceded me. She spoke from her heart about her concern for all of Canada, and I am sure we will all give heed to her plea to those of us who perhaps do not understand French Canada as well as we should, to find ways of enabling this country to work together more effectively in the future.

I wish also to compliment my hon. friend from Erie (Mr. Fretz) and my hon. friend from Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) for the fitting way in which they moved and seconded the motion of thanks to His Excellency.

● (1740)

This day, October 16, is a very special day for me, as it happens to be the anniversary of my first election to Parliament in a by-election one year ago. I feel fortunate to have had the privilege of sitting in opposition for a few months because it gave me a useful exposure to the serious defects of the former government which led to its downfall on May 22. I think we have all learned some lessons from that. If our many new initiatives, as so clearly set out in the throne speech, are allowed to bear fruit, I expect to be viewing my old seat from this more enlightened position on Mr. Speaker's right for many years to come.

Today is also a very special day for me in other respects as well. First, it was a very great privilege for me to take my seat in this Thirty-first Parliament with a man who is one of the finest examples of public stewardship. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) was the commissioner of my wolf cub pack when I joined it in Drumheller, Alberta, over 30 years ago. By that time he had already been a provincial MLA for almost ten years.

Indeed, in 40 years of public service, much of it as a cabinet minister in the Alberta government, the hon. member for Bow River has proved himself to be an outstanding and dedicated servant to the people of Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Siddon: It was this man who gave me my first and strongest perspectives of what it means truly to serve humankind by virtue of elected office, and I am sure all in this House will benefit from his wisdom and counsel.

I am also proud to share a place in this Parliament with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). He is a great Canadian of firm political conviction. He possesses a deep respect for the true principles of justice.

I will always remember that day in 1957 when the hon. member for Calgary North came to my home town of Drumheller, riding in a brightly coloured convertible. At his side was Canada's future Prime Minister, the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert. That evening in the local arena Dief spoke, just as he always spoke, with great oratory and passion about his love of Canada and his concern for those less prosperous parts and peoples of Canada whose needs had been neglected for decades by the dominant establishment in central Canada.

As a young man of 15 I was impressed by his message, and to this day I must credit John Diefenbaker with the kindling of my interest in our system of parliamentary democracy and in the political idealogies which shape it. I know he aroused those instincts in the hearts of many who sit in this Parliament today, especially some of my younger colleagues on this side of the House. It was a genuine honour to have known such a man and to have shared this place with him during those last few months of his life. He made Parliament live in a way which few others can. He made it accessible to every one of his "fellow Canadians". I know that his inspiration will carry on in the lives of those who follow.

Indeed, it is one of those who followed who now leads the government of this great nation as our Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). The right hon. member for Yellowhead has come a long way from those days at the University of Alberta when I remember him as the controversial, outspoken young editor of our campus newspaper, The Gateway. In fact he has come a long way in the short time since May 22 of this year. By his example he has shown us how to be optimistic about the future potential of this great nation. At the same time he has developed strength of leadership to make his promise become a reality. His strength was never more plainly revealed to the members of this House than it was last Wednesday afternoon, when the Prime Minister delivered his first and very excellent speech to this Thirty-first Parliament. I believe that all Canadians will find his style of leadership to be a refreshing change from that of his immediate predecessor.

If hon. members would indulge me I would like to take a few moments now to tell them something about the part of Canada which I am privileged to represent. The riding of Richmond-South Delta is situated at the lower reaches of the Fraser River, encompassing most of the fertile soils and biologically productive marshes of the Fraser River delta. The northern-most community of Richmond is home for almost 100,000 Canadians who live on a beautiful island known as Lulu Island. The island has an elevation entirely at or below sea level, being completely surrounded by dikes and criss-crossed by countless drainage ditches. These drainage ditches provide flood protection not only from the Fraser River but also from the occasional winter rains which some may have heard about, and which are sent our way from the city of Vancouver, located to our immediate north.

Richmond is a progressive, well-planned, and growing city which offers a unique balance of natural habitat, agricultural production, beautiful gardens, parks, recreational facilities, light industries, and pleasant residential neighbourhoods. It is also the site of Vancouver International Airport, which occupies Sea Island, to the immediate northwest of the downtown centre of Richmond.

To the south of Richmond lies the municipality of Delta, located between the south arm of the Fraser River and the United States border. I am privileged to share in the representation of Delta with my good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). My portion of Delta includes the two communities of Tsawwassen and Ladner. Tsawwassen is a modern and quite prosperous community known for its almost perpetual sunshine, pleasant beaches, and good community spirit. It shares a short international boundary with Point Roberts, U.S.A.—and votes rather conservatively, I might add.

To the north of Tsawwassen, on the south shore of the Fraser River, lies the historic farming and fishing community of Ladner. Ladner reminds me most of my own hometown because it is a small community with a deep sense of its history and an instinct for survival, as witnessed by the many small businesses which consolidate the town centre.

Delta and Richmond both grew out of the pioneering enterprise of the farmers and fishermen who came to settle on the soggy marshes of the Fraser River. In November of this year each municipality celebrates the hundredth anniversary of its incorporation, and many centennial events have been held throughout the year. In those days of 100 years ago a group of Japanese immigrants established a fishing village at the southwest corner of Lulu Island. Other settlers came from the British Isles and eastern Canada. Soon, fishing villages, wharves and canneries had sprung up all along the lower reaches of the Fraser River. As a result the communities of Steveston and Ladner remain today as an important focus for the commercial fishing industry of southern British Columbia. The Japanese who came to find their new life in Canada have flourished as a strong and respected source of cultural diversity in our midst.

On the nearby farmland, diked and drained with a century of toil, our people grow blueberries, strawberries, raspberries, cranberries, and vegetables of every description. Waterfront industries and urban development are also welcomed by my communities, and they have been allowed to proliferate because of their strategic importance to our economy and to our citizens. But the people of Richmond-South Delta are ever conscious of their links with the river, where wild fowl and young salmon flourish, nurtured by the natural habitat which rests in such fragile balance with the progress of mankind.

Of course, I shall have many future opportunities to tell this House of the problems and needs of my constituents, but for today I thought I would merely give a travelogue and a sense of the spirit of those I am privileged to represent here. I am grateful for the trust which they have placed in me once again, and I will do my utmost to serve them well.

I want to turn now to the throne speech directly and to underscore what I feel to be the central message from His Excellency. I believe that the throne speech provides us with a blueprint for a new spirit of co-operation and mutual trust within this great nation. By recognizing our regional, cultural and institutional differences as genuine assets, we can use them as tools to rediscover that positive spirit of optimism and innovation which possessed the Fathers of Confederation more than 100 years ago. As the Prime Minister has so frequently pointed out, we in Canada have many strengths on which to build, but the process must start here in Parliament which, after all, is little more than a microcosm of all the diverse attitudes and aspirations of Canadians. The throne speech states that, and I quote:

> The great immediate challenge facing Canada today is to restore growth, confidence and jobs to the Canadian economy.

● (1750)

I believe that goal can only be achieved if we can first of all purge our society of a serious illness which has infiltrated the attitude of Canadians in recent years. That illness I will call the illness of distrust. I believe that this illness is not visible in the deteriorating relationship which has developed in recent years between this federal government and the thousands of private sector businesses which form the backbone of our economy.

But this illness is not restricted to relations between government and private businesses. It is to be found also in the attitude of government bureaucracy toward the individual citizen, and in the distrust of the citizen toward his government. It is to be found in the relationship between provinces and the federal government, in the relationship between French and English Canada, between labour and management, between native peoples and non-natives, pro-nucs and anti-nucs, and of course between the opposition and government sides of this House.

I believe that this sickness must be cured, and it will be cured if we find a way to replace confrontation with compromise; if we can sacrifice self interest for the sake of the common good; if we can refrain from intentional exaggeration, and selective mis-use of statistics to argue a point.

On that score I should like to cite an example. We regularly hear in this House from some hon. members, particularly on the other side, of the so-called high rates of profiteering by certain industries in our country. I suggest that the rates that are cited are selectively chosen to discredit certain of the private sector corporations in this country. By selectively quoting percentage profit increases, without any honest attempt being made to tie these profit increases to the base profit for the previous year, Canadians are given a distorted and misleading impression that some corporations are making windfall profits. But a 50 per cent profit increase over a 4 per cent return on investment amounts to only a 6 per cent return on investment.

What these hon. members do not explain to the people of Canada is that if return on investment is lower than the interest rate on bonds or loans, then there will be no capital investment in speculative ventures, and with no money invested in this country far fewer jobs will be created, unless of course the federal government decides to step in, as it did for the past decade, and continually finance make-work projects, with increasing amounts of debt capital. As an aside, let me say that I would welcome from hon. members opposite in the coming days an explanation or a justification of ever increasing deficits. I would welcome it particularly from our good friends down in the far corner of the House.

Another example of distrust which I feel is often displayed in the House occurs whenever an hon. member makes sweeping insinuations about certain companies which may or may not be under investigation, or when a member casts doubt on the motives of another member. I saw this happen in recent days when an hon. member made reference to a certain meeting among three cabinet ministers, and tried to suggest a less than proper motive for that meeting. I believe that this sort of star chamber justice, this attempt to find ghosts where none exist, has no place in this House of Commons, and in fact and indeed casts an adverse reflection on every one of us.

I am convinced that certain political attitudes in this country have been systematically whittling away at the credibility of private enterprise. Our government is about to reverse that trend. We believe that our laws are the tools to cope with illegal conduct by any businesses or individuals who would take advantage. These laws should be enforced and respected. But we must dispense with the current notion that the government must have a window on industry in order to "keep them honest". We hear that term quite often from some of our friends in the House and outside it. This approach does not work. It destroys the respect which private businesses must hold toward the government which sets the rules. We in the government intend to give individual initiative and opportunity to flourish once again and to stimulate the enthusiasm of all our citizens to take a stake, to share in the risks of building a better Canada.

I would like to deal with a few special topics, Mr. Speaker, but I would prefer to carry on at eight o'clock. So, may I call it six o'clock now?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there consent to calling it six o'clock and allowing the hon. member to complete his remarks at eight o'clock when we resume the sitting?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Mr. Siddon.]

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take the floor once again to continue my presentation in reply to the Speech from the Throne. As I was saying before six o'clock, we have a serious problem in the country, a problem relating to distrust which many Canadians feel toward their government, and which governments within the country feel toward one another. The problem of distrust seems to permeate all the actions of government, at least of the government in office until May 22 of this year.

Now I should like to discuss a number of specific situations starting with the one which has been thoroughly debated and on which we have been thoroughly battered by members of the opposition, and that is the question of Petro-Canada. I should like to put the following question to the House: do we feel the private sector oil companies of this country have shown cause to be distrusted?

I put a question to the president of Petro-Canada a few weeks ago, and I think the answer he gave was very important. I asked the president of Petro-Canada if, on the basis of having a window on the petroleum industry, he had any cause to distrust or to suspect the motives of any of the private sector oil companies in the country, and he said that he did not. Further he indicated that he had nothing but the highest regard for the senior executive administration of the private sector oil companies in the country. That is an important observation which must go on record.

Many members of the House feel some concern as to what Petro-Canada has learned as a result of this virtuous "window on industry" by which they propose to have advantage. I have strong reasons to suspect that if one were to ask the president of Petro-Canada what special information it has obtained as a consequence of having this window on industry, one would be severely disappointed in the information one would receive.

A colleague of mine asked the president of Petro-Canada what Petro-Canada feels it can do better than any private sector oil company in the country. As I recall it, the answer was that there was nothing Petro-Canada could do better, in the interests of this nation, than the private sector can do; that the only difference is that Petro-Canada might do it faster. Of course that refers to the ability to bring on offshore resources and petroleum reserves more quickly than the private sector. Then that becomes a matter of price because, if the price is right, the private sector will do it equally as fast. But if Petro-Canada has access to subsidized capital to pursue such exploration, of course it can do it more quickly.

Hon. members of the House should ask themselves if Petro-Canada is really profitable. Hon. members of the opposition have told us how profitable Petro-Canada is. But I have an article from a recent issue of The Globe and Mail which indicates that in 1978 Petro-Canada reported a profit of $13.7 million. The equity value of Petro-Canada is $3 billion, so this total profit represents less than .5 per cent return on investment. I think that is atrocious, and certainly no private sector corporation could exist in the country with that rate of return on investment.

Also I should like to ask another question in the House this evening. Who owns Petro-Canada? We have heard a lot of comment to the effect that Canadians own Petro-Canada. The government of this nation extended $800 million worth of equity capital to Petro-Canada which we financed by adding to our debt, and not one nickel of interest has been returned to the Crown in relation to the $800 million. In addition to that, Petro-Canada borrowed $1.5 billion in order to acquire the assets of Pacific Petroleums Co. Does the House realize where this equity came from? It was issued in the form of term preferred shares to the private banking system of the country. They went to the United States and elsewhere to borrow that money. If members of the House want to delude Canadians into believing that we own PetroCan, they are fooling the masses. Petro-Canada is owned by multinational interests who have loaned $1.5 billion to this country, and the shares are held in the names of the private chartered banks of Canada.

If one reads a financial statement of Petro-Canada, one will find that it has assets of $3 billion and liabilities of $849 million to the Crown of Canada. Where is the difference? The difference is in the form of term preferred shares issued to private sector banks in the country. They are the ones who have title to Petro-Canada.

I must ask members of the House what their wish is? Would they prefer that the private chartered banks own the shares and borrow the money internationally, or would they prefer that Canadians have an opportunity to own a piece of Petro-Canada? I recommend that the House consider the importance of giving individual Canadians the option to purchase shares, to own a portion of Petro-Canada, and to accept a portion of the risk.

Also I should like to ask one final question. Should the Government of Canada be engaged in those profitable sectors of our economy in order to pay for the costs of the high risk areas where indeed the government must play a role? The hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) have suggested that we should use the profitable portions of Petro-Canada to finance its losses. I say, rubbish. That is not the role of the Government of Canada. If that was the case, we would want to own the multinational grocery merchandising firms in this country which enjoy a good rate of return on investment, and we would want to own, indeed, all the profitable ventures in this country. I submit that it is private individuals who should own a stake in Petro-Canada. It should be a Canadian-owned corporation, and the return on investment should go to those Canadians who choose to participate.

● (2010)

With that off my chest, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments in the area of fisheries. I think that it is important that we re-establish trust, as I have indicated earlier in my representation, among the government, the bureaucracy, and the people affected by the decisions made by the bureaucracy. In the area of fisheries there has been a dismal record indeed, wherein decisions were taken within the bureaucracy with the consent of the minister, and after the fact those decisions were reported to the fishermen. That must change.

It is time that we instituted a policy of consultation. Since the appointment of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), as Canada's Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a large number of initiatives have been taken to improve federal-provincial relations in the administration of our fisheries, and to improve relations with the canning industry, fishermen, and other fishing related industries. For example, the minister has recently met with the Atlantic fisheries council of provincial ministers and the Pacific fisheries council of provincial ministers. This is a first in many, many months, if not longer.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has announced that a major review of fisheries policy in Canada will be undertaken and presented to this House in the form of a white paper, with the participation of the provinces, fishermen, and the fishing industry. That is a first. The minister also indicated that the difficult questions of licensing and the recommendations of the Sinclair Report and Levelton Report will be subject for discussion and debate by the parliamentary Standing Committee on Fisheries and the Environment.

Such action is an expression of this government's willingness to involve all members of parliament in debate and discussions on issues of importance to that very important sector of our economy. The new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has taken initiatives that were long overdue. I would submit that in many other areas of our government similar initiatives will be taken, and that we will be using all the resources of Parliament and inviting the input of all points of view in order to evolve policies in the interest of Canadians and in the interest of maximizing the return of those very abundant resources which we enjoy in the great country of Canada.

On the questions of energy policy there have been committees formed which have worked diligently through the summer, and a national energy policy should be forthcoming soon. That policy will deal with the short-term problems of security, of supply and incentives to conservation. In the mid-term a policy will be introduced which will find ways to ensure that the seven or eight oil sands plants and heavy oil installations are brought on stream by 1990 in order to make this country self-sufficient in energy. That policy will also address the question of long-term alternatives, not merely restricted to nuclear power, but including the consideration of a number of other very attractive alternatives.

We have reason for nothing but optimism relative to the future of our economy and opportunities for young Canadians. If we are to tap those opportunities we must make a special attack on the question of increased support for research and development in this country. It is long overdue that we stop all the platitudes and get down to finding a formula that will ensure, at least in the immediate future, that 1.5 per cent of our gross national product is re-invested in science and technology, and in the long run a level approaching 2.5 per cent. If it requires that we insist upon research and developmental technology content in foreign investment in Canada to the tune of 1.5 per cent, then we must insist upon it. And if we must insist that companies investing in Canada extend world product mandates for the products of our technology, then those are initiatives that we must take.

Finally, in relation to science and technology, I would suggest that the universities of this country are an important training ground. I spent ten years of my life in a university in Canada in a technological area, and I have been appalled and astounded by the pitiful lack of support by the former government for science and technology. It is high time that we had a policy recognizing that fact. For every oil sands plant to be brought on stream, we may require as many as 3,000 engineers and many other technical people. We must provide the training for those people and recognize that, if we do not accept that challenge now, we will be importing those technologies later.

Before I conclude, I would like to say that there has been a tremendous preoccupation in this country with programs of equalization DREE, UIC, welfare and all the other programs which have granted subsidies and special initiatives to various parts of this country. These programs have been overlapping and filled with redundancy. When we in this government introduce a program such as our scheme of mortgage credits, it is designed to benefit the people who have been footing the bill for all these other programs. It is high time that these people obtained a few concessions from this government.

In conclusion, what the Prime Minister was saying in this House was that we must restore mutual trust in one another, not only here in Parliament but in all the institutions of this nation and in the attitude of people toward this government. Trust is bred by a spirit of good will and a penchant for openness, tempered by a healthy respect for the other person's point of view. It is achieved by making a genuine effort to gather all the facts, not just some of the facts, by discussing our differences and arriving at an honest consensus.

I see that process as being a catalyst and also the consequence of initiatives set out in the throne speech. I hope to look back on the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada as a success story in re-establishing trust among Canadians.

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, as the member of parliament for Moncton in the land of New Brunswick, the picture province of Canada, I am very proud to be addressing the House today, proud of my riding and proud of the people I represent.

The riding of Moncton encompasses many different communities, some large, some small, from the thriving villages of Petitcodiac and Salisbury in the west, to the growing community of Dieppe in the east. The motto of the city of Moncton itself is "Resurgio", a triumphant motto for a city which has overcome many serious setbacks over the course of its history. That part of the riding in which I and my family reside is the fastest growing community in Atlantic Canada—Riverview, New Brunswick—a friendly town whose citizens participate and work hard to make it the attractive community it is.

Moncton is famous for its Magnetic Hill where automobiles seem to go up hill without any visible means of propulsion, proverbial or otherwise. We also have the world famous tidal bore which tourists from all over North America flock to see. More recently we are proud of our growing l'Université de Moncton, with the first French speaking school of law east of Quebec City.

But the real strength of any community, Mr. Speaker, is not its tourist attractions or its institutions, but rather its people. In the only officially bilingual province of Canada we have, in the riding of Moncton, a microcosm of Canada where two cultures live side by side, both enriching the other, and giving to the community a flavour and a flair to which not many communities of this country can lay claim. With enlightened leadership and the commitment of reasonable men and women we offer a shining example to the rest of Canada.

My reaction to the Speech from the Throne is somewhat mixed. It is very obvious to me that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) canvassed everyone he could think of for ideas for the speech. Then he hung his ideas out like a drab wash on a clothesline and called it a throne speech. There is no theme to the speech, no connecting link, no underlying philosophy. The Speech from the Throne could have been a clarion call to Canadians from a new government intent on a new beginning for Canada. Instead, it turned out to be a clothesline. To be fair to clotheslines, even they have their good points.

I congratulate the government for its promise to introduce freedom of information legislation based, as the Speech from the Throne says, on the principle that government information should be available to the people and necessary exceptions to that principle should be limited and specified, and disputes over application of those exceptions should be resolved independently of the government. Those are noble words, Mr. Speaker. We can only hope that they result in some legislative action. In New Brunswick we have also heard noble words about a freedom of information act, but the act has not as yet been proclaimed. Let us hope the Prime Minister will not take a cue from his Conservative colleague in New Brunswick, and fail to follow through on his promise in the Throne Speech.

It is my understanding that the freedom of information legislation proposed in the Speech from the Throne stems directly from the government's perception that the process of government needs to be opened up. I believe that perspective is accurate. It is vitally important that we bring government at all levels, federal, provincial, and municipal, closer to the people. It is important because, as the hon. member opposite who just spoke pointed out, there is a great gulf fixed at the present time between people and their elected representatives.

A recent study conducted by a Carleton University professor has revealed that the majority of Canadians surveyed do not trust politicians, do not respect politicians, and do not even like politicians. The public perception of politicians is that they care more about themselves than about the people they are elected to represent; that they are out for themselves; out to line their own pockets—out to lunch. So the government is to be commended if it intends to do something about that alienation. I say "if" because actions speak louder than words. It is fine to say that "we are going to open up government and listen to people more, that we are going to be a government that seeks consensus rather than confrontation." Those are fine sentiments, but fine sentiments betrayed by deeds.

If the government were serious about its sentiments, it would not be moving in the direction it is moving with Petro-Canada. If the government were serious about restoring the process of government to the people of this country, Petro-Canada would be retained as it stands. According to a recent Gallup poll, 75 per cent of Canadians say that the federal oil company should keep exploring for gas and oil, 57 per cent say it should be involved in buying oil from other countries, and 54 per cent feel it should be retailing oil and gas. A Gallup poll in July found that Canadians opposed selling Petro-Canada to the private sector two to one, or 48 per cent to 22 per cent. A majority of Canadians want to keep Petro-Canada as it is. Is the government not listening to this majority? If there ever was a misguided, misdirected, ill-conceived, and unfortunate policy, it has to be this government's policy on Petro-Canada.

Petro-Canada was established by a Liberal government to secure Canada's future energy supplies. Since it was set up it has done a great deal to achieve that end. It has stimulated exploration for oil and gas throughout Canada—in many cases entering into partnership with other oil companies—to ensure that exploration takes place which might not have been undertaken at all had the multinationals been left to themselves.

Petro-Canada is our very own national oil company. Despite what the government would have us believe, it is owned one hundred per cent by Canadians. Every Canadian citizen already has a share, already has a stake in Petro-Canada. It is our protection against the giant multinationals that care more about profit than about this country.

Petro-Canada works. It is the great Canadian success story.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, I think we should note that reaction. This is a great day—the deaf hear and the dumb speak!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCauley: The government would end this great Canadian success story. Just last night the report of the task force on Petro-Canada was made public. If the government follows its recommendations it will destroy the national mandate of that corporation. Why would it do that? Who knows?

We know for sure that this government is not responding to some great feeling on the part of the Canadian public. In fact, just the opposite is true. Canadians support Petro-Canada as it is. Canadians take pride in the company and want to see it continue its work. Canadians do not want to see it chopped up, carved up to become some miniature Canadian Exxon or Sunoco.

What reason can there be for the government's action? Well, if you read the report there does not seem to be any reason other than a dogmatic, inflexible desire to return to the antediluvian days of laissez faire capitalism. The report argues that the government should restrict itself purely to designing a public policy framework, leaving the actual operation to private companies. Would this government say the same of hydro? Would it say the same of the building of highways? Would it say the same of education? Of course not, and it should not say that of Petro-Canada. The work that Petro-Canada is involved in is every bit as essential as the building of roads, the provision of electricity, or the provision of education. This country needs energy to heat homes, to power industries, to keep the wheels of society turning. It is the one absolutely essential resource and, as such, it is desirable that government have every possible instrument at its disposal through which it can protect this essential resource.

If the government does not want to involve itself directly in petroleum operations, then what does the government want? We do not know the answer to that question. The answer to that question is difficult to ascertain. The task force says the government policy will be accomplished through the advocacy of fiscal regimes, appropriate regulations and incentives, as well as financial support. What that means in plain and simple English is more give-aways to an already over-fat oil industry. Not only does the taxpayer lose the profit from Petro-Canada but, in future, the instrument the Tories will use to effect their policy will be those tired old devices of corporate handouts and taxpayer give-aways. Surely, there is a better way.

There is more that is defective in the thinking of the government. The task force argues that there is confusion and uncertainty about Petro-Canada's goals and objectives. I suggest that the uncertainty and confusion exist in the mind of the task force itself.

Mr. Beattie: Have you read the report?

Mr. McCauley: No, and I do not think the task force has either.

I wonder whether the task force members bothered to read the act establishing Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada was created to secure our energy future. There is no uncertainty about its goals—its single purpose is to protect all Canadians. If anything, it has been too successful in this goal, for Petro-Canada has demonstrated that it is possible to serve the national objective and still make a profit. Would the Tories be so interested in privatizing Petro-Canada if it were not making a profit?

● (2030)

The Tory policy on Petro-Canada is fraught with many contradictions. For example, the task force suggests that the new privatized company will operate much more efficiently because it will have only one goal, to make profits for it shareholders. And yet, in recommending a division of assets, the task force requires the privatized company to maintain a reduced interest in the expensive and risky frontier exploration operations. The task force members seem to want to have their cake and eat it too, arguing on the one hand that management will be free to make decisions motivated solely by profit, while on the other hand burdening this "profit making" company with potential losses.

And what about the actual process of privatization? If the government decides to "BCRIC" Petro-Canada, perhaps we should look at the share distribution of BCRIC itself. In that process, two million of the 12 million shares offered free to B.C. residents went unclaimed. Is it not likely that the same thing will happen with Petro-Canada if it is "BCRIC'd"? Is it not likely that many people, unaware of the method of claiming their shares, not used to this kind of offering or knowing little or nothing about the stock market, will lose out on their shares in Petro-Canada? What will the government do for them?

In the end only one conclusion is possible: this government committed itself to a policy that seemed good when it was involved in an election campaign. People thought they could get some votes with it. Now this government is pointlessly sticking to a silly policy, a policy which makes no sense and which is, in a word, stupid. If the government were really serious about listening to Canadians, it would leave Petro-Canada alone.

If the government were really serious about listening to people, if the government really cared about people, it would not be systematically throwing them out of work as it is doing in my riding of Moncton. In the past two weeks, Mr. Speaker, 35 to 50 of my constituents have been laid off from the Department of Transport in Moncton. I am told this is only the thin edge of the wedge, that this 2 per cent cutback will be increased to a 10 per cent cutback in the very near future. In other words, this is just the beginning. The jobs being eliminated are not statistics, not figures on a balance sheet designed to make the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) look good, or to justify his nickname of "the Slasher." The lost jobs represent people, fathers and mothers, whose sense of self-worth that comes from gainful employment has been callously pulled out from underneath them. What will they say to their children when Christmas comes?

If the government really cared about people, little people, ordinary Canadians, would it be flirting with the Premier of Alberta, professing undying love in the form of increasing prices for oil by at least $4 a barrel next year? Such an increase will add at least 12 cents to the price of a gallon of gasoline or heating oil and will strike hardest and most directly at the consumers in Atlantic Canada. These are consumers, Mr. Speaker who have no choice but to drive their own cars. We do not have access to systems of mass transportation in Petitcodiac and Salisbury, New Brunswick. Atlantic Canadian consumers have no choice but to heat their homes with oil because cheaper natural gas is not available. Does the government care? I think not.

I think of one of my constituents in Moncton who, after five years with the Department of Transport, is now out of a job, kicked out because of the policies of this government. Without a job he will have to pay more money for gas and oil in the coming year. Will he think the government cares? I think not.

Besides its lack of care and concern for ordinary Canadians, I question this government's care and concern for Canada. If this government is intent on opening up the process of government to Canadians, should it not also be opening up Canada itself to Canadians?

The Prime Minister has a different vision of Canada. He is fond of using the phrase "community of communities". It is a nice phrase, Mr. Speaker, a catchy phrase, a comforting phrase, and I am sure on the Prime Minister's part, a sincere phrase. I do not question the Prime Minister's sincerity. I just question his wisdom. What does the phrase mean in practice? How is "community of communities" translated into action? It seems to focus more on small "c" communities than on the big "c" community of Canada. The Prime Minister seems to think that by making the provinces stronger he will, in some strange mysterious way, make Canada greater. Curious logic, Mr. Speaker.

It is somewhat like the father of a large family giving all his children $50,000 each, setting them up in competing businesses, and then expecting that situation to strengthen the family somehow. It does not make much sense.

The Prime Minister is telling us that the old days of federal-provincial tensions are over, that confrontation is to be replaced by conciliation, that demands and commands are to be replaced by jovial consensus. His government will consult with the provinces. He will talk to the premiers; he will have dialogue with the provinces. This is another example, Mr. Speaker, of noble sentiments not matched by deeds. Isn't it curious that this man who promises to do all these things with the provinces has nothing to say to the province of Quebec at this crucial time in its history? His philosophy with regard to Quebec, Mr. Speaker, seems to be benign neglect—perhaps if we just pretend that it is not there, it will quietly go away. I wonder what the people of Quebec think about their federal government on that issue.

The Prime Minister's theory of federal-provincial relations will not heal the regional sickness that afflicts us. It will only make it worse, because the Prime Minister is ignoring a fundamental fact of this country, that federal-provincial antagonisms are not political, not Liberals versus Conservatives, or Social Credit versus Conservatives, or NDP versus Liberals, or whatever. Federal-provincial antagonisms stem from the basic fact that there are conflicting interests in any federal-provincial system. There are two ways to deal with that kind of conflict, that kind of basic institutionalized conflict. One way is to appeal to idealism, the spirit of loyalty to one's country. It is to present the big picture, the forest instead of all the little trees.

The other way is to appeal to some baser instincts, the spirit of selfishness, the instinct of "me first, you last", greed when it comes to sharing the natural resources that mother nature has arbitrarily assigned to some parts of this country and not to others.

I fear for my country because I see this government taking this latter course. I do not believe for a moment that the people of Canada are going to be happy with this, because we are a great people, an idealistic people, an altruistic people, and we will not stand idly by when governments and politicians appeal to what is worst in us instead of to what is best in us.

I have just returned from Alberta and Saskatchewan. I have spoken with ordinary Canadians there. The people of the west love this country. They think it is the greatest country in the world. I share that conviction with them.

An hon. Member: So do I.

Mr. McCauley: I am pleased to hear someone else does too. They are not going to take kindly to a government that appeals to what is worst in them. Already they are in revolt. In Prince Albert, the seat formerly held by John Diefenbaker, all signs point to a government defeat. Mr. Diefenbaker was immensely popular in Prince Albert, Mr. Speaker, but his party is not, and is becoming even less so as each day passes.

• (2040)

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to support this government when it is right. It is my responsibility to be open-minded and fair, and I take that responsibility seriously. But at the same time it is my responsibility, as it is the responsibility of every member of this House, no matter what side he sits on, to speak out forcefully and strongly against policies that pit Canadians against each other on the basis of economic wealth and economic resources.

All of us have a duty to speak out strongly and forcefully against policies that encourage regionalism, that feed the prejudice of separation, that fan the fires of division in this country. All of us, each and every member of Parliament, have a duty to speak out against government policies that reveal a lack of compassion, a lack of understanding, a lack of caring. All of us have a responsibility to speak out strongly against policies that have more to do with some kind of abstract dogma than they have to do with flesh and blood, the hopes and dreams of the ordinary working people of this country. That is the enterprise that we should all be engaged in, Mr. Speaker, and I invite all members of this House to join me in that enterprise, to support what is right, but to speak out strongy and forcefully against what is wrong.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour to stand before you tonight as the new member for Lethbridge-Foothills. I believe that the role of a member of parliament is an important role in our Canadian society. As members we have exceptional rights, immunities and privileges. We also have major responsibilities.

Like many other members, I am in public life because I sense that Canada and Canadian people are at a low ebb, at a crisis of identity, at a point where we doubt our own abilities, institutions and future. We are questioning the basic values we hold dear. We are questioning the value of our basic institutions, be it church, government or marriage. We are at a time in history that can best be described as an interface between the values of past generations and future generations.

I have no doubt whatsoever as to the capacity of Canadians not only to survive this crisis of confidence, but to emerge with renewed vigour and direction. I am convinced that Parliament is the major institution that can focus our collective Canadian consciousness, that can put into place and motion the proper processes to solve our social and economic problems. It is Parliament that can set the tone of public attitudes. Parliament must protect individual rights, private ownership of property, and the fundamental freedoms. It is here in this House over the next few months and years that the role of government, the role of private enterprise, and the role of the individual citizen will be decided. I sincerely hope that we, as individual members, make decisions from the point of view that Canada will last for thousands of years. If we do, the future generations will be able to say we were wise.

Lethbridge-Foothills consists of the southwest corner of Alberta and has a population of about 90,000 people. Its geography varies from the beautiful Rocky Mountains through the foothills and out to the wide prairie. Our commercial enterprises range from tourism in the mountains, together with coal mining, to gas production and ranching in the foothills, to dry land and irrigation farming on the prairies. Located at convenient places throughout the constituency are about 20 communities which act as service centres for the surrounding farmers and ranchers. Agriculture and agricultural processing are our main source of wealth.

In our mountains we have millions of tons of low sulphur coal which is the real solution to the dreaded acid rain currently devastating our lakes in central Canada. Under our prairie, at a depth of 200 to 400 feet, lies a seam of thermal coal about six feet thick which is the long-term solution to Canada's energy supply. We have water for irrigation which is the short and long-term solution to the world's food crisis. In short, we have abundant resources.

The city of Lethbridge has close ties with confederation and its events. In order to build and operate the CPR, a supply of coal was needed. Elliot T. Galt, the son of Sir Alexander Galt, one of the Fathers of Confederation, found that coal at a place called Coal Banks, where Nick Sheran was supplying coal to Fort Macleod and Fort Benton. Coal Banks is now the thriving city of Lethbridge, with 52,000 citizens. It has the Centennial University of Lethbridge which offers a baccalaureate degree in arts, science, and education. Members will recall that Fort Macleod was the first fort established by the North West Mounted Police after a gruelling march westward during the summer of 1874.

What I really want to explain about Lethbridge-Foothills is its people. The people of Lethbridge-Foothills are what makes it great and my job so interesting and worth while. Our people are multicultural, with many organized and active groups throughout the riding. With the exception of our native people who I will mention shortly, we are all immigrants within the last four to five generations. We are in Lethbridge-Foothills either because of active hostility in other lands or because our ancestors wanted a better life for us—a chance of opportunity and freedom to work, save, and raise a family. For example, we have a large Mormon community which was viciously persecuted in the United States and who brought to Lethbridge-Foothills their unique skills of irrigation and strong family and church ties. We have a large group of Mennonite people who also came to escape religious persecution. To them we look for and receive humanity and charity which is unparalleled. Their reaction to the "boat people" crisis is so typical.

We have a large Hutterite community that choose to farm communally and to look after their own people. Different they are, but they are very valuable to our farm community. We have a large community of citizens from The Netherlands. They bring skills to farming and trades which have permitted the whole area to grow and become prosperous. They too bring a deep belief in family life. We have Italian, Ukrainian, Polish, Hungarian, Scottish, Irish, Japanese, Chinese and all other communities. All are proud of their own identity, but are subject to the Romeo and Juliet syndrome with the result that we are all becoming much more closely related. We have about 6,000 Blood Band Indians living on the largest Indian reserve in Canada. They are on the verge of a cultural and economic flowering that will grow geometrically over the next generations. They are educating their young, and are positive about their role and identity in Canada.

I could talk on for hours about my constituents and riding, but suffice it to say that we are a serious people, dedicated, hard working, confident, and deeply religious. We are still close to the soil and, therefore, the heartbeat of nature, with its tune of rugged independence. We are in Canada because it was a land of opportunity and hope. It still can be if we, as members, do our job well.

There are many topics I would like to speak about. I would like to tell the House of the devastating effect the capital gains tax is having on our farmers and small businessmen. I would like to speak on the belief honestly held by most people that Parliament does not respond to their wishes. Daily I hear from and read about citizens who are aggrieved, upset and angry about metric conversion, gun control, abortion, and capital punishment. Parliament must respond, and I am delighted with the government's plan to reorganize Parliament so that private members' bills shall come to a vote. I will speak on each one as it arises. Today, though, I want to speak briefly on three major topics—Quebec, Ontario, and our philosophy of government.

With respect to Quebec I can say that the vast majority of my constituents hold warm feelings of real friendship toward the people of that province. We are excited that they have broken out of the mold which restricted and blocked their cultural and economic development. We are delighted with their enthusiasm for life, language, and culture. We know they group us in the west together with all other Anglophones, but I want to say frankly and plainly that the people of my riding are as different from the people of Ontario as are the people of Quebec.

We believe the people of Quebec can grow and develop within Canada just as we can in Alberta. We are proud of that aspect of our life which is Canadian—the strong areas helping the weak in this generation because the situation might be reversed in the next generation. We are proud of our record as peacekeepers, of our reputation as a food basket for so much of the world, as a home for refugees, a country where diversity is valued, where changes are made through political evolution rather than revolution. At the same time we are proud of our unique Alberta experience—of our openness, our belief in the value of education, our diverse cultural and ethnic groupings, our fundamental belief in religion, family, and individual initiative. We want the people of Quebec to share the joys and tears of being Canadian while at the same time retaining their provincial uniqueness.

On one issue we in the west are united. We do not accept the concept of sovereignty association if by "sovereignty" the PQ government means total independence, as if it were a separate country, and if by "association" it means retention of equalization and high tariffs. We in the west feel we have contributed much to Canada through selling our raw products to the east at cheap world prices while buying eastern manufactured goods at tariff-protected prices. We need and want, and, indeed, all we ask is a commitment to the Canadian experiment which can continue to grow and evolve to meet the needs of future generations.

If I might be permitted a completely personal view, I am convinced that the prime minister of Quebec and his party are still reacting to pressures and injustices of 25 years ago when they were young. But those pressures and injustices have largely disappeared and those which remain can be completely resolved by open, frank, and friendly discussion with the federal government and the governments of the other provinces. Clearly, we have more in common than we have in difference. Mr. Speaker, from the depths of our hearts we want the people of Quebec to willingly and enthusiastically remain in Canada.

With respect to Ontario, Alberta is most upset with the stance of that province vis-à-vis our oil resources. Alberta has produced approximately 11 billion barrels of conventional crude and has only six billion barrels left. We need the world price for this oil so as to finance our ideas and dreams for the future. We believe that in the past, confederation and federal policies have largely been shaped to pour wealth and strength into Ontario. This was no doubt a correct policy for its time and place, but we are now ready, willing and able to contribute more to Canada than raw resources.

As I said earlier, people in the west are as different from the people of Ontario as are the people of Quebec. We have a different background. We are multicultural in our attitude. We have been tested by pioneering a new land and outliving the depression, and have met the test. Members need only read the history of the depression in the west where three out of every four farmers had to give up and leave the land. There were no major assistance projects to keep us on our farms and many of our parents and grandparents had to leave them. That experience is burned into our memory. We do not ever want to face such a situation again, and we regard our oil resources as being insurance against such disaster. We see Ontario's plan that our oil should continue to be sold at less than world market price to be a rape of our constitutional ownership and the virtual theft of our money.

Hon. members need to understand that Alberta's heritage trust fund should really be $20 billion rather than the $5 billion it is. Albertans have generously, and without complaint, contributed $15 billion toward the domestic price of oil, primarily to the benefit of Ontario. We do not accept the proposition that we are either greedy or selfish.

With respect to our philosophy of government my thesis is short and simple. The Canadian people must now decide where and how power is exercised in this country. By power I mean political and economic power. On one matter there should be no doubt. Power is always exercised by some group or person in every society. Decisions must be made and they are made; the question is, by whom? History shows that political power was exercised in the past by a very few male citizens with land. This has now changed to the point at which provision has been made for universal adult suffrage for both males and females. The process has been to spread out political power among people individually. I believe this to be good and wise.

With regard to economic power, however, the issue has not been settled. On the one hand there are the Liberal and New Democratic parties which believe that the means of production, and, by extension, power, should be nationalized, that is, owned by government with decisions being made by the cabinet. We in the Conservative party, on the other hand, are committed to returning economic power to individual citizens. We believe that millions of individual decisions by individual property owners, by individual shareholders, by individual business operators are much superior to decisions by one government, one cabinet, or one prime minister. In the past ownership of land was power. Today, ownership of shares is power.

The Canadian people are at a continental divide, a watershed; we can flow to the side of government ownership in which we all become employees, or we can flow to the side of individual ownership and control. We are not without modern-day examples of the way other countries have gone on this issue and how their citizens have been affected. Witness Russia, for example. In that country one sees the extreme of nationalization since all means of production are owned by the state. But decisions do get made—and by whom? By a small party of ultra socialists. But what of individual citizens? Would anyone in Canada want to trade places with them?

Take the example of Great Britain. Since the Second World War socialist governments have nationalized coal, gas, steel, electricity, railways, docks, waterways, and communications. They have taken over huge companies such as Leyland and Rolls Royce. In short, they have done exactly what the Liberals and the New Democrats want to do here in Canada. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, are the individual citizens of Britain better off for all this nationalization? Is there freedom and opportunity there for an ambitious person to build a better life for himself or herself? The answer is clear. It is no, and they are emigrating by the thousands.

Mr. Speaker, over the last ten years during the Liberal-NDP love affair, Canada endured a greater growth of centralized government bureaucracy and power than in any other period. The growth of Crown corporations, over 200 of them since 1970—in short, government in the business and personal lives of people—has been enormous. Government regulations and red tape are totally stifling the creative, innovative part of our society. We are seeing in Canada the breakdown of control mechanisms which worked when economic decision-making was spread among millions of people.

• (2100)

Government is now an active participant in the market place rather than a regulator for the public good. Why do the Liberals and the NDP so fear Canadians that they want government ownership? What happens when government owns a business or controls a Crown corporation? Simply this: political expediency overrides the clear, correct and sound decisions which must be made about investment in new plant, market development and labour relations. What does government do when the business is failing? It pours in people's tax money. It gives preferential treatment and privilege in direct competition with private people who are trying to do the same job. This is a truth which applies whether the government is PC, NDP or Liberal. This is precisely what happened with Petro-Canada and with many Crown corporations.

The Progressive Conservative Party and the government have really adopted the position of the "classical liberals". Thank heaven we have. I am proud to carry the banner offering individuals a chance to work hard and to build a better future for themselves and their descendants.

If I may be permitted another personal comment, my grandfather did not crawl out of a mine in England at age 24, having spent ten long years working underground and then giving the rest of his life and my grandmother's to pioneering in Alberta, followed by my father and mother, only to find those gains wiped out by a socialist government with confiscatory tax policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thacker: I will not let their dreams fail, and I call on other hon. members to join the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and this government in returning Canada to a place of opportunity, spirit, growth and good will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for having invited me to speak during the debate on the throne speech. As the new member for the constituency of Chicouti-mi, it is with pride and humility that I speak for the first time in the House. I therefore take this opportunity to say that I intend to defend as vigorously as possible the interests of my constituents and fellow countrymen and more especially the underprivileged and day labourers.

I also take this opportunity to thank my predecessor, the former member for Chicoutimi, Mr. Paul Langlois. He knew how to represent his constituents and how to defend the interests of his fellow citizens. In addition, he played an important role as chairman of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates; as such he won the esteem of all his colleagues. On behalf of the people of Chicoutimi, I thank him for the work he performed and I wish him every success in his new career.

Allow me also to congratulate the Speaker on his second election to the presidency of our assembly and to commend the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and all hon. members who have already taken part in the debate.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people have certainly noticed that a rather long interval has elapsed between the dissolution of the House last March and the opening of the new parliament on October 9. We recall that the hon. Mr. Trudeau had said that if he were re-elected he would open the new parliament in the middle of June. I concede that the party which has formed the new government is back from a 16-year walk in the desert. However, after listening to that sad little speech of 20 minutes in which the new government presented its so-called new policies, I had to curb my appetite. During the campaign and during the five-month vacation it granted itself, the new government kept announcing that it had finally found the solution to all our problems.

The day after the election, the increase in the inflation rate, in the interest rate and in the unemployment rate were nothing but bad souvenirs.

The day after the election, the government asked us to wait another while. To look serious, they are going to set up a timetable and feed us a catalogue of forecasts with figures—a matter of looking scientific. The big night will take place within three years, perhaps four, unless it is next spring when the people will be fed up with this government of sleepy-heads. The least we can say is that this government is showing disconcerting naiveté and does not realize that Canada is facing challenges both internally and now externally, and that those challenges are going to be with us for a long time. Internally, a provincial government is going to hold a referendum. That provincial government will be urging its citizens to separate from the rest of Canada. That brutal fact has been buried under a ton of silence. One can only interpret this serious omission as being indicative of the policy of non-confrontation being pursued by this government. For my part, it is irresponsible.

[Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi).]

Externally, this country is facing the challenges of a world dominated by uncertainty, monetary and financial conditions where the Bank of Canada raised its discount rate to 13 per cent the very day Parliament opened, which must be viewed as a most disturbing sign. Second, the world is going through a period of slower growth. That fact seems to have escaped this government. That is part of its new philosophy. This government thinks it is acting when it is not doing anything. So, it is with apprehension and fear that we see such a government take over.

Mr. Speaker, I believe a true government would have introduced an industrial strategy. For example, in my riding, an industry like Alcan exports nearly all its production of aluminum bars to foreign markets. Yet, that aluminum plant is located near the biggest power dam in the world and that power is being sold at very competitive rates. That is an advantage neither the United States nor Europe nor Japan have. How is it that we export so little in terms of finished aluminum products? It is not a transportation problem because there is a deep water port close by in what is called the Saguenay Fjord. For this government, spending is synonymous with waste. I feel that if waste must be fought, one must not confuse waste and capital expenditures that have such important effects on a regional or even national economy.

Private interests are now investing some $400 million in the aluminum industry of our region which is home to the largest aluminum factory in the world. Such multinational corporations as General Motors will start building aluminum engines. Why does the government not set up a scheme to encourage small and medium size business? If it did, its efforts would support those of the private sector. It has been found that in Japan, especially in the automobile industry, multinationals co-operate with small and medium size firms, which function as subcontractors. Why does the government not encourage our small and medium size enterprises to play a similar part? This would help reduce our trade balance deficit and create jobs in a region where unemployment remains a major problem.

What about agriculture? The government does not even mention that sector of our economy in the document where it sets forth its policies, perhaps as if it is not interested at all. I am worried about such an approach. However, Canadian farmers can rely on us. We will certainly remind the government that they exist. As a matter of fact, agriculture is the industry with the highest level of productivity, thanks to the encouraging policies of the previous administration.

The new government is guilty of serious negligence if it does not take any interest in Canadian farmers. However, let us look at some of the others schematic proposals contained in the Speech from the Throne.

First, what are we to think of the announcement of cuts in social services and the public service and the accelerated increase in the price of energy, to name only a few? What is surprising is that these measures were announced before the opening of Parliament. This is even more startling if we recall that the new Prime Minister never missed an opportunity to remind the previous government that its new policies should be announced in Parliament before being announced directly by the information media. Why is the new government not practising what it preached for so long? We are now in a situation where ministers have made public fantastic statements which were later confirmed or denied publicly by the Prime Minister. Yet, no representative of the Canadian people, in other words no member of Parliament was able to learn the position of the government by any other means than by listening to news reports since Parliament had not yet been convened.

We must admit that this is a first in the history of Canadian Parliaments. It is very disturbing to realize that this policy change has been brought about by a party that had promised repeatedly that it would re-establish the supremacy of Parliament. In view of the actions of this government, I am therefore faced with the obligation to protest strongly about its off-hand treatment of the Canadian people. Mr. Speaker, we are not the only ones to have suffered the arrogance of this new government. What about the way certain senior public servants have been treated?

Who will defend the 60,000 public servants involved, who include some who have been with the government for 20 and even 30 years? They include family men and women, as well as young and old employees who are living a dramatic experience. The government has suddenly told them that they are completely useless in our society and condemned them to become the laughing stock of their family and relatives. I shall not even mention the financial difficulties, the broken dreams and the despair of those Canadians. Yet, did the new Prime Minister not solemnly promise to put Canada back to work? The government must make an effort to create jobs for those public servants.

On the other hand, the new government continues to hire new people. I have heard that there is a lady in the office of the Prime Minister who does only that. She is in charge of human relations, while 60,000 civil servants are unfortunately denied that type of consideration. To be hard-hearted has become the new virtue of that regime. That is its trademark. Did the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) not say that he would be hard?

What about the statements of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) to a social club on October 4 last? Is that the leader of the Canadian diplomatic corps who wonders out loud what advantages Canada derives from its participation in certain aid programs, since our trade with some countries is negligible? We have no colonialist past, nothing to feel guilty about, so we can let them starve to death, those poor souls: our conscience is clear. Is that our new aid policy for the Third World countries? Mr. Speaker, if I have dwelled on the subject of these unhappy circumstances, it is because I fear that Canadians might be conditioned to harden their hearts, to accept the fact that we have nothing in common with the poor of the Third World. Then it will be all the more easy to accept that Canadians in turn be compelled to accept heavy personal sacrifices for the sake of a balanced budget because that is what they are trying to shove down our throats.

Since when are 60,000 Canadians the only ones responsible for an unbalanced budget? Does a balanced budget not flow from more intense economic activity, from an effort in the field of exports or from a display of imagination? Yet, when you have a Prime Minister who antagonizes the whole Arab world because he is the only one who stubbornly wants to move an embassy, it is no wonder if contracts are lost. As a result, each one of us is impoverished. Who is going to foot the bill for this loss of revenue? Will it be the public servants again?

Isn't the lack of coherence of the cabinet over the sale of the Candu reactor—and I will not quote you the remarks made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—the reason why we lost that sale in Argentina? Who is going to pay for this loss of income? Again, a bunch of civil servants?

The Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) candidly tells us that he will have to reduce the funds earmarked for the promotion of Canadian products sales in Latin America because of budget cuts. Is there a more anti-economic action than that one? Who will pay for the loss of revenue resulting from that irresponsible policy? How many public servants in the next tumbrel? There is never any tumbrel for the members of this government, Mr. Speaker.

In the area of economic measures, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) has announced his intention to get rid of many Crown corporations. That puts in the deepest state of anxiety and confusion those corporations' employees as well as the Canadian public. What reasons, what fever, what rage are driving this government to wanting to get rid of Canadian corporations such as Petro-Canada, Canadair or de Havilland? Are they showing a deficit? In most cases, the answer is no; on the contrary they are showing substantial benefits. Are they competing unfairly with the private sector? Again, the answer is no, and we might add that they are meeting alone the competition of foreign multinationals. Will this giving away of Crown corporations to the private sector help reduce the number of public servants? The answer is no because the employees of those companies are not considered as civil servants under the Public Service Employment Act. There is no mention of the fact that businesses such as Canadair and de Havilland were pioneers in aeronautics. Those operations are in Quebec, in a sector of high technology, and they enable our Canadian research workers to vie in ingenuity with those of other countries.

Finally, it is not sure that the executives and research workers who are working now in those businesses will agree to stay with the prospective buyers of those companies. Worse still, should they fall in the hands of multinationals, the first step which would be taken by those industrial giants would be to close the laboratories and rule out any expenditure for research and development in Canada. So, we would have turned the page on everything which could be a breakthrough in a promising sector for Canada, and for Quebec in particular.

Similarly, we do not understand why it is a shame for the federal government to have a presence in the industrial world through nationalized businesses. Are the provinces not doing the same thing, provinces under Conservative governments such as Alberta and Ontario? Is the present government afraid of its responsibilities? Is it afraid of being a real government?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I realize that I am actually pleading a case today. In fact, the official opposition has a duty to bring to light the contradictory actions of this government. For example, the new government thinks that Canadians have no assets in this country. Nothing is farther from the truth. Crown corporations act in the interest of Canada and Canadians. The new government wants to be attentive to the needs of the people, yet it refuses to listen to the arguments of the opposition parties as well as to the critics of Progressive Conservative members showing that Canadians are opposed to some government policies. Finally, all the electoral gibberish about promises for a better future, words such as "potential", phrases such as "to have interest in Canada" are but empty clichés and slogans. This government, after coming before Parliament, seems to have prematurely aged. That is understandable since we all know the government wastes its strength and its energy in purposeless activities as it does not know where it is going. The lack of a sense of direction and stubbornness are the two pillars of this new government. In my view that is not a very good omen for the future of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend the traditional congratulations to the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) for their superb presentations in moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Also I should like to congratulate Mr. Speaker on his appointment to that honoured position. I share with the House the outstanding contribution Your Honour made during the time I have been in the House of Commons since 1974, and the pleasure I have had working with you.

When one reviews the Speech from the Throne one finds that many positive areas have been advocated and proposed, many important areas. We have received a certain amount of criticism from the opposition in regard to the lack of statements respecting the economy, but in the Speech from the Throne we find that the government is making a commitment to better control federal government expenditures. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) introduced a new expenditure management system so that strict limits will fall upon individual ministers rather than simply on the shoulders of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens). Also we see that there will be parliamentary control in regard to the accountability of Crown corporations and that their spending habits will be scrutinized. We will have regular opportunities as parliamentarians to judge whether various government programs and agencies need to continue, or if they need to be altered at all by the implementation of sunset legislation.

It is a grand feat in itself when the federal government attempts to tackle the waste in government spending which has gone on for many years. In the area of parliamentary reform we see that the House of Commons will have its powers strengthened. Parliamentary committees will be much more effective. The average backbench member of parliament, if we can convince House leaders opposite, will have more of a role to play in discussing particular concerns of keen interest to constituents back home.

Also I wish to congratulate the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). One cannot help but be impressed with the positive action he has taken in the short period of time he has been the federal Minister of Transport. In my opinion one of the better appointments is the one that the federal minister made regarding the grain co-ordinator, Dr. Horner from Barrhead, Alberta. Not only was he a well-respected politician in the House, but also he was the deputy premier of the province of Alberta. He is an individual who is greatly respected across the country and an individual who can grasp our transportation difficulties.

We have received commitments from three provinces to participate in hopper car purchases so that we can increase the capacity of grain movement. Also we have a commitment from the Minister of Transport that the facilities at the Prince Rupert terminal will be developed to a greater extent. One cannot help but admire the man for giving a commitment that within six years our grain transportation system will handle an additional 50 per cent of grain.

The national government has two basic responsibilities. We have an obligation to run the federal government competently, and to lead the nation to realistic goals. We have a national responsibility to do so honestly. If we as a national government could say to Canadians that we have dealt with the issues honestly, I think we could pride ourselves in that. That is a commitment of this government. We wish to restore faith and confidence in our institutions. The Prime Minister has taken action in this direction. One cannot help but admit that when one does not know the answers, one should be willing to admit that fact. We will make mistakes, but I am hopeful we on this side will be big enough to admit to those mistakes.

The Prime Minister has introduced conflict of interest guidelines for cabinet ministers. Already we have begun to live up to a number of campaign promises, the key one being mortgage deductibility. In the very near future we will see in the House freedom of information legislation whereby the average Canadian citizen will have an opportunity to have a broader insight into the happenings of the federal government. There is a large task ahead of us to restore faith and trust in our federal institutions. The true test of any government is not how popular it is with the powerful, but how honestly it deals with the many individuals who depend upon it.

● (2130)

In the tradition I have established since becoming a member, I shall be very brief. With the tabling of the task force report on Petro-Canada, I think it is important to make a few comments. There is no doubt on either side of the House as to the need for a national oil company owned by Canadians. The dispute comes in as to whether it should have government ownership or whether it should have citizen participation. I campaigned on citizen participation in the petroleum company of Canada, and I wish to share with the House a portion of the release I issued during the election campaign. It reads as follows:

> It is important that Canadians have an opportunity to participate directly in the development of our national resources and, because of this, we have advocated that individual Canadians have an opportunity for direct ownership in the Petroleum Co. of Canada. This would be accomplished by offering only to Canadian citizens shares in the Petroleum Co. of Canada. It is advisable also that limits be placed on the number that one can own so that a large block is not purchased by a large multinational company, and that individual Canadians themselves are able to purchase them.

I was delighted to see that the task force report set limits on the amount of ownership that one could have. I believe for individuals they placed it at 1 per cent, and for companies at 2 per cent.

Mr. Fraleigh: Three per cent.

Mr. Elzinga: Three per cent. I believe that many Canadians welcome the opportunity to participate directly. As the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) pointed out to me in a conversation several days ago, "How much pride do we as individual Canadians feel for Air Canada?" If we had an opportunity to participate directly in a corporation we would feel a certain amount of pride, and we would participate in the development of that organization.

The hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) pointed out in his presentation the vast differences which exist between the members opposite and the members on this side of the House. It is great to see that we have broken now in so far as our philosophical beliefs are concerned and that the NDP party and the Liberal party are on the side on which they belong, and that we and the Social Credit party are on the other. They on that side believe that they know what is best for every Canadian, and they like to dictate what should be done for the average Canadian. We on this side believe in individual initiative, and we wish that individual initiative to foster in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: If it were allowed, Mr. Speaker, I would share with hon. members present the contempt I feel for the individuals opposite for misleading the Canadian public on the position my government is taking on Petro-Canada. I have a magazine here which states, "Write to your member of parliament to save Petro-Canada. The Tories want to sell off this oil company to other major oil companies." What a bunch of propaganda. We wish to have citizen participation, but they are putting in the minds of people the idea that we wish to get rid of it, to disband Petro-Canada, or sell it to other oil companies.

It is obvious that the government must keep control in certain sectors, as the task force has pointed out, particularly with regard to the negotiation of any necessary state-to-state oil supply contracts, the promotion or increase of frontier exploration, and the promotion of oil sands and heavy oil research and development.

I have one reservation with regard to the task force report, and that is the giving away of shares. Too often individuals when they receive something for nothing do not place the value on that something which it merits. I have no objection to a select number of shares being given away, but I believe the majority of these shares should be offered for sale on a limited basis to the Canadian public.

An hon. Member: No free lunch.

Mr. Elzinga: Right. As a member of parliament from Alberta, I feel I would be letting down my constituents if I did not make a few comments on the energy situation as it exists in Canada. I do so with a certain amount of reservation, but it is my conviction that we Albertans do believe very strongly in doing what is best for the national interest. It is obvious that Premier William Davis of Ontario is, frankly, opposed to the basic interests of Alberta. There is no doubt that a fundamental conflict exists between Alberta and Ontario on the distribution of power in Canada. There is no pleasure in recording that, but it is a bald reality.

Premier Davis would like to see the increasing value of Alberta oil come to Ottawa and to Ontario. He feels that Alberta is wealthy enough, that the shift of money to the west has gone far enough, and he wishes it stopped. However, when we review the record of what Alberta has contributed to the national welfare of this country, we find, because of the prices which we have taken for oil products in the last number of years, that we have contributed approximately $15 billion to the welfare of the nation as a whole. That is a very significant contribution.

One must face the fact that if the prices on oil products do not rise, the supply will run out. Our premier has stated this on many occasions. In other words, if we wish to have a long-term supply, we must pay the price, but if we do not wish any guarantees we can continue with a low price policy.

It is the position of the Alberta government that Ontario's position is a clear attempt to change the basic concepts and arrangements of confederation which left the ownership of natural resources to the provinces. What is even more objectionable is that their position purports to alter the ownership rights of provinces only with respect to oil and natural gas, leaving the provinces' ownership rights over other natural resources as they are now. It is obvious that we have a dilemma in Canada. Let us hope that we, as a national federal party, can draw these two conflicting views together, and I believe that we can do so.

Let me, in closing, share with hon. members the honour which I feel to have had the opportunity to be elected to this Thirty-first Parliament, and to share with you again, as I did in my maiden speech in 1974, my comments, that I will dedicate myself to serving the needs of all Canadians but, naturally, the majority of my interests will lie with that constituency which put me here in Ottawa. I thank my constituents for that opportunity to represent them in this House of Commons.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured tonight to stand before you as a new member in this House. I am very proud to be following in the tradition established by Harold Winch, who represented the great riding of Vancouver East for almost 20 years. I congratulate you, sir, on your recent appointment, and also my colleagues, particularly those who were elected for the first time.

I especially want to congratulate the nine women members who were elected to this House, and I would say to the last speaker that this does not include "the seven sisters", one of them named Esso. I am sure from my own experience that these women have worked very hard, perhaps twice as hard as our male colleagues, to be nominated and elected. As women candidates we convinced the electorate that a woman's place is in the house, House of Commons. I think, however, we still may have to convince this House.

I say this having recently completed an orientation workshop for new members, where many excellent panelists, all of them men, consistently referred to members as "he" and to spouses as "she". As a result my husband is now demanding equal access to the parliamentary women's lounge! Despite those male biases, however, I want to commend the organizers of the workshops. They were very helpful to new members. Undoubtedly under present government policy there will soon be an equal number of top women civil servants to sit on such panels the next time around.

● (2140)

Because we are celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the person case when women, were finally recognized as persons under the British North America Act, I want to raise several related questions from my impressions as a new member on the Hill.

Why, for example, Mr. Speaker, are there only male security staff, and only female servers in the parliamentary dining room? Why is there no daycare service for parents who work here? How can a woman messenger, whose take home pay is $380, support six children? Why should the staff on this Hill not be unionized and have decent rates of pay similar to civil servants?

[Mr. Elzinga.]

It seems to me that what is done on this Hill should be a model for the nation. If we are committed to equal rights for all Canadians I wonder why we are not leading the public service and public opinion by adopting an affirmative action program. Surely affirmative action and collective bargaining rights for workers are long overdue.

I want to concentrate tonight on two main topics raised in the Speech from the Throne. These topics are vitally important to the future of Canada as well as to the people of Vancouver East, my riding.

First of all, as immigration critic for the New Democratic Party I will speak to the need for a more just and fair immigration policy that will protect the rights of Canadians and that will provide adequate funding for settlement services for new Canadians.

Second, because I am told that a maiden speech may cover the waterfront, I will raise important issues related to the Speech from the Throne proposal to build an effective Canadian merchant marine.

We need a more just immigration policy that will protect the rights of every Canadian as well as every immigrant; that will provide realistic settlement services for new immigrants, and that will treat refugees fairly regardless of their country of origin. Every person in this House, except one, is either an immigrant or a descendant of an immigrant. The exception, of course, is the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), who has aboriginal rights. So other members had better listen to him carefully when he speaks on self-determination.

Our history shows that Canada has grown and flourished after every major wave of newcomers. I am told that every immigrant creates 1.5 jobs. Immigrants work hard, repay many costs, bring skills, have strong family ties, and contribute richness to our culture.

I have lived for 20 years in a neighbourhood in Vancouver East that has over 18 nationalities on our two short streets. People work hard to purchase and improve their homes, to educate their children, and to improve their neighbourhoods. There is mutual respect between new and old Canadians because people know and help each other.

Why is it then, that the question of immigration and particularly of refugees, is the most emotionally charged topic on every hot line show across this country?

During times of high unemployment and economic insecurity, prejudice flares. People fear their jobs will be threatened by newcomers who may work for lower wages and longer hours. Labour feels that unions will be undermined and workers exploited. What does government do? Instead of creating more union jobs for unemployed Canadians and refugees, instead of at least maintaining Canada Works jobs to help provide services for newcomers, the present government has cut Canada Works funds at the worst possible time. In Vancouver East funds were cut from $1.2 million to $35,000—from over 150 to a mere three jobs. Mr. Speaker, Vancouver East is an area that has over 18 per cent unemployment. It is also the community that is hosting the majority of the boat people in British Columbia. So the poor pay again for the humanitarian gestures of the rest of us.

Many citizens, born in Canada, cannot afford decent housing and will never own a home—although they will pay taxes to subsidize mortgage tax credits for wealthy home owners. In downtown Vancouver over 2,000 poor people are on waiting lists for social housing, many of them single people and pensioners, living in cockroach infested rooms. I am sorry to say that they wait in vain because this government has no plans to build social housing. Why should they be joyful when over 600 Vietnamese refugees move into their over-crowded neighbourhood and others are offered CMHC houses at subsidized rates? We know that it is not the refugees' fault that our government has failed Canadians.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it is the immigrant and the refugee who become scapegoats, not the government. Legitimate fears grow because our government will not provide for the basic rights of Canadians to jobs, housing, and services. Prejudice based on ignorance is soon inflamed by racists. Mr. Speaker, I urge Canadians, and through you, I urge every member in this House to press the conscience of our new government to provide an antidote to this backlash. We must develop jobs and affordable housing for all Canadians—including refugees. Social housing is essential and will stimulate our economy. Tenants, too, have rights. I believe also that shareholders living in co-operative housing developments are deprived of the new Tory Bonanza. Tory privatization of CMHC provides no social benefits—except profits for the privateers.

I want to stress two other points relating to immigration policy. I am sorry that the hon. minister is not here tonight. Mr. Speaker, our party favours a sensible immigration policy. If we open our doors to new Canadians we must have adequate financing for settlement services. It makes no sense at all to bring hundreds of refugees into a community and expect agencies to provide extra services without adequate government funding.

In Vancouver we have a multilingual service called "Mosaic" which is the major service agency for non-English speaking people in Vancouver. This association may be forced to close down because of the ridiculous "fee for service" method of financing of the federal government. In case our colleagues across the floor have not heard of this fee for service, it was introduced by the Liberals and is being carried out by the Conservatives. It provides for no overhead costs and requires unnecessary and costly bureaucratic procedures that intimidate many people. For example, if a non-English speaking person went to Mosaic to ask the way to the post office, he would have to fill out a form saying where he came from, what he does, when he came to Canada, his telephone number, his age, and might also be required to produce documents to prove all this. The worker would then have to fill out documents in order to get paid for the service. This is ridiculous. This method of funding also does not cover the cost of service for people who do not speak English but who have been in the country for over three years. This means, of course, that many women are excluded since they have been at home raising small children and have had little opportunity to learn English.

Just as our Immigration Act discriminates against women by treating them as spouses with few rights of their own, so our federal settlement services ignore the needs of women. Immigrant women at home with small children take longer to learn English and often lead very isolated lives. They can benefit immensely from orientation programs, from ethnic home-school workers, and from training for future employment provided that babysitting is available.

The fee for service method of funding must go. Essential settlement services must be subsidized by the federal government on a regular grant system that is based on need, not on bureaucratic discrimination.

We in the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker, supported and prodded the government to open our doors to boat people out of common humanity and because we could not leave the burden of so many refugees to Southeast Asian countries of first asylum. But, how can the government justify the double standard that exists in our immigration policy, especially as it applies to refugees? How can Canada accept General Dang Van Quang as a permanent resident with his nefarious Vietnamese war record, while at the same time we refuse asylum to Galindo Madrid, a young political refugee who has proven that he is a responsible worker in Canada and whose life will be in danger if he is deported to Chile? Yet the decision of this government is to deport him. We also have heard this week, of the plight of six Polish refugees in Newfoundland who are being refused asylum by the Canadian government. How can we spend $117 million for boat people—and we agree with this—while we ignore the economic needs of refugees in Nicaragua, and the urgent need for economic aid in Kampochea? What we need is a more just, objective refugee policy based on United Nations' standards, with adequate procedures for appeal.

Many other reforms to the Immigration Act are needed. I hope the new Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) will eliminate discrimination as well as including the multicultural fact of Canada, in revisions that are planned. I want to assure the minister that we will work energetically to press for reforms and revisions to the act which are essential.

Before speaking about the need for a Canadian merchant marine, I must mention again that last Monday a major accident occurred in Vancouver East when the Second Narrows CNR Bridge across Burrard Inlet was damaged by a Japanese freighter. As a result, there has been a serious delay in shipping grain, coal, sulphur, potash and forest products. I urge all possible government action to repair this major transportation artery quickly so that ships can once again reach bulk terminals at the eastern end of Vancouver.

I must also call attention to a precedent taking place in the Canadian Arctic. Hon. members may not be aware of this situation but it is of considerable concern to maritime unions and is a situation apparently condoned by this government. I refer to the issuance of work visas to foreign nationals. These foreign nationals make up the crew on the dredge "Aquarius" under charter to Dome Petroleum. This is a Dutch ship sailing in the western Arctic. While there may not be many unemployed seamen in Edmonton where these visas were issued, I know there are many in Vancouver who deserve these jobs. I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration, through you, Mr. Speaker, to rescind these visas in favour of Canadians.

I want to speak now of maritime issues and the need for a Canadian merchant marine. The port of Vancouver stretches from the northern border of the Vancouver East riding framed by towering coastal mountains, which incidentally are covered by daffodils all year round! From this beautiful port ships from around the world carry our raw materials to other countries to be manufactured, and they are then sold back to us. These ships are registered under foreign flags and are manned by foreign crews and pay no harbour dues to Canada.

There are many residents of Vancouver East who work on the waterfront as longshoremen, in fishing plants, in ship repairs and related businesses. However, since waterfront industries lack stability, their jobs are sporadic and seasonal, and we all know what they are likely to get in the way of unemployment insurance with the new cutbacks for seasonal workers. Our shipyards in Vancouver East live from day to day. Employment fluctuates from about 200 to 1,500 workers, depending on available contracts for small coastal vessels. Skilled seamen who used to sail on Canadian ships and shipbuilders who worked in busy war time shipyards are retiring, and with them their skills are disappearing. Our unemployed young people are not learning these trades. If Canada had a merchant fleet there would be a steady flow of work and regular apprentice training for these Canadians. Unemployment rates would be reduced to an all time low, not only in Vancouver East but also in the maritimes.

Canada is a maritime nation bounded on three sides by the largest coastline in the world. Until the Second World War, Canada was a leading nation in the shipbuilding industry. We had a merchant marine of which we were proud. Now Switzerland and Luxembourg have bigger fleets than we have. The Liberal government deliberately destroyed this heritage after World War II. Merchant ships were sold off, and skilled seamen and shipbuilders were put out of work. In their place foreign ships were allowed to exploit our trade thereby building up huge trade deficits.

The importance of shipping Canadian cargo in Canadian ships cannot be overstated. For example, in 1977 we paid $2.5 billion in freight charges to foreign shipping countries. If Canada had had a merchant marine this money would have gone to Canadians. In effect it would have wiped out half our trade deficit for that year.

Now, as a bedtime story, I must move on to the tale of that great Canadian pioneering industry, namely, the Canadian Pacific Railway. The CPR boasts about its Canadianism as it reaps profits with vast donations from the public treasuries, and it has done since 1880. The shipping record of Canadian Pacific Bermuda Ltd.—and I emphasize Bermuda—is a national disgrace. Yes, they have a modern deep sea fleet of over 30 merchant ships, but they are registered in Bermuda. Not one of these CPR ships is registered in Canada, built in a Canadian shipyard, or manned by Canadian seamen.

In 1978 the Liberal government gave CPR subsidies of over $100 million, with many more millions in tax deferrals and other corporate welfare gimmicks, to assist in this treachery against Canada. If this is what the new Conservative government calls privatization, God preserve our country from the privateers, and from the Tories too.

I hope, and the people of Canada hope, that we are entering a new era. We expect this government to act on the Darling reports and on the four or more subsequent reports that Otto Lang ignored. The time is right for major stimulation to our maritime industries in the east, in the west, and in the north where the promise of offshore resources is a challenge to us to develop new technologies for the Arctic. We welcome the throne speech that promises an effective merchant marine and we will watch closely for further details.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer this government to a plan of action that was strongly endorsed by both labour and management during recent months. This practical plan was proposed by none other than our own outstanding leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent): (1) repatriate existing Canadian owned fleets; (2) require that Canadian bottoms carry Canadian goods in Canadian waters; (3) stimulate shipbuilding with loans and grants carefully planned; (4) guarantee that future shipping of petroleum and mineral products from Arctic sources is owned, developed, built and manned by Canadians; (5) adopt the UN shipping convention rule which guarantees that at least 40 per cent of Canadian goods will be carried on Canadian ships; (6) instigate training programs for a whole new generation of maritime workers.

• (2200)

I look forward eagerly to this session in which I hope we will be able to solve some of these problems. I know the people of Vancouver East share my concerns.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—OPPORTUNITY TO SELL CANADAIR TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first question on an adjournment motion, I take this opportunity to extend my congratulations on your re-election as Chairman of Committee of the Whole and to express my best wishes for a prolonged life both in the chair and as hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry. During the question period yesterday, I stated to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) my concerns with the program of privatizing Crown corporations. Apparently the profitable corporations will have priority in the sales process, over the unprofitable ones, which will remain at the taxpayers' expense. Regretfully, I am referring for instance to Petro-Canada, which will go back to the private sector while the non-profitable part, research, development and risk ventures, will remain with the government. In the case of Canadair, a profitable corporation, there is also talk of liquidating and proceeding before the end of November. Mr. Speaker, what are we going to do with de Havilland in Toronto, which is still unprofitable? Are we to proceed in parallel, the profitable plant being sold while the unprofitable one will be kept as a Crown corporation? In its program of privatizing the Crown corporations, the government announced the sale of Canadair to the private sector without telling us how this would be done, what would be the criteria and within what framework the government intends to take that corporation away from its shareholders, depriving them of their right to share and participate in the profits or benefiting from the profitability experienced by this industry faced with a very promising future.

Mr. Speaker, Canadair was purchased in 1976 by the former administration at a cost of $38 million in order to ensure Canadian control over this important sector of the economy, to develop the aeronautic industry and, thereby, through the sale of its aircraft, to export on a worldwide scale the products of its technology. The Challenger, for instance, which has met with tremendous success actually represents an injection of over $700 million into the Canadian economy. Canadians took some risks in 1976 when Canadair was in a deficit position and on the verge of closing down. Today the purchase of Canadair represents the creation of more than 5,000 jobs in the Montreal metropolitan area out of which 95 per cent have gone to Quebeckers who, as a result, have developed an interest in aeronautics as evidenced by the 700-plus students registered in the school of aerotechnics at the Edouard Montpetit community college.

In 1976, out of an ailing enterprise, the Liberal government made a symbol of success which has become the pride of all Canadians and I would like especially to commend the executive team for its dynamism and the quality of its management as well as the plant workers who have also made significant efforts to ensure its success.

Mr. Speaker, Quebeckers are not just mere manufacturers, and if you will allow me the expression, drawers of water, because we also manufactured the CL-215 which is designed for fighting forest fires.

But Quebeckers are now manufacturing the most modern, the most efficient twin-engine jet, which has had a phenomenal success worldwide, and they want to keep that reputation and participate in that aeronautical development. Big contracts with the Department of National Defence for a new fighter plane worth some $2,500 million will surely mean major economic fallout for Canadair, and will be added to present contracts which represent for thousands of Quebeckers well-paid jobs for about 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, our leader mentioned early in the new Parliament that the opposition would be positive. I therefore suggest that the government look seriously into the possibility of creating a single aeronautics company merging Canadair of Montreal with de Havilland of Toronto, because of the importance of the relations between the government and private enterprise, especially in that specialized sector of aeronautics, considering the fact that planes are classified by the Department of Transport of Canada, their export is controlled by the Department of External Affairs, the marketing and financing by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and military needs are ensured jointly by the Departments of National Defence, Supply and Services and even of Environment Canada, which can intervene in that co-operation between private enterprise and the government.

It seems to me that formula for joint participation by the government and private interests is a far more logical solution and, especially, more acceptable to all Canadians. If they decide to go ahead with the sale of that industry the transaction should be made within the framework of general legislation on the liquidation of Crown companies.

Mr. Speaker, the case of the Arrow aircraft was the reflection of a lack of interest from the Progressive Conservatives in the field of aeronautics, and we do not want Canadians to be reminded of that sad story. Unless they can obtain from their government official safeguards which should be provided through the development of a national policy on aeronautics, it seems to me that this privatization will be useless and that Canadians will be fooled once again by the Tories.

Mr. John Bosley (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have to congratulate you on your appointment and I do so gladly.

I will proceed expeditiously to answer the question raised by the hon. member because I am sure he is anxious to hear the reply and not simply interested in making a speech. It is true, as he suggests, that Canadair Limited is one of the leading aircraft companies in the Canadian aerospace industry with integrated capabilities for design, development, production and marketing of complete aircraft, battlefield surveillance systems, and for specialized fabrication of major airframe assemblies for other prime aircraft manufacturers. The largest and most significant current project is the CL-600 Challenger corporate jet aircraft which offers a long-term potential for sales well in excess of $1.6 billion. Contracted sales involving non-refundable deposits now number 120. Nothing said by this government at any time has ever been intended as any suggestion that we wish to jeopardize the future of that aircraft or that company.

As the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) has already indicated, what we have under active consideration is the feasibility of returning ownership of Canadair to the private sector. A special task force to deal specifically with both the framework to which the hon. member refers and, in this case, the specific privatization procedure for this company, has been established to study and to make recommendations on the process of privatization and on privatization guidelines. I would be more than happy to refer the hon. member's suggestions to that task force.

As I finish perhaps it should be clear that the reason this company was purchased was to make sure, as the hon. member suggests, that the company would remain in Canadian hands and that the people who work for it would continue to have their jobs. It was clearly understood at the time that government ownership was seen as temporary, until the company could be returned to private sector ownership as a successful, ongoing entity with sound, long-term prospects in its business and market area. The timing and character of a sale to the private sector can be expected not to prejudice the encouraging commercial performance of Canadair which has been built up during the period of government ownership. Moreover, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) indicated to this House, the retention of major facilities in Quebec will be an important consideration.

Finally, I think we on this side of the House clearly reject the suggestion that merely because something has been government-owned, it ought automatically to continue to be government-owned. This is fundamental to the success of the companies themselves in the long run.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING DISPOSAL AND TRANSPORTATION OF CHEMICAL WASTES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Bird's Hill): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser) for taking the time to show up tonight to respond to the elaboration of my question.

If hon. members recall, the question I asked last Friday had to do with the disposal and transport of dangerous chemical wastes. Being a rookie I made the mistake of ending my question with a specific question to which the minister replied—and I was glad he replied as he did—"Yes, and soon;" that the government would proceed with the passage of the transport of dangerous goods legislation.

[Mr. Bosley.]

However, my question was prefaced with a more general question as to what the general intentions of the government were with regard to the transport and disposal of dangerous chemical wastes. I refer to the general problem of the growing number of dangerous products in Canada, a problem which we have not had to face up to until recently because, until recently, the United States was willing to take all of our chemical wastes and dispose of them for us.

However, the United States will be a garbage can for Canada for only so long, and its authorities have indicated that there is a limit to the time that they will receive these wastes from us, so we are faced with the prospect of having to build disposal plants on our side of the border.

I was first made aware of this problem when I was on a tour with the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) regarding health care. We happened into Fort Saskatchewan, north of Edmonton, where one of these plants is being suggested.

With regard to this general problem and with regard to the philosophical commitment of the government, I would like to ask the minister whether the government intends, as a policy, to allow the disposal of chemical wastes to be handled by the private sector or the public sector. One of the things a citizens' group in Fort Saskatchewan was concerned about was that the disposal of chemical wastes would be left to the private sector and that there were no incentives, once the chemical wastes were in the hands of a private company given this responsibility, to dispose of the chemical wastes in a safe and responsible way. Certain abuses have already been brought to our attention. These abuses have been by companies which have offered to dispose of waste, and then leaked these dangerous wastes on highways from leaking trucks, and carried out various other atrocities.

So, I would like to ask the minister what the general intention and policy of the government is with regard to this problem. I know the minister takes the problem seriously. I do not see this question as an attempt to embarrass the government, but I think it important that we know now just what the intention of the government is. Is this problem to be handled through public enterprise or through private enterprise? I myself feel that the latter alternative is a dangerous one.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since this matter falls primarily within the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport, I am taking the liberty of responding to the hon. member's concerns.

● (2215)

First, let me remind the hon. member that a bill to regulate the transportation of regulated goods is in fact included in the list of some of the measures the government proposes to place before Parliament during this first session of the Thirty-first Parliament and which the President of Privy Council (Mr. Baker) tabled in the House, Thursday, October 11. In case the hon. member missed this tabling of bills, this list is appended to Hansard at pages 116 and 117 of that date.

Regulations covering the packaging, handling and transportation of dangerous goods have been promulgated by a variety of federal, provincial and municipal authorities since the early part of this century. The resulting mass of often conflicting regulations, penalties, and enforcement provisions had led to confusion on the part of the distributors, carriers and manufacturers of these products and their containers. Indeed, in order to meet the needs of commerce, they have sometimes had either to ignore the rules or disguise the characteristics of the products. Attempts to enforce these conflicting standards would be exceedingly difficult and complicated, and would constitute a severe barrier to trade.

And so, Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill to regulate the transportation of dangerous goods is to ensure safety in transport while facilitating trade by providing for the promulgation and enforcement of a uniform set of regulations governing the handling and transportation of dangerous goods, and establishing a joint safety program with the provinces which will ensure that compatible standards are applied across the country.

In short, the act will be designed to ensure the complete integrity of hazardous shipments, be they commodities or wastes in and across Canada.

To respond to the specific concern of the hon. member over rail traffic through Winnipeg-Birds Hill, I can assure him that federal inspectors will enforce the provisions of the proposed transportation of dangerous goods act.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—PROTECTION AGAINST OIL SPILLS IN WEST COAST WATERS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to speak to a full House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: My topic tonight is the transportation of Alaskan oil. It arises from a question I asked in the House on October 11 of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser). The question was as follows:

> What does the minister propose to do to ensure that the routing of Alaskan oil will be done in the best interests of Canada and will not endanger the west coast?

My main point tonight is that the policy followed by the present Conservative government, and indeed by the previous Liberal administration, is a disaster for British Columbia and Canada, in my opinion. What really irks me is that we are on an American timetable in this issue. Surely the minister must realize that. It is like an old movie. We did the same thing with the gas pipeline. I have spent three years of my life on the regulatory procedure for that pipeline and we speeded up the regulation to meet the American timetable. What happened? We finished our regulatory procedures but we are still waiting for the Americans to get their act together. It seems to me that now we are doing it again, we are again trying to meet the American timetable.

I should like to give members in the House some brief facts on this matter so that it becomes a little more clear. The problem is to get Alaskan oil to the midwestern United States. There have been five proposals: first, a tanker route to Kitimat. That seems to be gone now. Second, a tanker route to Skagway. That seems to be gone. Third, a tanker route to Port Angeles, Washington, thence to Edmonton and thence to the American mid-west. That seems to be still there. It is the Trans Mountain proposal. Fourth, a tanker route to Low Point in Washington, near Port Angeles, and again by pipeline to the American mid-west. It is the "all-American"route. Fifth, an overland line, the Foothills line. Yesterday we heard that apparently Foothills has withdrawn its application or at least put it on the back burner. Now we are faced with an oil port on the west coast and a tanker route.

● (2220)

Ask any student in the city of Vancouver or in any one of the members' constituencies. They know about oil spills, about Chedabucto Bay, the Torrey Canyon incident and the present spill in Mexico. They know, and our scientists know, that there will be a spill if there is an oil port on the west coast. I know the minister shares with me the terrible thought of seeing British Columbia beaches covered with oil.

There is another reason why we worry about a spill. It is not just the love of the sea. The fact is that we have an incredible Fraser River salmon industry. It is a resource, as a food resource, that is comparable to the wheat capacity of the prairies. It is a permanent renewable resource. If we have a spill, it is gone.

Another matter which concerns me—and I will be frank about this—is that the government looks like a fool. My Canadian government, our government, looks like a fool. It seems to support the Foothills application. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) practically said so in the House the other day. It is counting on that, and then suddenly Foothills withdraws. Where is the policy? There is no policy. I hope the minister will rise after me and tell the House the policy. I do not like to see our government look like a fool. If that is an example of private planning, then God help us after we return everything to the private sector. We must plan for this. We cannot just let Foothills carry the ball. We cannot put everything on Foothills, and then suddenly they withdraw and leave the government with egg on its face. Where do we go from here? What is something positive that we can do?

Apparently the minister has accepted as a fait accompli the fact of a west coast oil port, and the Liberal member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Phillips) appears to have accepted that. I do not accept that for one minute, and neither do my colleagues in the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I suggested to the Prime Minister in a supplementary question that he should get together with the American president on November 9 and 10 and put this item on the agenda. The Prime Minister was kind enough to accept that suggestion. It seems to me the government should go further. It should adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), given in the House today, to send a strong note to the American government telling it what our policy is and that we do not want that tanker route. Also the Prime Minister and the government can use its leverage with the Americans. They can say that it is our policy that the user must take the risk. This is American oil going to Americans. Why should we take the risk? The user should take the risk. The government should say that to the President of the United States.

Also the government should say to the President of the United States, "You must extend the timetable". We can work together as countries to solve this problem. We can do it rationally. We do not have to follow the American timetable. We will have a lot of future dealings with the Americans, especially in gas exports, so we have some clout in dealing with them. I should like to hear the minister on this. The government should have a policy on this, not just follow Foothills and fall over flat when Foothills withdraws. I have suggested there are positive steps that the government should take. My time is running out.

Mr. Kempling: It sure is.

Mr. Waddell: I say to the hon. member: I hope time is not running out for the west coast of Canada and for our relationship with the United States.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising this matter during oral questions the other day and for bringing it forward in the adjournment debate tonight. The Government of Canada is opposed to increased tanker traffic on the west coast. That has been the position of this government, not just since it became a government, but through its speakers in opposition going back as far as 1970.

As the hon. member knows, I put no blame on the New Democratic Party, but I put a lot of blame on the former Liberal government which in those years refused to discuss with Americans any consideration of a land route for both gas and oil that would have avoided the tanker problem completely. It was their refusal in those years to enter into any kind of serious negotiation with the United States that put us in the dilemma we are in today. I know that my hon. friend understands that. It does not lie well in the mouth of the former prime minister to play the games he played today in question period where he suggested that the present prime minister (Mr. Clark) is somehow to blame because no action was taken when in fact he, as prime minister of the former administration, could have taken it.

This government supported Foothills, and that support was firm and indicated to the United States in an aide memoire. The fact is that we do have our regulatory processes. That aide memoire said that no final decision could be made until the National Energy Board had completed its hearings and there was another application. The reasons for Foothills' withdrawal are reasons which Foothills must explain to the country and to those who supported the company.

The dilemma we now face is exactly the dilemma put by the hon. member, and that is, first of all, is there any way in which we can persuade the government of the United States to look very closely at the remaining options, and is there any way, if necessary, that we can persuade that government, which will have to change its legislation, to extend the time. The Prime Minister has said that he will be discussing this matter not only with myself but with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn), and that he will be communicating our concerns to the government of the United States.

I thank the hon. member for his expressions of concern, and they will be passed on to the government of the United States. We are in a very difficult position, and I emphasize that the final decision does not rest with the Government of Canada.

I do want to point out the fact that when the U.S. Secretary of the Interior said that he is prepared to recommend to the President of the United States that the northern tier route be accepted, he also went on to say that he would allow a year for the northern tier route to work out its finances and that in the event they could not do so—that seems to indicate perhaps some doubt in the secretary's mind—then he would look at other options.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PRICE OF OIL AND GAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the government seems to plan an incredible increase of more than 30 per cent in the price of oil, and whereas such a step would mean an increase of at least 30 cents to 45 cents per gallon of gas and 20 cents to 30 cents per gallon of heating oil, and whereas such an increase would mean an additional cost of at least $140 per year per car driver, and at least $160 per year per household, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde):

That this House directs the government not to make any change to the present arrangements that provide for an increase of only three cents to four cents per gallon of gas between now and June 30, 1980.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY CONCERNING UNJUST DISMISSALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House.

Considering that in recent months thousands of civil servants with 15 to 25 years of seniority in the civil service were fired with no other explanation than the fact that their numbers had to be reduced, and considering that recent medical reports have since raised the spectre of infarct, coronary thrombosis, alcoholism and depression apparently settling in at an alarming rate because these unjust and inhuman methods have been resorted to, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre):

That this House condem the use of such methods and that an order be given for an inquiry to be instituted in the matter of firings in the civil service which, to all practical purposes, are now discriminatory and contrary to the most elementary justice.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

REQUEST THAT IJC STUDY HARMFUL EFFECTS OF RADIATION LEAKAGES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Because a 1,280 megawatt boiling water nuclear power installation is proposed for Sedro Woolley, Washington, a site contiguous to the Canada-U.S. border, and should construction proceed any future accident would threaten the lives of almost one million people in B.C.'s lower mainland, I move, seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That (1) Canada issue to the United States an aide memoire calling for a moratorium on the Sedro Woolley plant with a view to its relocation away from Canadian population centres;

(2) that during President Carter's visit here our Prime Minister discuss the concern of many Canadians over nuclear installations and the lethal effects of radiation leakage, and depending on the outcome of discussions between the two leaders, Canada consider initiating a reference to the International Joint Commission for study and recommendations.

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that there is increasing uncertainty over the American government's intentions in relation to the Garrison irrigation project in North Dakota, in view of the fact that any form of biological linkage between the Garrison water systems and Manitoba would result in substantial environmental damage and seriously harm the fishing industry in Manitoba, and in view of the impending visit of President Carter to Canada on November 9, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael):

That the matter of the Garrison irrigation project be placed on the agenda for discussion as a priority issue and that the Canadian government convey to the President that there should be no form of linkage between the Garrison and Manitoba water systems.

Considering the unusual procedure confirmed yesterday by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) regarding the laying of charges under the combines act, where the Prime Minister approved a practice whereby the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs discussed the laying of charges with the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), which was never the practice in the past, and considering that under section 15 of the combines act the director of investigation is to have complete independence, following an inquiry, to refer a case to the Attorney General for the purpose of laying charges, without any political influence or considerations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray):

That the Prime Minister conduct an immediate investigation into this case to determine who was present at the said meeting, what was said, and whether everything was according to law and practice, and that until the Prime Minister reports to the House on this important matter, he suspend the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs from his functions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NORTHERN PIPELINES

WITHDRAWAL OF FOOTHILLS' APPLICATION—CANADA-U.S. DISCUSSIONS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the question of the Foothills' pipeline project and its decision to withdraw its application from the National Energy Board.

Yesterday, at the end of the question period, the Prime Minister kindly informed us of the date of the aide memoire, which was September 28. He said he would get further information on what other démarches had been made previous to that date. Could he answer the question now and, in particular, could he tell us whether any significant action was taken either by himself or by his ministers to push that Foothills' project, which not only means fewer tankers up the west coast but more jobs for Ipsco in Saskatchewan and steelworkers in Hamilton. Did he, personally, raise this matter with the President, perhaps in Tokyo, or speaking on the phone on some other occasion?

● (1415)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not, personally, raise this matter with the President in Tokyo. That was not one of the matters on which the former prime minister briefed me, suggesting I should raise the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —but ministers of this government have been in touch with Foothills and in touch with United States officials throughout the summer to make clear the preference of the Canadian government for the Foothills route and to make very clear our concern about the environmental impact of tanker traffic off the west coast.

We knew there was a deadline of October 2 for submission of an aide memoire to the United States. We submitted that aide memoire before that deadline so that there would be no question about the position taken by the Government of Canada which had been made very clear in an informal way on several occasions during the summer.

Mr. Trudeau: The Prime Minister is, perhaps jokingly, suggesting that I should have briefed him before the Tokyo meeting on such bilaterals. If he needs that kind of help, I am at his disposal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The President of the United States will be coming here in early November, and I would be happy to tell the Prime Minister which important matters of interest to Canada he should raise.

I come back to his suggestion that during the summer there were some contacts with ministers—I am not interested in officials. The reason I did not brief the Prime Minister on that aspect was because we had, last March—last April—informed the United States government that Foothills was our preference. This information was given to the United States government within weeks after the U.S. had asked us for our preference. I am interested in knowing whether this government, through its ministers, informed the United States. The Prime Minister did not do so. Did the Secretary of State tell Mr. Vance? Did the Minister of Energy inform Mr. Andrus and, if so, at what date?

Mr. Clark: There were several meetings with Foothills involving ministers—

An hon. Member: That's not the question.

Mr. Clark: I understand that. I understand what the former prime minister is asking. The situation is this: the position of the Government of Canada was made clear by the former government in March of this year—

Mr. Trudeau: April.

Mr. Clark: In April, was it? I gave him more credit. Whatever the date, the former government made Canada's position clear. That position did not change. In informal meetings involving the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of the Environment, with Foothills—in a formal meeting, involving officials, between the Government of Canada and the government of the United States on October 6 again it was reaffirmed that the position taken by the Government of Canada in support of Foothills in March or April of this year was the position the Government of Canada continued to hold. This was reaffirmed officially again in an aide memoire delivered on September 28 of this year to meet a deadline of October 2 set by the United States.

Mr. Trudeau: I understand there were meetings with Foothills, and I am glad of that. I am asking whether there were meetings with the United States. Perhaps the Prime Minister made a mistake, but he mentioned that there were meetings of officials on October 6. Surely, if the aide memoire was delivered on September 28, the least that might happen would have been that some ministers might have talked with their opposite numbers in the United States since the government was supporting our position of last March and April.

The Prime Minister keeps referring to the fact that there has been a change of government. They know this in the United States, too. The question is: was this government pursuing this very important policy affecting Canadian jobs and Canadian environmentalists?

● (1420)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I did misstate the date. The meeting of officials was on September 6, not on October 6, and that was part of a regular consultation process of which the former prime minister is well aware.

The position of the Government of Canada was clear from the time the communication was sent by the former government. There was never any question in the minds of the ministers of the government of the United States as to the official position of the Government of Canada. This was reaffirmed officially by the Government of Canada in an aide memoire dated September 28.

LOSS TO CANADIAN ECONOMY AND THREAT TO ENVIRONMENT POSED BY TANKER ROUTE

Hon. John C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the Prime Minister, I am astounded that he would let an opportunity like this go by without a fight by the Canadian government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The Prime Minister has referred to meeting over the summer with Foothills. He has referred to meetings over the summer and in September with the Americans. Who initiated these meetings? With whom, and when, did these meetings take place? That is what we would like to know. When did these meetings take place? Did the Prime Minister and his ministers talk about jobs lost to Canadians, contracts lost to our industries, and the environmental threats off coast?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Did the Prime Minister talk about that, if the Foothills contract was lost to Canadians? That is what we would like to know.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I assume that the purpose of this questioning is to try to indicate that there was some doubt in the minds of United States' officials as to the position of the Government of Canada relative to a preference for the Foothills route. There was no doubt at all. There was a meeting of officials on September 6 as part of a regular series of meetings. There were a number of meetings between ministers of this government and officials of Foothills through the summer affirming that the position of support for Foothills enunciated by the former government was the position which was maintained by this government.

I can inquire as to whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs raised the matter in bilateral ways with the United States, but the point is that there never was any doubt about support for the Foothills route and about concern about tanker traffic down the west coast.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, that may be some minor consolation, but we on this side are not interested in how the government wasted time all during the summer on a project of this importance.

The Prime Minister did not answer my question. What we want to know is what government ministers did all during the course of the summer, to ensure that Canada got this contract and had the approval of Foothills, which would ensure jobs for Canadians. In that connection, I wonder if the Prime Minister has received a telegram from local 1005 of the United Steel Workers, the largest local of steel workers in Canada, berating this government for its incompetence in not pursuing this adequately to protect the jobs of Canadians.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will come directly to the question. I will inquire as to whether a telegram was received and I will advise the former minister of my response to that telegram.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): And the answers to the other questions.

FINANCE

PLANNED INCREASE IN PRICE OF ENERGY—EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given the most recent reports of a planned energy price increase of $4 a barrel for next year and also the raising of the excise tax on gasoline to 37 cents a gallon, I wonder if the minister can inform the House by tabling what projections he and his department have made of the negative effects of this price increase in terms of unemployment, inflation and the gross national product? Predictions over the short term for the economy in the winter are very negative. Would the minister not agree that this increase would push us into a very severe recession?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking me to comment on speculation in the newspapers. There has been no decision by the government that there is going to be any increase in anything at the moment, so I ask the hon. member not to get "excised" about the whole matter.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, surely the minister and his officials have done projections on various price scenarios and the effects these would have on the economy and Canadian consumers. Would the minister be prepared to table those scenarios in the House, and also to assure the House that we will have a full parliamentary debate on the question of price increases before they are implemented?

● (1425)

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Department of Finance is doing scenarios all the time and, in fact, never has the Department of Finance given the people of Canada as much information as they have been given since June 5. That will continue in the budget and by other means before hon. members of the House. But until the budget is brought down, I will not be giving further information in that direction. In the budget there will be all kinds of information which will satisfy the hon. gentleman on studies done and on what the effects are. Everything will be put before the House.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

FOOTHILLS' PROJECT—U.S. AWARENESS OF CANADIAN PREFERENCE

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, a question supplementary to that of my leader's. I should like to ask the Prime Minister how we can assume that the U.S. government was aware of our policy when, during all the summer, his ministers and he himself have kept saying they were going to change the policy on Petro-Canada. Petro-Canada was involved in this project and the government was going to change the policy on pricing. How can the Prime Minister suggest that the representations by the former government were good enough, when the present government was changing the whole energy policy?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Right on.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members opposite are putting forth a very curious doctrine. They are suggesting that, after 16 years—too long—of government by that party, we should have spent the first five months of our mandate going around and indicating what comma we agreed with in the agreements they had brought forward, what policies we agreed with or disagreed with.

What we did during the election campaign and during the summer was to make very clear those areas where we intended to introduce reform, such as bringing the budget more toward balance, taking a new look at the operations of Petro-Canada, or bringing more control by Parliament over the operations of government agencies. In a number of those areas our policies disagree profoundly with those of our predecessors. There was no need to reaffirm, in direct meetings and in telephone conversations with representatives of the United States, our support of the Foothills' proposal, which was well known to the U.S.

I do not understand why, apart from political reasons, members of the opposition are now trying to cast doubt upon the support of the government under two political parties for the Foothills route and the opposition of the government under two political parties to tanker traffic down the west coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the Prime Minister that the comma he is talking about was worth a billion and a half bucks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the House truthfully, and not shirk the question: did he, or did he not, explain to the U.S. government, or did his ministers explain, that the fact they wanted to dump Petro-Canada, dismantle it and change the whole energy policy did not change the policy of the government with regard to the overland route for oil from Alaska?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: That question was never raised in the minds or in the mouths of the United States. There was no doubt on that question, no doubt of the support of the Government of Canada for the Foothills route.

THE ADMINISTRATION

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADORS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister sent a plenipotentiary ambassador to the Middle East. Would it not also be useful to find a plenipotentiary to go to the United States, as he found a minister to go to Argentina?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): I am not sure whether that is an application—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —indicating that the member for Ottawa-Carleton is not happy where he is, and I can understand that. I certainly do not intend to send ambassadors to make clear questions that were never in doubt.

THE ENVIRONMENT

AGREEMENT WITH U.S. ON REDUCTION OF AIR POLLUTANTS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment: it relates to the report on long-range transport of air pollutants issued on Monday by the Department of External Affairs.

The report concludes that five million metric tons of sulphur dioxide are produced in Canada every year. Contrary to news reports, can the minister assure the House that the signing of a treaty with the United States does not have to wait until 1981 after the installation of the new President and, if not, on whose judgment does the minister rely to come to the conclusion that Canada and the United States cannot sign an agreement before that date?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It would be very well received by this government and by myself personally if such an agreement could be signed much earlier than I have indicated. But I have an obligation to the House and to the public not to raise unreal expectations, given the political situation in the United States.

I have said that we would do everything that we could to have the negotiations, the control strategies and the scientific strategy completed in sufficient time. Our own people are hoping to report on that by mid-1980 so that the text and the structure of an agreement can be ready as soon as possible to be put in the hands of the new administration immediately after the election.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, in that same report there is a conclusion to the effect that the greater portion of sulphur deposition in Canada is the result of domestic emissions. What action does the minister intend to take with the provinces which, like Ontario, are reported today as being unwilling to clamp down on companies that emit pollutants causing acid rain?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, the concern of the hon. member is understandable, especially given the fact that his party was the government for many years, that this acid rain problem was well known to them and that we heard nothing about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: In answer to the hon. member's question, I repeat—

Mr. Caccia: He initiated the study.

Mr. Fraser: Hon. members opposite are obviously concerned that their own inaction is part of the reason this new administration must put in place an agreement with the United States.

I know the hon. member is sincere in asking his question. His suggestion is that we should move unilaterally against pollution emissions in Canada. My specific answer to that is the same as before, that we have chosen the route to work with the provinces, and until there is some indication that that is not going to meet with the agreement we are hoping for, that is the route we will continue.

FISHERIES

MEASURES TO PROTECT FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Since the same report states that all forms of life in aquatic ecosystems can be irrevocably affected, I ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans what step his department expects to take to protect fishery products for future generations and, in light of the same report which mentions a lower production of sea products, how the minister intends to react.

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I was getting so frustrated over here that I was about to ask myself a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Why are you in that party?

Mr. McGrath: I am glad to see there is some interest left over there in the very important fishing industry in this country.

I welcome the hon. member's question and I share his concern. I want him to know that we are working very, very closely with the Department of the Environment on this question where jurisdiction is vested. I have every confidence in the ability of my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, to look after the interests of fisheries and all Canadians.

PUBLIC SERVICE

NEGOTIATIONS WITH RADIO OPERATORS' UNION TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It relates to the fact that there have been 97 air crashes in British Columbia in the last year, 54 deaths associated with those air crashes, 33 deaths in the last seven weeks, and three in my riding just the other day.

In view of the fact that the flight service centres, the only source of assistance to general aviation for 350 miles along the coast of British Columbia, are now shut in terms of general services because the Treasury Board will not meet with the representatives, I ask the President of the Treasury Board if he would give the House today his undertaking that he will have his department resume negotiations with the radio operators' union.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

SERVICE ON WEST COAST

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I will ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence because the resources are so limited and the results tragic. In light of the fact that there are no dependable primary search and rescue resources for 350 miles along the coast of British Columbia—that is, from northern Vancouver Island to the Alaska border—could the minister tell the House what provisions he is willing to make to provide those resources, in view of the very dangerous situation which exists there?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question is directed to me. In the short term it is very difficult. We are doing what we can in the way of replacement of smaller vessels. In the long term, we have signed an agreement with the United States and France to supply $13 million in the way of a search and rescue satellite which should be of almost inestimable value in the case of accidents and near tragedies on the west coast, particularly in that long stretch of water between Alaska and the north end of Vancouver Island.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING NEWSPRINT—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S INTERVENTION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Does the minister know that several Canadian pulp and paper companies are refusing to sell to Canadian newspapers the newsprint they need?

Second, is the minister ready to refer that very serious matter to the director of investigation and research on combines and, finally, will the minister take concrete steps to help Le Journal de Montréal, a very important Quebec newspaper which must now restrict its circulation because the large pulp and paper companies refuse to sell.

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the supply of newsprint is a matter which was brought to my attention very, very recently. I am giving the matter my consideration.

The allegation respecting the specific instance of the newspaper in Quebec is a matter which has not been drawn to my attention before, and I thank the hon. member for doing so.

CALL FOR AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, last Monday the minister candidly admitted in the House that he found many serious loopholes in the Combines Investigation Act. If he was serious when he made such comments, I would ask him now why there was no reference to that legislation in the throne speech and why there was no reference to amendments to the Competition Act in Canada in the lengthy list of some 90 bills tabled by the House leader last week.

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are many matters to which the government is giving very urgent consideration that were not referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

HEALTH

ACID RAIN POLLUTION—PUBLICIZING OF HARMFUL EFFECTS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. What does the minister intend to do through his department to provide Canadians with information about the effect of acid rain on the health of Canadians?

In particular, does the minister propose to address the matter of drinking water in rural areas where the quality of water is not controlled by the municipalities?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the matter of acid rain has so far been considered primarily an environmental one. However, I would like to advise the hon. member and other members of the House that my department, particularly the environmental sciences section, has been in contact with the Department of the Environment in respect of this monitoring work that it is doing.

● (1440)

In addition, there is a very excellent study going on now, in New York, by the United States government in respect of which my ministry has indicated an interest in monitoring, and we are doing that as well. This is a concern as it moves from an environmental matter to a health matter, but we find ourselves in good shape in terms of the information and data that is available in North America.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, would the minister care to comment on the second part of my question which related to the matter of drinking water in rural areas where the quality is not controlled by the municipality?

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, that is a matter I have not yet looked into and I am glad the hon. member has raised it. It is a matter that should be of concern to us and I will look into it and report to her.

TRANSPORT

ABANDONMENT OF RAILWAY BRANCH LINES—CRITERIA OF GOVERNMENT IN MAKING DECISION

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport and is in regard to branch line abandonments in western Canada. What criteria is the hon. minister using to decide whether or not a branch line will be retained or abandoned?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the criteria being used are those that were enunciated during the election campaign; that is, where elevator companies are prepared to provide adequate existing services or improve their services along branch lines, we will be prepared to ensure that transportation services are available.

This review is currently under way and I would hope to have a report within the next 30 days in order that these branch lines can be adjudicated on and determined in respect of whether they will be transferred to the basic network or become eligible for abandonment, consistent with our policy.

FISHERIES

COD QUOTAS IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who, on August 27, authorized a supplement of 10,000 metric tons to the cod quotas in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and at the same time authorized the entry of ships of 100 feet and over into the gulf, which was prohibited by the former government in 1975. Can the minister tell the House whether to date the 6,000 metric tons of catches authorized for ships over 100 feet long were met and whether he consulted with the provinces before making such a decision?

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, that decision was taken after scientific advice had come to us that we could take an additional 13,000 metric tons in the Gulf. On the basis of that advice, consultations were held with the Atlantic Groundfish Advisory Committee. There was consultation, and on the basis of that consultation it was agreed that 4,000 metric tons would be assigned the Gulf-based vessels, which left an additional 9,000 metric tons. We decided that on the basis of that new TAC, we would assign 6,000 metric tons to the 100-footers, or the offshore fleet which had fished in the Gulf prior to 1976.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAD CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary. If the minister is saying that there was consultation with the committees, I should like to know whether there was consultation with the provincial governments, in particular with the province of Quebec and, if so, whether he is prepared to table in the House all the correspondence in favour or against the decision made by the minister on August 27?

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, there was consultation with the five Atlantic provinces, including Quebec, which are represented on the Atlantic Groundfish Advisory Committee. They did meet in St. John's, Newfoundland, in mid-July. There was consultation at that time and there was consultation with the deputy ministers.

In line with the open policy of this government, we would be prepared to make all correspondence available provided, of course, that the provinces agree.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS UNDER COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—ROLE OF MINISTERS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Prime Minister approved a practice whereby the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs discussed the laying of charges under the Combines Investigation Act with the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Transport—specifically in the recent case of the Western Transportation Association—which to my knowledge was never the practice in the past, especially when I was the minister, when the hon. member for Windsor West was minister, and when the hon. member for Papineau was minister.

Would the Prime Minister explain how he can justify such a practice when the director of investigation under section 15 of the Combines Investigation Act is to have complete independence in referring cases to an attorney general for the purpose of laying charges, without any political influence or consideration? In the circumstance, would the Prime Minister tell the House if the director or his alternate were present at this meeting, and what was his recommendation in this case?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the latter part of the question, I will have to check to see if the director was present and to see if it is appropriate for us to make known his recommendation on a matter that is still ongoing. The former minister will understand the difficulty that might be involved in revealing the recommendation of an official on a matter that is still ongoing. I think the former minister would not want to suggest that consultation with colleagues necessarily equates with political influence; at least it does not in this government, whatever was the former practice.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the Prime Minister is that that sort of consultation never took place when I was the minister, when the hon. member for Windsor West or when the hon. member for Papineau was the minister. In circumstances in which the director is supposed to have complete independence in referring cases for the laying of charges, this appears to me to be a very serious matter, and I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would suspend the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs from his functions while he fully investigates this case to determine whether the law and the practice were, in fact, followed in this case.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of suspending a minister. I certainly will look into the question as to whether all of the legalities were honoured, as I am reasonably sure they were.

Mr. Allmand: And the practices?

Mr. Clark: Yes, and the practices that are appropriate; and I will report to the House.

DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION GATHERED ON POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a supplementary question. It is evident from his reply in this House at yesterday's sitting that he did not understand either the circumstances that led to the question on Friday and yesterday, or he did not understand the very sensitive role of the Attorney General, to be seen not to be influenced by political considerations at the time he is considering prosecutions under the Combines Investigation Act.

While the right hon. gentleman is investigating the matter, which I suggest he ought to have done on Friday and again yesterday, will he determine when the information that has been collected by the director of prosecutions was, indeed, turned over to the Attorney General for his consideration under section 15 of the Combines Investigation Act?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly be quite prepared to determine that information and, if it is appropriate, to publish that information and advise the hon. member.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

RIGHT OF WOMEN WORKING PART-TIME TO BENEFITS—STATUS OF FEMALE IMMIGRANTS

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that the Conservatives promised during the election campaign to rescind regulations that restrict unemployment insurance benefits for part-time and seasonal workers, most of whom are women, and in view of the fact that today at a meeting of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women the minister betrayed this promise of action in favour of the usual study, will he please tell the House why further study is needed, and when can the women of Canada who have worked on part-time or seasonal jobs collect their rightful unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to a colleague of the hon. member a week ago, the whole subject of unemployment insurance is under review by this government. That review is comprehensive. It will not be done quickly and decisions will not be taken precipitously.

I can assure the hon. member, as I assured the Advisory Council on the Status of Women this morning—and they were happy, I might add—that the subject of part-time workers and the 20-hour per week regulation imposed by the previous government is very much a part of the current review. I am, quite frankly, looking for alternative suggestions to that rule. I would make the offer to the hon. member, as well as to any member of this House, if they have any better suggestions I really would like to hear them, because this is a most difficult subject.

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that the minister has acknowledged that immigrant women experience a double disadvantage in the labour force, and because it takes longer than three years for immigrant women with young children to learn English and compete in the job market, what does the minister plan to do to extend funding for orientation, training and child care programs for immigrant women beyond the present three-year limit on residency?

● (1450)

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the hon. member was able to obtain a copy of my speaking notes from this morning. I only regret she was not in attendance.

I can tell her that, unlike the previous government, the immigrant aid settlement program will be extended where the first priorities of a settlement contract have been met—that is, for immigrants who have been in the country for less than 36 months. Where there are funds that are not spent, they are available for any immigrant settlement group to spend for immigrants in the community, including immigrant women, beyond that 36-month period. My officials have been instructed to draw the contracts accordingly.

OFFICIAL REPORT

COST OF SUBSCRIPTION TO "HANSARD"

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services.

In view of the previous government's decision to increase the subscription price to Hansard from $3 to $65, and in view of representations made to myself as well as to other members by those who, until now, had to abide by the action taken, but who can no longer afford such an unreasonable increase, can the minister tell the House what he proposes to do to make this service available, at reasonable cost, to those who want to avail themselves of it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I can sense that members opposite are frustrated up to their eyeballs.

Mr. Speaker, soon after I was sworn in as minister, I realized that this $3 to $65 increase was unacceptable. I, of course, received, as the hon. member himself noted, recommendations to make the price of Hansard more reasonable, because it is important, in our view, to make as much information as possible available to the public. I will, therefore, make an announcement at three o'clock today that the cabinet, upon my request, has decided that the price of Hansard, which the government had set at $65, should be reduced to $25 for private citizens and teaching institutions and remain at $65 for governments and companies.

FISHERIES

QUOTAS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I wish him well in his important responsibilities.

I know that his government has made a fetish of consultation with the provinces, even in areas where the provinces have little or no jurisdiction. Certainly this is the case in the allocation of quotas between types of fishing fleets.

May I ask the minister if he would inform his colleague from New Brunswick who immediately complained that he had not been consulted. I suspect that those who were consulted and agreed were from provinces where large fleets have dominated inshore fisheries policies for years. Has the minister considered that a lot of small fishermen belonging to fragmented organizations do not sit on the Atlantic Groundfish Advisory Committee, and in fact that he as minister should make sure that their interest is served, and not only the interest of the large fleet based outside the Gulf?

[Mr. Atkey.]

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question from the hon. member. I look forward to his distinguished contribution in the House as social critic.

I want to say to the hon. gentleman that I take second place to no one, not even the hon. member, in looking after the interests of the inshore fishermen. I say to him that consultation does not necessarily mean agreement, but there was consultation. On the basis of that consultation, we took our responsibility and made a decision.

I am sorry the hon. member does not agree with the decision taken, but it was made on the basis of updated biological data. I had no choice but to allocate those additional quotas. I was advised, after consultation with the inshore fishermen, that they could only use an additional 4,000 metric tons. After consultation with the non-Gulf fleet, they wanted the remaining 9,000 and we agreed to allocate them 6,000 metric tons because they had been fishing anyway for the same stock off Sydney Bight. That now means they will be, of course, able to fish in the Gulf in November and December at a time when there will be no inshore fishing activity in any event.

Mr. LeBlanc: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The reason, mainly, why I have to take an interest in the fisheries is my concern about some of the policies that are appearing on the horizon. This is very much one of them.

May I ask the minister if he will reconsider his decision, based on the fact that the large offshore fleet that he is allowing to return to the southern Gulf in fact has been largely served by the resources of the 200-mile limit? Will he check the amount of fish that they have taken, which they did not usually take off northern Newfoundland? Will he look at the amount of fish that they have taken in relation to the small fishermen? I am not speaking now of the 65-footers; I am speaking of the 40 and 45 and 50-foot boats which have yet to benefit from the 200-mile limit, including the southern Gulf.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the decision stands for this year. In answer to my hon. friend, I can tell him that it would have been irresponsible on my part if I did not allocate those additional quotas to the offshore fleet in order to provide some additional supplies to the underutilized plant capacity in the maritime region. That would have been irresponsible, and I suspect the hon. member would have been the first one to flag it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRORATA PENSIONS FOR CERTAIN WIDOWS—INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the very welcome announcement, both in the Speech from the Throne and in the list of bills proposed for this session which was given to the House on October 11, to the effect that there will be amendments to all of the statutes affecting veterans, may I ask the minister if one of those amendments will be a provision that will make it possible for widows of disabled veterans to be given prorata pensions in cases where they are now denied any pension because the veteran's disability was below 48 per cent?

While he is answering that question, can he tell us what other measures affecting veterans we may look for in the next little while?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the member from Winnipeg North Centre for his question. If ever the word "colleague" is used properly across the floor of the House, it must surely be between the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: As is now well known, I have made proposals to my cabinet colleagues about the various acts covering pensions and other things concerned with veterans.

With respect to the 48 per cent rule, while I have not been able to move as far as the hon. member would like or as far as I would like, I have made a start in moving in the direction we would both like. I understand that the proper format for this kind of discussion is not to give away everything that is in a bill before it is presented for first reading.

I can only say that the bill will cure several ills that are there at present and will make a move in the direction that the hon. member would like on the 48 per cent pension.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I thank the minister for his assurance that we are going to move at least some distance with respect to amendments to the Pension Act. Will he also be bringing in amendments to revise and update the War Veterans Allowance Act in view of the thorough review of that legislation that has taken place during the past number of months?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I will not be bringing in an act that will cover everything that was reviewed, but there will be a mention and there will be some amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

NATIONAL UNITY

SEPARATISTS WITHIN PUBLIC SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

Last Monday night, during his mini-stop in Hull in his pre-referendum pilgrimage, the premier of the province of Quebec invited the 18,000 federal public servants on the north side of the Ottawa River to join the public service of Quebec.

I would like to ask the minister whether he intends to ask certain "Judas Iscariot" federal public servants who have already started a propaganda campaign within the various departments to resign immediately and go to work in that illusionary paradise to which the separatist leader of Quebec has lured them in order to have their votes much more than their services.

• (1500)

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—INQUIRY WHETHER PUBLIC SERVANTS WILL BE FREE FROM LEGAL RESTRICTIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Given the Prime Minister's lack of interest in the Quebec referendum question—ranging from helplessness to indifference—can this attitude on his part be interpreted by federal civil servants as being the position of the present government, which would allow them to act as they wish either for the "yes" or "no", without the least legal restriction?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we better serve the cause of national unity when we show Quebeckers and all other Canadians that Canada now has an administration which can co-operate successfully with the provinces. This is the way we intend to encourage Quebeckers to support the federalist cause in any vote.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUBSIDY FOR SALT MINE AT ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE, QUEBEC

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Last Friday, the minister stated that he could not see any reason why his department should turn down the $10 million loan application which the Quebec government has made to develop a salt mine operation in the Magdalen Islands. Could the minister indicate to the House whether he has any objection to that now and, if not, when he is likely to make an announcement about this grant?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question which is of great concern to his constituency and to the province of Quebec.

As long as this very substantial project, which has capital costs in excess of $60 million, would not have injurious affectations on the whole Canadian salt industry, I would be very favourably disposed to assisting in whatever appropriate way we could do so. On the other hand, there are environmental and business matters which are still under consideration. I would be very pleased to acquaint the hon. member with the progress of these assessments as they proceed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—MINISTERIAL ANSWERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have a notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson).

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a serious question of privilege, of which I did give Your Honour notice earlier today.

My question arises from answers which were given to the House yesterday and last Friday by the Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence), and, in addition, it arises from an alteration of substance in today's Hansard.

On Friday last, Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister a question—I note that the minister is returning to his seat—concerning a meeting of a number of cabinet ministers about a possible criminal prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act. The minister's answer to this House at that time was as follows:

> I thank the hon. member for his good wishes, and I would inform him that the source of his information is completely and totally erroneous.

I subsequently learned, and it became clear, that this was not in fact the case. In fact the minister confirmed that the meeting did take place involving the ministers in question and on the subject of the possible prosecution mentioned. While the minister yesterday stated that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), who was present at the meeting, made no representations with respect to the timings of the possible prosecutions, I am informed that the minister did indeed express his viewpoint at the meeting with respect to the prosecution in question.

Second, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated to the House that the meeting which took place on Friday was, and I quote from his answer of yesterday:

> —one of a series of meetings that take place quite frequently in regard to various prosecutions recommended by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the Minister of Justice.

I met yesterday with the director of investigation and research in the hon. minister's department who referred the inquiry to the Attorney General for possible criminal prosecution and who, Mr. Speaker, was present at the meeting on Friday. This gentleman indicated that he did not recall during his five years' tenure as director a single similar meeting taking place discussing a possible prosecution involving himself and cabinet ministers.

I contacted his immediate predecessor. He indicated the same, that he had no recollection of a previous meeting taking place.

Today, Mr. Speaker, we had confirmation from the previous ministers involved that no such meetings had in fact taken place. This directly conflicts with the answers which were given by the minister to this House.

I should also add that I had arranged originally to speak with the gentleman in question, the director of investigation and research, and that I had confirmed a meeting with him for Monday of this week for one o'clock. That morning I was informed in this House by the minister that I was not to meet with the director of investigation and research—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): —until such time as the minister had had an opportunity to clarify the nature of meetings between members of Parliament and civil servants.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make reference to a substantial alteration in the Hansard reference to this matter.

I received the blues—which of course are green—of the answers to the questions yesterday. I checked the blues and an answer was given—at least was reported by the minister—which did not accord with my recollection of what in fact had taken place. I ordered the tape recording of the question from yesterday, and there is a fundamental and substantial alteration.

Hansard for October 16 indicates as follows:

> Indeed, I believe this was the first time the minister had been to that type of meeting.

The tape recording indicates otherwise. I quote:

> Indeed, I believe that this was the first time the minister had had that type of information with him.

There is a fundamental difference between the two versions of the events.

I wish to conclude by asking that should Your Honour find that a prima facie matter of a question of privilege has arisen on the grounds on which I have risen today, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That this matter of privilege be referred by this House to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for full investigation and report back to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, we have again today, as we had last week, a clear indication of a government that is treating the House of Commons like the group of fools that the new Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) secretly thinks the members of Parliament are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: This is a very important question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Last week we had the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) clearly having been caught in a situation where he had told some people one thing and other people another, and had not correctly informed the House of Commons.

Now we have a situation with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) who has been clearly caught by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), who is to be congratulated for bringing this kind of thing to the House early enough in the session for you, sir, to give some kind of direction as to how far this misleading can be allowed to proceed before it is clarified by the Chair.

I rise to support the motion put by the hon. member for Burnaby. I think he is to be congratulated for again bringing this sort of thing before the House early enough in the session for you to make a decision so as not to allow the government to mislead the House, as they did today on the pipeline question in the Yukon, and now with a specific example concerning the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

● (1510)

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the only reason that I rise is because I was most surprised to note that the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) would bring me into this matter when I indicated to him during the question of privilege that, if there was any mistake on my part, it was an innocent mistake because they had met, I said, at this moment. I would appreciate members accepting when other members try to clarify a situation by coming before the members of the House in order to give them the benefit of all the facts, without having it thrown back in their face. I did not have to withdraw that because, as you indicated, Mr. Speaker, it was just a question of words and I was right. I want to start this Parliament off on the right foot. I think it is very irresponsible and cheap of the member to come back at me the way he has done, and I would doubt it very much—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: If you expect the House of Commons to run as it should, ladies and gentlemen, I hope you will respect when members stand on this side and, in all good conscience, try to clear the record, without you taking some cheap political advantage—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: You have had your point. It was a cheap shot. It was to your own political advantage, and I resent it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have the impression that hon. members on the government side do not really appreciate the seriousness of the question of privilege and the question raised in this particular issue. Prosecutions under the Combines Act are some of the most important and largest prosecutions in this country. You will recall recently in the sugar case the judgment ordered by the Supreme Court was $2.5 million.

Some hon. Members: Order!

An hon. Member: What about the former minister, the member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet)?

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member for Papineau at that time took the honourable course of action which I think that that hon. member opposite should take today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Yesterday the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) put this question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). The answer by the Prime Minister is alarming. The hon. member for Burnaby said to the Prime Minister:

> Will the right hon. Prime Minister also confirm to the House that there will be no further such involvement, particularly by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in discussing possible charges of price-fixing by oil companies under the Combines Investigation Act?

As we all know, there is an inquiry going on with respect to the oil companies and that is just about ready for prosecution. What did the Prime Minister answer when asked to give assurance that there will be no further discussions? He said:

> Mr. Speaker, if I properly interpret the question put by the hon. member, he is asking that I guarantee that before the government takes action, ministers who might have a particular interest in an action that would be taken should not be consulted. Naturally, I am not going to give that kind of guarantee.

The Prime Minister is saying that he will not guarantee that these kinds of discussions will go on any further. That is a shocking thing under our tradition with respect to prosecutions as they are carried out by attorneys general of this country and carried out by the director of investigation under the Combines Act.

I should point out that the director of investigation under the Combines Act is not an ordinary civil servant. He has statutory powers under the Combines Act to act independently, without any pressures or influence or any sort of political discussion. Therefore, not only would I support the hon. member for Burnaby in his question of privilege that this be referred for full investigation to see who was there, what was said, and how many meetings there were, but I go back to the question I put to the Prime Minister. I believe this minister should be suspended until this whole thing is settled.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not know if there was going to be another ex-minister making a contribution to this debate. As I understand the situation, and I am sorry that I received no official notification whatsoever that a question of privilege would arise today on this matter, there is a request that if there is a valid question of privilege that has been enunciated before you that you refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I may say to you that certainly I would have no objection for that to be done if you thought you had genuine cases of privilege before you.

Again, I had nothing from the Chair, the Table or the hon. member about this matter. However, as I understand the question of privilege that has been enunciated to you, it is a double-barrelled one. Number one, there has been some tinkering with the official journals of this House in relation to Hansard of yesterday. If that is true, that is a very serious charge to make. Certainly I would like to see that cleared up. Second, somehow or other in the course of the question periods of Friday, Monday, and yesterday, I intentionally misled the House. Basically I think those are the two portions of the question of privilege before you.

Let me deal with the first one first. In no manner, shape or form have I corrected Hansard at all, or attempted to correct Hansard at all in respect of anything that I said yesterday or the day before, with the possible exception of some very gross grammatical errors that I have the habit of making in this House, but certainly in respect of any question of substance referred to by the hon. member, I can indicate to you, sir, to the House, and to the member, that I have not changed or intended to change Hansard in any way, and in relation to the phraseology used by the member I have no knowledge whatsoever of that type of change being made.

As a matter of fact, in respect of both versions which the hon. member has just given to the House, my impression and my memory are that both of those are wrong. Not only is Hansard wrong, but also in respect of the tape which the hon. member says he heard in respect of what I said—I think that was wrong, because what I intended to say, and what I believe I did say in respect of this question, and the knowledge of my colleague in respect of this matter, was that the meeting that we held last Friday, a meeting by the way that was not even called by me, was the first opportunity that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) had of being apprised of the facts of this matter.

That meeting was not called by me. It was called by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Flynn) pursuant to his responsibilities and his duties. The ex-minister said that type of meeting had never been called before. I believe he is wrong. In any event, that type of meeting had been held before. As a matter of fact, in regard to possible prosecutions under the Combines Investigation Act, that type of consultation has taken place not only under this administration but under previous administrations.

In respect of the advice that was given to the Minister of Transport, which is the crucial point referred to by the member referring to alterations in Hansard, I sent a brief to the Minister of Transport which I have reason to believe he unfortunately received just as he was going to that meeting, and that meeting was the first time in an information-giving session such as that the Minister of Transport had any opportunity to be aware of the meeting at all.

That is the type of impression I intended to leave with the House when I said what I said, and I firmly believe that is exactly what I did say. If the hon. member is now saying that I said something different from that, I am saying that the hon. member is totally wrong.

Getting back to the other question, the question of me misleading the House in respect of previous meetings, I say to the ex-minister that if he does not know that this is not a discretionary matter for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, he should know it is not a discretionary matter.

It is not me who the director of investigations has to convince to proceed with an action in that case. It is not me who the Minister of Transport or any other operating departmental head has to convince. The question whether or not there is to be a prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act is a matter solely and exclusively within the responsibility of the Attorney General of Canada.

I believe the Minister of Justice is making a speech today, perhaps in the other place—I am not sure—clearly indicating that it is his responsibility, and to know more about the intended prosecution he wanted, of course, to consult with me; he wanted to consult with the director, he wanted to consult with the minister and, as a matter of fact, he wanted to consult with another minister, the minister whose responsibilities involve federal-provincial relations, because in regard to the western trucking situation what has to be done, because of governmental intervention into the whole question of rate setting and the whole question of route setting, has to involve some direct and open consultation with provincial ministers. To indicate that this type of consultation with this government should not be carried on by anyone, even with other governments, is a completely ridiculous notion.

I was very interested to hear three different ex-ministers say that it is not within the responsibility of the Attorney General of Canada to consult with other ministers before he starts a prosecution. That is utter nonsense. I happen to believe it is utter nonsense within the knowledge of the ex-minister who just interrupted me, not to mention two or three other ministers. I say this because I can well remember, in this very chamber, the attorney general of Canada, who at the time was a certain hon. member, Ronald Basford, indicating on March 17, 1978, that as attorney general of the day he had consulted with certain of his ministerial colleagues before instructing that charges be laid against the Toronto Sun, its editor and its publisher, under the Official Secrets Act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: If my memory serves me well, that minister of the day would have been consulted at that time by the then attorney general because obviously he had a large part to play in respect to the very circumstances in which that charge was laid. I suggest there are other ex-ministers, still members of this House, who were consulted at that time by the then attorney general. Of course there has to be the fullest consultation within the ministry with respect to all these things and, by golly, if there had not been, I would say the record of that particular ex-minister with regard to combines investigation cases obviously shows he should have consulted, if he did not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Within this ministry there is now and there will continue to be the fullest consultation between ministers. That is what I meant to say the other day, that is what I believe I did say, and that is what I am saying is the truth today. It certainly was not misleading to any member of this House.

Mr. Speaker: I have no intention of prolonging this discussion. The hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has raised by way of a question of privilege a matter which contains three points—it has been described as having two but essentially it contains three, none of which, I think, falls within the definition of privilege following the intervention by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence).

First, is the question of the possible alteration in Hansard. I have had a preliminary investigation undertaken and the line to which the hon. member for Burnaby refers may have been misread by the reporter—I am not sure—but I will certainly undertake to the House to investigate, as I always do, and report to the House. Any alteration in Hansard is, of course, a very serious matter. But that is a subject for me to take up, now, with the editor in the light of the minister's assertion that at no time did he effect any alteration in the record. Once the minister has not done so, if it is the editor or the reporters, that is the responsibility of the Chair, and I will investigate the matter and make a full report at the earliest opportunity.

The other two points relate to whether or not it is a proper practice for ministers to consult with one another before laying a prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act. While that is a fascinating point, it is not a procedural point. Whether or not ministers are taking a step which is not in keeping with precedent in terms of ministerial practice is a matter of some concern and interest to hon. members, I am sure, but whether they do so, or whether they propose to continue to do so, may become a matter of legality or a matter of constitutional significance, even. However, it is surely not a matter of procedural significance here in the House; it is not a question of privilege whether ministers do or do not consult before the director of prosecutions gives advice to the Attorney General of Canada on the initiation of proceedings under that particular statute. Therefore, since it is not a procedural matter, there is no point our continuing argument as to whether or not consultations of that kind can take place or have taken place in the past. It does not give rise to a question of privilege, at least not in the manner in which it has been cast today.

Finally, there is the question of whether or not the minister misled the House. He has stated he stands by what he says, that it was a correct explanation of the information he possessed at the time. Presumably he invites hon. members to check the record to see what it says and whether it conforms to the information he now has. From the procedural point of view the significance is that the minister stands by what he said. Therefore, if any misleading took place, it was obviously misleading which was not intentional.

Members who examine the precedents will understand that if a question of privilege is to be established here the House must not only have been misled by the minister but the House must have been misled intentionally. Whether he was right or wrong, the minister says he stands by his answer. Therefore, if any misleading took place—which he denies—then obviously that misleading could not have been intentional in the circumstance. Whether this becomes a matter for debate or argument, or criticism of the quality of the answer given, or criticism of the performance of the minister, remains, again, an open question. What I have to decide is whether or not there is a procedural matter involved. The only circumstance in which it can become a procedural matter involving privilege would be if the minister deliberately misled the House and, since the minister stands by his answer, obviously he could not have deliberately misled the House if, indeed, he misled the House at all, which he denies.

For these reasons, having examined the three points which were raised, I do not think any useful purpose can be served by continuing the discussion at this time.

MR. FOX—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Hon. Francis Fox (Blainville-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is the first opportunity I have had to bring it to the attention of the Chair; it has just come to my notice. It arises from an answer given to me in the House yesterday during the question period after I had asked the minister responsible for employment at what time he would be making public his employment strategy. In answering that question the minister indicated, as reported at page 228 of Hansard:

> Most of the details of these programs will he announced in the budget since they may involve budgetary matters. So they will be announced at the time of the budget.

That was a straightforward, pretty clear answer, Mr. Speaker. However, it has been brought to my attention that this very morning, in a speech made outside the House, the hon. member in his notes of a speech to which he referred in the question period, indicated not one, not two, not three, not four, not five, not six but seven initiatives, as he calls them, of one of the major components of his employment strategy.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I believe this is an infringement of the privileges and rights of members of this House and certainly not in keeping with the rhetoric we were given to believe in the Speech from the Throne wherein the hon. minister's leader told us that this government would try to make Parliament a more meaningful place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1530)

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, as I indicated to the hon. member yesterday, that the key elements of the employment strategy are budgetary matters properly introduced at budget time. The speech of which the hon. member has obtained a copy—along with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) and, I hope, others—relates to an employment strategy for women. There are broad outlines of courses which are already public knowledge, but some of the details of which may be in the budget, clearly have not been revealed to the public or to anyone in a public way. The details will be, as indicated yesterday, a matter for the budget in this House.

I can assure the hon. member that there is still time, if he has any reaction to the seven items to which he has made reference, or to any other matters which might be properly included in the employment strategy, that I would welcome his views and those of his colleagues as a constructive contribution to the evolution of an important employment strategy.

ENERGY

REPORTED INCREASE PROPOSED IN PRICES OF OIL AND GASOLINE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing an important and specific matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the reported proposed increase of $4 per barrel a year for oil and, more specifically, an increase of 24 cents to 30 cents a gallon in the price of gasoline now being proposed by the Government of Canada to the ten provinces, which will have a catastrophic impact on the Canadian economy resulting in massive inflation and unemployment and triggering an economic recession affecting all regions of Canada.

It is imperative that, before implementation, this House of Commons urgently and immediately discuss this alarming Government of Canada proposal.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have received in proper time the notice of the hon. member of his intention to seek the invocation of Standing Order 26 in order to arrange an emergency debate on the subject he has just outlined to the House, and his presentation is in keeping with the notice which he did give me.

I do not feel that this is a proper subject for discussion at this time pursuant to Standing Order 26, for several reasons. The first is that I have some doubt as to whether it is necessary to set up an emergency debate to discuss anything during the course of the throne speech debate when any member can seek the floor and raise any subject he believes is relevant to the Speech from the Throne. I would not have ruled the matter aside on that point alone, because there are obvious restrictions on the ability of a group of members to address themselves to a subject in a cohesive way during the throne speech debate, but, after all, I must have regard for the fact that the hon. member and his colleagues do have an opportunity to participate in the balance of the throne speech debate and to focus on this subject if it is their desire to do so.

I have some other doubts, though, which lead me, on balance, not to grant the application. I have some concern as to whether this is on an ongoing matter rather than a matter of critical proportions. We have several problems of this sort. Members seek to utilise the provisions of Standing Order 26 on various problems in the country such as unemployment, inflation, and matters of that nature which are continuing problems but which, members allege, at a given time cross from being chronic to acute problems worthy of emergency consideration. Oil prices are a continuing matter in that category, and it would be very difficult to persuade me that continuing or chronic considerations are, or ever were, intended to be the proper subject of Standing Order 26. However, even if they were, in this particular case I have further doubts. I am sure that even on a cursory examination of the news reports related to the subject which the hon. member has raised, price increases, as usual, would be for a future date, and in fact would not be at one time but would be phased in over a rather extended period of time. All of that obviously has to be taken into account when considering whether the House will have an opportunity to discuss these.

It remains unclear as to whether the government, in proposing the price increases, either requires or, even if it does not require, intends to seek the approval of Parliament. That remains uncertain for me now, and in any case in the final analysis it has been said, and was repeated again today by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), that the price increase for crude oil itself does not require parliamentary approval.

The hon. member has included in his motion, and I quote more specifically "an increase of 24 cents to 30 cents a gallon". That, I understand on the basis of the replies of the Minister of Finance here in the House, relates to a suggested increase in the federal tax which would, I gather, be coupled with any such increase about which the hon. member is concerned. If that is so, that would clearly be a budgetary measure and would be debated in full during the course of a budget presentation. Therefore, I have to conclude that the House would not, on the information I have now, be deprived in any way of ample opportunity to debate the matters raised in this application, if in fact they do come about, which was left in some uncertainty today.

Therefore, until some of these matters are clarified more completely, I would not be disposed to think the House should consider this matter as an emergency pursuant to my understanding of Standing Order 26.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity, which is my first to rise to speak in this Thirty-first Parliament, to congratulate you on your re-election as Speaker. I had the opportunity in my first session of Parliament to have you as a neighbour, a row ahead of me, and I remember those days very well. Your wit and your wisdom have only increased since that time, and they were at a very high standard then.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fleming: I would also like, in the spirit of this House in its better moments—and we will start off with the better moments and see how it goes through my speech—to offer my congratulations to the new Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and hon. members opposite on the mandate given them in the election. I want to talk about the degree of that mandate as I make my comments today, but as best I can I sincerely wish them well in the interest of Canada.

• (1540)

I want to congratulate both the mover, the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz), and the seconder of the address in reply, the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald). Their thoughtful comments about their constituencies, their firmness of mind and freshness bode well for their contributions to this Parliament in the months ahead.

I plan to deal with two areas. First, as a member of the opposition and a member of Parliament since 1972, I would like to deal with the commitments made by the new government during the course of the last election campaign and what we now have instead. As well, I want to deal with the cultural field, in which I was given some opportunity by my leader to concentrate in an area which I believe is absolutely fundamental and critical to the survival of this nation.

I should like to speak on the issue of the new government, about what they promised and what we have. May I review, if I can, some of their economic proposals. They said that the last government, the government of which I was a supporter, had created terrible deficits, that indeed the spending of the Government of Canada was sending Canada down the road to hell. And so, in the course of the last campaign they concocted as an answer something called the stimulative deficit. That was created by that great democrat, Senator de Cotret. The senator proposed that, and that is what we heard in the campaign. Upon their election and in a minority situation, they abandoned that as impossible because they said matters were even worse than they thought they were so far as deficits were concerned. That is a possible position to take, except that that particular declaration, while abandoning a major plan that offered the return of money to many Canadians who felt the tax burden was becoming unduly large, that rationalization, came the same week that another senior minister of the new government announced that the deficit for the current fiscal year would be less than that forecast by the previous government.

In turn, the previous government was accused of being gutless and unimaginative on several very basic economic principles followed by that previous government. We were attacked for persistently claiming to float the dollar and, in fact, not floating it. I can remember when, day after day, the then member for Don Valley, now the principal economic adviser to the new Prime Minister, would rise in the House and attack the minister of finance of the last government, saying, "You are not floating the dollar at all; you are interfering with hundreds of millions of dollars; you are meddling with it. Fix it or float it. I would like to have it fixed." I believe that is what he said. He said, "I would like to have it fixed, but make up your mind." Upon forming the government in the six months that followed, they followed precisely the same policy they had constantly attacked when they were in opposition.

When it comes to the traditional policy of recent Canadian governments to increase our interest rate in line with increases in the American interest rate in order to attract capital and to grow as a country, we were constantly attacked for following the Americans, for not having some independence of mind, and for not finding an alternate course. Of course what we have seen happen since the election is again the policy they attacked as a fundamental mistake on our side which they have now decided to follow. They followed it religiously, even though there are many of us on this side who believe the time has come now to investigate at least, to see if it is wise, simply without questioning, to follow the increases in the American rate, especially when our own inflation rate is considerably lower than that of the Americans and we may indeed have a possible alternative policy that could work for Canada.

At any rate, on all these fronts, on the promised spending and give-out to the taxpayers, on the issue of the floating or non-floating dollar, on the issue of our inflation rates, they promised the opposite of what we were doing, but all they have done since they have formed the government is exactly what we did. I suggest that placed in the minds of the Canadian public, now that Parliament has finally met, some real concern about credibility and some real doubts that there would be some changes. Obviously the outcome of the election showed that some change was desired. That is what they said they would give, but apparently in those fundamental areas they will not give it at all.

They also accused us of being insensitive—and this was through the other side of the mouth—when we proposed the tightening up of the unemployment insurance regulations, because there was a broad feeling in the land, and a feeling in this House among members of most of the parties at least, that systems which were well intended were not working well. So, I must say that after considerable debate in my own caucus in the last Parliament, some changes were put forward, and those changes, finally after lengthy debate, were adopted, but with the then official opposition opposing us on that issue. What is the first thing they did upon becoming government? They gave final approval to putting those changes into effect!

I am talking about credibility and the very difficult position of the Canadian public as we try to make this Parliament work. During the campaign I heard a great deal about wage and price controls, about the last campaign five years earlier, the 1974 campaign. I heard about how we promised something and did a complete reversal. Well, at least it took us 18 months and very changed economic circumstances to do a reversal. They, in three or four months, reversed on almost every major economic plank they had, and the ones where they have not, I find most incredible as an offering to this Parliament for Canada's future.

I should like to mention one or two economic issues such as the issue of cuts to the civil service, the so called privatization. As I recall, that began by the Progressive Conservative Party saying. "You have too much government. We are going to cut it down. It is too much of a burden. The people are paying too much in taxes and the deficits are too great." They said, "Our answer will be a cut of 60,000." That is a nice figure; it has lots of zeros in it, but how they came up with the six in front I do not know. They got rid of Bryce Mackasey and that leaves them with 59,999. However, they say they have a plan.

That mastermind—I know he does not like to hear it said—the mastermind of the bank of western Canada, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens), continues to demonstrate his ability as one of Canada's leading economic acrobats. In the minds of the Canadian public these cuts are going to mean less of a burden on the taxpayer, and yet he is suggesting that one of the major Crown corporations the government should get rid of is a company like de Havilland with several thousand workers from my own constituency, a Crown corporation that a Liberal federal government took over in order to build it, to concentrate on technology which could be a world competitor and to make it strong. That is happening; it has just begun to show a reasonable profit. But what do they do? They say they will get rid of it. Well, there are two problems with that. First, that will not help the pocketbook of the Canadian taxpayer because the company is making profit and it is in the interests of the Canadian public to retain that company, at least until it reaches the point of considerably greater health. Right now it is at the turning point of real expansion and real success, and we will have to watch very closely as the new government moves toward privatization of de Havilland, to be sure that indeed the long-term interest of that technology and the interests of those workers are kept in mind.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Much the same can be said of Canadair. Here is a company we picked up as the federal Liberal government. We said it needs help, it needs some direction and money for support. We gave it support and now it is highly successful, but they say, with some kind of crazy economics, "Now that it is successful, we will give it back to the private sector and let someone else profit rather than the taxpayers of Canada."

One other economic issue of some importance to me, coming as I do from metropolitan Toronto, is the so-called mortgage interest tax deduction program. That program has now been switched to a mortgage interest tax credit. In my view, that is a positive step. Their original plan would have meant that the richer you are, if you hold a mortgage the more you will get. Now it means you will all get the same amount. I must admit that must come as some disappointment to some of the folks who voted Conservative and, after adding and subtracting, figured they would get as much as $4,000 or $5,000. Now the maximum they will get is $1,500 after the program is phased in.

Of much more concern to me, however, are those people who rent, the old and middle-aged people who worked hard to pay off their mortgages. Of much more concern to me in my constituency are the many thousands of Canadians who have built their homes here, particularly when I think of the Italian Canadian community and others who, very quickly, believing it was fundamental to their family life to have their home paid for, paid off their mortgages in less than ten years, pooling their resources, working hard, scrubbing floors, putting up brick walls, helping to build our cities. They will get nothing out of this program, and yet it is the major offering to the Canadian public, so far as getting any money back is concerned. Where will all that money come from to pay back the terrible deficits which this government says we have created?

Perhaps I have said enough about economics, unless one considers the Jerusalem embassy issue an economic one. I do not know how, at least in part, it can be considered anything else. Surely the kindest thing which can be said about that whole terrible mess and all its consequences is that it was an ill thought out decision of no real aid to Israel. Perhaps in the long term it would be against the interests of Israel. Certainly it has caused us great trouble in the Arab world. How many millions or billions have we lost? When they talked about the policy of moving the embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, I heard nothing about the much touted promise of the previous Conservative opposition that when taking government they would bring down a tough Arab boycott bill, that they would really do something. I wonder if anyone else has heard anything about that.

The government I supported put forward a bill which the Jewish community that supports Israel directly, and generally the Canadian community, found to be a reasonable approach. It was a guarantee that certainly we were not going to allow any discrimination against people because of their faith or interest in Israel. Certainly if that happened, it would be public and it would be castigated. There would be pressure against the people who might do that. All of a sudden with respect to something about which there was not enough before, we have heard nothing since.

We had the promise of an open government. Certainly for five months there was no Parliament. Now we have a Parliament, and when we finally get to Parliament what has the spokesman for open government and his supporters done? I gather they talked it over. I hope they talked it over before the Prime Minister said to Newfoundland that, even though the federal government and that province argued before, even though there was an agreement with the maritime provinces, and even though there was a test case regarding the west coast in the supreme court, the resources were theirs—"Newfoundland, here you go". After having said to the west coast, "Although we have some problems, British Columbia, here you go", he thought he might as well say it to the maritimes as well.

So there is the open government; there is the better use of Parliament. There was no reference to Parliament, no constitutional meeting. If it was open, at least we would know if they talked it over with Bill Davis. Did they talk it over with Hatfield? Did they talk it over with the Manitoba government? They are all good Conservative regimes. From what I know, no. That is our new open government. What about basic constitutional reform? I do not think anyone in the House would deny the people of Newfoundland maximizing what is justly theirs under the constitution. But the fiscal powers, and some basic interest to make sure that the fundamentals of one nation and the equality of all people in that nation are maintained, must be retained for the central government, the government of all Canadians.

When we talk about open government we should remember that two-thirds of the cabinet are locked out of the inner cabinet. That is not a very open government. Coming from Toronto I should like to ask where is Toronto in this inner cabinet? Where is Manitoba? My leader pointed that out very well. Where is New Brunswick in that inner group? We have had a tough season in Toronto, aside from my party having lost some seats, which is perhaps a non-objective comment. But the Argos have not been doing very well, the Argos wearing their blue. The Blue Jays wearing their blue have not done very well, and now we have the blue Tory ministers, all of them second string. Poor Toronto is not doing very well, although I have some hope for the Argos. Hope springs eternal, and I have some long range hope for the Blue Jays.

An hon. Member: What about the blue maple leaf?

Mr. Fleming: I do not know about those three fellows from Toronto sitting on the outside. I do not know if they have a hope at all of getting into first place.

Then there is Petro-Canada. I see we have brought hon. members opposite to life a little. That always encourages me. They will not disband Petro-Canada; they will simply cut off its arms and legs. Well, they will keep the high risk part in order to go out and spend money that others will not spend in frontier areas and to develop the tar sands and to find the technology to give us a real assurance of energy supply for the future. They will keep that part and sell off the profitable part. Meanwhile they con the public by giving them free shares. It looks like that will happen. After that the little guy will have a few shares. He can watch them go up as his taxes and energy costs go up. Then the big guy will buy shares. He will buy shares and make profits, and we will have a great Canadian company! Is that not wonderful? It is, but what about energy prices for average Canadians? What about pensioners trying to heat their homes? What about poor people? Where is our expertise, which we cannot just have in the high risk portion, to know the entire market place, to know whether we are being conned by some of those multinationals? It is gone.

I guess we have heard a great deal about Petro-Canada. Perhaps members on both sides are becoming tired of hearing the word. I do not believe anyone can say that the retention of Pacific Pete, the Atlantic Richfield portion, the profitable part, will harm the Canadian public. After messing up Jerusalem, after changing all their financial proposals, after keeping Liberal policies which they frowned on for months and years, how can they say finally that they will show guts by taking up that policy on a fundamental issue of interest to all Canadians, which I am sure no one can deny? It is madness. If it is madness today, then it will be a lot more madness a year or two down the road when this Parliament finds itself back in an election. Woe is the day as that story unravels for that party and that government. As that tragedy unravels, woe is the day for the Canadian public.

Even Bill Davis is shaking in his boots today. A couple of months ago Mr. Davis went out with his animated face and charged around the province of Ontario supporting the new Prime Minister. We know that he must be sitting quietly at home now, perhaps with a glass of brandy in one hand, wondering if everything in his past has been all that correct and wise.

I have said enough about Petro-Canada, but before I pass on to another topic I should like to make reference to Foothills. It was to provide $1.5 billion to $2 billion and tens of thousands of jobs for Canada. Apparently over the period of three months no minister, no prime minister, or no senior official had a meeting with Foothills. During the months of June, July and August there were no meetings in the new government over a major Canadian economic need. It was a matter that was by no means assured. Everyone watching the United States knew the confrontation between the executive and the legislative branch and did not think for a moment that it should not be watched. They knew there was public relations and leaning and pushing to do. The Conservative government, the experts on business, the ones who want privatization, did nothing over three months. Zip, it went out the window, and, "gosh, oh golly, shucks," another one is gone. If one looks at Japan, apparently Japan is out the window.

We have read about Argentina in the last few weeks. We have read about the Middle East and the Mexican deal. There was to be a meeting in September, and the Prime Minister made a joke. Somebody said, "Postponed or cancelled?" The Prime Minister said, "No, just postponed until next year". I do not know if we will be on our feet economically next year if this kind of record continues.

I have finished my comments about the government generally, but I should like to move to a more positive and hopeful tone, the field of culture. I mean that sincerely. I want to congratulate the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. MacDonald). He is not here today, he is away at a conference with his provincial counterparts who have responsibilities for communications. I want to pay my respects. In the cultural community he is considered progressive. Last November I believe he indicated in the budget speech five or six budgetary proposals which he said were commitments of his party to assist the Canadian cultural community if they got into office. He and his committee on culture moved across the country last year. I believe it showed a real desire to make some progress. In that speech the then hon. member for Egmont said the following:

> Our institutions of culture are starved for funding . . . such neglect of our culture . . . can only seriously jeopardize the well-being of this nation. We must bring a new vigour to federal responsibility.

If one honestly cared about one's country and is a critic in that area, then one would look forward to new vigour. I know of the minister's sincerity. I would call him a progressive more than a conservative in his interests in the field of culture, but he is not a superman. He is not faster than a speeding bullet. He cannot leap tall buildings in one bound. Also, he is the inner cabinet minister for social policy. What is that? Is it medicare? Do we have problems with medicare? Is there slippage? Will it not be universal any more? He is responsible for that in the inner cabinet. Also native interests are major responsibilities. There are big problems to be solved fairly. Also I gather that pensions will come under his inner cabinet responsibilities. What about indexing? Are we not to have indexing? Will we fight to keep indexing so that old people will not have less and less each year? What about social assistance? He has all of that to handle, as well as communications. There are staggering challenges over satellites, cable television, Pay TV, interconnections, super stations, and the future of the CRTC and its ability to cope. He is faced with all of those challenges. Then we come to the field of culture where he says we need new vigour.

• (1600)

Then we have the CBC. Do we have problems with the CBC? Do we have problems with the CBC! Then we have the National Film Board, the Canadian Film Development Corporation, the National Arts Centre, the Canada Council, with all its implications, the National Museums, the National Gallery, which is very important, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, the National Library, as well as publishing policy and recording policy. On and on the list goes, with one human being to deal with them all. No matter how progressive or how capable, how can he do it? Why when they have 137 members, and I mean this genuinely, with some very competent people in the back benches, is it necessary? Is he the only progressive man, in the Prime Minister's mind? Is this one of the few red Tories holding on? I hope that is not the case. I want good things in the cultural area, but why is one minister trying to cope with so much? He is a man who does care and understand.

Mr. Stevens: He is so good.

Mr. Fleming: Well, we will find out in time. I think that is arrogance on the part of this inner cabinet minister who suggests he is so good, and he is so good. He is so good there is no room for the others I think are very good and should be there.

Mr. Stevens: No, my colleague.

Mr. Fleming: I quite understood the "so good" minister.

Let me take a moment now to deal with the parliamentary enquiry that was very vaguely referred to in the throne speech. We do not know if it will be a joint parliamentary enquiry of the Senate and the Commons, though I have heard it will be that, I believe in a speech by the new Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. The idea of putting all the cultural fields together, reviewing things and straightening it all out, is something that everyone who is involved in the area has been calling for now for a year or two. I know the previous secretary of state made several major efforts at putting them together. I have real concern in a minority Parliament whether this can be competently and thoughtfully done when we are faced with the workload and the challenges we have here.

Of equal concern is the fear that while the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications may feel that is a productive route, and that demonstrates democratization and the open government concept they want to prove, it may be very dangerous, indeed, when the minister who just interjected a moment ago can go in and argue as President of the Treasury Board that it is under study and they do not need any more money. Remember, it was the Secretary of State who said a year ago that they were starving. Let us not continue that starvation. We take him at his word, but is that not a good excuse? That is what I am afraid of, that he will say they are having a study and that they should not be given any money until that study is completed. How long will that study take, and how much more critical will the situation become? The Secretary of State has said the situation is critical.

Let me take a moment to talk about this suggestion about starvation for funding. I asked my first question of the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications last week and he very proudly, when I questioned the heavy burden he had, responded that he had found $2 million more for the Canada Council. That was not responding to the question. I am very pleased about the $2 million, as I know it is a breath of air for them, but it is still $6 million to $7 million less than they would have had without restraint. It was the previous government that I supported that brought in restraint. While I was in support of that government, I also criticized it in committee for the extent of the restraint. I support the new minister in giving them more assistance.

If that is $2 million more, whatever happened to that $24 million the previous secretary of state, Mr. Roberts, promised from Loto Canada funds? We now hear that the total deal back is $24 million, and that is for sports and culture. If we have half of that, that is $12 million, and $12 million and $2 million is $14 million, we end up with a net loss of $10 million, and that is for the cultural community. But I will bet anything I can bet that it is not going to be $12 million. My hint for that was in a letter I received in response to a letter I sent to the Secretary of State. In that letter of September 19 he said:

> The net result will be increased revenues available from Canadian lotteries for the support of sports and cultural activity. That these new funds will be realized primarily at the provincial level is in my opinion a most positive development toward encouraging more active provincial participation in cultural support.

I agree, the provinces have to do more. Of course they do. He seems to be saying there will be more money, but not here. He seems to be suggesting it is for the provinces. More money for the provinces is good, but he says we are starving here, suggesting that the Canada Council and all those other agencies are starving. This letter seems to suggest less money, not more money, and I think the cultural community, which has some faith in this new minister, deserves an answer. Is the amount to be $10 million less, $12 million less or $14 million less? If it is $10 million more I will be very happy and the first to congratulate the new minister. However, I have my fears about that.

The proposals of November, 1978, put forward by the new Secretary of State, included expanding the 100 per cent capital cost allowance for publishing and recording. I argued, as I did under a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 last week, that he said last November these firmly would be budgetary proposals if they formed the government. They formed the government early last May, or early last June, and they have had five months to introduce them. We still do not know the budget date, but there is no secret about these things. That party promised them. We have a starved cultural community. Why not bring them in or bring them forward for discussion in committee so we can find out if they will work? They may not work, but I would like to find out about them. I want to be positive, but why put them off and then say they are starving? I do not think that is fair to a community that holds hope in this minister. I do not think this was rhetoric in opposition. Perhaps the problem is that he cannot get his colleagues to move. If he cannot, I want to point out that there is a problem.

I want to talk for a moment, if I may, about the suggestions contained in the minister's speeches when he was a member of the opposition and the critic of the then secretary of state. He seemed to suggest that he would regionalize the National Film Board and the Canada Council. I have heard around and about, in talking to people and in interviewing them, in an attempt to pick up the best knowledge I can about this area in addition to what I have learned over the years as a member of Parliament, that he has abandoned that. I hope he has, because strong regions do not have to mean a weakening of the middle, and if they do mean a weakening of the middle I think that is catastrophic. I hope that is not the direction he is going.

There are some specific areas in respect of which I want to put some questions on the record. Let me refer to the area of copyright. My colleague, the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Gourd) very forcefully made the point during the throne speech debate yesterday that for 50 years, and to the discredit of the previous government as well, no changes have been made in the Copyright Act. He referred to all the disadvantages it creates for our authors when we are trying to spur our Canadian authors and to build Canadian talent. Some real efforts were made by the last secretary of state. I know a lot was happening in his office to press the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, where the responsibility lies, for some action in this regard. I simply want to say that while our committee has not formally reached an agreement on that policy, and this involves simply a matter of finding the time in the first few weeks, I agree entirely with my colleague, and I hope we will move in that direction. I hope we can pressure the government into moving in that direction.

Again a major area of criticism by the new Secretary of State was in respect of copyright and the lack of action. He has been the Secretary of State for almost six months. In looking at 80 new bills on the order paper, some of them not so new, I see nothing about copyright.

Let me refer to voluntary action, an area of concern and the responsibility of the Secretary of State. We read in the papers that Ken Dryden has left the nets to do a little protective work. Perhaps I should be more positive. He has left to do some investigative work in the voluntary action area. He is going to head up a task force on voluntary action. When we call the department we are told they know nothing about it. There are no terms of reference, and they have not seen Mr. Dryden.

There was a task force on voluntary action several years ago. I simply want to encourage the Secretary of State, with the support of his government, to move quickly on this. I have some agreement with members opposite that good work can be done in the voluntary sector, and it is time we found out about these concerns. It is time we found out specifically whether lotteries, for instance, have distorted the ability of the voluntary sector.

I asked questions on that of the last government. I have written to the new Secretary of State, and I am very pleased that he has replied saying he shares these concerns and will be pleased to explore this issue more fully. He is going to take it up with his cabinet colleagues. He has asked for my suggestions, and I have suggested he certainly should look into the social impact of lotteries.

Finally, in conclusion, I simply want to say culture is not an airy-fairy issue; it is the reality of Canada. Of course the regions have to maximize and reflect the reality to themselves, but we are more than regions and we are more than a community of communities. We are a nation, and each part of Canada helps to make up the greatness of the total, but each part must better learn of, understand, and appreciate the other parts. It is the sharing of the richness of diversity that leads to national maturity. It is the assurance of the opportunity for excellence to develop anywhere that guarantees artistic and cultural opportunity everywhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robin Richardson (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, may I first most sincerely congratulate you on the unanimous selection of yourself for a difficult but most important post. I can think of no better person for this most respected position during what I am certain all hon. members will work for and pray will be a "Parliament of Reconciliation." I pledge to you my co-operation in this essential task.

• (1610)

Next, I extend the traditional and very sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I should also like to refer to my predecessor, the member for the riding of Greenwood, Mr. Andrew Brewin, and pay a tribute to him. Mr. Brewin is a very fine gentleman, a respected parliamentarian who represented my district for 17 years and, in my opinion, he is a compassionate man and a great Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson (Beaches): I hope to hold a reception for him later this year here on the Parliament Hill he loved so well, to which all of his many friends will be invited. I should like this House to know that Andrew Brewin is held in high regard and affection by many who, like myself, do not happen to share his political views.

I should also like to express my personal tribute to the memory of the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker who was well known to the Richardson family. As some hon. members would know, my uncle, Burt Richardson, was Mr. Diefenbaker's chief of staff for several years in the early 1960's. Mr. Diefenbaker was a man of great moral integrity and personal courage—a man of strong Christian conviction—and my only regret is that I did not have the privilege to sit in this House with him as a member of this Thirty-first Parliament.

My sadness at the passing of Mr. Diefenbaker is only the human feeling of realizing a great man and former prime minister of the Canada we love is no longer with us. It is more than overcome by the knowledge that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and leader of this Progressive Conservative government is equally a man of great moral integrity and personal courage, who is willing and able to take the tough actions necessary to ensure a safe, prosperous and united Canada for all Canadians in the days, months and years ahead.

I propose in this speech, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the prospects for Canadian peace and prosperity raised in the Speech from the Throne and, in particular, to challenge all hon. members to work together to help restore morality and a sense of true values to public affairs. After all, Mr. Speaker, Parliament is the central forum of our country. It should set the tone of public life since its decisions are felt by every Canadian. Our greatest challenge, individually and collectively as members of Parliament, is to help rebuild public respect and confidence in government.

First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few general remarks. At a moment like this when I am giving my first speech in this historic Parliament, I naturally think of the people in my own constituency. I think of the people of Beaches, as I am sure other hon. members think of their constituents, as the salt of the earth, and I hope I can justify the confidence they have placed in me as their federal representative.

I think particularly, Mr. Speaker, of the many people I met during the past two years of campaigning as I called from house to house, who have experienced and are experiencing the devastating effects of prolonged inflation. I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, about the retired people trying to live on limited pensions, the working men and women whose life savings are being destroyed, the homemakers who face soaring food prices, the homeowners, merchants and other small business entrepreneurs who are being devastated by high interest rates, and the young people who are facing very uncertain job prospects.

I think also, Mr. Speaker, of the many people I met who are fed up with politics and government. I am sure other hon. members experienced the same thing. They are the people who are dismayed by corruption and scandal in high places; sick of being bought off with their own money; distressed and discouraged at red tape and remoteness of government, and downright angry about the taxes which now account at all levels of government for almost 50 per cent of all the earned income in Canada. Fifty per cent, Mr. Speaker! God only asks for 10 per cent; Caesar and his legions are not so easily satisfied.

Who can deny, Mr. Speaker, that these are darkening days? The smaller this world grows, the more it seems to fly apart. There are wars and rumours of war; hot wars, cold wars, bush wars, and economic wars. There is famine and hunger, disease and suffering, strife and turmoil. There is financial uncertainty bordering on chaos that could serve as the prelude to an awful worldwide depression with its untold misery. The threat of nuclear holocaust is constantly with us. It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that "the distress of nations" is upon us.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that primarily inflation is a moral and political problem. Have we in this House the imagination to see that it is a threat to the political, social, and moral character of our society? Do we not see that the confiscation of capital, income and savings that results from inflation provided some politicians and bureaucrats with the excuse to trespass into many areas of our lives, and curtail freedoms? Have we not perhaps now come to the point in our history where, in a very real sense, "democracy in deficit" is descriptive of both our economic plight and possibly of our political future, unless we are willing to act with courage and conviction to resolve our problems?

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a member of this Thirty-first Parliament and, in particular, of this new Progressive Conservative government that is facing up to these very real challenges. I trust that we all in this House perceive the need to work together, regardless of political party affiliation, to support the initiatives set out in the Speech from the Throne. We must work together, regardless of party affiliation, on the foreign policy review, on the basic reform of Parliament, and on ways to balance the budget. We must address the crucial moral issues at the heart of the human dilemma today—social justice at home and abroad, the right to life, the problem of inflation. We must come to grips with what we are all about as individuals and as a nation.

Our failure in the past as a society, and our failure specifically here in Parliament, has been to articulate our national goals and preserve our individual values in attaining them. It is this failure, Mr. Speaker, that has led to the broad sense of disillusionment amongst the Canadian people today.

I represent many Canadian people who wish to be governed by a righteous and God-fearing Parliament. As many hon. members may be aware, Christians all over Canada have been praying for each one of you personally in the hope that men and women of God would be making the laws of the land. Mr. Speaker, I believe we have a yardstick by which to measure our effectiveness. That measuring device is God's Word. We must search for a biblical basis for civil government.

As a professional economist and businessman I have said much, and I will say more at a later time, about the primary cause of our inflation, which is government itself. But, Mr. Speaker, as a Christian and as a concerned Canadian, I am convinced that not all of Canada's problems are economic. Many are moral and spiritual. Indeed, both the human spirit and the national soul may perhaps be more in need of repair than the federal budget.

I believe the bible to be true, Mr. Speaker, when it states in second Chronicles 7:14 God's promise as follows:

> If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from Heaven, and will forgive their sins and will heal their lands.

What more do we need to encourage us, to motivate us, than to become active working together in the healing of our land? Mr. Speaker, I may sound like a voice crying in the wilderness, but I know for a fact that this Thirty-first Parliament has many others of like faith.

I am excited, Mr. Speaker, by much of what I have seen since the May 22 election, and I am very optimistic about our country's future because of the leadership I know will be given by hon. members in this "Parliament of Reconciliation." Our individual and national response to the desperate plight of the Vietnamese boat people, and the support received from hon. members on both sides of the House, is a very encouraging sign of what can be achieved by this Parliament as a positive witness to our fellow Canadians and to the world. Canadians have had enough of meanness and pettiness. What they want from us, Mr. Speaker, is leadership, and the true essence of leadership is service to others.

It is a fact that Canada, more than any other nation in the world, is blessed with abundant resources, good, hard working, and law abiding people, and a huge potential. As the Prime Minister has so properly said, "It is a time to build". I believe that in our Prime Minister we have an enlightened leader who has the courage of his convictions to uphold an unpopular stance in the name of the future good. He has given a positive indication in his response to the debate on the Speech from the Throne that we are and will continue to move firmly to correct those things which have been holding us back individually and collectively from meeting our God-given potential in this country. Although he would perhaps not use the same words as I, the Prime Minister has challenged us all, whether we be members of Parliament or individual Canadian citizens, to participate in this building of Canada with energy and skill; to stand fast in our faith; to fight the good fight; to be consistent in our good works, with love and understanding—"like the yeast that leavens the loaf and raises the level of all it touches".

"Do unto others as you would have them do unto you". Mr. Speaker, what a tremendous transformation would occur if the golden rule were applied to politics and government. Can you imagine the change that would be wrought? No more political campaigns based on "victory at any price by any means"; no more dog-eat-dog tactics; no more under-the-table deals; no more false witness; no more ego trips for self-centred purposes. Where there is animosity, there would be love; where there is greed, there would be generosity and compassion. Patience would take the place of anger, and service would rise above self.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully recommend to this House that one small thing we might do to signal a new direction to the people of Canada would be to allow the general public to enter this chamber while we are conducting daily prayers. It would certainly do no harm, and might even prove inspirational to some Canadians to see their members of Parliament humbling themselves before God on a daily basis, asking Him for His divine guidance.

● (1620)

Especially in these times, Mr. Speaker, when Canada stands at the political, economic, and spiritual crossroads, the challenges facing this Parliament are very important and can be exciting and rewarding too, not in the monetary or status-seeking way, but in the knowledge that we in this House of Commons are doing our part to build Canada so that some day it might truly be said of this land that " . . . His dominion shall be from sea even to sea . . ."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the challenge set out by our Fathers of Confederation was to build a nation in keeping with basic Christian principles. What began with them as a step of faith more than a century ago has proven to be a continuing test of faith ever since. I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is both a challenge and a sacred obligation for the hon. members of this House to work together in the healing of our land at this time of unparalleled opportunity.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to congratulate you on your re-election as Speaker of the House and to congratulate all hon. members on their election to the House. I also want to thank all the voters in the riding of Sainte-Marie who put their confidence in me. What confidence! All other candidates lost their deposit!

Mr. Speaker, having read the Speech from the Throne, I have to admit that I found it very deceiving. I expected that this Progressive Conservative government, after spending 16 years in opposition claiming that it had the solutions to all our problems, would present after five months in office something other than words and pious wishes. I admit that I am deeply worried about the two million senior citizens who built this country, about the 700,000 unemployed and those who will join their ranks, and about the seven million Canadians whose income is below $10,000 because the government offers them little if anything at all.

The formation of the inner cabinet was one of the first moves made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). This category of Canadians about whom I am worried and who represent a high percentage of the population of Canada gets no consideration from this goverment. Indeed, the Prime Minister did not consider it appropriate to include in the inner cabinet the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander), and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey). Those three ministers should represent and defend the interests of the groups of Canadians they serve. It would be essential that those same ministers be present at the meetings where the main decisions are taken. I do not know why the Prime Minister did that, whether it is because those three ministers are not competent enough or because he is simply not interested in those groups of citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that if those ministers had indeed taken part in the meetings of the inner cabinet and spoken for the interests of citizens that their departments serve, the Prime Minister would certainly not contemplate increasing so quickly the price of oil. I may indicate that the first victims of that increase will be the lower income group and not the industry that can pass on this hike to those same people. Moreover, those ministers would certainly not have let the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) cut 60,000 jobs in the public service thereby increasing the number of unemployed. I would like to know on which studies the government based itself to reduce the number of civil servants by 60,000. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell or assure the House that services offered to the public will not suffer from these cutbacks? How are we to know that there are not only 10,000 public servants too many? I trust that the decision to cut 60,000 public service jobs was not taken the day the Prime Minister decided to move the Canadian embassy to Jerusalem, because that was not his best day.

As stated in the throne speech, the government hopes to solve unemployment and create jobs by relying on the private sector. It should know that the private sector has long since had the opportunity to create jobs aided by government grants, with the result that there are now 700,000 unemployed. We have a lot to look forward to! I believe the government is wrong in relying only on multinationals and small and medium business, because we all know that their prime motive is profit and not job creation. One has only to consider the action taken by such companies as ITT, Cadbury, Sun Life and many others which could not care less about the workers. Often, Mr. Speaker, when governments give grants to corporations in order for them to modernize their equipment, there does not result in any new jobs. I will give you as an example a bakery with equipment producing 100 loaves of bread a minute; after receiving a grant from the federal government, they bought new equipment capable of producing 400 loaves a minute. The result is that you have only one operator instead of four, and three unemployed.

Furthermore, the Minister of Employment and Immigration decided to cut the Canada Works programs. That is unfortunate because it was one of the rare programs where the government put faith in the ordinary citizen. I hope that decision will be reviewed because in addition to creating jobs that program provided services meeting the needs of the people, particularly senior citizens. The government should also review the policy to help businesses so it will really help create employment.

Mr. Speaker, I want also draw the attention of this House to the tax credits for home owners announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie). That is an unfair decision because there is nothing for tenants. Instead, the Government of Canada in co-operation with the provinces should have examined the possibility of establishing an over-all housing policy to help middle income workers to own a home and low income people to have decent housing through a tenant subsidy.

If you look at Statistics Canada figures for 1976, you will see that there are in Canada four million home owners versus two million tenants. If you look at the provincial breakdown there are 1,676,000 owners and 958,000 tenants in Ontario versus 953,000 owners and 940,000 tenants in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, after reading those figures, you see the government's mortgage tax credit policy is unfair to Quebec where the rate of ownership is low. Furthermore, it is also unfair to senior citizens because most of them who own a house paid off their mortgages long ago. Indeed, in an article in the newspaper La Presse of Wednesday, October 3, one can read, and I quote:

> The Canadian Council on Social Development feels the interest and property tax credit program announced by the Clark government will have a very detrimental impact if it is not further improved to include low income Canadians.
> In a press conference yesterday in Ottawa, Director General Pierre Bourdon urged the government to amend its program to correct its three great weaknesses which he identified as follows:
> — no advantage for tenants, who account for 37 per cent of the population;
>
> — a maximum tax credit of $260 after four years for families at the bottom of the income scale ($10,000 to $15,000), compared with $900 for those with an income of $30,000;
> —nothing except the maximum property tax credit of $250 for owners of older houses and for rural families with large properties and low incomes.

It would have been desirable, Mr. Speaker, so as to enable middle-income Canadians to purchase a home, for the government to amend the policy of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation which guarantees loans only for the purchase of single-family dwellings and duplexes. I refer, for instance, to the city of Montreal where the majority of houses have three floors and three or four units. If the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation could authorize guaranteed loans for these properties, we could increase the number of homeowners in Montreal, where there are now only 353,000 homeowners compared with 571,000 tenants.

As evidence of the importance of the loans guaranteed by the CMHC, if a middle-income citizen wants to buy a property evaluated at $50,000, he can obtain a 90 per cent loan guaranteed by the CMHC, which represents a mortgage of $45,000 and which means that he need only make a deposit of $5,000. However, if the loan is not guaranteed by the CMHC, he can only obtain 75 per cent of the value of the property, or $37,500, and must make a deposit of $12,500, which means a difference in capital of $7,500.

I also take the liberty to say to the Minister of Finance that he did not have a very good argument when he answered a reporter who told him that his policy offered nothing to tenants. He made the following answer and I quote the newspaper Le Devoir of Tuesday September 18:

> Furthermore, the Minister of Finance gives nothing to the 4.5 million tenant families because "nothing was promised to them", he said.

We cannot say it is a very brilliant answer.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne refers to the creation of a social development ministry that will ensure better co-ordination of programs and spending in that sector. As I see it described in the Speech from the Throne and dreamed up by the Conservative party I suggest that this ministry will be responsible for reducing important services given to the people and not for improving the living conditions of small income citizens. However, that department has the responsibility to study thoroughy social programs of the federal and provincial governments such as the veterans pension, the old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, federal and provincial family allowances, tax credit for children, social welfare, social housing, school taxes, all those programs financed from taxes.

There are also programs paid by workers on top of their income tax, including the Canada Pension Plan, unemployment insurance, automobile insurance and work income supplement in Quebec and, in other provinces, private pension plans. There is also the Workmen's Compensation Board which is financed by companies. In fact, if we study all those programs to establish a guaranteed income policy allowing small income citizens to obtain higher allowances, I entirely agree.

Mr. Speaker, these days much is said about the proposed dismantling of Petro-Canada by selling stocks to Canadians. I believe that this decision is a real joke for small income citizens. What about older people who have only the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement? Single persons get only $325.95 a month and a couple $602.44 a month. What about people who depend on welfare—in Quebec a single person gets only $276 a month and a couple $439? What about people living on minimum wage who get only $3.47 an hour in Quebec, which adds up to $555.20 a month before taxes, not to mention the 700,000 unemployed who get from $480 to $550 a month? What do you think those citizens are going to do with two oil shares? Their first reaction will be to sell their shares to the rich, so they can eat. In a matter of months they will be the losers, because the new shareholders will ask the government to raise oil prices and subsidize their operations. Those will be the facts.

Mr. Speaker, there is a reference in the throne speech to parliamentary reform, and I quote:

> You will also be asked to consider reforms to extend the power of Parliament. Proposals will be submitted to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to strengthen the powers and resources of parliamentary committees, to accord more prominence to private members' initiatives, and to make my ministers more accountable to you. The standing committee also will be invited to consider the question of a permanent Speaker for the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, how can I believe in those reforms to give more powers to members of Parliament? How can the Prime Minister say such a thing, when he himself took powers away from his own members and even made "back-bencher" or second-class ministers by establishing an inner cabinet to control the whole cabinet? To quote from the press release issued by the Prime Minister's Office:

> Mr. Clark has announced that the reorganization of cabinet included the establishment of a main cabinet committee overseeing five policy sub-committees. The major policies of government will be developed mainly by that group.

And we note the absence of ministers to represent the majority of the people.

> The main cabinet committee, chaired by the Prime Minister, will develop government priorities and take decisions on major policy aspects stemming from those priorities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here are two documents both signed by the government, two documents which contradict one another. That is why I am anxious to see that reform. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I believe that if we are to improve the standard of living for people with low income, who are always the first to be affected by any increase in the cost of living, we will have, first, to prevent any further increase in oil prices; second, establish a policy to give subsidies to tenants; third, maintain and improve Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs; fourth, review all CMHC's programs; fifth, stop all cuts in unemployment benefits; sixth, study the possibility of allowing any citizen to retire and get old age benefits at the age of 60; and, seventh, establish a guaranteed minimum income plan.

Mr. Eric Ferguson (Saint John): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the throne speech debate in this the first session of the Thirty-first Parliament of Canada. I wish to congratulate you, sir, on your election as Speaker of this House. Your fairness and skill in carrying out your duties are well known across Canada.

Furthermore, I am delighted to congratulate the mover and seconder to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) displayed a concern for their constituencies and for Canada which, I hope, will set the tone for this session of Parliament. I would also like to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Clark) for his success on May 22. I am pleased to be part of this new government.

I have come to this House of Commons with a record of nearly 28 years of service to the public, 23½ years with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and four years as police chief for the city of Saint John, New Brunswick. Both careers were very satisfying to me. In many ways the Royal Canadian Mounted Police represents Canada to the rest of the world. My pride in being a member of that force remains undiminished and untarnished.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Malépart.]

Mr. Ferguson: It is also a particular source of pride to me to be the first police chief of a major Canadian city to be elected to the House of Commons of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ferguson: Saint John, New Brunswick, has one of the oldest police forces in North America. It has the oldest police union in the world, having been organized in 1918. Unrest in municipal police departments captures headlines in the newspapers much too often. The reasons are much too complex to describe at this time. In my present role as a member of Parliament it is my fondest wish to use my knowledge in police work to alleviate some of the problems.

As a member of the Canadian Association of Police Chiefs I was cognizant of the fact that resolutions received by the previous federal government were not given the attention they deserved. If in some way I, as a member of Parliament, can serve as a catalyst between the federal government and the police community, then I believe I will have served well.

I wish to thank the people of Saint John for having elected me. I hope I can maintain their confidence during my years in the House of Commons and serve my city and country to the best of my ability.

Mr. Speaker, I have come to Parliament to speak for the city of Saint John. I have come to speak for the factory workers, the drydock workers, for the office workers, for senior citizens and young people, for sailors and fishermen, for business and labour. Indeed, I have come to work for every citizen in the city of Saint John, and to work for Canada. I have come to speak, not with a noose in my back pocket or with a narcotic control act in my right hand, but, rather, I have come here with compassion and concern, a belief that things can be better, that we as members must do better, and I am prepared to work as hard as I am able to aid this government in bringing about necessary changes.

These necessary changes are ones which will improve the quality of life. We need, for example, to inquire into the needs of the disabled and handicapped, to strengthen the role of the voluntary sector, to extend spouses' allowances in certain circumstances, and to amend certain legislation respecting veterans. These are just a few of the programs to be considered as a means of improving life for Canadians. More will be brought in, more will be approved. More are required.

During the past five years Saint John, New Brunswick, has been the only city in Atlantic Canada where there has been a reduction in the number of federal government jobs. Indeed, in that period there has been no growth at all. In fact there has been a decrease. The previous federal government, starting in 1975, had set in motion a program designed to bankrupt the city in terms of federal positions. Thirty-seven jobs from the Department of Veterans Affairs are moving to Halifax, 77 jobs from Revenue Canada are going to St. John's, Newfoundland, and five positions in the Post Office Department are going to Halifax. I realize that this program had been set in motion by the previous government between three and five years ago. To my mind it has been a bad decision. I have met with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Baker) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. McKinnon). I have met with the Minister of State (Transport) (Mr. Howie). Mr. Speaker, if nothing can be done about the program at this stage, I ask that steps be taken to compensate for the loss of these 119 jobs. During the recent campaign I attacked the previous administration for implementing this program. The people of Saint John are now looking to me for action.

The city of Saint John bid for the 1977 summer games. The federal government of the day appointed a three-member independent sports committee to inspect the various sites in respect of which application had been made for the games. This committee gave its unqualified support to Saint John, New Brunswick. The then mayor of Saint John, Mr. Robert Lockhart, the city council and Mr. Ev. Trites, chairman of the steering committee, worked very hard, along with other members of the committee, and Saint John itself spent in excess of $60,000 putting forward a presentation which had full support from the province of New Brunswick. But in the infinite wisdom of the previous administration, a political decision was made and announced, contrary to the recommendation of the independent study. The hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde), who was then the minister responsible, made this political announcement. Mr. Speaker, the citizens of Saint John had worked their hearts out to get these games and they were all bitterly disappointed.

In 1985 Saint John will be celebrating its 200th birthday. In the same year New Brunswick has been designated to hold the summer games. To my mind there are many reasons for the games to be held in Saint John this time around, but the overriding reasons must be as follows: first, we want them in Saint John; second, the city and council have voted 100 per cent to have them there and are prepared to put up their share of the money; third, the games will provoke an unparalleled degree of community spirit which will do wonders for the city and, fourth, they will provide much-needed structures which will be of lasting benefit to the people. It will be an honour for us to welcome athletes from across the country who come to take part in the summer games of 1985. All these reasons are tremendously valid, but the overriding reasons for bringing the games to Saint John is because it will be our 200th birthday.

The Saint John harbour toll bridge in the centre of our city is a federal structure which has been plunging deeper and deeper into debt each year. This bridge was completed in September, 1968, at a cost of $18 million, and the interest on the debt in 1978 was $1.2 million. The cost of maintenance and expenses for the same year amounted to $600,000. The income from tolls in 1978 amounted to $1.3 million, leaving a net loss for the last operating year of $500,000. The total debt to date is now $26.8 million and rising.

I should like to quote from a report to the House of Commons by the Auditor General, Mr. J. J. Macdonell, on March 31, 1977:

> Revenues of the Saint John harbour bridge have been insufficient to meet principal and interest payments on the National Harbours Board loan and the advance from the Municipal Development and Loan Board. The miscellaneous loan from the Department of Finance was made to cover the shortfalls on repayments of principal and interest. In these circumstances, these loans cannot be regarded as fully collectible.

The province of New Brunswick has offered to assume the maintenance costs of the bridge provided a transfer of ownership occurs and the debt is forgiven. The bridge would then become an integral part of the provincial highway system. I would appeal the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) to forgive this debt and proceed with the transfer of ownership as soon as possible.

The port of Saint John has seen great growth in the past decade and hopes to double the present tonnage by the year 1990. I would like to express my gratitude to the hon. Richard B. Hatfield, Premier of New Brunswick, for his government's involvement in the construction of the Rodney terminal container pier. This is the only instance in Canadian history of a provincial government providing economic and political leadership in an area which is truly a federal responsibility. Had it not been for this involvement in the amount of $25 million, Saint John would surely have become a secondary port on the eastern seaboard. Indeed, we would not now be in the container business at all.

We in Saint John were pleased with the announcement by the Minister of State for Transport last June concerning a contract in excess of $13 million for port development. This expansion was very much needed and will allow our port to handle more goods more efficiently. Much more is required. With the development of great potash mines in the Sussex area only 50 miles from Saint John, terminal facilities are now required to handle the additional tonnage. The port of Saint John has an excellent labour force. We want to handle additional cargo, and I am sure the shippers we serve will be well satisfied with our performance.

My background dictates that I be concerned with the protection of human life. The time has long passed for a close investigation to be carried out not only in the port of Saint John but in every port across Canada to ensure that the safety of the workers is paramount. Too many deaths and serious injuries have taken place which could have been prevented had proper safeguards and security measures been implemented.

● (1650)

We have in the city of Saint John one of the best shipyards in Canada, if not the best. At the present time the yards employ in the vicinity of 1,800 people. The Saint John Drydock and Shipbuilding Company has the labour force, and the expertise which is required to ensure that Canada takes its rightful place in the world of super vessels. As set out in the throne speech, the Clark government will ensure an even flow of work to Canadian shipyards. This is the type of government program we welcome and encourage, one which builds on the strength of a region and promotes stability in our economy.

In order for Saint John Drydock and Shipbuilding to construct super vessels and carry out ship repairs which meet the standards of world demand, it is necessary to undertake expansion of existing facilities. We are looking to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to aid us in this goal.

We in Saint John and Atlantic Canada have a real contribution to make to Canada and to confederation. We are blessed with a wealth of natural resources and resourceful talent. Atlantic Canada is strong. We have a fine history in shipbuilding, farming, forestry, mining and fishing. We have great sea ports, beautiful beaches, and unpolluted streams. We are a good people, and that is really our strength. We look to the federal government in Saint John and in the Atlantic region for leadership and encouragement to build upon our strengths. We look to the federal government for incentives to improve our economy and lifestyle.

It is important that collectively our citizens, business, labour, and government at all levels, work hand in hand to develop our area and to make opportunities available in order that our young people can stay at home if they so choose and take their rightful place in society.

The opportunities to develop a wide range of energy resources in Atlantic Canada are unparalleled. There is great opportunity to develop our coal reserves and to explore the concept of harnessing the beautiful Bay of Fundy tides, including wave energy. It is now for us to move with haste in development and research in this regard.

On the outskirts of Saint John there is Point Lepreau, a nuclear plant which is programmed to go into operation within the next 18 months. As in most areas in the country, in Saint John there is much concern about safety. I am pleased that this government will be setting up a parliamentary committee to study all aspects of nuclear power. For Canada today nuclear power is becoming one alternative to conventional fossil fuels. Safety at all times has to be the overriding concern.

I am pleased that the government will form a youth employment secretariat. This will streamline all the federal programs under one department. Young people must have the opportunity to work and grow in this country. If the economic climate continues to affect young people from across the country adversely, we will sow seeds of disillusionment rather than seeds of hope. Every effort must be made to encourage job training and retraining for young people. This is mandatory in an ever-changing society.

In excess of 51 per cent of the people of this country are female. I am pleased that this government will place before parliament an employment strategy for women. Today only 3.5 per cent of the membership of the House of Commons are women. Not only have women been missing in significant numbers from the House of Commons, but they have also been missing from boardrooms, commissions, and the policy-making areas of our political system.

An hon. Member: How many have you hired?

Mr. Ferguson: I hired 12. In order to correct some of the injustices which have been done during the past ten years, a masterful effort will be required. This Parliament must do everything possible to provide opportunities for women to take their rightful place in society. The figures regarding women and poverty are staggering. This must be changed.

In closing, I want to talk briefly about the senior citizens of Canada. I am one of those lucky Canadians whose mother is still living. She will be 91 on November 30. She runs her own home, and she is a great campaigner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ferguson: We must do everything possible to encourage our mothers, grandmothers, fathers and grandfathers. Every member of this House must keep in mind rising prices, rising interest rates and the effect they are having on senior citizens, most of whom are living on fixed incomes. We have an obligation and a responsibility. After all, they were the builders of this nation, and it is incumbent upon us to ensure that each and every one can live in dignity.

We have much to be thankful for, and counting our blessings is not a bad motto. As a maritimer and as a Canadian I want our people to stay in this country and prosper and to build a future based on pride, dedication, and hard work. We in Saint John and all those from one end of this country to the other have the natural resources and the will to accomplish this goal. We have a great resource, our people, to meet this challenge, and there is no reason why our dreams cannot be carried to reality.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton)): Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Ferguson: Sure, I will accept a question.

Mr. Lessard: First I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Saint John (Mr. Ferguson) on his speech and, in particular, on the delivery of his speech. Although I do not agree with everything he had to say, I want to compliment him on his well-delivered speech.

I would like to ask the hon. member a question. He stated that government programming has negatively affected Saint John and that roughly 200 people will be moving away, might be moving away, or might be affected. I would like to ask the hon. member if I would be fair in stating that through DREE and its programming, and by making Saint John a special area, the previous government contributed much to the development of Saint John, the city the hon. member is so proud to be representing here today. I had the pleasure to be in Saint John and to meet the hon. gentleman. Will he agree with me that DREE has contributed much to the well-being of his city?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, it is a real honour to be asked a question by the hon. gentleman. I did meet the hon. gentleman in Saint John, and it is a beautiful city.

Yes, DREE money has come in very handy in the city of Saint John, and we need more.

Second, the great concern we had during the previous administration was that even though much DREE money was spent in Saint John, it seems strange that there is not one person working in any DREE office in my home city of Saint John. We do not have a DREE office in Saint John. If we want to deal with DREE we have to drive to Moncton, 100 miles, or to Fredericton, 60 miles. Ours is the only maritime city where in the last five years there has been a decrease in the number of federal jobs, and that situation is continuing.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate you and your assistant on you appointments to these most important posts in the House. As this is my maiden speech, I should like to say something about my riding.

For a number of reasons I am proud to represent the Laurier constituency on Montreal Island. First of all, it is quite a privilege to sit as a member in the House of Commons, the highest legislative body in Canada. My constituency, named after the eighth Prime Minister of Canada, has been represented in the past by a long list of imposing personalities. For instance, it was ably represented during the last Parliament as well as the past 15 years by the hon. Fernand Leblanc, who has been appointed to the Senate. Senator Leblanc, like all those who had preceded him in the House, had always been close to his constituents. As a matter of fact, the people of this riding have always been privileged ever since it became a constituency in 1935. Their first representative was the Hon. E. Bertrand, a minister in the St. Laurent cabinet. After his appointment to the bench, he was replaced by the Hon. J. Eugene Lefrançois, later appointed to the Senate. Its next representative was the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, a minister of transport in the Mackenzie King and St. Laurent governments, and both a minister of justice and solicitor general in the Pearson government. He was later appointed High Commissioner to London.

All those men served their country loyally and constantly. For the benefit of hon. members, I shall explain the geographic and demographic situation of the riding of Laurier. Located east of downtown Montreal, it extends from Park Avenue in the west to Papineau to the east, from Sherbrooke in the south to Bernard St. and the railway track in the north. Amongst its better known streets let us mention Laurier, St. Joseph, Parc La Fontaine, the commercial street, Mont-Royal, St. Denis, St. Louis Square and St. Laurent or the "Main", where traditionally east Montreal joins west Montreal. The population of the riding is 65 per cent Francophone and comprises several minorities of which the main one, numerically, is Portuguese. It also includes considerable numbers of Canadians of various origins: English, Greek, Spanish, Italian, Chinese and eastern European. In fact, every corner of the world is represented in the riding.

The riding has been and still is one of the areas where one of the larger numbers of immigrants settle; to my mind, it truly represents the Canadian mosaic. Some time ago, the riding had a fairly large number of Jewish people who were immortalized in the writings of Mordecai Richler. Before going any further, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express all my gratitude to the people of the riding of Laurier for welcoming me so warmly as a candidate, and electing me with quite a large majority. I hope I shall prove worthy of the trust the riding has put in me.

Mr. Speaker, as a candidate taking his first few steps in the field of politics, I have noticed a mood of impatience amongst my electors, impatience with the governments at every level which take so long to find solutions to their problems. As an example of what I mean, I should like to describe the housing situation in my riding. Since the election I have received a great number of calls from people in their sixties who, after working for 40 years, want to move into low rental housing. These are often sick people who live in those three storey houses with outside staircases, typical of eastern Montreal. They can barely keep up their homes which are often badly heated. There is a lack of low rental housing in Montreal, as was noted in a newspaper article last spring, which stated that there were 9,000 such units which were occupied, with a waiting list of over 11,000.

A related problem is the shabbiness of these houses in general in my riding. The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has a residential rehabilitation assistance program administered by the city of Montreal. The need for such a program is self-evident because our downtown areas are in dire need of renovation. However the problems that I have noted in the implementation of this program put its adequacy in question.

Some low-income tenants—some of whom have been living in the same apartment for over 30 years while others are ill and even often handicapped—have been advised that their lease will be cancelled at some future date when government approval is obtained. The owners are unable to set the rental rates before undertaking the construction. The tenants doubt that the projects will ever be undertaken but feel that the owners will rather make some superficial repairs to take advantage of government subsidies at their expense. Tenants' associations have been set up to fight against those projects or suggest some alternatives.

Mr. Speaker, when tenants move and buildings become half empty, the services worsen. The owners say that present subsidies are not high enough to meet ever soaring construction costs, with the concrete result that rents are higher after repairs and this prevents some low-income tenants from moving back into their apartment. No step has been taken to relocate the tenants during construction. In addition, there is no co-ordination between that renewal program and provincial legislation on rental which does not even allow owners to cancel leases to make repairs. Consequently the parties enter into endless legal proceedings which bring no adequate solution. I welcome the statement made by the Prime Minister last week in this debate when he said that his government would undertake to launch studies if that could lead to better solutions than those proposed by the government. I urge him and his minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to undertake a study on how this problem can be resolved as soon as possible and to refer that study to the appropriate House committee.

Mr. Speaker, unemployment is another major concern in my constituency. Not only are jobs needed, but the problem is even more far-reaching since we have to face structural unemployment. It seems to me that the young men and women graduating from high schools and community colleges do not have adequate education. They do not know how to find a job and they often have qualifications in fields where there is no job. I recall a few years ago I heard someone in the aviation industry say that his company badly needed aeronautical engineers. Unfortunately not one single student graduated from Quebec schools in that particular field that year. Canadair was faced with a similar problem; because of the success met by its Challenger operation in the last few years, it had to set up training programs for non-qualified labour.

Mr. Speaker, how could we fail to understand the growing impatience of a population faced with such permanent problems and unacceptable conditions such as the grain handlers strike in the port of Montreal, which has already been going on for five months, and a public transit strike which paralyses the whole city. If the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) were here, I would ask him how long he intends to wait before taking measures to put an end to the strike affecting the port of Montreal. That question has been put on several occasions in this House. We all know that we live in a great country whose wealth in natural resources is unparalleled and we should ask ourselves why nothing is done to solve these problems.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about the new government. It says that it is committed to efficiency and to cutting out waste. Important steps in the process of reform were initiated in the last Parliament, as has been acknowledged by a Conservative minister. But I am afraid that for the sake of satisfying its doctrinaire philosophy the government will cut out good programs and dismiss competent personnel. It has already done so. We are now losing a considerable amount of the expertise which has been assembled in Ottawa in the past 16 years.

The Anti-Inflation Board, while often criticized, accomplished much for which it will receive a general recognition in the future. During the summer I read a publication of the Board entitled "Inflation and Economic Policy", which I believe was distributed to all members of the House. The authors of the report stressed the limitations of economic policy. Because of the slowness of the economy to respond to monetary and fiscal stimulus, they favour a policy of gradual expansion. Selective measures, they said, should be used to correct weaknesses in the economy, for example, to fight structural unemployment, to which I referred earlier, and to develop particular industries. This government, with its doctrinaire philosophy, has ignored this advice. Rather than improving programs that were developed after much research and consultation with experts in many fields, it has wastefully committed $2 billion annually for a housing program that everyone knows is not a housing program.

Another important program which has suffered from budget cuts is the Canada Works program which provided employment and tangible social services to my riding and many others with high unemployment. I have received dozens of calls, from distressed older persons in particular, who benefited from this program in the past and are at a loss to make do in the months ahead. I urge the government to restore the program to its original levels. Unfortunately I feel my words and those of my colleagues fall on deaf ears.

We in Quebec have been preoccupied with the referendum. It is part of our daily lives. Bill 101 has been confusing for many English Canadians in Quebec and across Canada who have difficulty reconciling the apparent contradiction of a unilingual Quebec with a bilingual Canada. Initiatives by the Parti Québécois to shift the burden of bilingualism, as they put it, and to give Quebec a French face, have created tensions and led to economic loss and hardship. Some aspects of Bill 101 are clearly excessive and will be changed by a Liberal government, but English Canadians must recognize the concern which French Canadians have for the survival of the French language, as well as the economic consequences that language has for French Canadians to this day.

Most Canadians rebel at the thought of legally obliging children to attend French schools, yet in many cases French Canadians have always been forced to learn English in order to earn a living, which in effect amounts to the same thing. Furthermore, no matter what language legislation is adopted, or even if Quebec achieves independence, any French Canadian who wishes to advance in many areas of human endeavour will have to learn English.

Perhaps no aspect of Liberal policy was more controversial and misunderstood than the previous government's efforts to create a sense of belonging to Canada for French Canadians, and yet no policy was more vital to the survival of our country. I must confess that I have great difficulty in understanding the begrudging manner in which some English Canadians greet the French presence in our country. I am proud of our two principal languages. On a trip to Cape Breton Island some years ago I was pleasantly surprised to find a number of French villages along the coast which, in spite of all obstacles, had managed to keep their language, culture, and character. The French language outside of Quebec is like a precious flower Canadians must cherish.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), in a speech to the Canadian Association of Broadcasters in Winnipeg in April, 1977, tried to explain the objectives of the government's language Policy. He said that sometimes he wished that the government had never described the official languages policy as "bilingualism", because the word apparently implied the intent that all Canadians learn two languages. Also he said:

> Such is not our intent at all. What we have is simply a program for . . . greater equality between two languages, either one or the other of which is spoken by virtually every Canadian.

In trying to explain what language means to people he said:

> Just as when you speak English, when a Quebecker speaks French it is something he does naturally and automatically—almost like breathing. That is precisely why language is so important: because when you limit a person's use of his language, it is almost like interfering with his breathing. When we cannot speak our own language, we feel stifled, a bit as if we are choking.

This speech was made several months after the election of the Parti Québécois. Also our leader tried to explain why Quebeckers had voted as they did. He referred to the economic opportunities which had been denied to French Canadians in private industry. He tried to explain why the air traffic controllers dispute had become such a potent symbol to Quebeckers. He said that he felt it was in large part because the most visibly modern, future-oriented job sector of aviation seemed to be saying to Quebeckers that the tasks, in which other people all over the world are normally able to use their own language, are ones in which they may never look forward to using the French language in Quebec.

He stated that in Quebec the private sector would have to provide more opportunity for French Canadians to work hard and make decent progress using the French language only. On the national level, corporate business and other private organizations would have to make room for and share more power with the French Canadian who speaks English. Provincial and municipal governments would have to offer more administrative and educational services in French in areas where there were important French-speaking minorities. The federal government was quite willing to share costs in this respect. Our leader concluded by saying that our country could remain united only if French Canadians wished to and were able to participate fully in Canadian society.

It is evident that Mrs. Stephenson, the minister of education of Ontario, has not listened to these important words in refusing to establish a separate French school in Penetanguishene because of the cost. Also it is evident that some of those industries which have left Quebec in the last several years did not hear these words or did not care to hear them. In the final analysis they have done a great disservice to our country.

Just last week Canada's Commissioner of Official Languages remarked that Canada must become a comfortable and acceptable homeland for French-speaking Canadians or the country will not survive. Mr. Yalden said:

> Language reform is not an option for Canada, it is a basic requirement. Without it there will be no Canada, at least not as we have known it.

Notwithstanding the substantial efforts made by my leader and his government, we face today the greatest crisis in our history. It is a crisis which concerns all Canadians, not just those living in Quebec. In his remarks in this debate last week, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) stated that it was the duty of all members of this House to speak to the people of Quebec about a strong Canada and about maintaining our confederation. With all due respect, I believe that that duty extends to the rest of Canada as well. Each and every member of this House has the duty to explain the reality of this country to his constituents because, in the final analysis, as the Pepin-Robarts commission stated, it is only through a change in attitudes on the part of all Canadians that we will solve our national unity crisis. I have felt for some time that it is only through accommodation, generosity, vision, and will on the part of all Canadians, that Canada will survive and prosper.

But as our leader has pointed out, it seems that our language problem may be only one manifestation of a greater problem, a crisis of our national will. We are witnessing today the balkanization of our country where there is no national interest, just the interests of the provinces. The arguments of our leader are lightly dismissed as having no practical application by those scrambling aboard the bandwagon of decentralization. When our leader was prime minister he was often accused of being insensitive to the demands of certain parts of the country, and of seeing matters in only one light. I agree with the opinion expressed by a member of the government party last week when he said that the people of western Canada had judged our leader very harshly and that history will judge him with greater kindness and greater objectivity.

This country is not as easy to manage as the present government believed when it was in opposition. The solutions are not straightforward as they are now finding. I urge the right hon. Prime Minister not to dismiss the warnings of our leader out of hand. There are many, many Canadians who are now starting to ask, "What chance does Canada have?"

For those who feel that national interest has no practical application, I should like to remind the House of the impediments to the free movement of capital and labour which have been established in our country in recent years. During my election campaign I met a number of construction workers in my riding who were accustomed to working in Ontario when the industry was slow in Quebec. Thanks to the construction war between the two provinces they can no longer do so. I believe that is an area which falls within the domain of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander), and I would ask him to undertake everything possible to attempt to ensure that we restore the free movement of labour for the benefit of all Canadian workers.

If I may, I should like to suggest a policy which could provide inestimable benefits for the whole of Canada. Every Canadian knows that the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway was a vital element in establishing a country from coast to coast. It was essential to provide a cheap efficient system of transportation. The world today is struggling with the problem of providing sufficient energy for its needs while Canada is struggling to compete in world markets. In spite of our vast energy resources we are not divorced from this problem, as the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has found out in recent weeks and months.

Perhaps the profits from our energy resources should be devoted to developing a system of high speed intercity rail passenger transportation which would conserve energy and provide employment. Investment in such high technology areas would certainly reap dividends in exports as well. I believe Canada's subsidies for uneconomic passenger services for 1977 amounted to approximately $196 million. The United States will spend $800 million in fiscal 1979 in subsidies to Amtrack. For those people who think that is enough for a country of that size, I should like to point out the figures I have of subsidies for intercity rail passenger services in European countries and Japan. Britain spent $700 million in 1978, France spent $900 million, Italy spent $1.5 billion, and Japan spent $4.1 billion. Is it any wonder that North Americans, and more particularly Canadians, are the highest per capita users of energy in the world?

I, and others in this House, represent a generation of Canadians who grew up in the 1960s. We have heard for years and years of the greatness of Canada, about its potential, its people, its rich resources, its oceans, its farmlands and its cities. I would like to think that I might be able to say to this House on behalf of my generation that we feel it is time to act.

A Liberal colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis), stated earlier in the week that it was embarrassing to have to admit to foreigners that our constitution is still in England. I agree with that feeling. It is time we patriated our constitution. It is time it was amended to give the provinces what is rightfully theirs, but also to provide for the national interest. We must put these matters behind us so that we can begin to realize our potential. We want leadership from this House and from our governments. I for one do not want to be sitting here 15 years from now rehashing the same arguments we have heard for the last ten years, especially on this side of the House.

In spite of the differences of opinion among the members of this House, we share a belief in the future of Canada. Sometimes we will have occasion to be discouraged, but that should not diminish our purpose. Some time ago I read a statement by Walter Cronkite which perhaps indicates why I am in this House today. I am sure that similar motives have spurred other members of this House, and I should like to read this. When asked what he would tell kids getting out of school today in an age when a diploma no longer has the clout it had, he said:

> I tell them . . . that the challenges are so immense that it's an absolute crime and a sin not to get involved in attempting to meet these challenges, and to try to find solutions to the problems . . . one could be justifiably pessimistic about the state of the world and the survival of man . . . (kids) can become very cynical. They can say, "Why fight it, let me get mine in any way I can", or drop out—but not fight the problems. But they've got to fight the problems and it should be a great adventure to fight the problems—that's what I try to tell them. It ought to be great to get out there and see if you can make the thing work.

[Mr. Berger.]

Let us face these challenges with confidence and resolve, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, permit me, sir, to express the pride I feel at being a small part of the new government and to participate here as the new member of Parliament for Edmonton-Strathcona. With others here I have an opportunity not only to bring the concerns of my constituents to this body, but I hope as well to bring a little youthful idealism to some national issues.

Last week the opinion was expressed by an hon. member opposite that the Conservatives are so busy preaching what is right, they have forgotten what is good. I cannot accept, sir, the separation of that which is right from that which is good. This common sense principle has not, unfortunately, been applied in the governing of this country during the past years. The consequences of not having done so have been serious and have left the new government a legacy of urgent and threatening problems, problems which affect us not only as individual citizens, but as members of a free and democratic society.

The difficulties Canada faces today cannot, of course, be laid solely at the feet of past leadership. We are caught, along with the rest of the world, in the dilemmas of modern man. Ours is an age characterized by dissolution of tradition and old values. Ours is an age of unlimited expectation and increasingly limited means. Most crucially, we are in an age when it is not uncommon for those who govern, for those who administer the rules, to have lost faith in their own legitimacy.

Little wonder, then, that citizens question the legitimacy of rules. It is for this very reason, namely, to re-establish the trust and belief in the legitimacy of government, that the basis of governmental decision making must be rooted in what we believe is right rather than that which is merely expedient under the circumstances.

What is at stake in this kind of decision making is not Progressive Conservatism or Liberalism, or any other "partyism", but the ability to think clearly about what can and cannot be done to resolve the problems Canada faces today.

The most imminent of such problems is the presence of chronic inflation, in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of the vast majority of my constituents, at least; inflation which wipes out savings, impoverishes pensioners, rewards speculators, punishes many hard-working citizens, discourages private investment and productivity, and hinders trade competitiveness.

Helmut Schmidt, Chancellor of West Germany, has said that "inflation for economies is a killer disease". The symptoms of this disease are manifest both in a nation as a whole and in the workings of government. Inflation has also taken a toll on national morality. Witness the recklessness of consumer buying, the underlying insecurity, the loosening of responsibility at all levels of society, and the growing lack of respect for older pillars of society, including parents.

The symptoms of inflation are evident in our government's reluctant acceptance of three recent hikes in the bank rate of the Bank of Canada, raises increasingly damaging to the ordinary citizen, homeowner, farmer, and businessman alike.

The fact is, sir, in my opinion, that we are presently reacting to a situation created during the past six or seven years during which time our federal government spent more than it raised, financed its debts on credit, and intentionally inflated the supply of paper dollars. In an effort to do good, to meet the pleas in favour of social betterment, the previous government provided a lot of bad examples to Canadians.

Our major economic problems today stem in large measure, sir, from the inflationary bias of past government policies, policies which motivated citizens to spend too much and to save too little. Federal taxes, the budget and monetary policies all promoted immediate consumption instead of investment for the future. The result has been a less productive work force, a reduction in real growth, and an upswing in expectations. The reason has been too much money chasing too few goods.

From 1968 to 1978 the Canadian money supply, as defined by "M1", increased by approximately 160 per cent. During this time real economic growth in our country was about 54 per cent. The general price level in the economy increased by 106 per cent, a percentage very close to the amount of new money printed in a vain attempt to prime the pump or spur the economy.

One has to ask, I think on all sides of the House, why the previous government permitted the money supply growth to reach the point where the governor of the Bank of Canada now must talk about braking? A most important reason, of course, was the need to finance the rising federal debt brought on by deficit after deficit. Deficits can hardly be blamed on the Bank of Canada. In the period from 1968 to 1978 federal spending nearly quintupled.

Americans are worried about their current deficit of $30 billion, yet proportionately our current deficit is nearly three times the size. In U.S. terms the Canadian deficit would be more than $110 billion.

After the election, approximately 39 per cent of persons interviewed by Gallup pollsters indicated they considered rising prices or inflation to be Canada's number one problem. Our deficit is too high and the reduction of that deficit is one of the government's main tasks. Our government is pledged to curb government spending, but it will take real toughness to bring that deficit under control. Inflation must be attacked at its root cause. Not only must there be a cutback in deficit spending, excessive expansion of the monetary base must be stopped.

● (1730)

Being a lawyer, I believe in consulting precedents, especially when those precedents are impressive. West Germany is a country with a rock solid economy. During 1978, West Germany had a trade surplus of $21 billion. Its GNP is expected to grow more than 4.5 per cent in 1979. Inflation is not expected to exceed 4 per cent. Helmut Schmidt believes that the first among the greatest world problems is the notion—I am paraphrasing—to consume more than is produced and to fill in the gap by printing money. I believe we should heed Chancellor Schmidt's advice. The opinion of Mr. Schmidt is already shared by a number of economists both in the United States and Canada.

The solutions they propose include the following measures: first, consistent policies of moderate monetary growth; second, long-term tax incentives to encourage saving and investment; third, working toward balancing the budget and discouraging excessive consumer spending; fourth, reduction in government spending; fifth, the scrapping of destructive and wasteful government regulations, and sixth, a reduction of the government's over-all role in the economy in order to encourage personal incentive and private sector competition. The direction of the new government as revealed in the throne speech is very much in the direction of these proposals.

Like others in this House on all sides, I suspect, I am perplexed by the latest bank rate increase. It has given Canadians the highest real cost of borrowing in Canadian history—much higher than in the United States because inflation in that country is now running at about 14 per cent compared to about 9 per cent in this country. I am aware that the United States must try to keep its nominal interest rates above its inflation rate. But if inflation in that country goes to, say, 30 per cent because of bad fiscal, energy, and monetary policy in Washington, must this mean that the bank rate in Canada will automatically go 33 per cent or 34 per cent as well?

I realize that our central bank defends such increases as being necessary to maintain the value of our dollar in foreign exchange markets. But surely the difference in our current inflation rates must inevitably cause our dollar to move upward relative to the United States dollar. As for our balance of payments problem as a whole, I am persuaded that there are now probably more basic cures than monetary ones, such as exporting some of our surplus natural gas, moving more export grain, etc.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I believe that inflation has completely destroyed the credibility of the previous government, as well as the value of Canadian dollars. Borrowing by the government in the past has primarily been to hide an inept economic performance, and intentionally to keep the fly wheel of inflation turning. There we can vividly see an example of where expediency took precedence over right. The new government has an enormous task ahead of it. It will take a great effort, and courage, to curb expenditures. Nevertheless, this task is a vital one. Otmar Emminger, head of West Germany's equivalent of the United States Federal Reserve, has said that "inflation is like a dictator—it must be fought before it becomes established, or it is too late".

Next to the state of the economy the most serious concern of the people in Edmonton-Strathcona appears to me to be the growing violent crime rate in the west, and in Edmonton in particular. The 1977 Statistics Canada figures indicate that Edmonton had more violent crimes than any other major Canadian city. The violent crime rate per capita was more than double the average for Canada as a whole. From 1977 to 1978, for instance, murders in Edmonton increased by fully 85 per cent.

The increase in crime is also apparent in the whole Canadian context, evident in the national crime rate, which has gone up about 152 per cent during the last sixteen-year period, with crimes of violence approximately doubling. The disturbing fact is that crime rates have been rapidly going up in a period when Canadians have been enjoying both rapidly improving living standards and social services. How can this be explained?

Charles E. Silberman, author of "Criminal Violence, Criminal Justice", a fairly recently published work, notes that most crime is committed by people between the ages of 14 and 25 years of age. Silberman believes many of these adolescents are committing crimes because of the weakening of adult social controls.

I noted before that we live in an age where the old values are being questioned. This is equally true of our criminal justice system. After all, our justice system reflects the predominant social values of the day. The criminal law was originally fashioned with the idea that citizens entered into the social contract with the understanding that society would guarantee, or at least put a premium on, their lives, dignity, and right to possessions. Especially during the past decade our criminal justice system changed its emphasis from that of reform to that of rehabilitation, based on social scientists' convictions that most crime is rooted in environmental causes. The concept of rehabilitation has undeniably proved to be a failure. By the 1970s it had become clear that prisons were not effectively rehabilitating prisoners. The same faces were appearing in front of the courts with startling regularity.

It has also become clear that present parole laws have not been very effective. A 1974 study of penitentiary parole by the solicitor general's office showed that 53.7 per cent of the individuals released were back in prison within five years of their release.

I believe I am justified in saying that there is a growing conviction in the country that the mild treatment of convicted violent criminals, and I would stress "violent", has contributed to soaring crime rates. More important, there is an increasing fear of criminals by the citizens of this country, a fear that is gradually turning into real resentment.

A society in which crime goes without real punishment and victims receive no justice for their injury is a society that may turn to vigilante justice. Witness the increasing numbers of Canadians inclined to favour capital punishment.

Our criminal justice system constitutes a key element of our social fabric. It follows, in my opinion, that people will act, to some extent, according to how they believe society views their actions. A sentence not commensurate with the gravity of the crime indicates to the violent offender that his action is not regarded by society as a serious breach of social norms. Would not criminals be more effectively deterred by raising the penalties involved in violent crime as well as raising the opportunities and rewards offered by a non-criminal existence?

[Mr. Kilgour.]

Cynicism and indifference to good and evil are products of a society that is less concerned with the needs of those who observe its rules than with those who break them. Guidance respecting acceptable social behaviour must be provided in our social structure, especially for the young members of our society. The starting point for this, of course, should be the family and the educational system. These institutions must be reinforced by our justice system, through measures that, first, provide sentences commensurate with the severity of violent crimes; second, distinguish between the professional criminal and the occasional offender; and third, implement common sense rules with respect to parole and bail.

[Translation]

The last point I wish to bring to the attention of the House is the constitutional matter. The Quebec referendum, coming along with the recent provincial disagreements, will give great urgency to the problems related to the nature of Canadian federalism, as it is described in our constitution. The last century has obviously brought drastic changes to the structure of Canada. The growth of technological innovation as well as the growing diversity within Canada have required changes to the role of governments. These changes have been accompanied by growing confusion over the relations between the national and provincial governments.

Many Canadians, particularly in western Canada and in Quebec, have considered the policies of the previous regime to be harmful to the true federal system. The impact of these policies indicates that a number of citizens regard Ottawa as monolithic and insensitive to provincial needs, contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act.

It is becoming even more obvious that the provinces are little inclined to melt into a unitary and centralized state like France or Great Britain. The provinces believe that under such conditions the value of the language, the cultural traditions and their respective economic environment, which vary from one province to another, could become sources of frictions and debates. Also they think that it could be very harmful for our national unity.

The centralist point of view of Canada which considers the provinces as creations of the Canadian Parliament has indeed been refuted by the judiciary committee of the Privy Council since 1892 when it rejected the centralist argument in the case of the Maritime Bank, by upholding the intent behind the British North America Act which was neither to weld all the provinces together into one single state nor to subordinate the provincial governments under a central authority.

A country as large as Canada cannot be governed by and from Ottawa alone. If it were not a federal system, like a ten-link chain, it would be disunited. The Canadian economy cannot be designed to feed central Canada. A chain can be strong only if its links themselves are strong.

As for Quebec, it is imperative that there be significant resolve at the provincial level. Because of its cultural and linguistic make-up, Quebec has need of a strong judicial and political structure to protect its interests and remain part of Canada. Few Quebeckers think that the changes in the constitution suggested by the former government were in fact based on the wish to protect provincial rights, when in fact nothing was done by that government in the last eight years to better the constitutional position of the provinces within confederation.

Whatever past errors may have been, time has come for all Canadians to express their devotion to Quebec. Canada and Quebec have need of one another if Canadians want to continue proving that citizens of various cultures and origins can build a country worthy of the envy of the whole wide world. Tearing it apart now, as the former prime minister said, would be "a sin against humanity". It is very easy for us, Canadians, who feel the same way, to recognize the need for such changes as will achieve a realistic balance between the provincial and federal governments.

In considering the changes in the constitution that would help national unity, attention could be concentrated on the following factors: regional disparities, Senate reform, entrenching the Supreme Court in the constitution, federal government purchasing power, entrenching the Canadian Bill of Rights. The new Clark government recognizes that a truly federal system demands that there be consultations between the responsible governments through federal-provincial conferences. In addition, it recognizes that the provinces must have a broad enough base on which to set up efficiently the institutional and economic foundation of their own economies with a view to meeting their development need better.

[English]

I have mentioned briefly three problem areas which, if not checked, could constitute a very real threat to the fundamental principles of our society.

The dilemma we face, as far as inflation is concerned, is that the methods used by the previous government to resolve tensions in the economy are the very methods which are most likely to undermine the foundations of our social system. In my opinion they have, to a substantial degree, destroyed our trust in money itself, the instrument of exchange through which we conduct all of our economic affairs.

It was Abraham Lincoln who said, "You can't bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift... You cannot help the wage-earner by pulling down the wage-payer... You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money... You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could do for themselves."

Second, with respect to the problem of crime, we must remember that law and order are a matter of civilization. When there is no proper control over crime, a proper social order simply cannot be maintained. Thus crime threatens the social order in much the same way as does totalitarianism.

Criminal law in itself can never bring about a good society. However, it helps provide the framework within which a society can function.

Finally, with regard to the constitution, it must be remembered that in its expressive sense the constitution is a communication from the people to their governors of how they have asserted their freedoms and responsibilities. The federal government must be sensitive to this true spirit of our constitution and acknowledge its partnership role with the provinces in the governing of the nation.

The answers to the above problems have no easy solutions. There are no promising new doctrines or panaceas; there are only difficult and perhaps unpleasant choices. The root causes of these problems cannot be dealt with by experts or by abstract theories. They must be tackled by common sense people from a commonsense perspective that to effect something good one must proceed on the basis of what is right. This government, as the representative of the Canadian people, has the primary responsibility to proceed from the right to the good.

With the serious danger of chronic inflation, growing crime, and the threat to national unity, Canadians and the new government must recognize that this is a time for strength, a time for good will, a time for understanding and determination on all of our parts.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I want to join with many others in congratulating the two new members of Parliament who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I agree with other hon. members that the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) performed well, and I know that their constituents will be extremely proud of them. All members in this House on the opening day of Parliament, that day of tradition, were pulling for these new members. We wanted them to do well, and they certainly did not fail us.

I want to say how pleased I am as a member of Parliament from northern Ontario that one of ours, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), is once again the occupant of the Speaker's chair. It was my privilege to be associated with Mr. Speaker for one year during the Thirtieth Parliament in the capacity of deputy chairman of the whole House. That experience for me was not only enjoyable in every respect, but also it was an excellent opportunity to learn more about the intricacies of the procedures in this House, those mysteries of which the gentlemen at the Table know all, and when we go to them, will reveal to us what we need to know. During that year of working with Mr. Speaker I came to respect his quick mind and to appreciate his many talents and abilities.

I am now entering my twelth year as a member of this great democratic institution, the federal Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Alexander: The class of '68.

• (1750)

Mr. Penner: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) says the class of '68. That, of course, is not a very long period of service compared to some, but I can say to the new members of Parliament in this House that those nearly dozen years have gone by like an instant. So full, so demanding, and so challenging has the life and work of being a member of Parliament been, that time quite literally does fly.

A cynical friend of mine once said that one should never take up an occupation, profession or career that you enjoy too much because, if you do, you will find that it makes your life pass too quickly. My cynical friend would be ill-advised ever to enter active politics or become involved in public life, because he would discover that one's life does indeed pass by quickly. Weeks become like days, and years are often like months.

When I was called upon to speak a few minutes ago, I was identified by you, Mr. Speaker, as the member for Cochrane. That identification is still somewhat new to me, because for over a decade in this House, I was the member of Parliament for Thunder Bay. I should briefly explain that the old constituency of Thunder Bay was a large rural riding in northern Ontario. It was entirely rural, and included no part of what is now the city of Thunder Bay. That is all a little bit confusing.

To compress the story, boundaries were changed through the process of redistribution, and much could be said about how badly that was handled in the province of Ontario. I do not know about other provinces, but in my province it was done in a less than satisfactory manner. At any rate, as a result of that process, one third of the old Thunder Bay riding was joined with three quarters of the previous Cochrane riding to create what I call the new constituency of Cochrane.

No member of Parliament could ask for a better riding to represent in the Parliament of Canada. There may be, and I am sure there are, some that are as good, but there can be none better than the constituency of Cochrane. There are, for example, in the constituency of Cochrane French-speaking Canadians, English-speaking Canadians, new Canadians from all over the globe, and native Canadians, the original Canadians, and they live together in this part of northern Ontario in relative harmony and in an atmosphere of good will. The many differences among us are not merely tolerated, they are in fact respected.

The people of Cochrane are strong minded. They live in a developing region of this country, a resource rich region. What takes them there indicates that in character they would be strong willed and strong minded. In addition, they are politically astute. Allow me to illustrate what I mean.

This lesson of political astuteness was well learned when the party that now forms the minority government opposite and their national president came into the Cochrane riding to try to manipulate the political situation in such a way that it would serve their interests. The story is on record in the newspapers of the time. To put it very quickly and simply, the situation which they tried to manipulate blew up in their faces. The imprint of egg on some Tory visages will be difficult to erase for a long time to come. It gives us something to laugh about and we certainly need that, especially when the winter months come with the chilly Arctic winds sweeping down upon our bushland and into our scattered towns and small villages. A good belly laugh at that time does a lot to help the circulation.

Incidentally, I should point out that some of our television viewers in northern Ontario are now able to enjoy, thanks to satellite communications, programs all the way from Atlanta, Georgia. Atlanta has come to have a special interest for us in the Cochrane riding. We understand that this place in the southern United States is now the heavenly emporium for forlorne floorwalkers who have stumbled and fallen in the service of nation and party.

During the course of this so-called throne speech debate members on this side of the House have used a variety of terms in seeking to describe the present Government of Canada accurately. Thus, we have heard reference to frittering, inexperience, naivete, and confusion. Many have spoken about the government's unsureness, uncertainty, and lack of clarity. Some have been so bold as to suggest that what we see opposite is vacillation and evasion, and that the throne speech is, to quote one member, without commitment to anything.

When I observe the actions of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp), a minister whose activities I will be following with considerable interest during the life of this Parliament as the critic for Northern Development, the word which springs into my mind is none of the ones I have already mentioned. Rather, the word that comes to my mind is ineptitude.

I, and others on this side of the House, regret very much that such a distinguished member as the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Holmes) was not given the portfolio of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. How long and how hard this man laboured in the opposition vineyard as the critic for this important area of responsibility! He gained much respect for his diligence and the degree of understanding which he acquired during those many years. Now what is his reward? His reward is to play no more than second fiddle to the maestro from Provencher who is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I want to talk about some of the activities of that minister, particularly in initiating, without coming to this House, some very significant constitutional changes in the Yukon territory. Perhaps with Your Honour's consent and the consent of all members I can begin that topic tomorrow, and now call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HARDSHIP CAUSED BY RISING PRICES AND INTEREST RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the sharp increase in the cost of living announced today of 9.6 per cent, the highest since last May, an increase which reflects increases in the cost of oil and natural gas and in interest rates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans):

That this government be condemned for its intention to increase the price of gasoline and fuel oil by some 30 per cent and for its interest rate policy, which are causing hardships for consumers, small business people and Canadians generally.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the total absence of a regional economic development strategy in the Speech from the Throne, and the stated objective of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) when he was in opposition that regional development would be central in his party's economic policies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of State for Economic Development, sitting in the other place, be removed from the inner cabinet and his chairmanship of the economic development committee and be replaced immediately by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS—REQUEST CERTAIN MINISTERS RESIGN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the recent conflicting statements both inside and outside the House by Conservative cabinet ministers on the trucking affair, and in view of the serious constitutional question arising from the intervention by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) and a possible prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act and, finally, in view of the complete lack of understanding on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) of the serious nature of this question, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House call upon the Prime Minister to remove from his cabinet the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and the Minister of Justice pending a comprehensive inquiry into these very serious matters.

Mr. Speaker: Is there consent for the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

RECOGNITION OF AWARD TO MOTHER TERESA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of this House to introduce an urgent and important motion.

In view of the exceptional work she has done for 30 years to the most disinherited people of our planet, and in view of the universal recognition which was given yesterday to Mother Teresa of Calcutta, who was awarded the 1979 Nobel Peace Prize, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald):

That the House of Commons send a congratulatory message to the new recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize who was granted this honour for the great and exceptional services she has given to humanity.

● (1110)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Notwithstanding the considerable degree of collaboration involved in the presentation of this motion, I hope the House will forgive me if I again issue a caveat about using Standing Order 43 for congratulatory motions. I shall not disallow the present motion, however; it is obvious there is a great deal of agreement with regard to it. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DISASTERS

DESIGNATION OF DISASTER AREAS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to propose a motion which I hope will receive unanimous consent.

In view of the fact that a tornado devastated parts of Oxford, Brant and Haldimand-Norfolk counties in southern Ontario on August 7 last, causing a total of $60 million in damage to crops, orchards, livestock, barns, homes, equipment, and so on, of which $20 million was uninsured, and in view of the fact that the federal government will not or cannot contribute to a disaster fund until the provincial government has contributed a sum equal to the total population of that province—a very unfair and archaic scheme—I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That the federal government introduce legislation which would allow it to declare areas devastated by natural elements as natural disaster areas which would be eligible for direct federal relief funding in addition to any other funding.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 permit the introduction of this motion for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

CONTINUATION OF VIA RAIL SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

[Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke).]

On October 28, an order in council passed by the previous government which delayed a planned reduction of VIA Rail daily transcontinental passenger train service along the CNR main line in northern Ontario will expire. When the order in council was passed, the Canadian Transport Commission suspended hearings on the planned reduction in service which were to be held in communities along the CN main line including Capreol and Sioux Lookout. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chenier):

That this House urge the Minister of Transport to extend the order in council so as to further postpone implementation of the final plan for western transcontinental passenger service in order that extensive hearings may be held by the Canadian Transport Commission, especially in those communities between Capreol and Winnipeg on the CNR main line which will be most affected.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion can be put to the House for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST REPRESENTATIONS BE MADE TO LA SOCIÉTÉ CÂBLEVISION NATIONALE LTÉE RESPECTING CONTRACTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the growing dissatisfaction of the people in the Quebec City area with the quality of services provided by Câblevision Nationale Ltée, a dissatisfaction heightened by the strike of the company's employees which for several weeks now has drastically curtailed cablevision services to most people in the Quebec City area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet):

That the House ask the Minister of Communications to make the necessary representations to the CRTC so that the federal organization will strongly intervene to bring Câblevision Nationale Ltée to abide by their commitments to the people of the Quebec City area.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

CHILD CARE DROP-OUT PERIOD—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I might also add, Mr. Speaker, that I do so on an appropriate day, since it is 50 years ago today that people actually became people.

In view of a report by the National Council of Welfare that the poorest of all Canadians are elderly widows who worked hard all their lives but who had little attachment to the labour force because of child-rearing responsibilities, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery);

That the House request the Prime Minister to urge his friend the Premier of Ontario to withdraw his objection to an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan which would allow for a "child care drop-out period" thereby providing most homemakers with non-stop pension coverage.

Mr. Speaker: The motion may be put to the House only by unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE REVIEW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: In moving a motion under Standing Order 43, I want to see if the circumstances are as urgent and pressing on this side as they are on the other, and if my motion is equally as effective.

In view of the inhibiting effect which the Official Secrets Act appears to have on the government in its attempt to provide more openness, because of the anomaly of professing respect for human rights in other countries while this law permits such cases as that of Dr. Peter Treu, Bernard Maguire and others to exist in Canada, and because this House has a responsibility to the people of Canada to move quickly to remedy this intolerable situation, I move:

That this House recommends that a parliamentary standing or select committee be forthwith given an order of reference to review the terms of the present act, including a study of such recent cases as that of Dr. Peter Treu and The Toronto Sun and to report proposals for suitable changes to the Official Secrets Act, and that no claim of Crown privilege be allowed to limit the extent of inquiry by the committee.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion, seconded by Mr. Nowlan. Does the House adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

NORTHERN PIPELINES

FOOTHILLS' PROJECT—DATE OF GOVERNMENT'S STATED PREFERENCE TO U.S.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I wish to follow up the line of questioning which was begun yesterday on the so-called preference of the Government of Canada for the Foothills' pipeline project.

The Prime Minister made clear in his answers yesterday that it was clear to the government of the United States and clear to the Government of Canada what the preference was throughout the summer. I draw to the attention of the Prime Minister a statement made by his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on August 23 of this summer—or perhaps the beginning of the fall—in which to the question, "Is Canada going to have to re-endorse the Foothills' proposal," the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources replied:

Well, I think the position that we are taking as a new government is that we are going to review the alternatives and I simply think it's premature to indicate a position on the matter now.

That was August 23, when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could not indicate a position of the government on this matter. In the light of this fact, will the Prime Minister now admit that the first occasion that the Government of Canada made its position known to the government of the United States was on September 28, and that his government had lost four months in promoting this very important project?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that a day, or two days before the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the Foothills' proposal had been substantially changed at the request and decision of the Foothills group.

What the minister was responding to was a question in relation to the position of the Government of Canada with regard to a position by Foothills which had recently been changed. The fact remains that throughout all of this there has never been any doubt in the minds of the Americans or of Foothills about the position of the Government of Canada, a position of expressing great concern about the consequences of tanker traffic down the west coast and a position of support for the Foothills' proposal so long as that Foothills' proposal was before the NEB.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am really astonished at the answer of the Prime Minister, when the transcript of the interview makes it quite clear that the questioning was not about any alterations in the proposal of the Foothills group but, clearly, as to the preference of the Government of Canada for any route.

The next question that was asked was, what is the status of the former government's commitment? In other words, the minister was being asked whether the present government supports the position taken in April by the former government, or, what is the status of the former government's commitment? The answer was:

Well, I think that a new government is going to look at the alternatives and I don't want to suggest in any way that the review itself means that we're either going to change or not change, but I just think that that process obviously has to be . . . that we have a chance to look and have a fresh view of all the alternatives and, accordingly, when that process is over, our position will be made clear to the United States, to the President of the United States.

Will the Prime Minister tell me, now, how it is that the government of the United States could be clear about the preference of the Canadian government, when on August 23 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said in an interview that the process was not over and that when the process was completed, the view of the Government of Canada would be made known to the government of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my answer because the question has now been repeated for three days. The hon. member, the former minister, knows that the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was made in the immediate aftermath, immediately after the change of position by Foothills.

What the opposition is trying to do is to suggest that there was doubt in the mind of Foothills or doubt in the mind of the Americans as to the position of the Government of Canada. There was no doubt at all. They have no evidence that there was any doubt. No doubt has been expressed by the representatives of either the U.S. government or the Foothills group. Indeed, on September 6, when officials of this government met in regular session with officials of the United States, once again the position of support for the Foothills' line of concern about the consequences of tanker traffic was made very clear. The hon. member will have to try some other issue.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with the comment of the Prime Minister when he said that there was no doubt in the minds of the American government as to the position of the Government of Canada. I want to draw to his attention a public document, made public by the United States government last August 24, in which it is stated that the Canadian government had been requested to provide the United States government with its preference. The last sentence of that paragraph from which I will quote reads:

[Mr. Clark.]

To date, no official word has been received from Canada as to preference of possible action on applications.

Will the Prime Minister deal with that now?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. That statement was in the immediate wake of the change in the proposal put forward by Foothills.

FOOTHILLS' PROJECT—DATES OF REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S.

Hon. John C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Prime Minister if he would supply us with the dates, the times, and to whom his minister or he himself made representations to, in the United States government or to the President of the United States with reference to Canada's position in favour of Foothills.

Would he please honour this House and answer the question and let us know precisely what those dates and times were and who initiated the meetings?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): The first meeting was on June 6 of the ambassador of Canada with secretary Schlesinger; the next meeting was on June 15 of a representative of the embassy of Canada in Washington with officials of the Department of Interior of the United States; then a meeting on August 3 of the ambassador of Canada and representatives of the State Department of the United States; then a meeting on August 21 of the ambassador of Canada with officials of the State Department and the Energy Department of the United States; then a meeting on September 6, as I have indicated frequently, consisting of consultations on energy, including senior officials in Ottawa; then a meeting on September 21 between the ambassador of Canada and Secretary Duncan; a meeting on September 23 between the embassy of Canada and officials of the State Department; and a meeting on September 28 for delivery of an aide-mémoire.

● (1125)

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, can the Prime Minister assure the House that on each and every occasion of the meetings to which he just referred, the government made very, very clear to the United States its preference for the Foothills' proposal?

Mr. Clark: To make the point again, Mr. Speaker, there was never any doubt in the minds of the Americans.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): That is not my question.

Mr. Clark: Having regard to Foothills, there was never any doubt in the mind of the president of Foothills, who said last night on television, and I quote:

We had total support of Premier Bennett in British Columbia, Prime Minister Clark in Ottawa and a number of his cabinet ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NDP SUGGESTIONS TO DEAL WITH INFLATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will recall that at a meeting which he courteously requested following the election, I suggested to him that the cost of living was almost certainly to rise to double-digit proportions, likely by the fall, and proposed three concrete suggestions to deal with it.

Could the Prime Minister tell the House, since now, indeed, we have the return of double-digit inflation with the figures released today, why his government has done a number of things over the summer to raise the cost of living, including jacking up interest rates, but has not done a single thing to reduce the cost of living?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I missed the question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it sounds like the former prime minister.

An hon. Member: It sounds more like the former Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Broadbent: Consumers who are paying high prices for food, housing and fuel to run their cars will not laugh off this matter as the Prime Minister has just done. I should like to ask him concretely, what specific measures did he introduce in the summer which would have the effect of bringing down the cost of living? What action did he take? That will be a short answer. More specifically, what does he plan to do immediately to enable Canadians to cope with double-digit inflation?

An hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I take not only the issue very seriously; I take the Leader of the New Democratic Party very seriously. I appreciated the proposals he made to me in a meeting we had earlier. My difficulty was that I do not think he asked a question the first time he was up.

As regards the action the government has taken or intends to take, we regard inflation as public enemy No. 1 of the government. We are proceeding to deal with that problem, principally by bringing the costs of government in Canada under control so that we can remove that significant contribution to inflation and set an example to others in the community.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in the 1920s that solution did not affect prices, but it did cause the depression of the 1930s. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, since he promised in the election, and repeated it at his first press conference after the election, that there would be a $2 billion tax cut for middle and low income Canadians—he reasserted this commitment after the election—will he now tell the House that that will take place in the November budget?

Second, to have some real effect on prices, will he bring in a fair prices commission which will have the authority to roll back unfair price increases?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to bring in a fair prices commission with the authority to roll back prices. Naturally, I cannot reveal the contents of the budget before it is presented in this House.

INDUSTRY

ABANDONING BY GM OF PROPOSED PROJECT IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. General Motors announced last week that it would invest some $2 billion in Ontario, and when I asked the Prime Minister about it in the House, he held out to us bright prospects of imminent and substantial investments by General Motors in the province of Quebec. Well, we were all deeply shocked yesterday when we learned that General Motors had asked the federal government to close its file, period. Today, I should like to ask the Prime Minister how he can explain this failure, what he intends to do to ease the legitimate frustration among Quebeckers, and what concrete and short-term action, if any, his government will take to improve the industrial framework of the important area of Canada which is Quebec.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed an important issue. We have been equally surprised by this decision of General Motors. That was General Motors' own decision.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT IMPLEMENT INVESTMENT PROJECTS IN QUEBEC

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. It is obviously similar to the Foothills case—private businesses which the government cannot convince to invest in Canada. Since the government seems to be caught off guard, I urge the Prime Minister to overlook the piddling policy of his Minister of Supply and Services and immediately request his Minister of Public Works to order that all major federal projects to invest in Quebec be unfrozen, in order not only to create hundreds of permanent jobs but also to stimulate the construction industry and to ensure a federal presence which is important at this time in Quebec.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must point out that in the present case, the decision has been made by General Motors. I do not know whether there is any future possibility. I certainly hope so. I hope there will be opportunities for Canada in the future, and if General Motors submits another application for such a development, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will be prepared to support such a project. However I must emphasize that this was a decision arrived at due to internal matters at General Motors and not to any other reason.

As to the policy of a federal government presence in the province of Quebec, yes, it is essential, but we have to make sure the projects will really create jobs and establish an economic presence in the province.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO ENCOURAGE INVESTMENT BY AUTO INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address the right hon. Prime Minister. Considering the decision made by General Motors, which is very discouraging for Quebec in particular but also for Canada as a whole, and considering the steadily increasing and huge deficit in its balance of payments Canada will apparently have to face this year in relation to auto parts production and car assembling—over $3 billion according to a report which was recently submitted to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—what does the Prime Minister intend to do and intend to ask his minister in the Senate to do to encourage car companies such as General Motors, Chrysler and Ford to invest more money in Canada, particularly in Quebec and, hopefully, offset the huge deficit Canada will have to face this year in the auto parts trade?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): I think it is agreed by everyone, Mr. Speaker, by the House as a whole, and it is certainly a policy of the present government, that we should attract good investment here. We were hopeful about a decision to be made by General Motors, and we are disappointed over their decision. We are now examining the situation to see whether the Government of Canada can attract industries in the automotive sector or in other sectors to invest in the province of Quebec.

REQUEST GOVERNMENT ASK GM TO INVEST IN PLANT AT SAINTE-THÉRÈSE, QUEBEC

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and ask him whether he intends to meet personally with the heads of the automobile industry in general and the directors of General Motors in particular, in order to encourage them to invest in Quebec. They have decided not to invest in an aluminum parts-casting project saying they do not need aluminum to achieve their goals, but could the minister meet with the directors of General Motors and encourage them to increase their current investment in Sainte-Thérèse, to expand their assembling facilities in the province of Quebec in order to compensate for the lack of investments which will hit Quebec in the coming months?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as the former minister of regional economic expansion has pointed out, there is a serious imbalance in the automotive industry side which affects the province of Quebec.

I am pleased to be able to report to my friend that my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I have already initiated arrangements to meet the president of General Motors on an urgent basis and we are making every effort to make certain that automotive projects are directed to his province, and he can be assured that we will not cease in our efforts to do this.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ASSIST ECONOMIES OF QUEBEC AND MARITIMES

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Given what the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has just said, namely that there is a wide gap between Ontario and Quebec in the automobile industry; given the fact that in the aeronautical industry Pratt & Whitney have announced that from now on they would rather turn towards Ontario; given the very generous offer made by the government to GM to induce that company to open a plant in Quebec and the fact that the gap is widening between the two provinces, would the Prime Minister consider broadening the range of federal government measures to help the economy in Quebec and the maritimes, and I refer among other measures to tax breaks, purchases by the government in these provinces and accelerated establishment of government public enterprises in Quebec and in the maritime provinces?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yes, we can consider the issues from that angle; in particular, the hon. member who asked these questions and government ministers share the same objective, namely, a strong federal presence which could stimulate economic growth, not only in the province of Quebec but in the maritimes as well. We must take our decisions within the framework of the budgetary objectives of the government. The minister is now at a very preliminary stage in studying his budget and I can state that the objectives related to regional development will be one of the concerns surrounding the preparation of the budget.

Mr. De Bané: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Considering the very encouraging statement made by the Prime Minister, considering that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion declared that equal opportunities for all Canadians was one of the priorities of this government, and since he noted himself that the budget of his own department amounted hardly to 0.5 per cent of the government budget as a whole—that is, $600 million out of $50 billion—could the Prime Minister tell the House if his statement means that the next budget might bring a substantial increase?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think it is too early to make such an interpretation. It is one of our preoccupations. We are trying to find ways to help other departments, not only the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I think that was the spirit of the hon. member's proposal, which is certainly in line with the will of that department to achieve real economic growth in difficult areas.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS—ROLE OF TRANSPORT MINISTER IN DISCUSSION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the hon. Minister of Transport. I learned this morning from a highly-placed civil servant within his department that the minister received a written briefing from his departmental officials at least two days before the Friday meeting of at least four cabinet ministers, including the Attorney General, recommending that his minister take the position that the Attorney General not proceed with the prosecution at this time in view of the departmental study under way. Yesterday, the hon. Minister of Justice referred outside the other place to a request for a possible delay in any prosecution until the study was completed.

Will the minister table in this House a copy of the written briefing he received, and will the minister confirm to this House that this was, indeed, the position taken by him at the Friday meeting and, if not, what questions he asked and what viewpoint he expressed at that meeting?

● (1140)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's allegations are absolute nonsense.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister table the written briefing that he had; and I ask him again, is he prepared to tell this House what viewpoints he expressed at the meeting of Friday morning or, if not, why not?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the meeting was for information purposes, and I received the information.

Mr. Olivier: Open government.

Mr. Mazankowski: I did ask a couple of questions, but I did not keep track of what they were.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS—MINISTERS AND OFFICIALS PRESENT AT DISCUSSION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Each time his Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs makes a statement about the infamous meeting, he makes another startling revelation which leaves us with more questions.

Yesterday, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said that he did not call the meeting but that it was called by the Attorney General, which is even more serious, and the minister also said that he thinks these consultations should continue. In addition to the questions which I asked yesterday, I would like to ask the Prime Minister, since the meeting was called by the Attorney General, whether or not the Deputy Attorney General or a senior official from the Attorney General's department was present and whether any political aides were present at the meeting. Also, what was the interest of the Department of Transport in these meetings between the Minister of Justice and Attorney General and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the Deputy Attorney General or political aides were present, but I will determine that and advise the hon. member. I can say that the meeting was convened by the Attorney General.

In response to the questions asked yesterday by the hon. member, inquiries have been made and I have been informed that in dealing with cases of this kind the Attorney General is unquestionably entitled to obtain information and advice from whatever sources he may see fit, including his colleagues in cabinet.

I am also advised by the law officers of the Crown that the action taken by the Attorney General of Canada was not at all a precedent with regard to the participation of the Minister of Transport. The Minister of Transport was invited to be present because the matter under consideration involved questions which were pertinent to matters of policy of the Department of Transport and having to do with the jurisdiction of that department over aspects in which the subject matter of the proposed action was involved in western Canada.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said that these meetings did not set a precedent. Again I tell the Prime Minister that in combines cases which deal with large multinational corporations and affect the economy of this country, that was certainly not the practice when I was the minister of consumer and corporate affairs, nor during the reigns of the hon. member for Windsor West and the hon. member for Papineau.

Yesterday, the minister of consumer affairs said that these meetings would continue. In view of the investigation which the Prime Minister is making, and in view of other matters which have come to light, would the Prime Minister consider stopping this kind of meeting at least until the matter is fully investigated? Also, because the Prime Minister believes in open government, and since the justice committee is meeting tonight to be organized, would he not agree this matter should be referred to that committee so that we in this House may know what happened at those meetings, and to clear the air?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, because of the hon. member's request of yesterday, I inquired as to the law and precedents of this matter so that I would have a better idea personally and could communicate to this House as to the propriety of the meeting. The meeting was absolutely proper, with basis in law and basis in precedent. Meetings of this kind have been held before. Naturally, I am not going to order the cessation or stopping of meetings that are absolutely proper. Nor do I propose to refer to a standing committee a matter where there is no question of precedent or legality except in the mind of the hon. member posing it.

I am rather surprised that a suggestion such as this would come from a former minister of the Crown. We will not be put in a position of having ministers answer in the House of Commons questions regarding discussions which they may have had prior to taking a decision and which they have not yet taken.

POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS—REASON MINISTER OF JUSTICE CALLED MEETING

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I followed the Prime Minister's replies to the questions with a great deal of interest. The hon. gentleman indicated that he received information regarding the matter from law officers of the Crown.

Has the Prime Minister had an occasion to speak with the Minister of Justice since Friday in order to apprise himself directly as to why the Minister of Justice called this meeting, and if he did have a discussion relating to the circumstances leading up to the questions in the House, did the Prime Minister discuss with the Minister of Justice the very sensitive and delicate role he has as Attorney General while a member of cabinet and being charged with the responsibility of initiating proceedings such as these under the Combines Investigation Act which are, in essence, criminal proceedings?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not discuss this matter with the Attorney General of Canada and the Minister of Justice because there was no need to, because there is no question at all about the propriety or legality of the action which was taken by the minister.

Mr. Ouellet: No wonder you flunked your law examination.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised, in facing a situation of this importance, that the Prime Minister has not decided to discuss this matter with the minister within his cabinet who was primarily responsible for calling this meeting. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he review—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blais: —the precedents in the case.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister, when he discusses this matter with the Minister of Justice—and I urge him to do so—to bring to the minister's attention, in view of the evident ignorance of that minister, the precedents in the Campbell case. It is a United Kingdom case which has been a cause célèbre, dealing with the issues of independence of the attorney general and which has been credited with causing the downfall of the Ramsey MacDonald government in 1924.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will forgo the temptation to refer either to evident ignorance or cause célèbre, but I would like to make it clear to the hon. member who has put the question that we have determined the law and the practice, and that the actions of the Attorney General of Canada were in breach of neither the law nor the precedents of the Government of Canada.

ENERGY

PREMIER DAVIS' REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF OIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made yesterday by Premier Davis that he wants a postponement of the decision on the increase in the price of oil, a decision which will be very detrimental to the economies of both Ontario and Canada, is the Prime Minister ready to acquiesce to this request and postpone any decision until after the meeting between the premiers and the Prime Minister himself?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are in active discussions with all the provinces, including a meeting today on energy matters between the minister of energy for Canada and the minister of energy for Ontario.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister if he will tell the House whether or not he intends to discuss the matter with Premier Davis, who yesterday complained very bitterly that this decision was not in conformity with the stated policy of the Prime Minister who some time ago said that there will be no decision by his cabinet on these matters without the approval of the provinces.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, of course we will be discussing the matter with the premier of Ontario. The difference between this government and our predecessor is that this government does discuss questions rationally.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

MORTGAGE INSURANCE UNDERWRITING PRACTICES

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In view of the number of condominium townhouses where owners are abandoning their investment, turning their keys over to the lenders and the lenders are accepting quit claim deeds, giving Canada Mortgage and Housing an enormous number of repossessions, will the minister direct his officials in Canada Mortgage and Housing to cease giving undertakings to insure townhouse condominium mortgages until this surplus and repossession problem is straightened around?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, mortgage insurance underwriting practices obligate the corporation to evaluate individual applications very carefully. However, we will be extremely cautious in getting into this sort of practice until we have studied market conditions. I could not give the hon. member an absolute undertaking that we would cease, but we will be more cautious in pursuing this practice.

FINANCE

PROPOSED INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES OF CHARGEX AND MASTER CHARGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the high interest rates policy of the government, which was left on its doorstep like an abandoned baby by the Liberal party, and that has now grown into a 1,300 pound Sasquatch.

What action does the minister plan to take to prevent Canadian chartered banks from raising the cost of Chargex and Master Charge rates from 18 per cent to 21 per cent?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not plan to take any action. We have a free market economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: The no-action minister.

Mr. Crosbie: —and the forces of competition will regulate rates. When, in the twenty-first century, the hon. gentlemen get into power, they can then shut down our banking system with their interference.

An hon. Member: I can hardly wait.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, there was a time when a member on this side of the House would have referred to that answer as bafflegab and gobbledygook. I do not know what happened to that member; I think he went to sea.

The question I have for the minister is this: Is he telling Canadian consumers that there is nothing the government can do about price gouging, interest rate gouging or the banks excessive profits? What about the fact that banks are now paying tax at a rate of 10 per cent, which is less than a working guy pays earning $180 a week?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree that the hon. gentleman's analysis is correct or that the banks are gouging, nor do I agree with various allegations of that nature. I believe that the banks are operating in a competitive system. Furthermore, the new banking legislation, which I hope the House is going to pass in jig time, will increase competition in the banking system. I do not agree that there is no ray of hope as far as prices are concerned. There is no "ray" of hope in the NDP; I will admit that.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

EFFECT OF LABOUR DISPUTES ON MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It also comes under his jurisdiction as minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

The minister has set himself a most commendable goal, to increase Canadian grain shipments this year by 20 per cent. Would the minister advise this House of the shipments to date this year as compared to last? Could he advise whether the five-month strike at the port of Montreal, as well as the unfortunate incident in Vancouver harbour this week, will have any effect on his original estimates?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the latest information that has been provided to me by the Canadian Wheat Board indicates that we are running slightly ahead of last year. For the same period of time we are moving twice as much barley and three times as much rapeseed this year compared to last year.

I want to say that we are down in our deliveries of wheat, which is something of a temporary nature. However, in aggregate terms we are running ahead of last year's delivery for the same period of time.

We are, naturally, all very concerned about the breakdown at the west coast and the accident that occurred there, but I must say the action on the part of all components of the industry—that is, the railroads, the elevator companies, and labour—is commendable. The contingency plans that have been put in place are working very well and we would hope that through this kind of co-operative effort we will be able to minimize the disruption caused by the unfortunate incident.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST SEAWAY SHIPPING SEASON BE EXTENDED

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, because the closing of the Seaway would dramatically increase the pressure on the grain shipments via the west coast and because all segments of the grain transportation industry have requested that the minister extend the shipping season on the Seaway, has the minister had time to reconsider his decision of the December 15 closing date which was announced last week?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course we and officials of our department are very sympathetic to the suggestions that have been made. Unfortunately, the problem is that we cannot predict the weather.

Mr. Chrétien: Now he is blaming the weather.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We have heard that before.

An hon. Member: The weather is much better this year than last year.

Mr. Mazankowski: Things are better this year than they were last year, but at times a little unpredictable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: We would not be able to make a firm determination on that before the first or second week of December. The problem that we have, Mr. Speaker, is that on the Montreal to Lake Ontario section of the Seaway we have a number of hydroelectric generating plants. To give a firm commitment and to allow icebreaking facilities to open up the Seaway for an extended season we could endanger the operations of the hydroelectric plants, which could cause brown-outs and energy shortages in that particular area.

It is a very complicated matter. We are looking at it and we will certainly give all support possible to extending it, but we cannot make a firm determination at this point in time.

REQUEST MINISTER INTERVENE IN DISPUTE AT PORT OF MONTREAL

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Considering that it is of national importance and urgency to ensure the regular delivery of western grain to the various markets, that the Minister of Transport is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and the National Harbours Board, and that the Minister of Labour has been unable to find a solution to the handlers' strike in the port of Montreal, can he tell the House what he is waiting for before intervening personally in this dispute?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the actions of the Minister of Transport—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Mazankowski: —have been commendable in working out this particular dispute. He has been involved.

An hon. Member: What about the weather?

Mr. Mazankowski: I want to tell the hon. member that negotiations are going on and it is my understanding that a tentative agreement has been reached on the matter of wages. There are still a number of items that are up for consideration, but I am pleased to say that progress is reported and we are very optimistic that a satisfactory settlement will be reached very soon.

CALL FOR INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO END STRIKE AT PORT OF MONTREAL

Mr. Louis R. Desmarais (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell us if he has urged his colleague the Minister of Labour to introduce legislation to solve this conflict?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that would be premature. The fact that negotiations are going on and progress is being made would certainly not necessitate the need for legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Minister of Transport.

Given the fact that the strike has been going on for five months and that a report from the president of the Union of Montreal Harbour Workers indicates that he is willing to accept the mediator's report; further, given the fact that a report and talks between government officials and the National Harbours Board recommended special legislation, does the minister intend to state that the Minister of Labour did his job and introduce special legislation to settle that problem which has lasted now for five months when in Vancouver under similar circumstances he tackled the situation two days after the strike had started?

● (1200)

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Surely the hon. member is not suggesting that we superimpose legislation on this particular issue when negotiations are going on that are fruitful. As I indicated, a tentative agreement has been reached on the issue of wages. There are two or three outstanding issues. Negotiations are going on. Progress is, in fact, being made.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REINTRODUCTION OF SUBSIDY ON BREAD AND MILK—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I hope the Prime Minister can tell us whether he is going to do something about the high food prices, which went up by 12.9 per cent this year over last, in view of the fact he met with the leader of our party last June and promised that he would reconsider the reintroduction of subsidies on bread and milk that were taken away by the previous Liberal government, which his consumer critic in particular complained about so loudly during the last session. Will he reintroduce those subsidies?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that was the proposal of the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I did undertake to consider it; we did consider it; we decided not to proceed.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I have many quotes here made by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, when he was consumer critic, as to why they should be reintroduced. In view of the fact the price of bread and cereals went up by 19 per cent this year over last, can the Prime Minister tell us why he has decided not to reintroduce those subsidies which are so badly needed by the ordinary Canadian?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is our view that the action which we can take which will most benefit the ordinary Canadian, to use the hon. member's phrase, is to try to get the Canadian economy under control and growing strongly. We are going to be directing all our energies, as a government, to dealing with inflation, to restoring confidence and to getting the economy going.

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—MINISTERIAL ANSWERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD—REPORT BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday I undertook to the House to examine the point raised by the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) in respect to what appeared to be an inaccuracy in Hansard. The hon. member for Burnaby was quite correct; there was an inaccuracy in Hansard reporting in the line to which he referred.

We have determined, through conversations with the Editor and his staff, that the fault does, in fact, lie with the reporter who evidently had misread part of a sentence in transcribing the notes from shorthand into the typewritten transcript.

We have already had some discussions with the Editor and will carry these discussions forward to ensure that the usual high quality of reporting will always be assured to the members of the House. This is one instance of an honest and innocent error, I believe.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your confirmation. The version which I indicated to the House was accurate, I believe. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) stated that neither my version nor the printed version was the correct one. I ask Your Honour to confirm that the version which I indicated was correct.

Second, I hope that in no way the Hansard reporter involved will be penalized. It was an innocent misunderstanding, I am sure.

Mr. Speaker: I, of course, can only confirm that with the exception of this one part of a phrase that was referred to yesterday, the rest of the Hansard transcript was completely accurate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to put the regular Thursday question. Before doing so, I would like to congratulate the President of the Privy Council on taking over his onerous responsibilities. He always used to regard himself, when he sat at this desk, as a model of co-operation. I assure him I will not attempt to improve upon his performance in the weeks ahead.

Now that we will be at the end of the debate on the throne speech on Friday, may I ask the minister what the business will be for next week, especially Monday?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman, with whom I have had the privilege of working for a number of years, for his kind remarks and the assurances, such as they were, with regard to co-operation as we proceed into this Parliament.

As the hon. member indicated, we continue with the throne speech debate today and tomorrow. On Monday, it is my intention to call Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, (Spousal Allowances), standing in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I give notice today regarding a bill to stand in the name of the Postmaster General, which I will call next, concerning certain postal rates. It is an important matter, rectifying some matters that were let go in procedures that were deemed inappropriate in the last Parliament, and some might say even worse than that.

On Tuesday, October 23, it is my intention to call an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80. According to the order paper, that bill will be introduced by the Minister of Finance a little later. I assume that will go through very quickly.

Following that will be Bill C-3, an act respecting grants to municipalities, provinces and other bodies exercising functions of local government that levy real property taxes. We have been waiting for that for some period of time.

Later in the week we intend to call Bill C-5, an act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, and Bill C-2, an act standing in the name of the Minister of Labour to amend the Department of Labour Act. There are some tax bills that are the result of the fact that Parliament had its life brought to an end by the call of the general election. These bills arise from the 1978 budget. They have not yet been approved. We regard them as housekeeping matters and I presume they will be proceeded with rather quickly.

In addition, I would give notice of a bill with regard to adjusting the accounts of Canada, standing in the name of the President of the Treasury Board. We will probably be calling that later in the week. Notice is going on the order paper tomorrow regarding the freedom of information bill. We intend to call that early next week, likely Wednesday. Following that will be the property tax credit bill in the name of the Minister of Finance. We hope that will go through quickly.

I should say that the property tax credit bill, the freedom of information bill and certain other legislation will likely have to await the clean-up of the housekeeping legislation which was left as a result of the failure of the government to call them in the last Parliament. Therefore, we have to wait for those. That may also affect the introduction of a budget. I am not prepared to announce a date today.

While I am on my feet, I might mention that later this day the Prime Minister wishes to make a statement on the fiftieth anniversary of the "persons" decision, a very important decision. I would like to have had that statement made now, but through inadvertence, for which I take responsibility, my colleagues the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the Leader of the Opposition were not notified. I apologize to the House. I did not have a chance to speak to my other friends.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if we could have unanimous consent to revert to statements by ministers at five o'clock in order that the Prime Minister can make that statement and the appropriate replies can be given?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on this same point of order regarding House business. May I, too, extend congratulations to the President of the Privy Council on his assuming the role as government House leader. I am also glad that the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso is still a member of the House leaders' club. They have changed their positions. Mine seems to be the same.

Supplementary to the announcements that the President of the Privy Council made about House business, may I ask him two questions? First, as the minister will recall, the Minister of Veterans Affairs indicated yesterday that he has several pieces of legislation respecting veterans, one or two of which I believe are ready. Can he say how soon those pieces of legislation will be introduced, and how soon they will be called for debate and consideration?

As a second question, may I ask the government House leader whether there will be legislation during this session to advance the equality of women, particularly in terms of employment and retirement?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I cannot give the hon. member a precise date. I can say, though, with some assurance, that it will be brought in fairly quickly. He has mentioned the veterans bill. I have mentioned the freedom of information legislation, the matter of the tax credit and other pieces of legislation which we believe to be important, but which must await the cleaning up of the old budget bills: we cannot advance those pieces of legislation to which we attach some importance until we are sure we can obtain the co-operation which I hope will be forthcoming from the hon. gentleman.

With respect to the significance of the persons case, we are looking into some of the other matters the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre mentioned, but I would ask him to note that the first subject the government intends to call after the debate on the address has ended will be Bill C-6, which is designed to deal with what we feel is an inequity respecting women. I hope that measure will receive relatively early passage and that the hon. gentleman will support us.

Mr. Knowles: We shall deal with Bill C-6 when it is called on Monday. May I say to the House leader that he has asked us to let certain matters wait until the tax bills are out of the way, although he himself put half a dozen other measures ahead of the tax bills this morning. I therefore suggest that veterans' affairs and women's legislation are just as important as those other items, and that they should be dealt with without waiting for the tax bills to be passed.

Mr. MacEachen: Just for the purpose of preparing for the work next week, am I to take it that the first item is to relate to spouse's allowances, and that after its passage the House will turn to consider the borrowing authority bill?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when that is passed the House will be asked to consider an act respecting postal rates. I am assuming that those bills could be dealt with on Monday, since it is a full day. After that we would like to call the bill with respect to the Department of Labour, followed by the labour unions returns bill. On Tuesday we would proceed with the borrowing legislation.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is obviously exceeding all his former expectations if he believes we would get five bills through on Monday. I think he had better come down from those euphoric clouds he has reached on becoming a member of the new government.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fretz for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, when the clock showed six o'clock last evening, I was about to expand on certain ineptitudes of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp). In the Speech from the Throne, the government promised that measures would be introduced to strengthen the capacity of our two territorial governments to manage their own affairs. With that proposition I am sure all hon. members can agree and subscribe to the idea that in the long run this is a desirable and very commendable goal.

● (1220)

The Yukon's capacity to manage its own affairs is clearly defined, having been done so by this Parliament, in the Yukon Act. Hon. members, however, will look in vain to find mention of any amendments to the Yukon Act in the legislative program which has been tabled in the House by the government. It was only the day before yesterday that the hon. member for Yukon, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Nielsen), who is also the number one adviser to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on Yukon matters, assured a CBC audience in Whitehorse that the government would take no further steps toward self-government in the Yukon without introducing amendments to the Yukon Act.

What this suggests to me is that the government, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the Minister of Public Works, are beginning to feel a little uneasy and a little uncomfortable about steps already taken. Those steps were serious constitutional changes regarding the Yukon, and leading that territory toward provincehood. The government has taken major steps to move the yardsticks toward what it calls responsible government in the Yukon, and the House should know that the government has already taken these major constitutional changes in that territory.

In a letter dated October 9, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, acting, as he said, pursuant to section 4 of the Yukon Act, directed the commissioner of the Yukon as follows:

> You are instructed to request the territorial government leader that he shall constitute and appoint a body known as the cabinet or the executive council—

He then informed the commissioner:

> You will not be a member of the cabinet . . . and will not participate on a day to day basis in the affairs of the cabinet, and council—

Elsewhere in the letter the minister said:

> You should advise the government leader that he may use the term premier to describe his office and the term Minister to describe the other members of the (cabinet).

However, and this is the most interesting part of the letter, he cautioned the commissioner with these words:

> Until legislative amendments to the Yukon Act are passed, however, these terms should not be used in Territorial legislation or legal instruments.

It does seem rather elementary to point out that any title which one is not entitled to use by law is not a legal title. Indeed, I am told that the leader of the territorial government himself has been sufficiently distressed about this that he has decided on his own not to bother using the title "premier" which the minister would want to confer upon him.

I think we can snicker with some justification at the ineptitude of the minister in conferring provincial titles on territorial leaders and their institutions, but what we cannot take so lightly are the constitutional changes which he attempted to bring about on the strength of nothing more than his own signature. The fact is that the relationship of the Yukon government to the Government of Canada has been altered without the consent of Parliament. Acting under the cloak of section 4 of the Yukon Act, the minister added insult to his constitutional improprieties when he told the commissioner, Mrs. Ione Christensen, to pack her bags and move out of the legislative buildings altogether.

Let me refer to the section the minister uses to justify all his actions under law. Section 4 of the Yukon Act reads as follows:

> The commissioner shall administer the government of the territory under instructions from time to time given her by the Governor in Council or minister.

Instructions to administer, says the act, but it does not say that the minister has the authority under law to tell the commissioner not to administer at all, which is in effect and in fact what he has actually done. The commissioner, therefore, received her new instructions shortly after learning from the local press that they were on the way to her, and to no one's surprise but to everyone's dismay, particularly the people of the Yukon Territory, Mrs. Christensen promptly resigned.

Whether Mrs. Christensen, a native Yukoner, an immensely popular lady and a good administrator who enjoys the confidence of both the Indian and white communities in the Yukon, felt that she could no longer properly administer a government in which she was no longer even physically present, we do not know. Whether she felt that the Parliament of Canada had instructed her to carry out responsibilities with her council within the normal meaning of the word "administer", which the minister had told her to ignore, we do not know either.

Maybe she felt that Yukoners could not afford full fiscal responsibility until they were able to pay the cost of their own public services. Maybe she was merely disappointed that she, like all Yukoners, was not consulted in the matter, and that is another tragic error this new minister has made so early in his career. He has taken an enormous constitutional step without bothering to come to Parliament to get the authority to do so by amending the Yukon Act, and not bothering to consult the people who are directly affected.

He has taken his advice from whom? Well, certainly from the hon. member for Yukon, the Minister of Public Works, and from the leader of the government in the Yukon. That is who he consulted, and that is the end result of this serious step taken by the minister.

Mr. Epp: Both are elected, Keith.

Mr. Penner: We do not know the major points of disagreement between the commissioner and the minister, because when I asked him in this House to tell us what were the major points of disagreement, he would not say. All he would tell us was that his commissioner felt the government was moving the Yukon too quickly along the path to responsible government.

What we do know is that the commissioner could not be faulted for having had at least some of the concerns I have already mentioned. She would have known full well, for example, that historical precedent required the minister and his government to bring forward amendments to the Yukon Act in order to remove her from the deliberations of her council. It must have been common knowledge to a person as wise in the ways of government as Mrs. Christensen that in 1966 the Parliament of Canada specifically repealed a section in the Yukon Act which had previously required the commissioner to sit separate and apart from the council.

Evidently this made no difference to the minister. The fact that he had to come to Parliament to do that did not bother the minister at all, because someone told him that under section 4, by which he could instruct the commissioner how to administer, he could now instruct the commissioner not to administer at all, not to be physically present, not to consult with any committee, nor to consult with elected representatives.

Perhaps the former commissioner was offended at this slight to Parliament, although "slight" is hardly a strong enough word to describe the rearrangement of constitutional relationships without any reference to Parliament. On the other hand, perhaps she was not so jealous of the rights of Parliament, but we here in this House certainly must be. We can only speculate about her attitude to this irresponsible encroachment by a minister of the Crown upon federal jurisdiction. This grasp for power—which is what it is, in plain language—was engineered without her advice and contrary to the direct and substantial federal interest. However, I suspect it was the interest of Yukoners which was uppermost in her mind.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Penner: We hear a great guffaw from the other side. The minister is not even aware that this is one of the most respected public figures in the Yukon, and to guffaw when I suggest that what she was expressing was her concern for her fellow Yukoners, all the minister is doing is further revealing to all here today how ignorant he is of the situation.

● (1230)

Nevertheless, let me turn now to the consideration of the minister's instruction to the commissioner regarding financial management. This is something that always concerns members of Parliament—financial management, financial control of money that is raised from the public domain. I am referring here to section 12(3) of the Yukon Act which instructs the commissioner to consult with the territorial finance committee in the preparation of estimates of expenditures and appropriations required to defray the costs of public services.

I suppose that Parliament instructed the commissioner to consult on these matters since, in the present fiscal year, for example, the Yukon derived $23 million, or about 30 per cent of its operating revenues, from Parliament in the form of a deficit grant, and this is not to mention a further $15 million this year in capital grants. All of this $38 million is over and above the grant of about $13 million in lieu of income taxes which the Yukon government will begin to collect itself next year. No wonder Yukoners are worried about their future taxes, and no wonder the Parliament of Canada, which puts money there, wants to have someone consult in the expenditures and appropriations of these moneys.

In any case, the minister, who assured the House that everything he has done was within the terms of the Yukon Act, was not happy with the words of section 12(3) as they stand—he did not like them at all. Therefore, in place of those words of the Yukon Act, he substituted some of his own. They are in the letter. Let me read them. He told the commissioner:

—the cabinet will prepare the estimates initially and then refer them to you.

Nothing could be plainer, more simple or obvious. If the law of the land is to consult, then you have to be physically present and talk about what is going on. If something is referred to you after the fact, and it is just sent over for your approval, then there has been no consultation and the act of Parliament has been violated. The minister does not seem to worry about that: after all he is the minister, he is the authority, he has good advice from the hon. member for Yukon and he does not need to worry about any of the niceties, any of the legal intricacies.

I am told that one of the effects of this change in wording is to relieve the commissioner of any participation in future discussions with officials in Ottawa as to the amount of the annual deficit grant required. Here again, it might not be right to say that this particular liberty of the minister's raised the indignation of the commissioner, but since it is a clear contradiction of the words and meaning of a statute of Parliament, it should certainly arouse the indignation of this House.

Apart from that, the question of financial arrangements between the two levels of government strikes at the very heart of this issue. Not only do Canadian taxpayers foot nearly 60 per cent of the bill for Yukon public services through federal agencies and the territorial government, but neither the member for Yukon nor the leader of the territorial government seem to be interested in responsible government, if responsible government means that you have to raise your own tax revenues.

The hon. member for Yukon is on record as subscribing to the view that the annual deficit grant which escalates every year is the birthright of Yukoners, not to be diminished in any way by territorial tax revenues such as those to be derived from the Alaskan Highway gas pipeline. I think I have an accurate quote of his words spoken before the pipeline committee. He said:

We see no reason why the deficit financing, to which we have been entitled over the years, should now be changed merely because the Yukon is going to be enjoying greater revenues as a result of a good tax deal.

The opinions of the territorial government leader are not far different, if one can judge by his comments only a few days ago, because he told Yukoners in a radio broadcast that new financial arrangements between Ottawa and the Yukon had not been discussed in the course of his half-dozen meetings with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development about the commissioner's new instructions. There was no talk at all about her role, her responsibility to participate in the finance committee. The leader of the territorial government lamented, "We are still a colony of Canada". He went on to say that the minister recognized this, and therefore financial arrangements would not change until responsible government had been achieved.

Responsible government would be achieved, he said, on the day that the Yukon territorial government did not have to submit a budget to the commissioner for approval. I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that that day will not arrive until the Yukon government finds itself in a position to raise its own revenues from its own taxes for its own operations.

An hon. Member: Just like Newfoundland.

Mr. Penner: The hon. member is now talking about equalization payments, trying to fog the issue. Newfoundland came into confederation under a clear set of principles approved and supported by the House. We are not talking about that; we are not talking here about amendments to the Yukon Act: we are talking about unilateral actions taken by the minister himself.

So far as this belief in a "deficit grant birthright" is concerned, Yukoners would have been most interested, as I was, to read some remarks which were supposed to have been given by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) to the citizens of Whitehorse in a speech which was not circulated there or given out there, but which was circulated only here in Ottawa. This is what the President of the Privy Council was supposed to have said in the speech in Whitehorse:

One of the hallmarks of responsible government is that the duly elected representatives of the people decide how the tax dollars they raise should be spent. In this regard, should Yukoners decide that it is desirable to proceed towards full status . . . then the revenues generated from taxation of the pipeline right-of-way will assume particular significance.

He went on to admit the following:

These revenues, which will accrue directly to the Yukon, rather than being funnelled through Ottawa, are expected to grow to $30 million annually and more, depending on the rate of inflation, and to amount to over $1 billion over the life of the project. It is interesting to note—

The speech continues:

—that were this $30 million applied to the present annual territorial budget, your government would almost be at a break-even level—

A Progressive Conservative government enjoys hearing that kind of equation.

There is much more I wanted to say on this topic, Mr. Speaker, but I will have to come back on another day, to another debate, to finish my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The only way the House can accept a question is by way of unanimous consent, because the time allowed the hon. member has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allowing the hon. member to put his question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nickerson: I would like to ask the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Penner) why he thinks it is all right for him, as a southern Canadian, to enjoy all the rights and privileges of a Canadian citizen, whereas I myself, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), or the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar), cannot enjoy these privileges. Why does he still want to treat us in this colonial manner? Why will he not allow us to assume the responsibilities of responsible government eventually leading to provincial status?

Mr. Penner: In my opinion, the new member has come to the House not having learned yet to listen to a speech before he rises to his feet to speak in debate. The point that was being made, in answer to his question, is that there is a proper way to proceed in this country and that is by way of an amending statute, by way of parliamentary action. What I have taken exception to, sir, is that constitutional steps have been taken without amendments to the Yukon Act and without any reference to Parliament. Nobody has spoken about the rights of citizens in the constitutional development of this country. The hon. member has completely missed the point, and I am sorry that after such a short period of time here his experience has helped him so little.

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the throne speech debate and, along with other members, I wish to offer my best wishes and congratulations to Mr. Speaker on his re-election, and to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Also, I wish to identify myself with words of appreciation for the mover (Mr. Fretz) and the seconder (Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan)) of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne for the shape and focus of their remarks.

This is the first speech in the House by the first member for the new federal constituency of Waterloo. It is an honour for me to represent the 67,000 voters in that new riding created during the previous Parliament, along with 17 other ridings.

I should like to refer for a moment to the constituency of Waterloo, which includes a portion of the city of Kitchener, which was formerly a portion of the Kitchener riding. It includes the city of Waterloo, which was represented formerly in a different riding by Mr. Max Saltsman who for many years distinguished himself by his service to Parliament and the people of that area. Also, it includes Wilmot township, which was ably represented by the hon. Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis), as well as Wellesley and Woolwich townships, which were equally ably represented by the hon. Minister of State (Treasury Board) (Mr. Beatty).

The Kitchener-Waterloo area may be known to members of the House nationally through Oktoberfest and the televising of the national parade, if nothing else. But behind the televising of the parade and the stories of festival halls there lies a significant cultural community, a significant and vigorous economic and cultural area. In a sense, the new riding of Waterloo is a microcosm of Canada—building upon German roots and immigration. Today, it is a multicultural community. It takes pride in its Mennonite heritage and the characteristics of that way of life—marked by hard work, integrity, a deep sense of caring and compassion. This is reflected in the fact that the riding is amongst the prominent ones across Canada in the reception of Vietnamese refugees, the so-called boat people. The characteristics of work, trust and caring are inspired by the deep sense of faith which marks the people of my riding.

I want to say a word about the agricultural richness of the area. Dominant is Waterloo stockyard, one of the largest in southwestern Ontario. If one were to travel across the riding, one would enjoy Woolich township and the Elmira maple syrup festival. One would enjoy the hospitality of Wellesley and the apple butter festival. One would enjoy visiting Wilmot township and its areas of production in cheese and poultry. Also, one would enjoy very much the hospitality of small towns such as New Hamburg and Baden.

Within the urban area of Kitchener-Waterloo, one would see vigorous automotive, textile and electronics industries, as well as an industry related to space and the manufacturing of rubber products. The city of Waterloo has been called the Hartford of Canada, with more head offices of insurance companies than any other city in Canada. It is the home of two great Canadian universities. The University of Waterloo is world renowned for its co-operative engineering program. It has a fine applied mathematics program, a significant computer science program around its large computer facilities, an optometry faculty, a program of integrated studies, and the recently established innovation centre which will seek to do research and development in relation to the needs of small business.

Also, there is the Waterloo Lutheran University, as it was known previously. Today, it is the Wilfrid Laurier University. Through its theology faculty it maintains its roots with its former church affiliation. It has a very significant and vigorous business school, a consulting service to small businesses, a very fine social work faculty, as well as a first-rate music faculty.

In drawing this brief description of the riding I am proud to represent, I do so with pride because in the Speech from the Throne there was the call to harness the resources of the nation to nation building. Also, it contained an invitation to all Canadians in all walks of life to participate. The riding of Waterloo, amongst the ridings of this nation, is rich with resources. It has natural resources. It has human resources of body, mind and spirit. Also, it is rich in cultural resources.

I come proudly into this chamber, with all its history and with all of its importance for Canadian life, with a commitment to Canada and its future which I know is shared by my colleagues. I am grateful to God for this nation, its people and resources. Also, I am grateful that in my life I have had the opportunity to live on the west coast where I was raised, to live on the prairies, in central Canada and in the maritime community. For nearly five years I was associated on a daily basis with Canadian University Service Overseas—CUSO— as a co-founder and then the first director for West Africa, particularly Nigeria.

In my years of service abroad, I was able to see more clearly, than might have otherwise been my opportunity, Canada as seen from the world: Canada with its resources, its riches and its possibility to be a leader in the community of nations. Also, I was able to see something of the poverty and need of our world, to live through coups and counter-coups, and to realize how important this democratic Parliament is. I was able to see the importance of national, provincial and municipal institutions, ones which at times we take for granted.

Upon occasion, I was able to advise the Canadian International Development Agency in the direction of Canadian aid. I was able to see a number of the success stories of our effective participation with the so-called developing nations of the world—stories, which are so often not told because, unhappily, it is the bad news, which is often told and not things which are significant. Also, I had the opportunity of serving as a public servant. I recognize the importance of the contribution made by the public service in the nation's capital, as well as provincially within Manitoba. I was a consultant to the government of Prince Edward Island. I was able to see the importance at all levels of government of those who work behind the parliamentary process.

For the past 8.5 years I have been deeply involved in the life of the city of Waterloo as minister of Knox Presbyterian church and an alderman. There were influences and many encouragements to my participation in the democratic process which formed my life. I am grateful for the mood and the focus of my constituents; for their pride in Canada, a pride we share together; for a world-view which has come out of immigration throughout the years; and for a sense that Canada shall play a responsible part in the community of nations. I am grateful to political leaders who have come from that area into the life of this nation, to those who teach and those who have taught me. I am grateful to my colleagues in the public service and the church. I am grateful to my family who permitted me to make this entry into elected public service.

In response to and support of the direction of the Speech from the Throne, I want to speak for a moment about my concern for national unity and for young people who are vital to national unity. I see across the nation tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of young people who have completed higher education in order to be equipped and able to enter the life of our nation. I am anxious lest their enthusiasm, energy and commitment may not be channelled into our common life.

I see high unemployment and among the unemployed far too many young people. I am encouraged at the direction and thought of the Youth Employment Secretariat, soon to be upgraded and instituted by the government. But I am concerned that in the days that lie ahead we may, as financial crises continue in our nation, not be able to utilize these young people and somehow their lives may become filled with bitterness and disaffection.

I would propose for the consideration of members of this House and the government the concept in Canada of a national youth service. This concept would encourage all young people who complete training in universities, community colleges or CEGEPs across the land to be required to invest two years of service to Canada. This service might be in the military, in CUSO, in voluntary agencies, in business or in industry. It might be in the civil service at the federal, provincial or municipal level; it might be in northern development or with community agencies within our inner city.

This would, obviously, require major consultation with all levels of government, industry and labour; but it would provide for every young Canadian two years during which they could serve the nation. They could, together—like those who served in war years—be under uniform terms of service and pay. In the process of national service they would learn about Canada; they would work in different areas; they would help build Canadian society—and they would begin to feel the sense of belonging, as many of us do in this nation. They would, as well, repay the investment made in their university and community college education. This would give these young people a working experience which would allow them to compete in the work force. Other nations have done this. It will be my hope to encourage consideration of this concept by the government and others within the House who may find this a worth-while proposal.

I should like to make a second observation—this one about the single most important question facing Canada, the United States and a number of other western countries; namely, the whole issue of inflation and its effects on our society. The throne speech seeks to address this issue.

I am constantly struck by the way in which inflation is constantly perceived almost totally as an economic problem. This is perhaps understandable, because I am sure every member of this House is constantly reminded of the economic aspects of inflation every day of his or her life. I do not think, however, that we will fully understand inflation, nor will we be able to form a strategy to come to grips with this fundamental problem, until we possess a much broader understanding of what inflation really is.

Inflation is much more than an economic issue. Inflation is a sociological, psychological, political and, indeed, in very many ways a spiritual problem. It is straining the very essence of our society. It presents us with perhaps the fundamental challenge to our whole system of government and way of life as we move into the 1980s. Amongst its many insidious effects in our society, inflation tends to reinforce a protective, narrow self-interest on the part of individuals and groups; and at the same time it tends to weaken the spirit of co-operation and collaboration among the many elements and interests across our society.

I think we are seriously deficient in our analysis of inflation if we do not understand this "cancerous disease" in all its dimensions. By regarding inflation solely as an economic issue, we are blinding ourselves to any real possibility of coming to grips with it.

I should like to propose, therefore, that either as part of some of the conferences on industrial development mentioned in the throne speech, or as a separate national conference in its own right, we should begin to develop a broader and better analysis of inflation and its consequences. We need to involve more than economists in these discussions. Social scientists, church leaders, leaders in the voluntary sector, labour leaders and many other groups should be invited to participate in a national conference on inflation. I hope the government will look seriously at this proposal.

In conclusion, Mr Speaker, let me say I have the honour to represent a riding whose people are proud of Canada, and among those people there are those with dreams for this nation and who are not afraid to tackle difficult situations. Many of them have come from lands of oppression and appreciate the freedom that we enjoy in Canada. I am proud to represent this microcosm of Canadian society, and I am proud to offer my contribution in this House.

As I speak to Parliament on this day when we remember the decision to recognize persons—the human rights of women—I remember also the words of the first Canadian Governor General, the Right Hon. Vincent Massey. I wish during this, my first speech in this significant chamber, to identify myself with the words of Governor General Massey, who said:

> I believe in Canada, with pride in her past, belief in her present, and faith in her future.
> I believe in the quality of Canadian life, and in the character of Canadian institutions.
>
> I believe in the Commonwealth of Nations, within whose bounds we have found freedom, and outside which our national life would lose its independent being.
>
> I believe that Canada is one, and that if our minds dwell on those things which its parts have in common, we can find the unity of the whole.
> I believe that with sound work, the spirit of a team, and an awareness of ourselves, we can look forward to achievements beyond our imagining.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, since it is very near the hour, I wonder if I might call it one o'clock and commence my remarks at two o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree that we call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, during the recent election campaign and during their recent years in opposition, the Conservative party gave the impression that they had the answer to all problems—for the handling of the economy, for the rate of inflation and unemployment, for the price of food and for the price and availability of housing, to mention a few. They also felt they could solve the problems of freedom of information and, indeed, almost every problem in this country. During the election campaign the Conservatives, with these promises and with slick, misleading and sometimes malicious advertising in the media, took in many Canadians.

But what do we have now? After approximately five months of power we have a government of charades, contradictions and flip-flops. We have a Speech from the Throne which suggests a lot of studies. The government wants to study this and study that, but there are few answers. Where are those brave statements that party made before the election, that they were going to act on the price of food, the Canadian dollar, interest rates, youth and unemployment and so on? Where are the answers now?

The previous government said that these were tough problems and that there were few absolute answers; that in a free society there are always trade-offs when the government intervenes. We said that the government can achieve its successes but there are few absolute victories. We pointed out that in a difficult world our record of success in solving problems was much better than that of other countries.

The Conservatives ridiculed that record. They said that they could do better, that they could lead Canadians to a new Shangri-La. Well, they have not. From what we can observe so far, it was all rhetoric, puffery and, indeed, baloney, and I could use a few stronger terms. They have no answers, no real solutions and no principles. Their only principle so far, from my observations, has been expediency and political gain. This was confirmed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) after the election who, when he was asked about his election promises, replied, "Well, those are only promises for the election campaign. We did not really mean them. Nobody was to take us seriously".

What about their brave words that they would give greater respect to Parliament and the elected representatives of the Canadian people? Let us look at the record so far. To begin with, they appointed a senator, Mr. de Cotret, a defeated candidate, to the major portfolio of industry, trade and commerce and to the inner cabinet which is that new power creature where many regions and interests are not represented, not to mention the fact that he is from the province of Ontario from which the Conservative party elected over 50 members. Presumably none of those members had the ability to be minister of industry, trade and commerce. How does this give credibility to the parliamentary system and the electoral process? Here is a senior minister appointed from the Senate who cannot be questioned in this place by the elected representatives of the people and who does not have to stand the heat of parliamentary democracy.

As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) said, "We would accept ministers being appointed from the Senate if they were from a province which had few representatives in the Conservative party, such as Quebec, but not from the province of Ontario with approximately 50 elected representatives in the party." A defeated candidate being appointed to a senior portfolio is unacceptable. Under our tradition a non-elected minister with a senior portfolio should seek a seat in the House of Commons at the earliest opportunity. That is the tradition in the British parliamentary system in England, Canada and Australia.

● (1410)

Consequently, why is it that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret), the defeated candidate for Ottawa Centre, does not run in the by-elections to be held in Prince Albert or in Newfoundland? Why does the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) not insist that he get elected, or else resign from his portfolio? Where is that great respect for the parliamentary system that he spoke about?

There are other examples of disrespect of Parliament. In setting up his new cabinet, the Prime Minister has given eight ministers two portfolios. How does this help members of parliament get information from the government when some carry such a heavy load? No minister with two portfolios, no matter how intelligent, can master his work and prepare properly to answer questions put to him in the House of Commons. Perhaps that is why the minister of consumer affairs is doing so badly in the House. The Prime Minister has saddled him with two of the most onerous portfolios in the government, that is to say, that of Solicitor General and Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I can speak with authority on those portfolios since I have held both of them. According to my experience there is no way an individual can be briefed each day to fully answer questions in the House of Commons for both of those portfolios.

The same can be said for the other double portfolios. I am speaking of the office of privy council and national revenue; defence and veterans affairs; post office and environment; secretary of state and communications; sports and multiculturalism—

Mr. Paproski: And what is wrong with that?

Mr. Allmand: —justice and leader of the Senate; industry, trade and commerce and board of economic development. Each of these portfolios is headed by one man. How does this indicate respect for the parliamentary system and the right of elected members to get answers in this House?

An hon. Member: We give quality.

Mr. Allmand: We get no answers because there is too much for these ministers to handle.

The government has said that it believes in freedom of information and that it will bring in a freedom of information bill. When I wrote recently to the different ministers who are in portfolios for which I am a critic asking them to give me a copy of their daily clipping service, I was refused. I am referring to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Solicitor General's department and the Department of Justice. This is not a question of secret or confidential material but merely a collection of press clippings. They are helpful, however, because they bring together the clippings of all major media in Canada on a given subject. What kind of freedom of information is this? When I was a minister I would never refuse to provide these clippings to my critics. Each time they were asked for, I gave them. Often they were not asked for.

Recently I visited the offices of a prominent consumers' association in Montreal. This association was getting the daily clipping service of the minister of consumer affairs yet we, as critics in this House have not been able to get them. This is an example of more disrespect for Parliament.

What about the actions of the minister of Indian and northern affairs regarding the Yukon territorial government? The minister has said that he implemented these changes in the Yukon first, because he believes in democracy; second, because the member for the Yukon was elected on such platform, a platform to bring provincial status to the Yukon; and third, because the majority in the Yukon council favour such a move. What nonsense, Mr. Speaker.

The Conservative party ran on many policy positions in the last election. Their platform brochures and election speeches were full of them. Because they were elected as the government, does this mean that they do not have to consult Parliament? Does the fact that they were elected and these items were in their platform mean that they can be implemented by administrative action rather than by consulting Parliament? Does it mean that all promises can be implemented by administrative action, like the new instructions to the Yukon Commissioner? I do not think so. That has not been our tradition.

The Minister's argument is weak on other grounds. Even if the federal election were to be considered a referendum on provincehood in the Yukon, then from my information the question did not carry. If I understand it correctly, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) won his election with approximately 45 per cent of the vote. It was enough to get him elected but not enough to interpret that the majority in the Yukon favoured provincial status. He had less than 50 per cent of the vote. I do not see how that can be considered a vote for provincehood in the Yukon.

Furthermore, while members of the Yukon council might have individually stated support for provincial status, they have not as a body, as the Yukon council, expressed themselves on this subject since the federal election. There has been no resolution, no debate and no vote in the council. In addition, the Conservative government in the Yukon received approximately 38 per cent of the vote in the last election. How is this an example of democratic action? Well, it is not.

The minister's action respecting the Yukon Territory was a unilateral administrative act without consulting this Parliament on the Yukon council. There was no debate and no vote. Neither the Commissioner of the Yukon nor the Yukon Indians was consulted. Neither their promise nor the Prime Minister's promise to hold a referendum on this subject in the Yukon was kept. The minister of Indian and northern affairs has said he will consult with the council of Yukon Indians later, but to do what? He has already implemented a policy which brings the Yukon down the road to provincial status. Does this mean that when he consults with the Yukon Indians next week and they tell him they are opposed to the instructions given the commissioner last week, he will then withdraw those instructions? I doubt it. The minister has already made up his mind. He has done this now, and he is going to consult later. The Minister has said he will hold a referendum later. If he is going to hold a referendum later respecting provincehood in the Yukon Territory, why did he take the action he took last week?

An hon. Member: He has pre-judged the election.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Mr. Allmand: That is right. He said that the things he did last week are not a move to provincial status. That is not what the former commissioner thinks.

I might point out, because some people were casting doubts about her credibility this morning, that the Commissioner for the Yukon, Mrs. Ione Christensen, was born in the Yukon and has lived her entire life there. Her father was a leading RCMP officer in the Yukon. Therefore, she has strong Yukon credentials. She resigned in protest over the instructions given to her last week because she felt the Conservative government was moving to provincial status too quickly and improperly. The key issue here is not, as the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) said this morning, whether or not one day the Yukon and the Northwest Territories should have provincial status; the issue is the complete disregard of Parliament in the implementation of major governmental change.

The minister's contention that his move was prompted by a respect for democracy is phony. With less than 50 per cent of the voters in the Yukon supporting a proposal, one cannot claim democratic support.

There are still more examples to illustrate how Parliament has been by-passed by this government which said it would give a higher priority to Parliament. Acting against public opinion and without consulting Parliament, the Tory government traded off Loto Canada to the provinces. As a member of Parliament who is a strong supporter of amateur sport, I considered this a most regretful move.

I was present at many of the Olympics events held in Montreal in 1976 and at the Commonwealth Games in Edmonton in 1978. What pride there was for Canadian athletes and for the teams who showed so much improvement since the last Olympics and last Commonwealth Games. I believe Canada ranked in the top ten or eleven in the last Olympic Games and we walked away with the Commonwealth honours.

Under our Liberal government, the sports federations in our country had experienced increasing support over the last ten years and Loto Canada was a keystone of that support. It is from that source that a lot of money came for coaching, training and so on. Now the narrow, shortsighted Tory government has abolished all that and our amateur sporting groups are not sure where financial support will come from, despite the announcement yesterday by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism (Mr. Paproski). National sporting excellence in this country will not be maintained by provinces which approach all things from a regional, provincial perspective. The Tories treated a national dream for Canadian sport with short-term political expediency vis-à-vis the provinces.

● (1420)

There are more examples of ignoring Parliament. The Prime Minister signed agreements with Newfoundland and British Columbia to transfer offshore mineral rights to these provinces. Not only did he implement substantial constitutional change without consulting Parliament, but most informed opinion considers that these agreements, especially that with British Columbia, are illegal and unconstitutional.

In 1967 the Supreme Court of Canada ruled in interpreting the Canadian constitution that offshore mineral rights were a federal responsibility. They said that under the Canadian constitution offshore mineral rights off British Columbia were a Canadian federal responsibility. Consequently that court decision is part of Canadian constitutional law and cannot be changed by any federal-provincial agreement signed by the Prime Minister of Canada and the premier of British Columbia. The only way the Prime Minister can transfer offshore mineral rights to British Columbia, and perhaps to any province, is by a constitutional amendment. You cannot change the constitution by administrative action.

So far I have spoken about the complete sham displayed by the Tory government which preaches one thing and does another when it comes to respecting Parliament. Now I would like to mention some of the government's contradictions.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) went to the United Nations preaching peace, virtue, aid and detente, but ended up causing the exact opposite. By her confused diplomacy she has hurt the proliferation of nuclear weapons and left the world with less safeguards. Before her ill-chosen remarks regarding Argentina, that country had expressed its intention to purchase the Canadian Candu reactor and to accept the stringent safeguards laid down by the previous government. Now she has prompted them by her remarks to purchase a more expensive German reactor with less stringent safeguards. What did she accomplish by her speech? The world is less secure and she has caused great harm to the Canadian economy.

It goes on, Mr. Speaker. During the election period the Tories campaigned "Vote Conservative and get the country working again". Then they left Parliament on the sidelines for five months, crippled the Canada Works program and so far have replaced it with nothing else; lost the Candu sale to Argentina and a lot of jobs; and lost the Foothills pipeline by their inaction and negligence, losing more jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: That is getting Canada working again.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order. The hon. member should be entitled to the courtesy of the House in order to complete his speech.

Mr. Allmand: The new Canada Works criteria are completely ridiculous because they do not account for very strong pockets of unemployment in ridings which are otherwise well off. I can give examples. The other day my colleague from Saint-Henri-Westmount, who represents a portion of Saint-Henri and the Westmount part of Montreal, spoke. As everyone knows, the Westmount part is rather affluent, but Saint-Henri is not affluent at all. Because the level of unemployment in the total riding is not over 9 per cent, he gets no money at all from the Canada Works program to help the unemployed in his riding. The same is true in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. While some parts are fairly well off, there are pockets of real unemployment and poverty and we get no money. As a matter of fact, the whole west end of Montreal was cut off from Canada Works moneys because of the policies of the Tory government.

Under our policy we had a minimum amount for every constituency in this country to take care of those ridings where the total level of unemployment might be very low but with pockets of unemployment. They talk about democracy, but they abolished the constituency advisory group for Canada Works. In my riding on two occasions the president of my constituency advisory group for Canada Works was the Conservative candidate in the last election. That is the kind of group we had. I wanted a group under which the money would not be given out on a political basis. As I said, for two years the Conservative candidate was president of my committee, and another year it was the president of the NDP association as well as clergymen, principals of schools and so on. That has been abolished. Now Canada Works money where it applies will be given out on the advice of the Conservative member of Parliament or the defeated candidate.

The most startling omission in the Speech from the Throne is its silence respecting national unity. The Speech from the Throne mentions some activity in the area of federal-provincial relations, such as Loto Canada; but as I said before, I would argue that those things which are mentioned in the long run are initiatives that will lead to disunity.

One can judge the low priority this government gives to national unity by some of its actions or lack of actions. They abolished the national unity office. They postponed the constitutional conference that was to be held this fall. That was promised during the election campaign. They postponed it because they do not know what position they will take. They killed the referendum bill we had before Parliament to keep the separatist government in Quebec honest on their referendum bill. They decided not to proceed with that; they will trust the Quebec separatist government on that matter.

We have had no word on an entrenched bill of rights in the constitution. As a minority English-speaking Quebeckers, that is something that we, along with Francophones outside of Quebec, place high priority on. We want a bill of rights in our constitution to protect minorities in this country, not only linguistic minorities, but those of religion, race, sex and so on.

The other day the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) placed a motion before this House asking that this House support French speaking Canadians in the Penetang area of Ontario in their request for a minority language school. Some Conservatives said no to that request. We have not heard anything from this government with regard to federal assistance for minority language education and second language education. To my knowledge, they have done nothing to try and implement the bill passed in this House in the last session giving the right to French and English Canadians to have criminal trials in the language of their choice.

I have a strong feeling that this government has a tendency to ignore Francophones outside of Quebec and Anglophones in Quebec. One has the impression that this Tory government supports the view that Quebec should be solely French and the rest of the country solely Anglophone. In that sense they seem to approve of the bill 101 philosophy.

I wish to remind them, because there are not too many opposite from Quebec, northern Ontario or northern New Brunswick, that Montreal is the third largest English speaking city in Canada and that Quebec is the fourth largest English speaking province in Canada. We have more Anglophones in Montreal and in Quebec than most of the provinces and we have been there longer. We are not a new phenomenon. There are more French Canadians in Ontario than there are in some of the maritime provinces.

These minority groups in provinces which have a linguistic majority in the other language are extremely important. Under our proposals, those language minorities would have been protected. I hope this government will do the same, but I have my doubts as a result of what they have done so far. I personally would like to warn the government that we will be here to ensure they do not forget us. Under no circumstances will we allow them to sell us out and to sell out other minorities in this country.

In my capacity as caucus chairman of Indian and northern affairs I have taken note of certain proposals in the Speech from the Throne, especially those which state it is the government's intention to propose amendments to the Indian Act. Or as the speech states "to correct inequities borne by some individuals". The intention is not too clear. I am not sure whether the Speech from the Throne is telling us they are going to make over-all amendments to the Indian Act, or whether they are talking about the problem of Indian women marrying non-Indian men and thereby losing their status.

● (1430)

In any case, as the critic for Indian affairs in this House on behalf of my party, I should like to know whether they intend to go forward with this amendment without the approval of the Indian people of the country. It has been our policy not to amend the Indian Act in the absence of the agreement of the Indian people with respect to the proposals. I intend to pursue this point. Are members opposite talking about specific amendments with respect to Indian women or the general emendation of the Indian Act? Do they intend to proceed without the approval of the Indian people?

I should also like to know whether the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp) agrees with the recent policy statement by the president of the National Indian Brotherhood that, if the Indian Act is amended with respect to Indian women so that they have the same status before the law as Indian men, that policy should be made retroactive and that the resources necessary to take care of all those new Indians should be provided. If we amend the act, as we should do to make sure that Indian women have the same rights as Indian men, there will be a lot more status Indians—double or triple the population of status Indians. If we are sincere about what we are doing, it means doubling reserve land and increasing the resources available to the Indian people of this country to take care of all those new status Indians.

With respect to aboriginal claims, we do not know where the government stands at the present time. I do know the minister has greatly upset the committee for original peoples entitlement in the Mackenzie Delta, the COPE organization, by suggesting he intends to re-examine the agreement in principle which was signed by the former minister for Indian affairs and the COPE organization. They do not know, now, whether they have any agreement or not. The government cancelled the last two meetings which were set with the Council of Yukon Indians to discuss their land claims. They have received the Nunavut proposal from the Inuit in the eastern Arctic but they have not expressed any reaction. The other day the Montagnais people of Quebec received a letter from the minister stating they had a prima facie case for their aboriginal claim but due to the fact that the government was reviewing its policy there was no money available to research their claim and it was not known what the outcome would be. I should like to know—and so would the Indian people—what policy the government intends to pursue with respect to aboriginal claims.

In conclusion, let me say that this Speech from the Throne is a complete disappointment. After waiting five months to call Parliament, the longest period in Canadian history in which Parliament has not met, we find only a commitment to more study and more confusion. Let me make this clear to the government: they did not have the support of the majority of Canadians voting in the last election; they do not hold a majority in this House. They should recognize those facts. This is a Parliament of minorities with respect to the parties. We in opposition intend to do everything possible to keep the government honest, to protect the national interest and, despite the administration's poor performance so far, to make sure we get good government in this country.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to take part in this throne speech debate. For me, it is a special honour to stand here today, for I came as an immigrant to this country. My parents came to Canada after experiencing the horrors of the last world war. They came in search of a peaceful place in which to raise their children and they found a home in Regina, Saskatchewan. It is therefore a special honour for me to stand here today as a representative of the community my parents chose as home and in which I was raised.

The community has all the rich social fabric which makes up our country today. Long before the Europeans came, Indians lived on the prairies hunting vast herds of buffalo. Then the explorers came, establishing missions and posts like Lebret and Fort Qu'Appelle. Later came the many waves of European settlers. They came from the Ukraine, the British Isles, Germany, Russia and many other lands. This heritage is all part of our community.

The area I represent has a very interesting history. It was not far from Fort Qu'Appelle that General Middleton set off northward to put down the rebellion of the northwest peoples led by Gabrielle Dumont and Louis Riel. It was in Regina that the Conservative government of the day hung Louis Riel in 1885.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. de Jong: May I digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to talk about the plight of the many people of Indian ancestry who live in my riding. The Indian and Metis people have some very legitimate grievances which should have been settled years ago. Too many of them live in economic and social squalor, substandard housing and conditions of ill health, unemployment, welfare dependency and cultural alienation. Indian and Metis people do not want to be dependent upon welfare and government hand-outs. For too many years their lives have been ruled by white bureaucrats. The Indian and Metis people want us to adhere to the commitments which were made when this land was developed. They want the tools and resources with which they can achieve their own economic and social self-sufficiency. For too long we have seen Liberal and Conservative government agents steal their land, evade responsibility and create bureaucratic straitjackets. We need clear, honest leadership if we are to avoid increased human tragedy in my community.

Mr. Speaker, the people I represent have a unique social history, for it was in Saskatchewan that farmers first stood up to the grain companies early in this century. Farmers were being robbed by grain buyers at the grain exchange so they organized wheat pools and, through co-operation, they began to take some control over their lives. It was in Regina in 1933 that the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation—the CCF—was formed, a new political party dedicated to the rights of all Canadians, not just those of the privileged few. It was in Saskatchewan, also, that the CCF first formed a government in 1944 when the people of that province embarked on a great social experiment. In the tradition in which they had fought the grain companies they began to tackle other common problems.

In a very short period of time, some 30 years, the people of Saskatchewan have changed the course of Canadian history. For example, when the banks wanted to take the farmers' land, Tommy Douglas passed laws to stop them. In 1948, a hospitalization scheme was introduced because the government believed that every human being should have access to hospital care regardless of how rich or poor they happened to be. Over the years the people have built up a family of Crown corporations, including everything from an energy company to a computer corporation. They are owned by the people and operated in the interests of the people. Medicare was introduced in Saskatchewan in 1962. Now, all Canadians have access to medical services. Unfortunately, the Liberals started to destroy the system and I am afraid the Conservatives will finish the job.

I would like to point out that in every province except Saskatchewan citizens must pay hundreds of dollars annually for medicare premiums and deterrent fees. In Saskatchewan there is no extra charge for medicare. The people of Saskatchewan do not have to pay extra for health care. It is a right in Saskatchewan, as it should be all across Canada.

How do we do it? A good question. We co-operate. We do not approach problems in the way Liberals and Conservatives do, we co-operate. We have different ideas about organizing the economy. We have different priorities. We care about our fellow citizens. We are our brothers' keeper. In Saskatchewan we believe that the resources belong to the people. We do not let the multi-nationals carry them all away. It might interest people to know that in Saskatchewan there is a dental care program covering children between the ages of four and 12. Soon all young people in the province of Saskatchewan will be covered by a dental plan at no direct cost to the family. It will not cost the people of Saskatchewan thousands of dollars to take care of their children's teeth.

How can we do it? Well, we realize that properly managed Crown corporations serve the people well. We tax resources so that Saskatchewan people reap the benefits from those resources. We use this money to finance our social programs. Last year, for example, the Saskatchewan government got more than ten times the amount from its resources than did the Ontario government. That is how we do it. It is not so difficult. It is a matter of co-operation.

It is exactly the opposite of what this present government is doing. Instead of developing Petro-Canada in the public sector for the benefit of all Canadians, this government would sell off profitable and essential companies to their corporate friends. In Saskatchewan we know the importance of public enterprise. Saskatchewan people own and operate many companies: a transportation company, an oil company, the world's largest potash company, our own energy company and many others. We are not afraid of public ownership. We use it in Saskatchewan for the benefit of everyone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Jong: Let us look at the benefits: dental care, a prescription drug plan which reduces costs for the sick, programs to help the handicapped, the least expensive car insurance in North America, and so on. The people of Saskatchewan believe in co-operation. We have co-operatives throughout the province; there is probably a co-op in every town or village. Over 60 per cent of all banking done in Saskatchewan is done through credit unions. However, this is the work of only one province, the home of less than a million souls. Much more can be done on a national scale, and that is why we are here.

This country needs economic planning. For too long decisions have been made in the corporate board rooms of other nations, and the results have been disastrous for us. We face many serious problems. We have double digit inflation, chronic unemployment and economic hard times for many Canadians.

Our older people are the ones who worked hard to build this country. Today they are expected to live on meagre incomes. I would like to quote from a piece distributed by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women which was just recently released.

Three out of four single, widowed or divorced women over 70 had an annual income of under $5,000 in 1977. Even with the government old age pension three out of five single, widowed or divorced women over 65 live in poverty. Company pensions do not help many women. Four out of five single, divorced or widowed women over 65 receive no income from private pension schemes. This is how we treat old people in Canada when we have all the resources we have! This country owes much to its old people. Many young people have little hope of permanent and meaningful employment.

There is talk of oil shortages. Interest rates are soaring. As a nation we face a mammoth debt load. What is wrong? Why should a country as rich as ours not be able to do better for its retired people, workers, farmers and the young? Why? Because successive Liberal and Conservative governments have followed policies which gave away our resources and our heritage. It just boggles my mind. Many of our resources are gone, our environment is polluted and all we have to show for this is a mammoth foreign debt. Foreign companies have taken our resources and left us with debt. Every month millions of dollars leave the country in the form of profits and dividends. This widens our balance of payments deficit and creates many of the financial problems we face.

In Saskatchewan the government went out and borrowed money and used it to acquire a majority interest in the potash industry. Now the profits from that resource will stay in the country and contribute to rather than drain our financial resources.

There is no doubt that many Canadians are going to face a tough winter. Higher interest rates and oil prices will increase the cost of food, clothing, housing and other necessities of life. They will slow down activities and create further unemployment. The only solution the previous Liberal government and now this government seem to have is to attack the victims of the economic system. Cutbacks in unemployment insurance, cutbacks in job creation and cutbacks in low-cost housing and other social programs are the only solutions Liberal and Conservative governments have been bringing before this House.

What is needed is economic planning. We need an economic blueprint. We have to get control over the economic forces so that they benefit Canadians rather than exploit them. We need an economic blueprint which will provide stable prices, full employment, affordable housing, medical care and other social programs. Instead, we have a government determined to recreate a myth, the myth of free enterprise. Imagine, in our day and age when prices are not set by a free, competitive market but by a few international monopolies, we have a government which does not believe government should actively participate in the economic system on behalf of Canadians. This government is hell-bent on turning back the clock. It is destroying the few tools we have to protect ourselves from the manipulation and exploitation of multinationals.

When I read the task force report on Petro-Canada, I was amazed at the philosophy expressed. Somehow they seem to feel that we cannot run a successful public enterprise and still carry out social and national priorities. It is as though national and social priorities are incompatible with running a sound business. The people of Saskatchewan know that this is not so. They stand in total disbelief at the actions of this government.

In Saskatchewan we have a public transportation company. Our population is sparse and spread widely across the province. Many small towns and villages are served by this bus system. The profits from the main routes, those busy routes between cities, go to provide services to those routes which are not profitable. What this government is planning to do with Petro-Canada would be the same as if the Saskatchewan government gave the profitable parts of the bus company away and then began to pay for the unprofitable parts out of general revenue. No government in Saskatchewan would last five minutes if it tried something like that. It would be hooted and jeered out of office. Saskatchewan Conservative members of this House should know this. I am sure they do, and I am sure they know that their action will hurt them in the next election.

Saskatchewan people are quickly learning that this is not a progressive government. They realize that this government is controlled by the Bay Street boys.

What would happen if we sold off the profitable parts of our bus company? The unprofitable routes would have to be financed out of general revenue. There would be pressure to cut services, costs and taxes, and eventually the towns and villages would lose their bus service. That is the effect of this kind of thinking.

This government seems to have hang-ups about public enterprise; it does not think it can work. Well, if Petro-Canada must be taken out of government control, then I have a suggestion, a western suggestion. Make it a co-op, a national consumer-owned energy co-op. Give every Canadian a voting share. This would ensure that Petro-Canada would remain wholly Canadian-owned. It would also ensure that Petro-Canada would serve the interests of Canadians rather than exploiting them. It would ensure that Petro-Canada is democratically controlled.

If the recommendations of the task force on Petro-Canada are implemented, 100 people could end up owning and controlling Petro-Canada. It would eventually be taken over by oil companies and their corporate friends. Making Petro-Canada a consumer-owned co-op would guarantee that this could never happen. Who knows, five years down the road this co-op might operate a nationwide chain of service stations, explore and drill for oil and develop and market solar cells. Let the people make the decisions. Make Petro-Canada a co-op. I challenge the government to do some original thinking.

I would now like to discuss briefly the Conservative mortgage interest tax credit proposal. As with the issue of Petro-Canada, this government seems determined to push ahead with something which just does not make sense to anybody. This year we will be asked to approve over half a billion dollars for a program which will eventually cost the treasury over $2 billion. Why? It will not make housing any more accessible. In fact, increases in interest rates have more than offset what little benefits home owners are going to get this year.

The American experience shows that eventually benefits get built into the cost of housing and that banks and development companies are the only ones who really benefit from the scheme. This new scheme will not stimulate construction. It does not benefit renters and those who have already paid off their mortgages. The mortgage interest scheme is just a political gimmick for which the Canadian taxpayers will end up paying. If the government is really serious about helping the average Canadian acquire decent, affordable housing, let it use CMHC. We have the instrument to stop land speculation, to initiate social and co-operative housing projects on a massive scale to bring down the cost of housing. Members of our party believe that mortgage interest rates should be reduced. They should be brought down to 8 per cent for families earning $25,000 or less per year. This approach would guarantee that banks and developers are not the people who eventually benefit from the public program and the public purse.

● (1450)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Jong: A political will is necessary. I am afraid the government lacks such will. It has embarked upon a program of dismantling CMHC. It is just like PetroCan; they are going to throw Canadian people to the wolves. Their policies will drive up the cost of housing at the same time as destroying CMHC, the only measure of support and protection average and lower income Canadians have to get into the housing market. It is both stupid and cruel.

In conclusion, Canada is facing a number of crises: world energy shortages affect our lifestyle, inflation and economic uncertainty undermine our labour, environmental pollution threatens our health. We have reached a point in human history where man has finally become capable of total self-destruction. After millions of years of survival we stand on the brink of extinction. These are sobering thoughts, but if hon. members have been listening, they will know that I am not alone in this belief. Concerned thinkers and scientists throughout the world are raising their concerns. A new approach to development and economics is required. We cannot afford to continue with the outdated concepts of growth which we have been promoting for the past 200 years. We must have development which makes sense for people, not for profits! In some small way this was understood many years ago in Saskatchewan. The people realized that co-operation would make life better for everyone, so they co-operated. It is not perfect, but people understand that collective action can be taken to solve problems.

The people of Saskatchewan woke up to the fact that the free market system was exploiting them, that the free market system was not so free, that the free market system works well for bosses and owners but does not do very much for the little guy, the average worker and farmer in the country. We in Saskatchewan fought back. We started to take control of our destiny. Saskatchewan Crown corporations are working in the interests of the province. Any profits that are produced are turned over to the provincial treasury to fund social programs and further economic development. Saskatchewan people own a large chunk of their province through Crown investments. Saskatchewan people own and operate these companies. Saskatchewan Government Insurance will never leave Saskatchewan as Sun Life left Quebec. The people of Saskatchewan own their own insurance company; they direct its activities.

Canadians can learn much from the Saskatchewan experience. They can learn to take control over their lives, to direct their own future and to co-operate. Also Canadians will learn that governments can plan ahead, that governments can make life easier and our rewards fuller. Today Canadians are seeking a greater voice in the development of this country. They have good reason to doubt the ability of the federal government to look after their best interests. While Liberals and Conservatives continue to promote their outdated economic theories, our party will demonstrate that we have alternatives, that we can plan an economy which will reduce unemployment, decrease inflation and provide proper health and social services for all Canadians. We will not allow industries to pollute our air, water or land. We will ensure that the environment is cleaned up and protected for future generations. We are not pessimists, we are optimists. It is not a dog-eat-dog world as far as we are concerned. We believe in co-operation and sharing. We are our brother's keeper. We have faith in the human race. We have faith in people's ability to work together to solve their common problems. We have faith in the future. We have faith in the vast human and social potential which can make this land and this planet a peaceful place in which to live, free from starvation and want, exploitation and greed.

Perhaps the best way to sum up would be to paraphrase the first leader of our movement, J. S. Woodsworth, who said, "What we desire for ourselves . . . we demand for all".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. George Richardson (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate Your Honour on being elected as Speaker of the House. Also I should like to congratulate the mover of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Erie (Mr. Fretz), for his excellent motion and the manner in which he presented it. Also I should like to congratulate the seconder, the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald), on such an excellent presentation. I only hope that my maiden speech will be of the same calibre.

Also I congratulate our new Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) on forming one of the best governments Canada will ever have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Address—Mr. G. Richardson

Mr. Richardson (Humboldt-Lake Centre): I thank the people of Humboldt-Lake Centre for electing me. I assure them I will do my best on their behalf. Indeed it is an honour to be the first representative from the new riding of Humboldt-Lake Centre, the heart of Saskatchewan. The riding contains over 12,000 square miles of inhabited farmland, four potash mines, seven Indian reservations and some of the finest people in Canada. It is situated mainly in the park belt area and contains some of the best farmland in Canada, particularly in the northeast corner. It is strictly a rural riding being made up of the rural areas of the former seats of Saskatoon-Humboldt, Regina-Lake Centre and Regina East. Part of it is the original Lake Centre seat in which Mr. Diefenbaker was first elected to Parliament in 1940.

Times change, populations decrease and Saskatchewan lost four seats in a redistribution. Lake Centre was put in with Moose Jaw and Mr. Diefenbaker had to move to Prince Albert, a seat which he held until his death in August. The title "Lake Centre" has been retained as part of the constituency name in honour of our former prime minister, the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker.

At this time I should like to pay a brief tribute to Mr. Diefenbaker. He was never afraid of what men said. He always believed in what he did. One of his favourite quotes was that he was never always right and sometimes on the wrong side, but he was never on the side of wrong. He had the ability to bounce back, even when he lost the leadership at the 1967 convention. He went back to his hotel, shaved, put on a white shirt and said the equivalent of: let us go out and save Canada for Canadians. Mr. Diefenbaker made the Conservative party a progressive party. I believe it was his motion which added the description "Progressive" to the name Conservative. Whether this is true or not, it is a fact that he turned the party of the privileged into a party of the people, a party which believes in the worth of the individual and the values of private enterprise. He will be remembered as one of the greatest Canadians of all time.

This is a new government. We are facing the dawning of a new era. Unfortunately we are beginning in very difficult times. At the moment the annual budget deficit is approximately $11 billion. Our foreign exchange account is in a deficit position by several more billion. The United States appears to be going into recession, and the possibility exists of being dragged along with them. However, I firmly believe that if we fulfil our election promises, much can be done to alleviate the situation and put us on the right track to balance budgets and bring about a thriving economy.

● (1500)

Coming as I do from an agricultural riding, my first concerns naturally are for the welfare of agriculture and farmers. But let us face it, Mr. Speaker, when agriculture prospers, the rest of the nation does likewise. Even though Parliament was not in session, this government has been very active. One of our prime concerns, in the west at least, was to get grain moving and to put some cash in the farmers' pockets. We have set ourselves the target of increasing our grain export capacity by 50 per cent by 1985 to meet the Canadian Wheat Board's projected increase in marketing possibilities by that time. When we became the government in May, we faced the fact that in the crop year just ending the railways had handled one million tonnes less grain than in the previous year. Because of the previous government's failure to move sufficient grain in the 1978-79 crop year, we are going to have to increase our handling by 20 per cent this year, and by 10 per cent each year thereafter until 1985, if we are to meet our target and commitment.

In this matter, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) stated this morning that we are ahead of last year. We are taking action, and the wheels are already in motion. Some 5,000 rehabilitated boxcars will be coming onstream this year. In addition to these, there will be 2,000 Canadian Wheat Board tankers coming into service. Thus the grain handling fleet will be increased by 7,000 cars in one year. The Murta commission, headed by the hon. member for Lisgar, has made many useful recommendations which will speed up the turnaround times of grain cars. The Minister of Transport appointed the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) to meet officials of the elevator companies, and the lines which will be kept and upgraded have probably been selected.

An agreement on the development of Prince Rupert has been signed. Improvements to the over-all system are being rapidly undertaken. The appointment of Dr. Hugh Horner as a grain controller will speed up matters. Because of possible bad weather, strikes and various disasters, such as the one that has just hit the CNR bridge in Vancouver, it is never safe to predict success. However, prospects are bright and we may well achieve our target of a 20 per cent increase in grain shipments this crop year.

A couple of days ago, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael) told of the virtues and achievements of the previous government. Let us face it, Mr. Speaker, in a democracy all governments have some virtues and achievements. However, I maintain that we as a government have achieved in five months as much as they did in five years. The hon. member for St. Boniface mentioned the revised quota system. It was a good quota system too because it brought millions of dollars to the pockets of farmers in western Canada.

The idea for that quota revision was mine. In 1969, at a meeting of Mr. Stanfield with grain producers in Regina, I broached the idea of a quota revision, but I was told by Mr. Hamilton that we were not in power at that time, which I accepted. We were not in power and we could not do anything about it. I passed that suggestion along through the Federation of Agriculture to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board at that time. He saw the value of the idea and immediately instituted a quota revision committee. The basis of that quota revision was a new quota system which resulted in millions of dollars ending up in the pockets of the farmers of western Canada over the years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson (Humboldt-Lake Centre): Although it was my idea, they took the credit, but that is fine because we all benefited. If you transferred that idea from here to there, Mr. Speaker, you would see that we have achieved more in five months than the previous government has in five years.

There are also other matters of deep concern to me. With regard to energy self-sufficiency, it is very important that we stop being dependent on foreign oil. The Speech from the Throne stressed this point.

We promised a once in a lifetime exemption from the capital gains tax on the sale of a farm. This is a measure that is very important so far as farmers are concerned. It is also a measure which should be extended to the sale of small businesses. We hope that in time this will be possible.

During the campaign we also promised to inject some common sense into the previous government's mad rush to convert to the metric system. The appointment of an overview committee to discover how far the change-over has gone and make sensible recommendations is a step in the right direction. I hope to have time to return to this matter a little later.

The Speech from the Throne promised to implement our mortgage interest and tax deductibility scheme. Regardless of what the interest rates may be, those who are buying homes will still be helped by the scheme.

Last year, 20 per cent of the construction industry was unemployed and there were some 70 per cent unsold housing units in Canada. This scheme will help get those housing units off the market, will encourage new housing starts, will get construction workers back to work, and help an industry which is 100 per cent Canadian, using 95 per cent Canadian material in its work. What better way is there to help Canadians than by putting them to work building in Canada?

The matter of ever increasing interest rates is of deep concern to this government. The Progressive Conservative Party has always been considered the party of lower interest rates. The mandate given the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to look into all aspects of the situation and bring in recommendations should help toward finding a solution.

Small business is the backbone of this country. It is being badly hurt by ever increasing interest rates. It is the intention of this government to do something about rectifying this situation.

Returning to our promise of a once in a lifetime exemption from capital gains tax on the sale of a farm, I hope that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) will be able to implement this measure in his first budget. It is very important that he do so. So far as the farmer is concerned, his property is his pension plan. Because of his ever increasing productivity, he is one of the greatest inflation fighters we have. Why should he be made to pay for inflation that he did not cause?

The present roll-over features in the tax laws are not satisfactory. Under these regulations, a farm can only be transferred to a son or a daughter. A farmer cannot transfer his farm to his sister free of capital gains tax, even though the sister might have worked with him on that farm all her life. If he cash rents, he is no longer considered to be a farmer. He would have to sell his land to his son or daughter at the full market value as determined by the most recent sale of land in that vicinity. He would have to pay the full capital gains tax and his son or daughter would have to pay the full going price of land in that area.

It may be only a few years from now that a would-be farmer will not be able to afford to buy land from an heir who wishes to sell, because the heir will have to have so much money in order to pay his capital gains tax and have something left for himself that he would have to charge an outrageous price for the land. The only purchaser available then would be either a large corporation of government, for instance the Saskatchewan government land bank. In Saskatchewan now—I was given these figures the other day—there are some 914,000 acres of land already under the land bank and some 54,000 acres due to be purchased this year. We have to make it possible for the would-be farmers to buy land, and this once in a lifetime exemption from capital gains tax on the sale of a farm would seem to me to be the answer.

Land ownership by farmers on family farms has been the basis of progressive, productive agriculture throughout generations past. Continuation of our present course will result in takeovers by other than farmers—large corporations, governments and the like. Placing our farms under state ownership or corporation management lowers productivity and puts our future food supply in jeopardy.

Removal of this tax by allowing the farmer his once in a lifetime exemption on the sale of a farm would allow him to sell to anyone at a lower figure because there is no tax to pay. It would allow a family member to buy at a lower figure and be able to pay for it. It would keep ownership in the hands of the farm operator. It would enable him to produce for less, and at the same time productivity of the farms would keep going up, with society as a whole being the beneficiary.

As I said before, I would like to see this regulation extended to small businesses. During the campaign we promised to eliminate the capital gains tax from the sale of public Canadian stocks and bonds. Some 70 per cent of the small businesses in Manitoba, for instance, including farms, are not listed on the stock exchange. The elimination of this tax for them would help equally as much as it would the farmer, and we hope this will take place in the future.

Personally I have always questioned the value of a capital gains tax in a country like Canada, a country that is perpetually short of development money. It does not make sense to me to transfer potential Canadian investment capital to the non-productive sector by using a capital gains tax, then going abroad to borrow more capital at higher interest rates, further upsetting the foreign exchange and balance of payments accounts. I am told that less than 1 per cent of this tax goes into revenue, the rest of it being used up in administration. We are paying dearly for that 1 per cent in lost potential Canadian investment capital. Far too much potential Canadian investment capital has gone abroad because investors could get a better deal, a better tax break and a better margin of profit. It is the intention of this government to reverse this trend. It is the purpose of this government to encourage Canadians to invest at home.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, with regard to this mad rush to metric that was instituted by the previous government—

An hon. Member: Metric madness.

Mr. Richardson (Humboldt-Lake Centre): It is metric madness, you are right. Seventy per cent of the people in my constituency would put a moratorium on this metric change-over right now.

Personally I am not against changing to something better. I am for those changes that will give us an advantage in the marketplace or make daily life easier and reduce the price of product to the consumer. I believe that the units of measure we use should be the most practical ones; the ones with which it is easier to operate, the ones that will cost the economy the least, the ones that it will be to our advantage to adopt, whether these units be imperial units, metric units or some of each. This mad, indiscriminate rush to metric change-over has achieved the opposite result.

Perhaps I should elaborate on some of the foolish changes in measurement the previous government forced us into. As a farmer I have had units of measurement forced on me that were not asked for, were not needed and are not practical. I refer specifically to the bushel and the tonne.

A few years ago our international grain trade was conducted in tonnes, the farmers were using bushels and everybody was happy, if not with the price at least with the unit of measurement. Today the average farmer does not know where he is at. He has been forced to deal in tonnes at the farm level and a tonne is just something that cannot be visualized. The bushel is a unit of volume as well as of weight. The tonne is a unit of weight but its volume cannot be estimated. A farmer can look at a field of grain and estimate the bushels on it within a very small margin of error. There is no way he can estimate tonnes or kilos. He can look at a bin and tell you immediately how many bushels he has in that bin; he can multiply the bushels by the price per bushel and give you his net worth just like that. He can go and talk to his banker and get his loan. He cannot do this in tonnes without carrying around a bunch of tables and a pocket calculator. When seeding in bushels we knew what we were sowing, and when harvesting we knew what we were reaping. Quotas in kilos or tonnes mean nothing to us whereas quotas in bushels do.

A few years ago, and even up to the present, it did not matter to the Russian or the Chinese buyer, whoever bought our grain, whether the farmer delivered the grain to the elevator in bushels or tonnes. That buyer was receiving the grain in tonnes in any event. Why was this impractical tonne measurement forced on us at the farm level? As it is now, the railways are still paid for hauling in hundredweights and car capacities are listed in pounds. Where is progress made as a result of taking away our bushel and switching to metric?

I received a letter the other day from a small storekeeper in the village of Bruno, Saskatchewan. That storekeeper is being forced to buy metric scales at a cost of several thousand dollars with no trade-in value on his standard scales. These small merchants, the backbone of small communities, are finding it hard to make a go of it. In a small town of 400 or 500 people, and I come from one, how many thousands of dollars worth of groceries do these storekeepers have to sell just to pay for the scales? These small storekeepers cannot afford this kind of thing.

Referring now to lumber, if all our mills were switched to metric what would we use to repair all the standard size buildings in North America? A metric piece of plywood is three inches shorter and an inch and a half narrower. Sheer necessity would force us to produce in both standard and metric. The size of lumber yards would have to be increased to handle the different units. It would be necessary to have two production lines of equipment instead of one, and what that would do to the price of lumber I can guess. This would create problems and extra work for the mill men trying to fill orders for windows, doors, cabinets, lumber, etc. If followed, the actions of the previous government would force us to buy two sheets of metric plywood to repair that hole in our standard wall where the purchase of one standard size piece would have been sufficient. What a mess our livingrooms will be with cracks, joints, spaces and everything else all over the place! One standard size panel would have filled the need nicely.

To my way of thinking it would have been better to allow the person who wanted to use metric to buy a standard sheet and let him cut the three inches off the end and the inch and a half off the side. In this way we would only need one production line, not two, and in this way we would only create one set of problems, not two. The point I want to make is that to date common sense has not been used in this matter of metric change-over.

The manner in which metric change-over was handled by the previous government was an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people, and a costly insult at that. Industry knows when changeover will be beneficial to it. Farmers, storekeepers, consumers in general know what they want and what is good for them. When they want change they will ask for it, and the time for changing should be of their choosing. That is democracy, Mr. Speaker. In addition to that, when 70 per cent of our trade is with the United States any process of change-over should be in tandem with them; that is, we should change as they do.

I should like to commend the Minister of State for Small Business and Industry (Mr. Huntington) for appointing an over-view committee to study the progress of metric conversion. I am sure this committee will bring in some common sense recommendations that will let us either retain or convert to the unit that best serves our purpose, be that an imperial unit, a metric unit, or some unit yet to be devised.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure this Thirty-first Parliament will be one of the most productive, progressive and at the same time conservative Parliaments we have ever had.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1520)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the throne speech debate. I extend my congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, on being re-elected as Speaker of this House. It is an historical event because I believe it is the first time a member of the opposition has been elected to serve as Speaker in this House. It reflects the confidence which both sides of this House have in your abilities, and I am sure that they will be challenged in this minority Parliament, making your duties that much more onerous. I hope that your ability to judge wisely and your fairness will continue. Those of us from northern Ontario feel it a great honour that one of our own should be elected Speaker of the House. I know that hon. members who served on the back bench on the government side in the last Parliament look forward with great anticipation to the much wider latitude you have always provided to members of the opposition, especially during the daily question period.

I would also like to extend congratulations to Senator Grosart on being elected as Speaker of the other place. He has been a member of long standing in the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and I sure that this will stand him in good stead in his new appointment. Of course, as Speaker in the Senate he will also be the honorary president of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

I also want to extend congratulations to the former speaker, Senator Lapointe, on the character and the ability with which she served in this high office for several years. She did so with great style, grace and charm, and she has been an outstanding ambassador for Canada when she travelled abroad, whether replacing the Speaker of this House or acting in her own role as Speaker of the Senate.

I congratulate the hon. members for Erie (Mr. Fretz) and Cardigan (Mr. MacDonald) on their respective replies to the Speech from the Throne. I believe that they performed in the best traditions of this House, and hopefully have started what will be very good and worth-while parliamentary careers.

I extend my appreciation to the people of Algoma who last May 22 made what I believe was a very wise decision. I appreciated their support and encouragement on election day. Algoma riding takes in parts of Sudbury and Manitoulin districts as well as Algoma District on the north shore of Lake Huron, and it carries on up along the Lake Superior shore.

There were two significant changes which took place in the constituency this year. Some 15 per cent to 20 per cent of Sault Ste Marie, that area north of the second line and west of Allen's Side Road, was brought into the Algoma riding which resulted in some 11,000 electors being added to the constituency. I look forward to serving those constituents from that important city.

Likewise, since the last federal election the town of Elliot Lake has grown dramatically. It is one of the fastest growing towns in the country. In fact, if this Parliament should last as long as the Thirtieth Parliament, though I do not believe that it will, it will probably be a city by the time of dissolution.

With the last redistribution, there is almost a 50 per cent increase in the number of electors in my constituency, which spreads out along a rural area of some 400 miles from just south of Wawa in the northwest to Nairn Centre in the east, and includes Manitoulin Island, the largest island in fresh water in the world. I believe that it is one of the most challenging and interesting constituencies in the country and that it has the best electors. Of course, the challenge is the same to each and every member in this House, and that is to represent our electors in the House of Commons and to serve them in the constituency. That is what I plan to do as we begin this Thirty-first Parliament.

The election of 1979 is a long way behind us now. We have had the longest break between the election call and the opening of Parliament in the last 44 years. I think that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) indicated that this time was necessary. It is worthwhile to look at some of the things which have happened during this period while the House was not sitting. Certainly there have been some very harmful and very negative occurrences in my constituency.

Specifically, I refer to the decision made in early July to locate the new uranium refinery for the province of Ontario in Port Hope, just on the doorstep of metropolitan Toronto. This was a terrible blow to the economy, planning and hopes of all the municipalities along the north shore of Lake Huron. We believed that this Crown corporation would be located at Blind River on the north shore of Lake Huron. This move represents the loss of some $100 million in capital investment and 235 new jobs in an area which has one of the highest employment rates of any area in the province.

I believe that it is the policy of this government to locate the refining of uranium and other mineral resources from northern Ontario on the doorstep of metropolitan Toronto. With such a policy it will be a long time before we in the north achieve those economic and social goals which we look for. As if to add insult to injury, we learned last week via the news media that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and Eldorado Nuclear had announced that the nuclear waste of that refinery will be disposed of in Algoma.

It seems to me as though this government has no conscience, no heart and no soul. How could any reasonable person or government suggest that the resources will be mined and milled in the north, then refined in southern Ontario, which means that that area receives the benefit of the capital invested and the jobs available, and then after refining the uranium the nuclear waste will be sent back to the north? It is totally unacceptable. I hope that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will reverse this decision and locate the new uranium refinery in the north where it should have been in the first place.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) this summer decided to cancel the Canada Works program. This will have a disastrous effect on many of the communities in the Algoma-Manitoulin area which has depended on this program for some 400 to 500 seasonal jobs each year. This program has meant the spending of $1.5 million to $2 million on municipal and community projects, mainly through the municipal councils and Indian bands. There are approximately 4,000 to 5,000 status Indians living in the Algoma-Manitoulin area on 12 different Indian reserves. This program, which had created employment and benefited many of the communities, will now be replaced by unemployment insurance or welfare payments. Such a move was a cruel blow and most unfortunate for our community. A few weeks ago we had a seminar on employment programs for young people. We found that this Canada Works program, which we normally think of in terms of seasonal employment during the winter and spring months, was in fact utilized by young people to the extent of 45 per cent.

The new government came to power promising a great deal of economic activity and a chance for the private sector. On reading the Toronto Star yesterday, a headline suggested that the government was planning to impose a 23-cent excise tax on gasoline; this on top of a $4 increase in the price of a barrel of crude oil. If this report is accurate, then surely we are in for very, very hard economic times.

● (1530)

Yesterday in the House, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) told hon. members that he wanted to get that oil price increase behind him and get on with the building of the economy. I can see why he wants to get on with the building of the economy and get the oil price increase behind him, but if that oil price increase is to be 30 cents or 40 cents, as has been rumoured in press reports, we will not be getting on with the building of the economy very rapidly this year. It seems to me that if we are facing a 40-cent increase in gasoline prices, this will have a disastrous effect on the economy. An impact like that on the economy would be the equivalent of striking a weakened man with a baseball bat. As a result, the consumer price index will probably get pushed up 4 per cent to 5 per cent, giving us double digit inflation and a weakening economy.

The premier of Ontario has talked about the loss of 20,000 jobs in the province. His emissary, Mr. Miller, has come to Ottawa today to try to persuade the government not to move in such a drastic and harmful way. Mr. Blakeney, Premier of Saskatchewan, along with premiers from the Atlantic provinces, has expressed concern and denounced the move. All the sweetness and light of federal-provincial co-operation that we were told about during the election campaign seems to have gone down the drain over the last 24 hours.

I want to turn now to the report delivered by the task force on Monday. It seems to me that the proposals for the national petroleum corporation, Petro-Canada, require a review before being adopted by this government. In my opinion, the most devastating effect would be that of the government having to pay off approximately $1.5 billion and then having to turn around and give the shares away. Surely if we are talking about cutting back government expenditures, putting an item of $1.5 billion in the supplementary estimates next spring will require a lot of fund raising from one source or the other. I do not know if this report that about 23 cents excise tax will be loaded on gasoline prices is true or not. Perhaps that is the way the Minister of Finance will raise the $1.5 billion that would have to be paid off if the task force report is implemented.

Instinctively I feel there will be harmful effects if the government pursue this action. If we are in a tight financial situation, why deliberately assume an obligation of that size just to give something away? If we were to follow the procedure outlined by the task force report and at the same time the minister were to impose a 23-cent excise tax on each gallon of gasoline, we would have a situation whereby the Prime Minister by his own handiwork would be handing out a few shares of Petro-Canada worth maybe $100 and there would be an imposition of $150 in excise tax in order to get the money back. In a situation like that, no one gains. And, the real hooker is that we continue to pay the excise tax year after year, whereas the $100 worth of Petro-Canada shares, as proposed in the task force report, would be a one-time thing.

This report proposes an agency to take on all the risky ventures. All the things Petro-Canada is doing would be put into a company called Petro-Canada Exploration, which would be given away to the Canadian people. The risky things, such as the high Arctic exploration and the activities offshore on the east coast where this year the drilling of one well cost $25 million, would be assumed by this agency. Each year this agency would have to come back to Parliament to get approval for money required for exploration, for research into and development of tar sands technology, and so on.

At the present time Petro-Canada, because of its activities in the conventional western basin, is generating revenues in the order of $350 million in cash flow this year. That figure is projected to be $550 million next year from its investments in Pacific Petroleums, Atlantic Richfield and others. I am told it is generating enough revenue that it will not be necessary to approach Parliament for two or three years for exploration funds. If we adopt that task force report, we have to pay off the $1.5 billion and then give it away. The agency taking the place of Petro-Canada would be coming to Parliament each year for funds for exploration and development.

There are other disadvantages as well. For example, there is a penalty involved. If the federal government were to pay off all the preferred shares owed to the banks in the Petro-Canada Corporation, a $20 million penalty is required to be paid by it. As one reads through the report, it will be seen they have tried deliberately to break up the activities of the national petroleum corporation—such as Panarctic, the Polar Gas project, and the Arctic pilot program—into projects that make money and ones that do not. We find that these shares are broken down. Obviously, it is a very difficult exercise, and I would hope that the government would not jump into that proposal lightly. In my opinion, there are some natural disadvantages, the main ones being the financial cost to the government and the lack of direction which will result because it is paying most of its concern to generating profits and to paying a dividend to shareholders.

I think PetroCan has shown that it can give impetus and encouragement to the private sector and involve little investors and small exploration companies in its activities, but at the same time it is always working in co-operation with the private sector. It does no individual exploration. Those items should be carefully considered by the government before moving to implement the report. In my opinion it would be harmful and would not allow the national petroleum corporation to continue with what it is achieving now.

When members of this House went to work in 1975 to establish this corporation, I do not believe many of us thought that it would achieve as much as it has in the first three or four years it has been in place. I am surprised that the government is persisting with its plan to dismantle Petro-Canada.

A Gallup poll that was taken shows that 48 per cent of the people polled want Petro-Canada maintained, while 22 per cent said they did not. A more recent Gallup poll I believe has been more supportive than that. It is only three or four years since the bill establishing this corporation was passed, yet we have a major Canadian company owned by the Government of Canada and therefore by all Canadians. This company is big enough to stand up to the big foreign-owned multinational corporations that it deals with every day. It also has an influence on the whole industry. Petro-Canada is the sixth largest petroleum producer in Canada today. It is in the same league as the multinationals, and many of the other state owned oil companies which most countries have around the world.

Petro-Canada has taken an active role in exploration in the Arctic Islands. In 1978, 16 of the 26 wells drilled in the most remote frontier areas had PetroCan participation. PetroCan has the largest land possession in the eastcoast offshore, giving Canadians a real chance at the tremendous activity and development expected to take place there. In the Hybernia well, where there was an oil discovery this summer, the only Canadian player in the game was PetroCan. It has a 25 per cent involvement.

Let us look at state trading which was a role of PetroCan and is not in limbo. Before this government was elected, Canada was in a position through PetroCan to make a deal with Venezuela and Mexico for some 100,000 barrels a day so that we would not be dependent on the multinationals such as Imperial which last year proposed to cut back some 25,000 barrels a day of oil. That was during the Iranian revolution.

In the negotiations signed by the former minister of energy, mines and resources, Mr. Gillespie, we had a $5 billion agreement whereby we would be buying their non-renewable resources and they would be buying our manufactured goods, items of high technology like the Candu reactor. That agreement has been in limbo since the election. I understand the French have moved in and have taken the position for 100,000 barrels which would have been ours, and prospects of deliveries by Pemex, the Mexican national petroleum corporation, have been sharply reduced.

These negotiations with Venezuela and Mexico are now in limbo. No activity is taking place. In a recent delegation that went to Mexico, there was only one PetroCan official as an observer. We see as well that the Japanese have taken our place in line. They are not negotiating for 100,000 barrels a day but for 200,000 to 300,000 barrels a day. They are talking about a pipeline across Mexico and a port on the west coast.

Countries like Mexico and Venezuela have indicated they want to trade on a state basis in the future. They find it incomprehensible that this government is considering dismantling our national petroleum corporation. When the Prime Minister was in Japan in June, he indicated that our net petroleum requirements of offshore crude oil by 1985 would go from 200,000 today to 600,000 barrels a day. He promised to cut it from 660,000 to 600,000 barrels a day. It has more recently been suggested that by 1990 it might be 800,000 barrels a day.

When Sheik Yamani, the minister of energy for Saudi Arabia, was here, he suggested the real crunch would take place by 1985. At this time a year ago, there was some surplus in crude oil supplies in the world, but by 1985 the demand will far exceed the supplies. Of course, the real crunch will come then.

State to state negotiations will become more and more important in the future. The government has indicated it will leave state to state trading with the proposed agency or Crown corporation, but they have left it in limbo. Instead of hiking their way down to Mexico or Venezuela to complete negotiations, they have been in limbo since then.

PetroCan has taken an active role in the Syncrude project and other projects in the west such as the tar sands, the Lloydminster heavy oils project and the Cold Lake project of Esso Resources. This is fitting. It is certainly our most important ace in the hole. There is no certainty that future oil supplies will be discovered in the western basin, the east coast offshore or in the high Arctic. We know the tar sands are there. It is a case of finding capital investment and of overcoming environmental concerns to bring it onstream. PetroCan has been and should continue to be active in that.

Negotiations with Lloydminster and Esso Resources have been in limbo for the past six months. In the last three or four years of its existence, PetroCan has been a real catapult in exploration in the Arctic. If we look at the Whitefish discovery in the Arctic Islands last spring where three trillion feet of gas was discovered, we see that the initiative for that Arctic Island exploration group came from PetroCan. However, it did not invest all the money; there was something like an 18 per cent investment. Much of the rest came from multinational corporations which launched on a five-year program that will cost $80 million. It has already discovered significant reserves of natural gas.

In my opinion, we will not get that kind of initiative with the type of company proposed in the task force report on Petro-Canada. We will lose that. It will be a self-perpetuating management more concerned about paying dividends to its shareholders, which it should be, than taking risks and bringing onstream four or five years earlier the oil and natural gas resources that we need.

The same is true of the Sable Island discovery last summer. When PetroCan first went in there all other exploration had ceased in that area. They spent between $40 million and $50 million on exploration and made a really important discovery there. Although they had been ridiculed by the industry, the industry followed along and went in and now they are only a minority shareholder. If that well of last summer is proven, there will be adequate gas for almost three times the needs of the maritime provinces. It will change the whole energy pattern in those provinces.

In the Newfoundland-Labrador shelf, nine of the 11 wells drilled off Newfoundland this summer have had PetroCan investment, including the Hybernia well where oil was discovered. PetroCan was the only Canadian participant in that project. PetroCan's initiative on the east coast has stimulated a great deal of exploration and development there.

It is interesting to note that the Premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Peckford, is one of the most lively and enthusiastic of PetroCan's supporters. It is a pity the Prime Minister does not listen to his counterpart in Newfoundland.

To put that kind of activity that is taking place on the east coast offshore into perspective, some $600 million has been spent during the last 12 years on exploration and development there. This year it will be $300 million. That shows the kind of enthusiastic activity that is taking place this year while a few years ago activity was very low. If oil is discovered there in quantities large enough to be produced, it will be in the right place because it is on the east coast that we import most of our oil.

PetroCan has been intimately involved in the Arctic pilot project, which is a liquefied natural gas proposal. It is designed to use tankers and a gasification scow to liquefy natural gas in the Arctic Islands and ship it by tanker to east coast ports. The capital investment involved is much smaller than would be required for a pipeline. It gives us flexibility in the movement of natural gas in liquefied form to all the east coast ports.

● (1550)

Even more important is the ship technology which would be involved. There would be important spin-offs for delivering minerals and ores from the Arctic Islands. We are building up significant gas reserves in the Arctic Islands and this is the most favourable project at this stage, certainly from a financial point of view, because, as I say, not so much capital is needed as would be needed for the building of a pipeline. Using two ice-breaker tankers under that scheme we could process some 250 million cubic feet of gas per day, the equivalent of 40,000 barrels of oil a day, for the east coast. With the acquisition of Pacific Petroleums, PetroCan was placed in a much more favourable revenue position and I hope that before the government destroys or dismantles the national petroleum company it will listen to members of Parliament on this side, to members on its own back benches, to the provincial premiers and, most of all, to the wishes of the Canadian people. They want the corporation to remain in force to ensure our supplies of petroleum in the future.
