IMAGE EVALUATION TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences
Corporation

CIHM/ICMH Microfiche Series.

> CIHM/ICMH Collection de microfiches.

Technical and Bibliographic Notes/Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this capy which may be bibliographically unique. which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.Coloured covers/
Couverture de couleur
7 Covers damaged/
Couverture endommagéeCovers restored and/or leminated/
Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculéeCover title missing/
Le titre de couverture menque
Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en coulaur
Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/
Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)Coloured plates and/or illustrations/
Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
Bound with other material/
Relié avec d'autres documents
Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/
La reliure serrée paut causer de l'ombre ou de le distortion le long de la marge intérieure

Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/
Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.

Additional comments:/
Commentaires supplémentaires:

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurar. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent mudifier une image reproduite, ou qui pauvent exiger une modification dans la, méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

Coloured pages/
Pages de couleur
$\rightarrow$ Pages damaged/
Pages endommagéesPages restored and/or laminated/
Pages restaurées at/ou pelliculées
Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/
Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
$\square$ Pages detached/

Showthrough/
TransparenceQuality of print varies/
Qualité inégale de l'impressionIncludas supplementary material/
Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
Only edition available/
Seule édition disponible
Pages wholly or partially obscured by arrata slips, tissues, atc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image/
Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées é nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/ Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la genérosité de:

Bibliothèque nationale du Québec

The copy filmed here has been reproduced thenks to the generosity of:

Bibliothèque nationale du Québec

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condltion and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filined beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol $\rightarrow$ (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol $\nabla$ (meaning "END"). whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filme, et en conformite avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernidre page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la premiere page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la derniére page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la derniére image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole $\rightarrow$ signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole $\nabla$ signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être titi...ds à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenent le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

CHI
'Cilumblu, lumitis yor the fiont limes in the now north which hic hatisjumurverel.

पேேधாா

ADVERTIS EMENT.

THE following tranflation was mot originally defigned for the prefs; it is therefore hoped, that it will be read with candour, efpecially when the public is affured, that the principal motive in publifhing it, is to afford fome pecuniary aid to the father of a young family, who, indeed, has rendered himfelf deferving of whatever profits may arife from the fale, by his affiduity in preparing it for the prefs.

There

36082

ADVERTISEMENT.

There are yet two volumes remaining of this work, as will be feen in the author's preface (the tranflation of which is in great forwardnefs); there can, however, be no impropricty in publifhing this volume feparately, as the fame was done in the original. Whether the others fhall follow or not, muft be determined by the reception which this may meet with.

TRANSLATOR.

ERRATA.

Page 55 , in note, for, has not got it-read, has it not.
88, line 17 , for, attain-read, obtain.
113 , line 12, for, falis-r. folis.
346, laft line, for, they would-1. that they would.
158 , line 22, for appear-ir: appeared.
161, line 22, for, prevented-ri. fruftrated.
246, line 20, dele, themfelves.
266, line 7 , for, than-r. when.
274 , line 17 , for, they trembling fubmitted-r. they fubmitted with trembling.

The Duthor's $\mathscr{Z}_{\text {reface }}$

OF THE DESIGN OF THIS BOOK.

SOME years ago I digefted a plan, for a fet of amuling and inftructive books, for children of all ages; having obferved that fuch a collection, fo far as refpected the fuitablenefs of it, to the different periods of youth, was much wanted. In profecuting this defign, a principal point to be obferved was, a proper felection and gradation, not only of fubjects, but of ityle; fo that, in the perufal of thefe books, the young mind, at every fage, might be capable of comprehending the inftruction, and profiting by the amufement prefented to it. This felection and gradation I have attempted, in the Children's small Library; and, after that, in the New Robinson $\mathrm{C}_{\text {rusor, }}$ already publifhed. The latter was defigned to be the forerunner of Columbus, Cortes, and Pizarro.
A 3
tempted

[ vi ]

The children, then, who have read the two firlt works, or who have heard them read, are thofe which in this book, I have fuppofed to be my readers; and I have therefore prefumed them to be in poffeffion of that degree of underftanding and knowledge, which thofe works are capable of imparting: where Robinson $C_{\text {rusoe ceafed, }}$ in this communication and developement of ideas, Columbus commences. On this account, the ftile of the latter will be found fome degrt is higher than would have been proper in the former.

And for what fhall this latter book prepare my young readers?. Firft, for Cortes and Pizarro; but then, for that kind of reading, which I hold to be moft uffeful, becaufe the moft fuitable to children, namely, well digefted and carefully felected travels; that

[ vii ]

that is, fuch as at prefent we are deflitute of. I propofe dedicating for fome years to come, the leifure hours allowed me by my avocations in life, to the execution of fuch a collection, in which po more geographical, cofmographical, hiftorical, and other knowledge will be prefumed upon, than what young people may be fuppofed to have acquired, from the before mentioned books, and their ufual inftructions at fchool. And, I flatter myfelf, that I cannot employ the little time I may have to fpare; to better purpofe.

For if there by any thing capable of enlightening the minds of youth, of extending their knowledge of the world in an agreeable manner, of weakening their inclination to romantic views of life, and Arcadian dreams, exhibited in fuch inviting colours by our fafhionable publications; if thete be any thing capable of giving them a proper difguft, at that frivolous, affected, mind and body debilitating tattle, with which fuch books are filled'; and, on the other hand, of inftilling a defirable tafte for more ferious and ufeful employment;-if there be any thing capable of effecting thefe valuable purpofes, it is certainly the perufal of travels in which fuch care is taken; both with the matter and the manner, as to render them beft calculated to engage the attention of youth.

[ viii ]

This is my plan; and this book is written as introductory to it.

Hence my reafon will be apparent, for giving thefe hiftories in the form of dialogues, and alfo why, at the fame time, the explanatory converfations occur in this work not fo often as in Robinson Crusor. In relating thefe tales, to the children committed to my care, I was interrupted much feldomer than before, as they found it lefs neceffary to make enquiries.

As the beft refources for the hiftory related in this work are fo generally known, I think it unneceffary to fpecify them here. That I have not blindly or carelefsly collected my information, but, on the contrary,

[ ix ]

- have felected it fometimes from one author, fometimes from another, as I found them moft fatisfactory, will be perceived by thofe who have a fufficient knowledge of the fubject. In dubious cafes, where I had no other means of arriving at a clear decifion, I have taken the opinion of a man* who has lately developed this hiftory, with all the penetration of an Englifhman, and the affiduity of a German. I have, however, in fome inftances of little confequence, found it neceffary to correct even him.

I have more than once expreffed the maxim, that inftructors fhould not expofe the weak fide of humanity too frequently to children; but rather endeavour, as much as poffible, to conceal it from them, in order that they may not imbibe the dangerous notion, "If other people practife fuch follies and vices, how can it be expected that I alone fhould be an exception."-The one or the other of thefe propofitions, will now perhaps fubject me to the accufation of having

[^0]
[ $\mathbf{x}$ ]

deferted my firft principles, as the hiftory here related is fo fertile in examples of injuftice, villainy, and inhumanity. But, I anfiwer, firtt ; this work is not intended for little children, but, on the contrary, for thofe who are arrived at the pericd of youth, or thofe who are approaching to it. Secondly, thofe perfons who thus accufe me, evidently overlook what I added to the maxim, namely, that as children advance in years, and efpecially at the time they are about to enter into the world, they certainly fhould be made acquainted, though carefully, and by degrees, with the predominant vices and follies of mankind; fo that they may not, by expecting to meet every where with angels, be led, when undeceived, into the oppofite extreme, and condemn them in the lump, for devils. Thirdly, it does not make the fame impreffion upon the mind of a child, when he is told of fuch and fuch bad people baving lived fome centuries paft, as to hear of foolih and vicious characters who are living about him. Laftly, it depends in this, as in all other cafes of inftruction, principally upon the manner, by means of which one and the fame propofition fometimes promotes, and at others counteracts the end propofed. I flatter myfelf, that the way in which I have introduced incidents, as well as the manner of relating them, will be found eligible by experienced inftructors.

[ xi ]

To the queftion, whether this book fhould be printed, or not? the public has returned an anfwer to me highly honourable. The confidence placed in me, has awakened lively fenfations in my mind; and I hope my work will anfwer the expectations of thofe who wifhed to fubfcribe to it.

I have the pleafure to announce, to thofe, who with me regret the great dearth of proper books for children, in the french language, that this work has already been tranflated at Paris, and that, by a man whofe name* gives fufficient recommendation to his works.

This work will of itfelf prove, that my main object in compiling it was, as it always has been, not only to enlighten the underftanding of my young readers, by means of agreeable and ufeful knowledge, but, principally, to awaken piety in their hearts, to attach them to every focial virtue, to infpire them with a manly courage, equal to the difficulties and troubles of human life, and to excite them to difinterefted and philanthropic conduct. God grant that my attempt may not prove altogether fruitlefs; then fhall I be richly rewarded for my feeble efforts, and for this I would joyfully renounce every other recompenfe.

[^1]
[ xii ]

$$
\text { Hambro', } 7 \text { fune, } 1 \text { 1 } 78 \mathrm{r} .
$$

THE ## DISCOVERY of AMERICA:

FIRST TALE.

NiCHOLAS (calling the other chil(aren), James! Catharine! Thomas! John! Come, make hafte!

Cath. What is the matter?
Nic. O, make hafte; tell the other children to come. Father is going to relate fomething to us again!

All. Indeed!
Thos. Shall I call the others too, Father?
Fiather. Yes; go!
Fohn. Run as faft as ever you can.
Cath. (to Nic.) What is Father going to relate to us?

Nic. Oh, that nobody knows yet; but I think it will be a tale like that he told us about Robinfon Crufoe.
B

Cath.

[ 2 ]

Cath. (jumping) Oh! I fhould be very glad of that! (Thomas and the others, Henry, James, Jofeph, Peter, Frederick, Matthew, Charles, Eliza and Sarah come running.)

All. Is Father going to tell us another tale?

Father. Yes, children, if you fhould like it. All. Oh, very much!
Sar. Yes, Father, but if you pleafe, I muft go and call Mammà firft; or elfe you would have to tell it again.

Father. That is right, Sarah, Mamina mult be of the company too. Go and fetch her.

Geo. (tc Char.) Now mind, I dare fay this will be juft fuch a tale as that about Robinfon.

Char. I wifh it may.
[In the mean time, the family were affembled, and every. eye was fixed upon the Father, full of eager expectation. After a fhort paufe he began in the following manner.]

Fath. Now, children, what do you think I am going to relate to you?

Fames. Ah, who can know that.
Fath. No one, at prefent, to be fure; but you fhall foon be able to guefs it. I will tell you about one of the moft remarkable perfons that ever lived; about a man, who made one of the moft important difcoveries that ever were made; about a man, to whom we are indebted for many conveniencies of life, as well as for much knowledge, which we fhould not otherwife have enjoyed; in a word, about -well-who do you think it is?

[ 3 ]

Geo. About Peter Hele.
Fath. Why juft about him?
Geo. Hey! why becaufe, you know, he was a remarkable man. He invented watches.

Eliza. O, ay; the peoplehad ufed to call them Nuremberg egg.

Hen. Juft as if there were no remackable inventions but this.

Elisa. Do you know what, children? I think Father is going to tellus about the monk, who invented gunpowder. Hey day! what was his name?

Cath. Oh, you mean gbout Bartholoinew Schwartz.

Fames. And why not about Jurgens, the inventor of fpinning wheels?

Sar. Father, I do not think we fhall guefs it.
Fath. Well, then I fuppofe I muft tell you his name. It is Columbus.

All. Ah! Ah!

Fames. That will be a nice tale I am fure; I once read fomething about him.

Fath. I hope it will pleafe you, but to begin.-About 300 years ago there lived in

$$
\text { B } 2 \text { Genoa, }
$$

[4]

Genoa, in Italy, a man whofe name was Chriftopher Columbus. We know very little of his family, except that his parents were fea-faring people. It was for this reafon, in all probability, that from his childhood he had always a great inclination for the fame employment, and at laft devoted himfelf entirely to it. When he was yet a boy, he difcovered the moft promifing figns of the great qualities neceffary to a clever failor, as well as of thofe which are requifite to form a general good character. He was bold and active; no lover of indolence and effeminate eafe. Very early in life he learned to defpife all kinds of dainties, which are to be fure pleafant to the tafte; but injure the health; he was an enemy to trifling and to all childifh frolics, which are not productive of any good. His favorite employment was, to learn fomething, which would enable him at a future period to be ufeful to his fellow men.

He was informed; that if he wifhed to become acquainted with the fciences he fhould learn the latin language, becaufe there are many ufeful books written in that tongue: he began it therefore with all the ardourimaginable. In a very fhort time, fo great was the progrefs he had made, that he found himfelf enabled to enter on the ftudy of the fciences. Andbere, children, you fhould have feen. with what eagernefs eagernefs he inbibed every word that efcaped the lips of his teacher. Such was his application and his induftry, that at the age of fourteen he was well acquainted with geography, geome try, aftronomy, and drawing, and had made fuch attainments in other knowledge, neceffary to a failor, that although fo young, he was well qualified for the office of matter of a Thip.

[5]

Obferve, children. Thus have all thofe, who wifhed to become great men, diftinguifhed themfelves in their youth. It is therefore a juft proverb, that as the twig is bent, fo grows the tree. Rejoice, therefore, if you are confcious that you are now preparing yourfelves for an honourable rank in life, with all that ardour which once animated young Columbus; for in this care I have no doubt, but that, with the bleffing of God, you will obtain the reward of your prefent induftry. But if you do not difcover within yourfelves certain proofs of this ftate of mind, pray make hafte, yes, all the hafte you can, to attain it: for in 2 fhort time, perhaps, the opportunity for this preparation may be fled for ever! think, children, I fay for ever, and what a lofs will that be!

But to return to our Columbus: the firft fervice he was employed in was on the Mediterranean, for the navigation of his countrymen was at that time extended but little farther.

$$
\text { в } 3 \text { This, }
$$

[6]

This, however, was but a finall fphere for a mind that burned with defire to do fomethinge that no one before him had ever done. He therefore fought an opportunity for longer voyages, and found it. After a voyage upon the Northern Ocean, during which his ideas were very much extended, he enteredinto the fervice of one of his relations, a fea captain, who had fitted out fome flips at his own expence, with which he fometimes cruized againft the Venetians, and at other times againft the Turks.

Sar. What is the meaning of cruizing?
Fath. It is to fail to and fro, in certain parts of the fea, in order to watch for the enemies fhips, and, if it be poffible, to take them.

Sar. Ah! what juit as Rodney did with the Spaniards.

Fath. Right! Tn this cruize young Columbus very nearly loft his life; God, however, thought proper to preferve it for deeds of greater importance, In an obftinate engagement with the Venetians, in which our young hero proved a pattern of courage, both hips were grappled and took fire. You know what the meaning of the word grapple is, do you not?

Matth. To be fure! when one aris ed to another, fo that it cannot gct ivuie, and the people upon deck cut or fhoot each other, till one fide are obliged to furrender themfelves ifoners to the other.

Fath.

[ 7 ]

Fath. Quite right. Now only figure to ${ }^{\circ}$ yourfelves this terrible fcene; two thips thus grappled together, both in flames, and no other fhip near by which the people may fave themfelves! Such was the dreadful fituation in which Columbus found himfelf. But do you think it overcame him? Not at all. On the contrary, in this moft perilous fituation, where death evidently ftared him in the face, he poffeffed the whole of his intrepidity, and prefence of mind. He courageoufly threw himfelf into the fea, caught hold of a floating rudder, and eafing by this means his fwimming, at length got fafe to thore, which was about four leagues diftant.

Fohn. How much is a league?
Fath. Three miles. It was the coaft of Portugal on which he faved himfelf; as foon as he was a little refreined, he fet off towards the capital of that country, that is to Eliza. Lifbon.

Fath. Very right. It was this event that probably deterinined the career, of his future greatnefs; and we may alfo difcern in this fingle circumftance, how kind are the intentions of the Almighty when heis pleafed to afflict us. Be but a little attentive to me, and I will Thew you in what manner this is fo vifible here.

[ 8 ]

The Rurtuguefe were at that time the moft experienced and courageous failors in the world. They ventured into the Atlantic. Ocean, then but little known, and that farther than any other nation. Their exertions were repaid by the difcovery of two valuable iflands, which they named, Porto Santo and Madeira.

Char. Ah, thofe which lie near Africa.
Fath. The fame. Afterwards this adventurous people extended their difcoveries daily, till at length they formed the defign of attempting to difcover a paffage to the Eaft Indies by fea.

Fred. They had no occafion to feek for that long.

Fath. How do you mean?
Fred. Why they need only have laid the map of the world before them: they would then furely have feen that they muft firft fail down by Africa, then round the Cape of Good Hope, and then fail up again on the other fide of Africa; and then they are there.

Fath. Thou art quite in the right, Frederick, it is ftrange that in former times men fhould bewilder their brains a whole century about a circumftance, that one of us can find out in a fecond!

Fames. Ah, fo I fuppofe, becaufe we have got the map of Africa before us, and becaufe we know that it is poffible to fail round there-

[ 9 ]

Fath. Ah, why hear, Frederick, what he fays there. Had the people we are fpeaking of no maps of Africa, and did they not know that they could fail round the Cape of Good Hope?

Fames. No. And for this reafon they wifhed to make the trial, whether they could not get to the Eaft Indies round by Africa.

Fohn. We find too from ancientgeography, that in former times only the northern parts of Africa, and part of Ethiopia, were known; and whether the land towards the fouth was bounded by the fea, or whether it continued to the South Pole, the ancients were quite at a lofs to determine.

Fath. Why, Frederick, if this be the cafe, neither of us, if we had lived at that time, fhould have been any wifer than other people, for it appears to me juft the fame as if one fhould be arked at prefent, if, and by what courfe, one could get to the Eaft Indies round the northern part of America, or of Europe and Afia?

Fired. No.
Fath. Why not?
Fred. Why becaufe it is not marked in the map, whether there is an open fea by way of America and Afia, or not.

Fath.

[ 10 ]

Fath. What do you think then isthe reafon that this is not marked?

Fred. Becaufe the maker of the map, perhaps, did not know himfelf.

Fath. Take notice of that-Do you not now underftand why people, three hundred years ago, were obliged to make trials, in order to know whether they could fail to the Eaft Indies round Africa, or not?

Fred. Yes.
Fath. Columbus was now at Lirbon. His general knowledge and underftanding foon gained him the friendihip of feveral fkilful failors, in whofe company the plan which had been formed, to difeover a paffage to the Eaft Indies entirely by fea, was frequently the fopic of converfation.

Gea. Which way had they taken to get there till now?

Fath. The Venetians were at that time the only people in poffeffion of the Eaft India trade. They got the India goods by way of the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. But thefe two feas have no connection with each other, as you well know; on the contrary, they are feparated by a large neck of land : of courfe, when the fhips from the Red Sea were arrived at this place, the goods were obliged to be unloaded, and conveyed by land-carriage, or by canals, to Alexandria, in Egypt; from thence they were tranfported acrofs the Mediterranean to Venice. This loading and unloading, and tranfporting by land from the hed Sea to Alexandria, was a great hindrance to the Eaft India trade; and it was with good reafon that the difcovery of a paffage by fea was confidered as of great importance.

Another circumftance happened, which determined ftill more the courfe our Columbus was to purfue, i.e. he married the daughter of a fea captain, who was one of the firft difcoverers of the illands Porto Santo and Madeira. By this means he came into poffeffion of the $\log$ books and fea charts of this experienced perfon, and in ftudying them day and night, his inclination to undertake fomething fimilar, as well as his wifh to fee the newly difcovered iflands, became daily more powerful. He therefore embarked once more, and made a voyage to Madeira. He there purfued a very profitable trade for fome years, fometimes vifiting the coaft of Africa, the Canary Iflands, and fometimes the Azores.

Mother. Did he not take his wife with him in thefe voyages?

Fath. I think not, as none of thofe who have have written his hiftory have made mention of this circumftance.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}12\end{array}\right]$

Mother. Well, if that is the cafe, he may travel alone to night for all we care. Come, children, our work in the garden awaits us.

Eliz. Oh, Mamma! now this is juft the fame as when we heard the ftory about Robinfon. When one thinks it is juft begun, you call us away.

Geo. Never mind! Mamma only does it to exercife our memories. Don't you know that?

Eliz. Yes. ButAll. To work! to work! to work!

$[13]$

TALE II.

Father. DURING the whole time that Columbus was making thefe fhort voyages, to end from the Canaries, he did not once lofe fight of the great project which, it appeared, he had formed in his own inind, whilft at Lilbon. "How! (faid he frequently to himfelf), is there no way to India, befides that round Africa, which the Portuguefe are endeavouring to difcover? If one thould fail from hence right Weft, acrofs the Atlantic Ocean, fhould not one be able to find land, which would be either India itfelf, or connected with it? Is not the earth round? and if this be the cafe, why may not the 'Almighty have created a country on the other fide of it, in which men, and other animals, exift? Is it proba'ble that this other half of the globe is covered by the fea? No! no! 'India is, without doubt, larger than people imagine; and the Eaftern part of it extends, probably, very far towards Europe. If, therefore, one were to fail from hence right Weft, one certainly fhould get there."

This was the reflection that firft gave birth to his idea, that on the other idde of the globe

[ $\mathrm{I}+$ ]

there affuredly mutt be another country. But this was not the only one : there were feveral other circumftances which confirmed him in this opinion-the following muft be placed among the moft important. A Portuguefe once failed a great diftance towards the Weft, and on this voyage found a piece of wood, curiounly carved. This piece of wood, it muft be obferved, was driven towards him by wefterly winds : he therefore concluded there muft, without doubt, be an inhabited country weftward.

Again: Columbus's brother-in-law, upon a weftern voyage from the ifland of Madeira, had likewife found a fimilar piece of carved wood, which was alfo driven by a wefterly wind.

And again: Upon the coaft of the Azore inlands-I fuppofe you recollect where thefe iflands lie?

Cath. Oh, yes! Upon the Atlantic, between Europe and America.

Fath. Quite right! Well, upon the weftern coaft of thefe inlands, I fay, were frequently found trees torn up by the roots, of a kind never before feen. Thefe, alfo, were driven by a wefterly wind. In fhort (and this laft circumftance rendered the conjecture of $\mathbf{C o}$ lumbus the moft probable) there were once found upon this coait two human bodies, which were thrown up by the fea, the figure of which was fo fingular, that they bore no refemblance whatever to the Europeans, or to the people of Afia or Africa.

[ is ]

Columbus collected all thefe circumftances carefully together; reflected upon them day and night; compared them with the different accounts from India which he met with, either in ancient or inodern authors, and by this means his conjectures were converted into the ftrongeft conviction.

He did not, however, forget, that to err is natural to man ; and that two heads are better than one. He therefore felt a proper diffidence of his own opinions, and, for this reafon, confulted a perfon, whofe knowledge and underftanding were at that time highly refpected. His name was Paul. He was a furgeon in the Italian town, Florence. This enlightened man found the reafoning of Columbus very juft. He gave him ftill further information; which confirmed him more than ever in his opinions, and encouraged him to commence the execution of fo great a project, as foon as. poffible.

Columbus was now fully determined to enter upon the undertaking; but it demanded an equipment which far exceeded the limits of his property. It was therefore neceffary; in order to have it carried into execution, to lay it before one of the neighbouring ftates; and now the queftion was, to which he fhould give the preference. He did not hefitate a moment, but iminediately determined to offer to his native country the benefits of his future difco-veries.- He therefore laid the plan which ho had formed, before the Senate of Genoa, and requefted the affiftance which was neceffary to its execution. But this affembly did not fee the force of his reafoning. They looked upon this great man as a mere fpeculator, and rejected his application.

[ 26 ]

Columbus did not let this difcourage him. Having fhewn the refpect he thought due to his native country, he returned to Lifbon, with the intention of prefenting his plan to a court, which had, at that time, diftinguifhed itfelf more than any other, in undertakings of this kind. His propofitions were heard here with the greateft attention; but, after having enticed out of him the whole of his plan, they. behaved towards him with the bafenefs of traitors. They refolved to rob him of the honour of the difcoveries he lioped to make; they equipped a fhip in great hafte, and commiffioned another fea captain to execute what Columbus had plamned. This perfon fet fail, but as he did not poffefs the fpirit of the man whofe place he was occupying, he gave up all! ses of fuccels, after having made a fhort voyage weftward, and returned to Lifbon.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}17\end{array}\right]$

Zohn. That's right!
Fath. What?
Fohn. That the ftupid Portuguefe had not the good luck to wrong Columbus.

Fath. That to be fure fhould give us pleafure ; but, John, let us not call all the Portuguefe ftupid, becaufe, three hundred years ago, three or four filly advifers perfuaded their King to a bad action, when thefe advifers were, perhaps, defpifed by the nation at large.

John. O! I only mean them.
Fath. In that cafe thou art in the right. They certainly acted a mean and treacherous part towards Columbus, and he felt a great degree of indignation on the occafion. He immediately left a court which had treated him fo ill, and now directed his courfe towards Madrid-

Eliza. Oh! to Spain.
Fath. Yes. But as he could not be certain, whether his propofals might not be rejected by this court alfo, he fent his brother Bartholomew, who had always been his bofom friend, to England, in order to try, if he could not do fomething for him there.
c 3 Ferdinand,

[ 18 ]

Ferdinand, called the catholic, reigned as that time in Spain. He was of fo timid and diftruftful a difpofition, that he would not undertake any thing where there was the leait doubt of fuccefs. Ifabella, his Queen, was, it is true, more enterprifing than himfelf; but, being dependant upon him, the rarely interfered with any thing that did not meet his approba. tion. Add to this, the King of Spain was unfortunately engaged in a war with the latt King of the Moors*, whofe kingdom was in the Spanifh province, Granada. What then could Columbus expect from a King thus fituaided He was, neverthelefs, received by Ferdinand and Ifabella with great refpect, and heard with attention. Previous to giving him an anfwer, they thought proper to lay his plan before certain people to be examined, who unfortunately were deftitute of the information neceffary to the inveftigation of the fubject. They teazed' poor Columbus therefore with the moft prepofterous objections. One of them afferted, that the fea between Europe and India was fo

- The Moors were a people who came from Arabia, inio the upper part of Africa, and from thence into Spain They had made themfelves mafters of a great part of this country, but, by degrees, the original inhabitants became too powerful for them, and, after many long, and bloody wars, obliged them to leave Spain and return to Africa.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}{[9]}\end{array}\right]$

immenfely large, that a perfon, even with a good voyage, wonld be at leaft three years in making the neareft part of the continent from Europe. Another alluded to the roundnefs of the earth, and was of opinion, that in cafe a perfon fhould fail towards the Weft, he would continually go down hill, of courfe that in returning, he would have to fail conftantly up hill, which he obferved could never fucceed, let the wind be ever fo favourable. Others again wereimpertinent enough to afk him, " if he thought himfelf wifer than all the millions of people who had lived before him; and even, fuppofing there were a country on the other fide of the globe, whether he thought it could have remained undifcovered fo many centuries ?'"

Colunbus was obliged to fummon all his fortitude, to bear with the ignorance and pride of thefe people. However, he conducted himfelf with extraordinary patience, anfwered every. objection, even the moit ridiculous, in a ferious and refpectful manner. But of what fervice was it to him? After having loft five years, in endeavouring to convince thefe ignorant people that his plan was founded in reafon; he had the mortification to learn, that they had given the King the moft erroneous account of it; he of courfe received a refufal from this court, in the following words-" that they they could not commence any new undertaking fo long as the war with the Moors continued."

[ 20 ]

Figure to yourfelves, the ditrefs of poor Columbus, at this.mifcarriage of his fondeft hopes! it was great; but his fortitude was ftill greater. Far from giving up his adventurous undertaking upon this difappointment, he addrefled himfelf to two Spanifh gentlemen of high rank, who poffeffed wealth adequate to the equipment of a finall fquadron for a voyage of difcovery; but he found that they, alfo, were deftitute of fufficient confidence and refolution. He was again rejected.

Fohn. That is too bad, that the poor man's excellent project fhould thus be every where rejected.

Fames. I am furprized that he is not fo much vexed, as to give up all thoughts of it.

Fath. He would not then have been the great man he now is. Great and noble mindsobferve this children; do not fuffer themfelves to be terrified from the purfuit of a laudable object, no, not even by the greateft difficultie: that can be thrown in their way. Indifference, nay even ingratitude, from their fellow-men, may, it is true, give them pain, but will never difcourage them, or check their perfeverance. Whatever misfortunes may befal them, or whatever difficulties may obftrict their progrefs, grefs, their attention remains conftantly fixed upon the fingle object they have once nobly determined to attain. This is a certain mark of a truly great and virtnous character.

[ 21 ]

Such did the active hero of my tale prove himfelf to be. He bore nobly the mortification of feeing both himfeif and his plans every where rejected, and now determined to go to England' himfelf, having as yet waited in vain for news from his brother. This brother of his had the misfortune, on his voyage to England, to fall into the hands of pirates, and was carried into flavery, from which he was not releafed till fome years after. It is true, as foon as he was fet at liberty, he went to England, but in fuch miferable circumftances, that he was obliged to make and fell maps, in order to gain money fufficient to enable him to buy the neceffary cloathing to appear at court in.

Columbushad a fon, named Diego, whom he loved extremely. It was impoflible to leave spain without firft feeing him. He went, therefore, to the cloifter, in which his fon was receiving his education, and there made acquaintance with the Prior, or direstor, whofe name was Perez, and who was a man of learning. The Prior imnediately perceived the excellency of the plan, which others had confidered as founded ia ignorance; and, as he had reafon:

[22]

reafon to flatter himfelf with having fome influence with the Queen, he perfuaded Columbus to delay his departure till he fhould have received an anfiver to a letter which he faid he would write to her. Columbus confented; and Perez expreffed his reprefentation of the cafe with fo much earneftnefs and force, that the whole fcene became immediately changed. Columbus was called to court. Ifabella received him kindly, and his friends. began already to wifh him joy upon the accomplifhment of his defigns, when the timid doubts. of the weak King again ruined every thing. He called the fame people to council, whom he had before confulted about Columbus's plans, and as they ftill perfevered in the unfavourable fentence they had already paffed upon it, heabfolutely refufed to hear any thing more on the fubject, and, by his perfuafion, prevailed upon the Queen to break off all the treaties the had entered into with Columbus.

Here ftood the rejected, the flighted, and ill-ufed man, the laughing fock of mean courtfycophants; a fpectacle highly gratifying to. a fet of wicked envious people, who had viewed this rifing fortune with a malicious eye! He would have funk under a weight of the moft juft indignation, had not his mind been. ftronger than all the difficulties it had been his fate for foveral years to encounter!

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}23\end{array}\right]$

Eliza. O! Father! Pleafe to tell us firt, what are court-fycophants?

Fath. At the courts of Kings and Princes, as every where elfe, my dear Eliza, there are fometimes bad people mixed with the good; who neither can, nor will, do any thing but flatter, their fuperiors, and flander even men of merit, whofe honefty may fometimes offend their deceived mafters. Such worthlefs people, among courtiers, I call court-fycophants.

Eliza. Ah! That is it!
Fith. Columbus again fummoned all his fortitude, to make another trial, whichappeared to him to be the laft, viz. to go to England, and offer the King of this country a territory, which three courts had already, in their ignorance, contemptuoufly refufed. Whilft he was preparing for this journey, the Spaniards had the good fortune to take the town of Granada, and by that means put an end at once to the power of the Moors in the, Spanifi territories. Ferdinand and Ifabella were tranfported with joy at the conclufion of the war, as it put them in poffeffion of the whole of Spain; and, as the heart of man, when expanded by joy, is moft fenfibly inclined to good actions, two of Columbus's friends (men who were highly deferving of the refpect of future ages) ventured to take advantage of this opportunity, and once more lay before the Qucen, in terms the moft perfuafive, the truly great and well-founded project of their friend.

[ $2+$ ]

Geo. Oh! what were their names?
Fath. Quintanilla was one, and Santangelo the other.

Both of them fpoke with fuch zeal, and knew fo well how to give the greateft force to the reafoning of Columbus, that both the King and Queen were at laft obliged to confent.

A courier was immediately difpatched after Columbus, who had already entered upon his journey. He overtook him, and conducted him back again, as in triumph, to the court of a Queen, who was now awaiting him with the greateft impatience. Columbus at this moment forgot all the painful mifcarriages of his expectations, which he had had hitherto to bear with. He laid the propofals, upon which he intended to undertake his hazardons voyage of difcovery, befare the Qucen; and, as thefe were accepted, he at length, with unfpeakable joy, found himfelf at the fuminit of his moft ardent wifhes.

All. (jumping for joy) O , that is capital; that is charming! His hopes are at laft fulfilled!

Char. Is he going to fet fail directly?
Fath, You faall hear. that to-morrow. All. O, to-morrow! to-morrow!

TALE

[ 25 ]

TALE III.

Peter. О, MAKE hafte, dear Father! and let Columbus fet fail; left fomething thould happen once more to hinder him.

Fath. Do not fear. The bufinefs is now fo far fettled, that it cannot well mifcarry again. Columbus has got a paper in his poffeflion, figned by the Queen, in which is promifed him, amonglt other things, that he, and no other, fhall be Viceroy of all the lands which he may difcover, and that this honour thall continuc in his family to the lateft pofterity; and further, that he, and his defcendants forever, fhall enjoy a tenth of the revenue, which the crown of Spain may derive from the territories difcovered by him.

Matt. My goodnefs! why he will get quite tich.

Faames. He has been obliged to fuffer enough for it.

Fath. And fo he has.
The equipment of the veffels, which he was to take on the expedition, was now going forwards with all poffible difpatch. But they D were were fo finall and ill-built, that no other than Columbus would have had the courage to have ventured himfelf with them in fo diftant and unknown a fea, the dangerous parts of which no chart pointed out. One of them, in which he intended to fail himfelf, was called Santa Maria; the fecond, the Pinta; and the third the Nigna. The two laft did not much exceed the fize of a large boat.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}26 & ]\end{array}\right.$

This finall fquadron was provifioned for twelve months, and that only for ninety men. Thefe were the whole of the people who were to accompany Columbus upon this dangerous voyage. The expence of the equipment did not amount to more than twenty-four thoufand dollars*. Yet, fo enormoufly great did this fum appear to the Spanifh court, that the enterpiife would have entirely fallen to the ground again, had not Columbus agreed to pay an eighth part of it out of his own property. In return for this, however, he took care to fecure to himfelf an eighth of the profits which might accrue from the voyage.

John. Was the Spanifh court fo poor, at that time, as not to be able to raife fo fimall a fum?

Fath. At that time; my dear John, five dollars were worth more than one hundred are now, and this partly becaufe a perfon muft work harder to get them, and alfo becaufe they would purchafe more. And if you confider further, that the Spanifh court had been quite exhaufted by the long war juft concluded with the Moors, you will be able to explain to yourfelf this circumftance very eafily.

[^2]
[ 27 ]

Now, children, prepare yourfelves to fee at lait our brave Coluinbus depart. Every preparation is made; the veffels lie at anchor, ready for failing, at Palos, a finall harbour in Andalufia: have but a little patience, and you will foon fee them weigh anchor amidtt the loud farewels of a vaft multitude of people.

Nic. O why not rather immediately?
Fath. For this reafon; becaufe Columbus was not only a courageous and fkilful failor, but a pious chriftian." He therefore thought it his duty to implore, before he failed, the bleffing of the Creator of the fea, and Governor of the univerfe, upon his great enterprife, in which be was the more interefted on this account, that he had the intention of promulgating the knowledge of the only true God, among the ignorant favages that providence might lead lim to difcover. As, therefore, every thing was ready for his departure, he went, attended by all who were to accompany him on his voyage, in folemn proceffion to a cloifter, at a finall diftance from the town, and there, with the moft becoming ferioufnefs, offered up his prayers to God; the failors, in a manner truly devout, following his example. After this, they returned to their Thips, full of confidence in the protection of the Almighty, to whofe care they had commended themfelves; and the following . morning (it was the third of Auguft, 1492) they fet fail, amidft the fhouts of a vaft concourfe of people, affembled on the occafion.

[ 28 ]

All. Well done! well done! a good voyage!

Fath. According to the plan which Columbus had laid down, for this extraordinary voyage of difcovery, they failed right for the $\mathbf{C a}$ nary Lflands; but fo early as on the fecond day after fetting fail, they met with a misfortune, which, though in itfelf of little confequence, might have once more fruftrated the whole undertaking, had Columbus been as weak as his fuperftitious companions. The. helin of the Pinta broke, as it is thought through the premeditated defignof the mate, who repented that he had undertaken fo dangerous a voyage, and of courfe, wifhed to find that they were under the neceffity of returning. But in what light do you think the failors viewed this trifling accident? As an omen of the unfortunate iffue of their voyage. "We are loft, they cried, if we do not immediately return." And why? faid Columbus. Why! Anfwered they, does not Heaven give us clearly enough to underftand by the broken rudder, that we fhall be unfortunate if we do not inftantly renounce this rafh enterprize? Now, really, added Columbus, I cannot conceive where you could get the information, that this infignificant circumftance, is a prefage from heaven of future misfortune? As far as I underitand it, a broken rudder fignifics no $m_{n}$ re than that it fhould be mended. The admiral is an infidel, whifpered the failors, one to another! He does not believe in omens!

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}{[29}\end{array}\right]$

Columbus perceiving what were their opinions, thought it his duty to reclaim, if poffible, his ignorant companions from a fuperftition which might difcourage them on a hundred fimilar occafions. He therefore entered into a very minute converfation with them on the fubject, and clearly proved to them; that it was unreafonable to believe in any thing whatcver as a prefage; becaufe the Almighty has givea us no caufe to expect, that he will by fuch means inform us what thall take place in the future. With great wifdom and mercy, faid he, has Heaven on the contrary, conccaled from us the knowledge of future events. It is, therefore, an ufelefs and idle employment, to

$$
\text { D } 3 \text { endeavour }
$$

[ 30 ]

endeavour to guefy at our future lot, from circumftances that have no kind of connection with it. All that a pious and wife man has to do, is to attend to his occupation with difcretion and unceafing indurtry, to perform every day his duty, and therr to caft himfelf entirely upon the carc of Providence, without any anxious concern about what may happen unto him. And let us, my companions, refolve to adopt this as a rule, by which to govem ourfelves, during the whole of our voyage.

Columbus had the good fortune, by reprefentations like thefe, at leaft to leffen the fuperftitious fears of his companions, though he might not eradicatethem : and, without any thing farther of confequence having happened to them, they came to anchor off one of the Canary Iflands. Here they refitted as well as they were able, provided themfelves with all kinds of neceffaries, and on the 6th of September, again weighed anchor, in order to commence their great voyage upon the weftern Ocean, till then unnavigated. You may fancy how the hearts of the crew began to beat.

The firf day they w'se nearly becalmed, and made but little way. On the fecond, or as others fay, on the third, they ioft fight of the Canary Iflands. And now, children, direct your whole attention to the man upon whom the eyes of all his companions were folely fixed! From this day Columbus will difplay a greatnefs of conduct, which muft infpire you with love and veneratir towards him!

[ 31 ]

Scarcely had he and his fellow failors loft fight of land, when the courage of the latter entirely forfook them. Juft as though they had till now been unacquainted with their deftined voyage, they fuddenly became much territied at the great and daring enterprize, in which they were engaged. They began to weep, beat their breafts, and cried out like people that were led to unavoidable deftruction. Columbus affailed on all fides by their lamentations, ftood, like a rock in the midft of a tempeftuous ocean, compofed and firm, and difcovered fo much calmnefs of mind, fuch a fettled expectation of a happy iffue to his great undertaking, that his prefence would have given courage to the weakeft coward. He reproved them for their timidity, and placed the rewards, the riches, and honours they would meet with at the conclufion of their voyage, in fo ftrong a light, that they all forgot their fears, and promifed to follow cheerfully wherever he defigned to conduct them. From this inftance of their cowardice, Columbus learnt what fcenes he had in future to expect, and held himfelf prepared for them.

From

[ 32 ]

He was now almoft always upon deck, cither with the lead or the quadrant in his hand.

Fred. What are thefe?
Fath. The former, Frederick, is a heavy piece of lead, or iron, tied to a long cord. This they throw into the fea, and let the cord run after it. When the lead is got to the bottom, it may be learnt by the length of cord it took below the water, how deep the fea is in that particular part. Do you underftand?

Fred. Yes. But why do people trouble themfelves about the depth of the fea?

Fith. Should you not be able to guefs at that yourfelf? Think of it a little.

Fred. O yes! I know now ; if the water is. not deep enough, the fhip would ftrand and go to pieces, and for that reafon they muft always. try whether they have water enough.

Fath. Juft fo. Thus you fert if we do birt carry our thoughts about us, it is eafy for us to find out many things ourfelves. But now you will wifh to know what the quadrant is.

Fred. Yes, dear father.
Fath. 'Firft anfwer me a queftion. When you are going from hence to $B$-, can you tell at any part of the road how far you have walked?

Fred. O yes.
Fath.

$[33]$

Futh. And how can you tef that?
Fred. Why I only need count my fleps, or look about me; I fhould then know directly how far I was on the road. There is no art in that.

Fath. That is true. But tell me, would failors; when they are in the middle of the fea, where they can fee nothing but the fky and water, be able to tell exactly where they were, and how many miles they had failed?

Fred. No.
Fath. But you muft perceive that it is of the greateft confequence to thefe people, that they fhould be able at any time to tell this.

Fred. Certainly.
Fath. Becaufe, if they do not know where they are, they cannot tell how to fteer for the place they wifh to go to. Now, Frederick, how do you think they contrive to know this in the middle of the fea?

Fred. Why that is a myftery to be fure!
Fath. Come with me into the large parlour. Well; now look attentively at the ceiling, and take notice of the different ormuneuts upon it. Remember where they are.

Fred. Very well.
Fath. Now I will blindfold you, and will lead you backwards and forwards in this large room, room, and turn you round two or three times, till it will be impoffible for you to know whereabouts you are.-[The Father did as he had Jaid.]

[ 34 ]

Fath. Now lay your head back, fo that when I take the handkerchief off, you may not fee any thing but the ceiling. W.ell; now [taking the handkerchief off] look up, and tell me, if you can, in which corner of theroom you are?

Fred. In that next the organ.
Fath. How do you know that?
Fred. Becaufe juft in this place I find the rofe upon the beam, which I particularly noticed before.

Fath. See there ; you can tell where you fand by looking at the ceiling. Do you think that failors could tell in what part of the fea they were by fimilar means?

Fred. O, yes! They need only look at the heavens, as I looked at the ceiling, and I fuppofe they can tell by the ftars in what direction they are.

Fath. Right. But, my dear Frederick, the heavens are fo high, that the ftar which appears perpendicularly over our heads, feems to remain in exactly the fame place, after we have travelled many miles. Add to this, that the ftars do not continue fixed in the fame fituation; but, on the contrary, like the fun and moon, are to be feen fometimes in one part of the heavens, and fometimes in another. You fee, therefore, that failors cannot be guided by them exactly in the fame manner as you were by the ornaments of the ceiling.

[ 35 ]

For this purpole various arts, and fome very ingenious inftruments, are neceffary ; in particular one, by means of which the heighth of the itars, and their diftance from each other, may be meafured without going up to them. And this is the inftrument which is called a quadrant.

Fred. Ah! very well.
Fath. Columbus from this time, therefore, was chiefly upon deck; partly to make the neceffary obfervations refpecting the depth of the fea, and the courfe of the thip, and partly tu give the neceffary orders himfelf, for every thing that floould be done. F.w were the hours he allowed himfelf for neep and refrefhment ; yet he always exhibited to his companions a compofed and open countenance. He renounced every gratification, of which thofe about him could not partake, and was diftinguifhed from the common failor only by his penetration and fortitude, in which, indeed, he far excelled all his companions; and by means of thefe qualifications; he encouraged the cowardly among them, more than by the forcible and perfuafive fpeeches he addreffed to them. Such a man alone was capable of carrying into execution a project like that in which he was engaged. It muft inevitably have failed in the hands of any one who poffeffed a lefs degree of courage, penctration, and ingenuity.

[ $3^{6}$ ]

And with this enough for to-day. Tomorrow we will let our adventurer proceed on his voyage.

TALE

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}37\end{array}\right]$

TALE IV.

Fath. OW, children, before I proceed, I have fomething of importance to fay to you. It is neceffary that you fhould iiften to me with the greateft attention.

All. [full of expectation] Well?
Fath. In the courfe of my tale, I fhall often have occafion to mention the longitude and latitude of different places. It is proper, therefore, that you fhould all clearly underftand what thefe words mean.

Fohn. We have known that a long time.
Fames. Father taught us that two years ago, when we began to learn Geography.

Fath. Did I? Well; I an glad of it. Then one of you two eldeft muft take my place, and teach it the younger, who as yet know nothing about it.

Fohn. O, Yes. But we muft fetch the Globe firti.

Fath. I think we can do without it. Let us fee. I have a fketch here of a fmall globe, which, perhaps, will anfwer our purpofe. Now which of you will be Father?

All. O, I! I! I!

Fath. As you all wifh to be Father, I fuppofe I muft choofe one. You, John, being the eldeft, come forward; and do you, James, watch, whether he doesit right, or not ; in order that, if it be neceffary, you may affift lim.

John. Hem! Come here, daughter Eliza, and you, my fon Frederick; pay attention. I will teach you what the longitude and latitude of the earth is.

Mother. The beginning is pompous enough howeyer.

[ 39 ]

Fohn. Yes, Mother, I am Father now: It is therefore proper that I hould give myfelf a little confequence. Hem! Look here, children; this little drawing reprefents one fide of our earth.

Fred. Well.
Foln. The earth, as I fuppofe you already know, is round.

Eliza. O, and I know why; becaufe its fhadow is round, and becaufe-

Fohn. Not quite fo hafty, my daughter. What you are going to fay, does not belong to this place. Suffice it to obferve; the earth is round, like a lemon, only a little uneven; and this picture reprefents one fide of it.

Fred. Come, proceed; we know that already. Fohn. Upon this our earth are two points, which ftand directly oppofite each other, and round which it continually turns. (They are marked upon our drawing with the figures, No. 3. and 2.) Thefe two points are called poles of the earth. The uppermoft (No. r.) pointing directly to a ftar in the heavens, called the North Pole Star, has rceived the name of the North Pole. No. 2, on the contrary, is called the South Pole. Do you underftand?

Eliza. Certainly; the uppermoft point is called the North Pole, and the lowermoft the South Pole.

$$
\text { E } 2 \quad \text { Foln. }
$$

[ 40 ]

Fohn. Capital, my dear child. Now look again at our drawing. Round the middle of the glabe, the half of which is here reprefented, is a line drawn which divides it into two equal par ${ }^{+}$. . This line is marked A. B.

Fred. Is there really fuch a line upon our earth?
Fohn. Dear me! No; Frederick. We learned men only reprefent fuch a line in our own imaginations.

Eliza. But why do you do that?
Fokn. A little patience, and thou fhalt underftand it. Do you wifh to know what this line is called? It is called the Equator.

Eliza. Why?
Fohn. Becaufe we, in idea, divide the earth into two equal parts by it; and likewife, becaufe the day and night are of an equal lengtr, when the fun ftands directly over this line; for the word aquare, from which Equator is derived, fignifies, to make equal. Nowr, children, obferve the line drawn round the earth thus, from A. to B. and then on the other fide which we cannot fee, to A. again-this is called the longitude of the Earth. Do you underitand?

Both. O, Yes.
Fohn. Well ; fo far fo good. But now you muft learn what the latitude of the earth is. Do,

[ 41 ]

Do you fee thefe lines which run from the North down to the South Pole?

Both. Yes.
Fohn. Well, thefe fhew the breadth of the earth, and they are calleu Meridian lines.

Fred. Why Meridian lines?
Fohn. Becaufe, when the fun is exafly over one of thefe lines, all the places that lie upon that line have noon, or mid-day,* at the fame time. Do you underftand me?

Elisa. Yes; Doctor.
Fohn. Very well. One of thefe meridian lines, of which you may draw as many as you pleafe, is called the firt. In our drawing it fhall be this which you fee is drawn a little broader than the others, and is cutinto fmall divifions. Do you obferve it?

Both. Yes; yes:
Fohn. If we afk, (take notice) in what degree of longitude a certain place lies, we wifh to know what diftance it is from the firft meridian line. But, remember, the diftance from thence to the meridian line muft always be meafured towards the Weft. If, on the other hand, it be afked in what latitude any place lies? We then want to know how far it is from thence to the Equator. Is that clear to you?

[^3]
[ 42 ]

Both. O, yes.
Fohn: I obferve there is a finall fhip npon our drawing. If I fhould afk you now, in what longitude this hip is? What fhould I wiffs to know?

Elisa. How farit is from the firft meridian line.

Fohn. That is, fuppofing you to meafure towards the Weft, round the earth, till you come to the firt meridian line. But, Frederick, if $I$ enquire further, in what latitude the fhip is, what fhould I then mean?

Fred. Why, how far it is from thence to the equator.

Fohn. Right. Now I am quite fatisfied with your attention.

Fath. And I with thy explanation; give the little father a kifs, children, for having taught you fo well, and this [kifing him] thou fhalt have from me, as a reward for having done my office fo much honour.
fames. Buthe has forgot fomething, father.
Fath. What is that?
Fames. That the equator and meridian are divided into degrees.

Fath. Then do thou go and take his place, and try if thou canft not explain to them this circumftance as well.
Ffames. Hem! I will fee. Do you perceive that that the equator, aid the firft meridian line, are divided into fmall parts ?

[ 43 ]

$F: d$. and Eliæa. O, yes.
${ }_{5}$ umes. Each of thefe divifions is called a degree, and contairs fixty* geographical miles. The equator contains 360 fuch degrees; and a meridian line, extending from one pole to the other, 180 degrees. Now, for inftance, a perfon fays, a certain place lies npon the $33^{\text {oth }}$ degree longitude; nothing more is meant than this, that if we were to meafure round the earth, from that place towards the Weft, until we came to the firlt meridian line, counting the degrees upon the equator, we fbould find thein to be $33^{\circ}$. And, if the perfon fhould add, that the fame place lay upon the eighth degree latitude, he would mean, that if you began to meafure from the equator to the place in queftion, counting the degrees upon the meridian line, you would find them to be eight.

Fath. Bravo! James deferves a kifs too. Give him one, children, and there [kiffing him] is mine.

Fames. It was eafily gained.
Fath. Now, children, let us fee in what degree of latitude and longitude this fhip is, which I have drawn upon the globe.

[^4]Firft,

[ 44 ]

Firft, under what degree of longitude. Obferve, we muit count the degrees upon the equator weftward, from the place where the fhip is, until we come to the firft meridian line. But as th drawing reprefents only one fide of the earth, we cannot count upon it the degrees of the equator. We muft therefore depend on the accuracy of the perfon who made it. He has put, you perceive, under the fhip $3+0$, that then is the degree of longitude in which the finip is placed.

But now what is its degree of latitude? Here we can count the degrees ourfelves upon the meridian line from the equator; till we come oppofite to the fhip; that is hereabouts; therefore one, two, three, four, five : there we have it. It is under the fifth degree of latitude. Do you underftand that, children?

Eliza and Freu.' O yes, father.
Fäth. Very well; I am glad of it. It will be of great ufe to you in time to come; for if, in the courfe of my narration, I ihould fpeak of Columbus's hip being in this, or that degrec of longitude, or latitude, you will underftand what I mean. But obferve this, before I proceed, when we fpeak of the latitude of the earth above the equator, towards the North Pole, it is then called north latitude, and when we fpeak of the latitude of the earth, below the equator, equator, towards the South Pole; it is then, for the fake of a neceffary diftinction, called fouth latitude.

[ 45 ]

And now to return again to our Columbus. Fohn. 'That's right.
Fiath. On the fecond day of his departure from the Canaries, he had only failed eighteen leagues, there being but little wind. However, as he forefaw that nothing would difmay his ignorant companions fo much as the length of the voyage they had before them; he determined to pafs upon them, what he confidered as a harmlefs * deception, in order, if poffible, to preveni their impatience. He therefore told them they had failed feven leagues weftward.

On the twelfth of September, fix days after their departure, they were in three hundred and fifty degrees longitude, reckoning from Ferro, one of the Canary illands; or, which amounts to the fame, one hundred and feventy-two leagues weftward of it, and in the fame degree of latitude with this ifland. They here difcovered the trunk of a large tree, which appeared to have been fome time in the water. Through mittake the failors confidered this circumftance as an evidence that they were not far ditant from land, and of courfe became more fatisfied. However, this feafon of comfort did not long continue; for, having proceeded fifty leagues further, a circumftance occurred which threw them into the utmoft confternation, at the fame time that it ftruck their commander with aftonifhment.

[^5]
[ 46 ]

Some of them. What could it be.
Fath. You know, that with failors, the principal conductoris the magnet, as it poffeffes the fingular property of pointing always to the North. By means of it, people at fea are able to diftinguifh, both by night and day, the four points of the heavens, and know in what direction to fteer, their veffel. Without fuch a conductor, which hitherto had always been found faithful, to have ventured on fo long and unknown a voyage, would have been prefumption. Nọw you may readily conceive what was the furprize of Columbus; and the confternation of his cowardly companions, when they fuddenly perceived that the magnetic needle in their compafs (as you know the box is called in which the magnet is fixed) no longer pointed directly to the polar ftar, but a full degree weftward of this direction. Come hither, children; I have brought with me a compafs by means of which I hall be able to make you undertand underftand this circumftance better. Obferve, the needle now points in its ufual direction, namely towards the place in the heavens where at night the North Pole ftar may be feen. Now, at the time we are fpeaking of, it inclined towards the left hand, or the Weft, exactly fuch a degree as you fee marked here all round the compafs. This was an appearance which neither Columbus, nor any other failor, had till then witneffed. It was natural therefore for them to be much furprized at it.

[ 47 ]

Peter. What could be the caufe of it?
Fath. Though this variation of the magnet is now become familiar to failors, and the places are enumerated where it takes place, we are as much at a lofs to anfwer that queftion at prefent, as Columbus was then. There are, my dear children, many inexplicable fecrets of this kind in nature. This fhould excite you to endeavour to attain as much knowledge as you can, for it is impoffible to fay that the great God may not have defigned one of you to draw afide the veil, which mortal eyes have not yet been able to penetrate.

Nic. I will endeavour to find it out, as foon as I have learnt a little more.

All. So will I! So will I.
Fath. Very well. But if you winh to fucceed, you muft endeavour to gain a great deal of mathematical and phyfical knowledge, and to this end I will lend you my affiftance.

[ 48 ]

The companions of Columbus, as I cbferved, were in the greateft confternation. The diftance they had left behind appeared to them immeafurably great, though their commander, in the account which he had given them, had not mentioned more than one third of the leagues they had failed. They now thought all nature had undergone a change, and trembled at the idea that their only conductor, the magnet, had begun to forfake them.

Columbus, whofe penctration in difcovering fources of comfort for his weak and ignorant fellow failors, foon invented a plaufible reafon for this unexpected occurrence, which, although not fatisfactory to himfelf, was confolatory in fome degree to them. They therefore continued to purfue their voyage, hoping that nothing would agaia occur to alarm them. At length they got into the current of the trade winds.

Fred. What is that?
Fath. You remember what is meant by the tropics?

Fred. O, yes; thofe circles drawn in imagination round the globe, on each fide of the equator, over which the fun ftands perpendicularly when we have the longeft or the fhorteft day.

[ 49 ]

fames. When the fun ftands perpendicularly over the uppermoit of thefe circles, then we bave the longelt day; and, in like manner, when it ftands over the lowermoft, we have the fiorteft day.

Fath. Right! You may fee each of thefe circles upon our little drawing. Look, the uppermoft I have marked C. D. the lower E. F. Now, in the face between thefe two circles, in the midft of the Ocean, they have contimally the fame wind, namely from cafi to weft, and this is what is called the trade wind, or monfoons. Of this difcovery, which is nowi generally known, Columbus was alfo ignorant. Perceiving, therefore, that the veffel was continually driven by an eaft wind, his fuperftitio is people again began to be alarmed. "What, thought they, if the wind always blows from this point, how are we to return to our native country?" This idea made them tremble with fear.

Unfortunately, another circumfance occurred which tended greatly to increafe their apprehenfions. They fuddenly found the fea covered with green weeds, as far as the eyc wogld reach, fo that it feemed as if they were failing upon an immenfely large meadow. In fome places thefe weeds were to exceedingly thick that the patage of the fhip was obftructed by them. Here  the then was frefl reafon for dreadful alarm. "We are at lait (thought they) come to the end of the navigable fea. Under thefe weed; may be hidden rocks and fhoals, and before we can help ourlelves we may be dafhed in pieces. Poor unfortunaic people that we are! Why have we been fo ready to entruft ourfelves to the command of a leader fo prefumptuous and foolhardy ?'

[50 ]

The courage and prudence of Columbus did not upon this oucafion forfake him. "Are you not (faid he te his companions) a fet of ignorant people, thus to fuffer yourfelves to be terrified at that which ought to ftrengthen your hope of having nearly attained the fummit of our wifhes? Can grafs and weeds grow in the middle of the fea? and is it not therefore very probable that we mult be near a continent, npon the coafts of which thefe have grown? The failors ftared with amazement at fuch welcome news, and feveral birds having been perceived at the fame time; flying towards the Weit, their fear was in an inftant changed to joyful hope; and they proceeded on their royage in expectation that it would foon have a happy iffue.

[ 51 ]

TALE V.

cath. $W_{\text {ILL not }}$ Columbus foon difcover the country he is in fearch of ?

Fath. Indeed, my dear Catharine, there is no inmediate profpect of it. The hope which they had derived from the fea weeds, and the flight of the birds, foon forfook them; and though they had failed no lefs than feven hundred and feventy leagues weftward, fill no land appeared. Fortunately there was not any perfon on board either of the veffels, except the Admiral himfelf, who was able to calculate the way they had made. He continued, therefore, to keep back a confiderable part of his reckoning, and faid they had failed no nore than five hundred and eighty leagues.

Even this diftance, however, from their native country, appeared to them enormoufly great. They again began to figh, murmur, and complain. They blamed their own credulity, for having fo readily placed confidence in the affurances of Columbus, and even uttered the bittereft reproaches againft Queen Ifabella herfelf, for her cruelty in thus facrificing the lives of fo many of her fubjects, in attempting to execute the ridiculous projects of arr adventurer. In their opinion they had already given fufficient proofs of courage, nor would any one think of charging them with cowardice, thould they now turn the whole of their attention to the prefervation of their lives. They were all agreed, that it was high time to return, thould not the perpetual eaft wind render that impoffible; and that their commander fhould be compelled to renounce his romantic defigns. It was the opinion of the moft deluded among them, that he thould inftantly be thrown overboard, and thus be got rid of at once: they were certain that upon their return to Spain no particular enquiries would be made after fo wretched a fpeculator.
the

Columbus was aware of the danger that hung over his head, but did not fuffer it to terrify him; convinced that his views were equally rational and important; and placing full confidence in the protection of the A1, mighty, he appeared before his rebellious crew with the calm and fteady comntenance of a man, who had every reafon to be fatisfied with the profecution of his enterprize. He reproved their childig cowardice, in mild, but ferious terms terms, and tried every method which his addrefs and knowledge of mankind could furnifh, to revive their courage, and reftore fubordination anongit them. He endeavoured to bring them hack to duty, by gentle and friendly expoftulations, and then affuming the authoritative manner of a commander, threatened them with the difpleafure of their Queen, and the fevereit punifhments, if they dared to obftruct his proceeding, at the very time when he was about to accomplifh his great undertaking.

[ 53 ]

It is the prerogative of great minds to bend and mould the hearts of their weaker fellowcreatures like wax, and O, how happy would it be for mankind, were all thofe on whom the Almighty has beftowed great talents, to employ them like Columbus, in profecuting fchemes whofe object is the general good!

He fucceeded once more in reclaiming his revolting companions. Heaven itfelf appeared to aid him on this occafion, for the wind, which till now had continued eafterly, veered to the fouth weft, fo that every one mult perceive it depended folely on themfelves to return, whenever they thought fit. The Admiral did not fail to make them attentive to this circumftance, and as at the time feveral occurrences happened, which appeared to juftify the expectation of foon difcovering land, they agai promifed obedience to him, and procecded on their voyage with frefh courage.

[ 54 ]

One day the Commander of the Pinta, which had got a-head*, laid her along-fide the Admiral, that is, brought his fiip fo ncar the Admiral's fhip, that they could converfe with each other ; and informed Columbus that he thought he could difcern land about fifteen leagues to the North. At the word land, there was a general expreffion of joy. They immediately preffed the Admiral to alter his courfe towards the point where the fuppcfed land lay. But Columbus was fo well convinced the Commander of the Pinta was under a miftake, that he did not agree to this hafty propofal. He proceeded, notwithftanding the murmurs of his crew, in his courfe towards theWeft, to which, in conformity with his plan, he had uninterruptedly confined himfelf.

Nic. I think he was a little ftubborn there.
Fath. How fo?
Nic. He furely might have failed fifteen leagues on one fide to oblige his people.

Fath. No, my dear Nicholas, he ought not to have done it to oblige them, if he was convinced that the fuppofed difcovery was a miftake; for, if he had yielded, inis people would have concluded that he was not very certain as to what he was about, and knowing how much dependel on their confidence, he thought it right to guard againft any miftruft of this kind. Had they found that he was by any means to be prevailed upon to waver from the principles he had laid down, they would have been continually affailing him with their troublefome requefts. For thefe weighty reafons, therefore, he was fully determined not to vary in the leaft degree from the well digefted plan he had propofed to parfue ; and in the end it appeared that in this refpect he acted wifely.

* A fea-faring term, fignifying to be foremoft. T.

[ 55 ]

The next day they faw a great number of fea gulls*, a bird which Columbus himfelf erroneoully thought could not fly far, and of courfe confidered them as figns of approaching land. But, upon cafting the lead, they could not find ground with two hundred fathoms of line, a circumftance which appeared to militate againit his expectations, as the depth of the fea in general diminifhes near a coaft.

On the following day there were even finging birds on the mafts of the veffels, which roofted there all night, and at the approach of day took their flight towards the Weft. About this time they likewife faw a tropic bird.

[^6]
[ 56 ]

Matth. What kind of bird is that?

Fath. It is an inhabitant of that part of the earth which lies between the tropics, from which circumfance it takes its name.

Soon after this, the atte: tion of the fivilors was attracted by a fiagular appearance, which they had never before witnefrad. A fhoal of flying firh raifed themfelves above the firface of the water, and fome eren fell upon the decks of the veriels. They took them up, and gratified the cour dity by examining their long fins, which ferved them for wings. On the fame evening they again found the fea covered with weeds, and as they ftill confidered this as a fign that fome coaft was near, they again ibdulged the pleafing hope of the fpeedy accomplifhmeat of their undertaking.

This event, however, was yet retarded from day to day, and in proportion as they had raifed their expectation, founded upon to many favourable appearances, their fpirits were depreffed when they perceived, after feveral days failing, that all their hopes had once more deceived them. The fpirit of difcontent and revolt now broke out on board each of the three fhips, beyoad all kind of bounds. The failors, with loud minmurs, renounced all fuboruntion dination to their leader, and, in this inflance, were fupported by their officers, who 'till now had continued faithful ts the Admiral. Here, then, ftood Columbus, an oak amidft forms and tempefts; preffed on every fide; forfaken by all; affailed by the general tumult of his revolting companions; yet oppofing with wonderful fortitude the rage of thefe furious mutineers, who appeared determined upon his deftruction; or, what to him was worfe, upon the annihilation of his projects. He again exerted all his addrefs to quiet them, but in vain. Rage and defpair had taken fuch ftrong pofferfion of the hearts of his crew, that none of the means he had litherto fo fucceffully cmployed, would at all avail him. They would not hear anvonf hic exnofrniationg, hut thentanct him with immediate death, if he did not permit them to return without delay to their native country. In this defperate fituation, he found himfelf compelled to fubmit to imperious neceflity, and to promife the revolters he would grant their requeft upon this condition-that they would pledge themfelves to be obedient to his orders for the three enfuing days. If during this time they flould not difcover land, on the fourth day he would turn back and bring them again to Spain. Freatas was their rage, yet they could .040 utannowledge the reafonablenefs of their Commander's

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}{[57} & ]\end{array}\right.$

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}58 & ]\end{array}\right.$

Commander's reque?. It was therefore acceded to, and confirmed on both fides, by the moft folemn promifes.

Collumbus, in the mean time, was convinced he had little or nothing to fear. For the figns of approaching land now became fo numerous, that he had no doubt of difcovering it within the limited time. For feveral days paft they had found ground with the lead, which brought up with it a flimy foil. Confiderable flights of birds were now feen, and thofe of a kind that could not poffibly fly to a great diftance; all of them going towards the Weft. A bufh was taken up, out of the fea, with frein red berries upon it; the air became milder, and the wind, efpecially in the night time, very changeable, all of them proofs of the near approach of that perior: when the patience and fortitude of Columbus would meet with their juft reward.

He now, indeed, thoughthimfelf fo certain of obtaining his object, that foon after this, at the conclufion of public prayers, he thought proper to remind his people of the obedience and gratitude they owed to God, the great accomplifher of their enterprize ; he likewife directed them to keep a good look-out, and gave orders to lie-to, fearing they might be driven on land in the night.

Charles. What is that-lying-to?
Father.

[ 5) ]

Father. It fignifies to tie up moft of the fails, and to put the others in fuch a form that the veffel may move backwards and forwards, but not be driven to any confiderable diftance.

Char. So.
Fath. Columbus took this opportunity to remind his people of the Queen's promife; namely, that the man who fhould firft difcover ii.: land, of which they were in fearch, fhould have a yearly penfion of about 312 Spanifh dollars, to which he himfelf added the promife of a plufh jacket. Every one remained upon deck the whole night, looking with ftedfalt eye, and beating heart, towards the quarter where it was expected the wifhed for land would appear. And fo I think we will leave them till morning, that we may fee whether there is land or not.

All. O ! $\mathrm{O}!\mathrm{O}!$ dear father.
Fath. What fhall I not finifh here?
All. O no! no! no! pruy don't.
Peter. Now this is juift the pleafanteft part of it.

Fiath. Well be it fo. It was two hours before midnight, when Columbus, ftandins upon the forecaltle, thought he difcovered a light. Upon this be called to him a young nobleman of I'abella's retinue, then upon deck, deck, and pointed it out to him. He likewife perceived the light, and thewed it to a third, who had joined them. All three agreed that the light moved from place to place, and that of courfe it nuit lea suied by a perfon that was travelling. Iancy now how you fhould feel, if after not having feen your parents for feveral years, the door fhould fuddenly open, and they were unexpectedly to in.... in . Juft fo was the heart of Columbus affected at the apparance of this light. Soon, foon was the fruit of fo many anxious cares-the recompenfe of labour fogreat-and of fuch a variety of difficulties and dangers furmounted-to be fpread before his eyes! Soon were his incredulous companions to have ain inconteftible proof, that his great project was no creature of a difordered imagination, nor he limfelf a mere $f_{i}$ eculator! A profpect in itfelf fo rapturous, could not but de rive him of fleep for that night. About two hours after midnight, fhouts of joy were heard from the Pinta, which ftill continued a-head of the other vetfels. The cry of land! land! made every heart beat with tranfport. How gladly would the poor failors have given themfelves up to every expretlion of extravagant joy! bat fo repeatedIy had they been difapp ointed, that they could not prepent the pain fendions of doubt, giving giving a check to the happinefs they now felt. Between hope and fear, therefore, with the utmoft anxiety, they awaited the break of day, in order to be convinced with their own eyes, that the completion of their mott ardent wifhes was not a dream.

[ 60 ]

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}61\end{array}\right]$

As tardy as the hours of darknefs feem to move to the fick, fo did the remainder of this night appear to the anxious failors. Each minute feemed an hour, each hour a day. At length the bluihing morn begins to fhew itfelf, and the fun appears; and now, now the crew of the Pinta ftrikes up with a voice of rapture,
" Great God! to thee our praifes rife!"
The crews of the other veffels had fcarcely gazed, with eyes overflowing with tears of joy, when they alfo, in tranfports of enthufiafm, joined the general hymn of praife; for the land they fo much wifhed to difcover, now lay fitetched before them.

The bymn of thankfgiving was fcarcely finifhed, when the failors bethought themfelves of another duty, which was incumbent unon them; namely, towards their leader, whom the $y$ had grofly infulted and ill-ufed.

With unfeigued contrition, and the moft Lumble refpect, they threw themfelres at the feet of him whom even they, now thestht great, and aked his forgivenefs for their mibehaviour. Columbus, in this fituation, ftill preferved his confiftency. His fortitude in oppofing their tumultuous behaviour, was not more great and wonderful, than the condefcenfion with which he forgave, and promifed to forget their behaviour towards him.

[ 6: ]

Fames. What part of America was it they now difcovered?

Fath. Columbus does not know himfelf as yet. We muft wait until he has landed, and made enquiries. We fhall then, I think, be able to learn. Do not forget to bring a map of America with you to-morrow.

[ 63 ]

TALE VI.

Fames. $\mathbb{H}$ ERE, Father, is the map of America, which I was to bring with me:

Fath. Very well. Look here, children. Thefe inlands are all called by one common name, that is, the Babama Illes. One of them, which you fee lies here, is called Guanahani, or the Cat Illand. It was this that was firft difcovered. Columbus, it is true, called it Saint Salvador; meaning, that it was a country by the difcovery of which he was fayed : but this name has fince been loft.

For fope moments the enraptured failcrs ftood with wide ftretched cyes, gazing on the newly difcovered world, which now lay extended before them, gilded by the rifing fun.

They could not enough admire its appearance, feeming as it did every where to finile with plenty, to be adorned with fine woods, and interfecied by winding ftreams, that produced the moft beautiful effect.
G 2
Columbus

[ $6+$ ]

Columbus now ordered his people to hoift cut the boats; got into one of them himfelf, and, attended by the principal perfons who had accompanied him on this expedition, as well as a number of armed men, he proceeded towards the coaft, with flags flying, and a band of martial mufic, playing as they advanced. Whenthey came near, they faw an innumerable multitude of inhabitants, whom the uncommon appearance of European fhips had druwn together on the ftrand. They now reached the thore, and Columbus, very richly drefled, with a drawn fword in his hand, is the firft who new country he had difcovered.

Fohn. How happy muft he feel!
Fath. It is impoffible for thee, my dear John, to form any juft idea of the indefcribable fenfations that agitated the breaft of Columbus when he firft fet foot upon that country, the difcovery of which had coft him fo much labour and felf denial, fo many cares and fleeplefs nights, until thou thyfelf haft accomplifhed fomething, the purfuit of which has been attended with great difficulty and danger.

They all kneeled down. They kiffed, with the utmoft enthufiafm, the land they had fo long wifhed to difcover, and in this potture pledged obedience to their highly refpected commander, mander, as viceroy of the new world. After this filent expreffion of the fincereft joy, they planted a crucifix on the ftrand, and proftrated themfelves again before it, in order to perform the facred obligations they were under to God. Then, with various ceremonies, in thofe days cuftomary, they took poffeffion of the country, in the name of the King and Queen of Spain.

[ 65 ]

During the performance of thefe ceremonies, the Indians furrounded them, looking with amazement, firlt upon the floating houfes on the fea, then upon the ftrange beings they had brought over to them. They faw, and knew not what they faw; for they did not underftand a fingle thing the Spaniards had been doing. Oh! had the poor creatures known what the confequences to themfelves would prove, they would have filled the air with moans and howling, or have fhei their innocent blood in repelling the ftrangers, whom they now viewed with deep veneration.

Eliz. Why fo, father?
Fath. Have patience a little while, mydear Eliza, and thou fhalt know. The longer the aftonifhed Indians ftood intenfely looking on, the more unaccuuntable did every thing they faw and heard appear to them. The white complexion of Europeans, their beards, their drefi, their arms, their manners-cvery thitg to them appeared wonderful. When they heard the thunder of the mufkets and the cannon they flarunk backwards, as though they had been fruck with lightning; and at laft concluded that thefe ftrangers, thus poffeffing the artillery of heaven, nuuft be immortal beings, children of their God the fun, who had defigned to make them an earthly vifit.

[ 66 ]

Cath. Did thefe people think that the fun was God?

Fath. Yes; Catharine. Some Americans, and thofe, indeed, the moft intelligent, were fo ftruck with the all-invigorating, the neverchanging fun, that they regarded it as the moft bencvolent and $p$ werful of all beings, as God himfelf. Some invented for themfelves Gods in human forms; whilft others, on the contrary, poffeffed fo little undertanding, as never to direct their thonghts to the great Firlt Caufe of all things, and remained unimpreffed by the daily changes the world prefented. Thefe poor ignorant creatures knew nothing of any deity whafever, lived in the world without thought, giving themfelves no concern from whence they came, or what wonld hereafter become of them. Unhappy men!

Our Spaniards were almoft as much furprized at the fingular objects before them, as the Indians were on their part. There were herbs, plants, trees, and animals, of a kind quite different from any thing we have in Europe. There were men who, from their form, manners, and appearance, feemed to belong to another fuccies. Their flin was of a dark copper colour ; their hair black and long, their chins without beards, their ftature of the middle fize, their features fingular, their look mild and fhy, their face, and other parts of the body, oddly marked and painted. Some were almoft naked; others quite, excepting a variety of ornaments, fuch as feathers, fhells, and bits of gold about their ears, nofes, and heads. At firft they were extremely timorous, but when the Spaniards began to make them prefents of various trifles, fuch as glafs beads, ribbons, and other toys of a fimilar kind, they foon acquired fo much courage that, towards evening, when it was time to return to the fhips, a great number of them accompanied their heavenly vifitors in canoes, or trunks of trees hollowed out, which ferved them for boats; partly with the defign of further gratifying their curiofity, and partly to barter for different forts of nicknacks. They gave, in exclange for them, cotton yarn (the making of which they underftood), darts with points made of a ftrong fith bone, and various kinds of fruit. So eager were they to obtain the moft infignificant thing that that was European, that they gathered up with the greateft care fome bits of broken earthen-ware, which lay upon the deck; and for two pieces of copper money, whi " "y could make no ufe of, they would free ${ }_{\text {. }}$ twent $\quad$-five pounds of well fpun cotton. novelty of the things, and receiving them fro white people, were circumftances that gave them all this value in the eftimation of thefe wretched people.

[ 67 ]

[ 68 ]

On the following day Columbus furveyed the coafts of the ifland, conftantly attended by great numbers of the natives. He anxiounly fought after the place from whence they got the bits of gold with which they were adorned; but they gave him to underftand that there was none of it to be found in their ifland, and that it came from a country. which lay fouthward. There they fignified was gold enough. Columbus was determined to follow their directions, and go in fearch of this land of riches.

Fred. Was he very avaricious, father?
Fath. I fhould hardly think he was, my dear Frederick; but he had promifed the Queen of Spain, and his gold-thirtty companions, that he fhould difcover a country from which they might enrich themfelves; and of courfe he wifhed to keep his word: He went, therefore, on board again, took with him feven

Indians

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}69 & \end{array}\right]$

Indians as conductors and interpreters, and immediately fet fail towards the South.

He here difcovered feveral other iflands, but vifited only the three largett of them, which he named Conception, Ferdinand, and Ifabella. [Look; I have brought another inap*, upon which you may find thefe illands.]As Columbus did not here difcover the gold he was in fearch of, and every one anfwered his enquiry whence it came? by pointing towards the South, he made but a fhort ftay, and proceeded on his voyage.

Upon one of the iflands they faw dogs, but they were dumb, and it was afterwards difcovered that European dogs loft their barking, after having been fome time. in Ancrica. It was here that the firt alligator was feen and killed. It was in the form of a lizard, and has received the name of the Weft Indian Crocodile, on account of its near refemblance to that animal found in Egypt.

After a fho: voyage Southward, they difcovered a country of confiderable extent, which had a different appearance fism any of the iflands they had hitherto met with; not only with refpect to fize, but furface and productions. It was not flat, like the former, but adorned with hills and dales, woods, lawns, and rivers, moft charmingly intermixed. Columbus was doubtful whether this was part of the continent, or only a large ifland. After a few days he was convinced of the latter, and learned that, in the language of the country, this confiderable ifland was called Cuba.Look here; it is fituated upon our map between the twentieth and twenty-third degrec north latitude.

[^7]
[ 70 ]

Nic. Ah! is not that the ifland in which the Spanifh harbour Havannah lies, where the galliots affemble, previous to their departure from America to Spain ?

Fath. Quite right. There alfo the regifterfhips affemble, which-

Mat. What are they that are called galliots, and regifter thips?

Fath. I will tell you. Now take notice : galliots are fhips which the King of Spain fends cvery year to America, to fetch the gold, filver, and other articles, which have been there collected ogether. The regifter fhips, on the other hand, are fuch on board of which thofe merchants, who have purchafed the liberty of trading with the A:nericans, convey their goods. Thefe go, fome on them to Vera Cruz in Mexico, others to Carthagena and Porto Bells, in Terra Firma.-Look at thefe places on the map.
Cha.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}7 & 7\end{array}\right]$

Cha. But why are thefe fhips called regifter fhips?

Fath. For this reafon; becaufe all the goods which are fent in them from Europe to America, muft all be put down, or regiftered, in order that it may be afcertained that no more goods are fent to the Weft Indies, than are permitted by the King.

Fohn. Are not the galliots called the filver fleet likewife?

Fath. No, not at prefent. Formerly, be-fore the plan of the regifter fhips was adopted, one fleet in the ycar ufed to be fent to the Weft Indies, partly on the King's account, and partly on account of the merchants, to fetch not only gold and filver, but alfo merchant's goods. But as the regifter fhips have been added to the latter, the name of filver fleet is now done away.

Columbus, full of curiofity to become acquainted with the country and its inhabitants, caft anchor at the mouth of a wide ftrean. But $a^{\prime}$ 'l the natives forfook their huts, and fed into the mountains at his approach. Only one man among them had courage to venturc on board in a fenall canoe. Asfoon as they had fecured the fricudfhip of this Indian, by fimall prefents, the Admiral fent with him on thore one of the inhabitants of Guanaliaui, then on board, accompanied companied only by two failors, fearing that if they went in a large body, thefe timorous people would be more alarmed, and retreat ftill farther from them. Their particular errand was, if poffible, to gain the confideace of the inhabitants, and to examine the nature of the country.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}72\end{array}\right]$

In the mean time, they found it neceffary to keel-haul the veffels, and to caulk them. Do you underftand what that means?

Fohn. O yes! to kecl-haul a fhip is to lay it on one fide, and to caulk it, is to repair the damaged places in the bottom of it, by ftopping up the leaks, or holes, with oakum, and then pitching them over.

Fath. Right. After the Spaniards fent on fhore, had penetrated as far as fixty miles inland, they returned and made the following report to the Admiral.
"We have found the greater part of the country which we have traverfed, not only caltivated, but exceedingly fertile. The fields bear indian corn, or maize, and a certain root which they roaft and eat, inftead of bread. We came at laft to a finall Indian town, which confinted of fifty wooden habitations, and about a thoufand inhabitants; the principal of which came out to meet us; and when they had heard from our Indian companions what kind of people we were, they led us by the arm to the town, and fhewed us into a roomy habitation. Here we were feated upon ftools, made in the form of animals; the tail ferving for the back. The eyes and ears of thefe wooden animals were gold. As foon as we had placed ourfelves upon them; the Indians fat down on the ground by the fide of us, kiffing our hands and feet; by which we could difcern that they alfo confidered us as cceleftial and immortal beings. They gave us form of the roafted bread-root, which tafted alioft like chefnuts; and ve remarked, that among all the favages that came to vifit us, there was not one female. After a hort time, thefe people left us, and then came an equal number of women, who all repeated the fame marks of refpect, which we thatready received from the men. As we were preparing to return, a great number of the natives offered to accompany us; but we declined this honour, and only accepted the attendanse of the cazique, or the king, and his fon, who save conducted us hither again, and have caufed us to be treated with much refpect wherever we came."

[ 73 ]

The Admiral returned lis thanks to thefe royal vifitors, and treated them with the greatelt refpect on board his veitels. Upon his afking them, from whence they procured gold?

$[7+]$

they pointed towards the Eaft, but could not at all conceive why the Spaniards were fo. particularly anxious after this metal, which, in, their eftimation, was of little vife, as it fered them unly for ornament. The Spaniards, on the contrary, were equally furprized that the fe finaple people underfood fo little of its value: and Columbus, fhortening his ftay upon the inland, followed the direction pointed out by the Indians, in order to difcover the wifhed for gold-country, which they called Hayti.

He took with him nineteen of the natives from Cuba, which he left the nineteenth of November, purpofing to take them to Spain on his return home. Thefe people left their native country with the greateft indifference; Columbus having taken care that their fituation on board his fhip thould be rendered as pleafint as poffible.

Having contrary winds for fome days, the Almiral was under the neceffity of tacking-Elima. The fame as we did when we went to-?

Fath. Yes; he was obliged, juft in the fame manner, fometimes to fail on this fide, fometimes on that, as the wind would not permit him to proceed in a direct line. The captain of the Pinta, Alonzo Pinzo was his name, wifhed to turn this circumftance to his advantage;

[ 75 ]

tage; and as his veffel was the be?f failer, he endeavoured to leave the Admiral, in the hopes of difcovering the gold country firt, and of enriclring himfelf before the other arrived.

Columbus, who perceived his defign, gave him the fignal to flacken fail; Pinzo however took no notice of it, but, on the contrary, made all the hate he could to gratify that thirft for gold which now caufed hu & forget the obedience he owed to his fiv

Che. Fye! that was fhem 'shaviour.
Fohn. What is a fignal?
Fath. A fignal is a fign made either by the fring of cannon, or by hoifting out flags, or by fome other obfervable means, by which the Admiral makes known his orders to the other commanders belonging to his fleet.

Coluunbus was obliged to fubmit to what he could not prevent, and as the weather foon after began to be fo frormy that it was thought unfafe to keep out at fea, he returned with the Nigna to Cuba, and caft anchor in a harbour of that ifland. He employed the time which be was obliged to fpend there, in further examining the country, which was extremely pleafiat and fertile. Among the cuftoms of the inhabitants, they difcovered one which highly difgulted them. They faw them eat, with the moft voracious appetite, a fpecies of

$$
\text { H } 2 \quad \text { large }
$$

IMAGE EVALUATION TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences Corporatiori

23 WEST MAIN STREET
WEBSTER, N.Y. 14580
(716)872.4503

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}66 & \\ \hline\end{array}\right.$

large fpider, worms found in decayed wood, and fith but half boiled. By degrees fome of the Spaniards were tempted to tafte thefe difagreeable difhes, and they were found not to be unwholefome.

As faon as the weather would permit; Columbus put out to fea again, in fearch of Hayti, and his faithlefs companion Pinzo. He had not failed more than fixteen leagues before he difcovered it. It was on the fixth of December that he arrived at Hayti, and this ifland, which he called Hifpaniola, or little Spain, becaufe it bore, as he thought, fome refemblance in its appearance to Spain, is one among the few of thofe countries he difcovered which fill retain the name given them by him, Cha. But is it not called Saint Dominge. as well?

Fath. It is, and for this reafon; that they afterwards built a town here of that name which became the capital of the ifland.

Upon his arrival the inhabitants all fled into, the woods, nor was any thing to be heard or feen: of the Pinta. The Admiral, on this account, foon left the harbour he had run into, and fteered along the coaft of the ifland northward.

After having caft anchor in another harbour, his wifh of becoming acquainted with the natives was accomplidhed, by means of an Indian

[ 77 ]

Indian woman whom they had taken, and treated with great kindnefs, and afterwards loaded with prefents. The natives no longer hefitated to approach them, in order to fec thofe wonderful curiofities, and partake of the prefents of which their country woman had given them fuch an enchanting account.

Thefe people exactly refembled thofe of Guanahani and Cuba, in their appearance and manners. They alfo were like them naked, of a copper colour, timid, ignorant, and mild tempered. Surprized at every thing they faw, they likewife feemed of opinion that the Spaniards certainly muft be coeleftial beings. It was obferved that they had more gold glittering among their ornaments than the other illanders, and fo little value did they fet upon it, that they were eager to exchange it for a ftring of glafs beads, pins, bells, and other toys. When Columbus again enquired after the place where the gold was found, they pointed towards the eaftern part of the ifland. He therefore again fet fail towards this quarter, in fure expectation of now difcovering the fource of incalculable riches.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}78\end{array}\right]$

TALE VII.

Father. AFTER having come to anchor in another bay of Hifpaniola, his majefty, the cazique of this illand, having heard of thefe wonderful white people, was pleafed to pay the Admiral a vifit in hisoown perfon. His attendants were numerous. He was carried upon a fort of palanquin, by four men. His majefty's perfon was as little incumbered with clothes as his fubjects.

Upon going on board he, did not fhew the leaft doubt or hefitation; aud having learned that the Admiral was then going to dine, he ordered two old men, who appeared to br his counfellors, to attend him into the cabin. iefeated himfelf, in a refpectful but confidential manner, by the fide of Columbus.. The old men fat down at his feet.

He partook of what was prefented to him, and fent what remained to his people upon deck. When dinner was ended, he made the Admiral a prefent of fome bits of fheet-gold, and a girdle of curious workmanfhip.

[79] ]

In return, Columbus prefented him with a ftring of heads, a pair of red flippers, a bed quilt, and a flafk of citron wine. Upon which his Indian Majeity was fo enraptured, that in the excefo of his gratitude he gave the Admiral to underftand, that the whole of his country was at his fervice.

The behaviour of this naked monarch towards his attendants was dignified; but, on the contrary, towards the Spaniards extremely familiar. He examined every thing with the utmoft attention, and expreffed the higheft admiration at every curiofity he faw on board. Towards evening lie defired to be taken on fhore again.

His wihes were immediately fulfilled, and in order to give greater ftrength to the impreffions which he had received on board, the Admiral ordered a cannon to be fired at his departure. He alfo became convinced that thete white people, having thunder and lightning at their command, were coleftial beings. The refpect which his fubjects difcovered towards thefe heavenly vifitors was fo great, that they abfolutely kiffed the footfteps of one of the Spaniards.

As this was not the place where the rich gold mines were to be found, in which all their wifhes were centered, Columbus again gave orders to weigh anchor and fteer further Eaft.

Every

[ 80 ]

Every information they had gained agreed in defcribing this region of wealth as very mountainous, and governed by a powerful cazique. Columbus had already fent an embaffy to this great prince, which had returned with the moft preffing invitations. The Admiral confequently made all poffible fpeed to take advantage of this circumftance. Alas! Had he forefeen the melancholy accident which was about to befal him on this thort expedition, he would have been lefs hafty in proceeding, and rather would he have given up all the gold and filver he had in profpect, than purchafe the poffeffion of it at fo dear a rate!

Peter. What happened to him?
Fath. They had proceeded on this new voyage until they difcovered a cape, about a league from which the Admiral gave orders to lie-to. For the two laft days he had not clofed his eyes; nature began to demand her right; after having, therefore, given up the rudder to the Pilot, and particularly enjoining that he would in no cafe leave it, he retired to reft about midnight. Scarcely had he clofed his eyes when the carelefs crew followed his example ; every one forfook his poft and went to fleep. Even the man at the helin, apprehending no danger from fo calm a fea, was faithlefs enough to forget the orders of the Adiniral, and to give up his office to a young unexperienced boy, boy, and like the others went to reft. This boy, therefore, was the only one awake on board.

[ 8r ]

All of them being thus anleep, the fhip, by the current of the fea, was gradually driven towards the fhore. It fuddenly received fo dreadful a fhock, that the rudder flew out of the boy's hand. Awoke by the lad's cry, Columbus immediately ran upon deck, where he foon difcovered that they were firrounded by rocks, upon one of which the fhip had ftruck.

The whole crew were in a ftate of the moft dreadful alarm; the Admiral alone. retained prefence of mind, fufficient to take the necelfary fteps to fave the veffel, if it were poffible. He commanded fome of his people to jump into the boat iminediately, and drop an anchor at a certain diftance, by the aid of which lie hoped to haul the fhip off the rock. But fuch was the confternation of thefe people, that inltead of obeying his commands, they: confulted their own fafety only, by making the beft of their way towards the Nigna, The captain of this fhip, however, refufed to take on board peonle who had forgotten their duty to their proper commander, and forfaken him in the midit of danger the moft imminent, They were under the neceffity, therefore, of returning to the ftranded velfel.

Columbus,

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}82\end{array}\right]$

Columbus, in the mean time, in order to lighten it as much as poffible, had the mafts cut away, and the molt unneceffary thing thrown overboard. But it was all in vain! The fhip bulged near the keel, and fo violently did the water rufh in, that there were not the leart hopes of faving her. The Admiral, therefore, with all his crew, got into the boats fent to their affiftance from the Nigna, and rowed towards that fhip.

The next inorning he fent meffengers to the cazique of the country, to inform him of the misfortune he had met with, and to requeft the affiftance of fome of his people, in faving what they could from the wreck. The cazique (Guakanahari was his name) upon hearing what had happened, expreffed the utmoft forrow, and haftened, with tears in his eyes; to render affiltance to the fhipwrecked Europeans. So far were thefe good natured iflanders from wifhing to take advantage of their difafter, that they readily offered all the aid in their power. In a fhort time they collected a great number of canoes, and by the affiftance of fomany people, moft of the things of any value were fafely landed.

The generous Guakanahari, took noft of the articles faved from the wreck under his own eare, and every now and then fent fome of his relations

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}83\end{array}\right]$

xelations to Columbus, to intreat him not ta diftrefs hinfelf, for he would be anfwerable fos their fafety. He had them all brought to a place near his habitation, until the houfes where they were to be fowed were prepared for them: He alfo placed a guard over them, though this indeed did not appear to be neceffary; for all his fubjects bewailed the lofs of the Europeang as though it had happened to themfelves.

In the account which Columbus gave the Court of Spain of this misfortune, he mentioned the good difpofition of thefe honeft favages, in a very interefting manner. 's Indeed ( fays he) they are fo kind, fo hofpitable, and fo peaceable, that I can affure your Highneffes there is not a better people upon the face, of the earth; they love their neighbours as themfelves; ever cheerful and gay, their manners are the pleafanteft $I$ ever. witneffed; and, potwithftanding they go naked, they have many adinirable cuftoms, The King is waited upon with great parade, and fo dignified is whole deportinent, that it is impóflible not to behold him with fatisfacion. The retentive memories, and the great thirft after knowledge, which his people difcover, are equally deferving of admiration."

Moth. How do you like thefe Indians?

[ 84 \}

All. O, charningly! what good people they are!

Moth. And fill thefe are favages; peoplé tho have had no education, and have not even any knowledge of a God.

Fath. Shane, great flame for us, fhould we let them furpafs us in goodnefs of heart, or in adive benevolence, How much fuperion are the motives to virtue, as well as the advantages for attaining upright principtes and habits; with which Almighty providence hath diftinguified us, from thefe poor uniaftracted Indians! O, ehildren ! let ws, with all our might, frive to render durfelves worthy of the advantages we poffefs : what would become of us, fhould we ever be compared with one of thefe good-natured favages, and find ourfelves excelled by him in honour and integrity.
[A hort paufe; and the Father proceeds.]
Hearing how fond the Europeans were of gold, Guakanahari, in order to comfort them under their misfortune, made them fome prefents of it, and promifed to fetch them a much larger quantity from a place which he called Cibao. Much alfo was brought by his people, which they feemed glad to exchange for any trifles that were European. One of them, having a large piece of this metal in his right hand, land, held open the other to a Spaniard; on the latter putting a bell into it, the Indian, thinking he had outwitted him, dropped his piece of gold and took to his heels, as though he had been a thief.

[ 85 ]

Columbus's people began to like their ftay at this place exceedingly, whilft he himfelf was harraffed day and night by the moft dreadful anxiety. He had loft his beft fhip. Pinzon, the faithlefs Pinzon, had deferted him; the only: fhip that was now left him was fo fimall and fo crazy, that it was neither capable of accommodating all his people, nor could be ufed in fo long a voyage without the utmoft danger. What çould he do in fuch a fituation?

After having well weighed and reflected on the fubject, he came to the following refolu-tion-that he, with part of his crew, would. again embark, and notwithftanding every danger, would attempt the voyage home, in order to give an account to the Spanifh court, of the difcoveries he had hitherto made. The semainder of his peoplc he intended to leave at Hifpaniola, as a colony. As there were volunteers enough for ftopping, the propofal was inftantly agreed to. The cazique, Guakanahari, was likewife far from objecting to it; on the contrary, he was much pleafed with the idea, that fome of thefe heavenly ftrangers:

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}{[86}\end{array}\right]$

would ftay with him, and defend both himfelf and his people from their enemies.

Thos. Had he any enemies?
Fath. According to the information le gave them, there was a barbarous, favage race of men, who inhabited fome iflands to the South Eaft, which he called Caraibs. Thefe people, he faid, from time to time attacked him, and as his own fubjects had not fufficient ftrength to withftand them, all that could be done when the enemy approached, was to fly inmediately into the woods.

Columbus promifed to take him and his people under his protection, and in order that he might have fome idea of the European art of war, he directed his foldiers to perform fome part of their exercife. The Indian fpectators were ftruck with amazement; but when the cannon, which had been faved from the wreck, were fired, they were fo overcome with fear that they all fell upon the ground, and hid their faces in their hands. Even Guakanahari himfelf was much alarmed; Columbus, however, gave him to underftand that this thunder fhould only be ufed to defend him from the Caraibs; and the better to convince him of the amazing effects of this dreadful inftrument, he ordered a ball to be fired at the ftranded veffe!. It paffed through the wreck, and was feen to fall on the oppofite fide into the fea. So much did this furprife the cazique, that he went home quite deep in thought, being well convinced that fince his vifitors had command of thunder and lightning, they muft certainly have defcended from heaven.

[ 87 ]

Matt. But as the Spaniards and Indians did not underftand each others language, how could they converfe ?

Fath. They converfed by means of figns, and fingle words which they had learned from each other. This language was certainly very: imperfect; neverthelefs it was, in many inftances, competent to the communicating of each others thoughts.

After what had paffed, feveral days were occupied in erecting a fort, or a fmall fortification, in which the good natured Indians lent every poffible affiftance. Unhappy creatures! Little did they think, they were forging chains with which themfelves would foon be fettered!

As often as the Admiral came on thore, Guakanahari endeavoured to thew him fome particular mark of honour, which he on his part returned. The Cazique once received him with a golden crown on his head, and conducted him into a richly ornamented houfe. When they had entered, he took the crown off his head, and placed it upon that of his vifitor.

[ 88 ]

Titor. Columbus took from his own neck a ftring of very finall beads which he was accuftomed to wear, and hung it upon Guakanahari; he then took a very handfome coat-which he had on, and put this alfo upon the Cazique, and then placed a ring on his finger. Not content with this, he fent for a pair of red halfboots, which he likewife caufed him to put on. Thefe mutual prefents confirmed the friendthip they had conceived for each other.

In ten days the fort was finifhed. Columbus chofe thirty-eight from amongft thofe who wifhed to ftop, and appointed a nobleman who had accompanied him, Diego d'Arada, their commander. He frictly enjoined them to be obedient in every thing to his orders, to endeavour at all events; to attain the good opinion and friendihip of Guakanahari and his fubjects, and to make themfelves as much as poffible, acquainted with the language. He called the place where he left them, Navidad.

Columbus now went on board his crazy fhip, and weighed anchor the 14th of January, amidit the Thouts of thofe who remained behind. It was a hold undertaking. With a fingle fhip, and that in bad repair, to attempt to crofs an ocean as yet 'fo little known! I confefs I never have been fo much alarmed for the life of this brave man as at prefent.

Eliza. O, I wifh he would ftop there!

[ 89 ]

Geo. Or I wifh that ftupid Pinzon, with the other fhip, was with him again; then one might affift the other.

Fath. Heaven only knows what is become of that faithlefs fellow; Columbus could not get any intelligence concerning him. He fuppofed, therefore, that he was either gone to the bottom, or returned to Europe, in order to be firt in bringing the good news of the great difcoveries they had made; or perhaps with the view of prejudicing the court againft Columbus, and of drawing, by that means, more merit on himfelf. Ca this account did the Adiniral think it the more neceffary to return; fo as to be able, by his prefence, to counteract the bafe defigns of this faithlefs man.

The better to do away any doubts which the court might have of the veracity of the accounts he fhould give them, he had taken care to have fpecimens with him of all the curiofities he had met with. Amongft thefe muft be reckoned, befides the gold (which he knew would be mont acceptable) fome natives from each of the iflands he had vifited, as well as feveral birds never before feen in Europe; with a variety of othe: articles, which could not fail of impreffing the minds of thofe who faw them with a fenfe of the importance of the difcoveries he had made.

[ 90 ]

Columbus failed for fome time along the coaft of Hifpaniola, in order, as much as poffible, to make obfervations on the coaft. On the fecond day after his departure, he difcovered fomething at adiftance from him, which appeared like a fhip. He bore down immediately upon it, and found it to be what he little ex-.pected-Pinzon's veffel, which he had been in vain enquiring aftes for the laft fix weeks. You may readily conceive what a pleafant fight this was to the Admiral and his companions.

Pinzon came on board, and endeavoured to vindicate himfelf, by laying all the faultupon the formy weather, by which, according to his account, he was driven againft his will. Although Columbus was well convinced of the falfhood of this, report, yet did his natural inclination to generofity, as well as his prudence, lead him rather to overlook it, than co:act with rigour. He appeared therefore to believe what Pinzon had told him, and again took him into favour, highly pleafed with the idea, that the account of his important difcoveries would not be entrufted to a fingle crazy veffel.

Cha. Where had Pinaon been follong?
Fath. He likewife had been touching at vam rious fiaces upon the coaft of Hifpaniola, bartering for gold. He had, therefore, made no difcoveries of importance.

Mother.

[ 91 ]

Mother. ow, children, in order that you may rejoice at the difcovery of America, your fupper to-night fhall confift entirely of the produce of that county.

All. Ah! Ah!
Some. What is it, pray!
Moth. Soup .made of cocoa beans.
Fred. Ah! Chocolate.
Moth. And then fomething elfe, which I :fuppofe you will not much like.

Some. What?
Moth. Potatoes.
All. Oh! Potatoces! Potatoes! That is our favourite fupper.

Fath. Long live the memory of Columbus, to whom we are indebted for this favourite difh.

All. Huzza!

$$
\left[\begin{array}{lll}
& 92
\end{array}\right]
$$

TALE VIII.

Fath. Now, children, let' us attend our Columbus upon his return home.

Fred. That's right!
Fath. A frefh breeze, which fortunately juft now fprung up from the Weft, drove the fhips as though they flew before it. The bappy failors already fancied themfelves in Spain, furrounded by their friends, impatient to hear of the many wonderful things which they had feen.

Moth. I think you would do better to let the veffels come to land immediately, that the poor people might go on fhore at once.

Fath. I would willingly do fo, but I perceive $\alpha$ black cloud rifing yonder in the weft, which makes me tremble for my adventurers : I wifh I could bring them into a fafe harbour till the ftorm is over; but, unfortunately, there is not one bit of land between Spain and Hifpaniola, and of courfe not a fingle harbour to be found.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}{[93}\end{array}\right]$

Fames. O yes; the Azores.
Father. 'Thou art right, James. If I could get them there in time, they would be fecure; but they are, I think, at leaft fifty leagues froin it, and the ftorm comes on apace. It begins to grow dark, and darker ftill: the affrighted failors ftand upon deck, awaiting what is to befal them, with their eyes fixed upon the Adiniral, who, in full poffeffion of his accuftomed prefence of mind, is giving the neceffary orders.

The waves begin gradually to fwell; the veffels pitch, the cordage rattles, and the ftorm howls dreadfully among the mafts. It lightens, and is again dark as night; it thunders, and the rain pours on the quivering hips. Now, now the ftorm burfs forth in all its fury. The lightning darts flafh upon flath; the thunder roars, the wind rages, and the rolling thips are at one time raifed almoft to the clouds, and then again fink into the moft terrible abyfs.

Terror and defpair entirely overcame the whole of both the crews. Some of them fell on their knees, and prayed for the prefervation of their lives; fome lay down or ftood pale and motionlefs, as though they were dead; whilf others had recourfe to fuperftitious methods of appeafing heaven, by making a vow that, fhould their lives be fpared, they would go barefoot and naked on a pilgrimage to fome church dedicated to the Virgin Mary:

[ 94 ]

Eliza. I don't underftand that, Father.
Fiath. '. hen I will explain it to thee, dear Eliza. Attend to what I fay. Thofe chrittians, that are called roman catholics, ufed formerly to believe that it was rendering God an acceptable fervice, to perform a journey, attended with a variety of difficulties, to fome particular fpot, at a diftance from the place where they lived; and there to fpend their time in prayer and fafting. Such journies ufed to be called pilgrimages, and thofe who performed them pilgrins. Formerly this practice was very common, and was rendered by devotees themfelves as difficult as poffible. Some went barefoot, with nothing but a coarfe cloth for a covering to their bocies; and upon the road voluntarily fuffered hunger and thirft, heat and cold; nay, they even flogged themfelves into the bargain, and thought they were happy in proportion as they fuffered diftrefs and pain: For they believed this penance was fo acceptable to God, that on account of it, he would forgive all their fins; and when they were in any particular danger, the beft method of fecuring his protection, they fragined, was by making a vow to go on a pilgrimage. This was done on board the fhip of Columbus. The failors promifed the AImighty mighty that if he would fave their lives, they would go on a pilgrimage, clad as I have above defcribed, in the firt chriftian country upon which they fhould land. Do you underftand me?

[ 95 ]

Eliza. O yes, Father.
Father. Now then, to return to Columbus and his poor crew, whom we left in the moft diftreffing fituation. It is not in the leaft degree changed for the better. They are ftill in fufpenfe, between life and death. Each wave feems ftill to threaten them with deftruction. In vain does Columbus, with the greateft prefence of mind, take every precaution for their fafety, which either knowledge or experience could fuggeft. In vain does he fay every thing in his power to encourage and perfuade them to ufe their hands, which, to all appearance, were become lifelefs. They ftood like ghofts, whilit the ftorm raged with unabating fury. At laft, when he could not any longer conceal that he thought all mortal aid was of no avail, he retired with a heavy heart to his cabin, and what do you think he did there?

Some. He prayed.
Fath. Undoubtedly he raifed his eyes with the moft filial fubmiffion towards heaven; but did notafk for the prefervation of his life; (that he committed to the care of him who gave it); on the contrary, he prayed for the accomplifhment of what was ftill dearer to him.

[ 96

Ferd. What was that?
Fath. Nothing diftreffed our benevolent hero fo much as the thought that with his life, all the important information he was carrying to Europe, and what he thought was of ftill greater confequence, the propagation of the knowledge of the true God, among the favages he had vifited, would be entirely loft. This cleft his heart in twain, as with a two-edged fword; and, of courfe, led him to think not fo much on his own fafety, as on the means of warding off the danger which in this refpect he apprehended. Attend, children, to the means which he ufed to accomplifh his defigns, and then admire the greatnefs of the man, who, in the moft inminent danger of immediate deftruction, was capable of acting as he did.

He feized a piece of parchment, defcribed upon it the moft important difcoveries he had made, wrapt it up in oiled cloth; then covered this with wax, and packed up the bundle in a clofe calk, which he threw into the fea, Mati. Why did he this?

Foohn. That you might readily guefs. He thought, I fuppofe, that the fea would fomewhere throw this cafk on hore-

Fath. And that fome one having found and opened it, would make known the treafure it contained.

[ 97 ]

contained. He afterwards prepared a fimilar cafk, which he faftened to the ftern of his veffel, intending to fet it at liberty only at ihe laft extremity. Now, children, who amongft us, think you, would be equal to fuch conduct as this?

Fohn. Not one, I believe, For myfelf I am certain not.

Some. I neither.
Father. But fhould you like to know, by what means Columbus attained fuch fortitude?

James. Certainly.
Fath. When he was about your age he ufed, on all occafions, even upon the moft trifling occurrence, to exercife the utmoft reflection, fo that timidity or fear might never overcome him; but that he might, on the contrary, find out ways and means if not to prevent, at leaft to turn to his advantage any misfortune which might befal him. He never looked to his fuperiors for affiftance, but in all cafes endeavoured to help himfelf, and to difcover by his own ingenuity, the beft methods of extricating himfelf out of difficulties. He never accepted the aid of others, in what he was capable of doing himfelf; and he defpifed from his heart, thofe effeminate and ufelefs beings, who are continually dependant upon the care and exertions of other people. By thefe means, and K by leading not only an induftrious and active, but a pious life from his childhood, by degrees it became natural to him, never to be alarmed at difficulties, never to be difinayed; no not even amidft the greateft dangers; but on the contrary, immediately to exert all his underftanding, fo as beft to relieve him, in every circumftance of perplexity and diftrefs. And in this manner, children, muft you act, if you wifh ever to become like him.

[ $9^{8}$ ]

Thos. Well I am fure we all of us will then.
Fred. Hannah, do you remember, that I fhall not want you to lace my half-boots tomorrow morning ; I would have you know that in future I thall do that myfelf.

Han. I will not force my fervices uponyou, you may be affured.

Fred. I do not want them any morc. I muft lace them myfelf in future, muft I not, Father?

Fath. Moft certainly, if you wifh to become a Columbus. But it would alter the cafe very materially, if you fhould wifh to become an old woman, and fit by the fire fide all your life.

Fred. O fye! fye!
Moth. But children, now we are wandering again from Columbus; I fhall fit upon thorns until I know what is become of him and his crew.

Fath.

[ 99 ]

Fiather: Well, then, I am ready to proceed : but alas the fituation of thefe poor people continues ftill the fame. The form yet rages as much as ever, and to add further to the horrors of death, they are now enveloped in the gloom of one of the darkeft nights; no twinkling ftar affords the leaft ray of hope or comfort; to thefe defpairing wretches. Heaven and fea are hidden in the moft dread. ful darknefs; nor does the raging hurricane in the leaft degree abate its fury, during the whole of this black night. Thus were they fufpended, as it were, between life and ceath, until they had become almoft fenfelefs, when at laft-

Some. Ah!-Poor Columbus!
Fath. Till at laft this moft dreadful of nights began to withdraw, and-to the inexpreffible joy: of the faikora; theyt cotutd difcover

All. Ah!, Ah
Fath: : Ste Adnizal tindelf, ato frrf, did not know what this land might be; but, as they drew nearer, they found it to be one of the Azore inles.

Cath. Thank heaven they are got there! I was very much alarmed for them.

Fath. They are not there yet, dear Catharine, although the land lies before them. The dreadfal ftorm which feill continues, makes it extremely dangerous for them to come near the coaft. Nothwithftanding, therefore, the ardent wifh of every one to get on thore, they were under the neceffity of plying for no lefs than four days. The Pinta was not to be feen, and it was doubtful whether the was gone to the bottom, or whether her commander, Pinzon, had taken advantage of the ftorm, and the darknefs of the night, to leave the Admiral, in order that he might be the firft to bring the news of his difcoveries to Spain. The ftorm at length abated a little. The Admiral availed himfelf of this favourable moment, ran in land, and came to anchor.

[ 100 ]

Some Portuguefe foon came to offer provifions, and make enquiries whence they came, and whither they were going. When the Spaniards had learned from thefs people that there was a chapel upon the coant dedicated to the Virgin Mary, Columbus permitted one half of his crew. to. go on ohore, in order: that they might pe form their vow. He hinifelf, from the continual fatigue he had undergone, had become lame in both his legs, and was therefore obliged to ftop on board. He, however, ordered the pilgrims, on their departure, to return as foon as poffible, that the remainder the crew might alfo go on hore, and perform theis their sow. They promifed to obey his orders. They fripped themfelves to their Thirts, and fet off barefoot towards the chapel.

At the expiration of a few hours they were expected to return ; however, they did not appear. Another hour paffed-ftill they came not; - night approached, without their being feen or heard of. Columbus began to l: : m in truftful, but could not fatisfy himfelf till the morrow. The morning came, and he now learned that the Portuguefe garrifon had feized thefe naked pilgrims, and thrown them into prifon.

Columbus was extremely hurt at this conduct, and as all the reprefentations which he caufed to be made of the affair were fruitlefs, he threatened with an oath not to leave the coalt until he had taken one hundred Portuguefe prifoners, and defolated the ifland. This threat had its effect. Meffengers were immediately fent, in the name of the governor, to learn whether they were really in the Spanifh fervice or not; and full fatisfaction on this fubject being given, the prifoners were, without delay, fet at liberty. The governor had received orders from the King of Portugal, to fecure the perfon of Columbus, if he fhould have it in his power, probably, in order that both he and his crew, might be thrown into prion; that thus his majeity.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}102\end{array}\right]$

jefty might come into quiet poffeffion of the countries our hero had difcovered : but ats they could not get him into their power, on account of his remaining on board, they thought it prudent not to detain his people, and to pretend they did not know they were Spaniards.

Obferve, children, here is another inftarce of what we fhort fighted mortals call misfortune, proving a real bleffing from the Almighty, notwithftanding we cannot difcover it to be fach at the moment. Columbus was ill; he had violent pains in his back, and was, therefore, denied the pleafure of going on fhore, after a long and dangerous voyage. There can be no doubt that, at the time, he thought this a misfortune; but how great was his miftake! It was the moft fortunate event that could have happened to him; for, had he been well, he would have went on fhore; and, had he gone on thore, he would haye been fecured, and perhaps have languifhed the remainder of his life in a prifon. It is, therefore, happy for us that our fate is in the hands of God, who, although he may fometimes vifit us with affliction, always caufes it to anfwer fome wife and good purpofe.

It was happy that this affair had ended fo well. Columbus again got under fail, in hopes of foon arriving at the clofe of all his toils and dangers ;

[ 103 ]

dangers ; but heaven had ordained yet another fevere trial of his fortitude. They were again overtaken by a dreadful ftorm. The veffel was driven from her courfe; the fails were torn to pieces; the mafts fell; and they expected to be buried under each fucceffive wave. In this defperate fituation, which had now continued for two days, they perceived at midnight that they were nearly upon a rock; their poor fhip was driving faft towards it. Had they failed in the fame direction another minute, fhe mut have gone to pieces. But Columbus's prefence of mind was ftill true to him. He made a well-directed tack, that faved his hip, himfelf, and his crew. He foon difcovered that he was upon the coalt of Portugal, at the mouth of the Tagus, where he foon afterwards fucceeded in coming to anchor. At break of day he fent off two meffengers, one to the King of Spain, informing him of his happy arrival, and the other to Lifbon, to the King of Portugal, requefting permiffion to fail ap the Tagus to that town, in order that he might there have his veffel repaired. This requeft was granted him, and of courfe he made the beft of his way thither.

The report of a veffel arriving from fo fingular, an expedition, was no fooner fpread, than all who could ufe their legs ran immediately down to the harbour. The fhore fwarmed with people, the water with boats, every one being eager to fee the man who had executed fo extraordinary an enterprize. Some of them bleffed God that they had lived to fee that day. Others lamented that their country had rejected and ill-treated fo great a man.

[ 104 ]

Even the King of Portugal coūld not refufe hinn refpect, notwithftanding he wasgrievounly vexed at the idea, that Spain, by means of this man; fhould make fo great an acceffion to its power and wealth-a man whom, led by the foolifh advice of his blind courtiers, he had fo inconfiderately repulfed. He gave orders to his fubjects to treat him with the greateft refpect; fent refrefhments on board, and wrote a very polite letter to the Admiral, requefting that he would pay him a vifit. Columbus immediately complied with his requeft. Upon his arrival, the whole court was ordered out to meet him. The King alfo infifted upon his fitting with his hat on during the whole of the audience, and whilft Columbus was giving a defcription of the difcoveries he had made, his majefty betrayed alternately repentance and admiration. Our hero, on the other hand, could not but enjoy the manifelt confufion of the courtiers, who had formerly treated him with contempt, as a wild feculator.

[ 105 ]

The King endeavoured, by the moft flattering offers, to perfuade him again to enter into his fervice : but in vain. He might have offered half his kingdom, but would not have induced a man fo faithful to his truft, even to waver in his duty to the court whofe fervice he had efpoufed.

Moth. Bravo!
Fath. As foon, therefore, as he had taken leave, and finifhed the neceffary repairs of his flip, he again fet fail, and fteered for the fame Spanifh port from which he had ftarted. He arrived there the fifteenth of March, after having been abfent feven months and cleven days.

And now we will let him take reft after fo long a voyare. To-morrow you thall have the pleafure or ieeing him land.

Peter. This is a very eharming tale indeed!

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}106\end{array}\right]$

TALE IX.

Nic.

$W$ELL, Father, will you be fo good as to let Columbus land?

Fath. Immediately, Nicholas; but let him firft enter the harbour of Palos in due order.

The report of his thip approaching, had fcarcely fpread, before every one ran down to the harbour, in order to convince himfelf of the truth of this joyful news. And when they found they were not difappointed-when the veffel came fo near that one recognized a brother, another a father, a third a friend, and a fourth a hufband - Oh that was, indeed, a fcene well worth witneffing - the air refounded with fhouts of joy. Had you feen the trembling arms that were ftretched out to receive thefe ftrangers, and the tears of joy that were thed upon this occafion, you would never have forgot it. Columbus at length ftepped on fhore, welcomed by the thundering of cannon, the ringing of bells, and the huzzas of an inmenfe croud of people. Far from difcovering the leaft fymptoms of pride on this occafion, he made it the firft object of his care, to thew that the fuccefs of his enterprize ought to be attributed not to himfelf but to God. With this view, he directed his footfteps towards the fame church in which he had fupplicated the affiftance and protection of the Almighty at his departure. His crew, and the whole multitude following him, formed a folemn proceffion. Having thus performed his duty towards God, he fet out on his way to Barcelona, a town in-

[ 107 ]

Nic. The province of Catalonia, in Spain.
Fath. Where the King and Queen at that time held their court.

Fames. Had nothing been heard of Pinzon.
Fath. Intelligence of him had been received. But the accounts are contradictory; fome fay that he entered the harbour of Palos foon after Columbus. Others affert, on the contrary, that he landed in Gallicia, feveral days previous to the arrival of our hero, and that he was upon the road to Barcelona, haftening to be the firft to carry the good news to court, but was ordered by the King not to appear before him, except in the prefence of his Admiral; upon which this vain man was fo much chagrined, that he fell ill, and died in a few days. Fohn. A pleafant journey, Mr. Pinzon. Nic.

[ 108 ]

Nic. Another time be not quite fo vain and faithlefs.

Fath. We will hope that he is now free from fuch vices.

Columbus found an immenfe concourfe of people, collected in every place through which he paffed; and heard his name refound from every mouth. He at length arrived at Barcelona, where the King and Queen awaited him with the utmoft impatience. The whole court, as in Portugal, was ordered out to meet him, and the ftreets were every where fo crouded that he could fcarcely pafs. The proceffion was conducted in the following order.

Firft of all came the Indiaps, who had accompanied him, dreffed according to the cuftom of their country; next were carried the gold, and various kinds of ornaments, he had brought with him; then followed the natural curiofities he had collected, fuch as bales of cotton, cafes of pepper, parrots, which were carried upon canes twenty-five feet long, ftuffed fkins of American anịnals and birds, befides a great number of other things, that had never been feen in Europe; and laft of all came Columbus himfelf, who attracted the eyes of the ${ }^{-}$ fpectators more than any of the curiofities that had precceded him.

[ rog$]$

In order to fhew hin a particular mark of honour, their Majefties caufed a fuperb throne to be erected in an open place, on which they fat to receive him. He now drew near, and was going to kneel at the foot of the throne, as was then the cuftom, when the King held out his hand for hin to kifs it, and defired him to fit down upon a feat placed for that purpofe at his right hand. In a very becoming manner, he then gave a particular account of the difcoveries he had made, and exhibited the famples he had brought with hin of the curious productions of thofe countries. 'The court, and all who heard him, were loft in aftonifhment. When he had finifhed his account, their Majefties both kneeled down, accompanied by alt who were prefent, and returned thanks to God for thofe wonderful events, which feemed to promife them fo many and fuch great advantages. Upon this Columbus was overwhelmed with the higheft honours. Every reward which lhad been promifed him, before his departure, was operily confirmed; he, and his whole family, were raifed to the rank of nobility, and whenever the King rode out, his favorite officer muft always be at his fide; a diftinetion till then granted only to princes of the blood: but what pleafed hin moft of all was, that his Majefty gave orders that a confiderable fleet L fhould fhould be innnediately fitted out for a fecond expedition.

[ 110 ]

In the mean time, his Majefty fent an ambaffador to Rome, requefting the Pope to give the Spaniards a fole right and title to all the countries now difcovered, or to be hereafter difcovered, by them in the unknown ocean. The Pope (Alexander the Sixth was his name) drew a ftraight line from one pole to the other, at the diftance of one hundred leagues from the Azore illands, and made a folemn grant to the King of Spain of all the land which might be difcovered beyond this line.

Thos. Heyday! How could the Pope give thefe countries away, when they did not belong to him?

Fath. At that time, Thomas, the Pope was, as you muft know from hiftory, poffeffed of very extraordinary powers. He was thought to be the great apoftle of God, and, on this account, was fuppofed to have a right of difpofing of every part of the globe as he thought proper. Every prince, therefore, that wifhed to enjoy his dominions in fecurity, was under the neceffity of applying to the Pope for a confirmation of his right to them. Things are not fo now.
Matt. It is very well they are not, or the Pope might think proper to take Hamburgh from us.

[ 11 ]

Fath. The fitting out of the fleet was carried on with fuch expedition, that in a fhort time feventeen Thips, moft of them large ones, were ready for fea in the harbour of Cadiz. A thirtt for riches brought together great numbers of people of all ranks, who defired to embark in this expedition, many of whom intended to take up their abode in the newly difcovered inlands; but, as it was not poffible for Columbus to take them all, he chofe from among them fifteen hundred, and took care not only that the fhips ihould be furnifhed with the neceffary provifions, but alfo with every thing requifite to the eftablihinent of colonies. For this purpofe, he collected all kinds of neceffary inftruments, as well as various animals unknown in the new world, fuch as horfes, affes, cows, &c. and, finally, all forts of European grain; and feeds of many plants, and vegetables, which he thought might thrive in that climate.

As he ftill poffeffed the miftaken notion that the countries he had difcovered were parts of the continent of India, he gave it the name of the Weft Indies, in order to diftinguifh it from what he confidered the other part already known. He gave it this name, becaufe a perfon in his voyage thither muft fail towards the Weft. India, properly fo called, which lay L 2 eaftward, eaftward, was from this time called the Ealt Indies.

[ 112 ]

Cath. But the whole of America is not called the Weft Indies?

Fath. No; we apply this name only to the American illands, which lie in the gulph of Mexico.

As foon as every thing was ready, the fleet fet fail from Cadiz on the twenty-fifth of Sep: tember, 1493. Columbus directed his courfe towards the Canary illes, before which he came to anchor on the fifth of October. Here he took in frefh water, wood, and foine other animals, particularly pigs. On the third day he fet fail again. The pigs which he now took with him, were the ftock from which fprang the whole race of fwine at prefent in Anerica.

Geo. But I fuppofe other pigs were taken there afterwards.

Fath. You are right, George. The American fwine cannot boaft, with certainty, upon the antiquity of their progenitors. Irrational animals might be pardoned this folly, were they capable of it ; but when a man defcends to the vanity of boafting the rank of his anceftors, one cannot but lament the fupidity he difcovers, in fuppofing himfelf the better for their high titles.

[ 113 ]

In the courfe of twenty days, during the whole of which there was a fair wind, they made as much as eight hundred leagues. And fo little of importance occurred, that I may now, without any further ceremony, put them fafe on fhore.

It was on the fecond of November, therefore, thirty-eight days after their departure from Spain, that they caft anchor before an inland which Columbus named Dominica, becaufe they difcovered it on a Sunday; which, in Latin, is called dies dominica, or dies Jolis.

Cha. Is not that one of the Antilles, or Caribbee ifles? Did not the French take it from the Englifh in the prefent war?

Fohn. Certainly ; fee here it is.
Fath. Not finding a convenient anchorage here, Columbus again fet fail, and difcovered feveral other iflands, fone of them of confiderable fize. One of them was Marigalante.

Fames. That is not in our Geography.
Fath. Then we will mark it now. It be longs to the French.

Further, Guadalonpe, which-
Tho. Belongs alfo to the French.
Fath. Columbus called it thus, on account of a promife he had made to fome Monks, who lived in a cloifter of the fame name, that one of the inlands he might difcover fhould be named in honour of their habitation.

$$
L_{3}
$$

And

[ 114 ]

And again, Antigua.
Fred. Which now belongs to the Englifh.
Fath. And then, Porto Rico; which, as you know, ftill belongs to the Engliih; and laftly, the ifland of Saint Martin, of which the Englifh have lately taken poffeffion.

At Guadaloupe they difcovered a very beautiful cafcade, which defcended from the fummit of a ftupendous rock, and might be heard at the diftance of nine miles. At firt they could not difcover any of the natives, as they had left their habitations, and fled into the mountains. But at length the Spaniards, that had been fent out for the purpofe of examining the ifland, brought two boys which they had feized, whe gave them to underfand they were not natives of that place, but had been brought there as captives. Soon after this they met with fix women, who were crying out in a moft dreadful manner for affiftance, for they had been condemned to perpetual flavery. From thefe women they learned, that it was the horrid cuftom of the inhabitants of this ifland to roaft and eat their male prifoners, and to make flaves of the females. The boys and women were immediately taken under the protection of the Spaniards.

The inhabitants of the other iflands confirmed the account which thefe women, and the

( 115 )

the cazique, Guakanahari, had given Columbus of the warlike and barbarous difpofition of thefe people. Almoft every where, when he attempted to land, he was oppofed in the moft defperate manner, and throughout the ifland found melancholy proofs that they devoured their prifoners, like the deer in their forefts. -It was not without fhuddering that they beheld human bones at the doors of almoft every hut. This circumftance, and a wifh to vifit; as foon as poffible, the Spaniards which he had left at Hifpaniola, determined Columbus not to prolong his ftay upon this ifland, and the more fo, as every peaceable attempt to become acquainted with the natives proved fruitlefs. He haftened his departure, and came to anchor off Hifpaniola or the twentieth of the fame month, in a harbour not more than a days journey from the lately erected fort of Navidad:

Sorr.s Spaniards which he had fent on fhore, returned with the ftrange account, that they had found upon the beach two human bodies, tied by ropes about their necks to $a$ wooden crofs. As they had lain fo long as to be quite disfigured, it was impoffible to diftinguifh whether they: were Europeans or not.
'This account gave birth to painful fufpicions in the mind of Columbus, which could not be fatisfied till the next.day. He fpent, therefore; a very

[ 116 ]

a very uneafy night, and at break of day haftened to difcover whether his melancholy conjectures were founded in truth. Upon his arrival off the height of Navidad-

Eliza: What does that mean, Father.
Fath. That is, when he arrived with his fleet oppofite the place where fort Navidad was fituated. Do you not recollect, when we were once upon the ftrand of the Baltic, how the fea appeared to rife above the land as it were?

Eliza. O, yes ; before we came clofe to it the fea appeared like a high hill.

Fath. Well then, becaufe the fea appears to rife in this manner like a hill, that part of it which is oppofite any particular place upon the coaft, is called the height of that place.

Columbus, therefore, immediately upon his arrival off the height of Navidad, fprung into a boat, and ordered them to row to hore. Eut what was his aftonifhment, when he could find neither Spaniards, nor any remains of the fort which he had erected, except fome fcattered remnants of clothes, broken weapons, and utenfils! This told him more than enough. He was convinced beyond all doubt of the deftruction of the infant colony, by finding at a fmall diftan ce from the place, eleven of their dead bodies which bore evident marks of having beers been murdered. Whilft they were lamenting the fad fate of their countrymen, and meditating how they fhould revenge their death upon the natives, the brother of Guakanahari approached, and gave a detailed account of the misfortunes which had caufed the deftruction of thefe European colonifts. The chief particular:s were as follows :-

$[117]$

"Columbus was fcarcely departed when they forgot the valuable advice he had given them. Infead of confirming, by friendly intercourfe, the refpect and veneration in which they were held by the natives; they indulged themfelves in fo many extravagancies and extortions, that the natives foon perceived, inflead of being fuperior, they were in truth inferior beings to themfelves. Their officer endeavoured to maintain good difcipline, but they regarded neither his threats nor perfuafions: they fet his authority at defiance, and ftrolled fingly among the Indians, committing robberies and other enormities of the bafeft kind. They confined their depredations chiefly to the fate of the cazique of Cibao, on account of the gold found there. At length, being unable any longer to fubmit to their ill conduct, he flew to arms, furprized fevera' fragglers and killed them; then furrounded the fort, and fet fire to it. A number of the Spaniards fell in defending it; the others, others, attempting to fave themfelves in a boat, were all drowned."

[ 118 ]

The relater of this melancholy tale further informed them, that Guakanahari had always continued their friend, and at that time lay ill of a wound he had received in their defence.

Columbus's people were unwilling to give credit to the latter part of this account, and wifhed for permiffion to take revenge upon every one of the natives; but he was too wife, and too humane, to give the leaft encouragement to wifhes fo vindictive. On the contrary, he endeavoured to convince them how neceffary it would be to the fecurity and the exiftence of the colony they again intended to place there, to re-eftablifh a good underftanding and friendfhip with the natives; and he therefore recommended the kindeft behaviour on their part towards them.

Columbus then went to vifit Guakanahari, whom he found really ill, from a wound which appeared to have been given by a wooden inftrument, not by a European fword. The unaltered fidelity of this man's behaviour, confirmed the truth of the information which he gave them, as well as that already given by his brother. The cazique, likewife endeavoured, by every means in his power, to fhew his friendly difpofition. He made Columbus a prefent prefent of eight hundred finall hhells, which were confidered as of great value by thefe Indians; likewife one hundred plates of gold, and three gourds full of gold duft, which, together, weighed near two hundred pounds; in return, Columbus made him as welcome a prefent of European trinkets.

[ 119 ]

Upon this, Columbus led his people to a more healthy fituation, at the mouth of a fmall ftream, intending to erect there a regular fortified town, in which thofe he fhould leave behind might have a place of fecurity. No one was permitted to remain an idle fpectator of this work. By the joint labour of fo many hands the firft town built by Europeans in the new world was foon compleated. Columbus, in honour of his Queen, called it Ifabella.

$[120]$

TALE X.

Fath. DURING the building of the town Ifabella, Columbus had a thoufand difficulties to encounter, which nothing lefs than perfeverance like his could have overcome. The Spaniards, who are naturally inclined to indolence, were rendered fitl more fo by the heat of the climate. They loudly complained therefore, of the hardfhips they experienced, which were as unexpected as fevere. They were come here with the moft extravagant expectations, and had promifed themfelves immenfe riches, with a life of cafe. Now they were obliged to work daily under a burning fun, like common labourers.-What a contraft!

The unhealthinefs of the air, which produced drowfinefs and various difeafes, aggravated ftill more their unhappy fate; and to add to this, they foon experienced a fcarcity of the neceffaries of life, which effeminate Europeans could but ill difpenfe with; and the golden mountaine, mountains, which they had promifed them-felves-where were they? 'They were not even permitted to go in fearch of them, becaufe their felf-conceited Admiral was determined to have his town finifhed, before any of them were permitted to go into the interior of the country.

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}121\end{array}\right]$

All thefe were reafons for difcontent, which at length ripened into a plot againft the life of Columbus: fortunately the fire was difcovered before it broke out into a flame. The leader of the confpiracy was feized; fome were punifhed, others were fent back to Spain, in order to take their trials. At the fame time Columbus requefted the King to fend him a reinforcement oî troops, and a frefh fupply of provifions.

Meanwhile, in order to divert the difcontent of his people, he undertook, with a part of them, an excurlion up the country. For fo doing he had another motive; he wifhed to convince the natives of the great fuperiority of European foldiers. With this intention he marched his troops in columns, with colours flying, and martial mufic, and caufed the cavalry, efpecially, to go through their various manouvres. 'This ftruck the Indians with great aftonifhment. Thefe people had till now never feen a horfe, and thought at firft that horfe and rider were but one animal; and you may readily conceive how terrible this animal, half horfe and half man, mult have appeared to them. Moft of them took refuge in their huts wherever the Spaniards made their appearance, and thought themfelves quite fecure when they had faftened up their door places with pieces of canc.

$[122]$

They took with them fome Indians, from the ftate of Guakanahari, as guides. Whenever thefe people, upon their march, came near a hut of their countrymen, they uniformly walked in, and, without faying a word, helped themfelves to whatever provifion they found, as though they had been at home. To this the proprietor of the hut appeared not to make the leaft objection. It feemed as if thefe good natured people, who perhaps had never before feen each other, poffeffed every thing in common. What a reproach to the avarice of Eu-ropeans!-They directed their march towards the gold country, Cibao; and were confirmed in the ideas which the natives had given them of it. It is true, they did not find any gold mines already opened here; for the Indians had not given themfelves fo much trouble to obtain a metal for which they had fo little ufe. But in every brook they found grains and lumps of gold, which the water had wafhed away from the mountains, and forced down with its ftreans.
ftreams. This was proof fufficient that the mountains themfelves contained rich veins of this metal.

With this pleafing news, therefore, they returned to Ifabella. Columbus, before his departure, had erected a fort at this place, in which he ftationed a force fufficient to defend it; but on his return he found the infant colony in a moft deplorable fcate. The provifions were nearly confumed; (they had not yet had time to cultivate the land) and the peftilential difeafes, fo prevalent in thefe hot uncultivated countries, had begun to make dreadful havoc. Every one expected foon to be carried off either by famine or difeafe; every one lamented the folly of having renounced his happinefs, his country, and his. health, to die of want in a foreign clime; every one curfed the author of their misfortunes,' who, by his fafcinating defription of this new country, had induced them to enter upon fo wretched an enterprize. Even the prieft, who had accompanied them from Spain, ftood at the head of the mutineers, and gave full vent to his defpair in the bittereft reproaches.

Fortunately this was not the firft ftorm that Columhus had been called upon to encounter. Experience had furnifhed him with wifdom adapted to fuch occafions, and the various dangers he had been expofed to, had fo fortified his mind, that he was prepared for any trial. He fucceeded, therefore, in quelling this new revolt, and once more re-eftablifhed peace among his people.

[. 124$]$

He had no fooner accomplifhed his defign, than he again fet fail with the intention of making frefh difcoveries. He gave his brother, Don Diego, the command over the people he left behind him.

Pet. Was this he whom Columbus fent to England.

Fames. No. His name was Bartholomew.
Fath. Right. Don Diego was his fecond brother.

Fred. Why is he called Don?
Eliza. The word Don is placed before the names of perfons of rank in Spain, as the word von is in Germany, or de in France.

Fred. So!
Fath. Columbus now put to fea, with one large fhip and two fimall ones, intending to direct his courfe weftward. The moft imoortant difcovery he made upon this voyage was the ifland of Jamaica-

Foin. Which belongs to the Engiiih.
Fath. The fame. As foon as he came to anchor off this place, he fent a boat well armed to found the harbour.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}125\end{array}\right]$

Eliza. What is that, Father?
Fath. That is, they were to go and throw out the leadin different places, in order to learn if there were water enoug .or the fhips to come in with fafety.

This boat was foon furrounded by a great number of canoes with armed Indians, who feemed determined to oppofe their landing. As thefe poor creatures could not be perfuaded to defift from their purpofe, the Spaniards faluted them with a fhower of arrows, upon which they immediately took flight.

Geo. Had thefe Spaniards no guns with them.

Fath. The ufe of guns was at that time by no means general; moft foldiers were, therefore, armed with bows and arrows.

The harbour being found fafe, Columbus ran in, had his fhips repaired, and fpent the reft of his time there in exploring the country. It appeared to be more valuable than Hifpaniola, he did not fail to take poffeffion of this ifland alfo, in the name of his Catholic Majefty.

Fred. Who is he?
Fath. Do you not remember, Frederick, that this is the title of the King of Spain.

Fred. O yes.
Fath. From hence he failed towards Cuba, with the view of examining whether this ifland, me 3 which, which, as you know, he had before difcovered, were a part of the continent or not. And here commenced a chain of difficulties and dangers, in comparifon with which thofe he had already experienced were as nothing. He foon had to encounter one of the moft dreadful ftorms in a very dangerous and unknown fea. He found himfelf in the midft of rocks and hoals, which threatened his fhip with immediate deftruction; then, again, the veffels were taking in fo much water, in the midft of a fathomlefs abyfs, that it was with great difficulty the feamen, who had nearly exhaufted all their ftrength at the pump, could keep them from finking. He was now obliged to fuffer hunger and thirft with his companions, and as in every difficulty he uniformly difcovered more concern for them than for himfelf, when any frefh fupply was thrown by good fortune in their way, he was always the laft to partake of it. And now, again, he had to combat the difcontent of his people, who in the bittereft terms reproached him with their misfortunes, notwithftanding he fhared in them all with the utmoft fortitude and patience. View this great man, children, furrounded by fuch a multitude of difficulties; obferve the compofure of countenance he yet maintains; ftill hoping by his example to reftore chearfulnefs and courage to the minds of his timid companions; and judge from your own feelings whether an old author does not fpeak the truth, when he fays, 'there is not a grander fight in the world than a brave man encountering difficulties.'

[. 126 ]

[ 327 ]

At feveral places where he landed in Cuba, he learned from the natives that it was really an ifland. In fome parts of it, the quantities of birds and infects were fo great that fometimes. in the cleareft day the fun could not be feen for them, and the air was darkened by them as in a thunder ftorm. On the north fide he found the fea covered with an innumerable multitude of finall iflands, to which he gave the name of Queen's Garden. In the midft of them they met with a canoe of fifhermen, whofe method of fifhing was fo fingular that it deferves to be mentioned. They ufed a particular kind of fifh, about the fize of a herring, called kives, and which is faid to have remarkably fharp teeth. They tied this finh by the tail, and then threw it into the water. When it met with any other fifh it inmediately faftened upon them, and the fifhermen by this means drew out their prey. The Spaniards faw them take out in this manner a turtle of one hundred pounds weight, upon tbe neck of which this finall fifh had faftened itfelf.

So foon as thefe fifhermen difcovered the boat coming towards them, they made figns to the the crew not to approach, as though they had fome bufinefs to fettle with their acquaintances. This requeft was granted, and when they had taken their turtles, they came on board of their own accord, and prefented the Admiral with the fruits of their labour. Columbus made fuch a return for their kindnefs as he knew would be acceptable.

[ 123 ]

Whilft Columbus was thus cruifing among, thefe illands, upon the coaft of Cuba, they obferved an appearance in the fea, which for its fingularity deferves alfo to be noticed. In one part the fea appeared footted green and white; in another it was as white as milk; and in a third, to the great aftonimment of the failors, as black as ink. They could not at all account for thefe fingular appearances.

When they again came to anchor off the coaft of Cuba, after a very dangerous cruize, in the midft of rocks and fhoals, they erected an altar on the ftrand, at which to perform their devotions. An old cazique approached them, and appeared to pay the greateft attention whilft they went through the whole of the ceremony. When they had concluded, he prefented the Admiral with fome of the fruits of the ifland. He then feated himfelf upon the earth, raifed his knees to his chin, and in this pofture addreffed a fpeech to the Admiral, which was interpreted to him as follows:-

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}{[29]}\end{array}\right.$

" Thou art come into thefe countries with a force, like unto which we have never feen any; therefore haft thou brought fear and trembling upon us. But know, that in the other world, we are well affured there are two different places for the reception of the departed; one is terrible and full of darknefs; this is the inheritance of the wicked; the other is goodly and chearful; there the lovers of peace, and the friends of mankind, find reft. Doeft thou believe that even thou muft die? Doeft thou believe that thou fhalt inherit according to the good or evil thou haft done? Then do I truft, thou wilt not injure thofe who have never injured thee. What thou haft juft been doing is right; for if I am not deceived thou haft been offering up thanks to God."

The Admiral anfwered, with the greateft fatisfaction, that he was glad the cazique was acquainted with the immortality of the foul. That he was not come to promote evil; but that his matter, the King of Spain, had fent him there for the fole purpofe of difcovering whether the inhabitants were in the habits of doing injuries to each other, as had been told him of the Caraibs. He had orders to reclaim them from thele evil prastices, and to fee that

$$
\left[\begin{array}{lll}
130
\end{array}\right]
$$

that the inhabitants of all thefe his lands lived in peace with each other.

The cazique had fcarcely received this anfwer, when the tears were feen to trickle down his venerable face. He then informed the Admiral, that if the affection he had for his wife and children did not prevent him, he would immediately return with him to Spain. He received a few prefents from them, and appeared to be ftruck with their value. He then fell on his knees, and afked feveral times if thefe people had not defcended from heaven.

The continual anxiety of mind which Columbus had lately felt, both day and night, began now to threaten the moft ferious confequences to his health : he gradually funk into a ftate of debility, which being attended with an almoft entire privation of fleep, weakened his memory in a moft furprifing manner. His recovery was defpaired of; and, on this account, they made all the hafte in their power to get back again to Ifabella.

Providence had there prepared him a fight which tended, more than any medicine, to reftore his health. Upon his arrival at this place he found his much beloved brother Bartholomew, who had brought with him the troops, and frefh fupplies of provifions, which he had requeited might be fent from Spain. This was a double a double reafon for joy, which may be better conceived than defcribed.

[. 13r ]

It was now thirteen long years fince thefe brothers, who loved each other affectionately, on account of the fimilality of their difpofitions and purfuits, had been feparated, without having received any tidings of each other. You may eafily fuppofe, then, how affecting this interview muft have been.

Bartholomew, as we have already feen, addreffed himfelf to the King of England, and fucceeded to the beft of his wifhes. He immediately fet off, therefore, on his return to Spain, in order to communicate this agreeable news to his brother; but learned, in France, that he had himfelf already executed what he hoped to have affifted him in. He therefore haftened his return, in hopes, at leaft to be in time to attend his brother on his fecond voyage : but fate fo ordered it, that Chriftopher had fet fail a fecond time before he arrived at Cadiz.

He was called to Court, and there received all the honourdue to a brother of the difcoverer of the new world; and the news of Columbus's difagreeable fituation, with his requeft for frefh fupplies arriving, Bartholomew wás immediately fixed upon to take them. He flew on the wings of affection, to accomplifh

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}132\end{array}\right]$

'an expedition, the fuccefs of which lay fo near his heart.

His arrival could not have happened at a more feafonable time. The Admiral's indifpofition, with the deplorable ftate of affairs at Hifpaniola, made the prefence of fo courageous and experienced a perfon as his brother, a bleffing, without which, in all probability, both himfelf and the colony would have been loft. This unexpected good fortune operated fo powerfully to his reftoration, that he was enabled to prevent the ruin of the infant town which he had juft compleated.

Strange alterations indeed had taken place in his abfence : two-thirds of the colony had fallen a facrifice to the plague. The perfon whom Columbus had left as commander in chief (his name was Margarita) had revolted; and being unable to accomplifh his defigns, he had got on board one of the fhips, in company with Father Boyl, who was his companion in the revolt, and fet fail for Spain. The foldiers who were under his command, after his departure, went in fmall detachments about the country, and there committed every kind of outrage upon the poor Indians: at length, however, the natives affembled in a body, and killed many of the Spaniards whom they found in the woods.

[ $\mathrm{I}_{33}$ ]

All thefe occurrences were unfortunate, and fuch as threatened the colony with deftruction. What was ftill worfe, the Indians, who till now had been very peaceable, began to open their eyes to the misfortunes they had reafon to fear. Inftructed by experience, they caft a glance on futurity, and faw with horror that they had nothing to expect from thefe ftrangers, whom at firft they had viewed with fo much veneration, but flavery and famine. The heat of the climate, and the indolent life they were accuftomed to lead; rendered very little food fufficient for their fupport. A handfill or maize, and a little roafted caffada or bread root*, was all that was neceffary to fatist " ir ir appetites; and they now faw, with aftominment, that one Spaniard would eat at a fingle meal, as much as would be fufficient to ferve four of them a whole day. They confidered thefe Europeans, therefore, as excefively voracious; who, like infects, having confumed all the food in their native country, were com.

[^8]
[ 34 ]

pelled to leave it in fearch of another, where they might ftill feaft their gluttony. They hence concluded, that the produce of their illand would not be fufficient to fupport both themfelves and thefe ftrangers, and that they muft all, ti.srefore, expect to die of hunger.

Thefe reflections, and the daily outrages committed by the Spaniards, convinced them of the abfolute neceffity either of deftroying their vifitors, or bending their necks to their tyranny. They had fufficient courage to induce them to make trial of the firf alternative. They ran to arms, and enrolled themfelves under their caziques, who formed their different tribes into one large body.

Thus were affairs fituated when Columbus returned to Ifabella. Every thing was in motion. Every thing bore a warlike appearance. The whole body of the natives, except Guakanahari's tribe, who fill remained attached to the Spaniards, were now in arms, and ready to fall upon the fmall body of their oppreffors. They were fuppofed to have affembled to the number of one hundred thoufand.

Columbus was fhocked, not fo much at the danger which threatened his new fettlement, as at the injuftice of his chriftian fubje ts, who had thus enraged thefe Indians by nature fo peaceable. The pleafing hope of inducing thefe thefe infidels, by means of kindnefs and affection, to embrace the chriftian religion, was gone for ever. He faw himfelf obliged to thed the blood of thofe who fought for nothing more than to defend their own propert $f$, their liberty, and their lives againft the rapacity of robbers. A fituation truly lamentable for fo benevolent, fo confcientious a man as Columbus.

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}135\end{array}\right]$

In thefe diftreffing circumftances came the faithful Guakanahari, not only to fympathize with him, but to offer his fervices. 'This fteadfaft friend of the Europeans had, by his attachment to them, drawn upon himfelf the difpleafure of all the other caziques; fo that his making at this time a common caufe with the Spaniards, was as much a matter of neceflity as of choice. Columbus thankfully accepted his fervices, and both affembled their troops for the conflict.

And now, children, prepare yourfelves to fee the firft battle fought in America, by Europeans, which was the commencement of fo many bloody fcenes, attended with plunder, and barbarity that have fpread unheard of ravages in this unhappy country. But an event of fo much importance may, with propriety, form the fubject of another tale.

[. 136 ]

TALE XI.

THE next day the Father entered the room, in which he was accuftomed to relate thefe tales, with evident marks of forrow in his countenance. Every eye was fixed upon fiin with eager expectation; and in this little affembly there was an awful ftillnefs, which none dared to interrupt. 'The Father, in an affecting tone of voice, at length began.

Oh! My dear children, why cannot I let the curtain drop, and for ever hide from you the events I have now to relate; which hrought fo much mifery on the newly difcovered world! But what good purpofe will it anfwer to conceal them? Sooner or later you muft hear of them. For loud, loud, will the voice of innocence and humanity proclaim to the lateft pofterity, the enormities which chriftions committed upon their brethren, the poor oppreffed and helplefs Indians!

Both armies now ftand oppofite each other, and the dreadful moment is arrived which muft witnefs either the deftruction of the Spaniards, or the flavery of the natives of the new world! On one fide ftand a hundred thoufand In uns, armed with darts, with wooden fwords, with fpears, and arrows, pointed either with flint or fifh bone. On the other fide, there appear but two hundred European infantry, and twenty cavalry, fupported by a fmall body of Indians under the command of Guakanahari. A. ftrange difparity! But what this handful of Europeans loft in numbers they gained by their tactics, by their arms, their horfes, and their dogs.

[ 137 ]

Char. Their dogs?
Fath. Yes; they had brought a pack of large dogs with them, to hunt the poor Indians like wild beafts.

Elisa. Fie! What cruel creatures!
Fath.-The hazard then on both fides was nearly equal, and every thing depended upon the iffue of the battle.

Columbus fixed on the nigh for the time of this dreadful fcene; thinking the Indians might be overcome with fear through an unexpected attack. As foon, therefore, as it was dark, having divided his little army between 'imfelf, his brother Bartholomew, and Guakanahari, he fell upon the Indians when he was the leaft cxpected. The noife which they

$$
\text { N } 3 \text { made, }
$$

[ $1 y^{3}$ ]

made, the thundering of the mufkets, the fnorting of the horfes, and the barking of the dogs, fo much alarmed the Indians, that after having made a very llight refiftance they retreated in $t^{\prime}$ 'ie greateft confufion. Some of them fell by the fword, oi' ers were trod to death by the horfes, or torn to pieces by the dogs, and many were made prifoners. The reft fled into the woods.

It was then decided that this inoffenfive people fhould bend their necks to the iron yoke of Eurorean llavery. Columbus haftened to take advantage of the victory he had gained. He marched through the whole country, and wherever he came the natives, without the leaft refiftance, fubmitted to bis power. In a few months the inhabitants of the whole ifland were fubject to the dominion of Spain.

Fames. Father; I don't like Guakanahari. Fath. And why not?
James. Becaufe he combined with the Spaniards againft his own countrymen.

Fath. But is it not very praife-worthy in lim to be fo faithful in his friendship?

Fames. Certainly; and in that refpect I was very much pleafed with him. But the duties he owed his native country were greater than any he owed Columbus. He ought, therefore, either not to have interfered at all in this affair, affair, or to have taken the part of his countrymen.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}139\end{array}\right]$

Fath. (to the other children.) Do you hear, children, what James fays there? What think you of it?

All. That James is in the right.
Fath. I am really of the fame opinion myfelf, although it is fcarcely juft to judge oí an action when we are not fulty acquainted with the circumftances that accompanied it. Who knows but that the Indians might, in fome inftances, have wronged the Earopeans? Or whether the cruelties committed by the Spaniards in other parts of the inland were known to Guakanahari? Or whether he was not perfuaded that it would be for the advantage of the whole race of Indians, to have for their governor a man fo powerful and humane as Columbus? I do not fay this with a view to juftify his conduct (for furely it could in no cafe be right, to take up arms againft his native country) but merely to fhew that it was poffible he might have acted wrong from worthy motives; and in this cafe he is deferving of our pity, not our hatred.

Let us return again to Columbus. Until now this great man tas done nothing but what demands our admiration and efteem : but he was a man. Prepare yourfelves, therefore, to fee him alfo cominit a fault; and $O$, may it be ftrongly

[ 140 ]

Atrongly impreffed upon your ininds, how neceffary it is for even the good man to be continually watchful over his 'heart and conduct, that he fwerve not from the path of duty, perhaps juft at the time he is about to attain the fummit of virtue.

Margarita and Father Boyl, two of his fworn enemies, were now in Spain. He knew that thefe mean degraded pipirits would leave no ftone unturned, in order to detract from his merit, and to perfuade the King, who was already much inclined to fufpicion, that the difcoveries he had made were not of near the confequence they had been reprefented. Thus he faw gathering over his head, a ftorm which muft inevitably overwhelm him, if he did not endeavour to ward it off.

The only means of effecting this, was to fend the Spanifh Court a confiderable fpecimen of the riches he had promifed from his difcoveries; and for this purpofe he found himfelf under the neceffity of levying a heavy tribute upon the poor Indians.

Columbus therefore demanded of the conquered iflanders, who lived in thofe diftricts where the gold was found, a certain quantity of gold duft quarterly; and from the others, twenty-five pounds of cotton for each man. This was more than it was poffible for thefe poor people to procure. Accuftomed from their childhood to live im indolence, they thought it extremely hard to be compelled to exert themfelves in collecting gold and cotton, the ftock of which muft every day naturally diminifh : there was, however, no help. The order was given, and the hard-hearted Europeans infifted upon its fulfilment without mercy. This then is the firft inftance in which I find Columbus blameable*.

[ 141 ]

Thos. Yes; but neceffity forced him to it.

Fath. Neceffity! What neceffity, however great, fhould ever lead a good man to deviate' from the principles of juftice and humanity. Is it being virtuous to perform our daty merely fo long as it is combined with intereft and fafety? Real virtue, as I have often told you, confifts in making facrifices-in conforming cheerfully to the rules of truth and juftice, although we fhould forefee that certain lofs would be the confequence, or that we fhould thereby be deprived of our eafe, of our com--forts, of our honour, or even of life itfelf:Earneftly therefore as I fhould wifh to juftify

* The tranflator has already given an inftance that he does not agree with the worthy author in this fentiment, -See page 45.

Columbus

[ 14: ]

Columbus in the fevere meafure he has juft adopted, yet it is impoffible. The voice of truth, which now cries againft him, overcomes the voice of love in my heart, which would fo willingly excufe his firf fault. I an compelled to acknowledge that his conduct was both felfifh and crucl.

Mother. But, iny dear hufband, do not let us forget that poor Columbus was at this time weak, both in mind and body. He was not, perhaps, in full pofeffion of his rational faculties.

Fath. You are right, my dear. When forming an opinion of our fellow-creatures, how apt are we to overlook thofe circumftances which might tend to their juftification !-Fie ! I am afhamed of my felf that this did not occur to me. Well, this fhall teach me in future to be more circumfect in judging of other people; and, my children, let the fault I have juft committed be a warning to you.

The yoke which was thus laid upon the poor Indians, was heavier than they could bear; fince it was not poffible for them to furnifh the quantity of gold and cotton which was demanded of them; and as they were urged with the greateft rigour to the payment of this tribute, they formed a refolution, which could only only originate in defperation-Hear, children, what it was.

[ ${ }^{2} 43$ ]

From the extravagant notions which they had formed of the voracioufnefs of the Europeans, they conceived it poffible, by ceafing to cultivate their maize and calfada, to drive them away from their illand by means of famine. One and all, therefore, rooted up what had been already fown, and then retired into impenetrable woods, in which they propofed fupporting themfelves on the wild fruits there produced. And here, children, lament with me the mifery of thefe poor creatures. They fell a facrifice to their own plans!

They foon began to feel all the horrors of the famine they had defigned for their oppreffors. Great numbers were fwept away in the moft deplorable manuer; others were carried off by the plague, which is a common attendant of famine, and the remainder were fo weakened and emaciated, that they were lefs able than ever to bear the burdeas impofed upon them. This was indeed a moft dreadful fpectacle.

In refpect to the Spaniards, they unennbedly fuffered much by this defperate proceeding; bui by means of their own induftry, and a frefh fupply of provifions, which had" feafonably arrived from Spain, they were far from fuffering the

[ $14+$ ]

the extremes of famine. The expectation, therefore, indulged by the Indians, of banifhing their tyrants, was again fruftrated.

In the mean time the ftorm which Columbus forefaw, had already begun to burft upon him. Margarita and Father Boyl had defcribed the difcoveries he had made as being in themfelves fo defpicable, and reprefented his conduet in colours fo hideous, that they did not fail to make the Spanifh Court very fufpicious of nim. It was therefore determined to fend a perfon to the Wert Indies, for the purpofe of examining into the conduct of Columbus, as well as the difcoveries he had made, and report the refult of his enquiries to the King. Should you wifh to know his name? It was Aguado. He had till then been valet de chambre to his Niajefty.

This Aguado, puffed up by an ill-affuned confequence, arrived at Hifpaniola, and haftened to make the Admiral fenfible of the authority with which he was invefted. He treated this great man with the utmoft difdain, and invited all, both Incians and Spaniards, who had any acrufations to make againft Columbus, to appear before his tribunal. He haftily feized every complaint brought by the difcontented, without any examination into the juftice of them, in order to extract from each fomething bad, and thus to form a picture of the man he wifhed to ruin, in the blackeft colours poffible.

[ $1+5$ ]

Columbus, as we well know, could bear a great deal ; but infults like thefe were too aggravating. It was, therefore, no wonder that he determined to return immediately to Spain, and after having given a full explanation to the King and Queen, then to leave the iffue entirely to their decifion.

With this view he appointed his brother Bartholomew, Adelantado, or vice-governor of the ifland during his abfence. The office of chief juftice he conferred, unfortunately, on a man who was not deferving of fo much power; for he, as we fhall foon find, very much abufed it-His name was Roldan.

In order to make this voyage in as fhort a time as poffible, Columbus fteered directly for Spain. He little thought how much he fhould by this means retard it. He was compelled to learn, by dear bought experience, what every failor is now acquainted with, that it is extremely difficult to proceed in this direction on account of the trade winds, which blow from the North Eaft, and of courfe directly in the teeth of thofe who are coming from the Welt toward Europe. It is now well known, that fhips returning from the Weft Indies, in O order order to avoid thefe winds, muft go further North before they fteer for Europe.

[ 146 ]

He foon perceived the difficulties connected with the courfe he had chofen; but unaccultomed to be difinayed, he perfevered in it with the utmoft ardour. However the voyage, on account of this contrary wind, proceeded fo flowly, that at the end of three months he was fill beating about upon the open fea, without the leaft reafon to flatter himfelf that he fhould foon make land. The anxiety which he experienced on this account was greatly heightened, by finding that his ftock of provifions was nearly exhaufted. He was under the neceffity of putting his people upon a very fhort allowance, not nearly fufficient to fatisfy the demands of nature; but in order that none of them fhould have any reafon to complain, he, agreeably to the plan he had always obferved, placed himfelf in that refpect upon an equality with them.

But even with this frugality, the ftock of provifions gradually diminifhed, and confequently the diftrefs and defpair of the crew increafed in proportion. Hunger at length made them outrageous, and produced the inhuman determination of killing and eating the Indians who were on board, or if they hould not be cermitted to do this, they would at leaft throw them overboard, in order that they might not confume any more of the provifions. But even in an extremity like this, indefcribably dreadful as it was, Coluinbus's benevolence, which was fo diftinguifhed a feature in his character, did not forfake him. He fteadfaftly rejected their requeft, and reprefented to his furious companions that the poor Indians were fellow creatures, as well as fellow fufferers with themfelves; and that of courfe they had a juft right to a proportion of the provifions that were left. In this manner he fucceeded in pacifying the rage of his people for a floort time, and before they could recur again to their inhuman refolutions, heaven itfelf interfered, and put an end to all their diftrefs - The coaft of Spain appeared in view.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}1 & 77\end{array}\right]$

Matth. Thank heaven they are there! I was very much alarmed for them.

Geo. So was I. I thought it would have been all over with the poor Indians!

Fath. Rejoice then that our brave Columbus has once more efcaped : and take this pleafing impreffion with you to bed.

All. What ended already!

[ 148 ].

TALE XII.

Fath. OW, children, let us fee without further delay, what reception Columbus will this time meet with from the Court of Spain.

With an inward confciouinefs of his own merits, but at the fame time with a modeft deportment, natural to great minds, the defamed difcoverer of the New World now approaches the throne of his Prince, in order to clear himfelf of falfe imputations. However, a vindication of his conduct was fcarcely neceffary, for the fight of his countenance alone infpired his royal judges with their former refpect for his merits, at the fame time that they felt fome degree of thame, on account of their now credulity. But when he difplayed the valuable prefents he had brought with him, every mark of fufpicion fled, and they were only anxious to do away the painful impreffion he might have received, by every puffible mark of honour they could beftow upon him.

Thus,

[ 349 ]

Thus, children, innocence and real merit generally triumph over the malice and envy of the daftardly defamer. Let all be right here [laying his hand upon his heart] and there is but little to fear from the fcandal of evilminded people. The fun may now and then be darkened by a thick fog; but patience!-The fog will not always continue. Sooner or later itmuft vanifh; and then does the great luminary of day again appear in all its fplendour. Thus it is with virtue, when the fog fometimes caft over it by envy is difperfed.

Every thing which Columbus now propofed was immediately acceded to. His principal attention, however, was directed to the firm eftablifhment of the Colony at Hifpaniola; and for this purpofe he was defirous to have as many people, and as much provifions fent thither, as he efteemed abfolutely neceffary. He particularly wifhed that a number of peafants and mechanics fhould accompany him, in order that, in future, the colony might be enabled to maintain itfelf. This alfo was granted him.

Thus far all was well. But another of his propofals was lefs worthy of a man of his wifdom. In order that Spain might not fuffer by fending away fo many of its fubjects to people the new colonies he propofed that all the culprits confined in the differeat prifons

$$
{ }^{\circ} 3 \quad \text { ihould }
$$

[:50]

fhould be tranfported to Hifpaniola, and be made to work in the gold mines lately opened there. This alfo was agreed to, and an order was immediately diffatched to every court of juftice, that they fhrold not only tranfport to the Weft Indies the prifoners already in confinement, but any that might he reafter le found guilty. But did I not call this propolai unwife?

Some. Yes, yes.
Fath. Tell me. John, what you think of it.
Fokn. Willingly. I think that if there are fo maxy bul people fent to the Weft Indies, the diforders in the new colony muft become greater and grenter; and thefe bad people may, in time, infect the others; fo that they will become bad likewife, and then Columbus would have a whole country of bad people.

Fames. Yes; and when the natives find fo many bad men amongft chriftians, they will not be much inclined to embrace the chriftian religion.

Fath. I am glad that you have anticipated my opinion fo well. Experience has afforded lamentable proof, that fuch fears were but too well founded. But of this at fome future time. -Now to return again to Columbus-fhould be carried into execution with all poffible difpatch, the fitting out of the fleet this: time went on but flowly. The enemies of Columbus were the caufe of this, and it was to them chiefly that the management of this bufinefs was committed. Thefe degraded wretches, finding they could not do him any perfonal injury, endeavoured, to the utmoft of their power, to retard him in the honourable career in which he had gained fo much fame. They went therefore about what was committed to their care, with the greateft tardinefs; and fo contrived their plans, that fomething or other was always deficient. Thas a whole year had paffed before two tranfports only, with provifions, were fitted out for the colony; and Columbus was obliged to wait another whole jear after their departure, before he could get the fmall fquadron ready for fea, with which he was to go out in fearch of new difcoveries.

Notwithftanding the King had given exprefs orders, that every thing which he propof l

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}151\end{array}\right]$

Eliza. Father, what kind of fhips are thofe which you call tranfports?

Fath. Such as are ufed folely for the purpofe of fending to any place, men, provifions, and other things. But do you know what a fquadron is?

Eliwa. O, ycs, Futher. You explained: that t w, when you were reading the newfpaper. When a few fhips fail together it is called a fquadron, is it not?

$[152]$

Fath. It is. This word, however, is generally applied to men of war. When there are many fhips torether, it is then called a fleet. -The fquadron fitted out for Columbus confifted only of fix fail.

Thos. How many fails has a hip?
Fath. It has a great many, as you muft have already feen; but when we fay a fquadron confifted of fix fail, we do unt mean the fails of the Gip; but that it confifted of fo many fhips.

Columbus was inclined this time to fail in quite a new courfe, by which he was in hopes of difcovering the continent he had fo long wifhed for. With this view, as foon as he had reached the Canary iflands, he fteered for the Cape de Verd iflands, which the Portuguefe had difcovered. I hope you recollect where thefe lie.

Charles. Juft as if we fhould not know that. Here [pointing upon the map] under the Canary iflands, juft oppofite Cape Vied.

Fath. Right-But when he failed from the Canaries, he fent half his fquadion ftraight to Hifpaniola, in order to take a frefh fupply of provifions for the colony, and ftrongly recommended to the commander of thefe thips, to haften haften his paffage thither as much as pollible. As foon as Columbus had paffed the firft of the Cape de Verd iflands, which is called the Salt ifand, he came to anchor off a fmall barren illand, of which the Portuguefe made at that time a very fingular ufe. They fent thitherall thofe infected by the leprofy to be cured.

[ 153 ]

Cath. Why fo?
Fath. JJpon the coafts of this ifland are found great quantives of turtles, that come from the coaft of Africa, in order to lay their eggs here in the fand. Thefe animals are eafily caught. If they are only turned over on their backs, they cannot help themfelves at all. Now it had been obferved, that eating their flefh, and wafhing in their blood, was a certain remedy for that infectious diftemper. Hence they fent thofe who were infected with it, to this ifland to be cured, as I have now defcribed.

Befides the turtle, there was nothing elfe to be found upon the ifland, except an amazing number of goats, that had been produced from eight of thefe animals, which a Portuguefe brought with him from Europe. There was. not fo much as a tree or a well upon the whole ifland; the poor creatures, therefore, who were fent hither, were obliged to drink the thick ftagnated rain water, which they found in holes and ditches. At this time there were not more than fix healthy people upon the ifland.

[ 154 ]

From hence Columbus continued his courfe right South, intending not to pat about to the Weft until he arave! ot the Equator, which you will recollect is that line drawn round the globe, dividing it into two equal parts. But when he had failed as far as the third degree North latitude-You know, I prime, all of you, what that means?

Nic. O yes, father; when he had proceeded fo far that he was only three degrees from the line.

Fiath. Very right, Nicholas. When he had proceeded thus far he was quite becalmed. The fun beains now darted upon their heads with fuch aftonifhing heat, that the poor people hardly knew what to do with themfelves. The wine calks burf with the heat; all the water on board hecame putrid; the provifions were fpoiled; the fhips themiclves became burning hot, and the defpairing crews expected every minute that they would burft into flames. Behold, children, what a deplorable fituation $\mathbf{C o}$ lumbus is again brought into!

To add to his own diftrefs, and the defpair of his difheartened crew, he was feized with a moft violent attack of the g out, brought on, in all probability, by anyi , of mind and continued

[ 155 ]

continued watching. Herc he lay racked with pain, and wretched from the confideration of the dangerous fituation which his fhips were in, fcorched with intolerable heat; without the poflibility of relief from a draught of frefh water. Pitiable indeed was his fituation.
[Some of the children figh.]
At length heaven took compafion on his great diftrefs, and fent fuch a heavy fhower of rain, that it was fcarcely poffible to remain upon deck. The heat, it is true, was diminifhed but little by it. It afforded them, however, a refrefhing beverage; and the wind, to their great joy, rofe at the fame time, and hope began again to glimmer in the countenances of his people. They intreated him not to perfevere in his intention of failing further South, and he, agreeably to their wifhes, directed his courfe South Weft. After having failed in this direction feveral days, they at length heard the joyful cry of " land! land!' from the maft head. This was a heaven!; found to the poor half-famifhed and worn-out-failors, who had been folong toffed about upon the wide ocean. The ifland which they now approached, difcovered itfelf in the form of three hills. Hence Columbu; gave it the name of Trinidad, which it ftill bears. Look, here it lies; not far from the mouth of the river Oroonoko.

Fred.

[ 156 ]

Fired. Oh! where the monkeys are found.
Fitth. What monkeys do you mean, Fred.? Fred. Why thofe which are caught in fuck a fingular manner.

Fath. How do you mean? Tell us, if you pleafe?

Fred. Why the huntfinen fet a bottle of maize under a tree, then directly as they are gone, down comes a monkey, and puts his paw into it; but when he has got his paw full, he cannot get it back again through the narrow neck of the bottic. Upon the return of the liuntfinen, the monkey, inftead of letting go the maize and running away, holds it ftill fatt, making a moft terrible noife, and thus falls a prey to his own folly.

Mother. Thofe are very foolifh monkejs indeed, Frederick.

Fred. Indeed they are, Mother.
Moth. Should you think there are any fuch little monkeys amongit us?

Fred. O dear, no.
Moth. Not four-legged ones it is true; but fuppofe a little two-legged animal fhould be fo very fond of daintics as to injure his ftomach by eating them, rather thais deny his appetite any thing. What wo uld you call fuch a one?

Fred. [Wagging his finger archl:.] Mother, Mother, that is meant for me.

Moth.

$[157]$

Moth. Does the cap fit?
Fred. Well, I will not do fo again. Indeed I will not, I promife you. You fhall all of you be witneffes.

Fath. Well done, Frederick. If you ever wifh to be a flout man, and you do wifh it furely, you muft learn betimes to defpife dainties, and keep to good homely fare. That will make you ftrong and healthy; dainties, on the contrary, make us weakly and unhealthy.-Now again to Columbus-

The river Oroonoko empties itfelf into the fea, near Trinidad, with fuch amazing impetuofity, that it renders navigation here extremely dangerous. The waves rage, and break over each other in a moft dreadful manner; and the thip that fhould have the misfortune to get among them, would run great hazard of being dathed to pieces. Columbus experienced this misfortune ; for, before he was aware, he found himfelf in the midft of thefe turbulent waves, which toffed about his fhips like fo many corks. It exercifed all his addrefs to make his efcape, which he at laft effected through a narrow ftrait, of itfelf fo dreadful, that he called it la Bocca del Drago, or the Dragon's Throat. Look children, [pointing to the map], here it is, between 'Trinidad, and the coaft of Cumana, which as you lanow is a part of Terra Firma.

$$
\left[\begin{array}{lll}
158
\end{array}\right]
$$

Pet. Was it then Columbus that difcovered the continent of America?

Fath. Certainly it was. He was convinced that this land could not be an inland, on account of the amazingly ftrong and extenfive current of the Oroonoko.

Peter. But why was not that country called Columbia, after his name?

Fath. That it was not was certainly a piece of injuftice towards him, which our an ceftors ought not to have committed. But fo it is, and what is done cannot be altered.

Eliza. Why is it called Annerica?
Fath. We fhall hear that hereafter, we muft at prefent endeavour not to lofe fight of Co lumbus's fhips.

Convinced that he had now difcovered the continent of the New World, he fteered weitward along the coaft, and went afhore at feveral places. He found the inhabitants bore a great refemblance tic thofe of Hifpaniola, cxcepting that they appear to poffefs more fenfe and courage, and were rather lighter coloured. 'They were likewife adorned with plates of gold and pearls, which they willingly exchanged for any European toys, however infignificant. One of them came quite alone to Columbias, whilft he was on thore for the benefit of the frefh air, after his long indifpofition. He approached proached hin with feeming confidence, took a red velvet cap from his head, and in return pu:t a golden crown in its place. Columbus concluded, from this circumftance, that he inutt be a cazique; and gave orders to treat him with becoming refpect.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}159\end{array}\right]$

Thefe Indians wore a piece of coloured cotton round their heads, and a fhort apron of the fane ftuff about their waifts. They had long hair, and their arms confifted of a bow and arrows, and a fhield. Columbus would willingly have made a longer ftay here, in order to explore the interior of the country, but the bad condition of his hips, and his indifpofition, which ftill continued, compelled him to make inmediately for Hifpaniola. Upon his voyage to this place he difcovered the ifland Margarita, [look here it is] which, on account of the pearl fifhery eftablifhed there, is become of fo much confequence.

Much weakened by ficknefs and continual agitation of mind, he at length arrived at his colony, there to reft for a fhort time from his cares and troubles. But, Oh!--However, enough for to-night.

[ 160 ]

TALE XIII.

Father. Alas! the time for peace and reft to Columbus was not yet come. Inftead of finding Hifpaniola a place of comfort, new difficulties, new cares, troubles and dangers there awaited him, in themfelves fo great, that the fortitude of any one, unaccuftomed to encounter fuch fcenes, muft inevitably have funk under them. Let us hear what they were, and in what manner our hero conducted himfelf.

His worthy brother, Bartholomew, had during his abfence removed the colony to another fituation, far preferable to the former, and had there begun to build a town, which, in honour of his father Dominicus, he called Domingo. 'Fhis, which is ftill in a flourifhing ftate, was for a long time the principal town in the Weft Indies; and from it the whole ifland has, by degrees, taken its name.

So foon as Bartholomew had formed a plan for this new town, he made an excurfion with tome of his people into thofe provinces of the ifland where his brother had not yet been, and the chief juftice, Roldan, remained with the others. But this wicked man repaid the confidence which had bean placed in him with the bafeft ingratitude.

[ 161 ]

He had long wifhed for an opportunity of depreffing the family of Columbus, and making himfelf the governor of the ifland. This opportunity feemed to prefent itfelf during the abfence of Bartholomew and his brother. He availed himfelf of it to the utmoft of his power, by endeavouring to inftigate the Spaniards that were left with him, againft Bartholomew and Diego; and fucceeded fo well, that the greateft part declared themfelves in his favour. He was hereupon choten their leader, and they took up arms againft the vice-governor. They feized upon the proviíons, and attempted to ftorm the fort which had been erected at St. Domingo. This attempt, however, was fortunately prevented, by the watchfulnefs of the officer left in charge of it; and the revolters found themfelves obliged to take poft in another part of the illand. Here they endeavoured to perfuade the natives to join them, and in this they fucceeded fo well, that in a fhort time the whole ifland prefented one common fene of revolt.

[ 162 ]

In this confufed and defperate fituation, did Columbusfind affairs at the place where he had promifed himfelf reft and refreflment. Think, children, what he muft have felt upon this occafion!

His diftrefs was ftill more increafed by the fhips not arriving, which he had fen: forwards from the Canaries, with provifions. It appeared very probable that they had fallen a facrifice to fome accident at fea.

This, it is true, was not the cafe; but to Columbus they were loft. Storms and currents had carried them out of their courfe, and after. having been continually driven about in an unknown fea, they at length arrived off the coaft of Hifpaniola; but unfortunately juit at the point where Roldan and his adherents had eftablifhed themfelves.

The politic rebel conccaled his revolt from the commanders of thefe veffels, and fucceeded in perfuading them to fend part of their crews on fhore, in order, as he faid, that they might be conducted to St. Domingo. Thefe people, who confifted chiefly of the fcum of the Spanifh prifons, no fooner heard of Roldan's plan, than they heartily joined in it, as they expected to get fomething by plunder. Such were the firt unhappy fruits of that thoughtlefs advice which Columbus himfelf had given.

[ $\left.\begin{array}{lll}\mathrm{I}_{3} & \end{array}\right]$

A few days after the arrival of the Admiral, thefe fhips made their appearance before St. Domingo; but brought the poor deferted man no comfort in his forlorn fituation : for they had already landed the greater part of their crews, and confumed moit of their provifions. The infolent Roldan too laughed at his weaknefs, and from his evident fuperiority of force fet him at defiance.

The greateft anger now agitated the breaft of Columbus; and had he liftened to his refentment, for which there was fo juit a caufe, he would, at the bead of thofe who fill remained faithful to him, have fallen upon the rebels, and have rifked his life in the attempt to punifh them, rather than furvive the indugation he felt at fuch conduct.

But, fortunately for the infant colony, Co lumbus had greatnefs of mind fufficient to govern his paftions, and to pay more regard to the welfare of others, than to the gratification of his own anger. Ile fhuddered at the thought of being obliged to commence a civil war, and therefore generoufly refolved not to notice the infults he had received; but, on the contrary, to endeavour, by perfuafive and gentle means, to recal Roldan and his mifled adherents to their duty.

[ 164 ]

To this end he immediately proclaimed, that every one who was forry for his behaviour, and would return to his duty, fhould be pardoned. Roldan himfelf was included in this offer of pardon, and even promifed to be reinftated in his office as heretofore. By means of this condefcenfion, after many unpleafant conferences, he at length accomplifhed his wifhes, and had the fatisfaction of feeing this dangerous revolt quelied, without a fingle drop of blood being fpilt.

Upon this he difpatched a fhip to Spain, with an account of the new difcoveries he had made, and of the rebellion which he had fubdued, together with famples of the produce of the new continent; confifting of pearls, pieces of gold, and a quantity of cotton cloth of various colours, and remarkably fine texture. He alfo fent his log book, which contained an account of his fhip's courfe, and minutes of every important occurrence.

Roldan and his afociates, on the other hand, did not fail to write alfo to the King by the fane fhip, with a view to defame the Admiral, and to juftify their own baie conduct. The King, alas! was weak enough to give more credit to them than to Columbus, though the latter fooke only in the voice of truth.

The former uttered nothing but the moft infamous calumnies.

But here, children, let us break the thread of our tale a few moments, in order to take a view of another quarter of the globe, where, whilft we have been engaged in the Weft Indies, events of the greateft importance have occurred.

The King of Portugal repented, but too late, that he had rejected the important offers which Columbus had made him. In order, however, in fome degree to compenfate for this lofs, he fpared no expence in endeavouring to difcover a paffage to India round Africa. With this view he fitted out a fquadron, and appointed for its commander Vafco de Gama, a failor of confiderable merit.

Difficulties, apparently infurmountable, oppofed this undertaking; but, fortunately, İama hatd that ftamp of a great man which our Columbus poffeffed; namely this-he never peimitted liinfelf to be diverted from any fixed line of conduct, by difficulties, however great they might be. It was, therefore, to no purpofe, that the unexplored coafts of Africa oppofed their rocks and fhoals; in vain did the fun dart his meridian rays, and threaten to confume his thips; in vain did ftorms and temperts rage, and affail his very indiffernt velfels.

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}{[66}\end{array}\right]$

veffels with expected deftruction. He met all thefe difficulties with an undaunted courage, and perfeveringly bore fail againft them, till at length he arrived fafe off the reinoteft point of Africa, the Cape of Good Hope. But to an afpiring and ardent mind like his, this was only a refting place. From thence he failed up the oppufite coaft of Africa, and at length arrived at Melinda, which, [as you may See here upon the map of Africa,] lies upon the coaft of Zanguebar.

He experienced here the utmoft fatisfaction from finding the natives by far more enlightened, and bearing a nearer refemblance in many refeects to the Afiatics, than thofe which he had hitherto feen upon the coafts of Africa. They carried on an extenfive trade with foreigners; they profeffed the Mahometan religion, and poffeffed many arts which are found only in civilized countries.

With great confidence in the accomplifhment of his undertaking, he fet fail from hence, and at laft had the good fortune to arrive on the 22d of May, r498, at the fummit of his wifhes, the coaft of India.

Fames. What place did he land at?
Fath. Calcutta.
Pet. Oh, what upon the Malabar coaft?

Fohn. On the peninfula on this fide the Ganges ?

Fath. You are right.
He was aftonifhed at the amazing riches of this count:y, in all linds of natural productions, as likewife at their cilized manners, and the regular form of their government. Unfortunately, however, he had nothing on board his fhips which he could exchange for the treafures they poffeffed, for thefe Maliw were not to be fatisfied with fuch baubles as the favages of America were fond of. He did not, therefore, make a long ftay, but haftened back to inform the King of the happy accomplifhment of his expedition.

Thus almof at the fame time that Columbus difcovered the new world, another country with which the Europeans held but little intercourfe, although they were, it is true, acquainted with it, was by means of navigation brought into much more intimate connection with them. From this time the inexhauftible 10 hes of India flowed in copious freams into the in ts country, Portugal: nor was it with a fruall degree of envy that the Spaniards belheld their neighbours amaffing fuch inmenfe wealth, whillt they themfelves had not gained froni all their difcoveries the money that had been expended upon them.
${ }^{\prime}$. he rage for making difcoveries now extended ittelf more and more. Kings and Republics, Noblemsn, and citizens, all wifhed to try their fortune. Every one fitted out hips, either to go upon adventures themfelves, or to fend others in their room. A perfon, by naine Ojeda, fcr inftance, who had been with Columbus on his fecond voyage, perfuaded fome Seville merchants to equip four fhips, and fend him out with them as commander, upon a voyage of difcovery. To this end they applie dfor permiffion, and obtained it without Columbus being at all confulted on the fubject, which was contrary to the agreement made with him by the Spanifh Court. The Bifhop of Badajos, who as minifter had the management of the Weft India affairs, and was the fworn enemy of Columbus, was not fatisined with doing this injury to the man he hated, hut gave Ojeda the log book whicl Columbris had fent home, with all his chorts, that they might ferve hom as guides in his intended expedition.

This Ojeda was accompanied by a certain Spanifh nobleman,* called Americus Vefpucius.

Some. Ho! Ho!
Fath. This perfon foon made limfelf of fo much confequence with his companions, that in a flort time his orders were more attended to than thofe of Ojeda himfelf. He kept however clofe to Columbus's tract, and at length arrived in fafety upon the coaft of Paria, went on fhore there feveral times, trafficked a little with the natives; then failed farther up the coaft, in order to convince himfelf that this was not an ifland, and when lie had proceeded fo far "t the could no longer doubt of its being a co it; he immediately fet fail with flyis ours for Spain again; where, upon his arrivi talked fo much about the difcoveries he pretended to have made, that people abfolutely forgot that they were not in fact difcoveries, but nothing more than confirmations of what had been already difcovered by Columbus.

[^9]a mort

[ 169 ]

A truly great man (take notice of this truth, children) is no boafter. He fatisfics himfelf with performing good deeds, unconcerned whether the world become acquainted with them or not. Such was the principle upon which Columbus had acted. He had depofited all his journals and charts in the hands of his employers, for their ufe. It never entered his head to publifh them to the world, by means of the prefs. Americus, on thie contrary, was no fooner returned to Spain than he took care to have his exploits refounded from one end of Europe to the other, Q and

IMAGE EVALUATION TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences
Corporation

[170]

and be well underftond how to drefs up his account in fuch a manner, that every one muft conclude that he, and not Columbus, was the difcoverer of the new continent. Few people in Europe knew that this was falfe. Thofe only who had an opportunity of reading the manufcript journals of Columbus, could be acquainted with the real ftate of the cafe; and all thefe, without exception, being his enemies, they took care the error fhould not be corrected. Thus was the man, to whom alone we are indebted for the difcovery of the New World, deprived of the well-earned honour of giving it his name. From this time it has been called America, from the vain and boafting Americus Vefpucius.

Cath. Fie! That is very ftupid indeed.
Fath. Certainly it is; but let us endeavour to profitby this perverfe circumftance. Hence learn how a man of merit ought to prepare to meet the injuftice of his contemporaries. Frequently is he wronged; he is always envied, and not feldom hated; and fometimes it is the worthlefs that bear away the rewards due to his virtue. Do you therefore wifh, as I hope you do, to become men who fhall one day perform fome deed of diftinguifhed merit ; depend not, I intreat you, upon the univerfal applaufe of the world; ftill lefs upon rewards from the great ones of the earth: on the contrary, fix your attention alone on the approbation of an omniprefent God, as your recompenfe, who is acquainted with every hidden deed, and will one day reward them openly; for the period of injuftice, in the fight of God, fhall not be of long duration; fooner or later fhall every difficulty be made clear, and each receive according to his works. And on this fubjeet the inftance before us may ferve as an example.

[ 17 ${ }^{7}$ ]

What the better was Americus for the New World ibeing unjuftly named after him, inftead of Columbus? Is he, on that account, honoted the more, or Columbus the lefs? Do we not, for this very reafon, defpife him the more? and fet a higher value on the merits of Columbus, in proportion as they were depreciated by his contemporaries? Judge from your own feelings, which fituation you would prefer.

Nic. I would, a thoufand times, rather be Columbus.

Fohn. So would I; even if my deeds had never been known.

All. So would I. So would I.
Fath. Thus you perceive that virtue, although for a time it fhould not meet with its reward, does not, on this account, ceafe to be lovely and defirable.

Q 2 Voyages

[ 172 ]

Voyages of difcovery now followed one upon another, a defcription of which you muit not expect from me, at prefent; as this would take off too muck of our time and attention from Columbus. One fhort digreffion more, and I will be with him again.

In order to avail himfelf of the paffage which Gania had difcovered to the Eaft Indiés, the King of Portugal fitted out a whole fleet, with all kinds of European articles, in order thereby to carry on an advantageous traffick with the natives. A perfon named Cabral was appointed to the command of the fleet. This man, knowing how dangerous the navigation of the coaft was, directed his courfe into the open fea, as foon as he had croffed the line. After having purfued this direction for fome time, he found himfelf, to his great furprize, upon the coaft of an extenfive country, which he foon difcovered to be more than an iflan? Which of you can guefs what country this w:

Some. [Speaking at the fame time] South America.

Fath. But what province of it?
Fames. Probably the Brazils.
Fath. Gueffed. It was the fine rich Brazils, which this Cabral now difcovered by mere accident. He immediately took poffeffion of it in the name of his King, and difpatched one of his fhips home with an account of it.

[173]

Thus were different parts of America by degrees difcovered; and it appeared more and more evident, that the fuppofition of Columbus from the firft had been well founded.

Now, then, let us return again to him, in whom all thefe difcoveries originated; and whom we have left in a fituation not the moft pleafant at Hifpaniola.

But words die upon my tongue in endea--ouring again to fpeak of him. I muft ftopIn the mean time prepare yourfelves to drop a fympathetic tear; for, indeed, it will be required of you.

$$
\left[\begin{array}{lll}
{[ } & 74
\end{array}\right]
$$

TALE XIV.

$\rightarrow+<$

THE little affembly being prepared, by the conclufion of the laft tale, for fome melancholly event, fat in anxious expectation. The Father, in a depreffed tone of voice, began as follows :-

Providence, my dear children, often permits events to take place, the true defign of which, we fhort-fighted mortals are not able to difcover : but every one who is in the leaft degree attentive, may, in a thoufand inftances, daily perceive that the Almighty wills the happinefs of his creatures. If then, at any time, the courfe of events fhould be fo ordered that we cannot readily perceive why it is fo, and no otherwife, Heaven forbid! that we fhould harbour for a monent, in our minds, a doubt whether the ways of providence, although not underitood by us, are the wifeft and the beft.

My dear children, I have lived many years; I have feen and experienced much; I have witneffed.

[ 175 ]

witneffed happy and unhappy days. Oft times has darknefs furrounded me; often has my heart been oppreffed, and a trembling, through fear, fhook my frame; when I looked forwards to futurity. Then have I thought in my ignorance, Good God! why doft thou caufe me to walk in this thorny path? Why are others, perhaps worfe than myfelf, permitted to enjoy fo much apparent happinefs, whilif my lot is to fuffer? Such were the queftions of my foolifh heart; but there was none to anfwer. The difficulty, however, was not left unexplained; for by perfeverance under misfortunes, with a firm reliance on the goodnefs of God, things, ere I was aware, fuddenly changed : the night of forrow vanifhed like a dream, and a bright fun of unexpected joy again rofe upon my drooping fpirits. O God! where fhall I find words fufficiently to exprefs thy goodnefs? -Hearken, my good children, and imprefs it ftrongly on your memories-Precifely on that circumftance which, in the time of my diftrefs, I confidered as my greateft misfortune; even on that circumftance a kind providence has founded my greateft happinefs. Then, faid I in my heart, let what will in future happen to me; let the path in which it may pleafe God that I fhould walk, be ever fo rough and perplexed; never, never again will I be difcontented. I will always always recollect, that the all-wife God knows better than I what is beft for me, and that, in the end, his benevolence will not fail to produce the greateft good. And, my dear children, may the tears of joy which always flow from my eyes, whenever I fpeak to you upun this fubject, convince you of the truth of what I fay; that from that time, when my mind acquired a firm dependance upon providence, have I always been able to make myfelf happy, whether in profperity or adverfity.

[ 176 ]

[Here the Father clasped his hands together, and inzwardly offered up a prayer to God, that this unalterable confidence in him, might poless the hearts of the children who now heard him, or might hereafter read what he faid. He then proceeded.]

I thought it neceffary, children, to preface this tale with what I have faid, in order to anticipate the queftion-Why God had vififed Columbus with fo fevere a fate? Where is the man rafh enough to give an anfwer to this queftion? Columbus himfelf probably can now tell. Without doubt he is now praifing God, that by fufferings here he was prepared for the enjoyment of happinefs hereafter. But we, who can view every event only with mortal eyes, will humble ourfelves, be ftill, and fubmit to the appointments of God.

Columbus,

[ 177 ]

Columbus, it is true, had quelled the revolt at Hifpaniola, but a lafting peace was not thus to be effected. Difcord and difcontent were ftill perceptible; and although Roldan, in appearance, was returned to his duty, he let llip no opportunity of flandering Columbus and his proceedings, at court. The authority of Columbus had alfo fuffered not a little by his lenity and forbearance, which were confidered as proofs of weaknefs. The confequence was a revolt, firft in this, then in that province; by means of which, the poor Admiral, continually harraffed as he was, had no time to think either about juftifying himfelf in Spain, or of the further profecution of his project. Both he and his brother were obliged to be almoft continually under arms, and thus daily anxiety and vexation, preyed like an eier-gnawing worm on the mind, already much debilitated, of a man whofe exhaufted body, and nearly broken fpirits, had the ftrongeft claim on retirement and reft. Such was his fituation at Hifpaniola. The fhafts of ill fate were directed at him, not only where he was, but froma quarter where he was not prefent. Whilft he was exhaufting the remainder of his ftrength, in re-eftablifhing peace and good order at Hifpaniola; whilft, notwithftanding conftant indifpofition, he was bringing to maturity the wifeft wifent regulations, and was opening feveral very confiderable mines, in order to gratify the avaricious expectations of his employers; the moft dreadful ftorm broke out againft him in Spain. Hear, children, how this came to pafs.

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}178\end{array}\right]$

Roldan and his adherents, as I have already told you, had done every thing in their power to throw all kind of blame from themfelves, and fix it on Columbus. At the fame time, there were many difappointed perfons, who inftead of ımaking their fortunes, had lott their all, and returned to their native country overwhelmed with defpair. Thefe people all viewed Columbos as the author of their difappointments; and of courfe, inveighed violently againft him throughout all Spain. Encouraged by his enemies in power, they affailed the King and Queen with petitions that their loffes might be repaired, and with c mplaints of pretended injuries and injuftice received from the Admirat. Their ragged half-ftarved appearance infpired many with compaffion, and gave plaufibility to their complaints. Every time their Majefties appeared in public, they were furrounded by a croud of thefe people, who were inftigated by the Admiral's enemies, continually crying for mercy upon themfelves, and vengeance upon Columbus.

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}179\end{array}\right]$

It was therefore no wonder that a King, naturally inclined to fufpicion, fhould at length give way to their complaints; no wonder that the Queen, who had hitherto been the fteadfaft friend of Columbus, fhould at length alfo be prejudiced againft him.

It was therefore determined to fend a commiffary to the Weft Indies, to examine into the conduct of Columbus. Francifco de Bovadilla was the perfon whom the Admiral's enemies propofed for this bufinefs, and the powers with which he was entrufted enabled him, not only to recal Columbus, but were fo frained as to awaken in the mind of this unprincipled man a wifh to do fo; for he was commiffioned to depofe this great man, in cafe he fhould find his proceedings improper, and then to become Governor of the Ifland himfelf. Nothing more, furely, was neceffary to fecure the fall of our blamelefs hero!

Juft at the time that this meffenger of miffortune arrived at Hifpaniola, Columbus, by dint of indefatigable efforts, had fucceeded in reftoring peace and good order in every province of the ifland. The malcontents had been fatisfied; both Spaniards and Indians were again brought to a fenfe of their duty, and fubmiffion to the laws; the richeft mines had been opened, and the happieft beginning had been made made in the cultivation of the land. All thefe circumitances muft have proved his complete vindication, had not his fentence been already pronounced.

[ 180 ]

When Bovadilla arrived at St. Doningo, the Admiral was in a diftant part of the ifland, making fome neceffary regulations. Juftice and equity therefore demanded, that his judge fhould at ledft await his return. But what cared fuch a man as Bovadilla about juitice and equity?-He came not to hear the defence of Columbus, but to condemn him, and put himfelf in his place.

As foon, therefore, as he came on Thore, he defired to be conducted to the Admiral's houfe, which he declared from that time to be his own; and took poffeffion of every thing therein. Upon this he openly afferted, that the King had fent him thither to depofe the Governor, and to adminifter jintice to all who had any complaints to make againft him. Not content with this, he immediately releafed all thofe whom Columbus had confined, and invited them to clain fatisfaction for falfe imprifonment; and you may judge whether thefe creatures would want much perfuafion fo to do.

All this was extremely cruel and unjuft. It was, however, nothing in comparifon with the fhameful infults which this unjuft judge now offered perfonally to the oppreffed difcoverer of the New World. Hear, children, and lament the fate of the man who had every claim upon the love and gratitude of his contemporaties, now going to be treated- $O$. hameful ingratitude-like the vileft culprit!

[ 88: ]

The infamous Bovadilla fent an exprefs to him, commanding him to appear immediately at the bar of his tribunal, to give an account of his conduct. At the fame time he fent him a written order from the King, in which he was directed to do whatever this man fhould require.

A fudden thunderbolt in the cleareft weather, could not be more dreadful to the fecure traveller, than was this unexpected news to Columbus. He could not believe his own eyes. He again perufed the unfortunate paper, ftained with this outrage-bust it was even fo. The man of unequalled merit, the difcoverer of a new world, ignorant of a fingle crime he had committed, muft then really appear at the bar of a wretch, who was not worthy to wipe the duft from his feet. Columbus grated his teeth with rage at thefe heart-piercing injuries.

He did not, however, hefitate a moment upon the conduct he had to purfue. He was in poffeftion of a well-armed force; and his K brother brother Bartholomew was with him. It would have been eafy, therefore, to have anfwered his iniquitous judge fivord in hand. But his great foul difdained every kind of defence inconfiftent with the fubmiffion he owed to his fuperiors; even fhould they permit unexampled injuftice to be exercifed againft him. As I have already obferved, therefore, he did not hefitate to fet off immediately towards Domingo, there with fubmiffion to receive his fentence, whatever it might be.

[ 182 ]

He at length arrived, and was announced to Bovadilla. "Put him in chains" ( cried the monfter, without permitting him to appear in his prefence) " and drag him away." The inhuman command was obeyed. He was put in chains, and taken as a prifoner on board one of the fhips.
[ Here the Father paufed, in order to. give vent to the feelings of his young hearers, which were difcovered by the big drops that fell from their eyes. After a fort paufe he again proceeded.]

Figure to yourfelves, children, this vile treatment in all its abominable colours. There ftands the great Columbus, as a criminal, upon the land he himfelf had difcovered, before his own houfe, amidft people who were all his fubjects; the infolent defpoiler of his property and

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}183\end{array}\right]$

and his honour forbidding hin to enter; not even permitting him to approach his prefence, but ordering his limbs (though he had comnitted no offence) to be riveted in fetters, and in this difgraceful manner to be dragged out of a country, the poffeffion of which he had acquired for his King by a thoufand difficulties, and at the rifk of his life.
'There he ftands, and receives the laft hard ftroke of his ill fate with confcious greatnefs, and with a degree of fubmiffivenefs, which difplayed his innocence and noblenefs of mind with greater force than the moft eloquent pleading could do. They now led him away; but the cup of his fufferings was not yet full. His patience muft be put to a ftill feverer trial. The fenfelefs mob of Spaniards, who, we know, confifted chiefly of criminals, ran after him treating him with every mark of contempt, and laughing at his misfortunes. Oh what monfters! What barbarity!

Still Bovadilla's cruelty was not fatisfied. He well knew that the fufferings of his brave prifoner would not be complete, whilft he was the only one of his family who was perfecuted, and efpecially whilit his brother, Bartholomew, was yet at liberty. He therefore, and Diego, muft alfo be taken into cuftody; and, in order that one might not afford comfort to the other R 2 by

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}18+\end{array}\right]$

by his prefence, he commanded them to be confined on board feparate veffels. He then ordered the trial of the three brothers, and without further ceremony, condemned them all to die. But, fortunately, he had not fufficient courage to carry this murderous fentence into execution, fince he feared to be called to account for it. He was, however, in hopes that his coufin, the Bifhop of Badajos, an inveterate enemy of Columbus, would take care that he fhould not, on this account, efcape; he therefore determined to fend the prifoners, with a written account of the trial they had undergone, to Spain.

And now, children, tell me, if it be poffible to imagine a greater monfter thàn this Bovadilla. Happy will you be if, through the whole courfe of your lives, it fhould appear as imp? ${ }^{\text {mble }}$ as it does now.

But, thanks to God, human monfters of this kind are but feldom to be met with, and even where they are found, an honeft man is generally placed by his fide, in order, as much as poffible to make the mifchief good again.

Scarcely had the captain, who was to conduct Columbus and his brothers to Spain, got under fail, when he offered, in the moit compaflionate and refpectful manner, to releafe him from his chains. Columbus however, refufed refufed his kind ، "er. "Leave me as I am," he anfwered, "I carry thefe chains in obedience to my fuperiors. They alone can releafe me, and I wifh them to find me, as heretofore, obedient to their commands." He remained, therefore, in chains, until his arrival in Spain.

$$
\text { [ } 185]
$$

Bovadilla had ordered, that the prifoners fhould be given over to the Bifhop of Badajos, immediately upon their arrival; in order that they might not have an opportunity to avail themfelves of the compaffion of their former protectrefs, Queen Ifabella. But an honeft pilot, called Martin, who took the undeferved fufferings of the Admiral much to heart, contrived to get on fhore fecretly, and conveyed a letter to the Queen written by Columbus, containing an account of every thing that had happened.

The court was greatly furprized at this, for they had not forefeen that Bovadilla would have fo much abufed the power entrufted to him. They acknowledged the unworthy treatment of this meritorious man, and anticipated how much all Europe would condemn conduct fo ungrateful. An exprefs, therefore, was immediately difpatched with orders for the releafe of Columbus and his brothers.

Columbus.

[ 186 ]

Columbus was invited, in the moft refpectfut inanner, to appear immediately at court ; and money was fent him to purchafe the things that were neceffary for that purpofe.

When he entered the audience chamber of their Majefties, he threw himfelf filently at their feet. The injuries he had received fo piereed his heart, that it was fome time before he could utter a word. At length, fupported by a confcioufnefs of his innocence, he roufed himfelf, and began to make his defence againft the wicked calumnies of his opponents. With a firm tone of voice, he pronounced a fpeech of confiderable length, in which he fo clearly eftablifhed his innocence, that their Majefties. could no longer entertain the leaft doubt refpecting it. They expreffed their forrow for what had happened, and affured him that it had been done without their knowledge. In order to give this affurance the greater air of plaufibility, they immediately depofed Bovadilla, and endeavoured, by careffes, and promifes of future protection, to fatisfy Columbus.

Thus far every thing was well; but when it became the queftion who fhould fucceed Bovadilla, as governor of the newly difcovered territories, it was but too apparent that the fufpicions. their Majefties had imbibed of Columbus were not entirely rooted out. They were willing to.

[ 187 ]

avoid cven the appearance of ingratitude ; they wifhed to exculpate themfelves from ail grounds: for the charge of injuftice, by publicly cenfuring the proceedings of Bovadilla; but they hefitated to reinftate Columbus in his former honours. They thought it dangerous to place a man, to whom they owed fo much, and had: rewarded fo little, in a fituation that would enable him to be revenged upon them. Under various pretexts, therefore, they detained him at Court, and in lieu of him appointed Nicolas d'Ovando, governor of the Weft Indies.

This again was a deep wound in the heart of Columbus, which was ftill bleeding with repeated injuries. He felt, on this occafion, the utinoft anger, and did not áttempt to conceal it; but, on the contrary took. with him, wherever he went, the chains with which he had been fettered, as an evidence of the great ingratitude that had rewarded his fervices. They hung conftantly before his eyes, and he gave orders, that after his death they fhould be interred in the fame grave with himfelf.-And now, I think, enough forto-night.

All. Poor Columbus!

$$
\left[\begin{array}{lll}
{[ } & 188 & 7
\end{array}\right.
$$

TALE XV.

Matt. WV ILL Columbus never go to the Weft Indies again?

Fath. We fhall know that at the proper time. It does not at prefent appear as though he would : a deaf ear is turned to his complaints, and Ovando is preparing for his departure.

The fleet with which the new governor was to be intrufted, was the largeft that had yet been fent to the New World. It confifted of thirty-two chips, and had 2500 people on board; of whom the greater part were to eftablifh themfelves at Hifpaniola.

With this confiderable force Ovando fet fail. Columbus was obliged to remain, at home, a prey to grief and difappointment; and to fubmit to the mortification of feeing another fent to reap the fruits of what he himfelf, in the midft of fuch inexpreffible difficulties, had fown. To find himfelf thus interrupted in his honourable

189 ]

honourable career, thus deprived of power to carry his great plan of difcoveries to maturity! What he felt on this occafion I need not defcribe to you.

The arrival of Ovando at Hifpaniola was moft feafonable. Had it been delayed but a fhort time longer, the colony, by means of Bovadilla's weak and foolin management of affairs, would, in all probability, have been entirely ruined. This worthlefs man endeavoured to confirm himfelf in the power he had fo unjuftly affumed, by the moft mean and defpicable conduct towards the loweft clafs of his fubjects. With this view he refcinded all the wife regulations which Columbus had eftablifhed, and permitted every one to live in as unreftrained and loofe a manner as he chofe. His predeceffor had uniformly endeavoured to protect the poor Indians from the oppreffion of the Spaniards; he, on the other hand, permitted every outrage to be practifed upon them without controul. He caufed them to be numbered, and then divided them as flaves amongft his avaricious adherents, who compelled thefe poor creatures, in a manner the moft rigourous and cruel, to work for them in the mines. The hardnefs of the labour, added to the feverity of their mafters, and their own natural debility, deftroyed great numbers of them; them; fo that in a fhort time, this unfortunate people would have become extinct.

[ 190 ]

The firft thing Ovando did was to depofe Bovadilla, and to fend him, in company with Roldan, to Spain, there to give an account of themfelvès; then, by command of the King, he abolithed flavery, declared all the Indians free, and forbad every one to offer them the leaft violence. He checked the licentious conduct of the Spaniards, by making feveral new laws, and permitted them to continue to get gold upon the condition that one half fhould go to the King, as lord of the ifland.

John. He was a good governor, however.
Fath. We will hope that he may always behave fo well. What he now did was by order of the King. It remains to fee in what manner he will' act in fuch affairs as were left to his own judgment.

But it is time to return again to our Columbus. Yet what can I tell you of him, that will not awaken compafion and grief in your bofoms? Bending under a weight of diftrefs, fee how he vifits, time after time, the ungrateful court that fill continues deaf to his complaints! Hear, how he afks, not for mercy, but for juftice, and with the agreement figned by the King in his hand, urges the fulfilment of the promife it contained-the promife that he, and no other, fhould be Viceroy of the territories he fhould difcover! Behold his worthlefs opponents treating him with every mark of difdain, and fcarcely able to refrain from laughing in his face at the fruitlef's reprefentations he is making, and imagine what muft be the feclings of the man thus ufed; at the fame time that he was confcious his fervices merited the higheft reward.

[ 19: ]

Fohn. I know what I would have done.
Fath. What would you have done, my dear John?

Fohn. I would not have faid another word about it.

Fath. And what then?
Fohn. Then I would have retired, and have enjoyed the remainder of my life in peace; or I would have offered my fervices to fome other court.

Fath. Refpecting the latter, Columbus had already experienced that other courts. were not much better than this. Probably this brave man thought, that though his fuperiors had not kept their promife, yet it was no reafon why he fhould break his, by leaving a country in whofe fervices he had engaged himfelf. And as to fpending the remainder of his life in indolence, and giving up all further defign of making more difcoveries-this was impoffible.

[ 192 ]

He was convinced, that upon his laft royage he had difcovered the coaft of another continent. His former erroncous opinion, that this land was part of India, was, by feveral obfervations which he had made, if not entirely done away, at leaft made to waver. He now fuppofed that there might be a great ocean between this continent and the Wert Indies-and which of you can tell me whether this fuppofition was well founded or not?

All. O, certainly. The great Pacific Ocean.

- Fatk. Only fee how much more we now know of the globe, than formerly the wifeft heads could difcover. 'That which Columbus could but barely fuppofe, a child now can; with the greateft certainty, affirm. Thus you fee how much we are indebted to this man, without whofe aid one half of the globe would probably have remained fome centuries longer unexplored.

It was not without reafon, that Columbus further fuppofed, that near the Ifthmus of Da-rien-do you know where I mean?

Fames. Juft as though we fhould not know that-Between North and South America.

Fath. Exactly fo. He fuppofed, therefore, I fay, that near this place the land was probably feparated by a ftrait, through which one might fail into the unknown ocean, and acrof that to India.

[ $x 93$ ]

Nic. But that is not true.
Fath. Not trie?
Nic. Why, no. Here [Pointing upon the $m a p]$ is North America; there is South America, which are joined together by the Ifthmus of Darien; and that is no where divided.

Fath. You are right, Nicholas. But you perceive that the land here is, however, very natrow ; and confequently that Columbus, althongh not quite, was almoft right in his conjecture.

Now it appeared to him to be a fubject of the greatef importance, to examine whether there were fuch a paffage or not; for if fuch a paffage could really be found, how much more direct would the courfe be, than to fail from Spain, ftraight through America to the Eaft Indies, than round Africa, as difcovered by the Portugnefe. Great therefore, as was the infult he had received from his King, greater ftill was his wifh to benefit mankind, by the future difcoveries he might make. Hence he formed the maguanimous determination to forget every inftance of injuftice, and again expofe His hoary head to all the dangers and hardfhips of another voyage of difcovery.

He communicated his determination to the court, which greatly rejoiced at an opportunity of getting rid of him; for the prefence of a man fo deferving, and at the fame time fo grofly ill-ufed and infulted, was a daily, reproach to the King and Queen, from which they were glad to be freed. With the greateft pleafure, therefore, they accepted his offer to remove fo painful an object from them. They had reafon alfo to promife themfelves an advantageous refult from the fuccefs of this new undertaking. Orders were immediately given to fit out a fquadron for the purpofe.

[ 194 ]

But what a fquadron! Four miferable little floops, the largeft of which was not half the fize of a common merchantiman, conftituted the whole force committed to his care, for the exccution of fo great and hazardous an enterprize. With thefe he was to explore an unknown ocean! With thefe he was to difcover a paffage through which the treafures of the In dies were to be conveyed! How finall the means of accomplifhing fo great an end!

Any one elfe would have fhrunk back from the apparent inpoffibility of executing fo vaft a defign, in veffels fo miferable; but Columbus recollected his firft voyage, and did not hefitaic again to truft his life on board fhips, as bac :is thofe with which he firft croffed the wide ocean, that ien rates Europe from America. He went on hoard, therefore, in good fpirits, attended by his brother Bartholomew; and his fecond fon Ferdinand, then thirteen years old, who afterwards became his biftorian.

[ $\mathrm{r}_{95}$ ]

It was on the twenty-ninth of June, in the year 1502, ten years after his firt voyage, that he fet fail from Cadiz, and as before, Atereci- for the Cauary iflands. This voyage was in every refpect fortunate, excepting that one of his thips, the largef amoing them, was found to be fo flow a failer, that it was with difficulty the could be kept in company with the others. He therefore directed his courfe firtt for Hifpaniola, in order to change this ufelefs fhip for another.

When he was arrived off this illand, he fent a meffenger to the Governor, Ovando, to infore him of the purport of his coming there; and requefted permiffion to enter the harbour; but the governor - could you believe it, children? had the audacity to refufe him. Upon this Columbus informed him, that, from the obfervations he had frequently made, he had every reafon to expect a violent hurricane; he therefore only requefted permiffion to remain in the port during the ftorm, and as the governor was at that time going to difpatch a confiderable fleet to Spain, Columbus advifed him to defer it's departure for a few days. But it was all in vain! His requeft was rejected, his advice defpifed, and his precantion laughed at, as the dream of a weather-wife prophet. He was forlidden to enter the port, and the fleet deftined for Spain fet fail.

[ 196 ]

Thus was the man, to whom they were indebted for the poffeffion of the Weft Indies, prohibited from approaching an ifland, which with fo many difficulties, and at the rifk of his life, he had difcovered. Thus were his life and fafety, fo valuable at prefent on account of the enterprife committed to him, deprived of that protection which humanity would have offered to any ftranger. Another hard-dealt blow of ill-fate on Columbus, whofe heart was already fo much torn by misfortune.

But heaven, in a fingular manner, revenged the affront now offered him. The hurricane which he had forefeen, really commenced. He had prepared himfelf for it, and by that means faved his ihips. On the contrary, the richly laden fleet deftined for Spain, which confifted of eighteen Thips, all became a prey to the waves, except three; Roldan and Bovadilla, who were on board together, with the whole of what they had amaffed at Hifpaniola, here met with the reward due to their treatment of Co lumbus. They were fwallowed up together in the fea. It was a circumftance in a high degree remarkable, that the fhip which contained the property of Columbus, and was chofen for that purpofe becaufe it was the worft, fhould be one of thofe that were faved. This fhip alone proceeded on its voyage; the other two were obliged to return to Saint Domingo to refit.

[ 197 ]

Moth. Behold again, children, the finger of an overruling providence, which even here upon earth, in general, rewards every one according to his deferts.

Fath. Take notice of this circumftance, children, and fee if, in the courfe of your own experience, you cannot difcover what I have often pointed out to you, namely, " whenever I had reafon to be fatisfied with myfelf, that my affairs generally went on finoothly; nor can I recollect having, at fuch times, met with any confiderable difappointment: whenever, on the contrary, I had performed any action which my confcience could not juftify, then nothing was right with me; I could at that time always forebode with certainty fome ill befalling me;" this is the refult of long experience, and do you take notice, children, if at the end of twenty or thirty years, it will not be the fame with you; and then, if I hould no longer be amongft you, to remind you of your duties, O do not forget to return the molt cordial thanks to God, that, by means of me he made known his ways unto you, before you were capable of examining them yourfelves.

[ 198 ]

This fingular occurrence had quite a contrary effect, on the minds of the fuperfitious people of thofe days. Inftead of adoring the hand of divine juftice, by which all human events are directed, they fell into the abfurd notion, that Columbus was a conjurer (yout know, I fuppofe, what fuperftitious people mean by this word) ; and thonght, that by the aid of powerful fpirits, who were at his command, he had raifed this ftorm in order to be revenged upon his enemies; for, faid they, if this had not been the cafe, why fhould exactly that fip have been faved which had his property on board?

Columbus left with juft indignation an ifland, which had refufed its difcoverer protection from the moft dreadful ftorm; and failed with his damaged veffels towards the weftern continent.

This voyage was alfo attended with many difficulties and dangers. At length, however, he arrived in fafety at an illand called Guangjo, which does not lie far from the coaft of that part of the continent, which is called Honduras; look, children [pointing to the map] here is the coaft, and there is the ifland.

As foon as they had caft anchor, the Admiral fent his brother Bartholomew, with fereral of his people on thore; in order to examine the country, but approaching the ftrand, they fell in with a canoe which difcovered a great deal more art in its formation than any they had yet feen. It was of confiderable length, eight feet wide, and in the middle had a roof made of palm leaves, fo that it refembled one of the gondolas, in which we fometimes fail upon the Alfter*.

Under this roof were the wives and children of the Indians, and befides thefe were twentyfive perfons on board.

They endeavoured to bring them to, and although they were armed, they readily furrendered as prifoners. The Spaniards now examined their cargo, and found it to confift of mattreffes, a kind of cotton fhirts without fleeves, and fome other apparel, befides large handkerchiefs which ferved the women for cloaks; they found alfo fome large wooden fwords, edged on both fides with flint, which was faftened in with thread and rofin, as well as fome copper axes, and other implements of the fame metal. Their provifions were nearly the fame as at Hifpaniola, excepting a beverage which was made from boiled maize, much refembling beer, and a finall ftock of cocoa beans, which they appeared to value above every thing elfe. Thefe were the firlt of the kind that had been feen by Europeans.

* A river which fpreads itfelf into a confiderable bafon within the ramparts of Hambro', upon which parties of pleafure are frequently made. T.

But I muft not omit mentioning one thing, which appeared remarkable in thefe Indians, as I know it will pleafe you; I mean their great modefty and care in covering thofe parts of the body, which decency among us always requires to be covered.

The Admiral was much pleafed with having thefe good creatures in his power, as he hoped to derive various information from them. He caufed them to be treated with great kindnefs, and took their American goods in return for European articles; and after having made all the enquiries he wifhed, returned them their canoe, and permitted them to go in peace. But an old man, who appeared the moft intelligent among them, be detained with him fome time on board; this, however, was done by his own confent, and with a view of getting from him ftill further information, and that he might ferve as an interpreter in their dealings with other Indians.

Columbus learned from this old man, that there was a very extenfive country to the Weft, which contained gold in abundance. By the figns and geftures which he made, it was eafy to be underftood, that the inhabitants of this country wore golden crowns upon their heads, and large gold rings upon their arms and legs; that they adorned their tables and chairs with it; and, upon Thewing him corals and fpiccs, he affured them that thefe were alfo found there in great quantities. This country, however, was no other than Mexico. But great as was the thirt of Columbus's companions after thefe treafures, yet ftill ftronger was his wih to accomplifh the great defign of his voyage, the difcovery of the paffage from which he apprehended he could not now be far diftant. Without hefitation, therefore, he rejected the ineftimable treafures which were here offered him, and, regardlefs of the murmurs of his people, purfued his courfe to the eaftward.

[ 201 ]

Moth. Herein does he again prove himfelf to be a truly great and upright man. Notwith. ftanding the opportunity which offered of enriching himfelf, ftill to purfue the path of duty, willing to ferve the world rather than himfelf, and to bear the ill-will of others, rather than neglect what he had undertaken.- $O$, children! may you, in fimilar fituations, ever act with fuch difinterefted virtue.

Fath. So.they will, my dear; I am certain they will. I myfelf dare anfwer for it. If I could could not affure myfelf of this, $O$, I would pray to God rather to clofe our eyes for ever, than they_fhould be witnefs to the firft difhonourable action that either of them fhould commit. But tell me, children, you will never indulge yourfelves in fuch conduct. Would you not rather be poor and defpifed, than unfaithful to your duty? And whenever felfifhnefs tempts you to meannefs of conduct, call to mind how your father had warned you againft it-remember that he knew what was good for man, both here and hereafter; and that his advice originated in the beft of motives. Children, you will, I truft, ever be led to make fuch reflections as thefe; and in all: you do, act uprightly and honourably.

[ 202 ]

[ The children threw themfelves upon: his: neck, and thus ended the tale.]

$[2031$

TALE XVI.

Fath Columbus purfued his plan, and failed from the coaft of Honduras eaftward, in fearch of the paffage which the Indians affured him he would fall in with in that direction.

Fohn. Then they told him an untruth.
Fath. By no means; the cafe was, they did not underftand each other. Columbus defcribed a ftrait, but they underftood him to mean an ifthmus; and in this refpect they avere right in directing him towards Darien.

Upon this voyage towards the Eaft, they obferved the natives to be very different in their manners, from thofe they had latel.y left. They were apparently more favage; they were entirely naked; they ate raw flefh and fifh, without the leaft preparation; and had ftretched their ears fo much, by the quantity of ornaments hung upon them, that they reached to the fhoulderi. They had burnt in their bodies bodies the figures of ftags, lions, and other animals. Thofe of moft confequence among them, were diftinguifhed by red and white cotton caps. Some of them had their faces painted black, fome red, and others ftriped of various colours; others again only painted their lips, their noftrils, and their eyes.

[ 204 ]

The holes in their ears were fo large, tbat a hen's egg would readily pafs through them. Columbus, on this account, called that part of the coaft, De las Orejas, (the Ear-coaft).

From hence he proceeded on his voyage, without, however, making much progrefs; for he had continually to combat with contrary winds and currents. He at length arrived at a cape, from which the land inclined fouthward, fo that the wind, which had hitherto been againft him, now drove him up the coaft; hence did this pious man, who never omitted to afcribe the happy events he experienced, to the fource of all good alone, give to this Cape the name of Gacias a Dios, or, Thanks to God. Look here, upon our map; there it is..

A few days afterwards, as they were coming to anchor upon another part of this coaft, they found themfelves furrounded by a number: of armed canoes, who feemed difpofed to difpute their landing. But fcarcely were they convinced of the pacific difpofition of the Spaniards, niards, than they approached them with the utmoft confidence, and offered to barter whatever they had with them. Thefe articles confifted chiefly of arms; namely fhields, fpears of black hard wood, pointed with bones of firh, and clubs; as alfo cotton jerkins, and finall pieces of very pale coloured gold, which they wore about their necks. The Admiral prefented them with a variety of European toys, without taking any thing in return. At this conduct they appeared difpleafed; and finding the Spaniards averfe to landing, notwithftanding their repeated invitations, they concluded that fomething had occurred which gave them offence. This they fought to do away.

[ 205 ]

For this purpofe they fent an old man of venerable appearance, attended by two young girls, who wore pieces of gold about their necks, as ainbaffadors to the Spaniards. The old man held a flag in his hand, which no doubt was a token of peace, and requefted to be introduced to the Admiral, who received them with that affability, fo natural to him. He feafted, clothed, and fent them on hore again, highly delighted with the treatment they had received.

The next day Columbus's brother went on floore, where he found all the things which had: been given them placed in a heap; probably becaufe the delicacy of thefe Indians would not fuffer them to receive a prefent, without making one in return. Upon his arrival, two of the principal of, them approaching him, took hold of him by the arms, and invited him to fit down with them on the grafs. Bartholomew did as they wifhed, and afterwards, by the afliftance of an Indian interpreter, afked them feveral queftions, the anfwers to which he ordered his fecretary to write down.

$[206]$

But fcarcely had they perceived the pen, ink, and paper, when they fuddenly rofe, and ran away in the greatert alarm, attended by all the natives who were prefent. Thefe poor fuperfitious creatures thought the fecretary was a conjuror, and the pen, ink, and paper inftruments of the magic art. By means of thefe, fome ill, they fuppofed, was to be broughi upon them. It was with difficulty that they were diffuaded from this laughable fufpicion, nor did they venture to approach this conjuring fecretary, until, according to their notions, they had fecured themfelves againft his power. This they did in the following manner: they threw a powder or duft towards the Spaniards, caufing a kind of finoke, which they took great pains to blow at him, as they believed that it poffeffed the yirtue of counteracting all the powers of magic. What poor fupertitious creatures!

[ 207 ]

After this, Bartholomew went with them to their town. The moft remarkable thing he faw there was a large wooden building, which ferved them for a burial place. He found therein feveral dead bodies, fwathed with cotton cloth, fome of which were embalmed. Over each grave there was a board, upon which were feen either various figures of beafts, or a reprefentation of the deceafed perfon, with different kinds of ornaments about it.

The Admiral having, on the following day, detained fome of the natives on board, in order to gain from them what information he could, thofe on fhore took it for granted that they were kept from motives of avarice, in order that they might be redeemed at a high price. They fent, therefore, meffengers to him with two wild boars, as a ranfom for them. The Admiral endeqvoured to make the meffengers underftand that their countrymen were not prifoners, but that on the contrary they fhould foon be fent on fhore again, and that of courfe a ranfom was unneceffary. He purchafed the wild boars, and they returned well fatisfied.

The boars were brought upon deck, where was alfo a wild grey coloured cat, about the fize of a finall dog, which a failor had caught, after having cut off one of its paws.: This animal is as light and active as a fquirrel, jumps like him from tree to tree, and fometimes hangs itfelf, either for reft or pleafure, by its tail on a bough. Scarcely had the wild cat perceived the boars, when it endeavoured with all its might to efcape from them. One of them, however, being brought near to it, this creature immediately twifted its tail round the fwine's fnout, and fixed itfelf in fuch a manner on its face, that it muft inevitably have killed him, had not the failors interfered. It is faid, that in Spain the wolves adopt the fame mode with any animal they wilh to deftroy.

[ 208 ]

After having again proceeded on his voyage a few days, the Admiral came to anchor at the mouth of a river, and fent a boat on fhore. But a great number of armed natives oppofed their landing. More than a hundred of them jumped up to their middles into the water, brandifhed their lances, blew horns, beat a kind of drum, fplafhed them with fea water, and, as the greateft mark of their indignation, fpit chewed herbs at thein. The Spaniards had orders to avoid hoftilities; as then they made no attempt to refent fuch treatment, but remained at a diftance quiet fpectators of this warlike fcenc; their challengers, at length, became tired of their fruitlefs rage, and inftead of coming to action, a barter was commenced between the parties, in which the Spaniards obtained fixteen plates of gold, worth one hundred and fifty ducats, in exchange for a fow bells.

[ 209 ]

O that men would always conduct themfelves like thefe Spaniards; how much mifchief and forrow would be avoided; efpecially at times when they have to deal with unreafonable people! Suppofing, however, that our patience and forbearance fhould be fometimes abufed, and fail in accomplifhing their end; then, if nothing elfe will do, it certainly is allowable to oppofe force to infults and injuries. Care, however muft be taken, that felf-defence be confined to cafes of abfolute neceffity, and do not lofe itfelf in anger and revenge. In this refpect, alfo, Columbus has not left us without an example.

On the following day the Indians appeared to have miltaken the object of the peaceable difpofition of the Spaniards. They attributed it to cowardice, and carried their infolence fo far as again to oppofe their landing; the Spaniards, therefore, now found themfelves compelled to take proper meafures to convince them, that they wanted neither power nor refolution

[ 210 ]

refolution to encounter them. The Admiral ordered a cannon to be fired, and one of the Indians happening to receive a wound, all of them immediately took flight, and the Spaniards contented themfelves with merely going on fhore, without any further purfuit.

On the contrary they endeavoured, by geftures, to perfuade them to return. This invitation was accepted, as they were now convinced thefe prudent ftrangers had no wifh to injure them, however it might be in their power. They, of courfe, laid down their arms, returned, and peaceably exchanged their pieces of gold.

The Admiral having fufficiently explored the nature of this diftrict, its inhabitants, and productions, he again proceeded along the coaft, ftill in hopes of foon difcovering the expected ftrait. Upon this voyage he at length arrived in a bay, which afforded a fafe and extenfive harbour. On the borders of this bay the natives had erected a confiderable town, which appeared to be furrounded by large diftricts of cultivated land. Columbus, on account of the beauty of this place, named it Porto Bello*. Look at the map; there it lies.

The natives here difcovered a peaceable difpofition, and brought fome very fine cotton yarn, with all kinds of provifions, which they were willing to exchange for nails, needles, bells, and fimilar articles.

[^10]
[ 211 ]

From hence Columbus failed eight leagues farther towards the place where the town, Nombre de Dios, is fituated; which you may find upon the map. He was obliged to remain here a few days, on account of the tempertuous weather; and employed this time in repairing his fhips, which were a good deal damaged. He then got under fail, but ftrefs of weather again obliged him to put into a finall port, which he named Protection.

The natives of this place, alfo, appeared at firft of a friendly difpofition; but the infolent behaviour of fome of the failors excited them to acts of violence. Depending upon their numbers, which every moment increafed, they prepared for a general attack, in which they threatened to board the veffels.

The Admiral tried firf perfuafion, then threats, to divert them from their purpofe; however finding both fruitlefs, he fired a cannon, in expectation that its thunder alone would difmay them. But in this he was miftaken; for perceiving that this thunder was not attended with any ill effects, they only became the more daring, and anfwered the noife with loud fhouts, ftruck the trees with their fwords, and fhewed

[ 212 ]

Thewed every mark of difdain at the harmlefs explofion.

The Admiral was obliged, therefore, to give them dreadful proof that this inftrument was not quite fo harmlefs as they fuppofed. He ordered one of his largeft cannon to be fullcharged and pointed at an eminence, where many of the natives had affembled. It was fired off, and the ball went through the midft of this crowd. They then difcovered, to their great alarm, that this thunder could deftroy, and flew into the woods in the greateft confufion.

Thefe people were the handfomeft of any they had yet feen. They were flender, very well made, and not large bellied, like the other neighbouring tribes. In the harbour they faw a great number of alligators, which always fleep on fhore. Thefe animals emitted fo ftrong a finell of muk, that the whole air was filled with it; and though they always appeared fhy, yet they have been known to attack a man when endeavouring to take them.

Columbus now began to give up all hopes of difcovering a paffage from the Atlantic, inmediately into the Pacific Ocean. And having again to combat with the moft tempeftuous weather, he refolved to return, and fail towards a part of the country called Veragua, where;
according

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}213\end{array}\right]$

according to the affurances of the Indians, the richeft gold mines were to be found. This place is alfo pointed out upon our map.

The moft violent ftorm, combined with a fcarcity of provifions, caufed this thort voyage to be attended with many dangers and difficulties. The whole remainder of their ftock of provifions, after having been eight months at fea, confifted only of a fmall quantity of fea bifcuits, which were becone fo damaged by the alternate heat and damps of this climate, that one of us would rather have fafted a whole day, than haye eaten any of it. Indeed it was fo full of maggots, that it appeared to be quite alive, and thofe who partook of it might be faid rainer io eat vermin than breaú. NTotwitnftanding this, it was eaten by them with the greateft appetite, only taking this precaution, to retire into a dark corner, that they might not fee what they put into their mouths. Behold, children, what want of food, which you, thank God, only know by name, may bring people to! -Juft at this time they perceived the fhip furpounded by fharksEliza. What fifh are thofe? Fames. Do you not recollect, Eliza, what Mr. B - told us about them, when we were reading natural hiftory? Eliza. O, that is fuch a long time ago.

Fath.

[ 274 ]

Fath. Tell her, James, what you remember about it.

Fames. Well, in the firft place, it is a very long fifh. As long, I dare fay, as this room*, and very thick; then he has moft dreadful jaws', armed above and below with three rows of teeth, which crofs one another, and with which he can at once bite off a leg, an arm, or a head. Add to this, he has a very ftrong tail, which he always ufes for defence, and thould he ftrike any one with it, he is fure to break fome of his limbs, if not inftantly kill him.

Fred. Oh! that muft be a moft dreadfut fifh indeed.

Fath. And he is a very greedy one into the bargain. In the violence of his hunger he iwallows whatever comes in his way, even iron hooks and hatchets. Some travellers relate, that having one day thrown a dead failor overboard, wrapt in fail-cloth, according to the feafaring cuftom; the day following they took a large fhark, within fide of which they found the corpfe, wrapt in the fail-cloth, as it had been cart into the fea. Their flefh is oily and unpalatable, notwithftanding which it is eaten by the blacks in Africa, with a great relifh. In order to: make it more delicate to their tafte, they in general let it lie a week in the fun, by which time it finells and becomes putrid.

[^11]neral

[ 215 ]

Eliza. Fye!
Fiath. Columbus's fuperftitious companions regarded the appearance of thefe fea-moniters, as a prefage of fome misfortune that was about to befal them. However, notwithftanding this ill-founded fear, and the difguft which Europeans difcover at the oily flefh of this fifh, thefe poor half-ftarved people ate of it moft voracioufly, finding it far preferable to their magotty bread.

Fred. But how did they catch them?
Fath. Very readily. They needed only to take advantage of their voracioufnefs, which, like the paffions of fome inen, lead them inevitably to ruin. As they readily fwallowsed every thing which offered itfelf, the failors put a bit of red rag upon a hook, which they faftened to a chain and threw into the fea. Directly was there a hungry fhark uponit, and fo they drew him out. In the belly of one of them they found a live turtle, which was no fooner fet at liberty than it crawled about the deck. In another they found the head of a fhark, which had juft before been thrown overboard. This is a proof they do not hefitate to devoar one another.

Enough about fharks. 'To-morrow we will proceed with our Columbus.
'TALE

[ 216 ]

TALE XVII.

Fath. Before Columbus could arrive at Veragua, to which place he was now fteering, he found himfelf frequently obliged to come to anchor upon the coaft, on account of the ftorms which he frequently met with.

At one of thefe places a fingular fcene prefented itfelf. The natives built their houfes, not like other people upon the earth, but above it in the air.

Fred. Hey-day! How couid they do that?

Fath. In the fame manner that Queen Semiramis, in ancient times, is faid to have raiied her gardens a confiderable height above the earth-Do you remember that?

Fred. O yés, the flying gardens.
Fath. Well, Frederick. Juff as at that time whole gardens were fupported by piles, the houfes of thefe Indians were built apon the tops of very high trees, fo that they might really be faid not to live upon the earth, but in the air, like birds.

[ 217 ]

Eliza. But why did they thus build their houfes?

Fath. Probably becaufe they were in danger, upon the ground, of being fwept away by floods, injured by wild beafts, or deftroyed by their enemies?

Cha. But how did they get up to them?
Fiath. By means of ladders, which, when they had afcended, they drew up; fo that it was impolible for others to come at them.

Thos. I think that was rery cunning of thefe people.

Fath. They at length arrived at $V$ cragua, and the avaricious thirft of Columbus's companions began already to be gratified, by the idea of the near approach of the treafures, they imagined they were about to collect. They calt anchor in the mouth of a river, which the Admiral called Bethlem. But having become acquainted with one of the natives, and learning from him that the capital of the country, and refidence of their king; whofe name was Quibia, or Quibio, lay a few days fail up the ftream, they determined to proceed towards it. 'This was done; and the Admiral fent his U brother brother Bartholomew forwards, with fome boats, to compliment his Indian Majefty in due form. The news of the arrival of thefe white people having reached his ears, he came out to meet Bartholonew; and the reception on both fides was accompanied with proper marks of friendthip.

[ 218 ]

On the following day, his majefty was pleafed to pay a vifit to the Adıniral himfelf. Columbus received him in a manner fuited to his rank, and by a prefent of a few European toys, completely fecured his good-will.

Bartholomew, in the mean time had taken care to obtain information concerning the fituation of the gold mines, and, attended by guides, fet off to examine them. When arrived at the fpot, they difcovered feveral pieces of gold above ground, near the roots of fome large trees, which to them was proof fufficient that this metal abounded in the bowels of the earth. Having gathered what pieces they found fcattered about, they haftened back to the Admiral, to give him an account of the fortunate refult of their excurfion.

This confirmed him in the intention he had already formed of fettling a colony in this neighbourhood, and induced him to give immediately the neceffary orders for erecting the requifite number of houfes; near the mouth of the river

[ 219 ]

oats, orm. eople meet fides iendwas nfelf. ed to opean id tag the ed by rrived ces of fome ficient of the they ck to of the river Bethlem. This bufinefs was carried on with great fpirit, and, in the courfe of a very ihort time, the houfes bui: with wood, and covered with paln leaves, were compleated. Columbus chofe eighty out of his people for colonifts, and appointed his brother Bartholomew, to be governor. He furnifhed them with various utenfils, and other things requifite to their fafety and comfort. He left them in particular a good ftock of fifhing tackle, as the waters in thefe parts abounded in the beft of fin. Amongft others, there was a fpecies of anchovie, which the Indians ufed to catch in a fingular manner. This finh, when purfued by others, was accuftomed, in order to fave itfelf, to jump upon land. The Indians therefore covered their canoes with palm leaves, and failed about in the rivers, difturbing the water as much as poffible with their oars, when the fifh, taking the palm leaves for land, would jump upon them, and thus become an eafy prey to the fifherman.

The Admiral having made every neceffary arrangement, was on the point of departure for Spain again, when, to his great aftonifhment, he learnt that Quibio, from motives of jealoufy, on account of the fettiing of this new colony, was determined to fet fire to the houfes they had juft erected. He confulted with his brother, refpecting what fteps had better betaket to prevent this mifchief; they both concluded that it was moft advifable to anticipate his attack, and immediatcly to feize the cazique himfelf. An unfortunate refolution this, and its confequences were deplorable!

U 2 ther

Bartholomew undertook the execution of this plan. Accompanied by a confiderable force, he marched directly towards Veragua, at a fhort diftance from which, on a finall eminence, ftood the refidence of the cazique. When he arrived at this fpot, Quibio requefted that he would not approach tie houfe, as he would come out to meet him. In confequence of this requeft, Bartholomew took with him but five men, ordering the remainder to ftop at a certain diftance, and upon hearing the report of a mulket to advance, fo that none might efcape from the houfe.

The cazique now approached, but at the very moment when he was going to falute bis vifitor, he found himfelf-a prifoner. The fignal was given; and all in the houle were taken without refiftance.

Some. O fhame!
Fath. O fhame! fay I too, children, and willingly would I give a great deal to have it in my power to wipe off this fecond ftain from the hiftory of our friend. But-

Thos.

Thos. But the cazique was the firf to act difhonourably, and they only wifhed to deprivehim of the power of executing his wicked defign.

Fath. That to be fure is true, Thomas; but who gave the Spaniards the right to eftablifh a colony in his territories, without his. permiffion?

Thos. No one.
Fath. And who can blame the governor of any country for not tolerating frangers, who, he has every reafon to believe, will become dangerous to himfelf and his fubjects?

Thos. No one.
Fiath. Where then was the injuftice of which the Spaniards complained, and what could poffibly juftify them in thus violating the laws of hofpitality?

All that I am able to fay in vindication of Columbus, is this; that he might have fome humane object in view. He thought perhaps, that the colony under the management of his brother, would be the means of civiiizing thefe people, and of bringing them to a knowledge of the only true God; and probably his objeet in feizing the perfon of the cazique, was only that he might have it in his power to enter into a friendly negociation with him, and by this. means to gain his affections. If thefe were

$$
\mathrm{v}_{3} \text { his. }
$$

[ 222 ]

his motives, as we have reafon to hope they were, although we muft acknowledge them to be honourable, yet are we compelled to deplore the means adopted in the exccution of his views, as highly unworthy of fo humane a character.

Be this as it may, there was a chain of misfortunes connected with this hafty ftep, which attended him to the end of his days. -Let us fee in what they confifted.

The cazique, who had been taken prifoner, was ordered to be bound hand and foot, and conveyed on board one of the velfels. The boat fet fail; it became dark; the prifoner, who was bound to the boat with a cord, complained of violent pains in his hands, whicli were tied too clofe to the wood. His conductor: had fo much compaffion as to releafe him; but he was ftill held by the cord, bound hand and foot. The cazique, however, watched his opportunity, and, before they were aware, fprang over-board, drawing his conductor aftec: him. In vain did they endeavour to take him up again; his great agility in fwimming, favoured by the darknefs of the night, enabled him to effect his efcape. How he could do this, with his hands and feet bound, it is difficult: for Europeans to conceive.

This circumftance furnifhed a pretence to the rapacity of the Spaniards for feizing upon the cazique's property. 'They conftrned his. efcape into a crime. His houfe therefore was plundered, and the gold found in it, to the amount of three hundred ducats, divided amongs the plunderers.

Quibio, in the mean time, prepared to take a bloody revenge upon his oppreffors. By means of penetrating through a thick wood, he fell upon the colony before they expected it, and affaulted them with a flower of burning arrows, by which he hoped to fet fire to the houfes, covered, as was before obferved, with palm leaves. But the diftance was too great for the attainment of his object. Upon this followed a molt obftinate battle, which muft have ended in the entire deftruction of the colony, had it not been for the unparalleled prefence of mind exercifed by Bartholomew. With a few Spaniards, he forced his way into the midit of the Indians, and by dint of the greateft valour, at length compelled them to give way. Bartholomew himfelf received a wound from an arrow in the breaft; it did not however prove mortal.

By this victory they were in hopes of having deterred his Indian Majefty from any further hoftilities; in this, however they ware miftaken.

[ 224 ]

miftaken. On the contrary, he fought revenge more bitterly than ever, and without doubt, the colony muft have fallen a facrifice to his rage, had they not unanimoufly declared they had rather truft themfelves on board their ill-conditioned veffels, than remain at a place where they were in conftant danger of becoming a prey to the fury of favages. The Admiral, therefore, found himfelf compelled to fetch them away in boats and canoes, and to receive them on board his own fhip, as one of the fquadron had become a ufelefs wreck. This they were under the neceflity of leaving, and the other three fet fail.

The only wifh of the Admiral was, that he might arrive in fafety, with his ill-conditiored fhips, at Hifpaniola; for he thought it utterly impoffible to make the voyage to Spain with them. But the elements were apparently combined for the deftruction of this great man. The moft dreadful hurricane, made ftill more horrible by the tremendous thunder natural to this climate, raifed the waves mountains high, and dafhed thefe crazy veffels to and fro in fuch a inanner, that the failors becannepetrefied with fear. In vain did Columbus adopt thofe meafures which his experience pointed out to him. His people heard not his commands, or, if they did, from confternation or fatigue, they were unable to execute them. Thus one of his thip; was loft, and the other two were become fo leaky, that the whole of the crews, continually employed at the pumps, cculd fcarcely keep them above water.

[ 225 ]

Thus dreadfully fituated, Columbus fteered for the ifland of Cuba, in hopes of being able there to repair his fhips; but even this hope was fruftrated. A frefh ftorm, as tremendous as the former, drove him off the coaft of this ifland, quite out to fea again. The fhips were dafhed with fuch violence againft each other, that the people expected every moment to be their laft.

It however pleafed divine providence ftill to fpare the life of Columbus, in order that his virtue might undergo yet greater trials. His fhips withtood the violent fhock they had received, and arriving in the mean time off the coaft of Jamaica, the Admiral, by means of great exertions, was fo fortunate as to run the veffels on fhore at the very moment they were about to fink.

Fohn. But, good heavens! how is he to get away again, if he has got no fhips?

Fath, God only knows! Upon him did Columbus rely, after having done what appeared at the time abfolutely neceffary.

There

[ 226 ]

There was no poffibility of repairing the thips, for they werc both wrecks. It was neverthelefs of the utmoft importance to the Admiral that they fhould not go to pieces, fince, for two reafons, he held it advifable for him and his people to fleep on board rather than on fhore. For, in the firt place, they were here fafe from the hoftilities of the natives; and, in the fecond, Columbus, who was now fo dependant on their friendly difpofition, was by this means better enabled to prevent their being provoked to hoftilities, by the plunder and injuftice of his own people.

He therefore caufed the ftranded veffels to be fupported on both fides, as well as it was poffible; had tents fixed upon the decks, and forbad any of his people to go on fhore.

ThLicy were ioon vifited by a number of the natives; and, as they were treated by Columbus's orders in the moft friendly manner, they difcovered, on their part alfo, great marks of confidence and friendihip. They furnimed the European ftrangers with abundance of provifions, in return for fuch kinds of toys as the Spaniards were in general provided with. For one page of leaf gold, they willingly exchanged two geefe; a loaf made of mango root, for a glafs bead; and for bells, they would give the moft valuable things they poffeffed.

Columbus,

[ 227 ]

Columbus, in the mean time, held a confultation with his friends concerning the beft means of getting away from this ifland. There was but one method that prefented itfelf, and that was, to fend to the governor of Hifpaniola, and requeft him to furnifh them with a fhip to carry them away. But it was now the queftion, how this requeft fhould be conveyed to him. Thefe poor ftranded wretches had not been able to fave a fingle boat, and from Jamaica to Hifpanicia, as you may perceive on the map, is a diftance of near thirty leagues. Good advice then was again highly neceffary.

I' was, however, to be had. Columbus, by 1 nd behaviour, had fo well fecured the good-will of the natives, that they were willing to fell him fome of their canoes; but thefe were miferable things, fcarcely fafe to row about the fhore, confifting only of trunks of trees hollowed out. The nighteft guft of wind, or roughnefs of the fea, would inevitably upfet them.

Notwithftanding the manifeft danger in attempting to make fo long a voyage, by fuch a miferable conveyance, there were two brave men among Columbus's people who were willing to undertake it, in order if poffible to fave the Admiral and his companions in diftrefs. One of them was called Mender, the other Fiefki;

[ 228 ]

Fiefki; the firft a Spaniard, the latter a Genoefe. With pleafure, chiidren, do 1 mention to you the names of thefe people; for their laudable courage, in thus entirely devoting themfelves to the .ervice of the Admiral, deferves to be handed down from mouth to mouth, to the lateft pofterity. Each of them went on board a feparate canoe, attended by fix Spaniards, with fome of the natives to affift them in rowing; and it was agreed upon, that Fiefki fhould immediately return upon their arrival at Hifo paniola, whilft Mendez purfued his journey to Suint Domingo over land.

They fet fail, accompanied with the beft wifhes of their countrymen. After having rowed for two days and two nights, in the moft fuffocating heat, in the dirsction pointed out to them, they began to apprehend that they had got out of their courfe, and had paffed Hifpaniola. You may readily conceive how this apprehenfion maft have alarmed them; it was the more terrible as their ftock of water was exhaufted, and they were parched up with the burning heat of the fun. Some of the Indians fell exhaufted from their oars, and died. The furvivors feeing their wn fate in that of thefe poor creatures, became helplefs through defpair, by which means their fituation grew ftill pore defperate. The only refrefhment the; coold obtain was, by putting a little fea water into their mouths, to cool their parched tongues, which could certainly afford them but little relief, and muft render their defire of freh water fill more violent.

〔 229 〕

In this dreadful fituation a beam of hope fuddenly darted upon them. It was night, and as the moon appeared upon the horizon, they thought they could difcover, juft at the place where it rofe, an elevated point of land, which appeared in the form of a rock. This afforded them reafon to hope that they were in the neighbourhood of fome illand, and this hope again called forth their exertions to obtain here a place of fafety. They fucceeded: but what did they find when they arrived at the fuppofed ifland? Nothing but a bare rock, upon which was not any thing to fatisfy either their hunger or thirft. O dreadful fituation!

They nevertheiefs jumped out of their canoes, and ran about in defpair. Here have ave another inftance to fhew how wrong it is to doubt the protection of providence, even when every poffibility of relief feems to be denied us; for it is frequently the cafe, that affiftance is granted us juft at the time when we leaft expected it. Who could have thought that God would have chofen this rock, to afford thefe poor thinfty wretches that I which which could alone fave them from deftruction? It was, however, really the cafe. Betwean the cliffs of this rock they found an abundance. of rain water, pure, and as cool as from the choiceft ciftern: but, unfortunately, uponmaking this happy difcovery, they entirely forgot the wife rule of moderation-they fell greedily to; they drank-and drank too much. Some of them loft their lives by this excefs, and all of them their health. Some fell dead upon the fpot; others carried away with them fevers, dropfies, and confumptions. So true is it that excefs will convert the moft fimple and wholefome nourifhment, into deadly poifon; and that the ignorance of man frequently converts that into a curfe, which kind heaven defigned to be a.bleffing.

[ 230 ]

The greatef and moft preffing want of our adventurers was now relieved. But the dreadful queftion ftill remained; what is now to become of us? Fortunately, they found fome fifh upon the ftrand of this rock, which the feat had left there; and as there was fufficient to fatisfy them all, the two leaders determined to ftop here during the heat of the day, and fail again in fearch of land, in the cool of the evening. We will, therefore, let them reft; and fee to-morrow what will become of them.

[ 231 ]

Some. O dear, father! now only tell us fo far as that we may know whether they arrived fafe or not.

Others. O, yes; dear father! Pray, pray do?
Fiath. Well then, I believe I muft difturb the repofe of thefe poorperple, and make them fet fail again.

They did fó, as I have already hinted, towards the evening: after having rowed ullnight by the light of the moon, to their great joy they arrived next morning, at break of day, apon the weftern conit of IItifamiola.

Potir. Is that rall?
Friv. What is all.
All. Very well.
[ 2327.

TALE XVIIL.

Now, children, [ faid the Father, as on the following day he continued his tale] let us leave Hifpaniola, where we yefterday fafe$1 f$ landed thofe two brave fellows, Fiefki and Mendez, and return to Jamaica, that we may fee how Columbus is fituated there. I feel a kind of foreboding that we fiall foon lofe him. We muft therefore endeavour to turn to advantage every minute whilft his company is yet allowed us.

Geo. Ah! I hope he is not going to die.
Eliza. Oh dear, Father! I hope not. If he is, I will run out of the room.

Fred. So will I.
Fath. [ Seriou/ly], However we may conduct ourfelves upon the lofs of what we love, the decifions of providence ftill remain unalterable. It is therefore better for us, on fuch occafions as thefe, to hold ourfelves prepared to meet the worft with patience, if there be no remedy.

1233 ]

remedy, rather than act in an unbecoming manner.

Columbus's companions looked daily, with the utmoft anxiety, towards that qaurter from whence Fiefki was expected to return, with the news of his fellow adventumers fafe arrival at Hifpaniola. But alas! they looked in vais. There was no Fiefki to be feen.

Geo. LEey! Why did he notreturn?
Fath. How is it poffible 1 fhould know that? Are we not now at Jamaica, and is it in any power to fee from hence to Hifpaniola, and difcover the caufos of the faithfal Fiefki's delay?

Let it fuffice that he did not return. Columbus's people therefore began again to defpair: it appeared to them brit too certain that both their meffengers were loft, and of courfe that they themfelves were to remain upon this. inland, without the leaft chance of obtaining a: releafe from it. The air refounded with their: cries and lamentations. But this was not all. Coluribus, as ufual, was again tooked tor as the author of all their misfortunes, and again did they carfe the hour in winich they had entrufted themfelves under the command of fo fool-hardy and unfortunate an adventurer. Their cries and lamentations broke out at length into open cebellion. With the moft daring imprecations

$$
\mathrm{x}_{3} \text { did }
$$

[ 234 ]

did they threaten the life of Columbus; and the -hour feemed now to approach, in which this bizve man, after having efcaped fo great a variety of coimplicated dangers, firpuld fall by the hands of his own people.

Juft at this time he was confined to his bed by a violent attack of the goat; many of his people were in the fame fituation. All theothers had entered into a combination, under the direction of two brothers of the name of Porras, who acted as leaders, in the mutiny.

The eldeft of them, an unfeeling monfter, came to the Admiral's bedfide, and akked him, in the moftinfolent manner, why he would not return to Spain? Columbus anfwered with his. ufual compofure, "That their return did not: depend upon him, much as he might wifh it;: and in cafe there was any one amongft his companions who could propofe a plan, by which. this object could be accomplifhed, his advicefhould meet with every attention it deferved. He wifhed, therefore, to have, all the officers immediately called together, in order to hear their opinions on the fubject." Mild and prudent as this anfwer was, it made no impreffion on the mind of this infolent rebel; on the contrary he anfwered, with the greateft infolence, that there was no time for prating-he, for his part, was determined to fet fail immediately, and called out to the affernbled crews, "Thofe amongt you who are inclined to follow me, advance.",

[ 235 ]

This was the fignal for a univerfal revolt. Moft of them went over to this deluded man, and faid they were willing to follow him. The poor Admiral, lame and weak from the gout, hereupon fprang out of his bed, in order to difperfe thefe rebels; but his attendants, apprehending they might murder him, prewented his going amongft them. The like compulfion was exercifed alfo on Bartholomew, who was advancing furiouny towards them with a pike in his hand, to punifh them for their treachery. The matineers immediately took poffeffion of ten canoes, which the Adminal had purchafed of the natives. This led the remainder of the people, who had not yet joined the confpiracy, to defpair ; their fidelity began to waver; mott of them at laft jumped into the canoes, and begged to go with the rebels.

How deeply did it diftrefs Golumbus, Bartholonew, and young Ferdinand, that they were compelled to remain inactive feectators of this dreadful event. They at laft found themfelves deferted by all, except the fick and in, frim, and a few fervants, who yet remained faithful. Thefe people Columbus ordered to approach his bed fide, where he addreffed them in the molt pathetic manner; he thanked them for their attachinent to him ; exhorted them to perfevere in this line of conduct, and to fix their hopes and expectations of a fpeedy releafe from their fufferings upon Him, whe is the rewarder of uprightnefs and fidelity, both here and in the world to come.

[ 236 ]

The unfeeling mutineers, with fhouts of joy, now diretted their courfe towards the ealtern point of the ifland, with a view of paffing over from thence to Hifpaniola. Whenever they went on fhore, which during this hort voyage was frequently the cafe, they plundered and ill-treated the natives in every fhape; at the fame tirme telling them, they muft hold the Admiral acoountable for whatever injury they received, as he alone was the caufe of rendering all the mifchief that was done, neceffary and unavoidable. To this they added, a permiffion to take away his life, if he fhould refufe to make reftitution. Threy declared that his fole object was to make the Indians miferable, and that, if they were wife, they would anticipate his defign. Thns did they irritate the minds of thefe favages, againft their deferted commander.

After feizing a ftraggling party they forced them on board, in order to perforin the laborious part of rowing, and then left the coaft.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}37\end{array}\right]$

But fcarcely were they got four leagues out to fea, when a contrary wind arofe, and toffed about their canoes in fuch a manner, that they began to take in a onfiderable quantity of water. Now in order to lighten them-I tremble while I tell you-thefe monfters came to the determination of murdering all the Indians, and throwing them over board. They began to carry this inhuman purpofe into execution. It had already been executed on fome of thefe poor creatures, when the others, in defpair, jumped into the fea, and with the moft heartpiercing cries for mercy continued fwimming by the fide of the canoes; but Ob , the unheard of barbarity! when almoft $e^{\bullet}$ haufted by fwimming, they laid hold on the fide of the canoe, in order to reft themfelves; they hacked-would you believe it, dear children! Thefe European monfters hacked their hands off, fo that their death was attended with aggravated mifery. In this manner, incredible as it may feem, did eighteen poor Indians lofe their lives; and not ene would have efcaped, had not the Spaniards, under the apprehenfion that they thou'? not be able to proceed on their voyage, determaned to preferve the remainder to row them back to Janaica.

Blot this horrid tale from your memory, children; or, if this be not poffible, lament as often

$$
\left[\begin{array}{lll}
23^{8}
\end{array}\right]
$$

often as you reflect upon it, that there fhould ever have exifted monfters in the lruman form, who, entirely deftitute of all the feelings of fympathy and humanity, could thus degrade their nature.

Columbus, in his prefent fituation, fill maintained his confirtency of character. He bore this great calamity with fortitude, and though he himfelf was indifpofed, yet did he interef himfelf with ail the affection of a father in the care of the fick, who were left with him. Heaven fimiled upon his benevolent affiduity, and, in a chort time, he had the pleafure of feeing all of them restored to perfect health.

But he had now to combat with a new difficulty. The Indians, who had hitherto furnifhed them with plentiful fupplies of provifions. began to fear that thefe voracious ftrangers might take up ibeir abode with them, and thus caufe a famine in their country. This apprebemfion, with the ill-treatment they had received from the mutineers, had confirmed a fentiment of abhecrence, and dread of the Eucopeans. The refult was, that they brought no more provifions to the ftranded veffels. A deplorable event!

Columbus's fagacity, however, again affordad him the means of relief from this dreadful fituation.
fituation. This he derived from his knowledge of aftronomy. He knew an eclipfe of the. moon was approaching, and took advantage of this circumftance, again to imprefs the Indians with reverence and good-will towards him. Hear how he effected this.

By means of a native, brought with him from Hifpaniola, he affembled their chiefs together, giving them to underftand that he had fomething of importance to communicate to them. They appeared; and, by the aid of his Indian interpreter, he gave them the following information.
"'That he and his companions had a knowledge of the Gud who made the heavens and the earth; that this God was the rewarder of the good, and the punifher of the wicked, and that he would affuredly punifh them, if they did not furnifh his worfhippers with provifions neceffary to their fubfiftence. That as a proof of the near approach of fuch a punifhment, they would, that evening, perceive the moon rife with an angry and bloody appearance, and they might from thence conclude what they had to expect, if they ftill perfifted in refufing to furnifh them with provifions as heretofore."

This pruphecy was at firf univerfally ridiculed. But when the moon made its appearance, and the eclipfe commenced; when the darknefs darknefs was perceived gradually to increafe: then was their confternation equally general ; and they intreated, with bitter cries and lamentations, that the Admiral would pray to God to avert the threatened judgment from them, making, at the fame time; the moft folemn promifes that in future they would furnifh him with every neceffary of life in their power.

[ 240 ]

Columbus, on his part, promifed to fulfil their wihh; and to this end; fhut himfelf up in his cabin, until fuch time as he knew the cclipfe was at its height. He then again made his appearance, and affured them they had no longer any reafon to fear. God, he faid, was well pleafed to fee that they had changed their intentions, and would not therefore punifh them; as a proof of which, the moon would foon lofe its angry countenance, amd again fhine upon them in its ufual fplendour.

Seeing that every thing happened exactly as Columbus had foretold, they offered praife to the God of the chriftians; and abundantly fupplied this wonderful man with provifions.

Now, children, what do you fay to this? Was it prudent and confiftent with virtue, to take fuch advantage of the ignorance of thefe poor people?-[A general filenco $]$-James, what do you fay?

[ 241 ]

Fames. Yes, I think it was prudent; but whether it was confiftent with virtueFath. Well? .
Fames. I cannot tell; but it appears to me as though it were not.

Fath. And why not James?
Fames. I cannot exprefs my meaning as I could wifh, but I think it is not right to tell falhoods about Gorl.

Fath. I think fo too: but let us hear whether we form this opinion upon the fame grounds. Why do you think it is not right to tell falfhoods about God.

Fanes. Becaufe we fhould then lead other; to form wrong aotions of the Deity.

Fath. Very right, James; that is alfo my reafon, and you all know of what vart importance it is that mankind fhould poffefs juft notions of the Deity. Every erroneous opinion, which ignorant people form of this great and good Being, leads to fupertition. Thus did Columbus, in making the Indians believe that God, on his account, caufed the moon to be eclipfed, teach them fuperftition; and added one fuperfitious opinion more, to the long lift of thofe they had already adopted.

We cannot, in this inftance, therefore commend his conduct; but if an action, not altogether juftitiable, can deferve to be forgiven, it is in a fimilar cafe to this. Columbus could difcover no other means of faving himfelf and his people, and at the fame time he impreffed fome veneration for God upon the minds of the Indians, and by that means prepared them for better inftruction in future. This, in fome degree, may form an excufe for his conduct.

$$
[24 ;]
$$

Eight long months were now paffed fince the departure of Mendez and Fiefki, for Hifpaniola; and ftill there were no tidings from either of them. They had no longer then any doubts of theii being loft, and Columbus, as well as his remaining companions, now gave up all expectations of the relief they had fo long hoped for in vain. Defpair led them to the determination of deferting their diftreffed commander, and of joining the other mutineers, who were ftraggling about the ifland, fubfifting entirely by plunder.

But juft as thefe forlorn and hopelefs wretches were going to put their intentions into cxecution, a fmall European veffel, to their inexpreffible joy, appeared off the inland, and caft anchor not far from laud. It was not long before the commander of it came on fhere in his boat, and delivered a letter to the Admiral, from the governor of Hifpaniola, accompanied with a cafk of wine, and two flitches of bacon. Scarcely had he delivered theie, ould and effed f the n for edefince Hiffrom a any is, as gave blong o the comneers, fiffing is into their 1, and $s$ not ne on to the niola, d two ivered there, thefe, when he fprang immediately into his boat again, got on hoard his fhip, and failed away to the place from whence he came. The letter which he brought the Adniral, contained nothing but empty compliments.

$[2+3]$

You will, probably, be as little able to act count for this fingular appearance, as were Columbus's companions. I will tell you, then, the reafon of it. Ovando, the governor of Hifpaniola, whofe character we have learnt from his infamous treatment of Columbus, wifhea for nothing more earneftly than that this great man fhould fall a facrifice to his misfortuncs, under the apprehenfion that, fhould he ever return to Spain, he would again wifh to be re-inftated in his right, as Viceroy of the Weft Indies, and that, confequently, he himfelf fhould lofe his office of Governor. He therefore wifhed to know in what degree our hero fuffered, and whether, by delaying the departure of the veffels for their relief, he fhould be able to accomplifh his dark purpofe. Such was the objeck, as fome hiftorians affert, of fending this meffenger, and of the inftructions he received to leave the ifland fo fuddenly. Some afign a more innocent motive for his conduct: Ovando, they fay, apprehended that Columbus had made the ftranding of his veffels merely a pretext to obtain an opportunity of again.

$$
\mathrm{Y} 2 \quad \text { vifiting }
$$

[ $2+4$ ]

vifiting Hifpaniola, in order to reinftate himfelf as governor of that place. He accordingly fent this meffenger fimply to get information of the Admerial's real fituation. It remains with you to adopt that opivion, which to your appears moft probable. But iet me hear which of the two you would prefer. All. Oh the latter, the latte:
Fath. Why fo?
Fohn. Becaufe it is an uncertain fuppoiition that Orando was fuch a monfter; and beceufe, in doubtul cefes, it is our duty to think the bet: of other $\dot{r}$.

Fath. Wenl faid, John. Adhere to this maxin, cat you will never repent having acted upon it; not even if you fhould meet with a fellow creature whom you have thought more defesving than he really was. 'Tis better--'tis more conducive to our happinefs, to err ten times on this fide, then once on the other.

It is faid, that Columbus thought Ovando chargeable with the former motive; but, too great to fink under the heavieft of dificulties, he concealed the melancholly which his hopelefs fituation caufed to prey upon him. He informed his peopie, with a ferene countenance, that the reafon why the fhip failed away again fo fuddenly was, that it was too fmail to contain them all with their baggage. That Nen-dez and Fiefki were both of them fafely arrived at Hifpaniola, and that they had orders to purchafe a larger veffel on his account, which would foon, by its appearance, put an end to all their fufferings.

[ $2+5$ ]

He really had, at this time, received certain information concerning thefe brave men. We already know that they arrived in fafety at Hifpaniola, and I can now inform you, why Fiefki did not return, according to his promife. The whole affair was as follows. Notwithftanding he had carried a violent fever with him on flore, which he lad taken upon the rock; yet was he willing iminediately to return, and give an account to the Admiral of the happy iffue of their adventure. But not one of his companions conld be perfuaded to undertake this dangerous voyage back again. Neither threats', nor promifes, were of any avail. He was therefore obliged to accompany them to Saint Domingo, where, together with Mendez, he inceffantly preffed the governor to furnifh them with a veffel, with which they might releafe their Admiral from his perilous fituation. But this man, whatever might be his motives, delayed the accomplifhinent of their wifhes by a varicty of infignificant excufci.

Columbus, in the mean time, by various. efforts, wad inteayoured to bring the delnded.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}246 & 1\end{array}\right.$

mutineers to a fenfe of their duty; but in vain. They not only perfifies in their rebellious conduct, but infifted upon the Admiral giving up. one half of the cloathing on board the veffels; and threatened, in cafe of refufal, to take what they afked by force of arms. This refufal being given, they held themfelves in readinefs. to put their threats into execution.

Columbus ftill indifyofed, fent his brother Bartholomew to oppofe them, with all the force he could collect. He however gave him orders, to try again what he could do by means of perfuafion, and not to come to hoftilities until felf di fence fhould make it abfolutely neceffary. Bartholomew adhered confcientioufly to thefe initicuctions: but whea he came up with the rebels, and invited them to return peaceably to their duty, they regarded this conduct as originating in weaknefs and fear, and themfelves immediately began the attack. Six of them bound thenfelves to direct their united force folely on the perfon of Bartholomew, and not to defift till they. fhould fee him fail. But he reccived them with his wonted intrepidity, and being well fupported by his adherents, preffed with fuch irrefiftible force upon the rebels, that he foon obtained a complete victory. Some fell by his $f_{\text {word, }}$ others were taken prifoners, and the remainder mainder had recourfe to flight. Among the prifoners who were put in irons and taken orr board the fhips, was Porras, the rebel chicf, whom Bartholomew difarmed and took captive with his own hand. He himfelf efcaped with a light wound.

[ 247 ]

The fugitives foon after fent to the Admiral, and fued for mercy, which our generous hero, ever inclined to lenity rather than revenge, readily granted. Thus was peace and good order unexpectedly reftored; every one returned to his duty; every one received pardon except their daring chiefs, who remained in fetters, in order that they might receive the punifhment they had fo richly deferved.

Mendez and Fiefki, during this interval, continued to affail the gevernor with their requefts, for a thip to fetch their Aidminal from Jumaica. Long did he conti aue to anfwer their requefts with trifing excufes. At length, fearing left he fhould be called to account by the Spanifh court, for leaving him in this helplefs fituation fo long a time, he confented to have a fhip purchafed for him. Thus was Columbus's diftrefs relieved, at a time when he leaft expected it; another proof that we fhould never defpair, although every human fupport fhould fail us, but, on the contrary, relying on the protection of God, we ought to fo and hope the beft without ceafing. Thus did Coluinbus act, and thus, children, may we act, fhould we ever be brought into a fimilar fituation.
[ $2+8$ ]

A whole rear elapfed, during which time Columbus hau been continually ftruggling at this place with dangers, oppofition, and difafters, when the fhip which was to releafe him at length appeared. They all an inyfully on board, and arrived in fafety at Saint Domingo.

Colombus was here treated with every mark of howour and refpect, by order of the governor, who endeavoured to conceal his bafenefs by mean and defpicable flattery. Whilft, however, this poltroon, through fear, continued to flatter the man whom he hated in his heart, he could not refrain from giving a ftriking mark of the bittereft rancour. He immediately releafed the rebel leaders, 'which the Admiral was carrying with him to $S_{1}$ ain, in order that they* might there take their trials. He even went fo far as to threaten thofe who had continued faithful to their commander, with a ftrict examination into their conduct.

Columbus, who had fo often expecienced. the infolence of worthlefs people, fupported this treatment with his ufual fortitude. He made, however, all the ${ }^{1}{ }^{7} \mathrm{e}$ in his power to quit quit a place which he appeared to have difcovered only to promote his own unhappinefs, and fet fail for Spain, fo foon as the two veffels could be got ready for his departure.

[ 249 ]

Upon this voyage he again experienced the ill-fate, which, by the infcrutable decrees of the Almighty, had ever attended him, from the beginning of his great enterprizes to the prefent period. He was foon overtaken by violent ftorms, which difabled one of his veffels fo much that he was under the neceffity of fending it back again to Hifpaniola. The other was afterwards fo materially damaged, that it required more than common courage to undertake with it fo long a voyage. It had loft both main and fore maft, befides having received confiderable injury in its hull. Columbus, however, purfued his voyage in good cheer; with a veffel little better than a wreck, he made a run of no lefs than feven hnndred leagues, and at length, with great difficulty, arrived in fafety at the po:- of Saint Lucar, in Andalufia.

And now, I dare fay, you hope to fee an end at once to every obitacle which had hitherto oppofed him. But you hope in vain. He was fcarcely got on thore when he received news, of an event of all others to him the moft difaftrous. His well-wifher, his protectrefs, Ifakella, labella, was dead. He had depended folely upon her for obtaining a juft recompence for all the ill treatment he had received. And now, alas! She was no more! What then had he to expect from a fufpicious pufillanimous King, who had hitherto always been averfe to hinn.

[ 250 ]

He did not, however fail, on this account, as foon as health would permit him, to appear . at Court, in order to give the King a full account of the refult of his voyage, and of every cccurrence that had befallen him. But he was received with the moft difgufting indifference; his juft complaints, of the numerous injuries and infults he had received from his enemies, were not heard; and his equally juft requeft, of being reinftated in his rights and priviledges, were anfwered only by varions ili-founded excufes.
'Thus was this great and highly deferving inan, compelled to wafte the evening of his laborious life, in the fruitlefs employ of requefting juitice at the hands of an unjuft Judge, and fupplicating mercy of an unmerciful King, till. at length, Heaven itfelf put an end to his bitter: fufferings. Exhaufted by the great and numerous troubles and difficulties he had combated, he at laft died at Valadolid, in the year

[ 25.1$]$

4506 , in the $59^{\text {th }}$, or, as fome fay, in the $65^{\text {th }}$ year of his age.

His death was worthy of the manner in which he had lived. He died with that calmnefs of mind, and with that cheerful piety, which, through the whole of his life, even under the moft dreadful events, he had uniformly difcovered; and his poor exhaufted fpirit feemed joyfully to take its flight into the prefence of that Being, before whofe judgment feat Kings themfelves muft appear.

> [A long paufe.-The Father then proceeded as follores]

Shall I now tell you what account hiftorians give of the perfon and character of this brave man?

All. O yes! dear Father.
Fath. "His perfon," they tell us, " was tall and handfome. His figure and deportment befpoke fomething noble. He had a ratlier long face, an aquiline nofe, blue lively eycs, and a pale complexion. In his youth his hair was inclined to red, but from his clofe application, and the continual troubles he had to encounter, it became grey at an early period; for his life was a continual feries of fuccefs and difafter, abufe and praife; the higheit honours, and the loweft degradations. Few

252 J

Few and fleeting were the number of his happy moments, but feldom did a day pafs without his experiencing either violent $\mathrm{p}: \mathrm{n}$, vexatious incidents, or devouring grief.
"On the other hand, he poffeffed a good conftitution, great ftrength and activity. His manners alfo were obliging, and unaffected; he was uniformly modeft and friendly. He was complaifant to ftrangers, kind to his iervants, cheerful with his friends, and, (which was his diftinguirhing characteriftic) he was wonderfully patient in every period and fituation of his life.
c' What magnanimity, what exalted ideas, what penetration, what an undaunted heart, in the midit of misfortunes, as well as uniform circumfpection of conduct, do the events of his life prefent before us! Few have equalled him in courage, fortitude, and perfeverance, in conquering the greateft of difficultics.
" Although two thirds of his life were fpent in but low circumftances; yet did he affume, in changing his fituation, fuch true dignity of manners, that he appeared to be defigned by nature to command. He was diftinguiflied by a becoming gravity, as well as by that perfuafive, that powerful eloquence, which is foneceffary to a commander. He faid little, but when when he did fpeak, it was with particular energy and effect.

[ 253 ]

"He lived abftemious, dreffed plain, and when want or difficulties occurred, in any of his undertakings, he willingly refigned every comfort which his companions could not partake of.
" In his youth he applied, with great affiduity, to the arts and fciences; and had the fatisfaction of excelling moft of his contemporaries in a knowledge of them. But what moft of all demands our love and imitation, was his unfeigned piety, united to the ftricteft integrity, of which, on many occafions, he has given us fuch ftriking inftances. He was rather inclined to anger; but he oppofed this pation by the principles of religion, and weakened it fo much, by continual perfeverance, that he was enabled to meet the greateft infults of his worthlefs oppofers with wonderful meeknefs."

Such was the man whom his contemporaries defpifed, but whofe name fhull defcend to the lateft pofterity, and awaken love and admiration in the hearts of thofe who know how to appreciate virtue like his.
[The Father here ceafed to $\int \mathrm{B}$ ak, and the jittle affembly fat in melancholly filence.]

Z
At

At length each of them wifhed to know if the hiftory did not go any further; the Father anfwered, that muft depend upon the decifion of more than a thoufand other children, to whom he intendel communicating, by the affiftance of the printer, what he had related to them.

Oh, faid Thomas, if they were but all of them acquainted with my opinion.

APPENDIX.

APPENDIX.

-nspo-

TALE XIX.

โHE children obferved, from the manner in which the Father concluded the laft tale, that there mult be fomething more of it-But what that could be, they in vain puzzled themfelves to difcover.

Now you mind, (faid one of them) if Father has not been putting a joke upon us againColumbus will rife from the dead, before we are aware, juft like Robinfon Crufoe-Don't you remember?

No; I don't think fo, (anfwered another) -he looked too ferious not to be in earneft.

Oh, fo he did (cried a third)-And yet he might only be jefting.

At length Eliza crept behind them, and fondling with the Father, faid, Tell us, dear Father, what is to come yet; or we fhall not be able to fleep to-night.

Poor little girl-(anfwered the Father) I thould be very forry to deprive you of your heep.

$$
\text { z } 2 \quad \text { Eliza. }
$$

[ 256 ]

Eliza. Then, Father, you muft tell ws what remains Fath. Muft $I$, indeed?

Eliza. I meant to fay, if you would be fo good.

Fath. Well, then, I will be fo good; call them all together.

Eliza. [Calling aloud] Children! Chil. dren! Do make hafte-Father is going to tell fomething more.

Fath. [To the children, who come running] Eliza thinks you will not have any deep tonight, if I do not tell you the remainder of our ftory; therefore, as I wifh you to enjoy found fleep after $\approx$ bufy day, I fuppofe I muft endeavour to prevent your reftlefsnefi.

All. O , that's charming!
Fred. [Stroaking his Father's chin) Now I will call you my dear, dear Father again.

Some. And mine too; mine too.
Fath. Columbus, children, is really deadbut a perfon fucceeded him, who alfo greatly diftinguifhed himfelf-

Some. Who was he?
Fath. A little patience, and I will tell yous his name.

I muft firft inform you, of what happened after the death of Columbus, before this perfon (whofe name you are not yet acsuainted with) made made his appearance; other wife you will not be able to underftand his hiftory.

[ 257 ]

Fred. Well, now for it.
Father. In the firft place, let us caft a glance back again to Hifpaniola, or St. Domingo, in order to fee how affairs are fituated under the government of Ovando. But, I tremble to direct your attention thither, and have no doubt that you will tremble too, when, merely in paffing, I prefent to you the horrid picture of fhocking barbarities, committed in that unhappy country.

Ovando was no bad governor to the Spaniards, who had fettled in this colony. He made feveral wife regulations, re-eltablifhed his countrymen - by a good management of the mines he enriched the King, his companions, and himfelf, and, what has proved of the greateft advantage to this inland, and to Europe, he iltroduced the cultivation of the fugar cane, the plants of which he procured from the Canary Iflands. It was a happy thought; for how many millions of pounds of fugar have fince been grown in a climate where none had ever before been feen, and how many thoufand people have been fupported by this important a: ticle of commerce.

Thus far all was well; and why fhould the man who had done fo much good, act like a

$$
\text { z. } 3 \text { monfter }
$$

$[258]$

monfter towards the unfortunate natives, fo as to deferve the abhorrence of every mind not deftitute of feeling? Hear how he acted, and then fay yourfelves whether this was not his defert.

Not content with reducing the whole of this inoffenfive people, the juft proprietors of the ifland, to flavery; requiring from them, befides inceffant labour, a yearly tribute, which far exceeded their ability, he regarded them as to many beafts of burden, with which he might do whatever he pleafed. In order, therefore, to ingratiate himfelf with his avaricious companions, he gave to one twenty, to another fifty, to a third a hundred of thefe unforturate Indians; juft as a rich man would give fo many fheep, or pigs, to his fteward; and at the fame time granted permiffion to their owners to employ them in whatever they might think proper, and, in every refpect, to follow their own inclination as to their treatment of them.

So inhumanly were thefe weak, inoffenfive, well-difpofed people treated by their unfeeling mafters, that a great part of them died in the moit lamentable manner; and many others, weary of an exiftence fo wretched, were driven by defpair to feek relief in an untimely end. When Columbus firft difcovered this ifland, the the number of inhabitants was fuppofed to be a million. Now-but about fifteen years after, they could reckon no more than fixty thoufand; fo that, in this fhort fpace of time, not lefs than nine hundred and forty thoufand fouls fell a facrifice to the inhumanity of Europeans.

[ 259 ]

'Ihere was itill a confiderable diftrict of the inland, which, although made tributary, yet retained the privilege of being governed by its own Qucen. 'The name of her Indian Majefty was Anacoana; the was a decided friend of the Europeans, and had always paid the tribute impofed upon her with punctuality.

Unfortunately, fome of Roldan's former mberen"s, unfeeling and bratith people, had fettled in her territories, and notwithlanding thefe worthlefs wretches had been received both by her, and ber fubjects, in the moft friendly manner, yet did they, time after time, exercife upon them the moft fhameful violence, in retur:i for their kindnefs. The Queen was hence compelled to check their infolence; which of courfe gave high offence to this diforderly rabble. In order to revenge themfelves, they decited upon a plan to ovenivinein tinere hofpitable people with deftruction. With this view they went to Ovando, the governor, and informed him that Anacoana was bent upon revolt, and refolved to deliver herfelf in a fhort time time from the Spanifh yoke: They accordingly advifed him to feize upon her perfon, her property, and all her territories, without delay.

[ 260 ]

Ovando had too much penetration not to perceive the malicious defigns of thefe people. He well knew that their information was void of all truth: but as his own rapacious views were directed to the property and poffeffions of the Queen, he, flamelefs outcaft, appeared to believe them, and began to make preparations, as if the cafe had been really as it was fated to him.

But the force which Anacoana poffeffed was far from defpicable. She governed a very extenfive diftrict, and it is faid that more than three hundred caziques were her vaffals.

Char. What are vaffals?
Fath. Don't you know that? Why you are one yourfelf.

Char. I!
Fath. Certainly. Both you and the othen children are all vadfals.

Some. Whofe vaffals are we?
Fath. Mine. Have I not given each of you a piece of land for a garden? Are you not obliged, as an acknowledgment of this, to dig, and weed, and help to water my own garden, whenever I want you? Do I not protect you, fo that no one dare injure your gar: dens, dens, or take any thing out of them: And in cale any of you fhould die, or leave the place, fhould I not have a right to take the land to myfelf again, o: give it to another?

[ 26x ]

Char. Yes.
Fath. I am in fact then your lord, and you are really my vaffals, or tenants. Do you underftand me now, Charles ;

Char. Yes, certainly.
Fath. Queen Anacoana had then, as it was faid, thee hundred vafial caziques, and each of therin was obliged to fuppor her with all his fubjects, as often as required. Ovando knew this. He was afraid, therefore, of coming to an open war with her, for his own forces had been greatly diminifhed by the unhealthinefs of the climate; hence he detconined - $\mathbf{O}$ what a mean, what a defpicable foul! to have recourfe to an unexampled act of treachery.

In purfuance of this defien, he fent word to the Queen that he intented paying her a vifit, accompanied by a retinue fuited to her high ftation, and this with a view of ftrengthening the friendfhip that futfifted between them. Anacoana, devoid of all fufpicion, was charmed at a vifit from people to whom the felt the molt faithful allegiance; and in order to fhew her vifitors every potible mark of honour, the affembled her vaftals, and weat cut,

L 262 〕

out, at the head of a very numerous proceflion, so meet Ovando.

The tration nos appeared! Anacoana re. ceived him according to the cuftom of the country, with finging and dancing, and then led him to her habitation. Here, in the goodnefs of her heart, fhe endeavoured to make his ftay as agreeable as poffible, and to this end ordered a variety of games and exercifes, cuftomary amongft them, to be performed.

Ovando appeared to be remarkably well pleafed with all this, and requefted that he might be permitted to amufe the Queen with fome European diverfions. His offer was thankfully accepted. The next day, the whole court being affembled, with a great number of Indians, whe were very curious to fee what was going forvards, Ovando retired, as he faid, to make the neceffary arrangements for the approaching cntertainment, which was to confift of a tournament.

He foon afterwads appeared at the head of his cavalry, whilft the infantry, in due order, took poffeffion of every avenue leading to the place. He himfelf marched with his attendants in battle array directly to the palace, which confifted of a roof fupported by a number of pillars. The unfufpecting Indians could not enough admire this warlike amufement. But at length length Ovando, by laying his hand upon a crofs which he wore, gave the fignal for the explofion. In a monent every fword was drawn; they fell ferocioufly upon the poor unfufpecting Indians, who bccame panic-ftruck, flew numbers of them, feized the Qucen, and bound the caziques to the pillars. The monfter, Ovando, then ordered the building to fet on fire, and in a fhort time the unhappy r of his cruelty were confumed in the th

[ 263 ]

You are fhocked, my de $\quad$ dren, and well you may; but referve a portion of your Sympathy for the unhappy Queen, whofe fate is ftill more cruel than theirs, whom you have feen fall by the fword, or confumed in the flames. Like an innocent lamb, in the fangs of a wolf, the is now dragged by her executioner to St. Domingo, not with a view to fhew her favor, but rather to prolong her fufferings, and to give his barbarity the femblance of juftice. She was brought to trial, and without the finalleft proof of guilt, merely upon the evidence of the moniters who had fo fhamefully betrayed her, the was condemned to be publickly hanged. And this fhocking fentence was really executed.
[The Father paufed, and the children fighed; -he then proceeded.]

Fear,

IMAGE EVALUATION TEST TARGET (MT-3)

Photographic Sciences

[ $\left.{ }^{266+}\right]$

Fear, aftonifhment, and defpair, now poffeffed the minds of the Indians, and from this time none of them dare attempt to thake off the infufferable yoke impofed upon them by the Spaniards. As long as Ifabella lived, the continued the protectrefis of thefe poor people, and their unmerciful cppreffors found in her fome kind of check; but after her death, thefe helplefs, deferted creatures, were entirely expofed to the unreftrained cruelty of their tyrants. A good prieft, it is true, Bartholomew de las Cafas, was his honourable name, appeared as their advocate, and called loudly for mercy and compaffion upon thefe unfortunate inortals, both in Spain and in the Weft Indies: but what effect cculd the voice of a private individual have, when oppofed by the combined influence of their oppreffors, who were well aware, that the gold they fent from time to time to Spain, would effectually confute his principles, how good fo ever they might be.

The finall number of Indians that remained, diminifhed fo perceptibly, that they were no longer capable of working the mines. Ovando, therefore, propofed to the King, to tranfport the inhabitants of the Lucayo inles-you recollect, I fuppofe, that thefe are the fame which Columbus difcovered on his firft voyage.

[ 265 ]

Nic. $O$ yes; one of which is called Guamahani, the firft which Columbus difcovered. -Here it lies.

Fath. Very right. Well; he propofed that the inhabitants of thefe ifles chould be tranfported to Hifpaniola, in order, as he pretended, that they might the more commodiounly inftruct them in the chriftian religion. The King confented, and Ovando began to confider by what mancurre he could beft draw thefe well-difpofed people into his net. One fuggefted itfelf worthy of his knavih heart.

Some fhips were immediately fitted out, and fent to the Lucayo inles, where the miffionaries, appointed by Ovando, preacies the following falhoods to the too credulous natives.
" Hearken, good people," (faid they) " to the agreeable news we bring you. We are juft come from the land of the departed, where all your anceftors are leading a life-Oh! a life fo happy, that it is not to be defcribed! They have defired us to fetch you to them, that you may partake of their happinefs; and, if you are not fo foolifh as to refufe this invitation, we are willing to take you with us."
'Thus fooke thefe unprincipled deceivers, and the fimple natives, not harbouring the leaft fufpicion of the infamous treachery practifing repon them, without further confideration leaped on board in parties, highly elated with the idea of being unexpectedly united fo foon to thofe they had loft. The number of thefe miferable dupes amounted to more than forty thoufand.

> Aa leaped

[ 266 ]

Scarcely were they arrived at Hifpaniola, than they difcovered the cheat. Numbers of them died with chagrin, and forrow, others Tought every means of relieving themfelves from the claws of thefe tigers: Some were taken up by a Spanifh veffel, as much as tifteen leagues from fhore, paddling towards their native land upon the trunk of a tree; their whole ftock of provifions confifting of a few Calabaffes* filled with frefh water. They were at no great diftance from their own illand, when, to their inexpreffible forrow, they were taken up, and compelled to bend their necks to the yoke of llavery, which, at the rifk of their lives, they had endeavoured to efc

At length, when cunning wouri no longer fucceed, they had recourfe to compulfion, and,

* Calabafs is the fruit of a tree which grows in the Weft Indies. It refembles a very large gourd; its Skin is tough, but beneath that there is a flefhy fubftance, not difagreeable to the tafte. The outfide is ufed for drinking verfels.

$\left[\begin{array}{lll}{[ } & 67\end{array}\right]$

in a few years, thefe populous inands were fo ravaged, that not a fingle native was to be found upon any of them.

Fohn. Oh, what deteftable people! If I had been alive then, I would have moved heaven and earth, but what thefe villains fhould have been punifhed.

Fath. I apprehend, my dear John, that you would have done no more than the good de las Cafas, who alfo endeavoured to move heaven and earth on their account, yet could not effect any thing. Let us, therefore, rather return thanks to God, that we live at a time when fuch enormities are not practifed.

De las Cafas tried every public means for the relief of thefe wretched beings; but in vain. His zeal at length fo far blinded his underfanding, that he fixed upon a plan for relieving the Americans, whofe caufe he had efpoufed; the execution of which involved the deftruction of another fpecies of the human race. He advifed, that they fhould purchafe negroes from the coaft of Africa, who were much ftronger than the Americans, and that thefe fhould perform the moft laborious part of the work in the mines. The advice was approved of, and from this time commenced that inhuman traffic, the flave trade, which, to the prefent day, cofts yearly upwards of forty thoufand of our fellow creatures their liberty, their happinefs, or theit lives. And, notwithftanding this; the Anericans continued, as heretofore, wretched and deplorable flaves.

[^12]
$\left[\begin{array}{lll}268\end{array}\right]$

Enough-perhaps almoft too much for today.

TALE

[ 269 ]

TALE XX.

Thos. SHALL we hear no more about Columbus's brother, Bartholomew?

Fath. 'Tis well that you remind me of him; for it is time to return to the diftreffed family of our deceafed friend.

Columbus's eldeft fon, his name was Diego, continued after the death of his father to requeft the fulfilment of the contract the King had made with him, by which the office of Viceroy of the Weft Indies was conferred on him and his heirs for ever. He requefted however in vain! Ferdinand continued as fufpicious and unjuft towards the fon, as he had been towards the father. No reprefentation, no petition againft fuch conduct, proved of any avail.

Diego at length ventured to enter an action againft the King, in the court which was appointed for adjufting all American difputes, and, to the everlafting praife of this court be it fpoken, the upright judges had fuficient courage to give their decifion againft the King, and in favour of the juft demand of Columbus. They decided that the agreement made with lim ought to be fultilled in. the perfon of his. fon Diego.
A. $\mathfrak{a} 3$.
rage

$[270$ ]

All. 'That's right! That's right!
Fath. The King, however, in all proba-. bility, would have paid but little-attention to this verdict, had not Diego found means to. give his caufe ftill greater weight. Elevated by the juftice of this independent- court, to one of the highert offices within the dominion of:Spain; be paid his addreffes to the daughter of a nobleman of the firft rank, and: influence in the realin. She was niece to the Duke of Alva; nor was any hefitation fhewn in accepting his offer. This powerful family afrailed the King fo inceffantly, with folicitations. for the fulfitment of the fentence pronounced by the court; that he was at length under the neceffity of yielding to them; and of doing juftice to Diego. Ovando, therefore, was recalled, and the whole family of Columbus, trimmphant at laft over envy, and. injuftice, fet fail for Hifpaniola.

Gea. Oh, if old Columbus were but alive!
Fath. What need has his happy fpirit of an earthly recompenfe? In poffeffion of the exalted exalted joys with which God has rewarded him, he now, perhaps, looks down upon the purfuits of mortals as apon a puppet fhow, and: rejoices in the conqueft of his fufferings, without doubt clearly perceiving how good it was for him, that he was perfecuted here below.

[ 27 z ]

Accompanied by his brother, his uncle, and his wife, Diego now departed for Hifpaniola, and refided there in grandeur becoming he fervices his father:had readered Spain. A number of perfons of quality: likewife accompanied him thither. By this means the colony, in a fhort time, acquired a very different afpect. Many; families, now flourifhing in Spanifh America, derive their origin, from fome of thofe who attended Diego.

And now let us fee how the territories of the Spaniards were by degrees extended.

During the government of Ovando, there was one Juan Ponce, who requefted permiffion to fettle a colony upon the ifland Porto Rico, dif! covered by Columbus. His requeft be ng granted, he fet fail, attended by a number of adventurers, who were fafcinated with the idea of ac. quiring immenfe fortunes; for they were informed that this ifland alfo abounded in gold:

The inhabitants refenbled thofe of Hifpaniola, in their peaceable difpofition. They received their viftors, in a friendly manner ftill regarding regarding them as heavenly beings; and one of their caziques, according to the cuftom of the country, as a meinento of eternal: friendihip, named himfelf after the Spanifh cominander, Juan Ponce Aguonaba. But thefe heavenly friends, highly honoured as they were, foon let fall the mafk here alfo, and acte in a manner fo cruel and inhuman, that it $r$ s with difficulty the Indians could bring th felves to believe they were even men. In c er, however, to be fully convinced whether t.ey were mortals or not, the chief of this. nation refolved to try the experiment, with all poffible care, upon one of them firf. With this view he watched his opportunity, and foon found it.

272 I

A young Spaniard, who was probably ftraying about the illand, came to the hut of one of the Indians, ar $t$ requefted a night's lodging. He met with a friendly reception, and was treated with great hofpitality. The next morning his hoft procured him fome Indians to ferve him for guides; to whom he gave the neceffary inftructions.

They came to a river : one of the Indians offered his fervices to convey the young Spaniard acrofs it, and took him on his back. When he was about the middle he made a ftumble, by which means he threw off the youth, and, and, with the affiftance of his companions, held him under the water till there were no figns of life. They then carried the corpfe to the oppofite fhore.

[ 273 ]

Their prejudice, however, refpecting the immortality of the Spaniards was fo ftrong, that they could not yet perfuade themfelves this fuffocated youth was really dead. They therefore afked his pardon for the difafter, which had befallen him, by means of which he had been forced to drink fo much water, and affured him that they had rendered every affiftance in their power. Although the corpfe did not thew the leaft figns of life, they continued with it for three days, continually afking its pardon, in expectation that it would fuddenly come to hife again. At length they became fufficiently convinced of his death, by the putrid finell arifing from the body; they then haft-: ened to bring the joyful news to the cazique, that the Spaniards might certainly be killed.

More he did not wifh to know. He inftantly communicated this difcovery to the other caziques, who all unanimounly refolved to deliver themfelves from their tyrants, by means of force. But what could a naked people do in battle, when oppofed by experienced warriors, with fwords, fire arms, horfes, and dogs? It is true, they fucceeded in murdering a; hundred hundred of them, who were fraggling about the country, before the Spaniards were acquainted with their defign. Soon, however, were they obliged to atone for this with the entire lofs of their liberty, and of all their comforts. Ponce affembled his forces, confifting chiefly of veterans, purfued the Indians into all their hiding places, defeated them wherever lie met them, and made flaves of all who efcaped the fword. Having received a reinforcennent from Spain during thefe engagements with the Indians, their fuperftition led them to believe that the Spaniards which they had killed were come to life again, and that it would of courfe be of no avail to oppofe thofe that were left. Difarmed by this idea, they trembling fubmitted to the heavy yoke of flavery, which was now impofed upon them without any regard to mercy.

$\left[\begin{array}{ll}{[74}\end{array}\right]$

In defcribing this havoc at Porto Rico, the hiftorians of that time fpeak very highly of the fagacity and courage of a large dog, which they call Bazarillo, and which they fay performed many fingular feats; for inftance, he could immediately difcover which of the Indians were friends and which were enemies of his mafter, and that they were more afraid of ten Spaniards, accompanied by this dog, than of a hundred without him. Previous to the commencement mencement of hoftilities, the Indians, in order that he inight not injure them, gave him as much provifions, gold, and flaves, as they did to a Spaniard, which of courfe fell to his mafter. The following anecdote is related, as an inftance of the fagacity of this animal, the truth of which you may believe as far as you can. Some inhuman Spaniards, it is faid, wifhing to fee an old Indian woman who had difpleafed them torn to pieces, fent her away with a letter, and as foon as fhe was departed, they difiniffed Bazarillo after het. He purfued her moft furioully; but the poor old creature fell upon her knees, fhewed him the letter, and faid, O dear, Mr. Dog, I pray your honour fpare me; I ams going to deliver this letter to the chriftians. At thefe words, continues our ferious hiftorian, the dog became inmediately pacified; he finelt her, wagged his tail, and returned to his mafters, without doing her the leaft injury.

[ 275 ]

The happinefs of this people then was in its turn facrificed. Let us fee what occurred in the other parts of this hemifphere.

The difcoveries and conquefts of the Spaniards became more and more extended. I will relate the principal of them in a few words. The firft thing which Diego undertook, in order to add to the poffeffions of his King, was this. He fent a colony to the illand of Cubagua, difcovered by his father, in order to eftablifin a pearl filhery there. Look [pointing to the map] here it lies, near Margarita; not far from the coaft of Cumana.

[ 276 ]

Fred. Do they fifh for pearis?
Fath. 'They are found, my dear Frederick, in certain mufcles and oyfters, in fome parts of the fea, and in fome rivers, and muft of courfe be fetched up from the bottom. It has been fuppofed that they originate in a diforder. to which fhell-firh are fubject, in the fame manner as diforders in the bladder fometimes produce, ftones in the human body. Thus much is certain, that the matter of which thefe. pearls are compofed, is firft a fluid, which comes from the ihell-fifh, and afterwards affumes a hard texture. The pearl filhers, who are generally poor flaves, and are compelled to rifk their lives in the employment, ftop their noftrils and cass with cotton, take a piece of fpunge dipped in oil in their mouths, and then, with a rope tied round their waifts, they dive down to the bottom to fetch up the mufcles. You may readily conceive how many human beings muft lofe their lives in fuch an employment; and yet our ladies, notwithftanding their great fenfibility, do not hefitate to wear the price of thefe poor creatures exiftence, as ornaments to their necks and hands.

[ 277 ]

Diego Columbus thought, that this diving and fwimming would be eafier to the Indians than working in the gold mines. He therefore fent a number of them to Cuba, the coaft of which his father had obferved to be rich in pearis. The advantages that arofe to the King, as well as to Diego, were very great indeed; but the poor Indians fent there foon fell a facrifice to an employment fo unhealthy: and the barrennefs of the ifland, in a chort time, obliged the colony to quit it, in order to fettle in the neighbouring in and, Margarita.

About this time Diego took poffeffion of Jamaica; colonies were fettled there, and the natives experienced the fame cruel treatment as their neighbours of Hifpaniola and Porto Rico.

It was now Cuba's turn. Diego committed the conqueft of this inland to one Velafquez, a man who had diftinguifhed himfelf, on feveral occafions, under Columbus. A great number of perfons, hoping to make their fortunes, joined him in this expedition. Velafquez landed with them on the eaftern point of Cuba.

This diftrict was governed by a cazique named Hatuey, who had fled from flavery at Hifpaniola, and fettled here. This man, a determined enemy of the oppreffors of his country, had long expected a vifit from them, and, B в
in

[ 278 ]

in order to hold himfelf in readinefs to receive them, he employed feveral fpies at Hifpaniola, who were to give him notice of their approach. He was now informed that the expected mifchief was at the door: He immediately called his fubjects and allies together, informed them of the danger with which they were threatened, and exhorted then to maintain their liberty to their laft oreath. They unanimouly pledged themfelves to follow his example.
" "Tis well;" (added Hatuey) "but one thing is ftill neceffary, if our endeavours to keep off thefe tyrants are to fucceed. Do you not know what it is that brings them amongft us? It is to fetch their God. And as you are ignorant what their God is, I will tell youIt is this."

In faying thefe words he pointed to a balket full of gold; and affured them, that this worthlefs metal was the God for which the chriftians ventured every thing, and on account of which they wifhed now to take poffeffion of their illand. "Let us haften" (faid he) " to pay homage to this idol, fo that we may fecure its protection." 'They immediately began to fing and dance round the balket. This devout exercife, according to the cuftom of the country, continued until late in the night, when wh au the people, either from 'fatigne or init cation, gradually retired.

[ 279 ]

The following day Hatuey affembled his Indians again, and obferved to them, that notwithftanding the honour they had paid the idol of the Spaniards, he fill thought they would not be fafe folong as it remained upon the illand. "In vain" (faid he) "will you endeavour to conceal it; even were you to Jwallow it, they would cut you open, and tear out your entrails in fearch of it. Arife, therefore, let us caft it to the bottom of the fea, fo that no veftiges of it may be found." This advice was inftantly followed; every one haftened to fetch what gold he had, and all that could be found was thrown into the fea.

Notwithftanding this, however, they foon difcovered the Spanifh flag waving upon their coaft. Hatuey courageounly advanced to receive them; they came to battle; the army of the unfortunate Indian chief took to flight, after a very chort refiftance; he himfelf was taken prifoner, and, as an example to the other caziques, was condemned-to be burnt alive.

Some. O, what Thocking monfters!
Fath. He was already bound to the ftake, when a Francifcan Monk approached him, in order to defcribe to him heaven, the abode of the happy hereafter. "Are there any Spaniards in that happy place?" afked the cazique. Certainly, anfwered the monk;' but only thofe that are good. "'The beft of them are good for nothing," (added Hatuey) 'I do not wifh to go to a place where I muft expect to meet with onc of them !!"

[ 280 ]

This dreadful inftance of feverity fo alarmed all the natives of Cuba, that they no more thought of making any further refiftance, but at once fubmitted to the Spanifh yoke. Thus did the Spaniards, in the courfe of a few days, conquer one of the largeft and richeft iflands in the world, without the lois of a fingle man.

About this time, alfo, there were feveral voyages made to the continentdifeovered by Co lumbus, where they began to eftablifh colonies, and fubject the natives to their government; however, of this I thall tell you more hereafter.

But one other remarkable event, which occurred at this period, I muft interweave into my ftory. Ponce, the conqueror of Porto Rico, had heard a report from one of thefe fimple people, according to which, upon a neighbouring ifland, there was a wonder-working well, whofe waters had the fingular property of making thofe who bathed in them young again. Abfurd as this tale was, it however excited the curiofity of the credulous Ponce, and induced him to go in fearch of it.

With

[28: ]

t $282{ }^{1}$

Some. [winking at each other] Ah! now we thall have it.

Peter. O, quick, dear father. Who was $i_{1}$

Cortes! anfwered the Father-and here the tale ended.

[^0]:    * Robertfon's Hiftory of America.
    deferted

[^1]:    - Profeffor Junker, in Paris.

[^2]:    * Five thoufand four hundred pounds. T.

[^3]:    * Meridies in Latin. T.
    F. 3

    Both.

[^4]:    * Equal to $69 \frac{1}{2}$ Englifa miles. T.

[^5]:    * This conduct was unworthy of Columbus, and I could wifh my young readers, always to bear in mind, that deceit in every cafe is wrong, and never can be harmlers, $T$.

[^6]:    - Meerkoben-I am not certain whether I have rendered this word right or not. Adelung has not got it in his Dictionary. $\cdot T$.

[^7]:    * Kitchin's map of the Weft Indies, from Robertfon's Hiftory of famerica; the fame as here annexed.

[^8]:    * The caffada is a plant four feet high, with broad leaves, and a thick ftem. Its root is nearly in the form of a turnip, about fix inches in diameter. If eaten raw, it is unpleafant to the tafte, and unwholefome; but, when mathed, a mealy fubftance may be extracted from it, which, being dried in the fun, or by the fine, affords atolerably pleakant food.

[^9]:    - Others fay l.e was a merchant from Florance.

[^10]:    - Fine Harbour.

[^11]:    - Some are from twenty to thirty feet long.

[^12]:    A. 22
    tures

