HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 15, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCH—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN TORONTO "EVENING TELEGRAM"

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday in the house I asked the following question about the embargo on Canadian cattle to the United States—and I may say that the question has been on the order paper since Tuesday, June 8:

1. Has any action been taken as announced by the Minister of Agriculture last week in south Ontario that the cattle embargo is soon to be removed to allow Canadian cattle to enter the United States?

2. If so, will such action increase the cost of meat to citizens for home consumption in Canada?

3. Has any action been taken by order in council?

The answer I received yesterday was as follows:

Mr. McCubbin:

1. No action yet taken.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

I wish to call the attention of the house to a garbled report of this question and answer on a serious problem which appeared in the Toronto Evening Telegram of yesterday, June 14. Several members of the house asked a similar question on the orders of the day yesterday. I should like a correction to be made in the record accordingly.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATION—PROVISIONS AS TO RETURN OF CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, to provide for the return to a public official or his widow, under certain circumstances, contributions made under such act; to give a right to a public official to elect not to become a contributor under the act and to provide that withdrawal allowances and gratuities shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

AMMONIUM NITRATE

REFERENCE TO QUESTION DROPPED FROM ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when question No. 14 on yesterday's order paper, standing in the name of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield), was called, I requested in his absence that the question stand, but it has been dropped. I ask that it be reinstated.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noted the remarks made by the hon. gentleman.

COST OF LIVING

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENTAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the government whether it would welcome a report from the prices committee, and if so, and the committee brought in a report, whether the government would set aside ample time for its discussion. The Minister of Finance in reply said that he would draw the question to the attention of the leader of the house. Is the Prime Minister in a position to make a statement now?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that as to the time to be allotted to particular measures I think we should seek to accommodate each other, but I do not wish to make too many commitments in advance. A good deal will depend upon the progress we make in expediting the business of the house. I do not wish to make any commitments without regard to all sides of the situation, so far as these can be ascertained.

THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

CONGRATULATIONS TO DR. BEAUCHESNE ON HIS BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the house that today is the birthday of our Clerk, Doctor Beauchesne, who has been in office for a longer term than any other clerk in any parliament in the British empire. He is modest and unassuming. He is the light that shines behind the Chair. He is popular with all the members, and I am sure that my colleagues will join with me in wishing him a happy birthday and all sorts of good things on this day when he became seventy-two years young.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Clerk of the House will appreciate, from the applause which greeted the remarks of my hon. friend, that we are all pleased to have this opportunity of extending best wishes to him on his birthday anniversary and wishing him very many happy returns of the day.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is one time when I think all sides of the house can follow the lead of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot); I am sorry that we cannot do it more often. May I, on behalf of my colleagues, join with those who have spoken in extending to the Clerk of the House our congratulations, our best wishes, and our hope that he may continue in his present office for many years to come.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I am very glad to be able to associate the members of this group with other hon. members in congratulations to the Clerk of the House and in the good wishes which have been extended to him.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, there has developed among men in our time a sort of notion that men lose their efficiency after they get to be about forty years of age. I rejoice that our Clerk, Doctor Beauchesne, has proved by a splendid example that this notion is completely fallacious. My impression is that Doctor Beauchesne has grown more efficient with the years. I am happy to be able to associate the Social Credit group with the good wishes that have been extended to him. I feel disposed to put into his mouth certain words of Browning in this connection. They are:

Grow old along with me!
The best is yet to be,
The last of life, for which the first was made.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

TRANSPORT BOARD

JUDGE OF EXCHEQUER COURT TO BE CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946, to authorize a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada to hold the office of chief commissioner of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada at a salary of fifteen thousand dollars per annum less any salary received by him as a judge of the exchequer court; and to provide further that the exchequer court shall consist of the president and four puisne judges (in lieu of three), the salary of the puisne judges being twelve thousand dollars per annum.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the minister a few questions on this amendment to the Judges Act, the Railway Act and the Exchequer Court Act. Does it interfere with the sittings of board of transport commissioners to be held in the Toronto city hall a week from today, at ten o'clock, to hear the application in connection with the Jones avenue crossing, described by a former commissioner as one of the most dangerous in Canada, the accident which took place on Sunday, and many other matters?

I notice that the exchequer court is to be increased to five judges, one of whom is to preside over the board of transport commissioners in the place of the present chief commissioner. I want to find out if the cases before this court are to be conducted from the exchequer court point of view. For example, some men with no experience have been appointed to this court. I understand that drastic changes are being proposed in the present Railway Act and in the Judges Act. The Judges Act should have been revised by a legal committee long ago. It is very largely obsolete.

With regard to the exchequer court, I am surprised at some of its recent decisions, and I do not see how the country is going to stand some of them. We have had several matters in our city concerning level crossings, serious accidents, and so on. People have been killed but we cannot get a hearing. The Railway Act sets out the powers, the functions and the duties of the board of railway commissioners, now called the board of transport commissioners. A valuable report and survey on railways was made in 1917 setting out what the functions of the transport board should be. There should be no more political rate structures in this country. The report of the royal commission of 1917 said that any such proposals should be submitted to the board of transport commissioners. Yesterday we had a discussion on the Canadian National Railways. If you ask me, this is another measure bringing closer the time when there will be no regulation whatever of the steam railways in this country. If this is the only measure of the kind that we are to have during the present session, we shall have no regulation of the steam roads in this country, particularly if we permit a political rate structure to be made by changes in three statutes. If that comes about we shall have one province against another. If that is done you might just as well abolish the board of transport commissioners.

I only hope that the action being taken now will not prevent the present board from presiding over the cases to be heard a week from today in Toronto. In the accident which took place last Sunday, four freight cars might have fallen on top of streetcars, and might have produced pain and suffering and loss. If we create a board of four judges for this exchequer court I do not see how they are going to carry out their duties. Here we are at the 106th day of the session. The rate structure has been before the country for over a year. We are now changing the whole set-up of the board at this late date in the session. All we are doing now is to provide that, in the future, railway rates shall be left very largely to political influence. We shall have a political rate structure. Under the present Railway Act the onus is on the government of the day so long as they are the government of the day, because if the rate structure proposed by the transport board two or three months ago was wrong, there is the right of appeal by the seven provinces to the governor in council.

I fail to see the necessity for the appointment of a judge of the exchequer court as head of the board of transport commissioners. If that is done he will not have any time to attend to his duties on the exchequer court. If you ask me, the present exchequer court, with its travelling expenses around the country, is just spending money like water.

These are my objections to the measure. In my opinion the present minister, who is the attorney general, has done a great deal of good work since he has been Minister of Justice and Attorney General. I exempt him from any criticism when I deal with this proposed measure. I am sorry to see that at this late date changes are being made in all these acts. It is not in the public interest that it should be done, either now or in the future.

Mr. FLEMING: There are some views I should like to express on this resolution. Is it the intention of the minister to make an explanatory statement now? If so, I shall be glad to wait until he has done so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will make a statement. I hoped that the resolution would pass and that the discussion would take place on the bill, but I am quite prepared to make a brief statement on the resolution.

As the Prime Minister announced to the house a few days ago, a change is being made, in the acts referred to in the resolution, as the result of the prospective early retirement of the present chairman of the board of transport commissioners. The work of the board of transport commissioners will be extremely important for some time to come. A reference of large dimensions has been made to the board with respect to equalization of freight rates in Canada and possible changes in the freight rate structure. The position of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners will be of very great importance.

In surveying the scene, we thought that Mr. Justice Archibald, who is a judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, had in large measure the qualifications for chief commissioner. He was chairman of the national war labour board for some years during the war, and discharged his duties there with great acceptability to the public. He has a capacity for hard work, and he has the judicial temperament. It is unreasonable to ask a judge of one of the superior courts to resign his position and become the head of the board of transport commissioners, forfeiting as he would, in the absence of some change in the legislation, important pension privileges as well as life tenure of office. To overcome these difficulties we thought it would be appropriate to provide for the appointment of Mr. Justice Archibald to the Exchequer Court of Canada. His tenure of office is shortened somewhat. The limit there is seventy-five years of age, as against life tenure in the superior courts. That, however, is perhaps not a serious feature from the standpoint of the judge who is appointed, but his appointment to the Exchequer Court of Canada enables him to retain his present pension privileges, which I think he should be allowed to retain if he is to assume the arduous duties of this important position.

The salary of $15,000 for the position is not excessive when the salaries of comparable positions, indeed of some less important positions, are considered. We think that the salary is completely justified.

The effect of this legislation is that the ten-year tenure of office on the board of transport commissioners remains unchanged. Mr. Justice Archibald will become chief commissioner of the board, but only for a ten-year period. He will be eligible for reappointment at the end of that ten-year period, but whether or not he is reappointed is a matter for the future to disclose. If he ceases to be chief commissioner at the end of this period, he takes up his duties as a judge of the exchequer court.

The position he is taking as chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners is almost wholly a judicial one, and I cannot imagine anything in the duties of the position that would unfit him for the discharge of his duties as an exchequer court judge at the end of his tenure of office as chief commissioner. Indeed, there is much in the experience which a commissioner gains on the transport board that would be of benefit to him in the Exchequer Court of Canada. Of necessity he must travel all over the country; he is dealing judicially with a large number of transactions which affect the financial or economic interests of people in all parts of Canada, and the work seems to be to some extent along the line of the work of a judge of the exchequer court.

The more the idea was explored, the more unobjectionable this solution seemed to be. It seemed to answer the question. It means that there will be one more exchequer court judge. If the work of the exchequer court continues to increase, it may very well be that in any event there ought to be another exchequer court judge. A great many cases are in arrears in the exchequer court at the present time. That situation, however, is not being met by this appointment, because Mr. Justice Archibald will devote his whole time to his duties as chief commissioner during his occupancy of that office.

Mr. KNOWLES: And if he goes back to the exchequer court, another judge will come to this position.

Mr. ILSLEY: If he goes back to the exchequer court we have to obtain the services of another exchequer court judge as head of the transport board. We keep the office of head of the transport board on the level of an exchequer court judge instead of, as now, on a somewhat different level. The qualifications are high. At the present time no one can be appointed chief commissioner unless he has had ten years' experience at the bar of Canada. He may, at the moment, be a judge, but he cannot continue in that capacity. This legislation enables him to continue to be a judge. What this legislation does is to make it possible to get a competent judge to assume these duties, and this would be practically impossible under the existing legislation.

Mr. FLEMING: The proposal made by this resolution has all the earmarks of legislation intended to meet a particular case, to make it possible to induce Mr. Justice Archibald to accept the appointment of chief commissioner. That, according to the proposal of the Minister of Justice, will involve the amendment of no fewer than three statutes. When we start amending general statutes to meet particular cases I submit we are short-sighted. Situations may arise that we may later regret.

It is a matter of regret that the government saw fit to announce the intended appointment before parliament has even opened up the way by enactment of legislation to make the appointment possible. Announcements of that kind may prejudice discussion. Under such circumstances no one wishes to say anything that might seem to suggest lack of confidence in the proposed appointment. So far as Mr. Justice Archibald is concerned, what I have to say about this measure is said without the slightest reflection upon him or upon his fitness for the important position of chief commissioner. But there are several aspects of the matter that make me feel that the expedient proposed by the Minister of Justice is not a sound one. It will involve the creation of a number of anomalies. Within the board itself, it means that appointment to the office of chief commissioner is to be restricted to selection from the panel of judges in the exchequer court. To that extent it represents a considerable narrowing of the field from which future chief commissioners may be selected, and I think it is unwise to confine the field within such proportions. The time may come when there will not be on the panel of the exchequer court a judge who has the qualifications required to discharge the functions of chief commissioner, and I think it is a mistake for us now to enact legislation that will have the effect of narrowing so greatly the field of choice.

Another anomaly which will be created has to do with the relative status of members of the transport board. At the present time the terms are uniform, ten years. The Minister of Justice has indicated that the appointment of chief commissioner will continue to be for a ten-year period. Nevertheless this legislation will result in discrimination among the different members of the board. It proposes that the chief commissioner shall have life tenure as a judge. As a judge he has security to which he can always return at the conclusion of his ten-year term as chief commissioner

This procedure is not open to the other commissioners. I do not see why that discrimination should be practised within the board of transport commissioners. The ten-year term, on the whole, has worked satisfactorily now for forty years and more.

In the office of the chief commissioner of the railway board, or the transport board as it is now called, this country has enjoyed the benefit of the services of some very distinguished men. Some of the jurisprudence of the board has been laid down in the past by chief commissioners who were giants in stature. Not so many years ago a distinguished statesman of this country said that the position of chief commissioner of the board of railway commissioners, as it was then, was the most important and most powerful position in Canada outside the government itself.

A third anomaly is to be created by this legislation. It is an anomaly within the exchequer court itself. There is to be on the panel of judges of the exchequer court a member who is in the court but not of the court. He is to be on a different salary from that received by the judges of the court. Under this measure he is being appointed not for the purpose of taking his place on the exchequer court, but simply to qualify under the new legislation for appointment as chief commissioner. With all respect, I do not think that is the proper way to treat the exchequer court. If there is need of more judges to carry on the business of that court, they should be appointed for that purpose. But why should we resort to this device of appointing an additional member of the court who is never expected to sit in the court? There is no suggestion that he should sit in the court. As a matter of fact his duties as chief commissioner will occupy his time fully and will keep him extremely busy. We have this curious situation, in which the chief commissioner will be a member of the exchequer court, will never sit in the court, and yet will draw a higher salary than is received by the other members of the exchequer court who are discharging exclusively their duties as exchequer court judges.

I do not think that the device proposed by the Minister of Justice to take care of the present situation in order to open the way for the appointment of Mr. Justice Archibald as chief commissioner is a sound one. The minister ought to find some other way of inducing Mr. Justice Archibald, if he is to be the new commissioner, to accept this appointment. I submit that he certainly should not now bring in amendments to no fewer than three statutes, which amendments will introduce anomalies into each of them. That is a short-sighted method of accomplishing the end that the government has in mind.

I recall that we had a comparable situation not long ago when a member of the supreme court of Saskatchewan was appointed to the diplomatic service and, although not discharging his judicial functions, for some years held a diplomatic office. An amendment was proposed to the Judges Act to effect this result. If the present situation is unique and so unusual that it is proposed to amend no fewer than three statutes, the case certainly should be reviewed and some other method devised. If we are to treat the statutes of parliament in this way; if we are to assume that they are open to frequent amendments to meet the exigencies of particular cases, I suggest that we are embarking on an entirely wrong course.

I repeat that in what I have said there is no intention to make the slightest reflection upon the suitability of Mr. Justice Archibald for appointment as chief commissioner. What I am criticizing is the method to which the government is resorting for the purpose of offering Mr. Justice Archibald sufficient inducement to accept this important office. I suggest to the minister that some other method be found in order to provide that inducement; and I suggest that the method adopted should not be one which seeks to introduce amendments to three general statutes in order to meet the exigencies of a particular case.

Mr. HANSELL: I rise, Mr. Chairman, not particularly to discuss the legal aspects of the resolution, because I see in it something for the constitutional lawyers to fight about, and I am not a constitutional lawyer. At the moment I wish to discuss what I believe to be a vital principle involved in the manner in which the resolution has been introduced. I refer to the fact that when the Prime Minister the other day made his announcement that certain changes were to be made, he announced as well the resignation of the present chairman of the board of transport commissioners and the acceptance of the position by Mr. Justice Archibald. This procedure appears to me to be a direct flouting of the principles of parliamentary government. I do not know whether hon. members will see the principle in the same light as I do. But when the Prime Minister stated that it was the intention of the government to bring down this legislation, he announced that Colonel Cross, the chairman of the board, had resigned, and that Mr. Justice Archibald had been approached and asked if he would accept the office of chairman of the newly-constituted transport board.

Why is it that the Prime Minister announced the legislation, the resignation, and the appointment before he knew whether or not the legislation would be acceptable to this parliament? I know, of course, the answer may be that that is the way of constitutional government works. Well, if that is the way our constitutional government works, it does not work properly. It is a negation of parliamentary democracy. The Prime Minister over and over again has been an exponent of what he has termed our free institutions, the institution of a free parliament. But his actions seem to belie his words. The Good Book says, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth"; the Prime Minister, however, must be reading from some modern version that I have not yet read. He believes in not letting what you say know what you have already done.

I have watched this trend over the years, particularly since I have been sitting in this house. It seems to me that there has been a steady move to push parliament into the position of a rubber stamp. We do not like that. I had not been sitting here more than a couple of years when one of my colleagues said to me, "What is the use? We cannot do anything here". It would appear that we cannot, that everything is cut and dried. The Prime Minister comes along and says, "Now boys, this is what we have done; legislation will be introduced so that you can verify it". So we meet down here and our machine politics are of such a nature that men vote as yes men. That is about the situation.

I rise simply to object on principle. I am not objecting to the reconstitution of the board. I think the government has thought the matter pretty well through, and I am not objecting on those grounds. But the Prime Minister did not even have, shall I say, the courtesy to introduce the measure without saying anything about resignations or appointments. What he should have done was to let parliament approve this and then seek to fill the appointments. He may have had in the back of his mind the person he wanted to do the job; he may have had everything arranged, but the way this has been done was simply a negation of democracy and the flouting of our free parliamentary institutions.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, no doubt when the Minister of Justice replies to the hon. member for Macleod he will point out that when the Prime Minister made his statement on June 8 he merely said that the government intended to accept Colonel Cross' resignation after this legislation had been passed, and that it was merely the intention, subsequent to the enactment of this legislation, to appoint Mr. Justice Archibald to the exchequer court and then as chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that mind reading, or is the hon. member the minister's parliamentary assistant?

Mr. KNOWLES: I think my hon. friend realizes that that is precisely the sort of reply the Minister of Justice would make. He might also point out that if the Prime Minister had not made this announcement in advance, hon. members on this side would probably be questioning the government now as to what their intentions were.

Mr. ILSLEY: Hear, hear; that is certainly true.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is probably true. I might be one of those who would be asking what those intentions were. But even with the best face that can be put on the course the government has taken, which is what I have tried to give, I think there is merit in the objections which have been put by the hon. member for Macleod. If this happened only once, the objection might seem technical, but the hon. member for Macleod is right; we go through session after session feeling that we are called upon just to rubber-stamp decisions made in advance and announced in advance by the government.

I shall not rehash the other instance we had this session, or the instances in previous sessions, because they are vivid in the memories of hon. members. But I do think that the Minister of Justice and the other ministers should not simply be offended by the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Macleod. Rather, out of the interest which I am sure they have in parliamentary democracy they should think these matters over a little more carefully.

The Minister of Justice said "hear, hear," to a remark I made a moment ago. I suggest that what I referred to at that moment would have been a better course than the course that has been followed. At least the announcement of the government's intentions might have waited until we had the bill before us, until private members were asking the government how it intended to implement the proposed legislation.

This may seem of small importance to ministers who have been in power for a long time, but it looms large in the experience of those of us who are private members and also in the thinking of Canadian people generally. I am trying to keep my voice moderate about this. I have tried to indicate, to such an extent that the hon. member for Lake Centre thought I was on the other side of the question, that there is some argument on the other side. I ask the government to recognize that we still have parliamentary democracy, and that more attention should be paid to the rights, and the courtesies, if you will, due to private members in this house.

I should like to make a comment on the substance of the legislation. I do not share the objection that is sometimes made to the use of judges for functions other than those restricted to the court room. I believe there is something to be said for the use of men holding the objective position that judges hold in handling matters which are outside of our courts and quasi-judicial. Organized labour is most grateful for the contribution that has been made to the building up of labour jurisprudence through the use of judges in that field. I believe there is merit in the government's suggestion that the matter of freight rates is so close to being judicial that it would be a good idea to have a judge as chairman of that board.

I felt that the best that could be said for the minister's presentation of the case this morning was to note his frankness in admitting that this legislation is an arrangement to make it possible to get a judge for this position.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps the minister is trying to steal the thunder of some of the opposition. Perhaps the minister was afraid that somebody would call it a device, but at any rate he stated frankly that the purpose of this legislation was to make it possible to induce a judge to leave the bench and take on this job, which is limited to a period of ten years. The device is ingenious and novel, but there is one suggestion I should like to make to the minister. Having admitted, first of all, that is was a special arrangement, the minister then said that it seemed to the government that there was a relationship between the duties of the exchequer court and the duties of the board of transport commissioners. I gathered the minister felt that a judge who had had exchequer court experience would be better qualified for this work than judges of other courts. It may be that under present circumstances Mr. Justice Archibald strikes the government as the man best suited for the position. But in future—and I should hope this might be incorporated in the legislation—if the basis of this legislation is that there is some relationship between exchequer court work and the work of the board of transport commissioners, should it not be arranged that the chairman of that board be chosen from among the judges of the exchequer court who have had some experience in that court?

As the legislation now stands the door is left open for the hon. member for Eglinton to make the kind of remarks he did make this morning, that the proposed bill permits the appointment of a judge from some other court to the exchequer court for the express purpose of going immediately to the chairmanship of the board of transport commissioners. I wonder if the minister gave any thought to the suggestion that the choice be made from among those who have first served two, three or five years, if you will, in the exchequer court. That, I believe, would remove some of the element of this being a device, and would carry out the suggestion the minister made, namely, that there is a relationship between the kind of work dealt with in the exchequer court and the work done here. I say the idea itself seems to have merit but, the minister himself having admitted that it is an arrangement, perhaps he would consider this latter point a little further.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I rise not for the purpose of making a speech on behalf of the Minister of Justice, but to make one or two comments as to what was said by the hon. member for Macleod, as well as one or two on my own behalf.

It seems to me that however good an answer there may be, in the actual words used by the Prime Minister, to the criticism made by the hon. member for Macleod, in substance it is sound and just. It seems to me that we are choosing the very worst time to lessen the dignity and authority of parliamentary institutions, and by that I mean a time when people, from our point of view wicked people, are trying in almost every way to undermine them.

I shall not labour the point. But I repeat what has been said so often, that it seems inevitable that when people have held power many years, certain things happen to them. Apparently they find it impossible to act in the way they would have acted when power was not so important to them. In some ways they become above themselves.

The other thing I wish to say is this. It seems to me there is an incidental disadvantage in what has been done in that we have the name of a certain gentleman announced as the person who is to be appointed if this legislation is passed. Therefore we cannot discuss the matter in as detached a manner, on its merits, as we should be able to do; because we already have the name of that man injected into the situation.

I am not going to say anything more about the principle of the use of judges. In my view there is much to be said against it; obviously there is much to be said for it; therefore I shall not take the time of the committee in a discussion of that point. I would say however that I believe in substance what the hon. member for Macleod said is true; and the Minister of Justice, who in this House of Commons has acquired a reputation for sincerity and a readiness to speak his own mind, should state his position clearly. I shall be interested to hear what he has to say.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in acting this way we are setting what may turn out to be an unfortunate precedent from which we can escape only by another amendment to the act at a later time. If the chairman of the board of transport commissioners is appointed in this manner, as a judge of the exchequer court, then in ten years time, when his term of office as chairman is completed, we shall have to add another judge to the exchequer court in order to find a new chairman for the board; and so we shall have to go on adding to the number of judges on the court. The deaths of judges already serving may not coincide with the expiration of terms of office of chairmen of the board. In my view it is undesirable to narrow the choice of persons to fill the office by requiring that they must be suitable for and in fact appointed to the Exchequer Court of Canada before they can be chairman of the board.

It seems to me this is too much like writing legislation to suit the personality or qualifications of one individual the government may have in mind to appoint to a certain position. It is a dangerous trend to follow, and a dangerous principle to introduce. In addition we are narrowing too much the freedom of choosing suitable persons to be chairmen of the board in the future.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how long the committee would like to carry on this discussion, but I should like to say something about the charge that this method of procedure undermines parliamentary institutions.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, the Prime Minister was correct in the position he took at the time of his announcement to the house. Colonel Cross' resignation is not to take effect unless this measure passes. Mr. Justice Archibald is still a judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, and will not resign from that court until this measure passes. He will not be appointed as chief commissioner of the board, or to the Exchequer Court of Canada, unless this measure passes. This was all made clear.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

The house has the matter in its own hands. I think it would be a pity if this proposed legislation were defeated. I do not think it will be; but parliament has it in its power to defeat it.

No action has been taken by the government except to make the necessary arrangements with Colonel Cross and Mr. Justice Archibald. If we had brought this legislation before the house without any reference to what are called personalities, without any reference to names or persons, the air would have been filled with rumours, and the newspapers would have been full of guesses as to what we were trying to do. The present chairman of the board would have been placed in an invidious position, as would also the appointee. We would have heard many appeals in the house asking the government to be frank, and to tell the House of Commons what its intentions were and what it was trying to do. We would have been obliged to do it. This was one arrangement which had to be announced clearly, fully and frankly in advance. I could not come before the house and suggest this legislation without showing what we were attempting to do.

My justification for the proposal I can put on narrow and clear ground. The present Railway Act provides that a judge may be appointed as a member of the board of transport commissioners. This legislation makes it possible for us to get a judge. Without some legislation of the kind it would be impossible for us to do so. At a time when salary ranges were altogether different and the relationship between them was different, this was not so. But today it is unreasonable to expect a superior court judge to abandon a position in which he has life tenure, to abandon all his pension privileges for himself and his wife, to accept a position with only a ten-year tenure of office, with not so much difference in salary, and with pension privileges which are negligible as compared with those enjoyed by a judge. If therefore we were to get a judge we had to make some change in the legislation.

Hon. members say: "Take some other method; do it in some other way". What other way? I considered first changing the tenure of the board chairman to a life tenure. But that would have serious disadvantages. The hon. member for Eglinton himself said that he thought the ten-year tenure was one which should be adhered to, instead of making the appointment of the chief commissioner a lifetime job. You may not want him for life. It is a little different from an ordinary judicial appointment. So we think we should stick to ten years for the chairman, as for the other members of the board. It might be said that we could put this salary away up so that a judge would consent to take a ten-year appointment because he could afford to do it, since he was being paid so much money while he was there. I do not think that plan would work, nor do I think it would be acceptable to the house.

It might be said that we should amend the superannuation act to make special provision for this particular class of official. That would involve special legislation. All things considered we thought that this plan had fewer disadvantages than any practicable alternative. It may be possible for us to get a judge. The Railway Act contemplated the obtaining of judges for these eminently judicial positions. The board of transport commissioners is a court of record. Its work is not the same as that of the exchequer court, but it is along the same line. I do not mean that only persons with experience as exchequer court judges should be appointed, but rather persons who are qualified to be exchequer court judges.

Another thing we considered was whether we should say that only an exchequer court judge may be chief commissioner, or that the chief commissioner may be an exchequer court judge.

Mr. HACKETT: If the minister will permit a question, when was the legislation passed making it possible for a judge to be appointed to the board?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is in the section dealing with the chief commissioner. I take it for granted that it was there from the beginning. The act was passed, if I remember correctly, in 1903.

Mr. HACKETT: I believe that judges in the past have always resigned their judicial positions upon accepting appointment to the board.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. There is a provision in the Judges Act, and I think also in the Exchequer Court Act. The point I am making is perhaps a little obscure, but the act contemplated the possibility of appointing judges, not those who would continue to be judges, but judges who were qualified for an appointment of this kind. This legislation makes it possible for us to get a judge. Otherwise it would not be possible.

Mr. POULIOT: Why not as an alternative appoint a retired judge who is physically and mentally fit?

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on one aspect of this question. I have spoken to this point on many occasions, and with increasing conviction and ever-growing sadness as I have contemplated the inroads upon the reputation of the bench and the undermining of the judiciary by calling upon its members to perform duties and functions which are not inherent to the high office which is theirs. If it be desired to appoint a judge to the board of transport commissioners, let him cease to be a judge. That is what has happened in the past. I can see no objection to taking for this office a man with judicial experience but I can see every objection of his continuing to be a judge when occupying an office which is subject to all the influence and all the machinations and all the goings and comings to which the board of transport commissioners is subject. If anybody doubts my word, let him cast his mind backward just a few weeks and think of the things that were said in this house and the things that were done with regard to the freight rates decision, and think of the influences that were brought to bear upon the board and upon the government, and upon the government with regard to the board.

The government is seeking to bring to the solution of this particular difficulty the high office of the judiciary, and by so doing it is exposing that institution to great damage and disrespect. It is not necessary that a judge continue to hold judicial office to preside over the board of transport commissioners. If it is sought to appoint a judge to that position, it is solely for the purpose of bringing to the solution of the difficult political issues which arise out of rate-making the dignity of the judiciary and the great respect which the Canadian people have for that institution. The high and well-deserved reputation of the Canadian judiciary is being exploited to solve a political difficulty. I do not like to use harsh language. Mr. Chairman; I do not like to make statements that are unnecessarily blunt. But I can mention several instances, and give details of time and names, within the life of this parliament which have brought no honour to the judiciary, and in which members of the judiciary have been used and exploited for political purposes. It is time that that practice cease.

I think I know the right hon. gentleman who presides over the destinies of the Department of Justice, and I believe that these practices must be as repugnant to him as they are to me. There comes a time when other considerations should outweigh political advantage. Everybody knows of the problems that have arisen out of the rates question. It is a difficult question; it is one which should rest exclusively with the board of transport commissioners. Unfortunately it has got beyond the bounds of that jurisdiction and has invaded the realm of politics, and we are now asked to countenance the appointment of a judge to find a solution to this political problem. I make bold to suggest that the price to be paid for such a solution is too high. The position of the judiciary is too important to be impaired by the exigencies of any political situation. There is no other reason for the present proposal than that of bringing to a political difficulty the appointment of a judge as presiding officer over the tribunal which would have to deal with that difficulty.

In the past, judges have been appointed to the board of transport commissioners and to the bodies which preceded it. I think that the first and one of the most famous of its presiding officers was Judge Mabee; but the moment he accepted that office he ceased to be a judge. If anybody will tell me why a member of the board of transport commissioners should continue to be a judge when he has become a member of the board of transport commissioners—unless it be to carry into his new calling the benefit of his high judicial reputation; unless it be to bring to that office the respect and ascendency of the bench—I fail to see it. Solely out of respect for the bench, and solely for the purpose of maintaining and preserving one of Canada's rarest treasures which she has inherited from the old land—where judges do not accept offices of this kind; where it would not be tolerated that they accept such offices—I ask that no judge, however able, be made a member of this board. There is no question about the ability and the integrity of the gentleman whose name is mentioned here. He is a man of highest ability, a man for whom everybody has the greatest respect, and there is no reason why he should not enter upon a new field of activity on his own merits without carrying into it the judicial ermine in the hope that it will cover up some of the partisan difficulties that arise out of the very nature of the questions which go before the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply to my hon. friend immediately, because I disagree with him. He imputed views to me which I do not hold. The hon. member for Stanstead is greatly attached to the view that he has expressed today, that judges should rarely, if ever, be appointed as heads of royal commissions, or discharge extrajudicial duties. I have said repeatedly in the house that I think there are times when the appointment of a judge to discharge these extra-judicial duties is quite appropriate.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the hon. member permit me? I agree with that. There is work that they can do and do it with advantage, such as the recodification of the criminal code, for instance. But what I object to—and I do not want there to be any misunderstanding—is the appointment of judges to decide questions which are highly tinged with politics.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us examine this argument. I cannot deal with it conclusively because the issue arises from a difference in point of view. But my hon. friend said repeatedly that these judges who are appointed from time to time are appointed for political purposes, to solve political problems of the government. That sounds like a very damaging accusation; but after all, what are political purposes? When you use the word "political" I know that the first reaction of the public is that there is something discreditable about purposes if they are political purposes. But that is not the meaning of the word "political". The word "political" has a very high significance. Often judges have been appointed in the past because the state of the public mind was such, the worry in the public mind was such, the fear of wrongdoing was such, that there must be, and there ought to be, in the interests of the functioning of a democratic state, a finding by a person for whom the public had respect. That has been the reason for the appointment of judges.

My hon. friend may say that that is meeting a political need of the government; that is a political purpose that the government is carrying out. Well, if so, it is a high purpose; it is a worthy purpose that the government is carrying out when it appoints judges under conditions of that kind.

My hon. friend says that the government is trying to avail itself of, or benefit by, the high reputation of the judge. He should have added one other word. The quality of the judge that is so important in these things is the quality of independence. Take this very case, the appointment of an exchequer court judge to be chairman of the board of transport commissioners. He has what is virtually a life tenure—tenure until he is seventy-five years of age. He can do what he thinks and believes to be right without any dictation from the government. That is a strong reason for appointing him.

My hon. friend did not point out any deleterious or injurious effects which would flow.

Does my hon. friend think that a judgment of the board of transport commissioners, because there is wide interest in it, will drag down the Exchequer Court of Canada if at any time Mr. Justice Archibald functions as an exchequer court judge? I do not believe it for one moment. There are judgments of the courts which are most unpopular; judgments holding that the provisions of certain statutes are unconstitutional; judgments affecting the economic interests of thousands, and perhaps hundreds of thousands, of Canadians. That does not drag down the courts. It may be an unpopular thing, but so long as the public is satisfied that the man is an honest man, that he is acting independently, that he is not under the domination or dictation of the government, it does not discredit the courts; it does not hurt the courts in any way.

I think my hon. friend's views are—I used the word once before—extreme. I think they are extreme in this regard. He may think my views are extreme. But surely there are great advantages in appointing to a court such as this one who remains independent and whose judgment creates confidence in the minds of the public. If the public give the government credit for appointing that kind of man, perhaps that furthers the political purpose of the government, but only because the government did the right thing—that is all. We cannot refrain from doing the right thing because the purpose is sometimes political.

Mr. KNOWLES: You do the other thing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I did not intend to join in this discussion, although what has been said from this side of the house represents the opinion held not only on this side but in many parts of the country as well. I realize that the minister has been so long allergic to this kind of thing that any criticism of his actions in this regard, or any criticism of the government, is regarded as extreme.

I would point out, and I follow the hon. member for Stanstead in this regard, that too often the judiciary has been used by the government in setting up commissions on political matters, the result of which has been detrimental to the certainty with which the people of this country should regard the independence of the bench.

If the minister would like to read his own statements in that regard, I remind him that in 1932 or 1933—they are not before me at the moment—he was one of those who, from this side of the house, spoke with that directness which he can use on occasion against the findings of a judge, and he pointed out then that a judge who takes the position of a commissioner ceases to be sacrosanct so far as his conclusions are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: His recommendations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Whether it is recommendations or not, when these recommendations are subject to attack, the result is that the judge himself is placed in a position that denies that independence of the bench which is so necessary to the even administration of justice. Administration of justice consists not only in justice being administered but in the fact that the people as a whole believe that justice is being administered.

We have discussed this subject before, and the minister rouses himself when any question is raised that parliament on occasion is treated with contempt by this government. He becomes quite angry. He wraps himself in the cloak of an assumed wrath. He smiles now; that fits him better. I say this to him. What we have here is a strange procedure. Parliament decides that ten years is the proper period. If independence is what is asked for, why is not the position made for life? Why place members of the exchequer court in the position that they or some of them will be picked out ten years from now? You maintain the independence of the exchequer court by holding before its judges the opportunity to become chairman of this board!

In the past few years we in this country have suffered from the erosion of parliamentary rights. The other day the Prime Minister gave a statement to the press on the outcome of certain recent by-elections, and he indicated that the course of action of the government is not rightly understood; but he also indicated that ultimately, in the unfolding of events, the rightness of the administration will be established. I say to you, sir, that they do not do this in Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do not do what?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Place judges in the position of being translated from one office to another.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman sure of his facts?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: He is quoting the hon. member for Stanstead, but my understanding is that judges are appointed as heads of royal commissions in Great Britain.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They are appointed from time to time as heads of royal commissions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Absolutely; there have been occasions, but not when it is a question of political implication or as a result of aroused opinion whereby political passions may be stirred. I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead, and I agree with the right hon. gentleman, that in certain matters judges have a place, but I say that nothing did more to bring down the bench of this country, as far as our people are concerned, than to take an estimable man like the Chief Justice of Canada, Sir Lyman Duff, and place him on a political commission, the Hong Kong investigation. These things undermine—

Mr. DECHENE: Leave the dead alone; talk about the living.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend speaks of the dead. Sir Lyman still lives. Get up to date. It is these things, sir, that we object to.

Mr. ILSLEY: Sir Lyman Duff has not been brought down from anywhere. He is still up there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I remember when, very recently, the Minister of Justice strongly objected to any suggestion of criticism of that commission and of the findings of the judge. Once he did that, once there were criticisms outside the house, the position of the Chief Justice of Canada was placed where it ought not to be.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was the position of his critics that suffered there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, sir, I wish I could be as certain of that fact as is my right hon. friend, because he says we want to maintain the independence of the bench. But independence is not maintained by taking a judge and by subterfuge placing him—no, I will not call it subterfuge; by means suitable to the government, translating him—to the exchequer court, and then again, by indirect means, shunting him into the position of head of this board.

Look at the position. It is all arranged in advance. As reported at page 4888 of Hansard, Colonel Cross is consulted, and he admits that his term of office does not end until February 1950. What is all the rush? Colonel Cross has either done a good job or he has not. Colonel Cross is fully able to carry on his position. But he is consulted, and it is pointed out that some changes are to be made. Then he undertakes to resign if the changes take place. In fact he has given his resignation to take effect under these circumstances.

Surely the minister does not contend that that maintains the independence of the chairman of the board of transport commissioners.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Then a judge on the bench is consulted, before any change is made—a judge totally removed from any suggestion of political considerations. He is asked whether he, as a judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, will be willing to accept another position provided that the incumbent resigns and legislation goes through parliament. The independence of the bench, of which the minister spoke a few minutes ago, cannot be maintained by playing ducks and drakes with it in that manner. I have no objection to a judge's occupying that position. But surely the whole thing could have been done simply by an amendment to the superannuation act or to the retirement provisions in the Judges Act. That was done in order to preserve the rights of a judge in Saskatchewan; at least it had that effect.

Imagine what will be our position from now on. I point this out to the minister, although he had nothing to do with it; he was a member of the government, but he was not Minister of Justice. In 1938 we appointed a judge to the court of appeal in the province of Saskatchewan because the court needed a judge. For one and a half years before the war he occupied a position under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Then the war came along and he took a war job; I do not intend to argue that matter. He did his job and he did a job that I will commend. Though he had never sat on the bench, he remained a judge of the court of appeal of Saskatchewan, and had the advantages of a judge with regard to pension on retirement and the like. Then he decided that the diplomatic service was the place for him, and he went to Australia. That was in the latter days of the war. He returned from Australia, and was still a judge. Then something was said about his being appointed ambassador to China. But he could not be appointed to that position, otherwise he would lose his nine years' seniority on the bench and his pension qualifications. A bill was introduced which provided that a person who transferred himself from the bench to any other position should remain entitled to his pension qualifications. That procedure does not maintain the independence of the bench.

I suggest that in this matter the minister should not adopt the indirect method suggested by the various amendments he is bringing before the committee. I suggest that the end be achieved by the simple expedient of an amendment to the Superannuation Act, if you will. Why use the exchequer court as a medium through which a result may be effected that in the years to come cannot but constitute a dangerous precedent? Limitless possibilities are opened up here. If we want a judge in Saskatchewan for some position, all we have to do now is to increase the size of the court of appeal. By increasing the numbers, you have a judge available; then you put him into circulation in some other position. It is too dangerous a precedent, and I join with the hon. member for Stanstead in the stand he has taken. He is president of the Canadian Bar Association, and his views merit the consideration of the members of the house and the people of the country as a whole. All of us have a responsibility to preserve the integrity and the independence of the judiciary. Things like this cannot but have a deleterious effect on public opinion and its regard for that integrity.

Mr. POULIOT: I have seldom heard the hon. member for Lake Centre speak with such eloquence about the judiciary of this country. He spoke in moving accents when he referred to justice and the administration of justice. As one who was admitted to the bar a long time before the hon. member was, and one who will cease to practise a long time before he will, I was deeply interested. For me in my seat here it is refreshing to hear the hon. gentleman. He had the accents of d'Aguesseau, the great French jurist, in addressing the opening of the courts in France. Addresses such as these show great culture, and cannot do otherwise than create a profound impression on those who have the privilege of listening to them. I would not start a competition of the kind, because I admit at once that I would be beaten. Eloquence is not a gift that I possess; I have none.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member is too modest.

Mr. POULIOT: But when I think of the matter that is now before the committee, I wonder if it is the bench, or the freight rates, or both together, that are the cause of this concern. I have here a list of the judges who are superannuated. The first of them is a man who has acquired a great reputation as a jurist. I refer to Sir Lyman Duff. Would my hon. friend accept Sir Lyman Duff as head of the transport board if he agreed to go there? He would protest with regard to him just the same as he did before with regard to an investigation that was carried on by Sir Lyman Duff. Then there is Mr. Justice Hyndman, for whom I have profound respect and admiration. He is a superannuated judge. When I spoke to the Minister of Justice about retiring judges who were mentally and physically fit, he shrugged his shoulders. But on the list there is someone else who is able, and whose defence I will take at once. I refer to Colonel Cross, the chairman of the board of transport commissioners. Because the ruling of the board has not been satisfactory to some members, shall we change the whole board? Shall we bring in a judge? That matter gave to the hon. member for Lake Centre an opportunity to cast some mild aspersions on Mr. Justice Davis, the ambassador to China. He is a man I know well, and he does a very good service. I wonder how many eminent Canadians would agree to leave their country for China in the present circumstances, and to carry a prefabricated house with them. It is worse than the bed the paralytic carried on his back. Would any hon. member carry a prefabricated house to China?

Mr. KNOWLES: And a load of coal as well.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. The ambassador to China is a man who has imposed great sacrifices upon himself in order to serve his country.

Mr. HACKETT: Is the hon. member quite sure that the hon. member for Lake Centre said anything detrimental to Mr. Justice Davis? I listened with great care, and I do not recall that he said anything critical of Mr. Justice Davis.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not say detrimental; I did not use that expression. I said "mild aspersions". I know what I say, and the hon. member for Stanstead will be better off if he listens to me as closely as he listens to his colleague. He will learn much more by listening to me than he will by listening to the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I ask the hon. member whether he does not regard the words "mild aspersions" as being in some sense critical?

Mr. POULIOT: I am sure the hon. member for Lake Centre had nothing critical in his mind when he cast the mild aspersions. To the pure all is pure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that a personal testimonial by my hon. friend?

Mr. POULIOT: It is a testimonial to my hon. friend; it is a tribute to him. I tell the hon. member for Stanstead, who is a likeable gentleman and a great Canadian; I tell the hon. member for Lake Centre, who is a well-gifted Canadian for whom I have great personal admiration, although I do not agree with one iota of his policy—I ask them what they would like to have done by the transport board with regard to freight rates. Are they satisfied with the ruling that has been given by the board? Probably not. No one has been satisfied. Why? Because the board has not done the work that it should have done—that is, to compare freight rates throughout the country and iron out all discriminations.

I said to the house before that these gentlemen have some leisure. Is it necessary to cut their meat and put it in their mouths in a spoon so that they can eat? They must be older than babies; they must know what to do without being instructed all the time by the Minister of Transport. As soon as the ruling was given it was declared to be unsatisfactory, and we as members said, "We will call for a judge; a judge is supreme; we will have a judge". But very often a judge is used as a screen to cover political sins.

Why should we have a judge come into this business? Why should we change the whole board because a ruling is not satisfactory? Are we going to change the board every time a ruling is unsatisfactory to the Liberals, to the Tories, to the C.C.F., or to the Social Credit party? Will each party in turn ask for a change in the board, to have a judge replace the chairman? I know Colonel Cross quite well, and he does not deserve the criticism that has been made on so many occasions. He is a good man and he does well. I do not think I can pay the same compliment to the other commissioners. One of the former commissioners was Colonel Vien. He was acting chief commissioner of the old railway board, where he did exceptionally good work. Why do we not have the same results now from the transport board, the new name for the former railway board?

I do not see why we should have a change now. I do not see why we should have to discuss this with the judiciary. We might ask the present chairman of the transport board to make in another sphere the same sacrifices that Mr. Justice Davis has made by going to China. The board should start to reconsider the mass of evidence it has before them. These men must know something of the transportation problem, because they are supposed to have studied it for a long time. They must have acquired some knowledge. They should be told that with the mass of evidence they have before them they should try to iron out all the discrimination with regard to freight rates. They have the personnel, they have the evidence, they have the personal information; they are the right body to do this work. They are paid for their knowledge. Why should that all be put aside because the C.C.F. have suggested a royal commission?

Would the work of a royal commission be more satisfactory than the work of the transport board? I do not believe it would. I ask you, and I ask my colleagues to consider this matter and not ask for a change in personnel when it is not absolutely necessary. It is the duty of this board to do this work. They have been assigned to do it. Suppose a stenographer or a messenger happens to make a mistake. Is it necessary to fire that person and replace him with another? If that were done we would have a perpetual migration from every office. Many times a thing is done wrongly without any wilful intent, but the person can be shown the proper way to do it. That is the way we should deal with the transport board.

Perhaps there was a misunderstanding. I am ready to give them the benefit of the doubt. But I suggest that it is not proper to change the personnel of the board. They should be told to make their own examination and study and to report on existing discriminations in freight rates. Then when a report is made we will decide whether it is good or not, whether they are competent or not. But that would be after they had been instructed to do this according to the expectations of the Canadian people. We would then have an opportunity to reconsider the matter ourselves.

I say one last thing. If this suggestion is accepted we will have a report on freight rates in a much shorter time than if we appoint a judge or if we appoint any other body than the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, I see another side to this big question perhaps because I am not a lawyer. One side is the honour of the judiciary and the public respect for it. The other side is made up of the groups of people who get into trouble. Whom would you prefer to have preside, an independent judge, a distinguished businessman, a cabinet minister, an outstanding member of the opposition, or someone else? If I were a member of one of those groups, whether employer or employee, I would certainly choose a judge. Is it not the lifetime work of a judge to settle difficulties between individuals? What bigger job is there in a court than to settle difficulties which come before a commission such as this?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No. I wish to add a word. I think we can all accept what has been said by the Minister of Justice as to the requirement of independence. I listened with great interest to what he said—and by the way, I think the judges before whom he appears when he gets back to the practice of law will have to fortify themselves, so as not too readily to be carried away.

I wish to make one point. We talk about independence; let us be realistic about it. It seems to me there is one way in which we can get the independence the minister wants, without transgressing the principle the hon. member for Stanstead has outlined.

Let us not fool ourselves about judges; let us not believe that they are a separate order of creation or that they are not moved by the same feelings as those by which the rest of us are moved. We must not allow ourselves to get into that state of mind. No one has more respect than I have for judges; nevertheless I understand it has been the practice, one very regularly followed, that judges are not promoted from lower positions in the judiciary to chief justiceships. Why? It certainly was the practice for a long time in Ontario, as I understand it. One reason was that they did not want to tamper with the independence of judges—among other things, by placing a judge in such a position that he might have to seek to ingratiate himself with governments. Surely that is a creditable and well-recognized principle. It acknowledges that judges are human like the rest of us, and that we have to seek in every possible way to avoid lessening their independence. What are we doing here? First of all it seems to me that the general principle outlined by the hon. member for Stanstead is sound, that we should not have plums floating about for judges. I am being blunt about the matter, because we must regard them as ordinary human beings. Let us not fool ourselves; judges are like the rest of us, and they would like to have substantial additions to their incomes in special jobs which turn up.

It seems to me that what we are doing here is something which is far worse. As I understand it a continuing plum of a very substantial nature will constantly be held out before the judges of the exchequer court. The business of the judge of the exchequer court, in the main, is to decide between the government and the individual. If I understand the position correctly, being human he cannot entirely get it out of his mind that if he is a good boy and very highly and favourably regarded by the powers that be, the time may come when he may get a very important position.

Is there any way out? I suggest there is a simple way out—and I still hope the Minister of Justice will consider it. My suggestion is almost exactly in line with that of the hon. member for Lake Centre, although it may differ in one important detail. The law is that we can appoint a judge. No one questions that.

Mr. ILSLEY: You do not have to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Let me make this clear; I do not question the appointment of a judge. But as the hon. member for Stanstead has said, if a judge is appointed let him resign from the judiciary, and then attach to this office a proper pension. Public opinion would surely approve a proper pension, so that a man could take it and be independent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would not be sufficient unless you gave the office life tenure, or a tenure to seventy-five years.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister will allow me, I do not see why you need to give life tenure. I am impressed by the argument against it, but usually if he has the full ten years and is eligible for reappointment, and if he is a good man, he is reappointed.

Mr. KNOWLES: A good man or a good boy?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I come back to this thought: It seems to me we do not need to follow this plan, which I think has certain evils in it. The only disadvantage in following my plan is that it may cost us a little more money. I do not like to suggest the expenditure of additional dollars, but I certainly think it would be very much worthwhile; and I suggest, before I take my seat, that the ten-year appointment, subject to reappointment—and I think that might have been done; it happened in the case of Judge Mabee—would meet the objection of the hon. member for Stanstead.

Notwithstanding the eloquence of the Minister of Justice I do believe that there is a great deal of evil there, and that the very independence which he himself so rightly emphasizes is in danger of being challenged.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just wish to say a word about the first part of my hon. friend's remarks, that there are plums floating around here for exchequer court judges. It sound persuasive. But bear in mind the fact that the exchequer court judges are sometimes promoted to be president of the exchequer court; at least they are eligible for promotion. Judges of provincial appeal courts are continually being promoted to the position of chief justice of the appeal court; members of appeal courts in the provinces are often promoted to be judges of the Supreme Court of Canada and members of the trial divisions in the provinces are continually moved to the appeal divisions. While greater financial remuneration is involved, these positions are regarded by most of them as more desirable appointments.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That may be all very undesirable.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no way of avoiding it. If I were a member of the Exchequer Court of Canada I would not regard the additional pay here as a plum. If I had my mind on money, I would not take that job on a bet. If I were a member of the Exchequer Court of Canada I would stick right there. If I were not interested in doing a job for the country I would never think of moving from the Exchequer Court of Canada over to the board of transport commissioners, with all the grief there is there and all the difficulties there are there.

The hon. member seems to think we are making provision here by which a judge takes a sort of non-judicial or political appointment. The board of transport commissioners is itself a court of record. He is a judge; when he is chairman of the board of transport commissioners his work is judicial.

My hon. friend from Lake Centre is talking about the dangerous precedent which will be established by adding to the bench in the provinces in order to give political jobs.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I said there could be.

Mr. ILSLEY: As a matter of fact there could not, because the constitution of the courts of the provinces cannot be changed by us. It has to be changed by the province. We cannot do it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: But if we could, this does not create any additional precedent because we are not putting a judge into a political job. We are putting him into a judicial job. This is the only way we can get the necessary quality and the necessary independence, when you consider the salary we pay, the superannuation, and all that kind of thing.

What would my difficulty have been, or that of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Transport, if they had brought in that program? We would be on the other side then. I knew the hon. member for Stanstead and the hon. member for Lake Centre would come forward with this idea, that you should not use judges for anything else. But I would say to my hon. friends: do not just let habit of mind dictate what you say on everything. Look at the merits of the case. Have a little bit of adaptability, so that you can look at the real merits of this proposal. Do not apply preconceived rules to every situation. This is a case in which your rules do not apply.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 347, to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house met at three o'clock.

REVISED STATUTES

PROVISION FOR COMMISSION TO EFFECT REVISION

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada, to thereby establish a commission to effect such revision and to authorize remuneration to be paid the members of the commission, assistants, officers, clerks and employees.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MARQUIS: Mr. Speaker, to my mind this is one of the most important enactments of the present session, and for this reason I would be remiss in my duty if I did not say a few words with respect to it.

There is no doubt that the revision of our federal laws is long overdue, although there are many reasons why it could not have taken place before. The great war which we had to go through, the resultant uncertain period which has followed, and the temporary nature of the greater part of our emergency legislation in consequence thereof, have all contributed to the delays. I wish, therefore, to thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) and to congratulate him upon having initiated this important and advantageous enterprise before his retirement. This work will be the crowning opus of a parliamentary career so rich in learned and useful contributions to our federal legislation for well over twenty years.

All those who are affected by our federal legislation—and that means practically every Canadian, but more specially the judges and magistrates who have to apply the laws, and the lawyers, businessmen and administrators of all kinds who are in daily contact with them—will, I am sure, be thankful that their duties will have been made easier by the revision.

In a very interesting article by Doctor Maurice Ollivier which has just appeared in the last number of the Canadian Bar Review, and in which the law clerk of the House of Commons makes a study of the different statute revisions both in the United Kingdom and in Canada throughout the years, I noticed a section in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, Act, to the effect that the printed roll of the French version:

—should be deemed to be the authentic original French version of the said statutes, and as such shall have the force of law as if herein enacted.

The article refers to the discussion which took place at that time, and quotes Mr. Aylesworth, then minister of justice, as having stated in the house that:

The French text of our statutes is of absolutely equal potency with the English.

This section dealing with the French version does not appear in the governing act of the revised statutes of 1927, nor does it appear in the present bill. I wonder if the minister would not consider the insertion of a similar clause as section 13 of the present bill; or if not, would he consider making a declaration to the house that, although this section will not appear in the act, the situation as far as the authenticity of the French version is concerned remains unchanged.

Dealing with the next revision of the statutes as contemplated in the present bill, Doctor Ollivier makes what I believe to be some valuable suggestions which I should like briefly to bring to the attention of the house and of the minister.

The first suggestion is that a departmental subcommittee of the Department of Justice might prepare a codification and extensive revision of the criminal code, to be passed at the next session of parliament, to improve the act from the points of view of drafting, arrangement of parts and sections, and simplification of procedure.

His second suggestion has to do with the consolidation and revision of taxation measures along the line already started with the revision of the act respecting income taxes. In other words, there should be a revision of the Excise Tax Act, the Excise Act and the Customs Tariff. Doctor Ollivier states that if these statutes, and some others which he names, could be adopted by the house purely as consolidations, without changes, and by consent without discussion, much of the work of the commissioners would be eliminated, and consequently the cost of the general revision would be greatly reduced.

The article goes on to suggest that it would expedite matters if an act were passed or the rules of the house amended to provide that when a revised act is introduced it shall receive first, second and third readings without any discussion if the minister introducing it states that the bill is simply a consolidation without any new matter or essential change. It could further be provided that, if the minister so desires, the bill may be referred to a committee, there to be further revised, studied and examined.

These are all valuable suggestions which certainly deserve to be considered. I have no doubt, however, that the minister has read this memorandum by our law clerk and has had these very points under advisement and consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, Mr. Chairman, is one of those mentioned for promotion in case there is any change in the Department of Justice.

This bill is one of the most important which the present Minister of Justice has introduced into this house. Some years ago I proposed that the statutes of Canada should, like the Bank Act, be revised every ten years. This revision is going to take a long time. The last revision was in 1927. Every year amendments to statutes are made; and a very large amount of legislation has been put on the statute book since 1927. I believe the time has come for revision.

The present Minister of Justice will be very much missed. I am sorry to see him go, because he is a conscientious and hard-working public officer and has proved himself a most trustworthy attorney general. But if a change is to be made in the Department of Justice I believe that the province of Ontario should have this important portfolio. Sir Wilfrid Laurier appointed as minister of justice one of his colleagues, Mr. Mills, who represented a part of the country from which you yourself come, Mr. Chairman, western Ontario.

I want to compliment you, sir, on the work you have done as chairman during a large part of the discussion of these bills. I believe that in the estimates provision of $2,000 a year should be made for our chairman for the work he did last year and this year. Having said that I may say that the time has come when that portfolio should be given to the old province of Ontario.

I should like to hear something from the minister about this resolution. Is it proposed, as in the case of the revision of the Ontario statutes, to have a commission of judges conduct this revision—because it will take a long time to go over all the law? We have to consider also the rules and regulations which the crown makes on almost every statute that is passed, giving these regulations also the force of statutes.

The next point I want to make is this. The enforcement of all federal law from confederation to the present, has been a matter for the provinces, and the provinces simply turn it over to the municipalities. They have a municipal police system of their own. Up until recent times Ontario had only a skeleton police force, something like the skeleton in the health department. They have taken the skeleton out of the closet now, and once the skeleton gets out nobody knows what will happen.

So far as this revision is concerned I am hoping that someone like Hon. Mr. Justice Mackay, who has had a great deal to do with the law of libel and slander, criminal and constitutional cases, will be included as one of the commission. I see no reason why some estimate of the cost should not be given, because this will be a very expensive commission. It reminds me of what I proposed a short time ago, Mr. Chairman. We should have a legal committee in this house. They have had one in nearly all the provinces since confederation. These legal bills could be considered by that legal committee. I commend that suggestion to the present minister.

I do not know that I can say anything further, because I do not want to hold up the minister's resolution and bill. I hope that this commission will not be too large, that the members will be selected from some of the judges, and that the recommendations of the chief constables' association will be given consideration. I hope that the provincial police systems, which are largely municipal, will receive bonuses, subventions and subsidies from this parliament to enforce federal law, because we do not enforce federal law ourselves.

When I was chairman of the police commission in Toronto I found that the number of federal acts that had to be enforced, together with the orders in council issued by the government during the first war, entailed a large sum of money. With the late Mr. Bradshaw, our city treasurer, assisting me, I wrote to many states; he wrote to Australia and to New Zealand. We found that in Australia the city of Sydney received over $2,000,000 in bonuses, subventions and subsidies for doing this work of enforcing federal law. A very large part of our police work is devoted to traffic and to the enforcement of these orders in council. The mounted police serve the Northwest Territories. We all owe a great deal to the work which the mounted police did during the two wars and between the wars in coming to the aid of the civil police systems. If the federal government is not going to enforce its own federal law, there should be some recognition, by federal contribution, of the work done by the police throughout the whole of Canada during the second great war and since, in enforcing all federal law and hundreds and thousands of orders in council.

I am sorry to see the minister go. I compliment him on having the courage and the wisdom to bring in this resolution so that the matter may be cleaned up. When that is done, and a complete revision of federal law adopted, we shall have a better state of affairs in the enforcement of law and order in this country.

Mr. FLEMING: There is general agreement in the house that the time is ripe, if not overdue, for a revision of the statutes of Canada. In the past there have been just three revisions. The last one, which was made in 1927, is already twenty-one years old. No doubt by the time the revision now proposed is completed the 1927 revision will be twenty-five years old. The previous revisions of 1886 and 1906 did not present anything like the amount of work that was presented to the commissioners in 1927, and, of course, not nearly the amount of work that will confront the commissioners in this new work of revision.

Certain questions naturally suggest themselves on a reading of the resolution, and I would ask the Minister of Justice when he speaks to deal with such points as these. First of all, will the minister indicate the size of the proposed commission, the terms of appointment and the qualifications he has in mind for the personnel? In 1927 revision was carried out very largely by judges. Does the minister intend that the commission this time shall be composed in the main of judges?

Important questions arise also with reference to the scope of revision. It will be one thing if the task of the commissioners is simply to be the work of consolidation—a simpler task and one which could be accomplished much more quickly. But if a serious attempt is to be made to revise the statutes, then the undertaking is bound to be much greater.

When I spoke a moment ago about the revision being in the hands of judges I spoke rather of the provision for an earlier revision. The 1927 revision was in the hands of the following as commissioners: Sir Charles Fitzpatrick as president; Mr. Newcombe, who was deputy minister of justice at the time the commission was set up—on his appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada he was relieved of his position on the commission; Mr. Hartley Dewar; Mr. E. J. Daly, of Ottawa; Mr. F. R. Russell, K.C.; Mr. L. A. Rivet, of Montreal.

It is quite a coincidence that just last week the Canadian Bar Review carried an article by the law clerk of the house, Doctor Maurice Ollivier, on the subject of revision of the statutes. It is an article in which there is much learning. The author reviews the work of revision on the previous occasions. He outlines the work of revision of the statutes in the United Kingdom, and in some of the provinces where revisions have been carried out much more frequently than in the dominion sphere.

Some thoughts are expressed by the law clerk which call for some comment. He has a paragraph on page 810 of the May issue of the Canadian Bar Review on the need of revision. I should like to read the paragraph. He says:

> There is no doubt that a new revision of our federal statutes is long overdue. Many reasons have been given for not starting it. The main one is certainly the unusual situation created by the second world war. This had the effect of interrupting many normal activities and concentrating attention on more pressing problems. The situation thus created has not yet returned to normal, nor stabilized itself. The annual statutes are cluttered up with emergency and temporary measures; some of these may exist for a short time only, while others may be of the sort of temporary nature which is sometimes referred to as permanently temporary. Until the situation has been clarified by the lapse of time, it is difficult to say which of these acts should be included in a general revision and which should be omitted.

He points out the necessity for revision in certain classes of statutes, such as the criminal code, statutes relating to taxation, and some other acts which he mentions. But Doctor Ollivier goes on to deal with another matter which in my opinion calls for comment in this house. The law clerk offers his views with respect to the procedure to be followed in the house in the matter of revision, and I must say I am shocked at some of the views expressed in the paragraph which I should now like to quote. It will be found at page 811:

> It would expedite matters if an act could be passed, or the rules of the house amended, to provide that when a revised act is introduced it would receive first, second and third readings without any discussion, if the minister introducing it states that the bill is simply a consolidation without any new matter or essential change. It could be provided further that, if the minister so desires, the bill will be referred to a committee, there to be further revised, studied and examined. The work of the committee would consist simply in verifying that the consolidation contains no new matter and that the changes made are matters of form and do not substantially change the law, and in suggesting any further improvements in drafting or arrangement of sections.

He then goes on to point out what he considers to be the advantages to be derived from following a procedure of the kind—a sort of short-circuiting procedure. I entertain the highest respect for Doctor Ollivier, but I certainly do not share the view he has expressed in the paragraph I have read, in which he indicates that parliament should be quite content, so far as the work of revision is concerned, simply to give, without any discussion, first, second and third readings to bills of any kind which the minister introducing them intimates do not contain any change in matter or substance.

It is not the function of parliament to be a rubber stamp for anybody, the government or anybody else. While I hope that the commission on the revision of statutes will be a commission of eminent men whose opinions on the revision of statutes and the consolidation of sections will be entitled to the highest respect, I do not think that parliament will be paying to the work of the commissioners the respect which we trust will be due to their labours if we simply swallow their reports holus-bolus without addressing ourselves to the subject matter of the statutes so presented.

Surely parliament would be remiss in its duty if it simply conferred upon the reports of the commissioners, in effect, the force of statute without going through the procedure that has been laid down for the review of bills introduced in this house. Whatever is good in the reports of the commissioners—and I am sure that much in their reports will be good—should have careful study in this house. I trust therefore there will be no thought, on the part of those who will be members of this house when the reports of the commissioners are brought in, of simply taking that work and rushing it through first, second and third readings without careful consideration.

Parliament itself ought to be a party to the task of the revision and consolidation of the laws it passes. Simply because this is conceived to be a work of revision of existing statutes, there should be no excuse for parliament turning its back on its duty of accepting primary responsibility for such a revision.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have to register the most solemn protest against one of the suggestions of the hon. gentleman. He has suggested the appointment of "eminent men" to that commission. What is an eminent man? How many eminent men have we, those splendid looking wizards who impress bureaucratic civil servants? I hope the minister will not appoint any so-called eminent man. We have enough of them, $15,000 a year eminent men. I had hopes for the hon. member for Eglinton. I had hoped that he would fight bureaucracy to the limit, but now he is indulging in the same errors as those who support it.

Mr. FLEMING: I thought I was saying a word for the duty of parliament to retain responsibility for this revision and not simply to abdicate in favour of commissioners.

Mr. POULIOT: Did not the hon. gentleman mention eminent men? He would never call a Liberal an eminent man; I know him well enough.

Mr. FLEMING: On a question of privilege, I wish to correct this statement of the hon. member for Temiscouata. I would not say there are no Liberals who are eminent. As a matter of fact I consider the hon. gentleman himself an eminent man, and I think that his eminence is in large part due to the fact that he is not a rubber-stamp Liberal but one who practises independence in the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman for what he has said. It is news to me before I read the afternoon paper. I wish to warn him however about that eminent man stuff. I do not believe in it personally, though sometimes I use the expression as a matter of grace and just to show my good disposition. I do not believe that eminent men can be found to be placed on the tariff board. We do not need eminent men there. We need sensible men.

An hon. MEMBER: Men of horse sense.

Mr. POULIOT: Sensible, competent men. They will be competent if they are sensible. But we want men who are willing to work, who know how to work and who have a sufficient sense of duty to do the work which will be assigned to them by their functions, so that there will be no difficulty about it.

Mr. GRANT: Eminent men do not work.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret to differ. In fact I do not know what my hon. friend means by an eminent man. Probably the idea which my hon. friend the member for Kings has of what constitutes an eminent man is entirely different from that which is entertained by the hon. member for Eglinton. At any rate, whether a man is a judge or not, I hope, contrary to some suggestions that are made in this house, that when new appointments are made those who are appointed will be sensible men. Whether they wear robes of ermine or not, we can find sensible men in all walks of life. It is not necessary to be a judge in order to be a sensible man. I hope the minister will be happy in his appointment after the good wishes that have been expressed by the hon. member for Stanstead, the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the minister stated yet how many members will form the commission, and whether it is intended that the commission shall depart in any radical way from the course followed by previous commissions which have been entrusted with a similar task?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to deal for a few minutes with some of the remarks that have been made.

The hon. member for Kamouraska asked that I make a statement similar to that made by Sir Allen Aylesworth with regard to the authenticity of the French version. I will look at that statement and see whether I can do so when we are on the bill. I will give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion. The same observation applies to the other suggestions he made, such as that the Department of Justice should prepare a revision of the criminal code for the consideration of the commissioners, and that there should be a consolidation of some of the taxation legislation.

The hon. member for Eglinton asked about the size of the commission. The bill provides for the appointment of five commissioners, but I may move an amendment to provide for the appointment of seven, so that one section of the commission may devote itself exclusively to the criminal code. This is an idea which is under consideration at the present time. I am afraid that I cannot say much with regard to the terms. At the time of the former revisions I believe the commissioners were paid on a per diem basis and were not full-time commissioners. I am unable to say what qualifications they will possess except competency, if it is possible to get that qualification.

The hon. member for Eglinton stated that in the 1906 revision the commission consisted largely of judges, but that is incorrect. There was only one judge on that commission.

Mr. FLEMING: In 1927, I said.

Mr. ILSLEY: First let us deal with 1906. The hon. gentleman first said 1927; then he corrected himself by saying 1906. In 1906 the commissioners were: The Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General ex officio; Right Hon. Sir Henry Strong, president; Wentworth E. Roscoe, K.C.; Augustus Power, K.C.; Henry Robertson, K.C.—

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Power was in the Department of Justice, was he not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether he was or not.

Mr. HACKETT: It seems to me that he was.

Mr. ILSLEY: I mentioned Henry Robertson, K.C. Then there was Edward R. Cameron, K.C.; Thomas L. Metcalfe, barrister, and Henry Philippe Sirois, notary public.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Cameron was in the courts.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: He was registrar of the supreme court.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. So there was only one judge on that commission. In 1927 the commissioners were—

Mr. HACKETT: Sir Charles Fitzpatrick—

Mr. FLEMING: I read the names.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they were placed before the committee by the hon. member for Eglinton. Apparently there were no judges at all on that commission, although I understood one county court judge was engaged in the revision in 1927.

I am interested in some of the observations that have been made this afternoon. I certainly was not aware that it was part of the scheme for the revision of the statutes to have the statutes debated section by section when they went through the house. That was contrary to my impression of what is done or what can practically be done. That seemed to be the view that the hon. member for Eglinton had as to the duties of members of parliament. I do not think that they have ever assumed that responsibility. I think that they take adequate means to see that the statutes on the books are truly reproduced, and that is all. I do not think they go over them critically at all, section by section. But I will look into the suggestion. I think the hon. member for Eglinton is all wrong about the operation if he thinks that this is a reconsideration, and that the revision of the statutes involves reconsideration by parliament of all the statutes of Canada. I do not think it ordinarily does.

Mr. HACKETT: I was under the impression that a report was made dealing with all the statutes that had been considered, giving the reason for the elimination of some that were not included, and for the abbreviation of others. I am not certain about that, though.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will make inquiries about it. This is the very purpose of discussion on the resolution; we can get our views straightened out on these matters. Then I can come back, either on the second reading of the bill or when we are in committee, and answer these questions.

The hon. member for Eglinton seemed to think that Doctor Ollivier's suggestion that there be some consolidation by parliament before the work is undertaken by the commissioners is not a good one. I simply took it that Doctor Ollivier was suggesting that that would be a more convenient way to effect consolidation; that the officials—and I suppose largely finance officials—were in a position to consolidate these taxation statutes, and that they should do it; that the consolidation should go through without discussion provided there was an assurance that there was no change in the existing law, and that the commissioners would be saved that much time and the government would be saved that much money. It does not strike me as an important saving, I must say; nevertheless I do not think there is anything particularly dangerous about it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What does the minister mean by "revision"? It is a word that requires interpretation. What had the minister in mind? Was it merely a consolidation, bringing up to date the various amendments and setting them under their respective sections?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will tell the committee what I mean by revision, and what I mean by consolidation, but whether my definitions are in accordance with the dictionary definitions or the ordinary acceptation, I do not know. By revision I mean re-enactment after consideration, with some changes. By consolidation I mean re-enactment, in perhaps slightly different form, but without any change in meaning. The duty of the commissioners, if I am correctly informed, has been to effect a consolidation without change of meaning. They straighten out language, rearrange sections, and remove anomalies. They strike out sections which were put in for the purpose of fixing the date of the coming into force of the act. They may remove preambles. They may make all sorts of verbal changes. But if they are consolidating the statutes they are not making any change in the effect or meaning of the statutes. That is a consolidation, and I think that is a duty of the commissioners. Revision, in the sense in which I use the word, is a different matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a parliamentary responsibility.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; the matter of revision is a parliamentary responsibility. It has been suggested to me that parliament should take in hand quite a number of acts before this consolidation is completed, with a view to revision. It is suggested that these acts contain provisions which ought to be changed. But that is a different suggestion altogether from the one made by Doctor Ollivier in his article. He was suggesting a parliamentary consolidation preliminary to consolidation by the commissioners. I do not think there is much against it, but I do not think it is a particularly important suggestion.

Mr. KNOWLES: In view of the proper distinction the minister has made between the words "revision" and "consolidation", and in view of the fact that he stated it is his intention that this commission is to do a consolidating job, I should like to know the significance of the word "revision" in the second line of the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have always been called the revised statutes of Canada. In some jurisdictions they are called the consolidated statutes, but in Canada they have always been called the revised statutes. "Revision" apparently was used in a sense different from that in which I am using it.

Mr. KNOWLES: The terms of the bill will be such as to make it clear that the powers of the commission are only to do what the minister means by consolidating?

Mr. ILSLEY: The wording of the bill I am going to submit will not be exactly the same as that of the bill introduced in 1927. I believe the wording of that bill was exactly the same as the bill of 1906. A little change is being made which we cannot advantageously discuss here but which will be discussed when we come to that particular section.

Of course the criminal code ought to be revised, and it may be that if this is to be undertaken by a section of the commission that is to be set up, special powers or special responsibilities in respect to the criminal code will have to be given them. I must say that I have not been able to give any clear idea as to how the criminal code is to be revised. If the task of revision, if the changing of the code, if the changing of the penalties, if the changing of the principles of punishment and so on are to be delegated to commissioners—they would be a sort of royal commission to advise the government on what the law ought to be—then the government and parliament will have to take the responsibility for the changes in the criminal code in a sense in which they would not have to take it with regard to most of the laws on the statute books of Canada.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The distinction which the minister makes renders rather unimportant the work of revision by this commission. As a matter of fact if the revision of the statutes is to mean simply a rearranging of the sections, a recommending of the removal of the occasional preamble, then it is more or less a perfunctory act that is to be performed by these men. If that is so, the question of their eminence or ability or knowledge of the law would be of very little importance.

I suggest to the minister that in addition to discharging the more or less perfunctory responsibility which is necessary he ought to give consideration to widening the meaning of the word "revision" so that the commission to be set up under the bill to be based on this resolution will be discharging an essential function, namely, recommending to parliament or to the Department of Justice the necessity of changes in various sections of the statutes in order to bring them up to date.

I have not said anything on the matter up to the present, but after listening to the minister I feel that if all we are doing is setting up a commission for the purpose of running through the statutes and saying, "Well, this statute of 1932 has been amended four times and we will put in the amendments in the respective sections," then revision is of little importance in respect to the final findings.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what it is for.

Mr. KNOWLES: It would be just a collection of office consolidations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, it would simply be a collection of office consolidations of which there is one for practically every important statute. When you come to the revision of the criminal code, to which the minister has made reference, that is quite another thing. That will require unusual experience and knowledge of criminal law and practice, and also of the changes that have taken place in sociology and psychology and medicine and preventive jurisprudence since 1892.

For instance, there is the question of the responsibility for criminal acts. The law today is that a child under seven years of age has no capacity to perform a criminal act; between the ages of seven and fourteen years the capacity is not presumed but must be established affirmatively by the crown. When those rules were made a hundred and fifty or two hundred years ago, physical age and mental age were synonymous. We realize today that a person with a physical age of eighteen years may have a mental age of only eight years; but regardless of that fact the presumption still prevails that because of his physical age he in fact has the mental age to understand and appreciate the nature and quality of his acts. These are things in respect to which the criminal code should be brought up to date.

As the minister said yesterday, the insanity rules date back to 1842, I think it is—over a hundred years, in any event—to the Macnaughton case. There has been no change since. Many have felt from time to time that changes should be made in the law of insanity with a view to bringing it in accordance with modern scientific knowledge. It is of interest in that connection to note that in England a committee of parliament was set up which took evidence from judges, eminent counsel trained in the law and medical authorities. After hearing all that evidence, and with the experience of a hundred years behind them, the decision made in England was that the law as set out in the Macnaughton case with regard to insanity, should not be altered and is in keeping with the present day. That is an example of the matters that should be considered in a revision of the criminal code.

The minister mentioned the question of punishment. Today we ameliorate or increase punishment more or less in a haphazard and uncertain way. From year to year we follow a system of selective uncertainty. When this commission is set up, and if it is actually to discharge any serious responsibility, I should like to have it make recommendations for the revision of the criminal code so that it will become an instrument for justice rather than, so far as certain sections are concerned, being conducive to unfairness by reason of changing conditions and changing knowledge, scientific and otherwise.

Will the minister give consideration to widening—I do not know whether he can answer now—the scope of the commission to be set up? The commission cannot legislate, because that is the responsibility of parliament. Surely the commission, if it is to be composed of seven outstanding members of the bench and bar of the dominion, should have a responsibility greater than a clerical one. It should be a responsibility which would utilize their knowledge and experience, which would help parliament by making recommendations to the Department of Justice, and in general revise these statutes and bring them up to date.

There are statutes which have no place at all in our present system. They have been obsolete for a number of years, but still appear in the revised statutes. I think a recommendation might well be made for their removal.

Does the minister know whether the deputy minister has been able to devote some time to an anticipated revision, and whether in fact the actual back-breaking work of the revision must not be done by his department and his officials? The minister will recall that Mr. O'Connor did a good deal of work in anticipation of the last revision, and I believe his work was turned to account. To the minister's knowledge has some work been done in the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am unable to say, but I would doubt it. I shall find out however, and give the information tomorrow. The Department of Justice has been so very busy, drafting new statutes of every kind, sort and description, especially throughout the war years, in an effort to see that they did not get everyone into trouble—

Mr. KNOWLES: Including the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, including the government—that possibly they have not made any collection of ideas for future amendments. I suggest to the hon. member for Lake Centre that it would be pretty difficult to get a commission to revise in any effective and competent way a large number of miscellaneous statutes.

For example, if we are convinced that the Immigration Act ought to be amended in certain respects, what competency would a revising commission have to give us new ideas upon which that act should be based? They must emanate from the Department of Mines and Resources, go to the cabinet, be considered there, and come out from there. Then someone will ask why I take a different view with regard to the criminal code. Well, the criminal code is just too great, that is all. It is too extensive for us to get anywhere by using that method. These changes in the principles and important provisions of statutes are not in my opinion the sort of thing which should emanate from a commission of five or seven men.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER (speaking from a seat beside the Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to ask the minister one question.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the portfolio?

Mr. HACKETT: Another competitor for the leadership.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is just an anticipatory step. It will not be long before all of us are over here.

Does the answer the minister has just given apply to recommendations as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall give consideration to that suggestion, but we are not going to the lengths which apparently the hon. member thinks we should go.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 348, respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO ELIGIBILITY

The house in committee on Bill No. 60, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act—Mr. Gregg—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Persons eligible for insurance.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before we proceed, could the minister say whether copies of this bill as amended, and others to follow, are available?

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs): If the committee desires, I shall outline the amendments made to the bill.

Subsection 1 of section 3 of the act sets out the various classes with whom the minister may enter into a contract of insurance and the time within which the persons must apply for a contract of insurance.

It is now proposed to add to those classes and, at the same time, extend the period within which a person eligible to obtain insurance must apply therefor.

Accordingly, subsection 1 of section 3 is being repealed and a new subsection for the purpose above mentioned is being put forward.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Paragraph (a) of the said subsection extends the time of three years in which a veteran must apply, to six years from the date of his discharge from service or six years from the 20th day of February, 1945, which was the date upon which, by proclamation, the Veterans Insurance Act came into force.

Paragraph (b) merely re-enacts the present paragraph (b) of the act.

Paragraph (c) enables the widow or widower of a person who died on service during the war to apply for insurance within six years after the death of that person or within six years after the coming into force of the act.

Paragraph (d) enables members of the permanent force to take advantage of the act. This paragraph puts into statutory form the provisions of order in council, P.C. 467, of the 7th February, 1947, by which the benefits of the act were extended to members of the permanent force. The time within which these members of the permanent force may apply for insurance is six years from the 1st of April, 1946, that being the date on which they first became entitled by virtue of the above-mentioned order in council to apply for insurance.

Paragraph (e). Those merchant seamen who received or who were entitled to receive a bonus pursuant to the merchant seamen special bonus orders are now, by virtue of order in council, P.C. 3227, of the 3rd of May, 1945, entitled to apply for insurance. This class is now being given those rights by statute, and, in addition, the benefits of the act are extended to those merchant seamen who received or who were eligible to receive a war service bonus pursuant to the merchant seamen war service bonus order of 1944.

Paragraph (f). As the act presently stands, any person who is in receipt of a pension relating to the war may apply for a contract of insurance. It has been found that the wording of the act is sufficiently broad to allow parents or persons in loco parentis of the deceased member of the forces to apply. It was never intended that dependents of the deceased member of the forces, other than his widow, would be entitled to insurance. That condition is now cured by confining "pensioners" to those who obtain their pension by reason of their own disability. Widows of persons who died during service will obtain their rights under proposed paragraph (c). It may be noted that some parents and others in loco parentis have already been issued policies and that although this subsection is, by clause 3 of the bill, made retroactive to the 1st of April, 1947, paragraph (f) is exempted from this retroactive effect, and the policies that have been issued to those persons are protected from being invalidated.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES

PROVISION FOR NEGLECTED OR DEPENDENT CHILDREN, INCREASED PERMISSIBLE INCOMES, ET CETERA

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 196, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—"Orphan".

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): We have not had any opportunity to go over the bill to see whether the amendments approved by the committee have been incorporated in the bill. If the chairman does not mind my jumping ahead a few sections, I am principally interested in section 6, which provides for the increase to $250. Has that been carried throughout the bill?

Mr. GREGG: The bill now before us is based upon the recommendations made by the special committee on veterans affairs. It is exactly as reported to the house by that committee.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I do not know whether the minister wishes me to make my remarks on this first clause or on the sections in which we are interested as we reach them. My remarks will apply principally to clause 6.

Mr. GREGG: Perhaps we could have any discussion on the section to which it applies.

Mr. LENNARD: I have a few remarks to make which are not particularly applicable to any section. I refer to the brief which was presented by the British Canadian veterans on May 10. As many hon. members know, on May 6, 1946, they presented a brief to the veterans affairs committee of that year. The brief which was presented to the veterans affairs committee on May 10 of this year was one of the most complete and fairest briefs presented to the committee. It was presented by Stephen Jones, Toronto, supported by George MacKay of Hamilton. All that they asked for was entitlement for those British Canadian veterans who served in an actual theatre of war and who had twenty years of continuous residence in Canada. They pointed out that the British Canadian veterans who had resided continuously in Canada for twenty years after the first great war had been paying taxes. They had raised their families. They had contributed to the federal treasury from which all federal expenditures, including war veterans pensions, are paid. Their sons and daughters had served in the second great war and were prepared to serve again. To all intents and purposes they should be on an equal footing with the Canadian-born veteran. I believe that myself, and I am disappointed that the recommendation was not passed in the veterans affairs committee. I may say I had the privilege of moving the following resolution which was defeated:

> That the committee recommend that the appropriate section of the act be amended to allow that the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act be extended to veterans who served with the imperial forces in an actual theatre of war other than the British isles, and who had no pre-war domicile, but whose period of continuous residence in Canada has reached twenty years.

I felt on several occasions that this resolution would meet with the unanimous approval of the committee, but we found that it was voted down. As I say, I was disappointed, because the number of British Canadian veterans who would be involved was such that we could very well have adopted this resolution. I consider that an injustice has been done to those veterans of the first great war. It is true that they were not promised anything. They were not enticed to this country with any promise of that kind. Because of their continuous residence in Canada and their good citizenship, they are most certainly entitled to these benefits.

Another matter that should have received some consideration is contained in a brief presented by Canadian non-pensioned veterans' widows. Some of their points were well taken. This was fully covered by the committee, and I do not intend to deal with it section by section. I merely mention that it should have received more consideration. Probably I shall have more to say when we deal with the various sections of the bill.

Mr. QUELCH: I find myself in general accord with the remarks of the last speaker. The bill that we have before us is undoubtedly a better bill than the one which went to the committee, just as that bill made certain improvements upon the war veterans allowance as it exists today.

When the pensions bill came back to the house I congratulated the minister upon the changes that had been made, and at that time I expressed the hope that we would be able to deal as generously with the war veterans allowance bill as we had with that bill. However I am afraid that the present bill falls far short of the requests made by the various veterans organizations of this country. The bill as amended provides an increase in the allowance from $30 to $40 a month for single veterans, and from $60 to $70 for married veterans. In addition, it removes the ceiling upon casual earnings. That is all to the good. But, as I say, it falls far short of the requests that have been made by the various veterans organizations. For instance, at the last convention of the legion a resolution was passed as follows:

Resolved that we instruct our dominion command to continue to press for basic rates of $50 per month for single men and $85 per month for married men.

When that question was being discussed in the committee—as a matter of fact, the matter had already been discussed and decided upon in the committee when the legion met in convention, and therefore we could not deal with it again—a motion similar to it was moved and lost by a very narrow margin. As a matter of fact, it was a tie, fifteen to fifteen, and the chairman cast the deciding vote. He had the very unpleasant task of having to decide the vote. It was decided strictly on party lines, the opposition all voting for the amendment and the Liberal members all voting against it. It is quite obvious that the rate proposed in the bill will not be a sufficient amount to give the veterans depending upon this allowance a real living income. They can get by and will be able to exist. No doubt the government will argue that they are existing today on the present rate and will continue to exist on this increased rate. The point is that, with the increased cost of living, the amount proposed is not sufficient to give them a real decent living allowance.

The second point raised by the legion resolutions passed at the convention reads as follows:

Resolved that the brief of the Canadian Legion be fully endorsed to the effect that veterans of imperial forces, domiciled in Canada for twenty years, be eligible for war veterans allowance.

This is another matter that was discussed in the veterans committee. Again that resolution was lost in the committee by a very narrow margin. It was voted down, thirteen to ten.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did I understand the hon. member to say it was defeated?

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, it was defeated in the veterans committee, thirteen to ten. Again it was on a straight party vote, the opposition all supporting the proposal and the Liberal members voting against it. It is well to remember that the men mentioned in the resolution had all served in the first war in the British forces and not in the Canadian forces. Some of these men had been domiciled in Canada prior to enlistment; but, owing to the fact that they had gone back to the old country, probably a few months or a year before the start of the war, they were not considered to be domiciled in this country, and therefore were not eligible for the allowance as they would have been had they been domiciled in Canada at the time of enlistment. Nevertheless these men have now been domiciled in Canada for twenty years. They have been paying taxes in this country; they have helped to contribute to the wealth of the country; they have raised families and in many cases their sons and daughters served in the second world war. There is a very strong sentiment in Canada today that these men should now be made eligible for the war veterans allowance.

The third point that was dealt with in the legion brief is as follows:

World war I veterans with service in Great Britain.

Resolved that the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act be extended to Canadian veterans who served in Great Britain only for a period of eighteen months or more during world war I.

This resolution was also brought before the veterans committee, and again it was lost by a very narrow margin. The vote on the resolution was thirteen against and twelve for. Again it was decided on a straight party vote, the opposition all voting for the resolution and the Liberal members voting against it, with the exception of one. One Liberal voted for the motion.

I believe that in the past the legion have taken a stand against England being considered a theatre of war, but at this convention at any rate they did urge that veterans who had served in England for at least eighteen months should be eligible for the war veterans allowance. Of course, if these three resolutions had carried in the committee we would have had a far stronger talking point in urging the government to give consideration to this matter.

The minister realizes only too well that it was a toss-up whether these resolutions carried in the committee or not. The margin was so narrow in one case, while there was a tie in another, that it was just a question whether it carried. It was lost by one vote on one occasion and by three on another, and if a few more of the opposition members had been present the decision might have been reversed. In view of the fact that there is such a strong demand in Canada that each of these resolutions shall be adopted, and a strong demand, not merely on the part of veterans organizations but among various civilian bodies in the country, I would urge the minister to take the matter up with the cabinet and try to have the whole subject reconsidered, so that the amount of the allowance for single veterans may be increased to $50 and for married veterans to $85. Further, I suggest that England be considered an actual theatre of war and that imperials who have resided in Canada for twenty years or more be eligible for war veterans allowance.

Mr. PEARKES: I associate myself with those who have spoken, and I express regret, almost resentment, that the allowances have not been extended to meet the suggestions advanced by the Canadian Legion, both as regards the amount of the allowance and also as regards the extension of the provisions to include imperials who have had long residence in Canada, and those Canadian soldiers who served only in Great Britain during world war I. They served only in Great Britain, but that was no fault of theirs. It was due to the exigencies of the service or to the demand for their particular talent in training other men.

I have already spoken during this session on both these classes of veterans. I will not now repeat the remarks I have made previously, but I wish to bring to the attention of the committee one striking fact to illustrate the irony of the regulations which prohibit a soldier of world war I who served only in Great Britain from drawing these allowances. The allowances are available to any soldier of world war I who served on the continent of Europe up to the date of the conclusion of hostilities at that time. I remind the committee that the armistice was signed on the eleventh day of November 1918, but the war was not declared over until August 1920. Therefore a man might have left Canada after the signing of the armistice, and after a short period of training in Great Britain he might have been sent over to reinforce one of the battalions forming the army of occupation, being billeted in a comfortable house on the banks of the Rhine, suffering no hardship at all and returning at the conclusion of peace when the army of occupation returned to England. That man is eligible for all the considerations and the benefits of this act.

Similarly a man who went over to Great Britain, who did not see any fighting at all, who did not move to the continent of Europe until after the armistice, might have been attached then to some of the labour battalions connected with the imperial war graves commission. That man is also eligible for these benefits.

But the soldier who went over in 1914, who was exposed to the hardship of Salisbury plain, whose health perhaps was ruined, and who remained in Great Britain training other men for many years, perhaps right up to the conclusion of hostilities, separated from his family all that time, is not eligible for the benefits provided.

That is so ironical it is well worth further consideration. I hope the minister will bear these facts in mind and remember that this legislation is never finished. It is like history, unfinished business. I hope that when, between now and next session, he reviews this legislation with a view to bringing down further amendments he will realize that the granting of adequate allowances, the granting of allowances at all to imperials, and to the men of world war I in the Canadian forces who remained only in Great Britain for a period of over eighteen months, is still a matter of unfinished business.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I say once again that those of us who are not veterans are grateful for the hard work which the veteran members of the special committee have done on behalf of their comrades. I think it is also true to say that in the house and generally throughout the country there will be disappointment that more was not accomplished.

I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Nanaimo that this is unfinished business, and I hope that the government will continue to consider the points raised by those who have spoken thus far this afternoon.

In the first place—and I think this is the view of the citizens of Canada generally—we feel that something better than $40 a month should be done for those whom we know as burnt-out pensioners. There is on the part of Canadians generally a great deal of sympathy for these old soldiers who have become known as burnt-out pensioners, and in the light of today's cost of living, $40 a month is not good enough.

I am sorry that, although the committee did make a change, as I read the reprinted bill, incorporating the extra $10 as part of the allowance itself rather than as a supplementary allowance, the value of that has been somewhat lost by the reduction of the amount of other allowable income from $250 to $125.

I know there is now no ceiling on what is called casual income, but I think that is likely to create difficulties. I remind the government that a similar situation in connection with another piece of legislation developed back in 1943. In that year the government increased the amount of the old age pension by $60, but at the same time it reduced by the sum of $60 the amount of other income which the old age pensioner could earn. Some of us pointed out at the time that this was an anomalous situation which should not be allowed to continue, and it was only a matter of months until the government found that they had to restore the $125 figure which stood in the legislation at that time. I have the feeling that the government will again come to the realization that they should not have contracted this amount of other income which the pensioner may have.

I also strongly support the suggestion, which has been made a good many times from the floor of this house, that the imperial soldier should be included under this legislation. I also urge continued consideration—and I hope it will get somewhere—of this matter of England and world war I. England is not yet considered in this bill to have been a theatre of war. I need not repeat examples of the anomalous situation that this has produced, but I should like to say one word in this connection on behalf of the widows of non-pensioned veterans who are covered under this same legislation. It is tough on the old soldier himself to be in the position referred to by the hon. member for Nanaimo, when he served in England during world war I and was prepared to go to the continent but did not get there, to find that he does not qualify for the burnt-out pension. But it seems even tougher on the widow of a non-pensioned veteran who has passed on, to discover that she is denied this small widows' allowance because her husband—although he served and was prepared to serve anywhere—did not get to the continent during world war I. I would say there is fairly general disappointment that these changes were not made.

Speaking for myself and knowing something of the attitude of other hon. members and of people outside the house, I think I should say there is appreciation of the attitude which the Minister of Veterans Affairs has taken toward the work of his department and also appreciation of the attitude he has shown toward the desires of the members of the committee. In fact this has been a highly significant session of parliament in that regard. I cannot recall another occasion when so many changes in legislation have been made in committee as have been made this time. It is because the minister has paid attention and given consideration to the wishes of the members of the committee that here today we are voicing these sentiments again. We hope that he will treat these matters as unfinished business, that he will continue to give them earnest and sympathetic consideration, and that it will not be long until we shall have a further amendment of this act providing $50 a month as the basic burnt-out pension; restoring the amount of other income that can be earned to the figure at which it stood before; bringing in the imperials, and treating England as a theatre of war in world war I. If this can be done, it will mean a great deal to the burnt-out pensioners covered by this act and also to the widows of non-pensioned veterans.

Mr. MacNICOL: All those who were present on Saturday last at the opening of Sunnybrook hospital in the city of Toronto, and who later in the day had the pleasure of attending the dinner in the Royal York hotel, were pleased at the great applause given to the minister when his name was called and he was asked to stand up on each occasion. It showed the appreciation of the soldier city of Toronto for what the minister has being trying to do and for what he has done. I myself was highly pleased with the great reception that the minister received there; because when Toronto is satisfied it gives a good reception.

I want to add just a few words to what has already been said. I agree with all that was said by the hon. member for Wentworth, the hon. member for Nanaimo, the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. These hon. members demonstrated, as they have on many previous occasions, their sympathy for the soldiers and their dependents. I have the great honour of representing a part of the city of Toronto in which is located the section known as Earlscourt which, in the first great war, enlisted almost to a man and filled up the Princess Patricia's battalion, of which I had the honour to be patron. In the second great war the men in that section enlisted by the thousands. Other sections of Toronto and elsewhere perhaps in Canada did as well; but I can say that no part of Canada did any better and few parts equalled the voluntary enlistments in that area.

A few days ago a case came to my attention —and they are coming in all the time—about which I believe I have written to the department. It was that of a widow of the class mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Her husband served in the first great war; but because the officers who were around England apparently took a great fancy to the services he could render to them, they did not allow him to go to France. They kept him in England. He was there for four years. He died some time ago; I have just forgotten the date. His widow has been appealing to me to see if she could not receive some consideration. Because her husband did not serve in France during the war, she gets mighty little return for his four years' service in England. Therefore I agree with all that has been said by the other hon. members. Surely the time has come when those who served in England and were kept there against their will —because this particular man did his best to get over to France, as I know many others did—should receive consideration, and when England should be considered as having been a theatre of war in the first great war. I support what was said by the previous speakers in that regard.

I now wish to refer to the imperials. I remember very well that, in the part of the city in which I live, prior to the great war all sorts of rifle companies were in existence. These people nearly all came from the old country. Nearly every family I knew came from there. They formed rifle battalions and practised shooting, and one military exercise and another in that part of the city. Anticipating the storm that was approaching at that time, quite a number of them went to the old country immediately before war was declared and enlisted in regiments in Great Britain. I have in mind two brothers. One of them rushed over to Britain in order to be ready to defend his homeland. The other, who was not able to go from Canada at that time, later went over after the war was declared and fought in the great war. After the war was over, the one who, preceding the opening of the war, had gone to Britain, served faithfully over there, and was badly wounded, came back to Canada again because he liked Canada. His British pension is not one, two, three with that of his brother who served in the Canadian forces.

I endorse everything that was said by previous speakers. Surely to goodness the time has come to consider the imperial veterans of that class and, in addition, the imperial veterans who came out and lived here for twenty years. I believe the hon. member for Wentworth strongly emphasized the twenty-year limit for imperial veterans, with regard to both pension and war veterans allowance. I cannot add anything to what he and others have said in that regard, but I strongly endorse what they have said. These men served in the defence of the empire and of Canada in the first war, and surely they should receive some recognition. It is not their fault that the dear old mother country has been so drained of resources, both at home and abroad, that she is on her back today. It is not their fault that the homeland cannot give them the same recompense as is given to their brothers who were here in Canada.

I for one have every confidence that, now the minister has started on his way, he will consider the representations which have been made today by those whose knowledge of this matter is much greater than my own. I have taken very little part in discussions of this kind, and I do so now mostly because of the thousands and thousands of old country people who live in my part of the city of Toronto. A great majority of them served in the first war, and in many cases their sons and daughters served in the last war.

I am happy that consideration is being given to the widows of soldiers who served in England. Many of those widows were without pensions for a long time. As the minister knows, I was the first one in the house to bring up the question of non-pensioned widows' pensions. I was always supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre after he came to the house. I spoke the strongest words at my command on their behalf. I have seen so many of them die without recognition and without receiving what they should have received.

I trust that the minister will take into his warm consideration, not only the claims of the imperial veterans and of those who served in England but did not get to France, but also of the widows of those who did serve.

Mr. LOCKHART: I wish to say just a word, because I do not want to repeat what has been said previously. I did not have the privilege of sitting on this committee, but I do want to express regret that certain phases of this matter were not treated favourably. In my own area there is a very active organization of British Canadian veterans. I have listened to the presentations made by different hon. members, especially the hon. member for Nanaimo, and I in turn could cite dozens of cases where inconsistency has occurred, apparently because of the attitude of certain members of the veterans committee.

I am rather confused in trying to understand why the members of the committee split on party lines. It seems to me that the interests of these men and the widows of these men who served so valiantly should be above that. There appears to be a feeling among British Canadian veterans, among the widows of those who served in different branches of the services, among those who have not received recognition, that there is still some faint hope; that a new outlook is possible with the advent of the new minister.

The members of the veterans committee did noble work in trying to advance legislation that would be more in the interests of our veterans and their widows. I want to say to the minister that in the short time he has served he has gained the confidence, not only of those who have been favourably dealt with but of those who are somewhat disappointed. But, as has been said, this is a continuing work. I believe I am only reflecting the views of many in my part of Canada when I say I feel that this matter will not die simply because a particular cross-section of this house which was serving on the veterans committee decided to split on the lines which have been indicated by the hon. member for Acadia. Perhaps the minister will find ways of correcting these inconsistencies in connection with those who served equally as well as those who are being favourably treated by the terms of this bill. I want to impress upon the minister the need for continuing this work, so that there will be no inconsistencies in the administration of veterans affairs.

Mr. HERRIDGE: As a member of the veterans affairs committee, I first wish to indicate the keen enjoyment I have had in working on that committee. I think I speak for all the members of the committee when I express my appreciation of the way in which the chairman of the war veterans allowance board, his officials and the officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs presented evidence, facts, figures and information to the committee. I have rarely sat on a committee where information has been given more clearly and more fully. Anything the committee asked for concerning any aspect of veterans affairs was presented without question and in an understandable form.

I do not want to take up time this afternoon by speaking at length, but I should like to support what previous speakers have said with regard to disappointment in connection with certain aspects of this bill. I think the major disappointment as far as veterans' organizations are concerned is in connection with the treatment given to their suggested amendments. I am sure that the $40 a month which was decided upon was far short of what the veterans' organizations of this country expected, and hoped for and desired.

A couple of weeks ago I had an opportunity of attending the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion at Saskatoon. Many matters of great interest to the delegates and to the Canadian people were brought up before that large gathering of nearly one thousand delegates. I think the matter of greatest interest to the delegates at that convention was that of securing $50 a month for those who are entitled to war veterans allowance. That was evidenced by the special concern about the matter, and by the sending of telegrams to the minister and the chairman of the committee on veterans affairs, urging reconsideration of the committee's former decisions.

I am sure the attitude of the legion and other veterans' organizations has the support of a large number of people in this country. I am sure, too, that the majority of the Canadian people wish to make certain that aging veterans have at least sufficient to get along in a very modest way. I am sure no one would suggest that $40 a month is sufficient under present living costs and conditions.

These men form a particular group. In many instances they have suffered pre-aging and war disabilities. Owing to developments within our industrial structure, it is much more difficult for them to obtain additional employment than it was twenty years ago. I will admit that in the smaller places many of these men can supplement their income to a limited extent, but in the larger centres it is becoming increasingly difficult to do this from day to day.

Therefore I again support the remarks of hon. members who have expressed their disappointment concerning the decision to grant only $40 a month to those entitled to war veterans allowance.

Then, there is a group of imperials who have resided in this country for twenty years but who served with the British forces. In so doing, they were indirectly defending Canada. They have come to this country and spent many years of their lives here. Now many of them are in a position where they require assistance. I am quite sure that here, again, not only the veterans' organizations but the vast majority of the Canadian people would wish to see them given entitlement to war veterans allowance.

There is also the group of Canadians who served only in England. As was mentioned by a previous speaker, prior to the recent convention the legion had not taken a stand on this matter. It is now the considered opinion of the legion, as a result of comradeship and a fellow feeling for those in distress, that those who saw service in England should be brought under the War Veterans Allowance Act, and the legion has so urged upon the government and the committee.

We have to look at this question from all points of view. We must have a sense of responsibility and consider the financial aspects of the matter. But when one considers the sum mentioned as being necessary to increase veterans allowances to $50 a month, to give allowances to imperials who have lived in Canada for twenty years and to give veterans allowances to Canadians who served in England, he realizes that it is not beyond the easy capacity of the Canadian people to pay. I am sure these payments would receive the endorsation of Canadians as a whole.

In that respect my principal argument would be that the defence of Canada is a national responsibility. Therefore I, in common with many other members of the committee, maintain that those who suffered disabilities of war are entitled to be cared for by the nation. Their care is a national responsibility. While this bill is a great improvement on the one presented to the committee, and while the recommendations have been accepted in several respects, I suggest that the minister and the government should give further consideration to increasing the allowance to $50 a month, giving veterans allowances to imperials resident in Canada for twenty years, and to Canadians who served in England, in view of the fact that many people maintain—and, I believe, rightly so—that the care of those who suffered by war is a national responsibility.

Mr. MOORE: I do not intend to take up much time of the committee, but perhaps as a member of the committee on veterans affairs I should congratulate the minister upon the fine spirit he has shown in dealing with veterans problems.

I regret, however, that the committee found it difficult to obtain changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act. It was noticeable that the government accepted the changes suggested by the committee so far as the Pension Act is concerned, but it was not quite so ready to accept changes with respect to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I do not wish to cover any of the ground already covered; but, because of the large amount of correspondence received in the past year, I would say that the recommendation of the committee that England be considered a theatre of war in the first world war, within the meaning of the act, should be reconsidered by the government.

Another matter which should be brought to the attention of the government is that of applications for war veterans allowance by soldiers of the Canadian army who saw service only in Canada. I happen to have a number of applications from men who served for at least two years in Canada and who are now in necessitous circumstances. Because benefits under this act can be granted only for service performed in a theatre of actual war, they cannot be included. Something should be done to relieve the circumstances under which most of these people are now forced to live. The high cost of living has had a great deal to do with the applications now coming in for increased benefits under veterans legislation.

Mr. LENNARD: There is one situation I should like to describe on the record, because to my mind it is stupid. It seems odd that two departments of the same government cannot agree as to whether a man is or is not employable. Under the regulations which apply with respect to the War Veterans Allowance Act, a man must be permanently unemployable before he can qualify for the allowance. The unemployment insurance commission say that a man must be available and able to work before benefits under their scheme are payable. Yet a man who can qualify for war veterans allowance must expend his unemployment insurance benefits or credits first.

How can a man who is permanently unemployable be available for work? If a man qualifies for a war veterans allowance, why cannot his unemployment insurance benefits or credits be disregarded, so that he can be paid his war veterans allowance from the day he qualifies? The position of an individual could be indicated on paper. This would save a man a good deal of running around and standing in line at employment offices, when it is a foregone conclusion he will not be employed anyway.

I wanted to put that statement on record, so that the department could straighten the matter out in the next year, and thereby prevent this stupid arrangement from continuing.

Mr. SKEY: While the department is considering the matters mentioned by the hon. member for Wentworth, I suggest that it might consider the domicile clause in the Pension Act and gratuities and rehabilitation benefits. I know the minister and his deputy are aware of the situation. It seems to me wrong that we should consider a man eligible for rehabilitation in Canada and for all these benefits, and then if he has lost a leg or an arm in war, permit the domicile clause, which is different from that in the rehabilitation measure, to take away from him pension benefits to which he would be justly entitled.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Maximum allowance in certain cases.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): This is the main section of the bill, and provides for a small increase in the veterans allowance. I do not want to rehash all the matters that came before the committee or what has been said this afternoon, but I would read to the minister from the report of the veterans affairs committee, where at page 661 I find this:

Mr. White: This comes back to the argument I raised the other day. It really means that the veteran who is getting both the veterans allowance and earning the full amount is not going to benefit in any way by this increase.

The Chairman: Correct.

Mr. White: Even if you carry Mr. Harris' motion, it will still mean exactly that.

The Chairman: That is correct. The only difference is it does remove it from the questionable category of a supplementary grant, and raises to $485 his maximum receipts. Are you ready for the question, then?

So this really means that the veteran who, under the old act, was getting $365 a year if single, and double that if married, and earning the full amount available, will not benefit in any way under the amendment which the minister now proposes. Does the minister disagree with me?

Secondly, with the amount restricted to $365, plus whatever the veteran's casual earnings may be, I fear that the amendment will have a tendency in some cases to make the veteran who is able to work and earn something decide that he will simply not earn that extra money if his allowance is to be cut down to the maximum of $485. I would have thought the minister would leave the earnings at $250 for a single man and $365 for a married man or a widower with children. It was pointed out in the committee that a large number of widows will benefit by the act, and I am very glad that they will receive the benefit of the act. On the other hand a large number of veterans who are receiving the allowance today will not benefit in any way from the amendment which the minister now proposes. I would suggest to the minister that, even at this late date, he consider amending this section to provide that the earnings shall be increased to at least $250 since, if the amount is left at $125, many veterans will not benefit in any way, because they will refuse to earn extra money if their allowance is to be cut.

The minister and his department and the government must have taken some notice of the storm of protest at the legion convention a few weeks ago. The legion requested a further hearing by the committee, which was granted, and I should like to read one paragraph from the supplementary brief presented by the legion and dealing with this increase. It will be found at page 2:

The dominion council is greatly concerned about an increasing number of veterans who are finding it impossible to secure any employment and must subsist solely on the allowance. Certainly in these days, the allowances provided by the bill under consideration are quite inadequate for food and shelter alone.

I would impress on the minister those last few words, "are quite inadequate for food and shelter alone." No member of this house would say that the request of the legion that the basic rate for single men and widows be $50, and $85 for married men and widowers with children, is unreasonable. As I said, I ask the minister, even at this late stage, to reconsider and recommend to the cabinet, first, that the veteran be allowed to have larger earnings, and second, that the recommendation in the legion brief be implemented.

Mr. GREGG: I do not propose this afternoon to refer to all the things that have been said, because most of these questions were fully discussed in the veterans affairs committee. I want to say, first of all, that I and the officials of my department realize fully that these matters affecting veterans are unfinished business and will remain unfinished business long after the end of this session, even if Canada should not take part in any more wars.

The discussion this afternoon has ranged about two items connected with the bill. One is the amount of the increase. The other is eligibility: the eligibility of those who served in Britain only in the first war; and secondly, the eligibility of the British Canadian veterans who came to Canada after the old war and resided in Canada for many years but who was not resident in Canada prior to his service in 1914. The arguments on that have been discussed here and elsewhere. I am not going to say that the increase we have provided in the bill is such as any member of the veterans affairs committee or any member of this house would like to see, but I would point out that since 1930 the War Veterans Allowance Act has been twice improved in that respect. It was $20 in 1930 and stands at $40 today for the single man, and $70 for the married man. The government felt, in a year when the pensions bill had been increased, the first increase since 1926, that the committee had incorporated in this bill a reasonable increase which is looked upon as a permanent increase. We are now at a peak time as to both cost of living and employment. It is true, as has been stated this afternoon, that the older veterans cannot all get work; nevertheless a surprisingly large proportion of them are working, a great many of them full-time and many of them part-time. They are anxious to work, and I doubt whether many of them will give up useful and interesting works just to keep themselves within the terms of the amount which will be applicable to them under these amendments.

We should also bear in mind that there must be some equitable relationship between the benefits under this act and the benefits granted to those old people who did not serve Canada in uniform in the early days of their lives. As it is now, leaving out of consideration for the moment a very special factor, the terms of this act by and large—I am not going to argue the details this afternoon—are as good as those of any old age pension scheme in any province of Canada. But the special factor which I mentioned is that under this bill the old soldier at the age of sixty, if he comes within its terms, automatically gets war veterans allowance at the age of sixty rather than at the age of seventy, as is the case with old age pensions.

On the point of eligibility of members of the Canadian forces who served only in England during the first war, I think it is evident from the discussion here this afternoon that, if at this time they were made eligible under this bill, right behind it comes the next point: What about those who served only in Canada for four or five years in the first war? Side by side with that comes another point: What about the second war and those who served only in Canada? You have those questions raised right there. It is but dodging the issue to say these are not so vocal. I think, before that bridge is crossed, some decision must be reached. I think, too, the generation of veterans who are still young, and who served only in Canada, in the second war, might give some consideration to looking forward in years to come to an equitable protection through the normal social security measures within our country.

On the third point I state right now that I should like to consider all the factors which have been submitted in the discussion this afternoon and to keep it under consideration for the future.

Mr. PEARKES: The minister is drawing a red herring across the trail by talking about considering those men who served only in Canada during the first war. That point has never been raised at all.

Mr. GREGG: It was raised this afternoon.

Mr. PEARKES: It has not been raised in the house.

Mr. MUTCH: Yes, this afternoon.

Mr. KNOWLES: I thought I was following the minister very closely, but I did not get what he meant by the third point that he said he was keeping under active consideration.

Mr. GREGG: The third point was with regard to the British Canadians, or, as they have nearly always been called, the imperial veterans who served in the British forces in a theatre of battle in the first great war, and who, since then, have come to Canada and have been here for many years. They will be kept under consideration for the future.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is one other point I should like to have perfectly clear, namely, the ceiling on the combined income allowed to a burnt-out pensioner. I recognize that, at the moment, I am not looking at the fact that casual income is outside the pale. Apart from that, the bill as it went to the committee provided in the case of single veterans for an allowance of $365 and $250 other income, or a total ceiling of $615 a year. The bill as it has come back from the committee provides for an allowance of $485 and other income of $125, or a ceiling of $610. In other words, there has been an actual reduction of $5 a year in the ceiling on allowance and other income. The corresponding figures for a married burnt-out pensioner are as follows: The bill as it went to the committee provided for an allowance of $730, and $375 other income permissible, or a total of $1,105. The bill as we now have it before us provides for an allowance of $850, and other income of $250, or a total of $1,100. The amount involved is small, only $5 a year, but it does seem strange that this reduction should have been made. How it comes about is that the allowance has been increased by $120 a year, and the amount of other income allowed has been reduced by $125 a year. Basically I strongly support the point made by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough that the amount of other income should be put back to $250. I remind the government again that that is what they found they had to do with respect to the old age pension question back in 1943 and 1944. But at the moment I should like to have this reduction of $5 clarified.

Mr. GREGG: I am rather averse to going into the intricacies of this. All I can do is to assure the hon. member that the object sought by the committee with regard to that angle of it, at any rate, has been achieved. It will be remembered that in the original draft of the bill the expression used was "supplementary allowance of $10 a month". That then was a separate item. Then, when the parliamentary committee got at it they said, why do you call it a supplementary allowance? There was no reason, because it was intended that it should be permanent, anyway. Therefore it was lifted from there over to another clause. I am assured by the deputy minister that it conveys the desire of the committee on that score, and that the thing which is desired to be done is being done. The permissible income remains the same.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand what the committee did, and for the moment I am not arguing as to the facts of the case. I have pointed out that the committee transferred the $120 from what was previously called a supplemental allowance and made it part of the allowance itself. The committee offset that transfer by making a reduction in the permissible income. But when they reduced the permissible income they did not reduce it by the same figure, $120, they reduced it by $125, hence the $5 reduction.

Mr. GREGG: The permissible income remains exactly the same in the first draft and the draft now before the committee.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to follow up what the hon. member for Nanaimo said regarding the amount of the pension. I hope that the minister will give consideration to the men of the first war who were not allowed to leave Britain. I have a typical case in my own constituency. This man went overseas in the early part of the war, in 1914. He was among the first to go over. He was employed in instructing officers in gas warfare. I am sure that the hon. member remembers those days. That man was not allowed to leave Britain. He is now back home. He has lived in Canada all his life. He is refused a pension because he was not out of Britain. I think the minister will probably admit that this is a deserving case, and there may be more than one.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to point out to the minister that in both clauses 3 and 4 these words are used: "Without child or children." Both the single and the plural are used. I take it that this means that a widow or widower, whether he or she has one child or six children would receive the same amount of allowance. The allowance would be exactly the same. Is that correct?

Mr. GREGG: That is correct.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): If that is correct, does the minister not think a widower with more than one child should have a permissible income of more than $250 a year?

Mr. GREGG: I cannot very well answer the question offhand as to whether I consider it adequate. I do not think the item has been challenged by the committee, and I should like to see it carried as it is.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): In the Pension Act there is a separate allowance for each child. Apparently the War Veterans Allowance Act does not recognize more than one child. The amount of the allowance is exactly the same. I am not quarrelling with that; but the widower is restricted as to the amount of money that he can earn without reducing his war veterans allowance. Surely a widower with several children should be allowed to earn more than $250 a year without having his veterans allowance reduced. I do not think anybody would question that.

Mr. GREGG: I should like to point out that, compared with pensions, quite a different principle is involved here. In the case of old age pensions, there is no arrangement in any of the provinces for children. This is not intended to be more than some assistance for the veteran who needs it at that particular period of his life, and it is fair to state that there are not a great many who would come under that section owing to their age.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): That may be true, but you should recognize the liability, because you are providing that a widow with a child shall get double the amount. If you recognize it for one child it is only reasonable to recognize it for the other children.

Mr. TUSTIN: I cannot see why these men should not be allowed to earn a little extra money. Two cases were brought to my attention last week. One man drew the burnt-out pension and he could do some light work. He has two children; his wife has been ill for some time, and he advises me that it is actually impossible for him to get by on the allowance he is receiving, being allowed to earn only $250 in the year. I urge the minister to give further consideration to this provision.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If a man with a 50 per cent pensionable disability dies of that disability his widow receive $840?

Mr. MUTCH: The question the hon. gentleman asks relates to disability pensions. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act, it is not a question of degree of disability, since it is not strictly a pension in that sense but a living allowance. Therefore the question has no application to this specific act.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If a man has a disability of 50 per cent or more, his widow will receive the whole $850. I think that is correct. Therefore a deadline is struck at 50 per cent. Why that is done no one seems to know. If a man has a 45 per cent disability which is pensionable, and he dies, the widow receives $485. I do not see why there should be that difference. My suggestion is that further consideration should be given this point. At the present time $40 a month is about the equivalent of $20 before the war, so that there is no increase. I am making a plea for these women. They are all getting older, especially those from the last war. First of all, the deadline was 80 per cent. If the disability was over 80 per cent the widow automatically got the pension. Gradually that was lowered to 50 per cent. I do not know why that figure was decided upon. The widow whose husband had a 50 per cent disability is in the same category as the widow whose husband's disability was 45 per cent.

Mr. MUTCH: It is now 48 per cent.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The difference between $850 and $485 is considerable. The amount of the allowance at the present time is only $40 a month, which is no more than the equivalent of $20 a month before the war. As regards both the burnt-out pensioner and the widow, it would be only a small matter for the government to bring the allowance up to $50 a month. The minister has referred to old age pensions, but that has nothing to do with the matter. The widow's husband when overseas suffered a certain degree of disability, and she looked after him. Some consideration should be given her. It would not hurt the dominion if the amount were increased to $50. The amount the veteran is allowed to earn is also ridiculously low when one considers the cost of living. I know of one veteran who can earn a bit more than $250. He is suffering from silicosis and cannot work all the time. He is a stone worker and that is all he gets, so that his income for the year is very small. Something should be done to increase these allowances.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Maximum allowance in certain cases.

Mr. LENNARD: A married couple under the Old Age Pensions Act in some provinces can get up to $80 a month, and under this act as revised the maximum is a little over $70 a month. I know what the answer will be: they receive pension at sixty years of age instead of at seventy. But when a war veteran reaches the age of seventy, in order to receive the additional $9 or $10 a month under the present regulations he may not wish to transfer to the old age pension scheme. In many cases I do not think the veteran would wish to do that. I think he would wish to feel that he was getting his pension from the source from which he had earned it, instead of transferring to another source.

Mr. KNIGHT: Paragraph (c) of this section refers to a veteran deserted by his or her spouse. I was thinking of the contrary case where the veteran deserted his spouse and I was wondering about the rights of the wife under those circumstances. Where there is a voluntary separation, established over a number of years, the veteran can claim and receive veterans allowance only as if he were a single man. Is that correct?

Mr. GREGG: In the situation outlined, the allowance would belong to the veteran.

Mr. KNIGHT: The spouse has no claim in the matter?

Mr. GREGG: No.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is it a fact that in the case of an established separation, a voluntary separation, the veteran when he draws the veterans allowance draws only such veterans allowance as is customarily granted to a single man?

Mr. GREGG: That is correct.

Mr. KNIGHT: To follow that up a little further, the man's receiving his allowance as a married man—that is to say, receiving the greater amount—is conditional upon the fact that he is living with his wife.

Mr. GREGG: That is right.

Mr. KNIGHT: If the circumstances are such that he does not live with his wife, and he still has to support her—which is true in many cases—he still can use to support her only the amount of his allowance which he draws as a single man and not as a married man. That is also correct, is it?

Mr. GREGG: For ordinary normal absence, the allowance for the wife would be continued. As in most things, it is a matter of intention. If they are apart and intend to live together, and if everything is in order with regard to their marriage relationship, certainly their allowance will be continued. But if they have broken it up for any reason, then he would be a single man as far as we are concerned.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. MUTCH: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. There are some amendments to be made.

Mr. GREGG: There are one or two amendments from the parliamentary committee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Are they new clauses?

Mr. MUTCH: Yes, there are new clauses. I would ask my colleague the Secretary of State to move each one in turn.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West) moved:

To amend section 19, subsections 1 and 2, by changing 365 to 485 when those figures appear.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall this amendment carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: Can we be told the effect of it?

Mr. MUTCH: This is a consequential amendment to bring this section into line with the provision in sections 7, 8 and 11 which substitute $485 for $365.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MUTCH: Then there is this second amendment which I will ask the Secretary of State to move.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West) moved:

To delete from part IV of the act paragraph 12 (1).

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall that amendment carry?

Mr. MUTCH: During the deliberations of the committee it was pointed out that the regulations at the present time make it impossible for a Canadian who served with the Canadian forces but who, subsequently to his service, had been residing in the United States, to return to Canada and to obtain relief under this legislation until a period of three months had elapsed. Formerly the period was six months, and a former committee reduced that to three months. The committee this year agreed that the necessity for that three months' period had lapsed. That is the purpose of introducing the amendment which we have just had the Secretary of State move. It is bringing into line an overlooked recommendation of the committee to eliminate that waiting period.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MUTCH: There is one more amendment which I will ask the Secretary of State to move.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West) moved:

To amend paragraph (d) of section 4 of the act by adding after the word "allies" in line three the words "or powers associated with His Majesty in world war I."

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall this amendment carry?

Mr. MUTCH: I should like to offer a word of explanation. It appears that, since the conclusion of world war I, those Canadians who served in the United States forces, or those Americans who were domiciled in Canada but served in the United States forces and then returned and lived in Canada since, are not eligible under this act by virtue of the fact that it has been held that the United States was not an ally in world war I but rather an associated power. A small number of veterans in that category have been denied the benefits of this legislation. This amendment will make it possible for those applications to be granted.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported with amendments.

Amendments read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. GREGG moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. LENNARD: On division.

VETERANS REHABILITATION ACT

EXTENSION OF ALLOWANCE PROVISIONS

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 200, to amend the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—"Dependent" defined.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. MENARY: May we have the bill?

Mr. KNOWLES: We have not yet received the bill.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is in your file.

Mr. KNOWLES: But it has since been amended.

Mr. PEARKES: Has it not been amended since it was first printed?

Mr. KNOWLES: This is not a reprint, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the minister can tell us whether the amendments are extensive.

Mr. GREGG: When the resolution was before the house I outlined the bill itself quite fully. There are no amendments to amount to anything. I will refer to them immediately. On page 5 of the bill, there is an amendment at the last line, which reads "on the thirtieth day of September, 1947," to make it read "on the thirtieth day of June, 1948." That was the only amendment proposed by the parliamentary committee.

Mr. PEARKES: On what page was that?

Mr. GREGG: On the last page.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. We had better wait until we come to that point.

Mr. GREGG: Yes, we will come to that. It is the last line of the section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Persons deemed to be discharged as of September 30, 1947.

Mr. GREGG: This is the section to which I referred. I would ask my colleague the Secretary of State to move that, in the last line on page 5, "June" be substituted for "September" and "forty-eight" be substituted for "forty-seven."

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I move accordingly.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASE IN SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 198, to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Fishermen.

Mr. SKEY: I should like to bring a matter to the minister's attention, mainly with the idea of getting his advice. This is a problem which we have met with from time to time in large centres. I think it would be better if I described the situation rather than put a question to the minister. It is possible for a home owner on enumeration to register a considerable number of people who may be casual visitors but who are not necessarily residents in that particular place.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I do not think that would come under section 1.

Mr. SKEY: Is this not a general section?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This section amends certain sections of the elections act.

Mr. SKEY: Would the minister tell me if there is any section under which I can bring this matter up?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It should have been referred to on the second reading of the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Tenure of office, salary, rank, and powers of chief electoral officer.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There is an amendment to section 2 which I will ask the Minister of Public Works to move. This was suggested by the committee that considered this bill, and it deals with the appointment and remuneration of the chief electoral officer.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move:

2. (1) Subsection one of section four of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"4. (1) The chief electoral officer shall rank as and have all the powers of a deputy head of a department, communicate with the governor in council through the Secretary of State of Canada, devote himself exclusively to the performance of the duties of his office and be paid a salary of not less than eight nor more than ten thousand dollars per annum to be fixed by order of the governor in council. He shall be eligible as a contributor under and entitled to all the benefits of the Civil Service Superannuation Act but, until he has attained the age of sixty-five years when he shall be compulsorily retired, he shall be removable only for cause in the same manner as a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada.

(2) Subsection one of this section, and subsection one of section four of the said act as enacted by subsection one of this section, shall become operative only upon the retirement of the person who is chief electoral officer at the date of the coming into force of this act.

(3) The person who is chief electoral officer at the date of the coming into force of this act, shall be paid a salary of ten thousand dollars, per annum as from the first day of July, nineteen hundred and forty-seven."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is difficult to follow an amendment when one has not it before him. There was some reference to a salary of between $8,000 and $10,000 to be fixed by the governor in council. Would the minister explain the reason for that and tell me in what other legislation is there a provision analogous to that, whereby the fixing of the amount rests with the governor in council?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The salary of the chief electoral officer was set in the act that is being amended at $8,000. The present incumbent has been there for many years and has given valuable service. It was felt that his remuneration should be increased to $10,000, but it was also considered that this should not necessarily apply to any new appointee. It was thought that the salary should have a limit of $10,000, but that provision should be made whereby a new appointee could be appointed at a salary ranging between $8,000 and $10,000.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3, 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Qualifications.

Mr. WINTERS: There is an amendment here which I shall ask the Minister of Public Works to move and which reads:

That section 14(2)(i) as set out in section 6 of Bill 198 be deleted.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I so move.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BROWN: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni:

That section 6 be amended by deleting subsection 2 (f) of section 14 as set out in section 6 of the bill.

The purpose of this amendment—

Mr. MILLER: On a point of order, what happened to the amendment moved a moment ago in connection with section 14 (2) (i)?

Mr. KNOWLES: It carried.

Mr. MILLER: No, it did not.

Mr. PEARKES: I was on my feet to object to it.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): That is right; the hon. member was on his feet.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I did not know the hon. member for Nanaimo wished to speak.

Mr. BROWN: Which amendment are we dealing with?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with the amendment moved by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. PEARKES: Would the minister explain the purpose of that amendment?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The purpose is to enable Canadian citizens who are of Japanese race to be eligible to vote.

Mr. PEARKES: Is that irrespective of whether they were eligible to vote in the province in which they were residing?

[Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West).]

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, that is correct.

Mr. PEARKES: Is there any other case where people are not eligible to vote in a province, but who are being permitted to vote in federal elections?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes, there are others. For example, there are some who are inmates of charitable institutions.

Mr. PEARKES: Are they not permitted to vote in the provinces?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): In some provinces they are not permitted to vote.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Also the Doukhobors of British Columbia are covered by subsection 2 (i). I believe those in charitable institutions are covered by another section of the bill.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the deletion of subsection 2 (i) mean that henceforth in British Columbia Doukhobors and Japanese will vote in that province in federal elections? Perhaps they would come under paragraph (j)?

Mr. PEARKES: The Doukhobors will be permitted to vote as well.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No; they come under another section of the act which is not being amended.

Mr. PEARKES: Can the minister explain why? Are the Doukhobors not a race?

Mr. MacINNIS: I will explain the point. They are debarred from voting because they refuse to accept military service. They are exempt from military service because of the order in council under which they came to Canada. The situation is altogether different.

Mr. PEARKES: Are the Quakers debarred for that reason?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No; they do not come under this section. The Doukhobors came to this country under a special agreement. I shall read paragraph (j), which is not being repealed. It states:

In any province, every person exempted or entitled to claim exemption or who on production of any certificate might have become or would now be entitled to claim exemption from military service by reason of the order in council of December 6, 1898, because the doctrines of his religion make him averse to bearing arms, and who is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province.

Amendment (Mr. Fournier, Hull) agreed to.

Mr. SKEY: Before putting the second amendment—

Mr. BROWN: I think I have the floor, speaking to the second amendment.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I have read the hon. member's amendment, and he is speaking to it.

Mr. BROWN: Will you call it six o'clock?

Mr. SKEY: It will not take me long.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BROWN: It is just two minutes to six o'clock.

An hon. MEMBER: Hurry up.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, I shall give my reason for the amendment. The Indian Affairs committee, which is a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, has considered the question of voting by the Indian population in Canada. On or about May 6 of this year a unanimous report was made by the committee to the house, recommending that votes be given to the Indians on the same basis as they are given to urban voters. The reason was that in that way it would be necessary that they be enumerated and be on the enumerators' list. At elections they would not be able to go to the polls with some other person already on the list, and be sworn in.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock the hon. member for Essex West was speaking to an amendment.

Mr. BROWN: Mr. Chairman, as we adjourned for the dinner recess I had explained that this amendment is the result of a report made to this house by the Indian affairs committee on or about the 6th day of May of this year, recommending that the North American Indian on a reserve in Canada be given the right to vote in dominion elections on the same basis as voters in urban centres. The Indian would then have to be enumerated and be on an enumerator's list on election day. This recommendation was the result of many representations made to the committee by various organizations from coast to coast throughout Canada and by many Indian organizations. Representations have also been made by one who, as I speak here tonight, is sitting in the gallery of this house, the Reverend Doctor Peter Kelly, of the Native Brotherhood of British Columbia, a Doctor of Divinity and a member of the United Church clergy.

The Indian pays taxes. He pays sales tax; he pays income tax on income earned off the reserve; in fact, he pays all taxes except taxes on the land he occupies on the reserve. It is therefore felt by the Indians that they are paying taxes and having no representation. The principle of taxation without representation does not appeal to them or to many church and other organizations. It was unanimously felt by the committee that the giving of the vote to the Indian would create in him a desire to help himself—the theme of the Indian affairs committee since its inception has been that we were endeavouring to help the Indian help himself—and that it would create in the Indian a sense of obligation to society. It would train him in our democratic practices and make him realize that he has a place in the Canadian economy and in the Canadian society.

On the other hand, the giving of the vote to the Indian would result in a recognition by government agencies and by members of parliament that the Indian was not a chattel but a human being and as such had certain rights in our society and that he should be looked to and his rights be protected. In other words, the thought of the committee has been that the giving of the vote to the Indian will help us to assimilate the Indian. When I say assimilate I do not mean that the Indian would lose his rich background of cultural achievements, or any of the rights that he enjoys under treaties, or any of his rights, statutory or at common law; but that he would be recognized as being a human being and subject to the attention of those seeking office.

This thought of the Indian affairs committee and this recommendation are not without precedent, for in the United States the vote was given to the Indian in federal elections with certain minor qualifications. So that in moving this amendment, Mr. Chairman, I feel that a great step would be taken toward the assimilation of the Indian into the population of the Dominion of Canada, and it would make not only Indians but the other Canadians realize that we are all united.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Chairman, in rising to second the amendment of the hon. member for Essex West, who, as the committee knows, was chairman of the Indian affairs committee, I think it is well to call attention at once to the recommendation that was submitted to the house last year by the Indian affairs committee in regard to the enfranchisement of Indians. Perhaps I should not say "enfranchisement," because the Indians feel that there is some liability connected with that term; shall I say, grant the privilege to the Indian of voting in a federal election.

I can well appreciate the stand now taken by the Indians. They feel that they are unjustly taxed by the income tax law, because they say they have not a vote. Generally speaking, it is the more advanced and more cultured Indians who will be paying most of the tax, because in ordinary circumstances the more cultured among them have the higher incomes.

When the Indian affairs committee made this recommendation we knew that the committee on the Dominion Elections Act was sitting, and I thought at that time it would be possible for that committee to consider our recommendation and make it possible for certain segments of our Indian population, the better educated and more advanced, to vote in dominion elections. Everyone will agree that the problem of Indians voting is a peculiar one. We have 125,000 Indians scattered over this country from the United States border to the Arctic ocean, and as a result they are bound to be in all stages of civilization. The more advanced professional people among the Indians live near the United States border, and the Indians who are still in almost an aboriginal state live farther north. I do not think it would be wise to grant to the aboriginal native Indian, without an education and without a knowledge of English, the same privilege that we grant to his brother who may be a professional man. That is the feeling of the Indian leaders themselves. They realize what a vast difference there is in the culture of the Indians in various parts of Canada.

As a way out of some part of the problem, it seems to me that it might be necessary for us to recommend to the committee on the Dominion Elections Act that an Indian applying for the privilege of voting be required to fill in an application to indicate to the enumerators that he can read and write. It does not seem quite right that a man who cannot read the names on the ballot should have the privilege and the responsibility of going into an election booth and taking part in a federal election. There is no question that the educational disability which some of the Indians possess will be overcome in the next twenty years so far as seventy-five per cent of them are concerned. Anybody who has studied the program of the Department of Mines and Resources and the Department of National Health and Welfare will realize that these branches of government are making available a greater sum of money to further Indian educational advancement. From my own personal knowledge of the Indians on the Pacific coast, I would say that within the next twenty years most of them will be competent to exercise an intelligent franchise without any test as to education. In fact, most of them are competent now. The difficulties and problems which the Indians now face will certainly be solved by the action of the members of parliament whom, I trust, they will help to elect when they receive the vote.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The amendment which has been offered is one which has not been considered by the elections committee. I understand that many problems will arise if this amendment is passed. I would hesitate to hold up the passage of this bill by referring the amendment back to the committee which has already considered the elections act. The committee considered the act last session and throughout this session. The amendment which has been put forward tonight is not one that was brought before the committee during its meeting, and while I do not know all the problems that it would raise, I understand that many Indians are not anxious to have the vote. I understand that in Saskatchewan the chiefs of all the tribes in that province at a gathering decided to have a petition forwarded that they be not granted the vote, since they felt it might be the thin edge of the wedge to take away their treaty rights. I believe this matter should be thoroughly considered by the elections committee before being incorporated in the act, and I would suggest that the amendment be dropped in the meantime and referred to the elections committee at another session, so that it could be given careful consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: I have not had an opportunity of going over this bill, but I wish to express my views on the principle of the disqualification clause. I am in favour of allowing the Indians to vote, because they should be citizens. I refer to those who did not serve in the first and second wars. Citizenship should be made available to them.

I should like to refer to a matter which I voted for before, namely, subsection 1, paragraph (k), which refers to those in charitable institutions. I think it is a very small piece of business for this parliament to adopt the law of the provinces which debars from voting those old people in charitable institutions. They have borne the heat of the day, and many of them have voted all their lives. I am in favour of extending this provision, notwithstanding the provision in some of the other provincial acts.

Mr. CHARLTON: I should like to say a few words in support of this amendment. I have the pleasure of representing the largest Indian reserve in the Dominion of Canada, and am also a member of the Indian Affairs committee. In view of the minister's remarks, surely we can accept the recommendation of the Indian Affairs committee, which has been meeting now for the past three years, without sending this amendment back to the elections act committee. I would be very sorry if that were done. The Indians were the first citizens of this country.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Citizens? Aborigines.

Mr. CHARLTON: Surely it is time that these people were allowed the privilege of voting if they wish. I realize that many Indians do not wish to vote. Why is that? Because they are fearful that, by so doing, they will lose part of their rights and privileges. That is not true. Indians are a very proud people. They do not want to lose their identity as Indians. If we pass this amendment now we shall not be forcing them to vote. We shall simply be giving them an opportunity to vote if they wish. I think it would be poor judgment on the part of this committee not to pass this amendment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to say one or two words on this amendment. To me it is a surprising amendment. I was a member of the elections act committee. At no time was there a suggestion before our committee that the Indian should get the vote. In my own riding I have over forty Indian reserves. The Indian question is very much to the fore. To me, and I think to the leaders of the Indian groups in my riding, the solution of the Indian problem of Canada is to get the Indians away from being wards of the government and living on reserves, to the ordinary everyday rights of Canadian citizens living in cities, municipalities and districts, paying normal taxes and voting as Canadians. Therefore I cannot see how Indians who still want to maintain their treaty rights as wards of the state living on reserves away from the great influence of Canadian life can expect at the same time to be able to vote as Canadian citizens in dominion elections.

I confess that for the first time since I have been in the House of Commons I am at odds with my very good friend—we use that word very loosely around the House of Commons—the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. With all due deference, for example, to the hon. member for Davenport, I doubt whether there is a member in this House of Commons who knows the Indians of Canada as well as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni does. He was pretty well reared in an Indian village. His west coast riding of Comox-Alberni includes more Indians, I suppose, than the rest of British Columbia, who are renowned in Canadian history, the most warlike of all the Canadian Indians, the only ones who stopped the Spanish, the British and the Canadian explorers. But at the same time I wonder, when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asks for the vote for the Indians, whether he would turn his mind back to two or three years ago and think whether some of these old klootchmen—that is an Indian phrase on the west coast—whether these very old and aged Indian women, if called upon at the last election to sort out the relative virtues of Jack Gibson, the Independent candidate for parliament, Nigel Morgan, the communist candidate for parliament and Mr. Barnett, C.C.F. candidate for parliament, because of their lack of knowledge of the English or the French language—they speak Chinook—could have decided which one of these three was best able to represent them in parliament.

Mr. FULTON: Gibson was Indian enough.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I know there are many good Scotch names which seem very heavily interlarded throughout the Indian tribes in British Columbia.

A certain thing which strikes me as unusual about this amendment is that it was moved by the hon. member for Essex West.

Mr. BROWN: The sun parlour of Canada.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It was moved by the hon. member for the sun parlour of Canada and seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who in his speech suggested that perhaps twenty years from now the Indians on the reserves might be fit for the vote. I have never heard of a motion moved by one person who wanted to have it become effective immediately, and seconded by another who wanted it twenty years from now.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): My hon. friend did not hear me.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman will probably be here twenty years from now as the independent member for Comox-Alberni and he can then move it himself. I feel that one of the great incentives in the way of getting the Indians off the reserves, so that they might live as the rest of Canadians do under normal circumstances, would be to say to them, "if you cease being wards of the government, if you move out of the reserve and live as other Canadians live, you will get the vote". That would be a great incentive to the Indians.

In my own riding I live three blocks away from one of the principal reserves in the Vancouver area. In my own city of North Vancouver there are a great number of Indian families—as a matter of fact one cannot call them Indian families; they are Canadian families—who left the reserve to establish themselves where their children would go, not to Catholic or to Protestant Indian schools, but to Canadian schools, where they would learn to live as Canadians. These people have the vote. I should like to think they will vote for me, but whether they vote for me or for my opponent, they have established that right. I say therefore that, because those hon. members who are interested in this matter evidently did not take sufficient interest in it to bring it before the committee on the elections act, and secondly, because those who still live on the reserves are wards of the government and as such are dependents and not entitled to the consideration which should be given to Indians who have left their reserves and begun to live as Canadians, I must vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex West and seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. CROLL: I welcome the opportunity of supporting the amendment moved by the chairman of the Indian affairs committee, and I am particularly impressed by the seconder, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and even more so after the recommendation he received from the hon. member from Vancouver North. I feel, therefore, that I am on solid ground when I suggest to the committee, agreeing with the mover of the resolution, that the time has come for us, not only to consider the discontinuance of the practice, but actually to put an end to it, of treating the Indians like children. Let us, instead, allow them to live normal adult lives.

I recall the debate in this house on a resolution moved by the hon. member for Calgary East in 1945 when many pious utterances were made over the usual period of an hour, but nothing has been done in the three years that have elapsed. My own feeling is that we have too long kept the Indians in dependence and restricted them to an inferior status. The time has come—it should not be twenty years hence; the time is now—when we should clothe them with the dignity of citizenship and assimilate them into Canadian life. I think our difficulty has been that we have adopted a paternal attitude toward the Indians; as a matter of fact, an attitude of archaic paternalism which belongs to another day.

Whether this committee believes it or not, the Indian is the only man without a vote in the country of his origin. I am told that in the last war 5,000 Indians served in the armed forces.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): They all got the vote.

Mr. CROLL: I am not suggesting that they did not. In this war there were 4,000. They also pay taxes. I think that should appeal to hon. members when they realize that taxation without representation changed the face of the continent to the south of us.

The suggestion is made that Indians are a backward race. That is due to sheer neglect and indifference on our part. Instead of the Indians being backward, our treatment of the Indian marks us as backward at the present time. I welcome this discussion, because it is an opportunity to correct a great wrong. It is a reform long overdue. I do not think the resolution went far enough. It is time that the Indian affairs committee reported, so that we might have an Indian department with Indians on the staff, giving the Indians an opportunity to lead normal lives. Canadian Indians must become Canadian citizens. For that reason I support the resolution.

Mr. SINCLAIR: May I ask the hon. member a question? He has spoken learnedly of the Indians. Just how many Indians or Indian reservations are there in the great riding of Spadina?

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to support the motion made by the hon. member for Essex West. I am unable to understand why anyone would like to continue to keep the Indians in a class by themselves as the only people born in this country who have not the right to vote. A man coming from any other part of the world, after fulfilling his residence qualification, has the right to vote, and his children born here have the right to vote, regardless of their understanding of the election issues or anything else in that regard. I cannot see why we should continue to keep this one group of people in the position where they are denied the franchise. The situation is anomalous, in that all Indians who are veterans have the right to vote, so that on some reservations, of people with more or less the same educational qualifications and understanding of national affairs, some may vote, while others have not the right. I submit that the time is long past when these people should be granted the same rights in respect of the franchise which everyone else in the country enjoys.

Mr. BROWN: I realize that this is a serious subject and one that should receive careful consideration. I realize also that there are objections from many sources. I know this is a great forward step and, like any other such moves, it encounters many obstacles. This debate has been most valuable, in that it has brought the issue to the fore and brings the matter into the open, where it may be considered by the Canadian public as a whole. If the Secretary of State will give some assurance that this matter will be referred—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Stick to your guns.

Mr. BROWN: If the Secretary of State will give some assurance that this matter will go where it properly belongs, that is, to the dominion elections committee or some similar committee—

Mr. FRASER: Or in the pigeon-hole.

Mr. BROWN: —with the consent of my seconder I shall be pleased to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Many of my hon. friends seem to think this is a simple problem; but, no matter which way they voted on the amendment of the hon. member for Essex West, they would probaby be wrong. In the Indian affairs committee of which I was a member, the idea was to pass this without hedging it round with recommendations as to how the mechanics would work, and leave details to the elections committee. We were of the opinion that the elections committee was then sitting and would immediately set about looking into our recommendation and considering it. I myself was surprised to see that this bill was introduced into the house without that recommendation having been taken into consideration. The hon. member for Essex West is probably inclined to feel that, now that the matter has been brought out, the motion should be withdrawn. I feel that, before we take this drastic step—a step with which, incidentally, as I have already said, the Indians are not completely in accord—it might be advisable if the Secretary of State would give us an undertaking that the elections committee will again be set up next year, and by that I mean a specific undertaking. I am not talking about ten years from now.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Twenty years from now.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): If the Secretary of State would give us a specific undertaking that the elections committee will be set up at the start of the next session and that this matter will be considered before the next general election—and I think that, after all, that is the meat of the matter; we want to know if the Indians are to obtain the vote in the next election—I will withdraw the amendment, because I believe that procedure is in the best interests of everyone, including members of this committee who do not know on what they are voting.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): As I said previously, a great many questions must be considered in connection with an amendment such as this. It is not one that I should want to have referred back to the elections committee at this stage of the session and perhaps not get the bill through before parliament prorogues. I undertake that I will recommend that the committee be set up again at the next session, so that this matter can be brought before it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member permission to withdraw the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. IRVINE: It belongs to the committee.

Mr. FRASER: It can be withdrawn only with the unanimous consent of the committee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: In view of the explanation made by the minister and the desire expressed by the hon. member to withdraw the motion, supported by his seconder, I was going to ask if he now had the consent of committee to withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: It is still on the order paper.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before this matter is dealt with—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order or to the amendment?

Mr. MacINNIS: I was thinking that perhaps the Secretary of State made a promise that he may find fairly hard to meet. That is, of course, his business and not mine. I was going to ask the hon. member for Essex West if his motion arose out of a recommendation made by the Indian affairs committee.

Mr. CROLL: He said that.

Mr. MacINNIS: If that is the case, that recommendation should have been made in a report to the house.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): It was.

Mr. MacINNIS: When the house had approved that report, it would then be a fit subject to refer to the elections committee and, in my opinion, not until then; because, otherwise, the elections committee would be taking upon itself to deal with something with which it had no authority to deal by way of reference from the house. I would just make that point. If the motion is still before the committee, I should like to have something to say on it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am a little bit confused by the withdrawal undertaking given by the Secretary of State. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked if the Secretary of State would give an assurance that this matter would be submitted at the next session of the house, so that it might be dealt with by the house before the next general election. When the next general election is to be is something that I assume the Secretary of State knows. Did he give that undertaking on the basis that there will be no general election before the next session of this house?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): No. I did not understand that the hon. member used the words "before the next general election."

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes. They were plain. I would ask the hon. member to stand up and prove that.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): That was my intention.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I could not say—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That was your undertaking.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): My undertaking was that at the next session of the house I will recommend that the elections committee be again set up to consider this amendment or any amendments to the elections act that may be brought before it. I, of course, cannot say what can be done before a general election, because I do not know when the general election will be brought on.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then, may I submit that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni agreed to the withdrawal of the motion on a certain condition. That condition was that the minister would give the committee an assurance or an undertaking that this matter would be dealt with by the elections committee at the next session of the house and before the next general election. That was the request made and that was the request granted by the minister. We have no agreement at the moment, because the minister has not accepted the condition laid down by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Surely the hon. member for Comox-Alberni must now make his withdrawal absolutely without condition, in order to conform with the innocuous statement just now made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I would object to making my withdrawal absolutely unconditional. I assumed that there would not be an election for another year. However, not being in the seats of the mighty, I could not give my hon. friend that guarantee. However, if the Secretary of State can not assure us that there will not be a general election —and after all, we must be fair about the thing—if he will assure us that at the next session of the house he will reconstitute this committee and submit this matter to it, that is satisfactory to me.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the hon. member for Comox-Alberni not realize that, whether the election is held now or a year from now, the same government will still be in office, whether it is before the election or after the election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES: Wrong again.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what you think.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I intend to take a trip to the flooded areas and try to get a little water on my brain.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. Has the hon. member the consent of the committee to withdraw the amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Then we shall have to put the question. All those in favour of the hon. member having leave to withdraw the amendment please say "yea".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

An hon. MEMBER: Let him withdraw.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It is necessary for us to put the amendment if the hon. member has not the leave of the committee to withdraw it.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Put the amendment.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We have not the leave of the committee. Mr. Brown moves, seconded by Mr. Gibson, that section 6 be amended by deleting subsection 2 (f) of section 14 as set out in section 6 of this bill, All in favour of this amendment will please say "yea".

Amendment negatived: Yeas, 39; nays, 58.

Mr. COCKERAM: Mr. Chairman, I hope you noted that the mover and the seconder voted for that?

Mr. BROWN: On a question of privilege, the hon. member for York South has accused me—I did not get all of what he said—of something and wanted it noted that I had voted in favour of this motion. That is quite correct. After all, I was a member of that committee.

Mr. ROWE: And a member of that party.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, a member of that party, and I am proud of it. I am a Liberal. I want to withdraw this motion because, unlike some of the opposition, we feel that the committee of which I had the honour to be chairman—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What is before the chair? What is the point of order?

An hon. MEMBER: It is a question of privilege.

Mr. BROWN: We have a sincere responsibility over the lives and habits of 130,000 people, and it is no time for us to be playing politics.

Sections 7 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Instructions to be furnished D.R.O.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): There is an amendment to add a clause, which I shall have the Minister of Public Works move.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move:

That subsection 2 of section 34 of the said act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) Each of the agents of such candidate, and, in the absence of agents, each of the electors representing such candidate, on being admitted to the polling station, shall take an oath in form No. 35 to keep secret the name of the candidate for whom the ballot paper of any elector is marked in his presence."

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would someone just explain in a word what this means?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This is a secrecy clause, providing that each agent of the candidate, or in the absence of agents, each of the electors representing such candidate, on being admitted to the polling station shall take oath to keep secret the name of the candidate for whom the ballot paper of any elector is marked in his presence.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 21 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On section 25—Entry in poll book.

Mr. MUTCH: Mr. Chairman, I understand that this is the clause under which it would be appropriate to make the few remarks I desire to make with respect to the method of taking the vote. Suggestions have been made from time to time by influential groups in this country representing serious-minded people who have given a great deal of consideration to the study of the method of voting. I am one of those who are desirous of having the single transferable vote adopted in constituencies where more than two candidates are running.

I come from a province where the single transferable vote has been used in provincial elections for a considerable number of years. In my view and in the view of many others the results have been good, in that they have eliminated the election of members by a minority vote in the riding. This does not introduce a new method of voting, because it is the practice also in the province of Alberta. Here again I am told that the results have been satisfactory to the electors.

One need only to look at the membership of this house as it has been brought up to date in the last few days to realize the extent to which minority representation exists. At the present time there are 145 members who are in this house as a result of minority votes in the ridings from which they come. I admit quite freely, as someone will no doubt point out, that in the last election that condition applied to myself. Some sixty of those members are members of the government party; thirty-eight are members of the Progressive Conservative party; twenty-eight are members of the C.C.F. party; twelve are members of the Social Credit party, and there are seven others. If we needed lessons, we have had additional lessons in connection with this matter in the last few weeks.

Surely this is an opportune time to raise the question and to invite hon. members to give serious consideration to it. A few moments ago the Secretary of State indicated that he did not desire to reopen a question and refer it back to the committee, but if I heard him correctly he did indicate that such matters as this committee might desire to have discussed further before another election, assuming that there would not be one in the interval between sessions, could be referred back to the committee.

This is a matter which has been exercising the minds of large numbers of people in this country over a considerable period of years. It has been supported by a large section of the party of which I am a member since as far back as 1921, 1925, 1926 and consistently since. It was supported in the house in my time enthusiastically by the C.C.F. party, although it is notable that, since that party achieved power in the one place in which they have achieved it, namely Saskatchewan, they have been cold to the idea, and have tended to veer toward the support of another form of voting known as proportional representation, in which I do not desire to support them.

I wish to make it abundantly clear that my plea with respect to this is for the single transferable vote. It will be urged against the adoption of this practice that in the large majority of cases where this practice is followed there has been very little change in the representation as between the candidate who was high on the first count and the candidate who ultimately won on the second count.

I have not done the necessary research to discover the exact number of cases in which this situation has obtained in either Alberta or Manitoba, where the practice is followed; but I suggest this to the committee, that even if that be true, and even if it should prove to be an almost universal practice that the candidate who was high on the first count was ultimately elected, it does not remove one of the principal arguments for the adoption of the single transferable vote. The point is this, that the man who is high on the first count, or the man who is second on the first count, in the event of there being three candidates, does have the satisfaction of knowing that when he rises in his place in a legislature, or in the House of Commons, he is there or here by virtue of the fact that a majority of the electors in that constituency preferred him on either their first or their second choice, to speak for them. This system eliminates something of the disquietude of mind which disturbs the constituents themselves, when they realize that under the present system the man who is elected may have a majority opposed to him; and yet he speaks in their name.

It will remove that feeling; and if it did nothing else it would be worthy of consideration because of the added confidence it would give to the electors under our system of representative government, in the conviction that they have indeed a full share in electing the person who speaks for them in the legislatures of the country.

I am not going to branch out into a dissertation as to the methods or practices in connection with the system. I suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, to the committee, that there has never been a time more opportune than the present for the serious consideration of a change in our electoral law.

[Mr. Mutch.]

I expect there are those who are allergic to change. No doubt there are some among us who might have in their ridings and in their own personalities opposition and objection to change. However, this is something which I should hope would recommend itself to members of the house for serious study. We shall have an interval between now and the next session—I do not expect a very long interval—and during that time if we have any sort of assurance that when the house convenes again a committee will be set up to give further study to the matter, I would earnestly hope that members would give this matter some further thought.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have had three already.

Mr. MUTCH: They could consult with their electors when they go home, and return here well posted to give intelligent and proper consideration to the matter, and to express the popular will of our people which, I am convinced, is for the adoption of the single transferable vote.

Mr. FAIR: Coming from the most progressive province in Canada, Alberta, I wish to support the stand taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg South. I am sorry he did not go much farther. However, perhaps he has many other things on his mind, since his elevation recently to a new post, upon which we all congratulate him. Because I am so firmly convinced that the single transferable vote is what we should have, I intend to move an amendment which will bring the single transferable vote into effect, provided that it gets the necessary support in the House of Commons.

Therefore, before going farther I move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), another Alberta member who is proud of his province:

That subsection 3 of section 45 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"In single member constituencies the elector on receiving the ballot paper shall forthwith proceed into one of the polling compartments and there mark his ballot paper with a black lead-pencil in the following manner:

(a) by placing Arabic numeral 1 in the white space containing the name of the candidate of his first choice;

(b) by placing Arabic numeral 2 in the white space containing the name of the candidate of his second choice; and,

(c) by placing Arabic numerals 3, 4, 5, etc., in the white space containing the names of the candidates of 3rd, 4th, 5th, etc., choices, until a numeral choice has been made for each candidate's name appearing on the ballot.

The elector shall then fold his ballot paper as directed so that the initials on the back of it, and the numbers on the counterfoil can be seen without opening it, and hand the paper to the deputy returning officer who shall, without unfolding it, ascertain by examination of the initials and numbers appearing thereon that it is the same paper as that delivered to the elector, and if the same he shall forthwith, in full view of the voter and all others present, remove and destroy the counterfoil and deposit the ballot in the ballot box."

I feel that the use of our vote is one of the most important things with which we have to deal. If we insist upon using it wrongly it does not reflect great credit upon us. In Alberta I have not heard one objection to this system of voting, although in other provinces where the system is not understood as well as it is in my province there may be objections.

However, this is a simple and handy method of getting the number of votes for a candidate. We have, for instance, four candidates running in an election none of whom receives 50 per cent of the votes. In that event the candidate receiving the low number of the votes is dropped from the count, and his second choices are distributed among the three candidates remaining. After this is done and the votes are again counted, if none of the three candidates receives 51 per cent of the votes, or 50 per cent plus one, then the next lowest man is dropped, and in like manner his second choices are distributed among numbers 1 and 2. By this method either number 1 or 2 will have better than 50 per cent of the votes.

As pointed out by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, 61 per cent of the members elected to this house represent their constituencies by minority votes. In my opinion that is not good enough. We can bring about fair representation by adoption of the single transferable vote.

I do not intend to take up more time this evening, because I expect that there will be further discussions of the matter. I should hope that, before another general election is held, this method might be put into effect.

Mr. CHURCH: We have before us an amendment moved by the hon. member for Battle River and seconded by the hon. member for Calgary West. It is an amendment stating that subsection 3 of section 45 be deleted, and that certain paragraphs set out be substituted therefor. Then follow paragraphs (a), (b) and (c).

I doubt if one could find any body of public opinion in the two central provinces to support such a complicated system of voting. It is all right for one of the parliamentary assistants and for the hon. member for Calgary West to support it. I do not object to that, or to his seconding the amendment; but the average citizen in an industrial province does not want any such system as is proposed here. They would not have it in municipal affairs. The municipalities would go bankrupt under such a system.

The Conservative party to which I belong—I have been nothing but a Conservative; I do not claim to be Progressive, because calling yourself "Progressive" does not make you progressive. I am true blue. I may be the only one left, and we used to have a party in this house which occupied the treasury benches.

You have union government in Manitoba and British Columbia. I can never understand our party sacrificing all our principles for four or five jobs in a union government. Sir John A. Macdonald, our leader, adopted and followed a policy of protection ever since we were a country, and Laurier followed it too. What was that policy? It was the policy of protection, bonuses, subventions and subsidies, for all the provinces. It was that policy which made this country great. Today in Manitoba and British Columbia the only alternative to union government is hon. gentlemen to my left who believe in the socialist doctrine first, last and all the time. No wonder the two old parties were beaten in Yale, Vancouver Centre and all that kind of thing.

We have no right to pass legislation such as this. You are handed a ballot, and what do you find, under this amendment? You go into a polling compartment to mark your ballot paper in the following manner:

(a) by placing Arabic numeral 1 in the white space containing the name of the candidate of his first choice.

I would start at the other end. I would not vote for any of them under such a system. I would throw them all out. It may be all right for new settlers in some districts, but those who have been here for many years and whose ancestors have been here for two and three hundred years do not want this kind of thing. So far as I am concerned, I am utterly opposed to the proposed doctrine of the transferable vote. It would mean that you would have a system of minorities established in this country. It would be far better to go back to the provincial law in federal elections.

The other day we had a taste of what happens when you link up provincial and municipal affairs. Toronto is an industrial city, built up by protection. I have always had support from the working classes in every election, and I have practically no organization. In the last election I did not even have a car on election day except my own, to visit the polling booths. They might have stuffed the ballot boxes. They did once. Several hundred ballots were found in a box in one polling subdivision where there were only fifty-seven voters. If you want a system like that, all well and good. We can blame ourselves in this house for all these new doctrines that have been introduced here. No wonder on June 7 last some of the industrial ridings in Toronto voted the way they did. I can tell you why they did. A party that stands by its principles will never lack for a leader or a policy. That is the trouble in this country. Instead of a policy of principle and progress, we have now a policy of peanuts and party. That is what we have.

To come back to the amendment, people walk into a polling compartment and vote under this complicated system. I have read (a). Then there is (b):

(b) by placing Arabic numeral 2 in the white space containing the name of the candidate of his second choice; and—

Then (c):

(c) by placing Arabic numerals 3, 4, 5, etc., in the white space containing the names of the candidates of 3rd, 4th, 5th, etc., choices, until a numerical choice has been made for each candidate's name appearing on the ballot.

I doubt if anybody understands it. We have had enough of that kind of thing, filling out our income tax forms. The other day I was told by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works that he could not read my writing and that I should write in block letters as you do in writing your name on the income tax form. I doubt if anybody understands this proposed system of voting; but if that is what you want, all well and good. The party that sticks to its principles will never lack a following. We did not stick to our principles in the last election, and the result was that we crucified our party principle of preferential trade like a thief in the night and hanged it on the sour apple tree.

Under this proposed system of voting, everybody who votes will need a secretary. It reminds me of the committee of forty in Toronto. They would come to the police commission, of which I was the head, and complain of some actor or actress; it was generally an actress who did not wear enough clothing. They had their sleeves too short and other things too short. We had two committees in those days, the committee of forty and the committee of one hundred. Colonel Denison asked me once, as chairman of the police commission, what the difference was between the two committees, and I told him the difference was sixty. There were sixty more wanting their pet theories than the other committee of forty. With sixty people in a committee there is more conflict than there is with forty, and there is more conflict with a committee of one hundred than there is with a committee of sixty. The committee of one hundred wanted to abolish the bar and save the boy, and they wound up later by forgetting all about the boy.

It would take a Philadelphia lawyer to read the ballot. Suppose I do not like candidate A. I cross him out immediately, because he is one of the block system of candidates. Then I come to (b) and I am supposed to place a numeral in the white space containing the name of the candidate of my second choice. Well, now, they had a bill up here the other night introduced by an hon. member from the province of Alberta. The hon. member for Danforth is not in the house at the moment. By that bill they were cutting up horsemeat to be eaten. I said at the time that probably there would be no horses left; no horses for my good friend, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, to ride around the tracks or at the Woodbine. If that is the kind of system you want, all very well.

Then we come to (c), which asks us to place numerals 3, 4, 5 and so forth in the white space containing the names of the candidates. Having seen some of these people going in to vote and requiring somebody in the polling booth at the same time to mark the ballot for them in West Centre, Toronto, where I was a candidate at one time, and having seen them go in behind the white curtain, may I say that they did not know what they were doing. Then they came out and people tried to explain to them what it was that they voted for. It may be that they voted for No. 5 instead of No. 4, or No. 3 or No. 2 or No. 1. It is no wonder that a large number of ballots were found in the boxes, probably hundreds instead of twenty.

I am absolutely opposed to that kind of business. I am absolutely opposed to this modern combination system. A great many people have come to this country recently. We are glad to have them all from every country, but they will not understand this chartered accountant system. I venture to say that if this amendment should be passed the proposal should be referred by the Minister of Justice to the Supreme Court of Canada under the Supreme Court Act to find out whether this parliament has any right, over the heads of the provinces involved, to adopt such a system as the single transferable vote.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a point of order. May, thirteenth edition, at page 285 reads as follows:

Every amendment proposed to be made, either to a question or to a proposed amendment, should be so framed that, if agreed to by the house, the question or amendment, as amended, would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, first of all, that subsection 3 of section 45, which this amendment proposes to amend is not before us at the present time, and the measure is not worded in such a way as to put it into section 25 and do the job that the hon. member wants done. Further, I would point out that if one takes even a cursory glance through the elections act he will find that there are many other phases of our election procedure which this would affect. There is, for example, the method to be used in counting the ballots, the kind of report which the returning officer makes and many other things which one could find. The result would be that if we passed this amendment to this clause, not only would it be unintelligible in relation to clause 25 which is before us, but it would be inconsistent and unintelligible to the rest of the bill which is before us at the present time.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I wish to thank the hon. member for raising the point of order. I was going to say that I would have to rule this amendment out of order, on the ground that the hon. member has raised. In the first place, this amendment proposes "that subsection 3 of section 45 be deleted and the following substituted therefor". If the rest of the amendment were in order, I would not rule it out of order, since clause 25 of the bill with which we are dealing does itself amend section 45 of the act. Then that clause would have to be amended. In view of the fact that this would not be a proper amendment to put in the bill as it is at the present time, I shall have to rule it out of order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that your ruling has been given, but because you permitted the hon. member for Winnipeg South to say a few words on the question of the single transferable vote, I am sure that you will not deny me a similar right.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: My ruling the amendment out of order does not prevent the hon. member for Lake Centre from saying anything he wishes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was quite interested in the alacrity with which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised a point of order on this matter. I am sure he did not have in mind the fact that if it came to a vote, in view of the policy of his party in Saskatchewan, he would find some difficulty in voting on the question.

I would point out, sir, that this matter has been before the house on many occasions. It goes back to the year 1923 when a resolution was passed in this house in favour of the adoption of the single transferable vote. On April 30, 1925, the Prime Minister gave assurance that a bill would be brought down, and to use his words he said, "and we will proceed with it." That was a bill for the purpose of bringing in the single transferable vote. Indeed, the late Mr. Lapointe did introduce a bill on May 26, 1925, to provide for this type of voting. It received first reading. On June 9 of that year the late Mr. Robert Forke made inquiry regarding this matter. The house was prorogued on June 27 and the matter did not proceed any further that session.

There was an election in October, 1925. On September 29, 1932, the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, spoke in the Huron South by-election. According to the press reports of that date, he stated that the Liberal party advocated the alternative vote in single member constituencies, and the adoption of proportional representation in double member constituencies. In that by-election the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, promised this electoral reform as an integral part of the policy of his party.

In the election of 1935, as you remember, sir, the Prime Minister, as leader of the opposition, repeatedly committed his party to electoral reform, and on August 2 of that year he said: "The Liberal party stands for electoral laws which will ensure true parliamentary representation of the Canadian people." On September 17, 1935, in a broadcast during that campaign he said: "We are pledged to measures of electoral reform to ensure true parliamentary representation of the people." And finally, sir, you will remember that on election night in 1935 that was one of the promises which were to be carried into effect. Nothing has been done about the matter.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg South said, we find ourselves today in the House of Commons in the position where a majority of the members of the house have been elected by minority votes, and I can speak on that subject because I am one of those in that position. There are 144 other members in the house in the same position.

One of the reasons given for the fact that many of us represent minorities is the apathy on the part of the people as a whole, their failure to vote. The suggestion that has been offered to secure proper discharge of the responsibilities of citizenship is the introduction of a system of compulsory voting such as has been in effect in Australia, where approximately ninety per cent of the people do in fact cast their vote. The alternative to that is the suggestion made by the hon. member, and that is the single transferable vote, which has been in effect in the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta.

Some say that the single transferable vote will secure the result of majority representation. I believe that it will effect that result only if it is made compulsory and mandatory that each voter shall mark his ballot for a first, a second and a third choice. The situation in Alberta and in Manitoba indicates that where there is no compulsory requirement there is very little possibility of change in the ultimate result following the allocation of the votes according to the first choice.

I have looked into the matter with some little interest, merely for the purpose of getting some appreciation of the meaning and operation of the single transferable vote, and I find that in Manitoba in the five last general elections there were 124 electoral districts wherein there were three or more candidates. The degree to which a subsequent count will alter the results, unless there is a compulsory requirement that each person mark his ballot for a second and a third choice, is indicated by the fact that, in these electoral contests, only in four cases was the candidate with the largest vote on the first count actually defeated as a result of the second or third count as the case might be, quite a negligible change resulting from the counting of the second and the third choices, if the last becomes necessary.

In Alberta, in the five general elections, there were 186 contests in which there were three or more candidates. In only six cases was the candidate who had the largest number of first choices ultimately supplanted as a result of the second or the third count. These figures seem to indicate that the single transferable vote can be really effective only if there is a compulsory requirement whereby every person is obliged to mark his ballot for a second choice or a third choice or a fourth choice, as the case may be.

If there is not that compulsory requirement certain parties tend to plump. I can understand the difficulty in which my hon. friends to the left would be. Suppose their voters marked number one vote in favour of the adoption of socialism; then, with two other candidates in the field, they would have to mark the first vote for socialism and then vote for private enterprise in their second choice—

Mr. MacINNIS: Or lose their votes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They must have had that in mind in Saskatchewan; because there, over and over again, one of the integral planks in their policy was the adoption of the single transferable vote, and it is only since power has been attained by that party that the importance of that particular plank has diminished if it has not altogether disappeared. Indeed, as late as February, 1947, the premier of the province, the Hon. Mr. Douglas, speaking before the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon, was asked the question whether his party intended to bring in the single transferable vote before the general elections which will shortly be held, and he stated that it did not. He gave as his reason the fact that he had found in Alberta that there were quite a few spoiled ballots and that difficulty had been experienced in that province in explaining to the people how to vote. He indicated, however, that he believed in it personally, but he said it would take a long time to bring it into effect.

I point out that this was part of the policy, if indeed it was not part of the federal policy of that party, and recent events have indicated that something must be done. As to what that something is, we can disagree; each will have his own opinions. I point out that it is not a recent matter; it has been in evidence ever since 1930. If one takes the figures in the elections of 1930, 1935 and 1940, one will find they indicate that our present electoral system is archaic, out-moded and ineffective in acquiring the highest form of representative government.

In 1930, in the federal election the Conservative party elected 137 members and all other parties elected 108, although in point of fact the other parties had more voters in favour of them than did the party that was elected as the government of the day. In that year the popular vote was: Conservatives, 1,909,955; all others, 1,989,040.

Then we come to 1935. During that election the Liberal party received a tremendous house majority. It elected 178 members, and all other parties elected sixty-seven. With respect to the strength of the parties, the Liberal party had a total of 2,076,394 votes, and the opposition parties had over 300,000 more votes than did the Liberal party. The opposition parties had 2,386,856 votes.

Then in the 1940 election the Liberal party elected 184 members, and all others elected sixty-one. That year the Liberal party had a majority. They had 2,513,524 votes, and all others had 2,082,221. All of that indicates that there is something seriously wrong with a system whereby a parliament is elected with a majority of members who do not represent the majority in their constituencies. I think the time has come for a serious consideration of the whole problem, with a view to arriving at an electoral system that will deny the existence of the anomalous conditions that prevail today. But a system of itself is not sufficient. Something must be done to arouse the people to a realization that only through the exercise of the vote will they in fact determine the continuance in our country of the democratic system.

I could refer to the votes in certain cities. I think of the situation in the city of Toronto in the municipal field, where in 1939 44 per cent of the voting strength voted; in 1940 the figure had fallen to 36 per cent; in 1941, to 21 per cent; in 1942, to 19 per cent, and in 1943, to 17 per cent. Since then, it has gone up slightly. But that indicates an apathy on the part of our people which cannot be improved, however we change the electoral law.

I feel that we in this parliament should give consideration, first, to a method of electoral reform which will assure that the majority shall in fact determine the outcome in each constituency; and, second, that we should arrive at a plan in this parliament, whether by way of the compulsory vote or otherwise, whereby our people will be required to discharge their responsibilities. I know on the part of some the answer to that suggestion will be that if they are not sufficiently interested to vote, they do not deserve the vote. However, that is not an answer. Education of itself has not been sufficient. Whether the compulsory vote is the means whereby we shall in fact secure a greater interest in the exercise of our democratic rights is, of course, open to question.

I do not intend to deal with the recent election in Ontario, but there is no doubt about one fact. Because the election was held on a holiday, many thousands and tens of thousands of people in this province utilized the benefits that flow from a holiday, and in doing that they failed to discharge their responsibilities as citizens within the province.

I think one responsibility we have is to assure that whatever government gets into power in this country shall in fact represent the majority. Whether the single transferable vote is the means by which to secure that end, I am not at the moment advancing any argument. But I am saying that the matter should be studied. Something should be done between now and the next federal election, with a view to assuring that whatever government is elected will be representative of the people in all parts of Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: Inasmuch as considerable debate has taken place on this clause and since my party has been drawn into it, I think I ought to say something. It is strange to note the extreme urgency to have something done at this time. I am not surprised that the hon. member for Lake Centre should feel that urgency, because I understand that he attended a meeting of the Progressive Conservative party held in Manitoba last week, and that in this critical period in the history of our topsy-turvy world the most important question at that meeting was how they could best prevent the C.C.F. from getting more seats, either by staying in the coalition or by running separate members.

Mr. HODGSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member says, "Hear, hear". That is hardly a policy, although it may be a tactic, which is an altogether different matter. As far as this party is concerned, we have never in any of our national conventions gone on record in favour of either the alternative vote or proportional representation. In this house I have personally supported proportional representation, and I think I would accept the alternative vote if it went along with proportional representation.

There are two things that we must keep in mind with regard to proper representation. The first is that the governing party should, as nearly as possible, be elected by, and represent a majority of, the people and not necessarily obtain a majority of the seats. The second thing is that large minorities within the community should have representation in our parliaments and in our legislatures. When the present Prime Minister was speaking about electoral reform from 1921 on, he always associated proportional representation with the single transferable vote. The hon. member for Lake Centre has put many of his statements on record, and I will not deal with them. But what my hon. friends are concerned with is not a proper electoral system that will give proper representation to the people of this country. What they are concerned with is a system that will keep the C.C.F. out of office or out of parliament.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Or Social Credit out of office.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Social Credit party have far more representatives in this house than they would be entitled to under any proper system of representation.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The two are the same thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are not enough for Canada's good.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not so sure about that. It is a matter of opinion. I will go this far; I will say that the opinion of the hon. member for Lethbridge is just as good as mine.

In 1942 and earlier, but in 1942 particularly, after the elected leader of the Conservative party was defeated in York South by the C.C.F. and after various other reverses took place, a large C.C.F. representation was elected to the legislature of Ontario. The other parties and their public press began to look around for a means of keeping the C.C.F. out of parliament and out of the legislatures.

Mr. FERGUSON: Saving Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Montreal Gazette, under date of December 23, 1942, stated editorially as follows:

> The Winnipeg Free Press, in a scholarly and informative editorial reproduced on this page, demonstrates once more the advantages of a reform in the electoral system whereby all parties will receive fair representation. This time it brings out a new angle to the argument, namely, that a continuance of the present single-vote method is likely to favour the socialists at the next general election.

There you have the high-minded and public-spirited Gazette at its usual high level in dealing with public questions. Various papers elaborated on the same theme. What disturbed me tonight was to find the hon. member for Lake Centre toying with the question of not only making it compulsory that one should go to the polls to cast his ballot, but making it compulsory that one should vote for a candidate whether he wanted that candidate to represent him or not. That is what the hon. gentleman suggested. If there were four candidates on the ballot, one Conservative, one Liberal, one C.C.F. and one communist—he mentioned only three—the voter, perhaps the hon. member for Lake Centre, would be compelled to vote for the communist candidate before his vote would count for any one of the others.

An hon. MEMBER: No different in the last election.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is always the logic of compulsion. The situation must be getting desperate when the hon. member for Lake Centre is so much upset that he has become an advocate of that kind of compulsion in elections.

Mr. KNOWLES: Like telling Tories to vote Liberal.

Mr. MacINNIS: Which one you vote for does not make any difference. A member of the legislature of New Brunswick visited Quebec recently, and when he arrived home he was telling the people of New Brunswick about the parties in Quebec. He said that his great difficulty was to decide whether Duplessis was a Conservative or a Liberal. I can understand that. In this house no one could tell which was which if he did not note on which side of the house they were sitting. The fact of the matter is that a Conservative can move into the Liberal party or a Liberal can move into the Conservative party without sacrificing a single principle or renouncing a single item of policy.

An hon. MEMBER: There are a lot of communists in yours.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do not forget that the C.C.F. is the only party that stated publicly when it was offered the support of the communist party that it did not want it. I see the Minister of Labour across the way, smiling good-naturedly as usual. When the communists were supporting him in Welland in 1942 he did not denounce them; certainly not.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I hope hon. members will try to deal with this clause instead of getting into a political argument.

Mr. MITCHELL: On a question of privilege, my hon. friend need not try to mislead the committee. I had a communist candidate running against me in the last election. My hon. friend was in the recent provincial election there and none of his crowd disavowed the communists.

Mr. MacINNIS: As a matter of fact, I spoke in Welland in the recent election, and I said everything about the communists that could appear in print. My hon. friend says that he was opposed by a communist in the last election. Certainly they had a candidate in the field, but I was referring to the 1942 election when they were supporting him strongly. I will not go any farther unless my hon. friends drag the communists in. Then I shall have to tell them the story. I shall do it most reluctantly, and only if I am compelled.

The single transferable vote does not assure that the majority of the electors shall be represented in parliament or in the legislature. I notice that my hon. friends did not state what had happened in Manitoba in the election of 1945. Out of a total of 131,603 popular votes, the Liberal-Progressive coalition party, with 36 per cent of that vote, elected twenty-three members to the legislature, or 51 per cent of the seats. The combined opposition, with 64 per cent of the vote, elected twenty-two members, or 49 per cent of the seats.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In how many of those constituencies were there three or more candidates?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I wonder if hon. members would get back to dealing with the principle of the clause?

Mr. MacINNIS: We are told that the single transferable vote is working well in Manitoba. In Alberta, in the 1944 election the Social Credit party, with 55 per cent of the vote, elected all the forty-seven members outside the city where they have proportional representation, while the opposition parties, with 45 per cent of the vote, did not elect a single member. Surely that 45 per cent of the electors were entitled to representation in the legislature?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In how many cases in Manitoba were there three or more candidates in the field? In how many cases in Alberta in the election in question were there three or more candidates in the field?

Mr. KNOWLES: Very few in Manitoba, because there was a coalition of Liberals and Conservatives.

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot tell my hon. friend, because I have not that information here. But the fact is that he has been stating in this committee that the alternative vote is working well in those two provinces.

Mr. MUTCH: Does my hon. friend deny that the single alternative vote does give the voters within the constituency unit a candidate who is representative of the majority?

Mr. MacNICOL: It does nothing of the kind.

Mr. MUTCH: I am asking my hon. friend.

Mr. MacINNIS: As the hon. member for Lake Centre pointed out, it depends upon how they mark their ballots.

Mr. MUTCH: If they do not vote, they do not care.

Mr. MacINNIS: What you are contending, though, is that it will give proper representation, and I am saying that is not necessarily so. Proper representation in our parliament and legislatures is desirable, but let us face it in the proper way. The purpose is to give the people the representation they are entitled to. It is not just a matter of saving our own political skins.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hate to take up the time of the committee to do it, but I imagine it has to be done. Nothing new has been put forward tonight in connection with the matter of voting. There is nothing new in the request to try to change the voting system. In many countries for many years they appointed commissions and committees, numbers of them. England appointed three altogether; France appointed two, Ontario appointed two. I could go throughout the world, and give the numbers. In Australia the federal government appointed two, and New South Wales also appointed two. They were trying to ascertain some way to change from the present system of voting, which some people call the first past the post voting system, but which is ordinarily rightfully called the majority system.

Other countries have tried other systems. And, just so that the record will be straight, I should like to mention a few of the voting systems. England, Spain and Portugal, following the year 1867, tried to obtain what the hon. member for Winnipeg South likes to allege the alternative vote does; that is, obtain a majority of the votes. It does nothing of the kind, as I shall show in a moment or two.

They adopted and tried out what is called the limited vote in three-member or five-member ridings, set up purposely to try out the system. The limited vote meant that a voter could not vote for three, but that he could vote only for two. Or, in a five-member riding he could not vote for five, but could vote only for four. The vote was limited. So that there was no such thing as plumping for five or three, as the case may be. In each of those countries the limited vote system was abolished, because it was found unsatisfactory.

The next system tried out was called the cumulative vote. That is now in operation in the state of Illinois. That is the only state in the American union which uses that style of voting. It was adopted there, so that the different nationalities, of which there are many in the city of Chicago, should have representation in the local legislature. For instance, in that city there are thousands of coloured people, Italians, Poles, Russians and others.

In the state of Illinois the state elects three members to the legislature, from each electoral district. You can give the whole three votes to one, if you like, or you can give one candidate two votes and another candidate one vote, or you can give the three candidates one vote each. That is the only place in the world, I believe, where that system is used. It gives satisfaction, so far as minority representation is concerned.

The next system is one which was tried in Colorado. It is called the Bucklin system, which is a point system. There again you have a number of preferences, and if no one candidate obtains more than 50 per cent on the first count, they count the ballots over again and give each candidate his first, second and third votes, and so on. Those are added together, and whoever gets the highest total votes gets the seat. That has been abolished in nearly every place in which it has been tried in the western United States, and that is the only place it was tried.

Then, in Europe they have tried what is called the second ballot. Theoretically the second ballot is the best of all of them; but in actual operation it does not work out satisfactorily. Besides that, there are two systems of it. The second ballot was tried in quite a number of European countries. France tried it. There are two different systems. Under one system, if an election was held on the 10th of the month in single member ridings and no one candidate in a riding obtained a majority, then a second ballot was held ten days later. The voters are asked to vote for all the candidates over again; only in the second ballot whoever obtains a majority on the second vote is elected. They abolished that, because for obvious reasons it is unsatisfactory.

The next time they tried the second ballot they adopted a system whereby, if no one obtained a majority on the first ballot, then, on the second ballot ten days later they voted only on the two leading candidates on the first ballot. That has been unsatisfactory, also.

It will be observed that ten days later they held a second ballot. Now, some clever gentleman—he was clever; that is all—conceived the idea of doing all that balloting on the one day. His idea was not to have a second ballot, but to give the voter a second balloting or second choice at the same time.

The alternative vote is just a unique and freak system of voting. This is what Fischer Williams, one of the really great authorities in the world in respect to voting, says about the second ballot:

> No country which has tried the second ballot is content with it. Its evils have been one of the determining causes for the introduction and progress of proportional representation.

And at another page he says that the alternative vote, which succeeded the second ballot—

> . . . though a great improvement in mechanism, is still in principle only the second ballot in a new disguise.

That is all it is; it is just the second ballot in a new disguise. It allows the voter to vote twice or more on the same day by having a first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth or tenth choice, depending upon how many candidates there are in the field.

In an election where they have a choice like that the contest is not between parties.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

They do not concentrate on principles in an election like that. They say, Give me your first choice, vote for whomever you like on your second choice. The reason is that whoever gets the first choice, which is number one in the contingent or alternative vote—and its real name is the contingent vote—or in proportional representation, gets 79·66 per cent of the value of the ballot. The second choice is worth 17·33 per cent. So no candidate asks for the second choice, and much less would he ask for the third choice, because it is worth only a small fraction of the ballot.

The reason is that when a thinking voter goes into the polling booth his mind is made up. He is not a man who has a choice for this or that or anything else. He is not voting to have free water, or anything like that. His mind is made up to vote number one. But if his mind is not made up he would go in and vote number one and two, and, as I said a minute ago, the second choice is worth only 17·33 per cent of the value of the vote.

The contest becomes not an electoral contest, but rather a contest between candidates to try to obtain first choice. This alternative vote has been tried in quite a number of countries. It was recently bodily thrown out of Australia for federal senate elections, where it was a disastrous failure. In Australia, under the alternative vote, or the contingent vote as it is called, they elected their house of representatives. But they threw it out, and they now use another system. They elect their senate under the alternative vote. In recent years in Australia in an election they elected eighteen senators, three from each of six states. Eight hundred and sixty thousand votes elected seventeen senators—someone will say that is fair representation—and 820,000 votes elected one senator. Then, 178,000 did not elect any senators at all. There were three different parties.

All these freak systems of voting have many defects, and they all fail in practice. Someone has said that we must have electoral reform. It is not electoral reform we want. No electoral reform is superior to the one man, one vote majority system. When you go into the voting booth you know whom you are going to vote for, and you vote for him.

What we want and cannot get in this country, and perhaps for two or three more redistributions, is equal voting strength for every voter. For instance, in my riding with a population of approximately 70,000 there are about 45,000 voters. But I know of a riding with less than 20,000 population, and less than half of them vote. That is not fair representation.

But that is not the fault of the system of voting. How are we to overcome it? I did make some suggestions when redistribution was being considered, but I am not making them now. There is no other system of voting as simple as our system of voting.

Has the alternative vote failed in those two western provinces? I shall come to them in a oment.

The next proposal was to have proportional representation. I am sure that any man here who would advocate the alternative vote would agree that proportional representation is a better system. But you cannot get it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I do not think it is a better system.

Mr. MacNICOL: Authorities say it is the better system.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Including the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are always pretty smart in your expressions, but smartness does not add anything to a debate. I made a statement a moment ago and I stick to it. Authorities say proportional representation is the better system of those two.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I said I did not agree.

Mr. MacNICOL: You said more than that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, you did. You implied that I was an authority. If my hon. friend will just leave me alone until I get through he can talk all he likes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I think I had better.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Ontario government brought in its bill for proportional representation in 1923. The bill was not passed but it called for different counties to be merged. As examples, two ridings were proposed; one comprised Waterloo, Oxford and Brant; in the other, Lanark, Leeds, Carleton and Grenville were put together as one seat. You can see plainly that these counties would not have it and the members of parliament would not have it. That is proportional representation as they were going to have it in Ontario. In the west they have it in only two places in Alberta, in Calgary and Edmonton, and in Winnipeg, in Manitoba. Winnipeg has ten seats, and Edmonton and Calgary, five seats each. We would not like a system like that in our province. The results were not too good for some of us last time, although they were all right for some others.

I am going to say a word about the results of the alternative vote in Alberta. I am sorry to take so long, Mr. Chairman, and if I were in your place I would be tempted to call "Order". We have had three committees in Canada and held exhaustive inquiries, summoning experts to explain the transferable vote, but we have never adopted it. It should be thrown out now holus-bolus.

In the province of Alberta, in their last five general elections, there were 241 seats in the total, and in those 241 seats, on counting the second choices of the low candidate where it was necessary to do so, only six changes were made—six changes in 241 seats! That is a terrible price to put the province of Alberta to for such nonsense. If they had counted third, fourth and fifth choices it would have been even worse. In Pincher Creek, Alberta, three men were running. H. Bossenberry, Liberal; E. G. Cook, U.F.A.; R. O. Allison, Conservative. Bossenberry got 592 first-choice votes; Cook, 542, and Allison, 471. Not one of them got an absolute majority. So they counted the ballots of the low man over again, and the majority of the second choices of Allison's votes went to Cook, who, although he was in a minority on the first count, was declared elected over the man who had got most votes on the first count. We do not want that kind of system in Canada. Had they counted the ballots of Bossenberry and Cook over again, there is no telling who would have been elected. That is why I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg South that the alternative vote does not elect anyone by absolute majority, unless he gets a majority on the first ballot or on the counting of all ballot second choices.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. MacNICOL: Pardon me; it is not going to be carried for a moment. This thing might as well be disposed of and flattened out now. As I have said, we have had three committees inquiring into the single transferable vote, and it has been thrown out every time on the advice of experts.

To go a step further, the state of New South Wales had the alternative vote. It was one of the first to have it, and after a bitter trial they threw it out. Why? Because it was unsatisfactory. They got fed up with this idea of electing a man by recounting and recounting the ballots. They never would have got through if they had had to count all the ballots a second, third, fourth and fifth time.

Take Manitoba. The results there are just as bad as they are in Alberta. In Manitoba, out of 235 seats, in five general elections, and putting the people to all the bother of counting the votes over again, only four seats were changed. A lot of good time was wasted just to please somebody's fancy to have a system like this. It has been thrown out in many places, but not in Alberta and Manitoba.

Those who advocate the alternative vote never tell you which system they want. There are five different systems of alternative voting. In Manitoba and Alberta you must vote for one candidate, but you do not have to vote for the others. That is outlawed in the United States. In Australia you had to vote for all the candidates. But that system has been thrown out of Australia. There are several different systems. Which system are you going to try to foist on this country? They must agree on something, and so they advocate the Alberta and Manitoba system, which calls for voting for one candidate only, and then you can do what you like with the others. That is outlawed in the state of Connecticut, in the state of Michigan, in the state of California, and I do not know in how many other states, because, according to the United States constitution, every vote must have the same value and it does not have the same value when in the one case you can vote for only one candidate, in another case you can vote for two, and in another case vote for three candidates or more. That makes a differentiation in the value of the votes, of one vote as against another. Therefore it is rightly outlawed, and it should be outlawed here.

The other system, the proportional transferable vote system is superior. It has some merit. But it, too, has been tried in many different places and thrown out; for instance, thrown out in Kalamazoo, Michigan; in New South Wales, Australia; in Toledo, in New York, in Cleveland and in Edmonton. It has been thrown out of Saskatoon, out of North Battleford, out of New Westminster, out of France and out of many other places. Why do we want to bother with this thing, Mr. Chairman? Anybody going in to vote does not want to be pestered with one, two, three, four choices. I always know for whom I am going to vote. I am not going to vote for free trade and protection at the same time. The people should know for whom they are going to vote. I could go on indefinitely. I have a lot more to say but I shall keep it in case somebody else speaks on this matter.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sure it must be very interesting for those of us who come from Alberta to find how badly our system is working. As a matter of fact, I know of no one in Alberta who thinks it is working badly. But perhaps it is necessary for us to come here and listen to the experts tell us that we are all crazy and that we do not know what we are doing. However, we shall plod along in our own usual way, in spite of the experts and the kindly advice that we get here. I think it cannot be said of me, in any event, that I have become concerned because of recent political events in the elections in the Dominion of Canada and in the province of Alberta, because I did, standing where I now am, advocate this system of voting long before any of those elections were ever thought of.

I want to put this to hon. members, because we now have all these fractions, 70 odd per cent, 17 per cent and so on introduced, and I make this broad statement. Except for those of us who were nominated by acclamation by our parties, or where there was only a two-person contest, we were all nominated by the very principle embodied in the single transferable vote. In other words, if four people stand for nomination at a convention of any of our parties, the system invariably adopted is that the low man drops. We vote again and the next man drops, and we vote again until some person has received a minimum of 50 per cent, plus one vote of those in attendance. It might be said that you will get more than 50 per cent. Yes, you do. Therefore I emphasize the word "minimum". That is what the single transferable vote is, although in this case you have a ballot given you which gives you those alternative choices, without going through four or five votings as we do in any party convention that any of us have ever attended. That is the principle of the single transferable vote. It undertakes that all persons voting have a choice between the last two persons to be voted on. That is what it is. It means that every person voting has a choice between the winner and the runner-up. Can anyone suggest anything wrong with it? I do not mean these complicated fractions and percentages; but if we reduce the thing to its bones, to its very simple form, that is exactly what it is.

I do not intend to discuss or compare proportional representation with the single transferable vote. It does not apply to the same circumstances at all. Proportional representation is used only where you have a multiple-member constituency. The best example is any city which has not adopted the ward system. We heard that it was thrown out of here and thrown out of there. The answer is that the burghers and the voters of that city went back to the ward system and preferred to elect their members by that method. I will go along with my hon. friends over here that in multiple constituencies it does guarantee that the minorities have representation. I am not quarreling with that. We have it in our city, but it is something which is complicated.

What I am so anxious to make plain tonight is that what those of us who favour this are seeking is simply that the person who comes here—I am a minority representative from Calgary West, and 148 others of us are in the same position—will undertake that when we come to parliament we shall have a majority of the persons who vote voting for us as against our nearest and our last opponent. That is what this thing is, and it means nothing more than that. It is not complicated in any sense whatever, except to give every voter a choice between the last two persons, exactly as is done in the conventions where we are nominated by our parties to run for office in this dominion parliament.

I want to use the illustration used by my honourable, able and kindly friend, the hon. member for Davenport, who got annoyed at me a moment ago. In the constituency of Pincher Creek there were three men running, Cook, Bossenberry and Allison. On the first count neither of the three had a majority. Then Allison, who, I think, belonged to my party—I am not sure—had the lowest number of votes of the three. In the meantime, as the hon. member for Davenport said, Bossenberry was running ahead of Cook. But when they counted the No. 2 votes of Allison, who dropped out, it meant that Cook had beaten Bossenberry, and it meant taking the minority man and giving him the majority. Why should that not be? The decision was then between Cook and Bossenberry, and the majority of the voters wanted Cook.

How can we here who believe in democracy and who do much talking about majority rule, conceding that to be the principle upon which we operate in a democracy, quarrel with the idea that the persons who come here should have a majority of the votes of the persons who are sufficiently interested to vote? How anyone who believes in democracy can put up an argument against that is quite beyond me. I think the difficulty is this, Mr. Chairman. You have heard of our province, I am quite sure, starting some rather original things politically and in many other ways. It is so easy at a distance to say we have that crazy system of the single transferable vote. I have talked to a goodly number of members privately about this matter. I say it is not blameworthy on their part, but I found a number whom one might think would think otherwise who simply did not understand the system. It is the simplest thing in the world. I guarantee one thing, namely, that he who represents the people of a constituency will be sent here to represent them by a majority of the people in that constituency, and it means nothing else.

Mr. FAIR: I am glad to know there are so many members who are interested in the way in which Canadians vote. I think the privilege of the ballot is being abused, and before it is too late we should have some reform in the method of voting. I do not think the majority of the people are satisfied with the single "X" marked on the ballot. I am sure that when the single transferable vote is properly explained to them we shall have no trouble whatever in carrying that system into effect. I wish to give notice now that at the next session I intend to introduce a bill dealing with this matter. If it should so happen that I am not returned at the next election I have no doubt there will be somebody else here who will take steps to introduce legislation to bring about the desired result. I hear a C.C.F. member saying something under his breath. I have nothing to fear from that quarter, when a C.C.F. candidate loses his deposit in my constituency.

Section agreed to.

Sections 26 to 36 inclusive agreed to.

On section 37—Who may vote at advance polls.

Mr. CASE: I suggest that the application of this section should be considerably broadened, inasmuch as I take the position that the advance poll exists for the convenience of those who desire to cast their ballots. In the recent Ontario elections, while advance polls were held in my constituency, members of parliament were not allowed to vote at an advance poll, which necessitated their remaining over until the following Monday to cast their ballots.

There is one comparison I would make between the provision contained in this section and a similar provision in the Ontario act. Here it refers to commercial travellers. They leave out the word "commercial." The term "traveller" would be sufficient. I do not see why it should be qualified by the word "commercial." I wonder if this section could not be broadened in its application with respect to those who may vote at advance polls. A good citizen who, of necessity, must be absent, either on business or for some other reason, desires to cast his ballot in any event. There might be some danger of impersonation in the larger centres; but in the majority of cases, if a citizen applies for the right to vote at an advance poll, I think the section should be broad enough to enable him to cast his ballot, if he knows he will be absent on election day. I suggest to the minister that he remove the word "commercial" and simply leave it "traveller."

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This question was considered carefully by the committee at two of its sessions, and it was recommended that it be left in the present form. I think it should stay in the form in which it was brought in.

Section agreed to.

On section 38—Examining and sealing ballot box.

Mr. FRASER: I think there should be something in this section to impose a penalty upon a returning officer who opens the box ahead of time, because that has been done in more cases than one.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I understand from the chief electoral officer that this is considered misfeasance of duty and there is a heavy fine for such an offence.

Mr. FRASER: Is it in the elections act?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Yes.

SUPPLY

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

245. Departmental administration, $623,428.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): I wish to bring to the attention of the minister a matter in which my riding is interested. In that riding, and I suppose in many others, there are certain governmental institutions—I am referring particularly to Westminster hospital—and from time to time employees of that institution, sometimes transient employees who have been there for only a short time, perhaps three months, become a charge upon the township. During all their lifetime they have not contributed one cent of taxes to the municipality, but they become a charge upon it. I understand that in the case of Chalk river, the municipality was not able to carry the burden of this hospitalization and care of transient labour that came in to build up the Chalk river plant.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but of course he appreciates fully that the Westminster hospital does not come under this department.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): No. The point I am coming at is this. While Westminster hospital does not come under the minister's department, the Prime Minister has proclaimed a great health scheme for the dominion. If it is to be as far-reaching as we are led to believe it is to be, surely a place for it to be made operative is where municipalities do not receive any taxes from these government institutions, but are required to take care of their employees. For instance, if a corporation of some kind had a business employing as many people, with as many millions of dollars invested in it as are invested in Westminster hospital, it would be contributing a large sum of money to the municipality by way of taxes. Not only that, but some of the people who are employed in this hospital send their children to the schools in the municipality. Yet in 1946 all the taxes the municipality of Westminster received from the hospital was $161 and some cents. Some provision should be made in cases like that particularly.

I know of several cases in which employees have contracted tubercular diseases, and it has been necessary for them to receive care at the sanitarium. Then, after they were discharged from the sanitarium, they required further care for some time while they were at their homes. This has become a burden on some of the municipalities. In this health plan the Prime Minister is bringing before the country, surely there is some way whereby that matter could be taken care of. I should like to hear what the minister has to say about it.

Mr. MARTIN: I simply want to point out that the Chairman ruled, when these estimates were first discussed, that consideration of matters involved in the new health plan must await the presentation of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister indicated earlier that, without specific request, he would on each item give the actual expenditure in the previous year.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, that is right. The expenditure was $524,503.56; unliquidated commitments, $20,824.98; total commitments, $545,328.54.

Mr. FLEMING: An increase of about $92,000.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

National Health Branch—

246. National health branch administration, $122,823.

Mr. JAQUES: I should like to put on the record a quotation from a letter which I received from a constituent of mine who is a victim of arthritis. I know this lady. She is one of the pioneers of the west. She says this:

> I am a widow and am crippled with rheumatoid arthritis. My life savings are nearly gone, and I have no income. I know several others who need help too. It would be a great blessing if we could even have a small pension, and save us from a lot of worry.

I know, of course, that financial relief does not come under the department of the Minister of Health and National Welfare; but I wanted to put that on the record because, as was said the other night by other speakers, at the present time arthritis is incurable. There are thousands, and maybe hundreds of thousands of victims of this disease who are situated as is this constituent of mine. I do not think I have ever read a more eloquent appeal than that. Let me read it again:

> I am a widow and am crippled with rheumatoid arthritis. My life savings are nearly gone and I have no income.

I merely wanted to bring that to the attention of the committee, in the hope that something can be done for the victims of this crippling disease for which at the present time there seems to be no remedy.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall be glad to take into consideration what the hon. member says. The expenditure on this item was $118,005.99; unliquidated commitments, $35,398.94; total commitments, $153,405.93.

Mr. FLEMING: I wish to say a few words with regard to item 246, national health branch administration, and my remarks probably apply to the next item or two as well. There has been some consolidation of this and the next couple of branches in the departmental administration. I recall that on March 10 a statement was given, in reply to a question, that the food and drug division, the proprietary and patent medicine division—

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member is on the next item.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member speaking on item 246?

Mr. FLEMING: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: We are on item 246.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes. My remarks apply to items 247 and 248. The minister has given the expenditure on item 246.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, but we have not yet passed this item.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. Before this is carried—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is speaking on item 246?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. The other day I was interrupted in the middle of a sentence by eleven o'clock being called.

Mr. KNOWLES: It may happen again.

Mr. POULIOT: I am greatly interested in this matter. I appreciate what the minister is doing.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit one observation?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: I may be anticipating what my hon. friend has in mind, but does he not think what he is going to say should be said under item 272, welfare branch administration? He is a better authority on the rules of the house than I am, and perhaps he can say whether I am right.

Mr. POULIOT: I may tell the minister that the distinction between health and welfare is very subtle. The cases to which I wish to refer are those people who suffer from infirmities. They must come to health to enjoy welfare. I wonder if the department has established a line of demarcation between health and welfare that is easy to understand. To me the two words are synonymous. Some of the experts on health may be experts on welfare, and vice versa. If there are doctors in the health branch administration and doctors in the welfare branch administration, they all must have made the same studies and reached the same results—to protect the health of the people. Welfare is not intended to make people rich; it is intended to make them healthy. I do not know whether I shall be here when the other item will be up, and I should like to submit this in all friendliness to the committee.

Family allowances come under welfare, because they are paid for young children who may or may not be in good health. Those allowances are paid according to age, but those who are sick do not receive any more than those who are well. The rate is standard for all. That may be called welfare. Old people receive old age pensions, not because they are sick but because they have reached a certain age and are in need. The case I want to bring to the attention of the committee is that of people who suffer from infirmities.

These people are not exceedingly numerous and there would not be more than a few thousand in Canada. They suffer from disabilities and deficiencies which make life much harder for them. Nothing is provided for their assistance. The other day the hon. member for Macleod made a remarkable speech about incurables. There is a gap in our social service system. We hear a lot about social service; everybody is talking about it, and everybody thinks the government has a horn of plenty to satisfy the needs of all.

Old people may receive something if they are needy and are over the age of seventy years. The young receive something until they reach the age of sixteen years. The blind are assisted between the ages of twenty-one and seventy years. Along with the blind who are not between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one, those who suffer from infirmities receive no assistance from the ages of sixteen to seventy years.

Mr. HERRIDGE: They do in British Columbia.

Mr. POULIOT: I accept what my hon. friend says about British Columbia, but I do not know whether it is done in any other province. The hon. member for Terrebonne and the hon. member for Compton placed resolutions on the order paper to provide assistance for those between the ages of sixteen and seventy years who were suffering disabilities. They felt that the state should come to the assistance of those who could not look after themselves. If we accept the principle that the community must come to the assistance of its members who need it, why overlook the neediest cases? Just about a month before Christmas the great New York paper, the New York Times, devotes its front page to describing the neediest cases in the city. Some of those cases come under welfare, while others are health cases.

I had a survey made by the health unit of my constituency—this should be made in every constituency in the country—to find out those who needed the help of the state but could not reach the state, either because they lived in the back country and were not in contact with the authorities, because they were too shy to leave their homes, or for other reasons. These people all deserved special consideration. For a time this type of person was looked after by private charity. Private charity has accomplished marvels in this country. One has only to note the magnificent institutions erected in our cities and towns by private charity for the welfare of our fellow citizens.

But taxes are high and those who are ready to give sometimes find that they cannot give as much, because it is hard for them to make both ends meet. If we accept the principle that the state must help those for whom private charity can no longer provide, we must first look after those whom we might term the deserted of life, les désherités de la vie. These people do not have the same standard of living as the average Canadian citizen because of their disability or handicap which prevents them from earning a living for themselves and their families. And two or three years—if I remember correctly it was in 1945; it was either 1945 or 1946—

Mr. MARTIN: It was last year.

Mr. POULIOT: No, it was before that—there was a resolution sponsored by the hon. member for Terrebonne. I supported it, and it had the support of all members of the house. The hon. member for Portneuf supported it, and made an excellent speech on that occasion.

Mr. MARTIN: I was referring to your own suggestion.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Last year it was the hon. member for Compton.

Mr. MARTIN: I was referring to the speech of the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: I know it was a good debate, except for one speech, and that was the speech of the then minister of national health and welfare, the predecessor of my hon. friend the present minister. I was scandalized when I heard him say it was impossible to provide anything for the assistance of those who suffer from personal disability. I was both scandalized and shocked. I said it the other day. Hansard has reported me differently; but this is what I said; I was heard to say it, and I repeat it: How is it that we can send $20,000,000 to the children of Europe, but we cannot provide for our own people who are sick, who have not the means to go to the hospital and who have not the means to recuperate? What an absurdity!

I am all for helping those in other countries who are suffering; but how is it that we keep black spots in each constituency of this country? I could read the figures for my constituency. They are sad, but they are no sadder than those of any other constituency. They are the same. There are dwarfs in any constituency. There are people who have lost their hands in sawmill accidents. Even sometimes in sliding they have broken legs or arms. Sometimes sports are responsible for these human deficiencies.

When people are poor and live in large families they cannot attend so well to those who have suffered. Those people should be given at least the same as is paid to the aged, because they suffer deficiencies that are sometimes worse than those suffered by the old people. That is easy to understand. But when I heard a minister of the crown daring to say in the House of Commons that the country had not enough money to look after those people I was most indignant.

I appeal to the good heart of the present Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope he will not wait for the millennium to correct that absurd situation. This is the time to do something. It is most urgent because, when an injustice exists somewhere, whether we call it a social injustice or just an injustice, we should attend to it. I cannot see the difference between social justice and justice. When justice exists it is social justice. It is not necessary to use the word "social," because it is just justice. And when injustice exists it is not only injustice but social injustice.

When we think of any country with natural resources in the abundance in which we have them, a country in which there are people who suffer and who are ignored completely by the state, one is reminded of the parable of the good Samaritan. So many passed by and paid no attention to the man who was lying sick along the roadside. They were passing by, giving him the cold shoulder.

Those people may not be well enough to vote; they may not be able to leave their homes. Sometimes they cannot, because they have not the means to buy proper clothing to protect them against the rigours of our winter climate. Sometimes they cannot go out, because they are too sick and are unable to walk. Sometimes they are ashamed of their disabilities and do not leave their homes, because they would feel uncomfortable in meeting other people.

I must praise highly the health units of the province of Quebec which have accomplished marvels in our part of the country.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I am delighted to hear the hon. member for Portneuf, who is a distinguished member of the medical profession of this country, give his approval to what has been said about those people who belong to the health units of the province of Quebec, and who are afraid of no weather when they go out to look after those who need medical attention. Many times contagious epidemics have been stopped because of the devotion and sense of duty of the nurses, those fine young girls who go out in the blizzards of winter to look after the children at school, to vaccinate them and help them. Sir, let me remind you—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. It is eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall consider Bill No. 345, to amend the Tariff Board Act; Bill No. 346, to authorize the provision of moneys to the Canadian National Railways system; the resolution in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to amend the Diplomatic Service Superannuation Act; Bill No. 347, to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946; Bill No. 348, an act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada. Then we shall move to go into supply to take up the estimates of the departments of National Health and Welfare, Trade and Commerce, Reconstruction and Supply, Veterans Affairs and Agriculture.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following item was passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

245. Departmental administration, $623,428.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 16, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DECHENE—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN EDMONTON "BULLETIN" OF FEBRUARY 26

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, may I rise to a question of privilege? I shall be as brief as possible. I do not think anyone can accuse me of ever taking up the time of the house, or of the committees, uselessly. That may be because I have reached the age where I realize the value of time and the reasons for not wasting it. Therefore I shall not encroach on it now, nor shall I encroach on eternity, as is sometimes done in this house.

What I am going to speak about is some thing that has just come to my knowledge, although it happened several weeks ago. A friend of mine in Athabaska sent me a copy of the Edmonton Bulletin of February 26, 1948, on the front page of which appears in big block letters, "Fear of Reds silences M.P. in sabotage plot." That refers to me. Underneath the headlines the article appears. I have never been afraid of anybody, neither reds, this man, nor the group he represents. This article is an entire fabrication. I have only one word to describe it, and what it did to me. The man who wrote this is a liar. I hate to use that language. I shall not lose my temper, Mr. Speaker, but in the last election in Athabaska a communist candidate ran. He received more votes than the Conservatives did in Athabaska in 1945. While I abhor communism and everything it stands for, I have many good friends among these people in Athabaska, whom I consider to be more reliable and more dependable than the man who wrote that article without any basis of truth in it. Unless it is corrected, the man who wrote the article should be called before the bar of the house. The paper which published the article should retract it with the same prominence as to heading and type that was used when it was published.

The man who wrote this article asked me for an interview, which I refused. I told him I had nothing more to say. I asked him to look up Hansard, and if he had anything to say about what I had said he could use Hansard as the basis for his remarks. In spite of my refusal to grant an interview this article was published. That is my point.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Second report of standing committee on external affairs—Mr. Bradette.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That items 52 to 67, both inclusive, of the estimates for 1948-49, approved and reported on by the standing committee on external affairs, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

DIEPPE AND HONG KONG—RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. BROWN:

What consideration is being given and action taken in striking a medal or giving other special recognition to members of the armed forces who participated in military engagements at Dieppe and Hong Kong during world war II?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Members of the armed forces who served in the Dieppe operation are granted the 1939-45 Star, and those who served at Hong Kong are granted the 1939-45 Star and the Pacific Star. It was not the practice of this or other allied countries in the second world war to issue service medals especially in respect of any particular engagement.

In this connection it may be pointed out that in addition to the award of Campaign Stars, special personal recognition was given to personnel who served in the Dieppe operation and at Hong Kong as follows:—

Dieppe—

Victoria Cross	2
Distinguished Service Order	19
Military Cross	29
Distinguished Conduct Medal	20
Military Medal	65
Mentions-in-Dispatches	150
Total	285

Hong Kong—

Victoria Cross	1
Distinguished Service Order	2
Military Cross	7
Distinguished Conduct Medal	2
Military Medal	12
Mentions-in-Dispatches	29
Total	53

The following awards were granted for outstanding service by Hong Kong prisoners of war while in prisoners of war camps:

Officer of the British Empire	1
Member of the British Empire	6
Distinguished Conduct Medal	2
Military Medal	1
British Empire Medal	3
Mentions-in-Dispatches	31
Total	44

MONCTON AIRPORT

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Is the work being done in paving the runways at the Moncton airport under contract or on a cost plus basis?

2. If under contract (a) what firm is doing the work; (b) what is the amount of the contract?

3. Has a separate contract been given for the purchasing and hauling of the necessary gravel for this work?

4. If so (a) who is the contractor; (b) how much is being paid per yard for the gravel; (c) what distance is the gravel being hauled and at what price per yard?

Mr. WINTERS:

1. Under contract.

2. (a) The Rayner Construction Co., Leaside, Ontario; (b) $666,227.75.

3. No.

4. Not applicable.

EMPLOYMENT—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. STANFIELD:

1. Has the Department of Labour offered or assisted in securing employment in other provinces of Canada for persons in (a) Nova Scotia; (b) the maritime provinces during the calendar year 1947 and 1948 to date?

2. If so, how many persons left (a) Nova Scotia; (b) the maritime provinces to take up positions in other parts of Canada?

3. What provinces did they move to?

4. How many persons left (a) Nova Scotia; (b) the maritime provinces to take up residence in the United States?

Mr. COTE (Verdun):

1. Yes. The national employment service has a clearance system whereby vacancies that cannot be filled locally are notified to areas where there is a surplus of applicants for employment.

2. Total for all the maritime provinces, 7,740. Total from Nova Scotia included in above, 5,607.

3. The figures given are for all transfers. To show specific information as to where transferred would necessitate detailed examination of 7,740 records. Hansard, page 1283, of February 17, 1948, summarizes the movement. Some were transferred within the maritime provinces, most to Ontario but some to provinces of Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia.

4. No information is available to answer parts (a) or (b) of this question.

HARNESSING OF BAY OF FUNDY TIDES

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Has the government or any department thereof received any communciation from the United States department of the international boundary commission recommending the joint investigation of the possibility of a Canadian-American endeavour to harness the tides of the bay of Fundy at Passamaquoddy?

2. If so, what was the nature of the correspondence and what action, if any, does the federal government intend taking?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. On May 21 I received from the United States charge d'affaires in Ottawa a communication regarding the Passamaquoddy tidal power project.

2. In his note, the charge d'affaires inquired whether it would be agreeable to the Canadian government to make a joint reference of this project to the international joint commission for investigation, exploration, survey and report as to its practicability, public convenience and necessity. He added that draft terms of reference would, in due course, be forwarded to the Canadian government for consideration. I replied on May 29, noting the proposal that this matter be studied and that draft terms of reference will be forthcoming and indicated that the proposal for a reference to the international joint commission would receive careful consideration by the appropriate Canadian authorities.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES—D. A. MACDONALD

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. Is D. A. MacDonald employed by the Department of Mines and Resources as a forester?

2. If so, what is his position?

3. What is his salary?

4. What are his qualifications?

5. How long has he been with the department?

6. Does he attend conventions on behalf of the department?

7. If so, what conventions has he attended since 1945?

8. Did he return reports to the department from these conventions?

9. Did he suffer an accident while returning from Calgary in February, 1948?

10. If so, what was the cause of his accident and how long was he off duty?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. There is a D. A. MacDonald employed by the Department of Mines and Resources as a forester.

2. Acting dominion forester.

3. $6,000 per annum.

4. Graduation in forestry—B.Sc.F.; wide knowledge of forestry and forest conditions throughout Canada.

5. Thirty-four years.

6. Yes.

7. Annual conventions of Canadian Pulp and Paper Association and Canadian Lumbermen's Association.

8. Yes.

9. No.

10. Answered by No. 9.

CANADAIR

NEGOTIATIONS WITH B.O.A.C. FOR PURCHASE OF NORTH STAR AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): May I address a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply? Has the minister any information about a contract between Canadair and the British air line regarding the purchase of a considerable number of North Star aircraft?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Negotiations have been proceeding for a period of some months between Canadair—which as my hon. friend knows, is a private Canadian company —and British Overseas Airways Corporation. I am told that the negotiations are now approaching finality. The Canadian government has been giving Canadair such help as it could. The Canadian government regards it as very important to Canada that we obtain the contract if at all possible; for it means keeping one of our key aircraft plants in active operation. The Canadian plane has a British power plant, which was put in as a measure of co-operation with the British government, and we believe the aircraft is the equal of any aircraft flying today. We are also of the opinion that there are many compelling reasons why the business should come to Canada. However, the contract has not been completed. That is all I can say at the moment.

Mr. SKEY: It is not true to say that the contract is already lost to a United States company?

TOURIST INDUSTRY

QUESTIONING OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS AS TO EXPENDITURES DURING VISITS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) asked the following question:

Is it a fact that Canadian officials at the border are instructed to question United States tourists returning to their own country, and to ask them how much money they have spent in Canada and what kind of money it has been? If that is the practice, does the minister consider it wise?

Then further:

Will the minister give definite information later as to whether or not it is the practice?

The questions asked by customs officers at the frontier with respect to the amount of money which the United States tourist has left in Canada have no direct connection with customs, but the action is taken by our customs officers at the request of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Two forms are used to report the replies to statistics, and samples of these forms I will hand to the hon. member. The white form E.49 is used where the tourist has been in Canada less than forty-eight hours and where he has not been given a traveller's vehicle permit. The yellow permit form E.50 carries the request for the information on the reverse side.

The customs officer, on completion of the data, is expected to forward to the bureau of statistics either one form or the other for every United States passenger vehicle leaving Canada. The officers are also cautioned in port instructions that where the operator of the vehicle is reluctant to give the information there shall be no insistence, but in such case the form showing the number of persons in the vehicle and the approximate length of time in Canada must in any event be completed.

The officials of the bureau of statistics place considerable value on these returns, and are of the opinion that if the questions are eliminated they will be at a serious loss in compiling their monthly and annual returns.

The bureau gives me the following information:

"This method of obtaining information on tourist expenditures was inaugurated in 1940. It has worked extremely well. Many thousands of tourists answer the questions. The fact that many thousands do not, indicates the voluntary nature of the inquiry. Fifty per cent answer the question. Without this information, the bureau of statistics cannot make reliable estimates of tourist expenditures. We would only be guessing.

"The information we obtain is used both by ourselves and by the United States government in connection with balance of payments estimates. We have an arrangement with the department of commerce in the United States which is responsible for balance of payments figures in that country.

"We supply them with information on: (a) the expenditure of Americans entering Canada by vehicle; (b) the expenditure of Canadians entering the United States by all means of travel.

"The United States Department of Commerce supplies us with information on the expenditure of Americans entering Canada by train, boat, aeroplane and bus. They give out a postcard questionnaire which large numbers of Americans complete and send to the Department of Commerce on their return from Canada to the United States. This inquiry is also on a voluntary basis".

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON INLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It arises out of a press dispatch this morning suggesting that the dispute between the Canadian seamen's union and the great lakes shipping companies has developed into a condition that appears to be spreading to other industries and leading up to civil war. Has this press dispatch been drawn to the attention of the minister? If so, what steps does his department intend to take to prevent the arming of ships, as indicated by the dispatch? This state of affairs will ultimately lead to what I have suggested, namely, civil war, if it is allowed to continue.

The minister indicates that the dispatch has not been drawn to his attention. I sent him notice of the question this morning and a copy of the press dispatch.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman's notice has not been brought to my attention, nor have I seen the press dispatch, but I will consider what he has said. I am sure he is familiar with the division of jurisdiction between the provincial and the dominion authorities in matters of this kind.

[Mr. McCann.]

SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA

RECOMMENDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE AS TO KEEPING CONTINUOUS WATCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport, notice of which I have sent him? Has Canada agreed to the provisions accepted at the international conference on safety of life at sea, recently concluded in England, whereby all passenger ships and all cargo ships of more than 1,600 gross tons should keep a continuous watch, either through a human agency or through a human agency assisted by an automatic listening device? This question is of great interest to radio officers on the British Columbia coast.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I am unable to give a specific answer to the question, but I can say that Canada has signed the convention for the safety of life at sea, subject to approval by this parliament. I have not received a detailed report from the head of the delegation, but I am informed that the convention will not become effective until 1951, and in any event it cannot be realized until such time as fifteen countries have submitted acceptance twelve months before the date I have mentioned.

SOCIAL SECURITY

QUESTION AS TO RECIPROCAL ACTION AMONG COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Press reports this morning indicate that the British Minister of National Insurance has been having discussions with other commonwealth countries in regard to reciprocal social security rights. Have discussions been held with the Department of National Health and Welfare of Canada? If so, what has been the result.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There have been exploratory discussions from time to time with various representatives in connection with reciprocal social security benefits. I cannot say more than that at the present time.

CATTLE

EMBARGO ON SHIPMENT TO THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on June 14 I directed to the ministry a question which I should like to renew now. The Acting Minister of Agriculture was not in the house at the time. The question will be found at page 5154 of Hansard, as follows:

In view of reports appearing in the press, will the Minister of Finance or the acting Minister of Agriculture indicate to the house whether the government has arrived at a policy with respect to the removal of the embargo on cattle shipments to the United States? . . . It concerns the consumers who are paying high prices for beef.

The Minister of Finance said that the question should be directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Accordingly I am directing the question now to the acting Minister of Agriculture, who is in the house. Perhaps he has had a word from the fighting front in Saskatchewan.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Acting Minister of Agriculture): The question is one of policy which the government itself has to decide, and the hon. gentleman will be advised in due course.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question arising out of the minister's answer? Will the house receive an answer to this question before June 24?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Is it possible for him to say now whether during this session parliament will be asked to approve the general agreement on tariffs and trade?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should not like to give a final answer at the moment, but I should think it would be very unlikely that parliament would be asked to do so.

POSTAL SERVICE

AIR MAIL RATES TO YUKON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. A few days ago he announced that air mail rates were to be reduced to the ordinary land mail rates—that is, from seven cents an ounce to four cents. I would ask if that applies to mail in Yukon.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): It does when we are sending our mail by air.

WHEAT

QUESTIONS AS TO PRICE FOR PRESENT CROP YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of his promise earlier this week that he would make a statement today as to the price of eastern wheat for the present crop year, is he prepared to make that statement now?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not prepared to make a statement today. I hope to be able to do so shortly.

FLAXSEED

MIDDLESEX FLAX COMPANY—CONTRACT WITH FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to answer a question asked some time ago by the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Menary) with regard to certain flax that was sold to the Middlesex Flax Company.

I am informed that the Middlesex Flax Company entered into contracts with certain farmers for the growing of registered and certified flaxseed. The contract price for this flax for seed purposes was different from the commercial price of flax for crushing purposes, which latter has been fixed for the present crop year through the Canadian wheat board. That board's fixed price does not apply to registered and certified seed, which is not marketed through the board.

I am informed also that the quality of some of the seed delivered by growers to the Middlesex Flax Company was below the registered and certified seed standards, and that this flaxseed was delivered by the company in the name of the producers to the wheat board as commercial flax for crushing purposes. The fifty cent bonus has already been paid to these growers.

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): In view of the answer made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to my question, may I say that last week these men were not paid for their flax. Apparently they cannot get any satisfaction in writing from the company. They were not paid last week end. I do not know whether they were paid this week.

Mr. HOWE: The question whether or not the men were paid depends on whether they delivered the flax as seed, in which event they would not be paid and will not be paid; or whether they delivered it as crushing flax, in which event they are entitled to a bonus of fifty cents a bushel, which has been paid, according to my advice from the wheat board.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE—REPORT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I rise on a matter of personal explanation with regard to a kind and generous editorial in this morning's Ottawa Journal. It is entitled, "Mr. Jean François Pouliot called the wrong number."

Mr. MacNICOL: He never does that.

Mr. POULIOT: Calling the wrong number was calling Mr. Hector McKinnon, chairman of the tariff board, a Tory appointee. Then the Journal gives the right number as follows:

It is true that his first real promotion in Ottawa (where he had joined the civil service) came from R. B. Bennett.

This is the right number. I will add, Mr. Speaker, that the Journal says that Mr. McKinnon is an old-time Liberal. In the civil service there should be no Liberals, no Conservatives, no C.C.F., no Social Credit, no Bloc Populaire, but only public civil servants. That is all they are. The old men should be gotten rid of as soon as they are sworn in.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

FRASER VALLEY—REQUEST FOR CEILING ON PRICE OF HAY—PLANS FOR REHABILITATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I have two questions to ask in regard to the people in the flooded area of the Fraser valley. One is directed to the Minister of Finance, and is about the price of hay. It has been estimated that some 10,000 tons of hay will be required. Information has just reached me from the Canadian Legion to the effect that speculators are going round the various districts now, offering exorbitant prices for hay, to the detriment later on of the people who have lost their crops. The Canadian Legion would like the minister to give consideration to the placing of a ceiling on hay in that district in order to preserve some semblance of equality and to assist in the rehabilitation later on of the people in the flooded areas.

[Mr. Howe.]

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I shall be glad to look into the matter at once. Yesterday I received word from General Hoffmeister that the relief commission had authorized the purchase of some 1,500 tons of hay. But I will look into the matter that the hon. member has referred to and see what action should be taken.

Mr. REID: My other question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the uncertainty which prevails in the minds of many thousands in the flooded area, will he be good enough at an early day to make a statement as to the plan outlined and agreed upon between the dominion government and the provincial government for effecting rehabilitation of the people in the flooded area?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that I made a statement on that very matter a few days ago. I have since been in communication with the premier of the province, and will have a further statement to make a little later.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO RETENTION OF CEILING PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. E. DROPE (Northumberland, Ont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it the intention of the government to retain the ceiling price on butter? If not, when will it be removed?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): That action is a matter of government policy, of which my hon. friend will be informed in due course.

TARIFF BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO TENURE OF OFFICE, APPOINTMENT, ETC.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 345, to amend the Tariff Board Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Tenure of office.

Mr. FLEMING: The proposed amendment to section 3, subsection 3, will have the effect of giving to the governor in council power to appoint members of the tariff board for any term whatsoever—

Mr. ABBOTT: Not exceeding ten years.

Mr. FLEMING: For any term not exceeding ten years. But within that time there is no limit on the term for which the governor in council may appoint members. Is that provision not too broad? As I followed the minister's statement two days ago, it seemed to me that the purpose of this amendment was to give the government power to appoint ad hoc members for a particular purpose.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is under subsection 2.

Mr. FLEMING: The matter of the appointment of ad hoc members is dealt with in another section.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the next subsection of the bill.

Mr. FLEMING: I think the committee should have from the minister some further justification for the power that is being asked for here, because it is apparent that this could be used for purposes that parliament would not intend. For instance, if it suited the convenience of the government to make changes in the board to bring about a particular result on a pending application, the purpose of parliament would be defeated. The board, of course, must be kept on an impartial basis and free of suspicion of partiality in its decisions.

Mr. ABBOTT: The purpose of the amendment is not such as my hon. friend suggests, but to give a reasonable degree of flexibility. I have one board in mind on which a member has served most efficiently for a term of ten years, but his age may now be such that it would not be appropriate to appoint him for a further term of ten years. Therefore it is felt that power should be taken to appoint for a term of less than ten years. In these term appointments it is always a matter of judgment how long the term should be. Personally I think this provision is desirable, and I cannot see how it could be subjected to any abuse.

Mr. FLEMING: The purpose of the original ten-year term, as I understand the legislation of 1932, was to assure the members of the board of that tenure of office so long as they discharged their duties. It relieved the members of the board from any fear of removal if they were giving decisions that might not be acceptable to the government of the day. But if you make inroads upon that rule and make the appointments for a shorter period, it seems to me you may defeat the purpose of the original ten-year term, which in addition to giving the board security of tenure, removed them so far as possible from political pressure. This is not purely an academic question, because I think every member of the house appreciates the necessity of keeping the board free from political influence. By making it a shorter term you run the risk of invading that principle where a member of the board may be hopeful of reappointment.

Mr. ABBOTT: I really do not think it can be subject to abuse. Primarily it was for the purpose of enabling the government to get competent men by giving them reasonable security of tenure.

Mr. FLEMING: Does not that same remark apply today?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but I still think the power should be there. Let us say a man who is sixty-five years of age is still thoroughly competent to carry on his judicial functions. It might be desirable to reappoint him for a further period, but not for a further ten years. I really do not think there is any possibility of abuse by providing flexibility so that appointments may be made for less than ten years.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has dealt with the case of reappointment of a member of the board whose age is such that he is not likely to continue to serve for a further ten years. Is the minister prepared to confine it to reappointments?

Mr. ABBOTT: That might be undesirable, because you might want to appoint a man who is in his early sixties but who on account of his age should not be given a full ten-year appointment. I do not suggest that appointments will often be made for less than ten years, but I do not think you will get first-class men to take these jobs for less than ten years. I think it is a reasonable discretion to give to the executive.

Mr. CHURCH: Is this board going to be in the future just what you might call a political board with whose decisions the government of the day can interfere? The board was appointed to decide tariff matters, but as a matter of fact it simply forgot its functions from February 1947 right on down through Geneva and then Havana. An announcement was made in November of that year by the government of a new economic policy for this country. There were a very large number of applications pending before the board during that time, all of which were held up.

Clause 1 provides for a ten-year appointment. I object to the principle involved in clause 1. I object also to the principle of the government of the day, of its own volition, over the head of parliament when the house is in session, changing the fiscal system of this country. I have had several complaints from businessmen that they could not get rulings on customs and tariff matters because the board was away in Geneva for eight months in 1947 and then in Havana. The tariff will always be a political question, and no board can change it. If they did, they would be fired or hanged on a sour apple tree. If we are to have a tariff board, let it be a board that will discharge its functions, not one that will be here today and gone tomorrow. What is to become of our trade with the mother country if the board does not discharge its functions?

This board should have looked into the situation in connection with the Canadian international trade fair which has been held in Toronto for the past two weeks. There were many complaints from businessmen in Canada and the mother country which came to light during the fair and should have been looked into by the tariff board. Something should be done to restore the confidence of large and small businessmen in the trade policies of this country.

I object to this clause, Mr. Chairman. I think ten years is too long. Nobody knows what may happen by that time. As Time pointed out, we may be an economic unit of the forty-nine states of the United States. No one can tell what will happen. No wonder there is unemployment and unrest in the country.

On the title.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Prior to the last war this board did function, and from my observations I would say it did a good job on behalf of Canada. During the war, by order in council, many of the functions of the board were set aside. Now that the war is over we are back to a peacetime economy, and it becomes necessary that we have an organization of this kind in order that proper representations may be made as to tariffs.

I should hope the board might maintain the record of the late Judge Sedgewick, who was chairman of the board in days gone by. Under his chairmanship I witnessed the common man being heard, with due consideration given to all the people of Canada. One might say that it was their interests versus some of the bigger interests of the country. If the board for which provision is made in the bill functions as it operated in 1935, 1936, 1937 and 1938, prior to the death of the late Judge Sedgewick, I am satisfied it will be a vehicle through which the people of Canada can be heard. Their representations can be analysed by experts who know what is best for Canada, and under our present economy such an organization is necessary.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 346, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1948, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Power to issue securities for capital expenditures.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I note at the top of page 2 the words, "available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization". Will the minister give a word of explanation? Is that amount taken from reserves accumulated or set up during the current or past year?

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): This $15,815,000 is the amount that has been accumulated during 1948 for depreciation purposes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do I understand it really is an amount based upon the earnings of the present year, so that we are getting it as part of the picture of the current year 1948?

Mr. BELZILE: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: It is cumulative for five months of this year.

Mr. BELZILE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—When revenue of national railway system insufficient to meet operating and income charges.

Mr. ABBOTT: This and the following section are the ones containing the provision that if at any time in any year the available revenues of the Canadian National Railways are not sufficient to pay operating and income charges, temporary advances may be made by the Minister of Finance, to be repaid either out of earnings during that year or, if such earnings are not sufficient, by an item to be voted by parliament.

A question was raised as to whether that provision was too general. I do not think it is. Nevertheless I am satisfied to amend the section so as to provide only for the current year. I would point out, however, in respect to the suggestion that an opportunity should be given to debate the financial position of the Canadian National Railways, that the accounts of the railways and of Trans-Canada Air Lines are brought down in parliament early in the session. They are referred to the appropriate committee. Officials of those two corporations appear and give full explanations. There is no question therefore of parliament's not being fully and currently informed as to the financial position of the railways.

I am asking my colleague to move a section in substitution for the one now appearing in the bill.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move:

That section 9 in the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"9. If at any time before the first day of April, nineteen hundred and forty-nine, the available revenues of the National Railway System are not sufficient to pay all the operating and income charges of the system as and when due, the Minister of Finance may, with the approval of the governor in council, upon applications made by the national company and approved by the Minister of Transport, place at the disposal of the national company such amounts as may be necessary to enable the national company to meet all such charges: Provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the Minister of Finance from the annual revenues of the national railway system in so far as such revenues are sufficient and any insufficiency shall be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament."

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is April 1, 1949 the end of the financial year of of the railway company as well as of the government?

Mr. ABBOTT: It is the financial year of the government, not of the railway company.

Mr. FLEMING: They are on the calendar year?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am questioning whether it should be the calendar year of the company or of the government. Would it not be the company?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is always the matter of tiding over at the end of the year. The purpose of putting in April 1, 1949, is that we have to bring in each year a bill of this kind. In adopting this suggestion we will just carry it forward from fiscal year to fiscal year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But I still question that. I can see that there is a hangover, and that from the point of view of actual operation it may be acted upon later. I have not before me the wording of the amendment, but is it not the revenue of the railway system, and will it not be the financial year of that system which is relieved?

Mr. ABBOTT: This is enabling legislation. As we know, the nationally owned system turns in its surpluses to the consolidated revenue fund. It requires temporary advances from the Minister of Finance to be voted subsequently by parliament. This is purely a matter of mechanics. All I am suggesting here is that, to meet the wishes of hon. members of the committee, we put this on an annual basis. Government accounts operate on an annual basis. We make these advances to the railway company. The railway comes forward at some time during each fiscal year and says: Our financial position is such that we need a temporary advance. The Minister of Finance makes that temporary advance, but he must include an item in the estimates for that amount. The purpose of putting this date in was to assure members of the committee that each year they would have an opportunity of voting the temporary advances made to the Canadian National Railways during the last fiscal year. One could take it one way or the other, but I think it is satisfactory to take the government's fiscal year; I do not think it makes much difference.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not think it does. The minister has made his point, and I shall not press it. But I reiterate that the tidy thing to do would be to make it the fiscal year of the railway company.

Mr. ABBOTT: That may be.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—When revenue of Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries insufficient to meet operating and income charges.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will ask my colleague to move another amendment with regard to this section.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move:

That section 10 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"10. If at any time before the first day of April, nineteen hundred and forty-nine, the available revenues of the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries are not sufficient to pay all the operating and income charges thereof as and when due, the Minister of Finance may with the approval of the governor in council, upon applications made by the Trans-Canada Air Lines and approved by the Minister of Transport, place at the disposal of the Trans-Canada Air Lines such amounts as may be necessary to enable the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries to meet all such charges: Provided all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the Minister of Finance from the annual revenues of the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries in so far as such revenues are sufficient and any insufficiency shall be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament."

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATION—PROVISIONS AS TO RETURN OF CONTRIBUTIONS, ET CETERA

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act, to provide for the return to a public official or his widow, under certain circumstances, contributions made under such act; to give a right to a public official to elect not to become a contributor under the act and to provide that withdrawal allowances and gratuities shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the parliamentary assistant explain what this means?

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): The special superannuation act which was passed last year had certain defects in the matter of provision for the superannuation of public officials engaged in diplomatic work. The proposed amendments will improve the act. When the bill is brought in I think hon. members of the opposition will see that its provisions are in accordance with the usual superannuation practice.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does it involve the expenditure of more money, or the expenditure of less? The terms would seem to indicate the latter, but one cannot be sure.

Mr. CHURCH: There was a lot of discussion on the proposal made last year with respect to the diplomatic superannuation act, and according to the parliamentary secretary no changes have been made since then. It is time we woke up about this particular matter, because this thing is much overdone on the seven seas. Our trade commissioners do wonderful work, but those ambassadors and embassies do little or nothing. We have these embassies all over the seven seas. It is running into a large sum of money now with superannuation; it is a sinkhole for public money. It is all based on the doctrine that we are a first-class nation when we are not. We depend upon Great Britain's supremacy of the seas for our very life.

Now we have the united nations, and a lot of this superannuation is for that. If it was a baseball organization they would call it a "pudding-head" organization, because none of them ever knew enough to touch first base. We will see a sample of this tonight over beside the west block when the hon. member for Fort William is conducting his baseball game. We are not in this united nations organization for fun. It is dividing the whole British empire. The enemy may invade this country, we do not know how soon. They may come sooner than we think.

The people back home in the constituencies are trying to find out what is going on. They are just blindfolded and are allowed to know only as much as some of these columnists let them know—columnists who come in here for a few minutes in the morning and then they all leave and the result is the people do not know what is going on down here; they no longer become enlightened. Yesterday we provided an additional $10 a month allowance for those who fought for us at the hazard of their lives. All they get is that small contribution of $10 a month compared with what we pay for these families of ambassadors.

I am surprised that this country allows an organization such as this to be in existence all over the world. Nobody knows what the expenses are. Nobody knows what these ambassadors are costing this country. We cannot get any information. When a question is put on the order paper it is marked as an order for return and that means that it is dead and buried for the session.

There are a lot of people around here who want to be ambassadors and get the superannuation with it. I have never been asked to be an ambassador, but I think I have done as much to create good will as many other people. Now they are called "Their Excellencies" if you please. Some of them even have uniforms. How can they do that? What is being paid for all this? It must be a fabulous sum.

The people back home are blindfolded, but they reversed the prediction of some columnists in Ontario on June 7 last. Now they have another organization—consuls general. The hon. member for Davenport would make a very good consul general. He has been doing this sort of work at his own expense. He has been travelling all over the country in his own car. He gave me a ride last Saturday, and I notice that he needs a new car. With the travelling he is doing for the country something should be done for him.

All this is just a waste of money. We have the ambassadors with their staffs, we have first secretaries, we have second secretaries, we have third secretaries and all that kind of thing. Now they propose to give them and their families all pensions in a special act. This is being done when people cannot get houses to live in, or even rooms. Here we are pensioning these people and their families. The people back home in the constituencies are getting tired of the two old parties and are voting for something opposite. I know that because I represent these people. Mine is an industrial riding. They had a disaster there last Sunday which shocked me, but nothing was done about it; no columnist in the gallery would say one word about it. Yet these people are suffering.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: The freight cars might have fallen on top of a streetcar and many people might have been killed.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I am objecting to the principle of pensions for some and none for others.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is wandering far afield.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand; but this resolution has to do with the diplomatic service.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It has to do with the Diplomatic Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. CHURCH: I am objecting to the duplication of services and the giving of pensions to people who do not need them when others get very little superannuation or none at all from this parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the parliamentary assistant whether he can answer the question I asked a moment ago? If not, perhaps he can get the information for a later stage of this legislation. When he is doing that will he get the answers to a couple of other questions I should like to ask? First of all, have any ambassadors or persons who qualify under this act yet gone on pension under its provisions? If so, how many, and what rate of pension are they getting? How many are now covered by this act, and are hence paying into the fund? For what pension will they qualify? How many people does this amendment affect? As I recall it, last year when this bill was passed, over the vigorous opposition of a good many of us, the minister said that it would apply to only about a dozen people. As a matter of fact some of us thought that it was to fit one or two particular cases. The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to one such case a day or two ago. Similarly I should like to know whether this is to cover very many people, or only one or two.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): I shall be glad to get the information which has been asked for and give it to the hon. member as soon as we can obtain it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Following what my hon. friend has said, we should get more information from the parliamentary assistant than he has given us up to the present. We are asked to pass a resolution, and we should have some information. I am sure that with his experience he will have no difficulty at all in furnishing the committee with full and comprehensive information. I ask him how many there are who come under this act, and how many in the diplomatic service who do not. How many diplomats of the various grades have been appointed during the past year? What embassies, if any, or ministerships are being opened during the present year?

When this act was passed last year it was said to be most restrictive in its scope, as I remember representations made by the minister at the time. An extension is now being made. Before this resolution passes, the committee should have some idea as to the extent to which this proposal will mean additional expenditures. Why is it being brought in? Who was not covered that we are trying to bring in?

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member is not suspicious, is he?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Chairman; suspicion is one of the things I know nothing of. When I see a resolution such as this enveloped in mystery and surrounded by such diffidence in reply, I ask myself, what is the purpose of it? Is it as necessary and as devoid of implications as the parliamentary assistant, in his urbanity, would lead us to believe? Perhaps he will be able to explain a few of these things. I am sure he has the information readily at hand, and will let the committee know just what the measure is, the reason for it and the purpose of it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): An enigma wrapped in a mystery.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): I am sure that the hon. member for Lake Centre is not of a suspicious mind, nor would he suppose I would ask the house to pass anything which did not conform with the wording of the resolution. The proposal is perfectly plain; it asks that provision be made for certain persons who were not provided for in the act passed last session.

As to the number of ambassadors appointed, the number of ministers appointed and the number taking advantage of last year's act and those not taking advantage of it, I must say that we went into that in some detail in the committee on external affairs. We are prepared to discuss these details when the estimates come before the house. They were presented this morning and will be discussed in due course. I shall be glad to get the complete answers to all the questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Lake Centre, and make them available during the course of the day. I suggest it might be desirable to pass the resolution, and I shall provide the information after the bill receives first reading.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 349, to amend the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. KNOWLES: Next sitting.

TRANSPORT BOARD

JUDGE OF EXCHEQUER COURT TO BE CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 347, to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Without traversing the ground covered in the debate on the resolution I wish to record my opposition to this bill on second reading.

The house will observe that in one bill we are asked to amend three public statutes, which indicates the distance the government is asking the house to go to meet the exigencies of one particular case. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the kind of bill that this house ought to favour. I mention these reasons without discussing them in further detail because I think they were adequately developed in debate on the resolution stage.

In the first place, it is wrong in principle to revise or amend no fewer than three public statutes to meet the immediate exigencies of one particular case. This case cannot be of a nature that could justify the extensive revision of three public statutes to meet it.

In the second place, the way the government has gone about this whole question shows what has become a characteristic disregard of the rights of parliament. Parliament's prerogatives have been flouted by the government in its assumption that it can proceed and make all arrangements and announce in advance the appointment before parliament even knew the nature of the legislation that it was going to be called upon to pass to make possible what the government had already undertaken to do in advance.

In the third place, the proposed appointment of a judge as chief commissioner while he continues to hold judicial office in a court, is unsound in principle. It is no answer to say, as the Minister of Justice said in the debate on the resolution, that the board of transport commissioners is a court of record; that judges have held that office in the past; that it was within the contemplation of parliament when the Railway Act was first passed that the appointment of chief commissioner should be open to judges as well as to experienced lawyers. That is no answer. It is perfectly open to the government to appoint Mr. Justice Archibald or any other suitable and qualified person, but it is not proper to continue him in a judicial office while he is holding the office of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners.

In the fourth place, the idea of narrowing down the field of those from whom the chief commissioner may be selected to members of the panel of judges of the exchequer court is likewise wrong in principle. Why should the appointment to so important an office be narrowed down to selection from among four or five men who, however eminent may be their attainments in law, however well qualified they may be to hold office in the exchequer court, may not be qualified for the high and exacting responsibilities of the office of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners? That simply means that when it suits the convenience of the government to find outside the exchequer court panel a suitable chief commissioner, they will bring in legislation to enlarge the exchequer court, using that court as a sort of reservoir convenient to them in making their appointment to the office of chief commissioner. This will not increase respect for the courts, and surely one thing that we have learned in these troubled times is the importance of keeping hands off the judiciary.

Further, and this is the fifth reason, this measure will create anomalies and inequalities within the board of transport commissioners itself. It will mean that the chief commissioner stands in a different position from the other members of the transport board. When his term of office is ended, he is nevertheless assured of a life appointment in the court, if he should not be reappointed to the transport board. That is not a sound position. There is no reason why the chief commissioner, in that respect or in other respects except salary, should be in a more favoured position than other members of the board.

In the sixth place I have already indicated my reasons for saying that this measure will create anomalies within the exchequer court itself. A judge of that court will be in the court but not really of it, because under a section of this bill he is expressly prohibited from exercising jurisdiction of the exchequer court. Is not that an amazing situation? The government will appoint an honourable gentleman to the exchequer court of Canada, but not for the purpose of permitting him to exercise any of the jurisdiction of the exchequer court; for as a matter of fact he is told that though he is appointed to the court he shall not be permitted to exercise the jurisdiction of a judge of the exchequer court.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is incorrect.

Mr. FLEMING: I speak always subject to correction, but I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that under section 1 of the bill, in 2 (b) it is provided that the judge of the exchequer court who holds the office of chief commissioner is disqualified—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not supposed to discuss any of the sections of the bill.

Mr. FLEMING: I am referring to this particular section only because the Minister of Justice has challenged my statement. I am saying to him that as I read the section of the bill, which was the basis for my statement, the appointee has no jurisdiction in the exchequer court so long as he holds the office of chief commissioner. He cannot exercise the jurisdiction of a judge of the exchequer court.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is incorrect, but we will deal with it on the bill.

Mr. FLEMING: Very well. We were told yesterday by the Minister of Justice that it was the intention that the chief commissioner should give his full time to his responsibilities and duties as such. Even if the bill did not prohibit him from exercising any of the jurisdiction of a judge of the exchequer court, the fact remains that the responsibilities and duties of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners are so exacting, and will continue to be so heavy in the coming years, that he will not have any opportunity whatsoever for exercising any of the jursdiction of a judge of the exchequer court. And parliament is now being asked to legislate this amazing anomaly to meet the exigencies of a particular case.

The whole situation is perfectly apparent now. The government, in order to induce the proposed appointee to accept this appointment, has had to guarantee to him the security of tenure that attaches to the life appointment of a judge of the superior court of Nova Scotia, and with it an increase in the salary attached to the office of chief commissioner.

As I said yesterday, no word of mine can be taken as any reflection whatsoever on the suitability of Mr. Justice Archibald for the appointment. But, Mr. Speaker, I say to you that the method which the government is asking this house to follow in order to secure the appointment of Mr. Justice Archibald is completely unsound in principle. The government is asking this house to violate principle after principle in order to meet the exigencies of its wishes in this particular case. This is not the method that parliament should be prepared to countenance in securing the appointment of an honourable gentleman to the office of chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners, regardless of his suitability for the position.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Yesterday, when commenting on my remarks on the resolution, the Minister of Justice, with that genius for accuracy which is his, made some use of the exact or dictionary meaning of the word "political". I recall that when the late Lord Tweedsmuir came to Canada and was asked by reporters who met him at the dockside what he did in private life, he said he was a publisher and politician. This occasioned surprise, which was hardly mild, among Canadians; because rightly or wrongly we have developed on this continent a subsidiary or secondary meaning for the word "political".

I agree that the definition which the minister gave is etymologically accurate, but I think he will agree with me that everywhere, possibly with the exception of Nova Scotia, it has a secondary meaning which is not always savoury or not always free from a certain suggestion of cynicism. I used the word in its popular sense and in the way in which most people understand its use in this country. Here I reiterate what I said yesterday. I have nothing but admiration for the hon. gentleman whose name has been mentioned for this position, and I suggest that his qualifications as a lawyer and as a man of learning and experience should of themselves be sufficient to qualify him for the high office to which it is the government's intention to call him. But what I object to is his continuation as a judge in his new office. As I have said so frequently in the house, it is unfortunate that the great reputation of the judiciary for fairness and for freedom from partisan influences should be brought into an arena where partisan influences must and do play their part. It may be necessary that we have tribunals whose function is to solve difficulties in which these influences play their part. But I assert, with all the power I possess, with all the faith I have in the judiciary, and with all the desire I have for the maintenance of its integrity, that the judiciary as such should not be subject to these influences.

As a result of these practices, it is now commonly said in some areas: Oh, I do not want to go before that judge; he is a company man; or I do not want to go before that judge; he is a labour man. These assertions result from the use of the judiciary for the solution of extra-judicial perplexities and difficulties which are highly tinged with politics in the ordinary acceptation of the word, and with expediency, something that is entirely apart from the higher plane on which justice reigns or should reign supreme. I can tell the right hon. gentleman that if he were to canvass the judiciary and take a poll of the right-thinking judges—and thank God they are still in the vast majority—he would find that they all deplore the use and exploitation of them and their high office, their integrity and their great reputation, for the solution of political and partisan embarrassments.

It is not necessary to the efficiency of his work that the gentleman whose name has been mentioned here should take to his new office the title and reputation of the function which he is abandoning. I make bold to state to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is a wrongful use of the judiciary which is held in high repute to enlist its services to make acceptable solutions and decisions which have nothing to do with the ordinary administration of justice.

At a time when people are so uneasy, when they are not giving the adherence they used to give to the maintenance of the great institutions upon which our whole system of government and civilization rests, it is unfortunate that any of these institutions should be necessarily weakened by exposing a member of any one of them, no matter how distinguished he may be, to popular criticism because momentarily he may be called into a field where considerations other than learning in the law and integrity in the sense of honestly applying that law must prevail. The result must necessarily be a loss of prestige by and damage to the institution. If there were any other reason than the attempt to clothe with judicial authority decisions which of their essence must depend upon accommodation and fleeting and partisan advantage, I would not be so pronounced in an attitude which I hope is expressed in temperate language, although I am greatly disturbed at the necessary result which must follow from a continuation of this practice.

I ask the right hon. gentleman, in the light of events of the last few years—I do not wish to wound or to injure the reputation of any judge in particular; the incidents are uppermost in the minds of all hon. members, and in none more so than in that of the minister—if he does not think that the conduct of the government taking distinguished members of the judiciary off the bench from time to time and making them the arbiters in matters which are not judicial, which do not depend upon the interpretation of the law, and which do not depend entirely upon justice, has resulted in a loss of status and dignity on the part of the bench and the magistracy?

I cannot believe that there is any lawyer, I cannot believe that there is any judge, who, making a canvass of the events of the last few years, can escape the conclusion that this practice of conscripting the judiciary to settle quasi-political feuds has tended to weaken the respect and the confidence of the Canadian people in the great institution of the law, and in particular in that most important branch of it, the judiciary. For that reason I am opposed to this bill and opposed to all practices which bring the judiciary into the adjustment and settlement of questions which are beyond their scope and which expose the members of the bench to the type of criticism, harmful, unfair, and sometimes cruel, which has been levelled at members of the judiciary who have responded to the invitation of the government to perform extra-judicial duties.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I suppose this is a debate that a person without legal training should keep clear of, but I hope the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) will not misunderstand me when I say that I am getting a little bit tired of this glorification of the virtues of judges.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And lawyers, too

Mr. MacINNIS: And lawyers, too. Of course all judges have been lawyers, and more than that, they have been taken out of the hurly-burly of our economic, political and social life to the bench; and the assumption that the moment they are put on the bench they can divest themselves of all the preconceived notions and prejudices which they have accumulated in fifty or sixty years of life is absurd.

Again, there is this question of the dispensing of justice. I may be wrong, but my understanding is that the judges do not dispense justice. They interpret the law, which may be just or unjust, depending upon how it is drafted. When a judge's decision is reversed on appeal, it seems to me that it is reversed not because he erred in the matter of justice but because he erred in a matter of law. Whether his decision was just or unjust does not enter into the situation at all. The question is whether he interpreted the law according to precedent.

This is a complex bill, and if I had not such profound faith in the integrity of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) and a knowledge of the close study which he gives to matters of this kind, I might be inclined to be more critical of it. In any case I do not know sufficient about its underlying principles to criticize; but I cannot see that there is or could be anything wrong in appointing a judge to any position where there is no interference with his freedom to deal with the questions that come before him, except the restrictions imposed by his own conscience. Surely that is sufficient protection for the judge, whether he is on the bench or on the board of transport commissioners or any other board or commission. I think it is highly desirable that the judges should be kept in as close contact as possible with the economic, social and political conditions that prevail in this country, so that they will be in a position to understand what motivates and compels people to act in the way they do. To take them out of the conditions in which they have lived all their lives and assume that when appointed as judges they can in their virgin purity dispense abstract justice is of course just nonsense.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a comment on the speech last made. I do not think any of us pretend that judges are a superior order of people. In fact, I myself undertook to say yesterday that we must not regard judges as a superior order distinct from ordinary creatures of common clay, and no one is attempting to do that. The judges in the course of their duties come in contact with life at every turn, and there is no danger of their being removed into rarefied upper air.

On the point made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), I wish to say this. It is very easy to make a speech such as that just made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and made in perfect good faith; but it is much more difficult, and this is a thing for which we have to look to the minister, to appreciate the real depth of the principle which has been underlined by the hon. member for Stanstead. On that I say no more except to recall to the house what is so true, that it is of course advantageous to the judges themselves that the impression should not get abroad that such and such a judge is a company man and such and such a judge is a labour man. It is for the very purpose of trying to prevent that sort of thing that the hon. member for Stanstead spoke as he did, and I am afraid that in what we are doing now, while it may be helpful and convenient for the moment, we are disregarding that basic principle.

My purpose in rising is to say this. I have followed what the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said about this complicated incursion into three statutes, which looks like using a steam hammer to crack a nut, although it may be a difficult nut to crack. I would like to support what the hon. member for Eglinton said about the undesirability, and I would add the utter needlessness, of tying ourselves in this way; because it is extremely likely that later the government will come back to parliament and say: We do not want to appoint one of the exchequer court judges, and we want to change the legislation.

There is another point, and here I come back to the remark I made yesterday, that the minister was not nearly as convincing as he usually is in some of the things he then said. I cannot agree with him when he says that this appointment would not be considered desirable by an exchequer court judge. I think it would, first of all because it is highly remunerative. But that is not the chief reason. It is a position of great influence in the community, and the man making these decisions might easily become one of the most important citizens of our country. I see no reason why the position should not be desirable. Therefore it seems to me we shall notice in this legislation a distracting element—and I put it no stronger than that—in connection with the exchequer court judges.

I shall not press that. I really think the point made by the hon. member for Eglinton is the stronger aspect of the subject. The minister confines himself in this way, with the very greatest likelihood that later on he, or some minister of justice who will follow him, will have to come back and say that he does not find his man there, and that therefore he has to go outside. In my mind is the feeling that this could be dealt with easily in a simple, direct and straightforward manner, instead of having all this deviousness and complexity.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall say a few words with respect to some of the speeches that have been made. I do not share the uneasiness of the practical members of the legal profession who have spoken about the precedent which is being created or the principle which is being applied in this instance. I am more concerned about the free use of judges in a different class of activity. That has given me some concern.

There has been an extensive use of judges for extra-judicial duties as chairman of conciliation boards. Perhaps there would be hundreds of cases in which they have been appointed to those positions. I suppose it is that practice to which hon. members were referring when they intimated that some persons would tag judges as being pro-capital or pro-labour.

I have discussed this aspect of the matter with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) on several occasions. Of course his approach is not that of a lawyer, nor is it that of a politician, even in the secondary sense. I would say his approach is that of a person who wants to get decisions which will command confidence. He has said to me, "Whom can we get? Perhaps we can get lawyers, but they are very expensive. It is almost impossible to get a chairman who will command the confidence a judge would command." He went on to ask me this question, "Would you suggest university professors? Sometimes university professors are suitable for this purpose." But he added, "I do not regard them as nearly as suitable as judges." When I asked him whether he noticed any resentment about decisions which would cause the judiciary to be brought into disrepute, he said, "It is most gratifying, indeed surprising, to see the degree of acceptation given to decisions of these boards if they are headed by judges." Then he went on to say, "The ordinary people in the country have faith in the judiciary, and they are maintaining that faith."

The hon. member for Stanstead seems to think there has been some lessening of that faith—

Mr. HACKETT: I do.

Mr. ILSLEY: —in the last few years—

Mr. HACKETT: I do.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

Mr. ILSLEY: —as a result of appointment of judges to discharge difficult tasks. The hon. member may be right; I am not in a position to refute what he says. There was a recent instance in which a certain newspaper was almost abusive toward Sir Lyman Duff, who has now retired from the bench. But I cannot think that Sir Lyman Duff has suffered by it at all; he has not suffered in the public esteem from anything he has done as head of a commission. He has accepted the chairmanship of commissions which had to make difficult findings of fact. It is generally considered that for a great many years he has been the outstanding jurist of Canada. Perhaps when I say that, some would feel I am going too far; but certainly he has been the great ornament of the judiciary in Canada, and of our legal profession. It may be helpful to a situation, it may be helpful even to a government or to a party to have a matter settled in such a way that it will stay settled, through the appointment of such a man to a royal commission. But I cannot think that the judiciary has suffered in the popular esteem.

I believe there is something to be said, however, for being most careful about the appointment of judges to conciliation boards in too large numbers. The practice might get out of hand and eventually have bad results. The matter is earnestly discussed from time to time by members of the government—certainly by myself and the Minister of Labour—and I hope it will not be allowed to get out of hand.

But these considerations do not apply to the present position. To a unique extent the chief commissioner of the board of transport commissioners is connected with the building up of a most important branch of our jurisprudence, the part of it which deals with rate making, with reasonableness, with unjust discrimination, and many allied subjects. It is a position which calls for the exercise of the highest judicial qualifications, and it is worthy of the dignity of a judge. In what he has to do there is nothing inconsistent with judicial duties. He is the chairman, the chief justice in effect, of a court of record dealing with a very important part of our jurisprudence. For that reason I do not feel anxious at all about the principle of this legislation.

As hon. members have said, it may happen at some time that there will be no one on the exchequer court who is deemed to have the necessary qualifications. Then, just as hon. members have indicated, some government may come back here and say: Give us a wider choice. I had drafted the bill first so as not to limit the choice to judges of the exchequer court, and so as merely to empower a judge of the exchequer court of Canada to sit in that position and to remain a judge. I felt, however, that parliament would wish to keep a stricter control on the size of the exchequer court than it would have under that type of legislation; therefore I had the provision changed so that the choice would be limited, as it now stands, to members of the exchequer court.

Thus far we have been talking about only one branch of the matter. After all, we owe a duty to the people of Canada, and it is not a small duty, or an unimportant one. We owe to them the duty of providing for them, so far as is possible, good decisions and good judgments. While the board of transport commissioners did not have very much to do during the war, when rates were frozen and there was not much activity in that direction, in the years to come they will have more problems to solve, problems of interest to all the people of Canada. We had to get a good man. We think we have got a good man. Certainly we have a man with experience in national problems, a man whose judicial experience is highly regarded. No one has offered any criticism from a personal point of view against this man. We had to get that kind of man. We thought it was unreasonable to take away his judgeship, and we thought there was nothing disadvantageous about it, and that no sacrifice of principle was involved. Indeed we thought that the principle of having a judge was good, of having at the head of this great court—because that is what it is—a man who would still be Mr. Justice Archibald.

Mr. HACKETT: What would be the objection to appointing to the position the gentleman whose name has been mentioned without continuing him in the mantle of a judge?

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not in committee, but I would point out a very practical reason. If special superannuation or pension privileges or special provisions with regard to tenure are applied to this board, the precedent might prove to be very serious when applied to the public service. During the past few years the whole struggle has been to standardize pension provisions, to standardize pay and to keep remuneration of one kind or another and the conditions of holding office and so on from getting too much out of line. That is a practical problem which confronts the government. It was suggested yesterday that we should put the pay away up, or should provide special provisions in the superannuation act for the chairman of the board of transport commissionners and no one else. Immediately that would raise the question: What do you do with the other members of the board? What do you do with the chairman of other boards? You would be reversing the movement toward standardization, which is a most beneficial thing. That is the practical disadvantage. This is a simple way to do it, and, as I say, I do not see anything wrong where you are bringing a judge to a judicial position.

Mr. HACKETT: Means have been found in other cases of preserving the rights of a judge to pension and other benefits when he has been delegated to other fields of activity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I do not like to introduce legislation of that kind if I can help it, and I do not think it is necessary in this case.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Chief commissioner.

Mr. KNOWLES: In reply to a question by the hon. member for Stanstead the Minister of Justice indicated that he did not like introducing legislation to provide a special pension in a case like this. What bothers some of us about this legislation is that the minister frankly admitted yesterday that this was special legislation, designed as an arrangement to make it possible to get a judge to fill this position. We in this group have pointed out that we do not object, in fact that we approve the use of a judge for this kind of job, but it does have the earmarks of being a rather large order to enable the government to make one specific appointment. I wonder if it would not have been just as good or perhaps better if the minister had brought in a bill providing that notwithstanding the provisions of the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and so on, this particular person should be appointed as chairman of the board of transport commissioners for a period of ten years. Under those conditions he might have continued in the position of judge and would be entitled to the superannuation benefits which he had already earned. I do not know Mr. Justice Archibald's age, but I imagine—

Mr. ILSLEY: Fifty-seven years.

Mr. KNOWLES:—ten years will bring him to the retirement bracket. It would have been possible to deal with this case without any high salary problem or without the problem of a special amendment to the superannuation act.

The minister admitted in the course of this discussion that when Mr. Justice Archibald's ten years are over, the government in power may not be able to fill the position by using the provisions of this act, that some change may have to be made. Did the minister give consideration to that way of tackling the problem?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Consideration was given to all ways of tackling the problem. There was a bill passed covering the case of Mr. Justice Fullerton by which he preserved his pension rights. However, that bill did not preserve his tenure. I gave consideration to introducing an amendment to provide for an appointment for life or during good behaviour until seventy-five years or something of that sort. That would have met the situation fairly well.

Mr. KNOWLES: Was that to be for general application or just for this appointment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just for the chief commissioner.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just for Mr. Justice Archibald?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There are objections to having anything else but a ten year appointment to a position like this. The person has to be extremely active, and perhaps it would be more desirable to let him go at the end of ten years than it would be in the case of an ordinary judge.

Mr. FLEMING: There is just one matter I should like to mention in connection with clause 1. The minister and I had a difference in the discussion on second reading with respect to the effect of section 1, particularly the new section 2b. I wish to put myself on record in that regard.

The first reference is to the jurisdiction of a judge of the exchequer court under the Railway Act, and the second reference is to the jurisdiction of a judge of the exchequer court under section 27 of the Exchequer Court Act. He is not to be disqualified from exercising any jurisdiction conferred by the Exchequer Court Act on an exchequer court judge outside of section 27 of that act.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose for lunch we were dealing with clause 1 of Bill No. 347, to amend the Railway Act, the Exchequer Court Act and the Judges Act, 1946.

Mr. McMASTER: I wish to point out that this section deals with two acts. While the first section, which is numbered as clause 1, deals with an amendment to subsection 2 of section 10 of the Railway Act, which has to do with the question of the appointment of a commissioner, the other two clauses have nothing whatever to do with the Railway Act. They amend the Exchequer Court Act. I suggest that they should be separated. One clause should be an amendment to subsection 2 of section 10 of the Railway Act, and the other clauses should be an amendment to section 6 of the Exchequer Court Act. If anyone wants to know what are the duties of this particular judge, I do not think he would ever find them out by looking at the Railway Act. He would look at the Exchequer Court Act to see what limitations were placed upon the powers of the four judges, one of whose powers is limited by the fact that he can hear only certain cases in the exchequer court. He can carry on in other cases, apparently, save as his duties are restricted. That is why I think the amendment should be made to the Exchequer Court Act.

On several occasions I had to look up certain matters when we were dealing with certain types of legislation, and from the index to the statutes I had a great deal of difficulty in finding what I wanted.

May I point out that some of the duties of the transport board are set forth in the Railway Act. Another act, passed in 1938, chapter 53, also deals with their powers. I must confess that during the recess I had a great deal of difficulty digging out their powers from the two acts. It may be that when the new revision of the statutes takes place the necessary changes will be made; but I suggest that in this, as in all other legislation, an effort should be made to enable a person to find the powers of this board when he looks for them.

Subsection 2a says that section 7 of the Exchequer Court Act shall not apply. That refers to the residence of the judge. Perhaps the minister will have something to say about section 6 of the Exchequer Court Act. That is one reason why all the powers of the exchequer court judges should be in one place. Section 6 of the Exchequer Court Act says:

> A judge of the court shall not hold any other office of emolument, either under the government of Canada or under the government of any province of Canada.

That would seem to be in conflict with this proposed legislation which introduces an amendment to the Railway Act. Is it expected that the chief commissioner will carry on in the same way as the chief commissioner has done in the past? I feel that this legislation envisages his having some time to devote to exchequer court business. There are six members of the transport board. As the minister points out, their duties have not been so great in the recent past. Is it the intention to rearrange the duties of the chief commissioner? Will he deal only with certain important kinds of work of the board, or is that something which will be left to the board itself? Because some extra time will be at the disposal of the chief commissioner I do not imagine that he will spend all his time at this work. Does the same thing apply to the other members of the board? If so, the time may be fast approaching when there should be a certain overhauling of the transport board so that the time of the members will be fully occupied.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is expected that the chief commissioner will devote his full time to the work of the transport board. I think I am right when I say that there is no provision that he will do so, but in any event I feel sure that he will devote his full time to the work of the board.

The points raised by my hon. friend are to some extent answered by the section. My hon. friend cited section 6 of the Exchequer Court Act, which provides that members of the exchequer court can do nothing else. Subsection 2 contains these words: "Notwithstanding anything in this or any other act." These words make it unnecessary to refer to section 6 by number. The bill is not a bill to amend the Railway Act only, but to amend three acts, and it naturally has to go in one act; it could not very well go in the whole three.

Mr. McMASTER: In fact, this bill does amend the Exchequer Court Act in regard to the number of judges and their remuneration?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: Clauses 3 and 4 deal with the Exchequer Court Act. The last two subsections of section one should also be amendments to the Exchequer Court Act and not to the Railway Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a bill to amend three acts. As the hon. member has pointed out, it is a little awkward to have amendments to the Exchequer Court Act in the Railway Act, but I cannot think of any reasonable alternative.

Mr. McMASTER: Except to amend the Exchequer Court Act and not the Railway Act so far as these two subclauses are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend suggests that subsection 2a should be an amendment to the Exchequer Court Act; but the latter part of the subsection is appropriate as an amendment to the Railway Act. The words "The chief commissioner is not a civil servant for the purposes of that act" would be more appropriate in the Railway Act than in the Exchequer Court Act. It might be that that could be separated from the other, but I doubt whether there would be any great inconvenience here. It will be pretty generally known that there is a special act relating to this position.

Mr. McMASTER: Surely it will be incorporated some time in the Exchequer Court Act when the revision is made.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be in the revision.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. FRASER: On division.

Bill reported, read the third time, on division, and passed.

REVISED STATUTES

PROVISION FOR COMMISSION TO EFFECT REVISION

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 348 respecting the revised statutes of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Statute revision commission established.

Mr. FLEMING: I wish to ask the minister a question relating to both sections 1 and 2. The minister intimated yesterday that this bill would be in the same form as the 1924 bill preceding the last revision of statutes. That bill became chapter 65 of the statutes of 14-15 George V. That revision of that time was initiated by an order in council passed in 1923, and that may explain the fact that the first two sections of the bill before us have no counterpart in the statute of 1924. As we have not the terms of the order in council before us, will the minister tell us precisely how they compare with sections 1 and 2 of the present bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: The order in council of 1923 named the commissioners and stated that the naming of a secretary for the commission would be considered later. It specified the remuneration, and—

Mr. FLEMING: Did it specify the personnel?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, by name. It is not very long, but there is a good deal of preamble. The order in council names the members of the commission; intimates that the naming of the secretary will be considered later; provides that the commissioners, other than ex officio members, shall receive adequate remuneration for their services, the minister recommending the following rates of compensation: president, $4,000 per annum, vice-president, $3,000, and each of the other commissioners $2,500. The special payments begin to be earned on and from the date of the first meeting of the commission. I cannot say whether those were the amounts paid or not. The order in council does not say that they have to be; it simply states that that is what the minister recommends.

The order in council says that it will be necessary to provide that the appropriation may be paid and expended notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act, which prohibits extra payments to members of the civil service. The minister recommends that the vote to be taken at the next session of parliament be expressed in a manner to authorize payments to members of the civil service upon special approval of the Minister of Justice. The order in council seems to be somewhat conversational in form.

Mr. FLEMING: The provisions of the order in council of 1923, to which the minister has referred, seem to be the counterpart of section 1 of the present bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: They are, however, not a counterpart of section 2, at least so far as the minister has read them. Section 2 is an important provision, and I am wondering what counterpart it had in the order in council of 1923, because section 2 has no counterpart in the act of 1924.

Mr. ILSLEY: The order in council of 1923 seemed to be passed mainly for the purpose of authorizing the expenditure of money and making some financial arrangements. A statute had to be passed the following year, and that was done.

Mr. FLEMING: But the statute that was passed does not contain any counterpart of the provisions of section 2 indicating the duties of the commission.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but the preamble to the statute of 1924 states: "Whereas it has been found expedient to revise, classify and consolidate the public general statutes of Canada passed since the date of the revised statutes of Canada 1906", and so on. While those words have no exact counterpart here, the words of section 2 embody much the same language. This commission shall examine the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and the public general statutes of Canada enacted since the coming into force of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and in accordance with the provisions of this act shall revise, classify and consolidate the said statutes.

The only counterpart is the recital in the act of 1924 that that was being done, that the revised statutes of 1906 were being revised, classified and consolidated. The other provisions with regard to remuneration and employment of members of the public service are new in a way. Subsection 3 is much the same in effect as the provisions I read with regard to remuneration.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister appreciates that there may be concern as to the significance of some of these words which appear in section 2, and particularly the concluding words of subsection 1, "shall revise, classify and consolidate the said statutes".

My concern is the extent to which parliament is going to assume its responsibility for any changes that may be made in the statutes. This section will give rise in the minds of some to this question: How far does a commission go, when it is instructed as section 2 of the bill instructs this commission, to revise, classify and consolidate the statutes?

On the question of the meaning of "revision", some discussion took place in the debate on the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, it may save a little time. In what he is about to say, let him give full consideration to the words "in accordance with the provisions of this act". As I read section 2, no independent jurisdiction or authority is conferred by this section. The revision, classification and consolidation must be in accordance with this act; therefore one must look to the rest of the act for the duties of the commissioners.

Mr. FLEMING: The views I was about to express I thought could better be expressed on this section, but I will leave them until we come to section 5.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that you might permit some general discussion on this first section, at least until we get this point cleared up, because I am under the same apprehension as the hon. member for Eglinton. There are clauses in the bill which say that the commissioners shall do a certain job, admittedly in accordance with the provisions of the act. Then there are later clauses which say that once the job of revising and consolidating has been done, the clerk of parliaments and certain other people are to attest the roll, and then, lo and behold! by a proclamation of the governor in council it comes into effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does that mean that once this job has been done by the commission, parliament will not have the opportunity of approving the revised job?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that a new departure?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not a new departure. The only new departure in this bill is the revised wording of section 5. It is open to discussion whether those changes should be made.

Mr. KNOWLES: On previous occasions—for example, in 1927—when the statutes were revised, the commission did the job, but parliament did not have the opportunity to approve it?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. KNOWLES: My non-legal mind does not think that is a good way to do it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. FLEMING: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are certain sections which indicate that wide power is being given here. I looked up the word "revise" in the dictionary on the table of the house. Amongst the definitions of "revise" is to look over, re-examine or reconsider and amend faults in various things, including amending faults in the law. Why are there so many words here—revise, classify and consolidate? The meaning of "revise" must be gained from reading the subsequent paragraphs. Under section 5 "revise" would mean, among other things—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is only one way in which I can define what "revise" means, and that is by reference to subsequent sections where the powers are given to the commission. It is for this reason that I refer to them, sir. It is merely for the purpose of indicating how wide the power may be that is now to be conferred by parliament on that commission.

If I may proceed, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that under section 5 the powers that are given—and these are powers as to alterations which must come within the purview of the word "revision" are as follows:

5. (1) The commission in consolidating the said statutes . . . may make such alterations in the language of the statutes as are necessary in order to secure uniformity of style and expression—

That is, in fact a revision—the type of revision that consists in consolidation—together with the removal of language that is unnecessary or that contains grammatical errors and the like. The section continues:

—may rectify apparent errors—

So far so good.

—and reconcile conflicting provisions or enactments—

That goes a long way. To "reconcile conflicting enactments or provisions" indicates the granting of a power to decide what in the minds of the commission should be done in order to bring into realignment in accordance with the wishes of the commission two apparently dissimilar sections. The section continues:

—and in cases of doubt or ambiguity the commission may make such amendments as are necessary to resolve such doubt or ambiguity—

I shall stop there for moment. What is that but the power to legislate? What is that but giving power to a commission to say that parliament did not know what it was doing, that parliament did not properly legislate but has left an ambiguity with the result that a change must be made? I feel that is too wide a power to grant to a commission which will finally determine the question without regard to parliament. If this commission were merely to recommend, I could understand such a power. But for this commission to be given by parliament carte blanche to determine finally what parliament meant, goes farther than the question of revision should go. Indeed, parliament in fact delegates to a commission power to do something which the commission says parliament in its wisdom did not properly do. That, sir, is going too far. Actually it means that parliament delegates to a commission of seven the right to decide what parliament should have said and in fact did not say. For the next sentence says—and I again refer to section 5(1)—as follows:

—the commission may make such amendments as are necessary to resolve such doubt or ambiguity in accordance with what the commission considers to have been the intention of parliament.

That is a wide power. It is actually placing in the hands of a commission, over which parliament will have no control, the power to do that which judges frequently must do, namely, determine the intention of parliament. And in determining that question, judges must depend entirely upon the words used by parliament. In this section, and the subsequent sections defining the meaning of the word "revise", we are actually placing a commission in a higher position than that in which the judiciary of this country today is placed. The judges, when they are determining the intention of parliament, are restricted by the words used. This commission is to have no such restriction at all. I feel that any changes that are made should not become law without parliament actually having the right to decide whether or not those changes should in fact be made.

I would also refer to section 9 (1)—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. What is before the committee at the present time is clause 1.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I appreciate that, Mr. Chairman. But we are trying to find out what clause 1 means, and we can do that only by reference to other clauses.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the committee would make better progress if we dealt with the clauses as we come to them. If we pass clause 1—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thought we were on clause 2.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: No. Clause 1 is now before the committee.

Mr. FLEMING: I have another question or two on clause 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FLEMING: May I make this observation? The minister turned aside my remarks on this subject of the meaning of "revision".

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: My remarks were intended to tie in with the effect of section 5. If the minister proposes to take this subject up now, there are some things that I had better say before he begins. It will save time.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think we should deal with clause 1.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. ILSLEY: May I say a few words, with the unanimous consent of the committee. I think we shall be arguing all afternoon and longer unless I do what my much wiser predecessors did, and that is, use precisely the language used in 1924. I am prepared to do that. I find in Doctor Ollivier's article these words:

> On second reading Mr. Lapointe, then Minister of Justice, stated that the bill was an exact reproduction of the bills that had preceded other revisions of the statutes of Canada.

When we come to section 5 I will move that subsection 1 be struck out and that we use the words used in 1924. It will be open to many objections which the hon. member for Lake Centre has expressed; nevertheless it has not seemed to do much harm.

Mr. FLEMING: What is proposed to be paid to the five members of the commission, and what are to be the terms of their employment? Will they work full time or part time? When is it expected that the work will begin, and what will be the method of operation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I expect that they will not devote their full time to this work, and that they will be paid on a per diem basis, but what that basis will be I cannot say now. Before, they were paid on a per annum basis.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the remuneration be on a uniform basis for all the members?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say.

Mr. McMASTER: The revision of the Ontario statutes has taken place every ten years—except that 1937 was the last one—and one of the outstanding judges of the high court of Ontario is usually appointed as chairman of the board. Is it a fair question to ask the minister whether one of the judges of the High Court of Ontario, or of some other province, or of the Supreme Court of Canada, may be appointed? Speed is necessary, because we have not had a revision of the statutes for a long time, and a few dollars spent in obtaining the services of an outstanding jurist would be money well spent.

Mr. ILSLEY: A prominent judge was appointed to be chairman of the revising body in 1906. That was not done in 1924, but consideration will be given to the suggestion. I rather got the impression from the discussion yesterday that some members felt this was a job for clerks, a sort of scissors-and-paste job. I do not agree. To put the present statutes in proper shape and bring them together requires a good deal of ability.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Certified roll to be deposited with clerk of the parliaments.

Mr. CHURCH: Is it proposed to substitute this commission for the high court of parliament? When the Ontario statutes were revised years ago, the work was done by a board, which at one time was under the chairmanship of Chief Justice W. R. Meredith. It was largely a committee of officials, presided over by a judge, and afterwards it was passed on by the legislature. Parliament ought not to delegate its powers and functions to any crown officer—because that is what they all will be, crown officers. Are we to accept their revisions without reading them? Is parliament to abdicate its functions? I am surprised to find a bill like this before parliament, and I protest against it.

Mr. FLEMING: I wish to say a word or two in relation to parliament's functions in regard to the revision. A comparison of the present bill with chapter 65 of the statutes of 1924 shows that, apart from sections 1 and 2 which we have dealt with and which did not have a counterpart in the act of 1924, the remaining sections of the bill have been taken verbatim from the 1924 act, with the exception of section 5, and the minister has indicated that when we reach that section he proposes to restore the original section. It may be then that we shall be in the position of being asked to legislate in precisely the same terms, with the exception of sections 1 and 2, as those contained in the legislation of 1924. Nevertheless, I think there is still enough breadth in the duties attached to the work of revision as indicated in sections 2 and 5, even after the new section 5 which the minister is to propose, to make it not only desirable but necessary that any changes going beyond what the minister referred to as a scissors-and-paste job should be reviewed by parliament. I do not think parliament will be slow or unwieldy in dealing with matters of this kind. Parliament could move very quickly to appoint a special committee for the purpose of reviewing the statutes as revised by the commissioners, and this committee could come to the house from time to time with the recommendations of the commissioners. But I cannot reconcile my duty as a member of parliament with simply accepting provisions of this kind, in which parliament is saying in effect: We are giving certain instructions to the commission; we fully expect that the commissioners will adhere strictly to their instructions, but whether they do or do not, whether they confine themselves to the terms of those instructions or whether they stray afield, their work is not to come back to parliament. All they will be required to do is to deposit the roll with the clerk of parliaments. Then, under section 7, on the filing of the roll, power is reserved to bring those statutes into full force and effect.

I do not expect in advance that the commissioners will exceed the terms of the commission. But I do not believe parliament will be doing its duty if it agrees now to accept in advance whatever work the commissioners may do, and whatever may appear on the roll which they will deposit with parliament perhaps three, four or five years hence, when their work is completed. I do not think that is the way in which parliament ought to address itself to its responsibilities. At this stage we have to insist that there be some limitations in the terms of the bill, so that in respect of anything other than what the minister has described as the scissors-and-paste job of consolidation, parliament will accept responsibility and will have an opportunity of reviewing the work of the commissioners.

I do not conceive that that will mean delay, or that parliament will make any unwieldy or cumbersome interference with the work of revision. As I have said, parliament can set up a committee which will make its recommendations to the house. It seems to me parliament must accept its responsibilities and its task in connection with this work of revision.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, if I had any faith in the possibility of the committee, of which my hon. friend speaks, considering over again all the statutes of Canada, I would perhaps accept his suggestion. But I know perfectly well that the committee would not do that. The thing to do is to do what has been done repeatedly in the past. Instead of relieving these people from responsibility we should place the responsibility upon them, so that they may do a workmanlike job. They have always done it in the past, and they will do it in the future. If we argued a week on each statute, as we do often on bills, it can be seen what would happen. My hon. friend talks about parliament reconsidering four hundred pieces of legislation such as the Canada Shipping Act—

Mr. FLEMING: The changes in them.

Mr. ILSLEY: —the Income War Tax Act, and many other acts, to see whether the commissioners have done their job properly. If that is done it would delay the revision of the statutes for years. I know enough about attendance at committees and the possibility of getting members out of the house into committees, to say that if my hon. friend's suggestion were followed, the work would fall back on departmental officials, and those officials would be given the assurance that if there were no change in the law the statute would be accepted by the house. That is what would happen if my hon. friend's suggestions were accepted.

I would rather drop the revision of the statutes than embark upon something which will take five or ten years to accomplish, just because theoretically the house feels that it is unsafe to leave the work to a responsible commission, if the job is to be done faithfully and well.

I do not know why we should institute that new system at this time. It makes a good talking point, of course. But I ask hon. members to have some regard for the practical elements in the situation.

Mr. FLEMING: I hope I am as practical a man as the minister. Having in mind the practical side of the matter, I am asking why this cannot be done. The last time this work took three and a half years. It is a greater work now than it was then?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Perhaps this time it will take more than three or four years. Why cannot the commissioners, as they complete their work of revision and consolidation of the statutes, pass it forward to parliament, session by session, within that period of time? Parliament could then review completely, through committees set up for the purpose, any changes that were proposed.

I do not for one moment suggest that parliament would carry out a revision, section by section, of 400 odd statutes which would come before us in four or five volumes. But surely parliament is going to accept its responsibility in connection with changes. The commission is not only authorized but is directed to make changes in certain ways. Who is to say in advance whether the commission will adhere to or confine themselves within the narrow interpretation of the instructions respecting changes? It is in the matter of changes made that I think parliament at this stage, in 1948, must take its stand. No matter what the commissioners may bring in, or put in the roll, when it comes here it becomes the law, without the slightest revision by parliament.

I have not so completely lost faith in parliament and the ability of parliament to do its legislative task with efficiency and expedition that I am prepared to accept the principle that parliament should not have any part in the work of revision, or that parliament will be clogging its work if it insists upon reviewing the changes. Parliament has a task to do, and, regardless of what was done in the past, we have a situation to face today in 1948. Parliament has no business to turn its back on its duty.

Mr. KNOWLES: What about the criminal code?

Mr. ILSLEY: The criminal code will have to be dealt with by some body other than this. Important changes should be made in it. Initially, revision of the criminal code is a departmental responsibility. Just as the revision and consolidation of the Income War Tax Act is the initial responsibility of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue, in the same way, the revision and consolidation of the criminal code is the responsibility of the Department of Justice. For the purpose, the Department of Justice will have to secure the necessary appropriation and employ the best possible help to give advice. Then it will have to take the responsibility for changes in that law, just as it has in the past. The department will have to make recommendations to council, and council will make recommendations to the house. That is the only way in which we can deal with the criminal code. It is a different operation entirely from a consolidation of the statutes.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will a revised code appear as such in the revised statutes?

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is done in time. The statutes revised in the interim between now and the time the commissioners make their report, or when their roll is deposited, can be embodied in the new revised statutes. If the criminal code consolidation and revision is completed in time, it will appear.

Mr. KNOWLES: And approved by parliament?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and approved by parliament; that is right. That is a matter of parliamentary responsibility, of course.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the British constitution the courts are subservient to the legislatures, and those courts include not only the judges but all the crown officers. In the present procedure the government is simply wiping out the power of the legislature, and it is giving to judicial bodies, including crown officers, the power to pass those statutes over the head of parliament. And note that every bill we pass gives crown officers the right to make rules and regulations thereunder which have the force of statute law. If that is law reform in this country, well then, I will say to the government that it is violating one of the most important principles in our constitution, namely that the courts are subservient to the legislatures.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me call the hon. member's attention to the fact that this course was followed in the two last revisions of 1906 and 1927. There may have been revisions before that, but the course of procedure being followed here was followed in the last two revisions.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Schedule of repealed, superseded, inconsistent or spent enactments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to bring up a matter which has not been dealt with previously—the volume of orders in council that are not found in these statutes, but which amend, suspend or abrogate, in whole or in part, statutes passed by parliament. I first brought up this matter in 1942 by way of a question, when I asked for a list of statutes which had been amended, suspended or abrogated. The attitude taken was that that was a question which just would not be answered because it had not occurred. Finally I placed a question on the order paper, it was passed as an order for return, and a list of statutes which had been suspended or amended or abrogated was brought down.

There are quite a few statutes in that position today. One statute was suspended in its operation even without an order in council. That was the one passed two years ago under which the railway companies were required, by a certain date, to abdicate any function in the matter of air transport. That date has long since passed, and the statute was not in fact suspended by an order in council or otherwise. A direction was simply made by the minister of reconstruction.

Section 4 of the bill reads:

> There shall be appended to the said roll a schedule A similar in form to schedule A appended to the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1927; and the commission may include in the said schedule all acts and parts of acts which, though not expressly repealed, are superseded by the acts so consolidated, or are inconsistent therewith, and all acts and parts of acts which were for a temporary purpose, the force of which is spent.

As long as statutes are being suspended or abrogated in whole or in part by order in council—this is an occurrence not unusual under the Customs Tariff Act—I think something should be done to provide a list of statutes or sections of statutes that are in a state of suspension or whose provisions are not in effect. Today it is impossible for any person in the practice of law to know what the law is on any subject unless he has before him the various orders in council which have been passed and are still in effect.

I pass this on to the minister by way of suggestion. The passing of orders in council at an accelerated rate in the last ten years requires that something be done in order for the convenience of those charged with interpreting the law on behalf of clients and so that the judiciary may have before them at any one time the situation with respect to every statute. Would the minister be prepared to amend section 4 or add another section so that that certainty would be assured which is necessary if counsel are to advise? There should be a list of orders in council which detract or subtract from the effects of statutes in the appendix.

Mr. ILSLEY: A great deal of consideration would have to be given to that suggestion. I am under the impression that the repealing or amending of sections of acts by order in council was done under the War Measures Act, or the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, or the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act. That act expires on March 31 next, at which time these orders in council will lapse and lose their force. Unless there were some statutory amendment or repeal of the various sections, those sections would be there as the law.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister give consideration to it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: May I suggest that the minister give consideration also to the question of revising, not only the orders in council but the regulations? Several years ago a useful act, the Regulations Act, was brought into effect in Ontario, under which all regulations issued by the provincial government were reviewed, brought up to date, classified and reissued. It had the effect of eliminating a lot of dead wood and making the present regulations known. There is a much larger body of federal orders in council. Such a measure applying both to orders in council and to regulations would be a most useful measure to put into effect here. I cannot speak too highly of the results obtained in Ontario from that statute. Under it the registrar of regulations is a continuing officer charged with the work of revision. New regulations must be submitted to him, and they are filed in public through him. I urge the minister to give consideration to that. Perhaps it is not as important as the revised statutes; nevertheless it is of great importance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree that it is important. I am told that the work is under way at the present time. For instance, all the regulations of the Department of Agriculture are being gone over carefully in the Department of Justice, and that work must be going on in other departments as well. I think it is under the direction of the privy council office.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Powers of commission as to alterations.

Mr. ILSLEY: The word "commissioners" was used in the 1924 act, while the word "commission" is used here. With the amendment proposed, section five will read as follows:

The commission in consolidating the said statutes, and in incorporating therewith the acts or parts of acts passed subsequent thereto and selected for inclusion therein as above provided, may make such alterations in their language as are requisite in order to preserve a uniform mode of expression, and may make such minor amendments as are necessary to bring out more clearly what they deem to be the intention of parliament or to reconcile seemingly inconsistent enactments or to correct clerical or typographical errors.

Mr. McMASTER: Before the motion is put, I would suggest to the minister that he include the words which are in the Ontario act as to the consolidation of statutes, and which follow almost exactly what he has read, with a few minor changes. They have added this sentence: "And may include in such consolidation and revision such private acts". They relate to professions and callings. I would suggest that such private acts as are of general application throughout the province should be included. There are a great many private acts which affect a large number of people. As it is now, you require a whole library of the statutes of Canada in order to find them, because some of them go back a few years. Without this revision, you would have to obtain the statutes of thirty or forty years ago. There are some important acts which are called private acts and which affect a large percentage of the people of Canada. It would be a great convenience to solicitors and to the public if they were included.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman sure that private acts of Ontario are the same as private acts in Canada?

Mr. McMASTER: No, they are not the same. If they were the same they would not have been passed by Ontario. Some of them affect professions, but that does not alter the fact that in Canada we have many private acts which may be affected. If the commissioners find that there are no such acts, and I am sure they will not, they will not include them, but there are many such acts.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know they deal with different subject matters; but what I meant was, is not the definition of private acts in the province of Ontario different from the definition here? Are not acts which have any public importance or significance here classified as public acts? Is that not a matter which was carefully attended to before the bills were introduced.

Mr. McMASTER: If that is so, then perhaps the amendment is meaningless. If not, it is important.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an interesting suggestion, but it has never been done before. I do not know what we would be getting ourselves into if we started it. It would involve an examination of that preliminary question. It may very well be that, in Ontario, acts which are called private acts affect general interests, but here these acts are not called private acts. At the moment I cannot think of any private act which we pass here which affects general interest. Certainly divorce bills do not, except in an indirect kind of way.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Bell Telephone bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the Bell Telephone bill be one?

Mr. McMASTER: No, I would not think so. I think that is entirely a private act. Perhaps I can give the minister one. I refer to the act affecting the United Church of Canada. I think of that only because I am a member of the United Church. But it is something of that kind that I have in mind. The selection would be left to the committee. We are not telling them what they shall do. We are making the suggestion. When they go through the acts they will have a more intimate knowledge of what has been enacted in the past than I have, perhaps, who have taken this matter up only in the last few minutes.

Mr. ILSLEY: There certainly would be a big difference of opinion among the commissioners, between the commissioners and the government, and between the government and parliament, as to what was of general interest and what was not. There is no doubt about that. There is nothing definite about the task that is being given to the commissioners. Perhaps that would not make very much difference. They could take some of the ones that they thought ought to be put together, and publish them. If they leave more important ones nobody suffers, I suppose. I am afraid that somebody has to go through all the acts, anyway. We have never done this before. I think it would be too big a job. It is important that we get ahead with it.

Mr. McMASTER: An index was issued a few years ago of all the acts ever passed by the Dominion of Canada. You can find out where the act is. All it means is finding the particular year of the statutes to look it up.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think it is a very good gesture on the part of the minister to return to the old section.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend wanted to make it broader yesterday.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I wanted to make it broader only in so far as the recommendation to parliament is concerned. I wanted this body to be set up to make recommendations to the Department of Justice and to parliament, but not to detract from parliament and the right of parliament to determine whether or not this recommendation should, in fact, be carried into effect. Under section 5 as it was originally drawn, and which has now been withdrawn, provision was made for the making of such amendments as are necessary. In the section as it formerly was, such a wide power was not given. The only power conferred upon the commission was power to make minor amendments necessary to remove inconsistencies.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was not any general power to make such amendments as are necessary.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have the section here.

Mr. ILSLEY: Wait a moment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The section reads as follows:

> The commission in consolidating the said statutes and in incorporating therewith the acts or parts of acts passed subsequent thereto and selected for inclusion therein as provided in this act, may make such alterations in the language of the statutes as are necessary in order to secure uniformity of style and expression, may rectify apparent errors and reconcile conflicting provisions or enactments and in cases of doubt or ambiguity the commission may make such amendments as are necessary to resolve such doubt or ambiguity in accordance with what the commission considers to have been the intention of parliament.

Apparently the old section did not cover the situation, and this new section 5 was introduced by the minister. I say that under the old section only minor amendments could be made by the commission. The minister, having accepted the suggestion that was made regarding the all too great comprehensiveness of the new section, has met the criticism that was offered.

Sections 6 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Revised statutes not to be deemed new laws.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have looked over sections 8 and 9 and there is no alteration. Is there any particular difference between these sections and their corresponding sections in the old act?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I thought.

Sections 11 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to say one word. Somebody asked me about the remuneration of the commissioners. I said it was expected that they would be paid on a per diem basis. I want to make it clear that we are free to make a better arrangement if we can. If we can pay them on another basis we are free to do so. I want to make that clear, so that it will not be said we told parliament it would be on a per diem basis and it turned out later it was on another basis.

Mr. KNOWLES: Piecework.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, or per annum as it was before.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

National health branch—

246. National health branch administration, $122,823.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): When may we expect a review of the legislation announced by the Prime Minister in his speech on May 14?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): That comes under the supplementary estimates.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): And when may we expect those?

Mr. MARTIN: All the departments come in together and the Minister of Finance hopes they will be brought down some time next week. May I, Mr. Chairman, compliment the hon. gentleman on the splendid graduation exercises at the hospital in Toronto with which he has been associated for so many years and for which he has done such admirable work.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
247. Food and drugs, $540,953.

Mr. FLEMING: Can the minister give us the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $387,736.86; unliquidated commitments, $16,098.37; total commitments, $403,835.23—a remarkably good estimate.

Mr. FLEMING: For a change. In connection with this item and the next two, would the minister make a statement with reference to the consolidation of these divisions in his department? A statement was made to the house on March 10, indicating that the food and drugs division, the proprietary or patent medicine division and the advertising and labels division of the department had been combined and organized as a directorate for certain reasons set out in Hansard of that date. I had assumed, in the light of that statement, that these items would be consolidated in the estimates. Exactly what has been done in the consolidation of these branches, and why have we separate items, after we had been given to understand that there had been a combination?

Mr. MARTIN: The advertising and labels division has been consolidated with the food and drugs division. The reason the other has not been is that it administers another act.

Mr. FLEMING: But the minister's parliamentary assistant, in Hansard of March 10, is reported as follows:

> The food and drugs division, the proprietary or patent medicine division and the advertising and labels division of the department have been combined and organized as a directorate for the following reasons.

And the reasons are set out.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right, but we must have a separate vote for proprietary or patent medicines, because that division administers a separate act. That is in accordance with treasury practice. It is, however, part of the same division.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. FLEMING: Are any economies being effected as a result of the combination?

Mr. MARTIN: It is too early to say yet, but we have had a more efficient administration.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I do not wish to delay the estimates; but I suggest that in the rush of business hon. members seem to overlook the fact that for the first time, in my experience at any rate, extending over a quarter of a century, the minister has the great good fortune to have a fair assistant on the floor. I am sure she will help him to a great extent in his estimates.

I wish to impress upon the minister the urgency of a matter which he knows is on my mind, and that is the addition of 150 beds in the hospital in Toronto. Even though we must wait for the supplementaries before we can discuss this question fully, I suggest that those who are engaged in estimating those supplementary items should have the benefit of discussion in this chamber on the general estimates of the department. I think I am in order in that regard.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: When the first item was called, the hon. member for Eglinton asked the Chair to rule whether members would be allowed to discuss the scheme that was announced by the Prime Minister. A ruling was given, to which hon. members have adhered pretty well, that there should be no discussion of that question until the introduction of the supplementary estimates. The matter does not come under this vote.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Then I will observe the ruling. I would ask the minister whether all the matters that have come to the attention of the national health branch in connection with this item will be given thorough consideration when the supplementaries are being prepared. I think that question is in order.

Mr. MARTIN: May I say at once, for the information of my hon. friend, that the $30,000,000 announced by the Prime Minister will be included in the supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
253. Child and maternal health, $71,565.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister explain the reduction in this item and make a statement as to what is being done under the head of child and maternal health?

Mr. MARTIN: The reduction is due almost entirely to a diminution in the expenditures for the informational work of the division. It does not represent any material curtailment in the activities of the department. It is a matter of the amount of printing required. One year we are up and the next year down. This is nearly all due to the publication of Doctor Coûture's book, "The Canadian Mother and Child." The printing last year was heavy, and that will carry us on, I hope, until the end of this year. Next year it may be up again. There is no curtailment in our activities. When the supplementary estimates are before the committee my hon. friend will see that there is considerable increase or acceleration in this division.

Mr. KNOWLES: In other words, there has been no curtailment at the informational end, because of any criticism that has been made on that score.

Mr. MARTIN: That is quite true. On the contrary, there has been acceleration.

Mr. KNOWLES: Good.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not think the minister has given the expenditures on these last several items. The last one I have is item 247.

Mr. MARTIN: On item 248: expenditures, $19,807.96; unliquidated commitments, $51.24; total commitments, $19,859.20.

On item 249: expenditures, $117,805.02; unliquidated commitments, $237.77; total commitments, $118,042.79.

On item 250: expenditures, $233,545.66; unliquidated commitments, $4,244.06; total commitments, $237,789.72.

On item 251: expenditures, $205,335.28; unliquidated commitments, $10,848.35; total commitments, $216,183.63. That is another example of good estimating.

On item 252: expenditures, $441,527.52; unliquidated commitments, $4,316.69; total commitments, $445,844.21.

On item 253: expenditures, $93,686.92; unliquidated commitments, $1,781.78; total commitments, $95,468.70. That is another example of fairly good estimating.

Mr. FLEMING: There is an odd case of that. Will the minister say a word about he expansion of the services in connection with immigration?

Mr. MARTIN: That is largely owing to the policy of accelerated immigration of the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. FLEMING: I realize that. Will the minister indicate the method by which it is working out, and how it is being handled?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not quite understand my hon. friend's question. We service the department from a medical standpoint, carrying out the examination of immigrants and so on. It is being done on the basis that I outlined in the house some time ago. I think my hon. friend will find that statement in Hansard of June of last session, just before our estimates were dealt with.

This service supplies medical advice to the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources, with regard to medical inspection of prospective immigrants, both abroad and at Canadian ports of entry. The medical examination is designed to assist the administrative immigration officers in prohibiting the entry of persons who are physically or mentally unfit, who might be a danger to the public health, or who probably would be unable to support themselves and would become a charge on the public. This is in accordance with the medical clauses of the Immigration Act and the regulations made pursuant thereto. This service also provides medical treatment for those individuals in immigration detention, under the authority of the Immigration Act and the regulations made pursuant thereto. It maintains and equips hospital accommodation for these purposes. It convenes medical boards of reference when needed. It pays costs of sending medical officers and their families overseas to conduct medical examinations in the countries of origin, wherever full-time officers or agencies are established. It pays the actual living expenses of those medical officers.

I may say that the present system of examination is much more complete than it ever was. X-rays are now required in the case of all immigrants. That is an improvement over the previous medical system and arises out of the experience the department has had during the past two years.

Mr. FLEMING: My question was designed to bring out the way in which the expansion of the service is working out, because the minister is budgeting for a substantial increase here. In the light of the minister's concluding remarks, may we take it that there will not be any repetition of the sort of thing that happened with regard to the immigration of the Polish soldiers a couple of years ago, where they were admitted, apparently without adequate medical examination, and then, not long after they were here, it was found that among them were a number of cases of tuberculosis as well as venereal disease.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend has the assurance that is being done now. Our experience is that the existence of X-ray examination is proving desirable and effective.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
254. Public health engineering, $161,292.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister give the expenditures on this item?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $142,088.87; unliquidated commitments, $2,289.82; total commitments, $144,378.69.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
255. Treatment of sick mariners, $437,981.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister give the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $421,007.74; unliquidated commitments, $268.16; total commitments $421,275.90.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister indicate whether there has been any increase in the fees collected?

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. FLEMING: What was the amount for the last fiscal year?

Mr. MARTIN: Total dues paid for the calendar year 1946, $200,229.42.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
256. Industrial health, $99,364.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister give the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $82,576; unliquidated commitments, $9,789.31; total commitments, $92,365.31.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
257. Civil service health, $212,630.

Mr. McLURE: In the details of the services at page 196 of the estimates, I notice that about 66 per cent of this whole vote is for temporary assistance. It is quite a large amount, almost $135,000, and the total vote is $212,000. May we have an explanation of that?

Mr. MARTIN: It is a new division, and as quickly as we can get the temporaries made permanent, that will be done.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. FLEMING: No. May we have the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $151,343.48; unliquidated commitments, $6,779.02; total commitments, $158,122.50.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Martin.]

National health branch—
258. Nutrition, $150,816.

Mr. CHARLTON: Many people today realize that nutrition is extremely important. Can the minister give the committee some idea how this branch of his department is working and what it is doing to help nutrition across Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: This division, under the supervision of one of the outstanding nutritionists in the country, carries on much of its work through surveys which it makes at the request of provincial and other bodies, usually on recommendations made by the dominion council of health. I may say that the work of this division this past year has perhaps been more significant than in any other period. One important function is to carry on research on the state of nutrition of Canadians. It is a specialized service available to provincial health officers and others who find the nutritional information useful to them. Surveys have been made of the health of the populace in order that we may have more effective control and a more effective policy in improving and maintaining the health of Canadians. Surveys of this kind have been made in the maritime provinces, Quebec, Ontario and the prairie provinces, and requests are always on the desk of the nutritional director asking for further surveys. The work is both active and consultative. It is one of those branches of the service which I think is making a valuable contribution to our national life.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this done in connection with the national research council?

Mr. MARTIN: The work is done by departmental officers, but there is a close consultation with the national research council.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is actually all done under the national research council?

Mr. MARTIN: No; it is done by this department. The expenses were $28,942.65; and the total commitments aggregate $31,000 odd.

Mr. FLEMING: Last year the item was $138,448, and this year the minister is asking for $150,000. He has stated that the commitments aggregate $31,000. Surely there must be something astray somewhere, when the minister is asking for five times the amount expended last year.

Mr. MARTIN: What item is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. FLEMING: Item 258.

Mr. MARTIN: We are on nutrition. The expenses are $118,577.34.

Mr. FLEMING: What was the $31,000?

Mr. MARTIN: I should have said that the unliquidated commitments were $10,963.67, and the total, $129,541.01.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
Combating venereal diseases—
259. Administration, $37,363.
260. Assistance to provinces for control of venereal diseases under regulations approved by the governor in council, $175,000.

Mr. FLEMING: I think, Mr. Chairman, we had better take these two items together. Will the minister indicate the proposed disbursement of this $175,000? Is it to be on the same basis as in the previous year?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. On item 259 the expenditures are: $28,942.65; unliquidated commitments, $2,429.17; total commitments, $31,371.82.

Mr. FLEMING: What are the figures for item 261?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $49,440.92.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister make a statement on the whole subject of venereal disease and on what progress, if any, has been made within the limits of the department's jurisdiction in dealing with it? The department is assisting the provinces not only with certain grants under item 260 but also in connection with the distribution of drugs under item 261. What headway is being made in combating this scourge? There was a dominion-provincial conference of the officers of this department with those of provincial health departments, and I think useful results flowed from that conference. A program was also undertaken in connection with this disease in Alberta. Would the minister give us a statement as to the work that has been carried on during the past year?

Mr. MARTIN: As my hon. friend will realize, the new national health program involves a substantial increase in the activities of this division through the financial arrangements that are to be made and those already in effect now with the provinces. During the past year there has been a continued administration and distribution of the federal cash grant, materials and anti-venereal disease drugs to the provinces, according to the regulations set forth in order in council P.C. 1690. We have had the addition of a medical consultant, Doctor A. G. Laroche, to the staff of the federal division of venereal disease control. There has been the further development and distribution of venereal disease educational material and other educational activities. For instance, there has been the continuation of projects involving the review of venereal disease documents of all service personnel and the provision of information upon request to provincial venereal disease control divisions. Arrangements have been undertaken for production of an additional supply of anti-arsenical compound "BAL" for therapeutic and research purposes. We are engaged in preparing for the convening of the third federal-provincial conference of venereal disease control directors and participation in eastern and western regional conferences. There has been a continued compilation and expansion of quarterly statistical reports on venereal disease in Canada. Amendments have been enacted to sections of the criminal code dealing with prostitution. There has been increasing activity with respect to closer liaison with foreign countries and world health organizations. That, of course, is one of the important objectives in the control of venereal disease throughout the world.

The encouraging trend in the over-all venereal disease picture noted throughout the previous year has continued into the first quarter of 1948, as can be demonstrated by a review of the number of reported cases of syphilis and gonorrhoea. There were 736 less cases of venereal disease, all types, reported by physicians and to provincial health departments during this period, representing an improvement of about nine per cent. Distributed between syphilis and gonorrhoea cases in numbers of 164 and 528 respectively permit me to say that these represent a six per cent improvement in syphilis infections and 10 per cent in gonorrhoea cases. Early syphilis cases reported decreased by 213, or 24 per cent, while "syphilis others" increased by sixty-seven cases, or about four per cent.

It is both interesting and reassuring to note the precipitous fall in the reported cases of other types of venereal disease, namely forty-four cases, which, even though relatively insignificant in comparison with syphilis and gonorrhoea, represent an 80 per cent improvement.

I think my hon. friend will agree with me that, in spite of the serious proportions that still exist, much has been done in this field.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to refer to the publication "Canada's Health and Welfare". Would it come under this item?

Mr. MARTIN: No; we passed that in the departmental administration item.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I notice that only 83,000 copies are issued. To whom do they go? I was wondering if the publication gives value for the money spent. What are the results obtained? I should not like to see it go out of existence, but I wish to know something about it.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

261. Distribution of drugs under regulations approved by the governor in council, $50,000.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the amount?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures were $49,440.92; no unliquidated commitments; total commitments, $49,440.92.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Did the minister say that the information for which I asked came under some other item?

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend was not speaking on the right item. By the Chairman's nod I knew I would be precluded from answering.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Publications for educational purposes would come under this item.

Mr. MARTIN: I recall now that the hon. member was not in the house the other evening, and he told me later that he would like to ask a question in this connection. Perhaps, without creating a precedent, I might have the indulgence of the committee to answer. The publication to which the hon. member refers is one which I am sure all hon. members will agree is really effective. It is circulated monthly to the extent of over 80,000 copies. Those copies go to provincial governments, provincial health authorities and local health authorities, and are distributed widely throughout the country. It is based upon a recommendation made to us by the dominion council of health at its bi-annual meeting held in Ottawa. I have every reason to believe that it is a satisfactory publication. For instance, the articles on cancer, let alone the articles in recent issues on mental health, are being re-copied by journals and are being given radio coverage. These have received wide commendation. It serves as source material in an important educational way for people throughout the country.

National health branch—

262. Health insurance studies, $23,302.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with this item, I would be interested in having the minister's answer to the same type of question the hon. member for Eglinton has been asking. The minister will know my reason. Last year it turned out that not all the moneys appropriated for health insurance studies were spent. How much of the money appropriated for the past year has been spent, and why is there a reduction this year as against last year? What progress has been made in health insurance studies during the past year?

Mr. MARTIN: From what my hon. friend said the other night, I fully expected him to ask this perfectly proper question. Because of the importance of the matter, perhaps I should deal with it in a somewhat more extended fashion than I otherwise would.

First of all, the expenditures are $6,652.61, and the unliquidated commitments are $28.27, or a total commitment of $6,680.88. May I say at the outset what I said last year, that this particular division of the department is so important that I as minister was not going to recommend the appointment of anyone who, in my judgment, had neither the competence nor the conviction in terms of belief in the general proposals of some form of system of health insurance.

I am sure the hon. member and the committee generally will agree with this. Certainly all one has to do is to speak to any minister who has had anything to do with the administration of this department to find out that the personnel in the country available for this work is extremely limited.

I am hoping to be able to announce shortly the name of an individual in this country whose eminence in the field of national health administration is unquestioned. It is hoped that that person will be able to take over the administration of this division of the department. I am sure that if satisfactory arrangements can be made in connection with getting this individual it will win not only the commendation of the house, but of the country.

The cut in the expenditures as indicated in the estimates is not at all indicative of the work that has gone on in this branch. I have arranged, during the past year, to have attached to this particular division Doctor B. D. B. Layton, who has been engaged in other pursuits in the department, and who had special qualifications for this work of health insurance studies. He has been engaged throughout the whole of the past year in this particular field. His salary is being voted in another division. So that, while the salary of the director under this particular branch has not been actually expended, the important thing is to make sure that the work is being done.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is that other division?

Mr. MARTIN: The venereal disease control division.

I do not like to mention names, but I mention these names because they will be known to those who are familiar with this subject as being among those who have special competence in this field. Mr. J. W. Willard of our research division, formerly executive secretary of the Canadian medical procurement and assignment board and one of those who directed the national health survey in 1943, has been in charge of the health planning program carried on by our research division in collaboration with others in the division who are engaged in health insurance studies.

Both of these men have devoted their entire time during the past year to the work of this division. They have had the full-time assistance of Doctor J. H. Horowicz, Miss M. Van Duzen, Mr. C. D. Allen, Mr. J. A. Macdonald and Miss B. J. Stewart, together with supporting clerical and stenographic staff.

With respect to specific grants under the program to be covered by the supplementary estimates and as announced by the Prime Minister some time ago, in addition to these individuals we have had certain senior members of the department devoting a considerable portion of their time to this work during the past year. It will be realized, of course, that it is difficult to assess exactly the actual proportion of time which these officers have devoted to this work.

The director of the mental health division, Doctor C. G. Stogdill, because of the pre-eminent importance of his work in this field, has been an indispensable person for this work. Likewise, Doctor H. A. Ansley, the assistant director of health services, and Doctor Couture of the child and maternal health division, as well as Doctor Davidson, deputy minister of welfare, and Doctor Cameron, deputy minister of national health, have made invaluable contributions.

In addition, I have enjoyed the most extensive collaborative services of Doctor H. M. Cassidy of the University of Toronto. He spent all last summer and part of the fall on this work and continues to act in a consultative capacity.

I have calculated by mental arithmetic that, during the past year, the value of the time that all these individuals have devoted to this particular division would have exceeded $100,000. While I cannot say what the supplementary estimates will reveal in this connection, my hon. friend will see there submissions for the administration of our new health program which I know will please him and satisfy most hon. members.

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the minister will recognize the spirit and the truth of what I say when I suggest that he might well withdraw the objections he made the other night when I mentioned this on the first item, because it has given him an opportunity to get ready the statement he has just made.

Mr. MARTIN: This statement was made last fall. I always anticipate my hon. friend.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the minister suggest that there has been nothing done since last fall and that this statement which was prepared then is still an up-to-date report?

Mr. MARTIN: I have just indicated what has been done, which is considerable.

Mr. KNOWLES: Although the minister has done some mental arithmetic to suggest that more than $100,000 has been spent on this work, I do not think it can be taken that the people the minister talks about as being in other divisions spent their full time in two or three different capacities. The minister speaks of the great importance of this work and the considerable time or full time spent upon it by these various people, and yet they all have other jobs to do as well. As I listened to the minister's statement, I am afraid that it did not impress me as much as the words in it might be calculated to do.

The minister spoke of, and we agree with him, the desirability of delaying any appointments in this branch until it is possible to get someone who would go into it with conviction. He says he wants somebody who really believes in a program of health insurance. Some of us are wondering whether or not the government has any conviction on this matter and really means to go ahead with it. There is not a great deal of difference between what the minister said today and what he said a year ago in reply to my deskmate, the hon. member for Mackenzie. As I listened to the names of the persons which he read they seemed to be in the main the same persons. I have not the figures before me that he gave us last year, but the minister has now told us that for the year 1947-48 there was appropriated $27,863, of which only $6,680.88 has been spent. I am afraid we shall have to judge the seriousness with which this problem has been pursued, by those figures.

I hope that the minister will not start this fall to prepare a similar statement with which to answer the same kind of question next year, but that rather in the meantime this important question will be pressed with real conviction. It is not good enough to be talking about what we are going to do in the future about the health of the Canadian people; it is not good enough to be thinking about some glorious day in the distant future when people will no longer have to mortgage their whole lives in order to pay hospital, doctor and other bills; it is time for action now. I hope that the word "conviction" which the minister used is something that will be demonstrated by the pursuit of this important matter.

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot urge my hon. friend to accept what I have said if he does not want to, but I simply say there has never been as much activity in this division as there has been during the past year. The immensity of the program which we shall discuss next week clearly indicates the importance of that. If my hon. friend does not accept my word, I ask him to accept the word of Doctor Mott, who will confirm everything that I have said. I have enjoyed the collaboration and profited from the great experience of that gentleman. My hon. friend says nothing has been done and he refuses to accept the word of the minister. I can only assure him again that my own interest in this matter, apart altogether from the commitments of the government, must be regarded as indicating the tremendous amount of activity that is going on.

Mr. KNOWLES: On the minister's own statement, the department spent only $6,680 last year.

Mr. MARTIN: What I said was that we had utilized the services of men like Doctor Cassidy, and that is not calculated in that expenditure. Nor has my hon. friend calculated the time spent by qualified individuals in the department who have been working almost incessantly.

Mr. KNOWLES: They are good people.

Mr. MARTIN: I am glad that my hon. friend says they are good people. Apart from the individual whose name I hope to be able to announce shortly, I doubt if there is any group in the country more technically qualified in this field than these gentlemen and these women.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to make some observations, but in view of the minister's statement and the stress that he has placed upon the announcements to be made next week on the supplementary estimates, I am prepared to defer judgment on the work that has been done in this branch during the past year until we have the facts before us.

I simply say in passing that while the minister has been at pains to indicate the amount of work that has been done, and the fact that the actual amount of expense does not represent the entire amount of work that has been devoted to this subject, nevertheless the committee will want some further proof of progress toward health insurance than he has yet given. As I say, I am not offering judgment at the moment. I am suspending whatever I have to say on this subject until we have a full statement next week, but we shall be looking for a statement next week of some definite headway toward health insurance. That is one of the most conspicuous features of the statement made by the Prime Minister in this house on May 14.

Mr. MARTIN: Let us wait until we come to that, shall we?

Mr. FLEMING: At the moment I am speaking of something that was not in the statement. While the Prime Minister dealt with a number of matters in relation to health services, there was not anything said there, there was not a promise held out of something definite in the way of progress toward health insurance—

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend has not read the Prime Minister's statement too carefully.

Mr. FLEMING: I not only heard it, but read it. The Prime Minister dealt with a number of subjects in relation to health services. What I am saying to the minister is that the house will be looking now more than ever, in the light of the statement he has just made, for some earth-shaking statement next week from the minister as to some progress being made in this country toward health insurance. If we do not get that statement, there will probably be further debate on this subject.

Mr. MARTIN: I have known my hon. friend too long not to appreciate the extent of his warnings. They frighten me not too much. I simply tell him that the nature of the announcement made by the Prime Minister and the details of the program are of such fundamental significance in this country—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. We shall deal with the item before us.

Mr. MARTIN: I am dealing with health insurance studies.

Mr. FLEMING: Dealing with that which was not dealt with in the Prime Minister's statement.

Mr. MARTIN: The details of the program are of such fundamental significance to this country that the appraisal put on them by my hon. friend falls far short of their real worth and content.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has undertaken to make a comment on the things that were in the Prime Minister's statement. I made a comment on something that is not in the Prime Minister's statement. If the minister wants to make an ex parte statement of that kind in praise of the Prime Minister's proposals I am just going to tell him that the statement fell far short of the country's expectations; and if that statement is not supplemented next week by announcements which will meet the expectations of this house and of the country, then there will be another debate on the subject.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are on item 262, health insurance studies.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. I have just a few words to say on it. We have to do more than study the problem. We shall have to do something about it. I listened with interest to the minister's statement. I do not suppose there is anyone in the house more anxious to do something about the problem than the minister; but I realize also that the minister is faced with considerable difficulty in inaugurating the kind of insurance plan that should be inaugurated. Unless we change our basic thinking in the field of medicine, no minister or no government will be able to solve the problem. All we are doing about these basic problems is carrying on a lot of studies. The people of Canada are awakening to the fact that something more than a compilation of statistics on the problem is necessary in order to give us any kind of reasonable assurance that we shall provide the health services necessary for the people of Canada.

I listened to the hon. member for Lanark last evening. He dealt with the subject of arthritis. A lot of studies have been made, and the problem is thoroughly set out. We realize that we do not know much about the disability, but we are still probing around, trying to find some solution. The same situation applies to practically every disability or disease to which the human being is heir.

As outlined by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Prime Minister has made a gesture. He has told the provinces that he is willing to grant them certain sums of money for the purpose of carrying on research in certain fields, and for the purpose of providing more adequate hospital facilities and so on. But that is not a solution. I do not want the minister or hon. members to think I am speaking just as a socialist and expressing my own opinion. I am going to read an editorial which applies to one section of the country. It comes from a sensible and intelligent paper, namely, The Maritime Co-Operator. The point I want to bring home to the minister is the shortage of doctors and nurses in this country.

Mr. MARTIN: The whole program deals with that very thing. I do not think my hon. friend would be doing justice either to himself or to the committee by going into details now.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going into details.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member is talking about the shortage of doctors and hospitals. That is all covered by the program, the supplementary estimates for which will be introduced next week. I think my hon. friend will find that a convenient place to discuss it. In fact, I suggest with great respect, that if a point of order were taken, that is the only item on which he could properly discuss these matters.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going into details. I am going to be brief and abrupt. What I want to prove is this. As I said in the first place, unless we change our basic thinking in the field of medicine, all this talk about studying and providing a health program for the people of this country is only so much talk.

The minister says we are going to overcome these things, but we do not overcome it overnight. You do not train nurses and doctors and put them in the field overnight. Even after that is done, if we still continue, as we have done, to concentrate the doctors in the large urban centres, we shall have the great majority of our population in the rural centres without any medical services, even under the program that the minister outlined.

I do not want to go into details. The figures are known. So far as the government is concerned, I do not think there is any mystery about it.

Mr. MARTIN: That is why we announced the program, and the proper place to discuss it is when we reach the estimates dealing with it.

Mr. GILLIS: In the next fifteen years you are going to train enough doctors and nurses under the kind of program that the minister has in mind; but in the meantime, what will happen to the people of this country? I do not need to give the figures. I have the figures from the statistical departments of government. They have been put on the record. My point is this. So long as you keep the dollar sign on medicine; so long as the medical profession adopt the attitude that they will live where they like; that they will work how they like and will charge what they like; so long as they take the position that medicine is not a service to humanity but rather something to sell, no government will be in a position to give the people complete service in that field.

Today the doctors are concentrated in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver; and Nova Scotia and the maritimes generally—

Mr. MARTIN: I do not like to raise a point of order when the hon. gentleman is the victim; but if he is allowed to carry on I should be given the chance to reply. The matter that he is now discussing to which we in this department attach the greatest importance, is one feature of the new program. When the supplementary estimates are under discussion this particular problem can be fully discussed; but I suggest that it cannot be discused on this item.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue about the matter at all. I would not have risen in my place had it not been for the cross fire between the minister and the hon. member for Eglinton. I had no intention of speaking on this subject at all, but I do not want to remain in my place and let anyone in this house kid me or kid the people outside that we can do this kind of thing by some more studies. I am not going to argue any further with the minister. I would suggest that if he did not make so many speeches himself others would not make many from this side.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right. I never agreed more fully with anything.

Mr. HANSELL: I notice that under this item extensive studies are being made of health insurance, and I would suggest to the minister another form of insurance which I think should be established. I am thinking of insurance against improper diagnosis, where mistakes are made by the medical profession. This matter came to my attention through a case with which I am familiar and which I regard as most serious. I do not suppose the suggestion I am about to make will be acceptable to the medical profession, for whom I have the highest regard. I say we have the highest regard for them because, if it were not for our medical practitioners, it would go hard with us. If we have a stomach ache the first thing we do is to call in a doctor and we have to trust him to prescribe for us.

I make no complaints, because I recognize that mistakes are sometimes made. Not even medical practitioners are perfect. We know, however, that when such mistakes are made the one who suffers is the patient and he has no redress. The medical man may say: Yes, he can sue through the courts. I think, however, it will be generally agreed that the patient has not one chance in a thousand of getting any redress by that procedure.

I suggest to the minister that something be done to set up an insurance scheme of this kind for the protection, not only of the patient but of the medical men themselves. The case in which I am particularly interested is this. A man took treatment for a certain malady which he thought was rheumatism, and the treatment given him consisted of radium, by which evidently he was burned. He is quite confident that in the process of the treatment a mistake was made. He sought legal advice, and the lawyer said to him, "I think we have a clear case. There is no question according to the story you have told me that a mistake was made; but I would not advise you to sue, because I do not believe you have one chance in a thousand of succeeding. You would have to call other medical practitioners to give advice". The lawyer then outlined the procedure that would have to be followed.

That man has been on his back for nearly a year. I visited him lately and he asked me whether something could not be done. It is costing him nearly $1,000 a month. While I was visiting him, the nurse dressed his wounds. In his back there is a hole six inches in diameter and one can see his bare spine. The medical men are doing all they can for him; and I thought, by the look of the wound, it was being gradually cleaned and eventually the doctors might be able to operate and bring the flesh over. Specialists were called in from the Department of Veterans Affairs, men who had been practising for many years in the treatment of wounded veterans. I believe they are doing a good job in the effort to make this man well, but unfortunately he is suffering. Some mistake was made, and he is left a sufferer who is heavily in debt.

These cases may not be numerous, but something should be done for the protection of both patients and practitioners. Perhaps the medical men will oppose a suggestion of this kind. I am not proposing that the patient pay the insurance. I am suggesting that the medical profession should have some type of insurance to protect them in such cases where patients must seek redress for mistakes that have been made.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman was good enough a few days ago to discuss this matter in detail with me. As I told him then, and I repeat it now, it will be carefully studied.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

263. Dental health, $42,551.

Mr. FLEMING: What are the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $32,617.03; unliquidated commitments, $6,579.12; total commitments, $39,196.15.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to bring to the minister's attention something a little more pleasant than he has been hearing for some time. I refer to the high honour that has come to the dental profession of Canada through the award made to Doctor Harold Keith Box, D.D.S., Ph.D., of Toronto, as a result of his years of investigation into periodontology. Recently Doctor Box was awarded the Jarvie medal, being the second Canadian to have won it since it was first presented in 1905. It is undoubtedly a high honour that has come to this Canadian, who has devoted a lifetime to the study of the subject, and who is recognized as an outstanding authority in Canada on periodontology. I should like to read something in this connection:

This coveted fellowship gold medal is awarded annually by the dental society of the state of New York. It was presented to Doctor Box at its eightieth annual meeting at Syracuse, N.Y., on May 10.

That is this year. I might say that Doctor Box was born in the riding of the hon. member for Lanark, I believe in the fine thriving town of Carleton Place. This is a great credit to the county of Lanark. To continue:

This is the second time that a Canadian dentist has been so honoured since the inception of the award in 1905.

Then the article goes on to say what the award is for:

The award is made to the individual who has contributed outstandingly to original research or whose high attainment and professional career have been of such a character as to have materially advanced the science and art of dentistry.

And Doctor Box has done that. I have been in his office at various times, and there have met patients from the various European nations, from most of the states of the American union and from all over the world. To continue:

Doctor Box is at present research professor of periodontology in the faculty of dentistry, University of Toronto.

Along with being a professor in that university, he conducts his own research office. To continue:

The work and progress of the department of periodontology in the faculty of dentistry, Toronto, has achieved wide recognition under the leadership of Doctor Box. In a recent graduate course conducted during the week of May 3 dentists were registered from the states of Texas, Ohio, Indiana, Nebraska, Louisiana as well as several Canadian provinces.

A great honour is done to the University of Toronto when these students come from practically all over the United States. Just a word or two more. To continue:

Recent visitors to the department include Dean Alphonso Leng of the University of Santiago, Chile; Doctor Emil Schulz of Prague, Czechoslovakia; Professor J. J. Holst, professor of dentistry, Copenhagen, Denmark; Doctor J. Axel Hojer, surgeon-general, government of Sweden; Doctor Valy Menkin, associate professor of experimental pathology, Temple University, Philadelphia; Doctor Frank Beube, acting head of the department of periodontology, Columbia University.

I may say that I myself met one or two of these people during my visits to Doctor Box's office. My last word is this:

In receiving this award he not only brings honour to himself and the faculty of dentistry, University of Toronto, but also to Canadian dentistry.

I should like to say it is an award for outstanding persistence and diligent study in the field of peridontology. This award has brought great honour to Canada and to Lanark county where Doctor Box was born.

264. Hospital designs, $24,664.

Mr. POULIOT: I suggest that all the temporary buildings should be used as hospitals. Here in Ottawa we have a number of temporary buildings that were constructed during the war. They cover an immense area. We hear complaints from all over the country that there are not enough hospitals and that there is too much bureaucracy. Why do we not fire the bureaucracy and use these buildings for the sick, the poor and for institutions for the old? Ottawa would be an ideal city for the convalescence of those who need some special care. I suggest this in passing for the attention of both the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Public Works, so that those buildings may serve a definite purpose for once, at least.

Mr. MARTIN: I have noted what has been said by the hon. member, and I will pass it on to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. FLEMING: May we have the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $18,722.51; unliquidated commitments, $15.20; total commitments $18,737.71.

National health branch—
265. Mental health, $79,847.

Mr. McKAY: Will the minister make a statement with regard to the new health program, on what is to be done about mental institutions?

Mr. MARTIN: That will be done when the supplementary estimates come in next week, in accordance with the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can the minister tell us when the public health estimates will be brought down? Will it be the evening before we prorogue, or will it be several evenings before that? That is important, because there is no use in putting us off, unless the minister is quite sure that he will give us plenty of time to discuss this matter.

Mr. MARTIN: I can only say that I do not make the rules of this committee. The other night I tried to discuss the program and, as hon. members will recall, the Chairman, called me to order. The Minister of Finance has control of the supplementary estimates. I spoke to him about the matter this morning, and he assured me that he was hoping that by the middle of the week or thereabouts he would be able to get the supplementary estimates down, so that we could have full discussion on this item.

Mr. FLEMING: May we have the expenditures on this item?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $47,730.82; unliquidated commitments, $1,582.34; total commitments, $49,313.16.

Mr. MacINNIS: In reply to the minister, who has said he does not control the rules of procedure and he cannot say when his estimates will come down, may I say he has a wonderful lullaby for the committee in his statement that we shall discuss all these things when the estimates are brought down. I am just telling him that we may or we may not. It depends on what time they are brought down.

Mr. MARTIN: As soon as possible. I cannot say when.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it a lullaby or a swan song?

Mr. FLEMING: Before we leave that point, this matter was discussed on June 11 when the first ruling was made; and the suggestion from the minister was concurred in on the understanding that the supplementary estimates on this matter, which are so important, would be brought down in time for ample discussion.

Mr. MARTIN: That will be done.

Mr. FLEMING: Expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $18,338.51; unliquidated commitments, $20,120.91; total commitments, $38,459.42.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will the minister give some indication as to what this control means? I have no idea about it.

Mr. MARTIN: The main purposes of this division are to arrange medical examinations for those applying for pension for the civilian blind, pursuant to the Old Age Pensions Act and the amendments thereto of last year, when the age was reduced to twenty-one; and, on the evidence submitted, to decide the eligibility for pension. We also seek to arrange medical re-examinations and make all necessary inquiries regarding the pathological condition causing or leading to blindness.

Mr. BRYCE: I have some blind people in my constituency, and I am quite sure that all hon. members in the committee will agree with me when I say we cannot do enough for those people. I wonder if the minister received a copy of this pamphlet from the Canadian council of the blind?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. BRYCE: Does the minister care to comment on the sixth point?

Mr. MARTIN: That should be dealt with under the old age pensions item under which that particular matter comes. That is with regard to changes in the Old Age Pensions Act.

Mr. BRYCE: The sixth point is for the prevention of blindness. If we could prevent blindness or provide people with proper care in their infancy, many dollars would be saved later on.

Mr. MARTIN: I quite agree. I announced the other night the new program established under this department for the prevention and cure of blindness in those drawing a pension. Thus far we have been able to enter into an arrangement with New Brunswick and with Nova Scotia. I am hopeful that this will be followed up by agreements with the other provinces to meet the very important problem of blindness.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the reason for delay in getting the other provinces in the plan?

Mr. MARTIN: It is up to them.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the offer been made to all the provinces?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, to all of them.

Mr. KNOWLES: How long since?

Mr. MARTIN: Over a year ago.

268. Grants to institutions assisting sailors, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $2,400.

Mr. MARTIN: The expenditures were $2,400 last year.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: The minister stated that his department had a new look. I should like to see a new look with respect to the Canada Shipping Act, so far as that part of it is concerned over which the minister has jurisdiction. The one outstandingly foolish thing in that act is that if a seaman gets sick in a foreign port he gets free treatment there—

Mr. MARTIN: That is covered by item 255, which we have passed.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Item 268 covers grants to institutions.

Mr. MARTIN: These are grants to specific institutions. Surely Mr. Chairman, my duty is to point out the item we are discussing; otherwise there can be no order. The matter to which my hon. friend is referring is covered by an item that has already been passed. I do not want to stop him. I only point out that that is the fact.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Sometimes we cannot hear the items called. I have not been in the habit of holding up estimates, and perhaps I might be allowed to say what I have to say on this item.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman does not take up much time, and perhaps the committee will permit him to continue.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The one thing that is absolutely foolish in that part of the Canada Shipping Act which is administered by the minister is that if a seaman becomes sick in a foreign port he can get treatment there, but when he is shipped home in another boat he cannot get treatment because he did not come back in the same hull. Suppose the boat on which he became sick was sunk. How could he ever get back in that boat? The Minister of Transport has taken out several of the kinks in that part of the act which comes under his jurisdiction, and I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to do the same with that part of the act which comes under his jurisdiction.

269. Medical services—Indians and Eskimos, $7,187,530.

Mr. BRYCE: I have a great many Indians in my constituency, but not many Eskimos. I have taken up the matter of Norway House with the minister repeatedly, and he has given me a lot of information. I asked him about it last year, and I think he will be able to do a good job there this year. Would he tell us what his department is doing in that north country?

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend, who has been a member of the Indian affairs committee, has been interested in this problem of the health of Indians, as have so many other members who have an Indian population in their ridings. As he knows, we have embarked upon a considerable hospital construction program for the Indians, particularly in western Canada, and I am hoping that very shortly we shall be able to direct our attention to a greater extent than hitherto to hospital construction in the east. We regard the institution at Norway House as not being fully satisfactory; and, just as soon as prior needs can be disposed of, our intention is to improve the situation at Norway House to which my hon. friend directed my attention last year in the house and several times afterwards.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the minister any information to indicate that the health of the Indians is improving or otherwise? I made a study a few years ago of the incidence of tuberculosis among the Indians, and I was promised at that time that better medical facilities would be provided for the Indians. What improvements have taken place in that regard, if any?

Mr. MARTIN: This is an important matter and it is one to which I have given a good deal of personal attention. I spent all last fall seeing for myself just what the situation was in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, the northern part of Ontario, some sections of Quebec along the St. Lawrence, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I covered as many of the areas coming under this department as I could, and I am happy to be able to say there has been a reduction this year in the mortality rate among the Indians to the extent of seventeen per cent. I think that is almost a phenomenal result.

Mr. MacINNIS: Over how long a period?

Mr. MARTIN: Over the past year. It is due to many factors. It is due in part to improved nutritional knowledge and the dissemination of that knowledge among the Indian and Eskimo population. It is in large part due to the aggressive work that is being carried on in trying to bring the doctor and the nurse and the hospital into the more remote parts of our country.

Hon. gentlemen who live in Alberta, for instance, will bear testimony to the great value of the tuberculosis hospital, the Charles Camsell hospital, of 350 beds. It is one of the outstanding institutions of its kind devoted exclusively to the treatment of tuberculosis among the Indians. We have also had a hospital constructed at Coqualeetza, and a new hospital at Nanaimo, of 250 beds, as the hon. member for Nanaimo will likely confirm. I think he has visited the hospital. We have also another hospital at New Westminster; a new hospital at Brandon, another at The Pas, and we have a projected new hospital in one of the most densely populated Indian districts in Canada, the James bay district, where the tuberculosis rate is the highest.

The budget for health of Indians this year amounts to $7,500,000, as compared with $5,000,000 last year, and less than $700,000 in 1928. That gives one an idea of the accelerated program that is under way. Money is no measurement of these things, but it is an indication. That we have a real problem is emphasized by the fact that one per cent of the population of this country is responsible for twelve per cent of the tuberculosis in Canada among our native population. That is a challenge, and it is one which I am proud to say we are meeting on an accelerated plane.

There is a great deal yet to be done. I can say only this, that we have had the collaboration of many agencies. For instance, we are now in process of completing X-ray surveys of the Indian population in many parts of our country. I might mention the successful X-ray survey made recently by our own director of Indian health services along with Doctor Tisdall of the Toronto sick children's hospital and others associated with them. That was a survey made in connection with anthropologists who are still in the area living among the Indians. This survey is giving to medical doctors and those who have to deal with the medical health of the Indian population a greater degree of knowledge and an ability to deal with the problem which has never existed before.

I should like to thank the medical profession throughout the country, and particularly some of the medical colleges, for what they have done and the assistance they have rendered the department in this important work. I should not like to single out any individuals, but I would take occasion to thank Doctor Frappier of Montreal, and his colleagues, for the highly important work they have done with regard to B.C.G., and the effect it has had on all our institutions, particularly the one under Doctor Simes at Fort Qu'Appelle in the Qu'Appelle valley.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish, first, to thank the minister for the full answer he has given to my question. Is there any change in the number of cases of tuberculosis among the Indians which are being reported? By treatment we can extend the life of tubercular patients, perhaps effect quite a number of cures. But the real control of tuberculosis lies in a better living standard and a better standard of hygiene in the homes. What is being done in that regard? Is the number of cases going up or coming down? I could understand that, because of the detection service in the department, the number might go up.

Mr. MARTIN: As I said a moment ago, we have pursued a new policy of case finding through extensive X-ray surveys. The result of that improved method of detection has been a knowledge of a greater number of cases.

With regard to the social aspects of the problem, my reply would be that this matter is under the Department of Mines and Resources. However, what the hon. member says is quite true. Much of the condition we have been discussing is due to social conditions which are related to better nutrition and like factors. Until the problem is tackled in that basic way, it will always be a problem.

Mr. WARREN: I was somewhat disappointed when, in the minister's report regarding tuberculosis among the Indians, he failed to give credit where credit belongs. Travelling from one reserve to another, evidently he did not visit the reserve at Golden Lake in the constituency of Renfrew North.

I hope the minister knows that what has been happening in the last few years on that reserve has had much to do with the reduction of tuberculosis among Indians all across Canada. I told the story in the house either last session or the session before; perhaps it was three years ago. A marvellous transformation has taken place at Golden Lake. Formerly it was considered one of the most unsatisfactory reserves in Canada. It is not a large one. Back about 1938 someone had the idea—I had something to do with it myself—of making a definite change in the handling of that reserve. I remember suggesting that, by the purchase of a tractor so that the land could be torn up, thereby permitting the people to work, much could be done to permit the Indians to support themselves. Instead of a tractor being purchased, a good team of horses was bought. Fortunately a teamster who was proud of his horses and was anxious to keep them well groomed and harnessed was retained. Adequate machinery was purchased, and the Indians began working together. They dug a pit in which to keep their vegetables, and then began to grow vegetables.

The point I intended to develop was that it was in this reserve that the raising of goats was initiated. This was not done because of any shortage of milk. I doubt if many of these people drank goat's milk, because they had easy access to pasteurized milk at Eganville dairy. However, they raised these goats for shipment to other reserves. An Indian chief went to the Golden Lake camp from one of the Nova Scotia reserves, and took quite a number of the goats back with him. They are shipped throughout Canada, and even to the nomadic tribes in which Indian children never see milk from the time they are weaned.

These people when they are starting out in the spring in their canoes or boats, take their goat along. The goat's legs are tied and she goes along in the canoe. Thus they always have a supply of milk.

Then, let me point out that they have not had a new case of tuberculosis on Golden Lake reserve since they started keeping goats. In addition to raising their own vegetables, they raise pigs. Each Indian family is supplied with one or two pigs, as required. They also export chickens. They bring in the baby chicks in the spring of the year. When they are old enough to stand the trip they are shipped to far away reserves. Wonderful progress has been made in co-operative effort in that little community. In days gone by you would never see anything but a few green poles for fuel in front of their homes, but now they go out together on the reserve to cut their wood, which is sawn co-operatively. Now you see in front of the Indian homes piles of dry wood to which they have access during the year.

They are constantly improving their homes and building more modern homes. A lot of credit is due to the efforts of the officials of the department and some fine people on the reserve. A celebration is to be held soon, and I should like to have the minister come and take a look around Golden Lake reserve. I am sure that many members who have been spending time in the Indian affairs committee could usefully spend some time in going to see what has been accomplished at Golden Lake.

Then a word in connection with these goats. As is known, these animals are hard to fence in, but this is being done. I understand that goat's milk plays a great part in the control of tuberculosis among Indians and, I presume, among white people as well.

Mr. MARTIN: There was expended under this item $5,176,387.17; the unliquidated commitments amount to $21,909.12, and the total commitments to $5,198,296.29. I know the Golden Lake reserve quite well, having spent most of my boyhood within a few miles of it. I have visited it twice since I was appointed minister. In speaking about what has been done on the reserve, the hon. member, perhaps because of his modesty, has not mentioned the contribution he has made to this great work and his representations to the department on behalf of these people.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is the hospital at North Battleford operating, and what staff is there?

Mr. MARTIN: It is partly staffed and is receiving patients. This will be done to a greater extent just as soon as the necessary equipment is made available.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): During the last two months Doctor J. A. Campbell, a prominent veterinary surgeon in Toronto, the curator of the zoo, has been up in the James bay area. He suggests that goats could be raised in that part of the country, because they could live off the land.

Mr. MARTIN: Experiments are being carried on by the department.

Mr. CASE: I am sorry I was not present when the minister made his statement, but we were busy in the Indian affairs committee dealing with the report for this session. We have evidence of the importance of the medical services that are being provided for Indians and we have had an opportunity to learn something of the progress that has been made. Doctor Moore and Doctor Tisdall gave a fine lecture with lantern slides, showing the inroads of disease among Indians, especially those in remote regions.

I am wondering whether provision is being made under this item for the capital cost of the new hospitals that are being provided. I should like to know also the general attitude of the department with respect to the Eskimos. It is my considered opinion that it will be more difficult to bring them within the status of Indians than it will be to determine the future of the Indians. It is a question whether they are closely related to the Indians.

There is another matter which I presume comes under this department. As is well known, Indian affairs are still under the Department of Mines and Resources, but the medical services are now provided by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I am wondering if the department has considered the granting of old age pensions to Indians. This will be a recommendation of the committee. I realize that this might not be on the same set-up as would apply to other citizens, because there is a provincial contribution along with the federal contribution; but from my own observations I know this would be greatly appreciated by the other Indians, the disabled Indians and the blind Indians. They need something to improve their security.

It has been my privilege to visit many Indian reserves. While some progress has been made, there is still room for improvement, because many of them are in a deplorable state. Credit should be given to the department for the health and welfare work they have carried on. They have provided considerable medical facilities and care for the Indians; and I hope that this, along with the additional educational facilities that have been provided, will greatly improve their status.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

269. Medical services—Indians and Eskimos, $7,187,530.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are still on item 269.

Mr. CASE: In this item is there any capital cost toward the construction of new hospitals? What is the department's attitude toward providing the Indians with the old age pension?

Mr. MARTIN: In the main item there is approximately $1,500,000 for new construction.

[Mr. Case.]

With regard to the other matter, when we reach the appropriate item in the estimates we shall discuss it.

Mr. FRASER: Is any provision made for the Indians off the reserve? Some of the half-breeds have no other means of looking after themselves.

Mr. MARTIN: Like any other person, they are citizens of the municipality.

Mr. FRASER: They do not come within the municipality, owing to the fact that the government has allowed them to live on government land. They do not pay any taxes. The government looks after them in no way, except that they live on this land and the municipality in which they live is charged with their medical and hospital care and has been so charged for some years. It is not fair to the municipality.

Mr. MARTIN: With regard to medical care, they are treated in the same way as other Indians are treated. I thought the hon. member was talking about welfare generally.

Mr. FRASER: Are they treated as other Indians are treated?

Mr. MARTIN: In regard to medical care, yes, if they have Indian status.

Mr. FRASER: What about the half-breeds?

Mr. MARTIN: We do the same thing for them.

Mr. FRASER: Would you look after them?

Mr. MARTIN: We do, if they qualify under the act.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

270. Grants to hospitals which care for Indians and Eskimos, $55,000.

Mr. PEARKES: I notice there is a reduction of $164,320 in this item. I presume that this reduction is due largely to the fact that new Indian hospitals have been established, as the minister intimated before the dinner recess, at such places as Nanaimo in my constituency. But there are also a large number of Indians who are not able to take advantage of these Indian hospitals which have been established in various localities. These other Indians have to go to the hospitals which are nearest to their reserves. It is known that the costs of running small hospitals have increased greatly in the last year or two. In fact, certain hospitals in my constituency, the King's Daughters' hospital at Duncan, and the Chemainus general hospital, have found that they are quite incapable of taking in the Indian patients at the rates at which they admitted them prior to this year. Would it be possible for grants to be made to these smaller hospitals which must admit the Indian patients, and which cannot afford to admit them under the contract prices which were arranged previously between the Department of Indian Affairs, now the Indian health branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare? I should like to read an extract from a letter which I received recently from the administrator of the King's Daughters' hospital at Duncan which, I think, shows the difficulties under which these small hospitals are working. I shall read only the pertinent paragraphs. I shall keep my remarks as brief as possible:

> Our last year's financial statement showed a loss on operations of $1,429.74, and that in spite of the fact that we had received over $6,000 in donations from the public. The board of directors therefore decided that, if Indian patients want the services of the hospital, those services must be paid for at the regular hospital rates. You can understand then that if the Department of National Health and Welfare, Indian health services, will only pay a portion of the cost of hospitalization we must collect the difference from the Indian patients themselves. The hospital authorities have no wish or desire to bar the Indians from the hospital and its services, but the refusal of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Indian health services, to meet the increased cost of hospitalization has compelled them to adopt some measures to avoid loss on the hospitalization of Indian patients.
> In consequence the board of directors have advised the Department of National Health and Welfare, Indian health services that, unless they agree to pay the increased costs as from March 1 last, as advised by us in a previous letter, we shall have no recourse but to refuse the admittance of Indian patients to the hospital, except in those cases where the Indian patient himself or herself deposits sufficient moneys with the hospital on entry for treatment to meet any additional cost over the $5.

That is the contract price. Another part of the letter goes on to say that the hospital authorities will, of course, admit Indian patients in case of emergency. I have another letter which points out:

> Also we receive provincial and municipal grants in addition to this rate but for Indian patients neither of these grants are received.

In view of the fact that there is an item in the estimates which includes grants to hospitals which serve Indian patients, will the minister inform me what hospital receives these grants, and whether the Indians who are patients at the hospitals to which I have referred, namely, the King's Daughters' hospital at Duncan, and the Chemainus general hospital, receive grants? What steps are being taken to ensure that the hospital fees which are necessary for these hospitals to ask, because of the increased cost of hospitalization, are being paid? Is it the policy of the department to allow Indians to go to the hospitals when these Indians themselves will be expected to pay a portion of their hospitalization?

Mr. MARTIN: The reason for the reduction in this item is that we gave a grant of $200,000 to the Fort William sanitorium on condition that they build a wing for the exclusive use of Indian patients. That $200,000 grant has been paid to them, and this accounts in part for the reduction. We do not make a practice of giving grants to the institutions. We have to consider our budgetary situation and our arrangement with other hospitals, apart from those which are departmentally owned and operated, such as the ones at Nanaimo and at Coqualeetza. We have a per diem rate arrangement with all other hospitals. I can appreciate the situation my hon. friend has outlined. It was, however, our belief, after careful consideration, that the fairest all-round method is the per diem rate arrangement, whereby a hospital taking care of an individual Indian is paid by the department for his hospitalization. That is the arrangement all through the country, not only in the particular case to which my hon. friend has referred, but throughout the dominion, apart from our own institutions.

Mr. PEARKES: When the arrangement is not satisfactory to the hospital concerned, what happens?

Mr. MARTIN: It becomes a matter for mutual agreement; and, where there is dissatisfaction, our officers sit down and try to work out, in the light of costs in the area, as fair a proposal as possible.

Mr. PEARKES: Is that taking place now in the case of these two hospitals to which reference has been made? These matters have been referred to the department.

Mr. MARTIN: Actually at the present time we are in negotiation with those institutions.

Mr. PEARKES: You are in negotiation with those two hospitals?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. PEARKES: Is it likely that the Nanaimo hospital will be enlarged sufficiently, either in staff or in equipment, to take care of all Indians on Vancouver island?

Mr. MARTIN: I will not say all Indians on Vancouver island but, we hope, a considerable number of them. That hospital has recently been opened and we are increasing the bed capacity. It will serve a considerable area.

Mr. PEARKES: Right across from Chemainus on Kuper island, there is a big Indian school, and any patients from that school will naturally go into Chemainus hospital. I hope the officers of the department will try to get a settlement with the authorities of these two hospitals at the earliest possible date so that the matter can be adjusted. Can I get an assurance on that score?

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend has that assurance. Nanaimo hospital will take care of all but emergency cases.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have a great deal of sympathy with the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo, because I carried on an agitation for several years to get the Indian affairs branch to pay the same per diem rates for the hospitalization of Indians as the hospitals charge other patients. After considerable correspondence and agitation and many interviews, the last word I had a couple of years ago was that the department had come up to the prevailing rate for patients in British Columbia. The question, which I imagine has not been looked into, is what is now causing the trouble. When did the Indian branch last increase the per diem allowance rates? Rates have been going up; costs have been mounting steadily, and unless the Indian branch keeps pace with these costs, the hospitals cannot take care of the patients. I should like to know from the minister when the last increase in per diem rates was made, and what the rates were then, and what they are now.

Mr. MARTIN: There is no uniform rate. We are continually making adjustments and agreements with various hospitals throughout the country. Only two months ago I made an adjustment with St. Paul's in Vancouver; today I signed one in respect of northern Manitoba. We are doing that continually. The rates are not uniform; they depend upon cost factors. It does not cost the same to maintain hospitals in all parts of the country. There is at Fort Qu'Appelle a departmental hospital where, because of favourable local circumstances, permitting such things as growing their own vegetables, the cost is considerably reduced. It would not be reasonable to have a uniform rate throughout the country, for the reason that costs are different.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I appreciate that, but a hospital which the government itself might be running would not be in the same position in the matter of rates. You take care of costs, regardless of what they are. But when hospitals are run by private organizations and municipalities they must charge rates on an economic basis which would pay for the services provided. My understanding was, as far as most hospitals in British Columbia were concerned, at least the hospitals in the outlying parts, apart from hospitals in the larger cities, that the rate was fairly uniform. I forget what it was, but I believe it was around $3.50 a day.

Mr. MARTIN: The rates are much higher today.

Mr. FLEMING: Can the minister give the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $200,000; unliquidated commitments, none; total commitments, $200,000.

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: What is the reason for the drastic cut this year in grants to hospitals?

Mr. MARTIN: I gave that.

271. Civil aviation medicine, $21,704.

Mr. FLEMING: What are the figures?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditure, $763.46; no unliquidated commitments; total commitments, $763.46.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister make a statement as to what is being done by the department in the matter of civil aviation medicine, in view of the fact that he has just announced that only $763 was expended on this item?

Mr. MARTIN: The director was appointed only a short time ago, about four months ago, I believe. This is a new operating division.

Mr. FLEMING: What are the plans for the coming year?

Mr. MARTIN. We are setting up physical standards for civil flying personnel; organizing and training a medical service to examine prospective pilots. We are seeking to set up machinery to assess medical examination reports and to advise on the suitability of applicants for employment, from the mental and physical point of view. We seek to advise on all problems in connection with health aspects of air travel, and supervise industrial medical services at airports. This division was created at the instance of those who are operating our air services, so that we may study and advise, from the medical point of view, regarding the safety of air travel, and also to apply any benefits derived from experiments that are carried on, so far as they may affect civilian passengers. The director was appointed two months ago; I was in error when I said four months. He is in charge of this program.

Mr. FLEMING: That sounds like a large program when it is only at its outset, if the director was appointed only recently. Can the minister give in greater detail the work to be carried on through this branch?

Mr. MARTIN: The work will be carried on in close collaboration with the Department of Transport. This estimate is considered by the officers in charge to be a fair amount to set aside for the initial period. We shall have to wait until the end of this year to see the results of the operations of the new division.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister give the total of the health items corresponding to last year's estimate of $8,000,000 odd?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditure, $8,287,030.76; unliquidated commitments, $160,885.09; total commitments, $8,447,915.85.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—

272. Welfare branch administration, $37,098.

Mr. McLURE: I wish to mention something that I brought to the attention of the minister, the department and the committee last year. There is a class of people who are sick, crippled or incapacitated in some way. With all the money that is being spent on national health and welfare, this class is entirely neglected. In my own constituency I have a number of cases about which I have written to the department from time to time but never could get anywhere with regard to my representations, because they would always refer me back to the welfare branch in the province, who in turn would not take care of these patients either. It is cases of that class that I wish to mention.

One case is that of a young man who is now thirty-five years of age, and who was crippled as a result of an accident when he was a child. He has been a burden, not only to himself but also to his parents who were not in a position to give him all the care and attention he should have had. After he lost his parents, who had taken care of him until that time, he became a burden on one of his brothers. This brother had a large family of his own, was engaged in fishing, and did not have too much of this world's goods with which to take care of his crippled brother. When this young man was about thirty years of age the doctors decided that they might be able to do something for him by amputating one of his limbs. This they did, and he is now more of a cripple than ever. If it were not for the goodness of his own brother he would be thrown out of the world entirely alone. There should be something in national health and welfare to take care of cases of this kind. There are many of them across Canada.

Another case that I wish to bring to the attention of the committee and the minister is that of a lady about fifty years of age who, in an accident a few years ago, lost an arm and was hurt otherwise. She is nearly crippled and is incapable of doing any work. She is the wife of a labourer, and these people find it most difficult to get along.

In mentioning these two cases, I am mentioning only two out of the many there are throughout Canada. Why cannot something be done through the welfare branch by way of the allowances that are made, to take care of such cases? As a result of writing to the department, as I said in the beginning, all I receive is the answer that it does not come under their jurisdiction and that there is no vote for it. It stops at that. I thought that possibly, by my now bringing the matter before the minister, something could be done. Besides the items that are mentioned we find there is an extra vote, or one might call it a blank cheque, of over $1,000,000. Surely somewhere in that estimate there might be a chance for these unfortunate people. I should like the minister to take this into consideration and see what can be done in such cases.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. McLURE: I should like to have an answer from the minister.

Mr. MARTIN: I had intended saying something on this matter, because of the remarks made the other night by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I thought possibly others were proposing to say something on the subject. That is why I did not rise at once.

May I say, in the first place, I am sure that, when we listened to the hon. member for Temiscouata the other night, we were all impressed by the important contribution he made to this subject at the time. This is not the first time he has raised the matter in the house. He has obviously, because of the survey which he has conducted in his own county, given this matter a great deal of attention. I am sure that I speak for all hon. members when I say we are grateful to the hon. member for the point of view expressed and for the way in which he expressed his views the other night. He expressed himself somewhat along the same lines as the hon. member for Queens tonight. To both these hon. members and others I wish to say that I greatly appreciate what they have had to say.

This matter is one that is receiving my personal attention. The committee may recall a conference that was held between officials of the department and representatives of an association in Canada that has been promoting the interests involved in this particular project. I feel that what the hon. member for Temiscouata said the other night is, in principle, incontestable. When we consider that we are giving assistance by way of social legislation to so many groups in this country, it is impossible for anyone to argue against this matter in principle; because all of us know of many cases of individuals who, because of disability, are unable to seek employment, and who, in the absence of private means, are unable to have a proper maintenance. That, in principle is an incontestable situation. I certainly believe that, in the development of programs, that kind of group will have to receive consideration.

Let me say this. The matter of looking after those who require assistance at the hands of the state is not one for the federal government only. In this country we are spending close to $800 million a year on social welfare. Of that total, the federal government is spending 80 per cent. Those are the important figures. I do not want to put this question on the basis of cost, and I am not putting it on that basis. But I believe that, in trying to approach this problem in an orderly way, we must bear in mind the responsibility of properly constituted authority in this country, namely, the responsibility of the municipality, of the province and of the federal government.

Having said that much, I believe I should also say this. It should not be overlooked that a great number of those who are in the disability class—not by any means all but a great proportion of them—received assistance through family allowances, veterans legislation and unemployment insurance. I do not say all the groups receive that assistance, but there is a great body that does. I am satisfied that the proper basis ultimately on which to arrange this sort of thing is through a system of disability insurance. I recognize that there will be a great body who could not benefit by that kind of scheme, because they have not the wherewithal to make contributions to what I think will ultimately come about, a contributory scheme covering disability and invalidity. For those who could not share in such a scheme there will have to be assistance given by the state, whether it be in the right of the municipality or in the right of the province or in the right of the dominion.

All I can say at the moment is that I am seized of the importance of this problem. We are paying this year, the dominion and the provinces together, by way of old age pensions, $100 million. That is a tremendous increase in the outlay by federal and provincial authorities, and of that amount the federal government pays close to 75 per cent. We have lowered the age for the blind to receive assistance from forty to twenty-one. That covers a considerable group of those who are handicapped, although there is still a great body left out, including the kind of cases referred to by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken and the cases referred to by the hon. member for Temiscouata. I repeat that all I can say tonight is that I recognize the importance of this problem, and I should like to think that, before I leave this parliament, I shall be able to say to the house that, in conjunction with other governmental authorities in this country, we have made, in terms of actual program, further progress with regard to this great class of our population. I assure the committee of my very deep interest in this matter.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, my remarks really apply to the next item, but I have to leave shortly for a meeting of the banking and commerce committee, and perhaps I might be allowed on this item to raise two questions in connection with the family allowance which I have been discussing with the department for some considerable time. First, however, as to the matter raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata and discussed by the minister, some pension scheme for incapacitated people is something which, as the minister suggested, will have to be worked out in conjunction with the provincial authorities. There is no doubt about the need. I should like to leave this thought with the minister, that the most pathetic person in any group in need of social security is the woman of fifty to sixty-five years of age.

Mr. MacINNIS: Even up to seventy.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but I am going to stop at fifty to sixty-five. There are thousands of women in that age group in this country who have contributed families to the nation, who in turn went to war to save the institutions of this country. These women now find themselves with their families gone and themselves unable to work and with nowhere to turn for a livelihood. In each province there is a mothers' allowance act, but it is really a misnomer. It is not a mothers' allowance, because the children are the qualifying factor. Could not the minister, when he is working out with the provincial governments his comprehensive health program, suggest that they include women in that category under their mothers' allowance acts? In my own part of the country and elsewhere in Canada I run into hundreds of women who are in those circumstances, and they are the most pathetic group in society. They have nowhere to turn. Their families are gone; they have no income, and all they can do is wait for the old age pension. The minister would be doing a real service in provoking thought by the provincial governments on that subject.

What I rose to say was this. There are two sore spots in connection with the family allowance. First, there is the fact that children who remain in institutions in Canada cannot receive the family allowance. I have discussed this matter in the house and have had considerable correspondence about it with the previous minister, and it has been taken care of to some extent by the inclusion of children who were boarded out from such institutions. The allowance can be got through the children's aid society under those circumstances. But there is another considerable group who do not get the allowance. I know the minister is sympathetic. Would he not consider including children who remain in institutions for certain reasons? When we framed the act we understood that it was for the benefit of all children born in Canada, but here is one category that is not included.

Secondly, could the family allowance not be continued beyond the statutory age for children who are continuing their education? This should be given serious consideration. Many widows find themselves with a son or daughter on their hands who wants to continue his or her education and learn a profession, but the allowance is cut off at the age of sixteen. The department might very well continue the allowance for two or three years under those circumstances.

I conclude by saying this. I have had a great deal to do with the family allowance branch in Nova Scotia, and I think we who do a lot of criticizing should hand out a bouquet where it is deserved. I want to tell the minister that he has, administering his district branch in Nova Scotia, a wonderful personnel. They have done an excellent job right from scratch, and the branch there, with the exception of the one or two points I have mentioned, over which the local personnel have no control, is running like a well-oiled machine. I know the minister will do what he can to iron out the few kinks that still remain in the act.

Mr. MARTIN: The expenses under this item are $33,199.45; unliquidated commitments, $643.14; total commitments, $33,842.59.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to say a few words on the question of social security. I have listened closely to what the minister had to say and, while what he said is undoubtedly true, I do not believe that it should be a bar to our working toward a social security program. I have, during the last few days when the minister's estimates were under discussion, heard several members bring to his attention some particular case of helplessness for which they wanted something done. These cases could be multiplied a hundredfold, and that would not include them all. So what is required in Canada is an over-all social security program which will provide for every person who is prevented from making a living for himself for reasons beyond his control. There is no way in which we can provide for people in a piecemeal way.

Then we come to the question of how this is to be paid for. It can be paid for by the contributions of people either by way of taxes or in other ways. When I hear people who are continually complaining about high taxes and who urge for more and better social services, and more of almost everything else, it leads me to believe that there is something wrong. There seems to be some lack of sincerity or lack of understanding.

Those of us who have most of the good things of life will have to share them with those who have not. There is no other way in which these people can be cared for. There is no magic wand we can wave and bring goods and services to people, without taking those goods and services from the people who created them. Under our present economic set-up, that is done by way of taxes. As the federal government is in the position where it has power to collect the largest amount of taxation, undoubtedly it will have to take the greatest responsibility for providing those services.

Today municipalities are overburdened. They cannot meet all the requirements made upon them. Most of the provinces are not in a much better position. Consequently the government that has the power to raise money must take the responsibility for providing those services, along with the responsibility of making the necessary arrangements with other governments to meet their constitutional requirements.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to say something about the statement made by the minister. I think all hon. members appreciate the minister's remark regarding the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities as well as that of the federal government. On the other hand, I am sure we all realize that in the past the federal government has apparently taken the attitude that it alone has the responsibility of taking care of the needs of people in foreign nations. That is to say, we have made large contributions to foreign nations. We have not said we could do it only on the understanding that contributions would be made by the provinces and the municipalities.

We as a federal body have assumed full responsibility for making those contributions, without tying the provinces and municipalities in as well. Therefore it seems to many people in this country that our own people should be considered just as favourably as people in foreign nations. Surely there can be no group in Canada who have a greater right to expect priority against the production of the country than those who are incapacitated and unable to take care of themselves. I cannot follow the minister's statement that this can be done only if the cost is borne by the provinces and the municipalities. As I have said, we have not hesitated to make these expenditures in connection with foreign nations. If we can help to restore better conditions in foreign countries, then surely we can afford to look after our own people without haggling over the responsibility of this or that province.

The minister has emphasized the fact that the federal government is already paying out large sums of money. I do not think that is an important point. The question is how far short that falls of meeting the requirements of those in Canada who are disabled. If we pay out a billion dollars, then how much more do we have to pay out in order to see that all those people who are physically incapacitated are cared for?

The other day I attended a dinner in which a gentleman named Doctor Graham, I believe, spoke about arthritis. I was struck by one statement he made. He said that certain people still come to him and ask him to diagnose their conditions and to prescribe what should be done. Then he said, "Of what use would it be for me to prescribe that a person should rest, when that individual may be a mother with five children, and when I know that as soon as she leaves me she will go home and look after those children? Is there any use in my prescribing rest when I know she cannot rest?"

This is not a question of the number of doctors or nurses we have or the hospital accommodation available. The need here is for some assistance to be given to people of that kind, so that they can take a rest or take the required treatment. That is something we must take into consideration.

I realize that this is not the opportune time to advocate the paying out of large sums of money for any body of people, because we are now in an inflationary period. And to the extent that inflation exists, I would not for one moment criticize the government for continuing to maintain fairly heavy taxation on the people in the high-income brackets. But that condition will not always obtain. Certainly it was not the case in the thirties, when production was at less than 50 per cent of capacity. It would not have beeen necessary at that time to maintain heavy taxation in order to make more wealth available to those people who were physically incapacitated.

The reason the federal government can assume this responsibility so much more easily than the provinces and the municipalities is that the federal government has access to moneys to which neither the provinces nor the municipalities have access. The federal authorities have different means of raising money. Therefore I was glad to hear the minister say this is a problem which he realizes the federal government will have to consider, and to which no doubt it is giving consideration. I hope that by next year the minister will be able to bring down a comprehensive program to take care of, not just some of the people who are incapacitated, such as the blind, but all people in Canada who are physically disabled and cannot take care of themselves.

Mr. POULIOT: Before this item carries, I should like to express my appreciation to the minister for what he has said. When does he expect to be able to give a favourable answer? The people who suffer the disabilities described, and the incurables, are suffering now. They suffer more because they are poor. Is it not possible to do something for them? When the question of sending millions of dollars to Europe for the assistance of European children was placed before parliament, that money was sent quickly. It did not take long to do it, and it was a fine gesture. But if we cannot provide for our own people who are in an unfortunate condition, then surely there was some exaggeration in those expenditures.

I know the big heart of the minister, and I know he was sincere when he spoke as he did with reference to speeches made by some hon. members. When does the minister expect to give a favourable reply to the request now made from all sections of the house?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member will appreciate that this matter does not repose in the minister alone. I can only say that at a recent meeting of the welfare authorities of a good number of the provinces this matter was discussed. It will be discussed again within the course of the next few weeks. I am resorting to every legitimate practice within my knowledge to try to bring this kind of matter to a head. Beyond that, there is nothing more I can say at the moment.

Mr. POULIOT: If I understood what the minister said on other occasions there is no province that has refused to answer his call for a meeting of the deputy ministers with the dominion authorities?

Mr. MARTIN: In the field of health that is definitely the case.

Mr. POULIOT: In the field of health there is co-operation between Ottawa and all the provinces. Doctor Jean Grégoire, deputy minister of health of the province of Quebec, is a distinguished doctor, as is the assistant deputy minister, Doctor J. C. Beaudet. The minister has said that within six weeks there will be a meeting of the welfare people, and that is good news. The minister will hear about it from unsuspected quarters. He will be told the appreciation of many people who regret the present circumstances and who rely on him to improve the situation.

I could say much more. I have a list of the incurables in my county, and I suggest to my fellow colleagues that they get the same information from the health authorities in their constituencies during the coming recess. They will find that there are perhaps 100, 200 or 250 incurables in their constituencies, people who do not benefit from the present social legislation.

I thank the minister for the attention he is giving to this important problem. I am sure that his name will be greater among the poor and among his fellow citizens if he completes that part of the security program so that the neediest cases will be provided for.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a great deal of criticism which may be quite proper, but I think the minister has done exceedingly well for his first appearance. He has shown an appreciation of the problem and a determination to attack it, which is altogether commendable. I should like to draw to his attention one important fact which may not be welcome, but which is something his government and his party must face. He must gauge the amount of assistance he can give to the people of Canada by the amount of goods and services which the people of Canada can produce and not by the amount of money he can collect from the people in taxes. If he will do that there will be no question of the ability of the government and of the Canadian people to provide adequately for every Canadian from coast to coast.

Mr. POULIOT: I have another matter to bring up in connection with the activities of the welfare branch. This branch gives out information, and in some cases it should be given information. We hear a lot about beautifying Ottawa. Ottawa is like a woman with make-up on only half her face, beautiful on one side and ugly on the other. You have only to go to the eastern and western parts of the city and to some quarters in the immediate vicinity to find slums. Every time we come here we hear about the beautification of Ottawa.

Some years ago I had something to do with the old Department of National Health and Welfare. At the request of the judges of the supreme court I drew to the attention of the then minister the condition of the old supreme court building. An investigation was held and it was condemned as being unhealthy for the judges. One judge became very ill because of the drafts and overheating, and another judge died. He told me before he died that he was dying because of the nonsalubrious condition of the building. I am not exaggerating. My reward for denouncing the condition of that building was to receive from the minister an official copy of the investigation. That was my reward for telling the truth. My reward in this case will be the removal of these slums as the next step in beautifying the capital city of Ottawa.

I have another case I want to cite to show the connection that exists between the department of health and some of the other departments. I should like to give the particulars of this very sad case which requires immediate welfare treatment. I will not give any names, because these people live in my constituency. This man is a good labourer. He worked for two weeks at night and then he worked during the day at a certain manufacturing plant. He worked eleven hours during the day and thirteen hours at night. When he was working at night he put in eighty hours a week.

In 1947 he bought a house which is now occupied by three persons, the father, the mother and a boy, twenty-five years of age. This man, whose case I am bringing up, has ten children, ranging in ages from eighteen to two years. They occupy a tourist cabin which measures eighteen feet by fourteen feet. They had to put three children in the orphanage. There are six who sleep in a room eight feet wide. The father, mother and baby are in one bed, while three of the daughters are in another. In the other small room are two boys sleeping in one bed, with a third one sleeping on two trunks.

The kitchen is ten by twelve feet. There is table, stove, washing machine, sewing machine, radio and three rocking chairs. Around the family table are eight chairs which cannot be moved. The toilet is close to the kitchen cupboard and the partition does not go to the ceiling. There is no door on it. There are only 320 cubic feet of air for nine persons, and the mother has been in the hospital for several months for a T.B. prevention cure.

Mr. WARREN: Did my hon. friend hear my story about the $475 house? I have a better one than that.

Mr. POULIOT: I think the hon. member for Renfrew North should have more sympathy for those who suffer and stop his silly jokes when we speak of suffering people. His story is old. It has appeared in the press. He is stonehearted if he makes jokes when I mention a case like that. He should be ashamed of himself and hide behind the curtains or under his desk. I want none of his silly jokes when I am speaking about the sufferings of my fellow citizens. He should sit down, because I am sick of interruptions like that by a man who should be ashamed of himself by interrupting a member who is fighting for the welfare of his fellow citizens. I will not stand for it. He should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. WARREN: On a point of privilege—

Mr. POULIOT: The word "privilege"; privilege is not to be interrupted with silly questions like that.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall say more to the hon. gentleman if he does not shut up. I will be wicked.

Mr. WARREN: On a point of privilege—

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell him—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. WARREN: On a point of privilege, this is my story. I did not have an opportunity to tell it.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not to be interrupted by that nonsense.

Mr. WARREN: It was no joke. It was absolutely true. I have even a better one than that if my hon. friend would care to listen.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not to be interrupted by silly things—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I will be wicked and may say something which the hon. member may regret and for which he will be defeated in his constituency, and it will not take long.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. If the hon. member has a point of privilege he should state it.

Mr. WARREN: My question of privilege is—

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege, not to be disturbed by a fool like that when I speak of my problems in the house.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member will have to withdraw that word.

Mr. WARREN: I hope so.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It is unparliamentary. He should not use that word.

Mr. POULIOT: I withdraw it; I used it as a euphemism.

Mr. WARREN: Some day—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. WARREN: My story still stands.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. members to deal with the item under discussion, if they can. Let us get on with the work of the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Now, sir, this is a pitiable situation. The family is an honest family. The father earns his living working in the mill. They cannot even live with their children. They went before the judge, but the judge said he could not do anything. He appealed to the Minister of Finance. He said he could not do anything. I now appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I mention that case to him.

I could mention many others. I have large files here, but I am not going to take up the time of the committee with them. I mention one case; I have others. I will tell the minister that I do not see why the regulations are so rigid. There are some cases which are worse than others. I remember that some time before in Montreal there was an administrator who was a sensible man. When there was something that was out of the ordinary he gave the privilege to the interested parties to return to the civil law. They were not bound any longer by these tight regulations, the cause of disease, the cause of the disruption of families. We have welfare. What finer word is there in social legislation than welfare? In French it is bien-être, being well, welfare. These people have a right to expect something. It does not interest only the Minister of Health; it interests also the Minister of Justice because, when there is an injustice such as that, when a man who has bought a house honestly, has paid for it and cannot get the delivery of the house his children have to suffer. In the summer it is not too bad; but how do you think a family of nine can live in the wintertime in a house which has only 320 cubic feet of air? In our climate it is impossible. I will ask the minister—

Mr. WARREN: Build a house.

Mr. POULIOT: I ask the minister to use his influence with the Minister of Finance and with his colleagues in the government, so that the regulations concerning rent are not applied so strictly and so formally, and when exceptions are necessary they should be allowed. I can speak also to the Minister of Justice about the matter, because it is cases like these out of which communism grows. I do not see how we can speak of social security, of beautifying the capital city of Ottawa, when we have slums in Ottawa, when we start with slums, and when, on account of regulations that come from Ottawa—the blame cannot be put on the provinces; the regulations have been made by the wartime prices and trade board—these people cannot take possession of their own house.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. WARREN: Let them get out of the city.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, I may say what I want to say. If I am provoked too much I will say it. I remember that one day there was a man who was a candidate in the county of Ontario and he was defeated—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —because of a story I told.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: His name was Kaiser.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It is entirely out of order for an hon. member to use threats in the house.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a threat, sir; it is a warning.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—Family allowances—
273. Administration, $1,717,513.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister two questions with respect to family allowances? One of them is the question I asked the other night when we were on the general item. Has consideration been given to amending the act so as to make it possible for children to qualify for the allowance in less than the three years required at present? When I drew this matter to the attention of the minister the other night I stated that at that time I could not recall whether this point had been discussed when the act was passed in 1944. Since then, I have looked up the debate on the point, and I found that there was a fair amount of discussion on it. The Prime Minister stated that in his view it was a good idea to start off with that provision in it and to see how the matter worked.

We have now had a few years of administration of the act. I think the position taken the other night by the hon. member for Dauphin is valid, namely, that with children coming to Canada, children of immigrants from the United Kingdom and from other parts of the world, it seems unfair that they should have the disability of not getting the allowance as other children do in this country. After all, the purpose of the allowance is to make it possible for all children to have the best possible chance.

My second question relates to the amount of the allowance. In view of the increased cost of living—and the minister in his capacity as chairman of the prices committee knows all about it—has consideration been given to increasing the scale of the allowance? As the minister knows, the increased cost of living, particularly the increased cost of food, hits hardest at families in the lower income brackets, and families with a larger number of children. It does seem to me that this would be one way to help the people that need it. Can the minister answer my two questions?

Mr. MARTIN: A number of questions on this matter of family allowances were put the other night, and I promised to deal with them all in one reply, including the two questions mentioned by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. On the first of July the family allowances program will be three years old. I believe the program has fully justified the hopes of those who shared the responsibility of placing it upon the statute books of our country. I think it is recognized universally as being the most comprehensive and generous family allowances act to be found anywhere. The benefits paid under the act are, by and large, more generous than those of any other system in existence at present. That the program has gained increased favour with the Canadian people is indicated, I think, by the Gallup polls which have been taken this year and in the two previous years of the act's existence. This shows a steady increase over the last three years in the numbers of our fellow countrymen who, as a result of their experiences with the family allowances program, have expressed themselves as being in favour of this key item in our social security program. The percentage of those favouring the program has now risen to 75 per cent of the total population. The percentage of those expressing themselves as opposed to family allowances has constantly dwindled and now is shown to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of a little less than eight per cent of our total population. Rarely does any public opinion poll show such an overwhelming majority of sentiment in favour, and such a relatively small percentage opposed to any given measure or proposal.

Since I put on Hansard the table asked for by the hon. member for Eglinton the other night, I have noticed that considerable attention has been paid in the press and elsewhere to these tables showing the increase in the total expenditures under family allowances during the years they have been in operation.

These tables showed that for the nine months of the fiscal year 1945-46 the total expenditures on family allowances amounted to $172,632,146, or an average of a little over $19,000,000 a month. For the full fiscal year 1946-47, the expenditures totalled $245,140,000, or an average of a little less than $20,500,000 a month. The expenditures for the fiscal year just ended amount to $263,000,000, or an average of a little less than $22,500,000 a month; and the estimates for the current year —I ask the committee to bear these figures in mind—indicate that we shall require something in the neighbourhood of $267,000,000, or almost $22,500,000 a month.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How do you account for that?

Mr. MARTIN: I shall deal with that in a minute.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is it breeding?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. MARTIN: That would be one of the reasons. I shall come to the reasons in a moment. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that, since the act came into force, there has been distributed a total of $725,000,000 to approximately 3,750,000 children, representing over 1,650,000 families in our country.

The reasons for this progressive increase in expenditures are not difficult to understand. The experience of most countries has been that in the immediate post-war years there has been a very sharp increase in the birth rate. This is due, of course, to the fact that the post-war years have seen a marked rise in the rate of marriages and in the rate of new family formations, as hundreds of thousands of men have returned from military service overseas to civilian life.

It should be noted incidentally that this increase in the marriage rate, and consequent increase in the birth rate, has no direct connection with family allowances as such. This can be shown by comparing the Canadian birth rate in the immediate post-war years with the United States birth rate. Despite the fact that family allowances are not provided in the social security program of the United States, the birth rate in that country during the post-war years has risen even more sharply than in Canada.

In our country, however, there has been during the last few years a most remarkable increase in the number of births. From 1937, the year in which the number of births sank to its lowest point of 220,000, there had been a slow increase until the year 1945 when births totalled some 288,000. The average increase for this eight-year period was something in the nature of 8,000 additional births a year. From 1945 to 1946 the total births jumped from 288,000 to 330,000, and from 1946 to 1947 they rose still further to a total of some 358,000 for the last calendar year.

In other words, total births have increased no less than 70,000, from 228,000 to 358,000 in the last two years. This increase is more than the total increase which took place in the preceding eight years. It is this unusually large post-war increase in the total number of births occurring annually in our country which has accounted in large part for the increase in the total annual expenditures for this program.

As will be noted from the estimates for the current fiscal year, it is not expected that the increase from 1947-48 to 1948-49 will be as great as it has been for the previous period. The total anticipated increase for the current fiscal year will be in the neighbourhood of $4,000,000. The figures appearing currently from month to month show that the post-war situation regarding marriages and births is beginning to normalize itself, and it is expected that, as a result of this, the annual expenditure on family allowances will tend to increase less sharply in the course of the next few years and will ultimately flatten out at a level not markedly higher than the level which will prevail for the current fiscal year.

At the present time the provisions of the Family Allowances Act cover nearly all the children of Canada. It is probably safe to say that not more than 50,000 children in all Canada fail to benefit at the present time from the provisions of this legislation. One of the most significant groups in this 50,000 consists of children who are debarred from receiving immediately the benefits of the family allowance by the fact that they have come recently to Canada with their parents and have not yet established three years residence in this country as required by the legislation.

We have been giving serious consideration to this aspect of the problem, particularly in connection with our immigration policy. A substantial number of representations have been received from several organizations interested in the welfare of immigrants; and the department is at the present time engaged in the study of how best, adequately and fairly, in the light of all considerations, to meet this problem.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I interrupt the minister for a moment? I feel confident that if the question were put to a vote in the House of Commons the proposal would receive unanimous support, that all new children brought to this country under our immigration schemes should receive the same treatment as is given to every Canadian-born child in the way of benefits from family allowance, and that not more than a period of six months should elapse, and possibly not three months. This is a most serious matter. I have been receiving letters from people who have recently arrived in the country. We told them of the great benefits they would derive here; and we find that mothers of little children, under the present law, cannot receive the benefits that Canadian-born children receive, until a period of three years has elapsed. This is something that should be taken up at once. I do not think a period of more than six months should elapse before the child arriving in this country receives these benefits. They have come here to become Canadians for the future; and they should receive, almost immediately, the benefits that are given under this act. I believe the unanimous feeling of hon. members, representing all parts of Canada, irrespective of parties, would be in support of this suggestion.

Mr. MARTIN: If I had thought the hon. member intended to make extended remarks instead of asking a question I would have finished the statement I was making.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask just one question? Could the minister break down the 50,000 into categories, or, to be specific, tell us how many are children of immigrants?

Mr. MARTIN: I have not that information here. May I say that this problem is not as easy as it would appear on the surface. One has to consider the abuses. This act has been in existence for only three years, and it is important that we do not start tinkering with it. Instead of doing good, it might do harm. We have good reason for conjectures as to what some of the abuses might be. This is the most generous act of its kind to be found anywhere; and people coming here, with no intention of remaining, because they are en route to the United States, would automatically get the benefit of the family allowance, if there were not in the act some provision regarding residence. There are considerations of this sort that one must bear in mind, and we are studying the matter carefully.

What I want to say about the family allowance administration is this. I greatly appreciate what was said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South in praising the administration, particularly in his part of Canada. As Minister of National Health and Welfare, I have had to authorize but eight prosecutions for fraudulent receipt of family allowances by individuals in this dominion. I think that is a great tribute to the people of this country. I am not saying that is the only extent of abuse. That would perhaps be placing an assessment on human nature that would be extravagant. But through the surveys that we conduct and through the special arrangements that we have had with the provinces, our judgment in the administration is that the attitude of the public toward this matter is an honourable one, and I believe that this is the place to say it.

I believe it is something of a record to be able to say that with respect to a matter involving over $725 million, going into almost one and three-quarter million homes, representing three and three-quarters of a million children, the minister responsible for the administration of the act has had to authorize but eight prosecutions. I feel that, from all the evidence that we can get, from the increase in the consumption of milk, in the use of medicines, cod liver oil and things like that, family allowances have been a good thing. I have on my desk a report from the minister of education of Ontario, who is also premier of that province, pointing to the increase in the school attendance in Ontario since the introduction of family allowances. The same thing is true of every province. So, in making this abbreviated report on an important social welfare program, I think the house and the country may be well satisfied in the decision that was made when it was decided to establish family allowances in Canada.

Mr. CASE: I have one observation to make with respect to family allowances. There is much to be said in favour of the arguments which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Simcoe North have advanced with respect to newcomers. While I can appreciate some of the difficulties that have been referred to by the minister, one feature about family allowances which I do not like is the compulsory feature. In a free country there should be an element of choice whether you want to accept the family allowance or not. The answer that is usually given is that it is not compulsory; but for income tax assessment purposes it is compulsory.

There should be a line of demarcation. If those who have incomes of $3,000 and over do not care to register their children to receive the family allowance they should not be required to do so, and the act should so provide. If that were done, the figures might be even more favourable than those which appear in the estimates at the present moment.

I can understand the increase in the attendance at schools. For the information of the minister—and no doubt he probably knows it now—I might say our experience on the committee on Indian affairs was that a marked improvement has been noticed on the Indian reserves with respect to children's attendance at school as a result of family allowances.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. CASE: I notice that in this one item, administration, the cost has been cut by $186,000. Yet it would appear that personnel has been increased by about nine. It must be in the temporary help column or somewhere that the department is enabled to save $186,000. I should like the minister to comment on any prospects of changing the act so that it is not compulsory for people to accept the family allowance, which is the condition prevailing at the present time.

Mr. MARTIN: The feature to which my hon. friend refers does not come under the heading of "compulsory". It is not a compulsory feature. I have nothing further to add, other than to say we believe that, everything considered, this is the most effective way, administratively, to handle the matter.

Mr. CASE: That is an answer, to say that it is not compulsory. Nevertheless, for the Department of National Revenue and for the Department of Finance, it is compulsory inasmuch as you are assessed whether you accept the allowance or not. It is assumed that you take it. There is that aspect or feature to it, but possibly it should be left to the Department of Finance to straighten that out.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to comment briefly on two aspects of the statement made by the minister. The first is as to the reasons for the increase in the total annual payments by way of family allowances. The significant increase in 1947-48 over 1946-47, amounting to $18,000,000, was largely accounted for by a factor which he has not mentioned. That was the amendment of the Income War Tax Act in that year, to which the hon. member for Grey North has referred. It was in that year that the amendment took effect; and a great number of people who previously had not taken the family allowance, took it that year because otherwise they would have lost the benefit of both the allowance and the deduction with respect to the support of dependent children under sixteen years of age.

When attention is drawn to the fact that between those two years payments by way of family allowances increased by $18,000,000, it is also well to bear in mind the fact that, with the other hand, the government took away from the taxpayers of this country, by the same amendment to which I have referred, something like, if I remember the figures correctly, approximately $8,000,000 by way of increased taxation or, on the other side of the picture, by reduced deductions with respect to dependent children. So that it should not be thought of as a net increase. The net increase was, I think, only about half of that figure, when the additional taxes are taken into account.

The other factor that I should like to comment on and follow with a question or two, has to do with the subject of administration. I think Canadians are proud of the record of the administration of family allowances, having regard to the number of prosecutions. The minister has referred to eight in all. It is an extraordinary record. There were those who feared—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And how.

Mr. FLEMING: As I say, there were those who feared that the family allowances would not be devoted to the purpose for which they were provided. I do not believe that the minister will say there were only eight cases of abuse. Nevertheless I think all are encouraged to feel that the record is one in which the parents of this country may take great pride.

The method of investigation is one that will interest the committee. The minister spoke about agreements with the provinces. I wish he would give the committee some report as to any steps that may have been taken in the direction of administration during the year. When the last report of the department was issued as of March 31, 1947, attention was called by the minister to the fact that there were agreements with five of the provinces, for investigation to be made, with regard to the recipients of family allowances. There is an agreement with the province of Ontario effective January 1, 1947, which I think the department regards as a sort of model agreement, under which investigations are made at the request of the Department of National Health and Welfare at a charge of $5 per case. Similar agreements exist with British Columbia and Manitoba. The agreement with Nova Scotia is similar, but there is a guaranteed floor payment of $1,050 monthly. In the case of New Brunswick the investigations are carried out by the children's aid societies and not by the welfare department of the province. Those are five provinces. I should like to ask the minister what, if any, arrangements have been made with the other four provinces in the meantime with respect to handling cases for investigation? Perhaps he can give us a report on the whole picture with regard to the handling of these investigations.

Mr. MARTIN: I thank the hon. gentleman for reminding me of something I neglected to mention. The house and the country will be interested in knowing the cost of administration, having in mind the sum being expended this past year, $263,000,000. The total estimated cost of administration is $3,886,645, of which our share is $1,664,539, and the share of the Department of Finance, which issues cheques and so on, is $2,079,267. The share of the Department of Public Works, for the inspection of premises and so on, is $143,000. That truly is a remarkable figure. When one compares the cost of administration of family allowance in other countries he will find that our administration costs are substantially lower than in any country that we have examined.

As my hon. friend has said, we do have arrangements with certain provinces whose child welfare agencies we use, paying them a certain amount per case. We have arrangements with Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta and Quebec. In the other provinces we use our own staff, having special reasons for doing so. This method of investigation has proven itself, so much so that I think we may reasonably expect to increase the number of provinces with which we make these arrangements.

Mr. FLEMING: When the agreements with Alberta and Quebec came into effect—

Mr. MARTIN: I was wrong when I said Alberta and Quebec. We use our own staff there and selected private agencies.

Mr. FLEMING: What about the other provinces, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island?

Mr. MARTIN: The same arrangements there, through our own staff and selected private agencies.

Mr. FLEMING: There have been no new agreements since March, 1947?

Mr. MARTIN: That is so.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What were these eight prosecutions? Were these marvellous figures produced out of the air?

Mr. MARTIN: I have not the details, but I recall that in one case the applicant in Ontario alleged that she was the mother of two children, and false confirmatory evidence was presented, and the allowance was paid over a period until the facts were discovered. In another case there was actually a conspiracy between the applicant and the parent of another family, by which both joined in this fraudulent scheme.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Were they all of that type?

Mr. MARTIN: That type of case.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What can you prosecute for under the act—just things of that kind?

Mr. MARTIN: That sort of thing.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What have these eight prosecutions to do with the use that is being made of the money paid out by way of family allowance?

Mr. MARTIN: I did not mention the prosecutions for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then for what purpose?

Mr. MARTIN: To indicate the extent to which people were prepared to mislead. The use of these child welfare agencies is to meet the kind of abuse which likely my hon. friend has in mind. When we have reason to believe that the allowance is being improperly spent we send these welfare workers to make an investigation. That is the way in which we seek to exercise a proper method of administration.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What you mean in short is this, that eight people were found out of the hundreds of thousands who were receiving this large amount of money, $700 million, who were prepared to be criminals and to obtain the allowance by false pretences. By a conspiracy or otherwise they became thieves and got a little of this money. What possible relation has that to the question as to where this large amount of money is going?

The minister used another illustration. He spoke of the increase in the consumption of whole milk. Did he compare the increased consumption of milk with a very scarce commodity called butter? We know that dairy products have had a tremendous increase in value in this country. How can you credit the family allowance with the increased consumption of milk? It seems to me you have taken an awful jump, without looking into other similar products. Am I not correct in that.

Mr. MARTIN: All I can say is that our surveys indicate exactly what I have said. Almost mathematically school attendance has increased with the advent of family allowances. The same is true of the consumption of milk. More clothing has been purchased and more cod liver oil, which is so important to a child's health.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have heard that.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, so the doctors say. The increase in the consumption of cod liver oil has been amazing.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is not that because we found some fish livers out in the ocean?

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You are not claiming that it is any more than a coincidence in the reasons you have given up to now. Is it not a fair assumption that the money we pay out goes into bottles, one kind being milk bottles and the other, beer bottles? The beer bottles would be away down there, of course.

Mr. THATCHER: I have received a letter from a constituent of mine who, I think, has a legitimate grievance. This lady lives in Moose Jaw. She married an English airman during the war. She writes me this letter:

> I married an English airman during the war. We had a child in Canada, then we returned to England, where we had two more. Returning to Canada after 1945 we had a fourth. The last is the only one for which I receive the family allowance.

There might be some reason why the two born in England do not get the allowance, but it seems to me that any child born in Canada should get the allowance, whether his parents were away from Canada for a few months or not. Is there not some way by which the allowance can be paid in this case? I wonder if the law does say that this child cannot have it. Is there not something that can be done; because I believe any child born in Canada should be eligible for family allowance.

Mr. MARTIN: I can only administer the act passed by the House of Commons. If the facts are as stated by the hon. member, she broke residence. She did not have domicile in Canada.

Mr. THATCHER: Her husband went overseas during the war.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, but the act is there, and I cannot give a favourable answer simply because my hon. friend asks for it.

Mr. THATCHER: Would you consider it?

Mr. MARTIN: The act is there; I cannot go beyond it. If my hon. friend will let me see the case I will look into it, and if help can be given I shall be only too happy to help.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then would the minister answer my question? Has consideration been given to increasing the scale of allowances to meet the increased cost of living—milk, groceries and the like?

Mr. MARTIN: That matter has been seriously considered. In the opinion of those who have had a great deal to do with this kind of legislation in other countries, where similar statutes have been enacted it has been pointed out how dangerous it would be to the whole scheme if the scale of allowances were permitted to vacillate in accordance with the cost of living. That is the opinion, for instance, of Mr. Waters in New Zealand, who was here a few weeks ago. The very strength of this scheme must be that its rate of payment can be relied upon for some measure of constancy.

Mr. KNOWLES: But it should be related to the cost of living.

Mr. FERGUSON: Can we have the minister's assurance that the three-year period necessary for residence in Canada will have his immediate attention, and that steps will be taken immediately to have that period reduced? Immigrants are coming to Canada today, some of them with children only six months old or two months old. These people are going to our farms, and as families they are doing essential work and providing the wherewithal for the starving people of Europe. We never want it to be said in ten or twenty years from now by any of these newcomers, who in the interim have become creditable citizens of the country, that when they were small children they came to Canada with their parents, but that they had to wait for a period of three years before receiving the treatment that other children were receiving.

It is a most serious situation, and something which will be detrimental in future years. I implore the minister to assure the committee that immediate steps will be taken by the government of which he is a minister to remedy the situation, and that the waiting period will be reduced to no more than six months, even if it has to be said that the Canadian taxpayers paid for a child whose sojourn in this country was only one month, following which it went to the United States or some other part of the world. It should be said that those children received the treatment which we believe is necessary for our own children.

Apparently opinion is unanimous that family allowances are a benefit for our children. Let them be a great benefit to every child in Canada; and reduce that three-year waiting period to no more than six months, so that I shall not have to write to any new immigrants to Canada who ask, "Mr. Ferguson, am I entitled to those benefits for my four children? We have now been here a year. Do we have to wait for three years?" I have to write to them and state that such is the law of the land. This is the place where laws are made. Cut out the red tape; change the law, and reduce the waiting period.

Mr. THATCHER: I agree with the hon. member for Simcoe North, but I should like to get back to the situation in my constituency of Moose Jaw. I know the minister has said he only administers the act. But when an injustice has been pointed out, as it has been in the present instance, would the minister not give consideration to seeing if there is some way whereby the act could be amended?

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot add anything to what I have said. I have already replied to the hon. member.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I remind the minister that my question was brief.

Mr. MARTIN: I understood it.

Mr. FERGUSON: Will the minister assure the committee that he will immediately give attention to this question of reducing the waiting period? Will he use his efforts to do that?

Mr. MARTIN: I have already given a great deal of attention to these matters.

Mr. FERGUSON: Will the minister give his assurance that he will give this matter immediate attention?

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot answer any further than that. I am giving attention to these matters all the time.

Mr. TUSTIN: No doubt the minister has so many of these cases before him he may have forgotten that last year I presented one identical with that described by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, in which a child was born in Canada, and when the mother paid a visit of three months to England she was deprived of the allowance for that child.

A few minutes ago the minister said that when the department has complaints they send welfare officers or workers to investigate, where it has been alleged that moneys have been misspent. If it is found by the investigators that the moneys have been misspent, what action is taken by the department?

Mr. MARTIN: We find some agency with which the money can be placed in trust, and carry on; in some cases we have to order suspension. The action taken depends upon all the circumstances.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask—

Mr. MARTIN: Family allowance administration: expenditures, $1,619,287.97; unliquidated commitments, $45,251.72; total commitments, $1,664,539.69. With regard to family allowance payments, the expenditures are $263,165,192.33; unliquidated commitments, nil; total commitments, $263,165,192.33.

Mr. FLEMING: There are two questions which I think should be cleared up as a result of the minister's observations and those of the hon. member for Calgary West, on the subject of investigations and prosecutions.

Two quite distinct matters are involved here. One is the matter of obtaining money by false pretences or in breach of the provisions of the Family Allowances Act, section 14, which deals with offences.

The other matter is that of investigations to ensure that the moneys, if properly received in the first instance, are disbursed for the benefit of the family. The minister's statement has dealt with the first matter only. He has indicated that there were eight prosecutions for, in effect, obtaining money by false pretences, or for kindred offences. These might be offences of the four kinds created by section 14 of the act, namely, first, making a false or misleading statement with a view to influencing a decision with respect to the payment of family allowances; second, making or presenting to any inspector or person appointed to make an inquiry under the act any statement or document which is false in any material part; third, cashing any cheque for an allowance to which he is not entitled and, fourth, being a person to whom an allowance is payable, failing to report as required by section 4 (4) of the act.

The kind of investigation to which I was referring, and which is the subject of agreements with five provinces is, in the main, as I understand it, with respect to cases where cheques, having been properly issued and received, are being used for purposes other than the benefit of the children who are to be benefited by the act.

I notice that during the fiscal year 1946-47 a total of 4,838 cases were investigated, of which 2,985 were investigated through the facilities of the provinces, 643 by local agencies and 1,210 by the family allowances staff. Would the minister enlarge on the information he has given to the committee with reference, not to the cases of obtaining money by false pretences or the commission of one of the offences created under section 14 of the Family Allowances Act, but to the other class of case where the money has not been devoted by the recipient to the benefit of the children? Can he give us figures as to the number of cases in which the department has had to suspend payment or make payments to another agency?

Mr. MARTIN: In addition to the type of investigation carried out through provincial or local facilities, family allowances offices use staff members in certain cases where necessary. During the fiscal year a total of 10,636 cases were investigated as follows:

Through the facilities of the provinces..	3,858
Through other local agencies	897
Through family allowances regional office staff	5,881

The 10,000 cases that were investigated during the fiscal year must be observed in relation to the 1,669,944 families receiving family allowances as of March, 1948. The incidence of cases warranting investigation when seen in proper perspective is not great.

An analysis of the source of cases under review by the welfare sections of family allowances regional offices indicates that some 36 per cent of them came from social agencies, including institutions; 26 per cent from the families themselves or from close relatives; 8 per cent from private individuals, and the remaining 30 per cent arose from clerical work within the family allowances offices in studying the eligibility of applicants.

A review of the action taken indicates that in approximately one-third of the cases no change was found necessary; in other words, the payee was considered a suitable recipient of the allowances. In other cases, changes of payee were made, or a third party administrator was used in a minority of cases, as I indicated a moment ago. It is of interest to note that in the matter of complaints of misuse of allowances, of 1,580 such cases reported, 1,046 were discovered on investigation to be unfounded, so that payment was undisturbed.

Mr. COCKERAM: What did the investigations carried on under the act cost?

Mr. MARTIN: Five dollars per case.

Mr. COCKERAM: Would that be $50,000 for the whole?

Mr. MARTIN: The expenditure last year was about $30,000.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—

Old age pensions (including pensions to the blind)—

274. Administration, $59,832.

Mr. BRYCE: Earlier in the evening I started to say something about those people who have been unfortunate enough to lose their sight. I think everyone in the house would agree to doing whatever can be done to help these people. We should do as much as we possibly can for them. The Canadian National Institute for the Blind has put out a pamphlet, and I imagine that every hon. member has received a copy similar to the one I hold in my hand. They set out six points which they want to bring to the attention of the minister and which are as follows:

1. The creation of a blind persons' act separate from and independent of the Old Age Pensions Act.
2. The use of the term "blindness allowance" and elimination of the term "pension."
3. The elimination of the means test in the award of the blindness allowance.
4. An adequate rate of blindness allowance in relation to the cost of living. Under present circumstances, this would appear to be not less than $40 per month, preferably uniform for all provinces.
5. The reduction of the present residence requirement from twenty years to five years, in the case of a person with normal vision who has taken up residence in Canada in good faith and at any time thereafter has lost his sight.

6. Adequate provision for medical or surgical treatment for eye conditions to conserve or to restore vision and to prevent blindness.

I referred to the sixth item earlier in the evening. Everything that can possibly be done should be done to prevent blindness. The medical profession has made sufficient progress to save the sight of many people. I could talk for a long time on this, but I think what I have said will impress the minister with the necessity of further work being done. With the support of the government and with a sympathetic public, I am sure we can make the wishes of those who have been deprived of sight come true.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want briefly to support the views which the hon. member for Selkirk has expressed. I have no doubt that the requests which have been made here have captivated the entire sympathy of the minister and of all members of the House of Commons as well as of the people of Canada. This is something which has no place in politics. I imagine that, in pursuing the course which has been suggested, the only difficulty of the minister will be, first, the type of scheme to help these people and, second, the matter of money.

No one can think of a legitimate reason why the unfortunate blind in our country should be associated with old age pensions. One can think of being deaf; one can think of having an accident of some kind, but I know that I at any rate cannot comprehend my position if I were stricken blind. I am not sufficiently courageous, nor have I the imagination even to contemplate a disaster so great as that.

I realize that during the present session of parliament no new act could be passed, but in support of the hon. member for Selkirk we are asking this, and I am sure we shall receive the sympathetic consideration of the minister. I want also to speak to his colleagues. When we speak of social service, security and all those things we are agreed on one thing, that this country will subscribe sufficient money by way of taxation to take care of those persons who, through injury or through accident at birth or through other causes no fault of their own, are without sight. I am sure that the minister and this whole House of Commons will not think of being penurious when dealing with a matter of this kind.

Let us think of two men, eighteen to twenty years of age, one blind and the other with his sight. One cannot conceive of the handicap or cannot get into his head any idea of any fairness in competition in the labour markets of the world, and I use the word "labour" in its biggest and broadest sense, to say nothing of the loss of sight itself. On the economic side one immediately appreciates the handicap of these persons. The most that any of us can do tonight so far as our legislation is concerned, because our legislative life in this session is, I hope, nearing an immediate end, is to suggest this separation. I can see no reason for applying the means test, except at a point where the blind person is earning sufficient money to live in even greater comfort than the ordinary person because of the tremendous handicap that he has in the loss of sight. Braille has been a great thing. It gives the blind person the pleasure of some reading.

With respect to the age limit, we did reduce it at the last session; but there is no reason why we should have taken the age of twenty or twenty-one years, whichever it is, or why we should not have said fifteen years or ten years. I am not suggesting for one moment that when blind people come to Canada this country should assume the burden for them, but I am saying that when persons come here with the intention of living here, making a stake here, helping us along with our business, and they are stricken with blindness, they should not have to wait the length of time prescribed in our present statute. After all, the amount of money is very far from terrific; it is really a reasonable sum. I heartily commend what was said by the hon. member for Selkirk, that if sufficient funds were in the hands of people who had oncoming blindness, and through that assistance they were permitted to go to an ophthalmologist—it is a great big word that I have difficulty with—to one of those persons who might arrest the progress of the disease, or in early years even restore complete sight, then could we go home and say truly we have done a job worthwhile for the people who have suffered more from that illness or from that disability than from any other disability of which I have any cognizance?

Mr. FLEMING: There are many hon. members who will deplore the fact that we have practically reached the end of the session and we have seen on the order paper as yet no indication of any intention on the part of the government to introduce legislation with respect to old age pensions. I do not need to review the debate that was held in this chamber a year ago on the 1947 amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act; but I remind the committee that the increase at that time was quite inadequate to sustain health. It meant that the dominion, by setting the basic pension at only $30 a month, with 75 per cent contribution by the dominion to a maximum pension on that basis, was not accepting the responsibility for the adequate maintenance of the old age pensioners, and was throwing the residual responsibility on the provinces where it does not belong.

When one has regard to the fact that the dominion has great resources at its disposal; that provincial boundaries have no place in meeting the needs of our aged pensioners, that certainly was a position which could not commend itself to the judgment of many of us in this chamber. The government did not go nearly far enough. The principle that the dominion was setting a limit to its responsibility was unsound.

This question is tied up, of course, with the larger question of the basic approach to the meeting of the needs of aged people. We call the present payment an old age pension. The word "pension" is perhaps a polite term to apply to the payment. It is not a pension at all in the strict and proper sense of the word. It is a payment without relation at all to the question of right and title on the part of the recipient. There will be—surely it is apparent by now—no final solution of this problem until the whole question of a proper pension scheme, with retirement features, on a contributory basis, is taken up in this country, on the basis of joint action on the part of the dominion and the provinces. I have no doubt that all the provinces will be prepared to participate in any reasonable scheme if the dominion will take action and accept its responsibilities in this regard.

The minister is well acquainted with representations made to him and to the government on this subject by the Canadian welfare council, a body whose views on this and other welfare questions are entitled to the highest respect, as I am sure the minister will readily acknowledge. He will remember that the point on which the Canadian welfare council criticized the proposals of the dominion-provincial conferences of 1945 and 1946 was that they did not get at the root of this problem, and did not seek to bring about what will eventually be the only possible and comprehensive solution, namely, a contributory overall scheme that will provide adequate retirement, or old age, insurance for aged people of this country.

An interesting news report emanated from Ottawa in January last. I take it that there was some basis for the report which appeared in the press. It suggested that some plans were under way in the department at that time for drafting and submitting to parliament a contributory old age pensions scheme. It was suggested in this news article that a bill embodying such a scheme would be submitted to parliament at the present session. A good many of us have been looking patiently for the introduction of such a measure. None has been indicated as yet. May I read briefly to the committee the substance of this report which appeared in the Globe and Mail on January 15? I shall refer to part of it. It says:

> Measures covering a contributory old age pension scheme as well as a health insurance plan are being drafted, with a view to having both bills presented to the commons at the coming session. There has been no cabinet discussion of Health Minister Martin's new plans, and it is likely that they will come in for careful and lengthy scrutiny. It is the hope of the minister and the department, however, that both bills will be on the statute book before parliament prorogues at midsummer.
> Both bits of legislation are based on extensive studies made in the department, using the original dominion-provincial proposals of August, 1945, as a starting point.
> In both cases the legislation would follow the pattern of the original Old Age Pensions Act—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think it is in order for the hon. member to read press reports on this item.

Mr. FLEMING: We are discussing provision for administration of old age pensions in this country, and the statutory item of $65,000,000 for old age pensions. I submit that it is entirely in order to discuss all features of the old age pensions legislation and its inadequacy, and plans that will meet the exigencies of the situation and the needs of the Canadian people. What I am referring to is a report that emanated from Ottawa last January.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: That report may or may not be true. Many statements appear in the press, and it is hardly in order for the hon. member to advance the report as an argument. It would be more desirable to have his own argument. It would be much more valuable to the committee.

Mr. FLEMING: That may be a matter of personal opinion, Mr. Chairman, but it is not a ground for ruling out of order a reference to a press dispatch. The minister will have full opportunity to indicate whether he and his department have this subject under study and whether they plan to put such legislation before the house.

Mr. MARTIN: Ask the question now and it will save time.

Mr. FLEMING: Perhaps the minister will allow me to put it in my own way. I call the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, to the necessity for a courageous approach to the problem and for finding a solution of the kind that ultimately must be sought, a solution of the kind which the government has been asked on more than one occasion to bring in. At one stage of the session the air was filled with rumours that the government would bring in such a plan, and we are now on the eve of prorogation without such a plan, without any breath of intimation from the government that any such plan is to be brought in. I say that the house has a lively concern in the question, and I am sure it wishes to know from the minister whether his department has such a plan, how far it has progressed, when we may expect to have it, and how far it intends to go.

That raises the question as to what the federal government proposes to do in this respect in co-operation with the provinces. The minister indicated in his statement to the house last week, when his estimates were up for the first time on June 11, that a happy spirit of co-operation had been exhibited by all parties to the dominion-provincial conference held in Ottawa last week. There have also been conferences of the welfare officials of the dominion and provincial governments from time to time. May I ask the minister also, in addition to these other questions, whether this subject has been discussed at dominion-provincial conferences, whether any further conference on the subject is now contemplated, and how far the matter has progressed as between the dominion and the provinces?

Mr. FAIR: I should like to say a few words in support of the plea made by the hon. member for Selkirk and the hon. member for Calgary West. I wish also to commend the minister, even at this late date, for the action he took last session in bringing down an amendment reducing the age from forty to twenty-one in the case of blind persons receiving pensions. That, I believe, received favourable comment throughout the dominion, and I do not think we have felt the loss that has resulted from that action.

In connection with old age pensions in general, I wish to ask a few questions. The first has reference to the prairie farm assistance bonus cheques received by old age pensioners. I should like to know just how these cheques are treated by the department, whether they are allowed as income or otherwise. Perhaps the minister is not aware that farmers have to contribute one per cent of their grain cheques to a fund known as the prairie farm assistance fund, and when the average crop goes below a certain number of bushels per acre the people contributing receive a small payment on account of the low average yield. I understand that there is some conflict in respect of the treatment of this matter. I would ask the minister to give an explanation of the method used and the reason for its adoption. After that, there are two or three more questions I wish to ask.

Mr. MARTIN: The Department of Justice has ruled that as income.

Mr. FAIR: Thank you. The next question is in connection with proof of age. Recently I came across a number of cases, particularly affecting Ukrainians and Polish people, and other people from those countries who came here many years ago. Because of the spelling and pronunciation of their names, mistakes were made in recording them as they came here, with the result that, after they have spent the useful part of their lives here and have reached the age of seventy, they are unable to produce proof of age. I understand that many of them are denied pension on this account. In some cases I have tried every method I could think of and have been unable to get proof of age. I wonder what action has been taken by the department so far as these cases are concerned, or whether any method can be found whereby these people can be granted their pensions.

Mr. MARTIN: The regulations were relaxed last year at the last meeting of the dominion-provincial pension board and every effort is made to assist the individual in proving his age. It is no longer mandatory that there should be a birth certificate. Other circumstances may be taken into account which are just as effective for purposes of proof.

Mr. FAIR: I am aware that these people can go to the bureau of statistics or the old age pension branch in the province and try to get through the census records some proof of their age, but in some cases we have been unable to prove age. Other methods such as immigration records and filing on homesteads having failed, I suggest that some method should be found whereby these people can be enabled to get their pensions.

Mr. MARTIN: These questions are all a matter of dominion-provincial regulation and agreement, and whatever valid proof can be given of age is now admissible under the liberalized regulations agreed to by the provinces and the dominion.

Mr. FAIR: One further question. Would the minister read and explain section 10 of the act.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. FAIR: I wish the minister would give that explanation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to support once again the plea for the blind so well put forward by the hon. member for Selkirk and others who followed him tonight. I wish also to express my active interest in the old age pension question, not by making another speech tonight but by putting three questions to the minister.

My first question relates to the proposals made to the provinces by the dominion government in 1945, which included a $30 universal pension for all Canadians seventy years of age and over, without any means test, together with a means-test allowance for those between sixty-five and sixty-nine years of age. My question is this. Is the government considering implementing that proposal, at least in the case of provinces that have signed the taxation agreement?

My second question is one that arises particularly if the answer to the first question is either in the negative or a delayed reply. Is the government considering increasing the amount of $30, which is now in the basic Old Age Pensions Act, to a larger amount? I refer now not to pressure that may be put on the provinces to add to it. My direct question is this. Is the government considering an increase in the basic amount provided in the federal statute?

My third question relates to an over-all scheme, or more specifically, to tie it down to this field, to the question of contributory old age pensions. Is the government considering a contributory old age pension plan for presentation to parliament at an early date?

Mr. CHARLTON: I wish to say a few words in support of the six-point program sponsored by the Canadian Council of the Blind and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. I think it is unnecessary for me to mention those six points again. The minister is well aware of them, and I believe he is favourably disposed toward them.

I wish to say one word in connection with point number four, which I believe is most important. That is the one with regard to the twenty-year residence law which is now in force. It is most ridiculous that a person coming to Canada to live, with the intention of making Canada his home, if he should have difficulty, get into an accident or have some mishap whereby he loses his sight, must remain in this country for twenty years before he can get this pension. As I said, this is a most ridiculous situation. I hope the minister will lend his support in favour of these six points.

I might say here I see that there is a $27,200,000 increase in this particular item. I wonder if any portion of that is to go toward increasing pensions for the blind?

Mr. CASE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CHARLTON: Will the minister answer the question that I asked?

Mr. KNOWLES: Will he answer the three questions that I asked?

Mr. CHARLTON: I ask the minister to answer.

Mr. MARTIN: A great many questions have been asked. I will deal with them as best I can after I get them all in.

Mr. CASE: I should now like to renew the question I asked earlier with respect to income tax. I believe this is a spot where I might expect the minister, when he gives an answer to many questions that have been asked, to tell the committee if the department have recognized the recommendation by the special committee on Indian affairs, and whether they will now be prepared to grant a pension in kind—an old age pension, as it is now called—to the aged Indians on the various reserves.

I should also like to take this opportunity to underline and support the views that have been expressed with respect to the blind. I wish to go one step farther. I think the blind suffer a terrible disability, but there are other types of disablement, both physical and mental. I believe this country can afford to assume the burden in order to release society of that responsibility—I refer particularly to the parents of children who are afflicted by mental disease or physical incapacity— so that when the children attain the age of twenty-one years the state should provide for those unfortunate victims of disablement, which is no fault of their own, but who remain a burden to those whose responsibility they are, whereas the nation could well afford to provide for them.

I should also like to express a view which has been expressed before by myself and others, that I believe the means test should be removed as of age seventy, that the amount should be increased, and that the pension should be available at the age of sixty-five, subject to a means test if necessary, but certainly at age seventy. I could elaborate at considerable length on the reasons why I think that would be a good move and would tend to promote thrift; because those people, in anticipation of a pension, knowing it would be available for them upon proving their age, would probably continue to save their money and might not even need a pension. But as matters stand at the present time, very often between the age of sixty and seventy people dispose of their small estates in order that they may obtain a pension, and the country is the loser.

Once again I say it is unfortunate that we use that term "old age pension", because I feel it does not properly describe the objective. I think it would be far better if the title "retirement allowance" were used, since one of the objectives surely is to remove from the labour market those who have served their country and their community, who are entitled to some reward, and are encouraged by the very terms of the act to desire retirement with a greater sense of security than they have at the present time. The country could well afford to be more generous to those who are seventy years of age and over, without the means test, even though we continue to apply it in connection with any reduction of age that might be anticipated. But I am particularly asking the minister if the government have given consideration to granting a pension in kind for all aged Indians on the various reservations.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I add my support to the hon. member for Grey North in advocating abolition of the means test for all blind people, abolition of the means test for all old age pensioners at the present time and certainly after they have reached the age of seventy; also that great consideration be given to the unfortunate children in this country who find themselves crippled through one means or another, and whose parents are not in a position to look after them as they should be looked after. I believe that some form of payment should be made to children who find themselves in the condition that they are not able to look after themselves and whose parents are not in a financial position to give them the proper kind of treatment to which they are entitled as Canadian citizens.

I would go even farther. I would say there should be abolition of the means test at the age of sixty-five. To encourage thrift in this country, unless figures can be produced to prove conclusively that the taxpayers cannot afford these suggestions, I am certainly in favour of the abolition of the means test at age sixty-five.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CASE: May we not have some answers first?

Mr. MARTIN: First of all, with regard to the question put to me by the hon. gentleman whose name indicates the good character of the weather but whose constituency I have forgotten—the hon. member for Battle River—section 10 of the Old Age Pensions Act provides that for the month in which the pensioner dies, the portion of the monthly payment covering that portion of the month in which he was alive may be applied to any debt that may be left unpaid at the time of death.

With regard to the representations that have been made by a number of hon. members with regard to the six-point program of the institute for the blind, may I say I am to be privileged, before this week is out, to have a conference with the managing director of that institute to discuss this and other matters. I must say that I am largely in accord with the general features of what they have asked, at least with regard to the suggestion of separate legislation that will place blind pensioners under legislation that is more properly applicable to them rather than including them, as they are now included, under the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act.

The committee will appreciate the fact that in the consideration of these matters one must bear in mind a number of things—the general over-all policy of the administration, what one might expect and what one might reasonably say with regard to other features of the act. I will be frank in stating that what I am aiming at is a system of contributory old age pensions in this country.

Having said that, I should add that whatever action we may take in this regard is conditioned and contingent on action on a constitutional basis involving the transference of or agreement on jurisdiction now enjoyed by provincial governments—something that is not as simple as it may appear on the surface to some hon. members. Last November we had a meeting with the provinces and discussed these matters, and any progress we may make in this regard is predicated largely upon the kind of action we may expect from those in authority in the provinces. But as an over-all objective I state unreservedly to the committee that that is my intention, and I am hoping that the progress we have made with the provinces in the matter of health during the past few weeks may be followed by the same measure of collaboration with the provincial governments with respect to old age pensions and welfare matters generally, but particularly old age pensions which involve, if a contributory scheme is to be established, even in connection with a scheme on a co-operative basis, agreement of some sort as to endowing the central authority with power, that is now enjoyed by the provinces entirely.

With regard to the blind, the amendments we made to the Old Age Pensions Act last session regarding the blind were very considerable in their portent. What we did was to reduce the age from forty to twenty-one, thereby adding no fewer than some twelve hundred blind individuals to the roll of recipients. In other words, twelve hundred blind people are now receiving moneys which, but for those amendments, they would not have received. That is a very considerable matter.

With regard to old age pensions, we are now paying roughly $100 million this year by way of old age pensions. What I said last year I repeat again tonight, that we are looking forward to developing a social security program in this country to cover such things as invalidity and disability which have been mentioned tonight. But we must have a sense of proportion in these things when considering expanding into other important fields of social welfare. Some 65,000 individuals have been added to the list of old age pensioners as a result of the old age pension amendments, and with respect to the $100 million let it not be forgotten that the federal government is paying 75 per cent of the cost of the basic pensions. It is all very well for some hon. members to say the federal government should pay the whole cost; but let me say, without any hesitation or doubt, I do not subscribe to that. The moment you centralize the administration and responsibility for all social legislation in the central government, you thereby do to social security and to social welfare and to the provinces a gross injustice, and most of the provinces do not want that. This I can tell hon. members from the discussions I have had with a number of the provinces. I think the present proportion, 75 and 25 per cent, is not an unreasonable proportion.

Mr. KNOWLES: That has been upset by the supplements which have been added by some of the provinces.

Mr. MARTIN: It has not been materially upset. Remember what I said last year, that the old age pension is but a maintenance grant, and we have amended the act to permit the provinces to increase the amount paid to an old age pensioner up to $50 a month. When I add that the federal government is paying 80 per cent of the costs of the social services in this country, which total between $700 million and $800 million, I do not think we are in any way capable of being adjudged as being ungenerous. I do not say the picture is perfect, but I do not think we are capable of being adjudged as ungenerous.

With regard to the old age pension means test, let this be clearly stated, that our means test is the most liberalized means test of any country in the British commonwealth and, so far as the researches of my officers have gone, of any country in the world.

Mr. FERGUSON: This is one of the wealthiest countries in the world in natural resources.

Mr. MARTIN: I agree with that.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It is not in order for an hon. member to interrupt.

Mr. MARTIN: I am going to say in the kindliest way, as my colleague the Minister of Labour would say, because we have to be realistic, that we have made certain proposals to the provinces. The Prime Minister, the present Minister of Justice, the present Minister of Finance and I have stated the policy of the government with regard to those proposals. They still remain in their broad essentials the policy of the government of Canada. I say this simply to keep the record straight, because the question has been raised tonight, that we are not in any respect standing in the way of the realization of that program. The Prime Minister and other ministers speaking for the government have clearly indicated that, just as soon as we get agreement with the provinces, we are prepared to deal with these important measures. Let me say to the hon. member for Simcoe North, for whom I have a very deep regard, that he has influences in certain places where I have not, and if he would bring pressure in those places he might materially assist in this program, as well as other hon. members who have influence in another large province with another head of a provincial government. No one can say that if we have not made progress in this regard it is the fault of this government.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that, although agreements have not been signed by certain of the provinces, this government has all the money that it would get even if there had been agreements? How can the minister use his present argument as an excuse for not going ahead with the proposals made in the green book?

Mr. KNOWLES: At least with the seven provinces.

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot add anything to what I have said. I have stated the policy of the government and I cannot go beyond that.

With regard to the question put to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I have already spoken about contributory schemes and our objectives in that regard.

With regard to the other question the hon. member posed, the government policy in these and other matters will be announced in the light of circumstances as the government sees them at the time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can the minister say whether consideration has been given to the specific point I asked him about, namely, implementing those proposals in the case of the seven provinces which have signed an agreement?

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot add anything to what I have said. The government's policy is well known.

I want to thank the hon. member for Grey North for the generous words of appreciation which, before the dinner recess, he used in respect of this department and particularly its administration in regard to the health of Indians, and to the general approval he has given respecting the administration over which I have the honour and responsibility of exercising ministerial jurisdiction at the moment.

The matter to which he has referred concerning the Indians is very much in our minds. We are following with keen interest the work of the Indian affairs committee, particularly in respect of enfranchisement and granting of citizenship. The furthest I can go at the present time is that the matter is under active consideration and is receiving our full attention.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I note that there is only $65,000,000 provided in the estimates.

Mr. MARTIN: The rest is paid by the provinces.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then it is not 75 per cent of $100 million?

Mr. MARTIN: Under the act we pay 75 per cent of the basic pension provided for in the statute.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): You have said that figure is $100,000,000 and that would mean that this figure should be $75,000,000. It is only $65,000,000 in the estimates; is that figure correct?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then the amount is not $100,000,000?

Mr. FLEMING: What are the amounts?

Mr. MARTIN: Old age pensions administration, $52,812.53; unliquidated commitments $25.15; total commitments, $52,837.78. With respect to old age pension payments including pensions to the blind, expenditures, $58,089,000; unliquidated commitments, nil; total commitments, $58,089,000.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—National physical fitness—

275. Administration, $48,871.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, last year I drew the attention of the minister to this law, and I asked him whether all the provinces had agreed to accept its benefits. In his answer he said that six of the nine provinces had agreed to accept the subsidies according to law, but that the three other provinces had not entered into an agreement with the federal government. Those were the provinces of New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. Have those provinces come to an agreement with the federal government since that time?

I feel that this national physical fitness program should render a service to our population, and particularly to our youth. I turn to page 6 of a book I hold in my hand, setting out the object of this law. Doctor Heagerty states this:

> The idea of national physical fitness is fostered by all who are interested in the field of physical education and chiefly by men in the physical-fitness field who are associated with schools and universities and who urged the dominion government to establish a physical-fitness plan and provide funds to enable the provinces to establish a program along lines similar to those which have been in effect in Europe for a number of years.

And farther on, he says:

> It will be the duty of the council to assist in the extension of physical education; to encourage and correlate all activities relating to physical education; to formulate plans for training teachers, lecturers and instructors and to correlate efforts of the provinces to organize activities, to promote sports and to co-operate in the amelioration of physical defects amenable to improvement through physical exercise.

For many years I took a special interest in the problem of the desertion of rural districts in favour of urban centres. That problem existed thirty-five years ago, but it is more acute today than it ever was before. In my province the population in the rural districts is about equal to that in urban centres. I know that in some provinces the population living in the cities is far more considerable than that in the rural districts. That condition should not exist.

That is why I am seeking to impress upon the minister to try to convince the provincial premiers and the provincial ministers of health in all those provinces which have not come to an agreement with the federal government, to profit by this law, and to develop what I would call rural educational and recreative centres in order to give the necessary fitness to our youth, and to make them feel more at home in rural centres. To attain that, I think it would be necessary that the provinces and the federal government should act more closely together to develop those centres, and to give subsidies so that such centres may become a reality.

A year or two ago I received a brief from Vancouver concerning community centres in Canada. From it I would quote this paragraph:

> In today's world the community centre is an essential part of democratic community life. It is not intended to substitute for the home, church or other forms of social life, or to replace bowling alleys, movie theatres, libraries, art galleries, museums, or concert halls.

I should like to see these rural educational centres equipped with libraries, small gymnasia, pool tables and the like, in order that the youth who gather there might find such centres more interesting than even the urban centres. I know the lights of the cities and the opportunities to go to moving picture theatres and concert halls may be attractive; but I know also that in the rural centres we have young people with great talent. Some are talented vocally; others have other musical talent which could be developed in those centres, so that they might be more appreciated by their fellow citizens. Along with the development of such talents, the fitness of our youth could be improved.

I hear hon. members speaking about those who are crippled; but I believe that we have not been sufficiently aware of the old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. We have not emphasized sufficiently the point that such prevention should have been better understood by our population.

Last night I heard the hon. member for Temiscouata speak about the sanitary units in my province. The chief aim of those units is that of preventive medicine. If there were more preventive medicine there would not be so many cripples or blind people today. In the past the education among the people was not sufficient. When families were asked to be quarantined for measles or smallpox they did not like it. Now they have been better educated by the sanitary units, they understand the necessity of quarantine for certain diseases.

The doctors know that after measles, smallpox and other diseases, eyes and ears may be affected. Many people are suffering today from kidney trouble and from eye or ear troubles because the necessary precautions were not taken.

I want the minister to understand my point, even though I have not made it quite clear. I should like to see him try to convince the premiers of the provinces which have not signed agreements with the federal government that they should do so. In my province, for instance, if we had entered into an agreement, since 1947 we would have received $130,496, which is twice the amount of $65,248 which we would have received. In ten years that would mean $1,300,000, and with that amount of money we could start rural recreational and cultural centres. With the development of such centres, we could keep our youth at home and have them better contented to live in rural areas. We would then solve the problem of the desertion of the rural areas in favour of urban centres by our young people.

I know the minister is an active minister, but I think he will agree that we shall have more success if the three provinces which have not entered into agreement would agree to do so. I hope that soon he will be able to announce that agreements have been reached, and we shall then be sure of seeing the development of these centres which are so necessary to our population.

Mr. MARTIN: We have agreements with all provinces but two, Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. FLEMING: In order to save time at this stage, would the minister place on Hansard the financial statement of the national physical fitness administration for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948?

Mr. MARTIN: I tabled it in the house the day before yesterday.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not mean the full report; I mean the financial statement for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948, which is only about half a page.

Mr. MARTIN: I will give consideration to that.

Mr. FLEMING: I am trying to save time.

Mr. MARTIN: I am tabling the statement now.

Balance at end of fiscal year 1947-48		$148,109.84

*Account paid in 1948-49.

Mr. JAQUES: When the minister told us that he was removing the duty on glucose I understood him to say that glucose was used in the making of jams and other similar articles. I should like to ask the minister whether his advisers consider the use of glucose in the manufacture of jams and other articles as being an aid to physical fitness? My experience is that it is an injurious adulteration of jam or anything else.

Mr. MARTIN: I shall be glad to have that looked into at once.

Mr. FLEMING: May I have that report?

Mr. MARTIN: I have not it before me, but I shall see that it is made available.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—National physical fitness—

276. Assistance to provinces, $100,353.

Mr. MARTIN: The expenditures for 1947-48 were $89,635.29; no unliquidated commitments; total commitments, $89,635.29.

Mr. FLEMING: Could we have the figures for item 275?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $31,938.33; unliquidated commitments, $11,190.36; total commitments, $43,128.69.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—

277. Assistance to schools of social work, $50,000.

Mr. FLEMING: How was this money spent last year?

Mr. MARTIN: The grants for the schools for 1947-48 were as follows:

Maritime school of social work	$ 3,250
School of social work of Laval University	6,560
School of social work of the University of Montreal	6,670
School of social work of McGill University	7,300
School of social work of the University of Toronto	12,230
School of social work of the University of Manitoba	4,430
School of social work of the University of British Columbia	9,560
	$50,000

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants—
Grant to:
280. Health league of Canada, $10,000.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Could the minister give the officers of this organization and details of the work that it does? I have received considerable correspondence, and I know there are many people who are not well informed. I was wondering if there is an overlapping with the work of the Canadian public health association or with departmental activities?

Mr. MARTIN: The Health League of Canada is a voluntary body which is doing a great deal of work in the way of health education. The director is Doctor Bates, and the president is Mr. H. H. Bishop of Toronto. They publish the magazine, Health, and I cannot speak too highly of their work. The provinces, some municipalities and the dominion make contributions.

Item agreed to.

282. Canadian National Institute for the Blind, $18,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How much did the Canadian National Institute for the Blind request this year? Did they get what they requested?

Mr. MARTIN: That is now under consideration.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How much did they request?

Mr. MARTIN: I forget the full amount, offhand, but it is now under consideration.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Did the minister get any request from the institute for the hard of hearing?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. That, too, is under consideration.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): People who are totally deaf can be aided. You cannot do anything for people who are totally blind. People who are hard of hearing can be aided. I suggest that intensive research be instigated, through the Department of National Health and Welfare and through the national council, to bring aid within reasonable bounds to those who are hard of hearing, in regard to the cost of hearing aids and also in regard to the cost of maintaining them. That is important. I do not think nearly enough attention has been paid to the handicap of those persons who are hard of hearing. The blind people get everything done for them. The institute is doing very well. I understand that the Canadian national institute is connected with the hard of hearing as well. It is a serious thing to be hard of hearing, far more serious than the average individual realizes. There is the great economic loss to the country as well. I suggest that some contribution be made toward the work that the institute is doing for the hard of hearing, so that they may be able to carry on that work.

Item agreed to.

287. Victorian Order of Nurses, $13,100.

Mr. WEBB: I am particularly interested in this item. Last year when the hon. member for Wentworth took up this item the minister said at that time he would be glad to give it serious consideration, meaning, of course, that the grant is exactly the same this year as it was last year. It has been my privilege to be closely associated with the Victorian Order of Nurses in Canada for several years. The financial statement presented at the annual meeting this year, which, incidentally, was the fiftieth anniversary of this order, was somewhat alarming. I made it my business to check into the affairs of the order, and I believe it would be interesting to hon. members and to many people outside if I were to put some figures on the record. It will not take long.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. member wish to place them on the record?

Mr. WEBB: It consists of just a few figures.

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. WEBB: I am sorry if it is going to keep anybody up, or anything like that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. WEBB: I have found that there has been a tremendous increase in the Victorian Order visiting nursing service during the past few years. In 1944, in round figures, 732,000 visits were made; in 1945, 757,000 visits; in 1946, 853,000 visits, and in 1947, 906,000 visits, or an increase of 23·8 per cent in the last three years.

In 1947, forty per cent of the visits were to mothers before and after the birth of the baby for care and health counseling and for assistance to the doctor when the baby was born at home. Some 187,471 visits were made to the mothers and newborn who returned home from hospital, to demonstrate the baby's bath and establish a plan for the care of the baby. Forty-seven per cent of the visits were to medical and surgicial patients of all ages, some of them with long-term illnesses. Owing to the extension of life expectancy, people are living to a greater age, and the care of the older age group has become a major health problem. The Victorian Order cares for many of these people who do not need institutional care, and are happier in their home environment. Victorian Order nurses are taking an active part in the campaign for the prevention of cancer. They use their many opportunities to teach the importance of health examinations for early diagnosis. Last year they made 37,000 visits to give care to 1,487 patients under treatment for cancer.

The Victorian Order gives care to many patients who would otherwise need hospital treatment, and to patients discharged as soon as their condition permits, to release beds for more urgent cases. This relieves the pressure on overcrowded hospitals and reduces the cost of illness to the patient and to the community. During the year, 41,904 visits were made to patients on their return home from hospital.

The Victorian Order provides nursing care to the community at a reasonable cost which permits people in moderate circumstances to have a nursing service for which they can pay. The charge may be reduced when the patients cannot afford the full fee, and when necessary, the visit is made without charge. The service is for everyone. Every call is answered, but care is continued only when the patient is under medical treatment.

During 1947, twenty-two per cent of the visits were made to people who paid the full fee; in sixteen per cent of the visits the fee was reduced; ten per cent of the visits were paid for by insurance companies for care to policy holders, and fifty-two per cent were made without charge.

As soon as nurses are available, new organizations will be set up in several other places. This heavy demand on the Victorian Order of nursing service, the increased cost of operating and the cost of training nurses in public health, have placed an increasingly heavy burden on this order. During the past four years, the educational training of nurses alone has required $72,400. The budget for 1948 shows an estimated deficit of $43,900, and includes a further $14,000 for training purposes, with consideration for an additional appropriation if suitable nurses and funds are available. Prior years I find show the following deficits:

1945	41,838
1944	12,737
1943	7,388
1942	3,247
Total	$143,718

To meet these deficits, it has been necessary to draw on capital funds to the extent of $137,000.

The annual grant from the dominion government has remained at $13,100 since 1934, although during the period from that year to date the number of Victorian Order branches has risen from 79 to 104, an increase of 31·6 per cent. A comparison of the number of patients served shows an increase of 46·7 per cent.

I am told that the president and members of the management committee have brought this service, and the need of increased financial support, to the personal attention of the minister and the deputy minister of national health and welfare. Personally I feel, and I know the minister feels, very sympathetic toward this order. I was quite impressed this year when the minister attended the annual meeting and brought his good wishes and every feeling of sympathy toward the order, but that does not carry the order on from the financial standpoint. I feel at this stage that with the increased service which the order has given across Canada, it is definitely entitled to some consideration in the way of an additional grant. I wonder if the minister, after making the statement he did last year, which I believe his predecessor also made, that serious consideration would be given this item, has in fact given it that consideration. If so, why has it not resulted in a larger amount being brought in for this order?

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister not giving an answer?

Mr. MARTIN: The matter is being given active consideration at the moment along with other grants.

Item agreed to.

289. Canadian Red Cross Society, $10,000.

Mr. FLEMING: With regard to all these items, I suppose we may assume that payments were made in accordance with the amounts appropriated?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

290. Grant to Canadian Nurses' Association, $9,719.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the amount?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $46,525; unliquidated commitments, none; total commitments, $46,525.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

291. War charities division administration, $13,412.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the amount?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $27,934.81; unliquidated commitments, $33.09; total commitments, $27,967.90.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

292. Division of voluntary war relief, $7,259.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the amount?

Mr. MARTIN: Expenditures, $13,138.77; unliquidated commitments, none; total commitments, $13,138.77.

I promised my hon. friend that I would give the total departmental expenditures, unliquidated commitments, and total commitments. Expenditures authorized by statute: $321,267,178.61; unliquidated commitments, none; total commitments authorized by statute, the same amount. To be voted: expenditures, $11,889,820.31; unliquidated commitments, $238,853.53; total commitments, $12,128,673.84.

Mr. FLEMING: Will this be the last year that these will be continued as demobilization and reconversion items?

Mr. MARTIN: I expect so.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the house. Tomorrow we shall take up Bill No. 344, to amend the Lord's Day Act; Bill No. 195, to provide for the investigation, conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes; Bill No. 343, to amend the Government Annuities Act. When these have been considered we shall go into committee of supply, taking the estimates of trade and commerce, reconstruction and supply, veterans affairs and agriculture.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Seventh report of the special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Mutch.

QUESTIONS

(Questions to be answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS—UNITED STATES

Mr. TIMMINS:

1. What were the exports from Canada to the United States in each of the years, 1946 and 1947, and for the first four months of 1948?

2. What were the amounts of imports into Canada from the United States in the same respective periods, in terms of foodstuffs, manufactured goods, raw materials and base metals, and all other commodities?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Exports to the United States:

	Canadian Produce	Foreign Produce
Calendar year 1946	$ 887,940,676	$ 20,636,491
Calendar year 1947	1,034,226,394	22,371,174

NOTE—Tables (b) and (c) are not available for the period January to April, 1948. Information compiled on calendar year basis only.

BARLEY—EXPORT PERMITS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. When were export permits for barley first granted in 1948?

2. To date (or any convenient recent date) for how much barley have export permits been granted?

3. Is there any restriction to the granting of these permits? If so, what was the cause of the refusals?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Export permits for barley were first authorized in 1948 on April 1 and the issuance of the first permit under the authorization was approved on April 9.

2. Permits granted since the authorization to June 12, 1948, total 3,853,307-09 bushels.

3. There is an over-all limitation on the exportable quantity, but no applications for barley export permits by authorized dealers, shippers or exporters have been refused since the authorization was granted on April 1.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—CONVICTIONS FOR MILITARY AND CIVIL CRIMES

Mr. PROBE:

1. How many convictions of members of the permanent force—army, navy and air force have there been in the years 1946 and 1947 for crimes punishable by military law?

2. How many convictions have there been for crimes punishable by civil law?

3. In how many of these cases have the persons involved been dismissed from the service?

Mr. LAPOINTE: As the active defence forces were reconstituted on the 1st October, 1946, the period covered by the following reply includes period from 1st October, 1946 to 31st December, 1947.

1. By courts martial: navy, 11; army, 86; air force, 32.

2. By civil authority: navy, 199; army, 52; air force, 90.

3. As a result of sentence by courts martial: navy, none; army, 3; air force, 4.

As a result of conviction by civil power: navy, none; army, 40; air force, 11.

*INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR—CHARGES FOR ELECTRICAL WORK

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have complaints been received from exhibitors at the international trade fair in Toronto as to overcharges for electrical work in the booths, or for other services?

2. If so, who were the exhibitors making such complaints?

3. Who were the auditors in charge?

4. What action does the government propose to take in connection therewith?

Mr. McILRAITH: There have been complaints from a number of exhibitors concerning overcharges for electrical installations in the booths. These were individual contracts made between the exhibitors and the electrical contracting firm. The trade fair authorities have no financial responsibility for them.

[Mr. Winkler.]

As soon as this situation was called to the attention of the trade fair officials, however, they immediately discussed the matter with the electrical firm, who pointed out that there were over 1,000 accounts and their accounting department were not able to cope with the situation. There were some unfortunate discrepancies. The firm is most anxious to make the necessary adjustments, and the exhibitors have been assured that their interests will be protected and appropriate adjustments will be made.

SALARIES ACT

INCREASE IN SALARY OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Salaries Act so as to provide an increase in the salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island from $7,000 to $8,000.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SATURDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, the 19th June, 1948, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the present session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock a.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

He said: May I say in regard to this motion, Mr. Speaker, that it has been presented to the leaders of the various parties and has been approved by all of them. I hope therefore it will carry unanimously.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. FLEMING: On division.

Mr. GILLIS: On division.

Mr. MacKINNON: Carried unanimously.

Motion agreed to.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

FRASER VALLEY—QUESTION OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE—DREDGING AND OTHER HEAVY EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will an announcement be made as to the financial assistance to be given to the Fraser valley flood victims?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I mentioned yesterday that I would shortly be making a further statement in regard to the flooding in the Fraser valley. I cannot say to my hon. friend on what particular day I can give him the information he desires, but a statement will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am afraid I shall not have an opportunity until we go into supply to make a speech, but I will definitely make one then. I will take this opportunity to say something in which I know the Prime Minister will be interested. I have here a picture of a house; I did not own it, but I lived in it for three years. This picture was taken just before the flood reached its peak.

I should like now to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What steps have been taken to secure large dredging and other heavy equipment to rebuild the Fraser valley dikes and reclaim the damaged land?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): The government is considering the question of dredging and rebuilding the dikes on the Fraser river. I understand that a commission was formed by the diking commission within British Columbia, with engineers representing the province and the federal government. As soon as conditions permit, we expect to proceed with the work.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is not the question I asked, Mr. Speaker. I asked what steps had been taken to secure large dredging and other heavy equipment. It may require to be brought in even from Europe. The public of the Fraser valley and British Columbia are not satisfied with answers such as those that have been given now.

CATTLE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT WITH REGARD TO LIFTING EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I desire to address a question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture or to his parliamentary assistant. In view of the uncertainties created by statements in the press as to the lifting of the embargo on beef cattle, is the government yet prepared to make a statement clarifying this matter?

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I have taken note of the question that has been asked by the hon. member for Brant. He can rest assured that when an announcement is made, it will be made in the interests of all concerned.

Mr. KNOWLES: Put him in the cabinet.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture, who has given a delightful answer to a question about the removal of the embargo on cattle. A copy of the Financial Post has just been handed to me, which says that the government will delay decision on lifting the cattle export ban until after the Saskatchewan election and until after the House of Commons adjourns. Is there any basis for the statement contained in this paper?

Mr. McCUBBIN: I have not seen the article mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre, but the government will announce their decision, irrespective of any provincial election, whenever they deem it in the best interests of the country.

ALASKA

PRESS REPORT AS TO BUILDING OF RAILWAY FROM UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or to the appropriate minister. Will the minister make a statement in regard to an announcement in the press to the effect that the United States desire to build a railway from their border up to Alaska, and the part Canada is to take in it?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, the government has no information of any project of the kind.

Mr. IRVINE: I intended to ask the same question, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE ON INLAND WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I inquire from the Minister of Justice if he is in a position this morning to answer the question I asked him yesterday?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I made inquiries, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the situation my hon. friend from Cape Breton South mentioned yesterday. There is a newspaper dispatch indicating that boats will be armed, but how much reliance is to be placed on that statement of intention, I do not know. In the meantime, the division of jurisdiction to which I referred yesterday will be maintained. The federal police will protect federal government property and do their best to prevent trespassing on federal government property and to maintain order on it. Naturally there will be some co-operation between the federal police and the provincial police. But essentially the division of jurisdiction well established by practice will be maintained in the future as it has been in the past, and the federal police will confine their duties to the field I have mentioned. That will be the case until they are requested by the attorney general's department of Ontario to do something further. At that time the request will be given consideration.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Whose responsibility will it be if the companies decide to arm the crews on their ships? Will that be legal under the laws of Canada, and if it is not legal, whose responsibility will it be?

Mr. ILSLEY: The responsibility for the maintenance of order lies with the provincial authorities, not with the federal authorities. As my hon. friend knows, sometimes the provincial authorities find that the situation is a little bit beyond their capacity to deal with, in which event they ask for federal assistance. When that is done, consideration is always given to their request.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Press reports this morning indicate that a request has been made to the government to put a controller in charge of the ships involved in the strike. Is the minister prepared to make a statement?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I make the statement that the government has no power to take over any industry at the present time. We had that power under the War Measures Act, as my hon. friend will remember. I would express the personal opinion that governments should not be in business and take over industry to show our communist friends how to run this country without a House of Commons. That is no reflection on my hon. friend.

Mr. MacINNIS: They will soon be taking you over.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

SALMON FISHERY

PROHIBITION OF EXPORT OF FROZEN SOCKEYES, PINKS AND CHUMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT W. MAYHEW (Minister of Fisheries): I wish to refer, Mr. Speaker, to a matter of significant importance to the salmon fishing and processing industry of British Columbia.

It will be recalled that the government has been concerned since last fall with the situation facing the salmon canning industry in 1948, as a result of the withdrawal of export controls on certain species of salmon. To give effect to the representations of the fishermen, co-operatives, and canners, the government announced, on April 8, that effective as of that date British Columbia fishermen would be permitted to export, without restriction, raw spring salmon—export of fresh cohoe salmon was also permitted, but only up to September 1 of this year—and that fresh sockeyes, pinks and chums would be retained in Canada for processing.

It was indicated at the time that the policy of the government sought to retain for processing in Canada those species of salmon normally canned and that the plan was a compromise between the different interests; further, that the plan indicated flexibility in the event of changing conditions.

From information received during the past few weeks from the Pacific coast, it appears evident there is a distinct possibility that large quantities of sockeyes, pinks and chums will be frozen and exported, thus defeating the original plan. This would have had the effect of depriving the canning industry in British Columbia of considerable quantities of raw material, which would result in curtailed operations and loss of direct employment in the canneries, and indirectly cause loss to many ancillary industries.

In view of these changed conditions it has been found desirable and necessary for the government to extend its policy of affording safeguards to both fishermen and management in the salmon canning industry of British Columbia. Accordingly, an amendment has been made to order in council, P.C. 1521, effective immediately, that sockeyes, pinks and chums in a frozen condition will not be permitted to be exported. However, after September 1 of this year frozen chums may be exported.

The combination of the two plans will, I am informed, be quite acceptable to both the fishermen and the operators in British Columbia. It will have the effect of giving additional force to the submissions of the fishermen, co-operatives and operators, namely the retention in Canada for processing of species of salmon which normally are canned. At the same time, the normal export trade in fresh spring and cohoe salmon will be unchanged; likewise in the case of frozen cohoes and fall-caught chums after September 1, the normal past trade will not be interfered with.

Mr. PEARKES: May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries? It was very difficult to hear his announcement in this end of the chamber. I understand that the export of raw and frozen salmon is no longer permitted. Have contracts been signed between the fishermen and the packers on these terms?

Mr. MAYHEW: So far as I know, no contracts have as yet been signed between the fishermen and the packers. The announcement I made today will further protect both the fishermen and the packers.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries a question. Will the export of frozen chums be on the quota basis under this change of policy? Is there also a change in policy so far as the export of raw fish livers is concerned?

Mr. MAYHEW: There is no change of policy in this announcement. All the policy does is to prohibit the export of frozen fish which in the fresh state is ordinarily intended for canning purposes.

Mr. ISNOR: In view of the statement made by the Minister of Fisheries regarding west coast fisheries, will he consider the elimination of the clause relating to the moisture content of codfish on the Canadian eastern coast?

Mr. MAYHEW: I shall look into it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BASEBALL GAME BETWEEN MEMBERS AND PRESS GALLERY JUNE 16

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is custodian of the nation's health and well-being? What liniment does he recommend for broken-down baseball players of the press gallery and the House of Commons?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In answer I would say that old men should not play young people's games.

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance when he expects to bring down the supplementary estimates. The house is supposed to close a week from tomorrow.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I hope to bring them down not later than the middle of next week.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN—SURRENDER OF INDIAN LANDS ON PIAPOT RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): On the 20th of May a series of questions of mine on the Piapot Indian reserve were passed as an order for return. This is the 17th of June. It should not take a month to answer these questions. They were all plain and simple. I should like to have an answer.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to look into the question for the hon. gentleman and see whether an answer can be brought down.

COARSE GRAINS

QUESTION OF DATE OF ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement reported to have been made yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is in Saskatchewan, that the supplementary payments of six and eleven cents will be made on oats and barley, when will this house be officially informed of the amount of these payments, and will the payments go forward before June 24?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the statement referred to by my hon. friend. I shall be glad to look it up and consider the situation.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made in the arrangements for the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in London?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I shall have to ask my hon. friend to allow the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to answer this question.

Mr. GRAYDON: I did not think the Prime Minister took a back seat to anybody.

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

MR. LACOMBE—EXPRESSION OF CONGRATULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Today, this 17th day of June, we must acknowledge that it is the birthday of our friend, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains. He is a prospective judge. He has been here a long time. He is a gentleman; he is learned in the law, and he is liked by all his colleagues. I wish him a happy birthday, and I congratulate him on his appointment to the bench, which will take place shortly. I wish him the very best.

Mr. MAURICE HARTT (Cartier): I should like to join the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat in congratulating the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains on his birthday and wishing him many happy returns of the day, and also on his appointment to the bench. From my point of view and from my experience he was a born judge. I owe him this gratitude because in the last election in Cartier, when he was asked to come and speak for my opponent, he was judge enough to say no, that a Liberal member should be elected for that division. I am also grateful to the Premier of Quebec for having taken the hon. member out of the political arena and placing him in a position where he can show his qualities and his aptitude and his service to the province.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I join with the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in congratulating the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains. He will be much missed for his humour and all-round showmanship. I wish him well in his new duties.

LORD'S DAY ACT

AMENDMENTS AS TO LEAVE TO PROSECUTE—REPEAL OF ONTARIO PRE-CONFEDERATION STATUTE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 344, to amend the Lord's Day Act.

Mr. FLEMING: Before I say a word or two on this subject may I ask the Minister of Justice whether it is his intention to explain the purpose and effect of the bill, and to deal with a question which I think will be of interest to the house, namely, whether there has been—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. members not to interrupt and to maintain silence in the chamber. It is impossible to hear the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. FLEMING: I would ask the minister if it is his intention to make a statement now on the effect of the bill, particularly on this question, which I believe at this stage will be of greatest interest to the house: Is this bill introduced at the request of the government or legislature of Ontario, the province chiefly affected?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, section 1 of the bill has been requested by the government of Quebec, and section 2 by the government of Ontario. The Department of Justice sees no objection to either section, nor do I. Therefore the bill is introduced.

Mr. FLEMING: When were those requests made?

Mr. ILSLEY: During the past twelve months, and I think on more than one occasion. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has also suggested that section 1 would constitute an important amendment, and one which could be considered desirable. The hon. member wrote me to that effect, and I believe I have correctly expressed his view in the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. Mr. Speaker, if I am permitted—

Mr. FLEMING: I thought I had the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Eglinton wishes to question the minister, I suggest that he wait until we reach the committee stage.

Mr. FLEMING: I merely asked the minister if it was his intention to make a statement on the bill. He made his statement, and I thought I was to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules, hon. members may not speak more than once on a second reading. I suggest that if the hon. member has questions to ask, he wait until we reach the committee stage. The hon. member for Temiscouata has the floor.

Mr. FLEMING: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say I did not speak; I simply asked the minister if he would make a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member wishes to look at the rules of the house he will see that they are as I have stated them.

Mr. FLEMING: May I remind Your Honour of the remarks I made a moment ago.

When I rose to speak on second reading I said that if the minister had a statement to make I was prepared to stand aside, and then to follow him. The minister has made his statement. Shall I not now have the opportunity to speak? What I said should not be considered as a speech on second reading.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I still believe the hon. member is considered as having spoken, if we are to abide by the rules. If, however, it is the pleasure of the house to give unanimous consent, he may proceed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree.

Mr. GRAYDON: There should be no need for unanimous consent. Surely the hon. member only asked a question of the minister. That has been done in the house year after year, session after session, for a long time, as long as I can remember. Surely what the hon. member has said should not be interpreted as a speech on second reading. It has never been done before, and I am sure Your Honour would not wish to create a precedent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think hon. members would be satisfied to have the hon. member proceed.

Mr. GRAYDON: So long as it is not on the basis of unanimous consent.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to ask any indulgence at all from my colleagues in the house, because I do not believe in doing that. In what I say I shall be brief.

The statement the minister has made clears up the point I had in mind. Section 1 of the bill is of general interest to all the provinces of Canada, while the other section is of particular interest to Ontario. The minister has indicated that the second section is introduced at the request of the government of Ontario. This being so, we can safely leave it to the legislature of Ontario to take whatever course may be considered necessary to fill any gap there may be in the legislative field when the repealing sections of the present bill take effect.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, if I am permitted I should like to stand by the minister, because I mentioned this matter to him.

Here is what happened. The Lord's Day Act is strict in its terms. It was passed a long time ago. It forbids the sale of canned goods or pop on Sundays. When a complaint is lodged against an accused person for the sale of two cans of tomatoes and two cans of corn niblets, or a bottle of pop, heretofore permission to take action had to be signed by the attorney general himself. He could not delegate his power. This is an imposition on an attorney general, whether he be from Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba or Nova Scotia. Attorneys general are busy men, but under the present provisions of the act they have to do this clerical work. The deputy attorneys general of the provinces could do that work.

I mentioned this matter to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) because many attorneys general, including Sir Lomer Gouin, Mr. Taschereau, Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Conant, who were very busy men, found it difficult to see other people at times owing to the fact that they were busy approving complaints for the prosecution of people who had sold canned goods or pop on Sunday. Surely we should have a greater sense of proportion than that.

This is a purely clerical procedure. Attorneys general must trust their deputies sufficiently to have that work done by them. I commend the minister for correcting some of these obsolete provisions in the law for the benefit of the country at large.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Leave to prosecute.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: For years the law has been that the consent of an attorney general must be secured as a condition precedent to the commencement of an action. The change made here, as I see it, is a necessary and proper one. I can see no reason why a deputy attorney general should not be able to act in the place and stead of an attorney general in a matter such as this. What was the reason originally given for the requirement that no prosecution could be taken without the consent of an attorney general? It places the administration of the act strictly within the conscience of the attorney general of the province who for the time being occupies that position. It denies or might deny equality of administration and enforcement of the law in all parts of Canada. When the minister is giving his explanation I should like him to say whether or not he considers that the provision requiring the consent of the attorney general in all cases should be abrogated.

Mr. McMASTER: Have requests to attorneys general ever been refused, and, if so, by whom and when?

Mr. ILSLEY: I assume that the reason why some discretion is vested in the attorney general is that some of the offences against the Lord's Day Act might be trivial or might be justifiable in a real sense. I heard of an instance in one of the provinces where a farmer was prosecuted for doing some farm work on Sunday at a time when almost anyone would say that it was justified. The Lord's Day Act of Canada provides that such prosecution cannot be instituted without the consent of the attorney general. The pre-confederation statute in Ontario does not provide for the consent of the attorney general and therefore such a prosecution could and did take place. As the hon. member for Temiscouata said, some violations might be so trivial that it would be undesirable to place the possibility of instituting prosecutions in the hands of an ill-disposed neighbour or a competitor or something of that kind.

This is one of a set of sections in our law which vests this discretion in the attorney general. There are a number of sections in the criminal code providing that certain prosecutions cannot be instituted without the consent of the attorney general of the province. The principle of those provisions was discussed when I introduced last year the amendment to the criminal code dealing with habitual offenders. The hon. member for Lake Centre may remember that a person cannot be charged with being an habitual offender without the consent of the attorney general of the province. A similar provision was inserted this year in the section dealing with criminal sexual psychopaths, but was deleted at the instance of this house. There are many sections to be found in the criminal code, and perhaps in other statutes of Canada, which vest in the attorney general of the province, and in some cases in the attorney general of Canada, the discretion of preventing prosecution by withholding consent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are there many prosecutions under the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I could not give my hon. friend a list of them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is practically nothing done.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes, there are many hundreds.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the minister had any correspondence with the province of Ontario as to this bill, and who asked for it? I agree that there should be a repeal of the pre-confederation statute. The Lord's Day Act contains many provisions with regard to what should not be done on the Lord's day. By this Bill No. 344, the federal government is divesting itself of all control over the Lord's day. We are going through difficult days. It is the 108th day of the session before this important bill is brought before the house.

Our proceedings for the past ten days have shown the need of a committee to consider legal bills of this kind. They have had such committees in a number of the provinces for years. These legal bills are being brought up in the dying days of the session, and such a committee could hear deputations on important bills of this kind. When this matter came up in our city some years ago with regard to Sunday street cars a vote of the people was taken. I do not know how they got along in those days without cars; they certainly could not get along today without them.

I look on this bill as divesting the federal authority of all control over the day of rest. It is now being left to the attorneys general of the provinces or the deputy attorneys general of the provinces. The deputy attorney general is a ministerial officer who carries out the instructions of his minister. In some provinces they have wide open Sundays when you can do anything you like.

I believe this is a local question. In our own city they recently opened up the parks on Sunday. Some people are for it and some are against it. This is a question which should be left to the people to decide. I do not think the federal government should divest itself of all control over this statute. The attorney general of Ontario represents the riding of the hon. member for Eglinton.

I believe that this is a local question and that the federal government should not turn over the execution and administration of this act to the provinces. It is being left to the attorneys general or the deputy attorneys general of the provinces, and their consent is necessary to prosecute. You are going to have nine different views as to what should be done across Canada. There should be some federal contribution with regard to these legal matters. We do not enforce any federal laws. The enforcement is a matter for the provincial attorney general, who just turns it over to the local municipal police. They get nothing for it. There are hundreds of thousands of orders in council, we are passing statutes every day and when the deputy attorney general of the province says so, the municipal police are supposed to act.

The time has come when we should either administer and enforce the federal laws or give grants to the municipalities to do these things. I believe the matter of Sunday observance is something to be decided by the people in the local communities. On the 108th day of the session we have ceased to function in such matters as are dealt with in this bill, under our committee system. No deputations have been heard on this matter, and I believe they should have been heard before this important amendment passes the House of Commons.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister indicated that section 1 was being introduced at the request of the government of the province of Quebec and section 2 at the request of the government of the province of Ontario. Were other governments consulted about other sections?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they were not. It would have been more accurate if I had said, at the request of the attorney general of the province of Quebec and at the request of the attorney general of the province of Ontario. I have no reason to think that the request was embodied in any privy council minute or order in council of those provinces. The attorney general of Quebec would like the first section passed, and the attorney general of Ontario would like the second section passed. The other provinces were not consulted.

Mr. FLEMING: I cannot see that there is anything very serious involved in the first section. I understand that after section 16 came into force there were some who thought for a time that leave could be given in the name of the attorney general of the province by the deputy attorney general. It was not until 1910 that the point was determined by the Supreme Court of Canada in re Criminal Code, 43 Supreme Court Reports, 434, that the leave contemplated by section 16 could not be given by the deputy attorney general of the province. The change now embodied in section 16 seems to be reasonable and not very important.

Mr. POULIOT: The act could be entitled an act for the relief of the attorneys general.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Repeal.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I sent out to get the statute that is being repealed, and it is a most interesting act, passed in Britain in 1781. Why we should be repealing that act I do not know, nor can I see what application it has to present-day conditions. Perhaps I might read the preamble, which is in old English:

> Whereas certain houses, rooms, or places, within the cities of London or Westminster, or in the neighbourhood thereof, have of late frequently been opened for public entertainment or amusement upon the evening of the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday; and at other houses, rooms, or places, within the said cities, or in the neighbourhood thereof, under pretence of inquiring into religious doctrines, and explaining texts of holy scripture, debates have frequently been held on the evening of the Lord's day, concerning divers texts of holy scripture, by persons unlearned and incompetent to explain the same, to the corruption of good morals, and to the great encouragement of irreligion and profaneness; be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, . . . that, from and after the passing of this present act, any house, room, or other place, which shall be opened or used for public entertainment or amusement, or for publicly debating on any subject whatsoever, upon any part of the Lord's day called Sunday, and to which persons shall be admitted by the payment of money, or by tickets sold for money, shall be deemed a disorderly house or place.

It provides that the penalty shall be £100. I cannot see how this act applies to Canada, because it has particular reference to the cities of London and Westminster and in the neighbourhood thereof.

Mr. ILSLEY: The local references are only in the preamble.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It also provides for forfeiture and the like. Has this act been in effect, and is there any authority for it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not pay much attention to these pre-confederation statutes. I presume that by an act, perhaps an act passed about 1790 or 1791, the law of England was brought into and became part of the law of Upper Canada. I doubt whether this old English act is part of the law of any of the other provinces. I do not know about that; it is a very interesting line of inquiry. But the principle of this bill is to make only the Lord's Day Act of the Dominion of Canada apply in the province of Ontario, and therefore the provisions of pre-confederation statutes did not concern me very much. Another statute, one other than the British statute to which my hon. friend has referred, is repealed by this bill, and that is an act of Upper Canada, 1859, which I presume would not be quite as archaic as the one to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. CHURCH: As I understand it, chapter 21, George III, 1781, was amended by the statute known as the Constitutional Act of 1791, which amended all imperial statutes. The act referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre, chapter 21 of George III, 1781, was amended in the two provinces and only so much of the British law was adopted as was applicable to our circumstances in Canada. Is that not correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that that is so. I have not looked at the textbooks on these questions for I think thirty years. But the general principle as I remember it—I may simply be revealing my own ignorance—is that in the common law provinces the common law of Great Britain applies unless it is clearly inapplicable. The statutory law also applies unless it is clearly inapplicable. The Constitutional Act brought in, if my memory is correct, certain parts of the statute law of Great Britain, and apparently it did bring in this act preventing the profanation of the Lord's day. The principles would be as applicable in Ontario, I assume, as they would be in the neighbourhood of Westminster, and the act was probably brought in as part of the law of Ontario.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is the minister expressing any views of the government on this subject?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I regard Sunday observance as a very important part of the law, though I do not hold the extreme views on Sunday observation that some people do. I want to ask this question. Are we not by this bill repealing what is a substantial part of the law of Ontario now with regard to Sunday observance, or is the bill repealing only something which is archaic and no longer applicable? The member for Lake Centre has read an amusing extract from the British statute. There may be others which are not so amusing or so archaic. But my question is—and I regard it as important: does this bill make a substantial change with respect to Sunday observance in Ontario, and if so, are we not doing it rather lightly?

Mr. ILSLEY: By this act the control of prosecutions is being vested in the attorney general of Ontario. Under pre-confederation statutes spiteful neighbours or ill-disposed competitors or any other members of the public could lay charges for offences no matter how trivial, and nobody could stop them. Now by the Lord's Day Act the attorney general has some control over prosecutions. All that this bill does is to put Ontario in the same position as every other province in Canada except Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia there is an unrepealed pre-confederation statute, and if the attorney general of that province requested us to introduce a bill to repeal that statute, consideration would be given to his request just as it was given to the request of the attorney general of Ontario. The attorney general of Ontario saw me personally in this matter and requested that this act be passed.

My hon. friend asks whether there is any substantial loosening of the control over activities on the Lord's day. That is a hard question to answer, but there would not seem to be anything very serious here, because the code in Ontario will now be the code that is in existence in every province of Canada, with the exception of Nova Scotia, that is to say, the Lord's Day Act. In Nova Scotia there is, in addition to the Lord's Day Act, the pre-confederation statute to which I have referred.

In the Lord's Day Act itself power is given to the legislature of every province to authorize certain activities, and it might very well be that the province of Ontario was bound by these pre-confederation statutes to a greater extent than it will be bound by the Lord's Day Act of Canada. But I doubt whether there is anything very serious about that. In any event, if there is any authorization in Ontario in respect of activities in the future on the Lord's day, it must be by action of the legislature of that province, and within the limits set out in the Lord's Day Act itself.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the minister to answer the question I asked?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Eglinton has the floor.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Broadview did ask a question a while ago.

Mr. CHURCH: What are we in committee for if we cannot get an answer?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that I am trying to have discussion directed from all parts of the chamber.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member asked me whether the government has any views on the observance of the Lord's day. I am very accommodating, many people think too much so, in airing my personal views, but I do not think they are relevant to this bill.

Mr. CHURCH: I look on this measure as simply establishing an open Sunday for the whole of Canada. There is no enforcement of the law in Canada. It is left to the attorney general or the deputy attorney general of the province, which means that by this bill there is no federal authority in the enforcement of the act. This is the only statute which is left to the provinces for enforcement. Why does not the federal authority enforce its own federal laws? Why is this act singled out as the only federal statute which the provinces directly must enforce? I say to the minister, why do you not enforce all other federal laws?

Mr. FLEMING: I sought to take part in the debate a few minutes ago in an endeavour to answer one or two questions which had been raised. The hon. member for Lake Centre raised the question whether the imperial act of 1781 is in effect in Ontario. The Ontario courts ruled in 1880 that it was in effect in the province. I refer to the case of Rex v. Barnes, 1880, 45 Upper Canada Queen's Bench reports, 276, where that question was raised, and the court determined that the imperial act of 1781 was in effect in the province of Ontario.

I need not weary the committee by reviewing all the stages by which that came about, but it goes back to proclamations of the eighteenth century. The English law as of October 15, 1792, was adopted as the law of Ontario except as repealed, altered, varied, modified, or affected by any act of the imperial parliament still having the force of law in Ontario or any act of the late province of Upper Canada or of the province of Canada or of the province of Ontario still having the force of law in Ontario. That is the law of Ontario today, as set out in the Ontario statutes. Historically the laws of England, civil and criminal, were supposed to be introduced into Canada by royal proclamation of October 7, 1763. The criminal law was not displaced by the Quebec Act of 1774, 14 Geo. III chapter 83, but was continued in the province of Upper Canada. The legislature of the province, by the act of 1792, 32 George III, chapter 1, provided that in matters of property and civil rights the laws of England should prevail. In 1800, apparently for greater caution, the act 40 George III, chapter 1 (Upper Canada) provided that "the criminal law of England as it stood on the 17th day of September, 1792", should be the criminal law of the province. The date September 17, 1792, was the date of the first of the legislature in that year; and, according to the existing law, the statutes of the session took effect as of the first day of the session.

That is how this old act of 1781 came to be part of the law of Upper Canada, and that was not changed by the Constitutional Act of 1841. When confederation became effective, no right was reserved to the new provincial legislature to modify the old pre-confederation law.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario raised the question whether this is a matter of substance or not. I think a word might be said further on that. The fact is that the legislature of Ontario some years after confederation sought to pass legislation on the subject of Sunday observance. That legislation incidentally is in many respects comparable in terms to the old imperial legislation. This act to which I am referring was enacted in the reign of Queen Victoria, and it was carried forward into the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1897, chapter 246.

The test of the jurisdiction of the provinces went to the privy council in the year 1903 in the case of the Attorney General of Ontario v. the city of Hamilton Street Railway, 1903 Appeal Cases, pages 524. The privy council determined that the provincial legislatures had no power to pass such legislation, holding that the law with respect to Sunday observance falls within the jurisdiction of parliament to legislate in respect of the criminal law; and consequently, the legislature of the province of Ontario has had no general jurisdiction over Sunday observance except in so far as scope is given to the legislatures of the provinces by the federal statute, the Lord's Day Act.

The statute that is now being amended is the Lord's Day Act, chapter 123 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. In taking the step that is involved in section 2, it does not seem to me that anything is being done that need give any member of the house reason for pause. The principal law of this country with reference to Sunday observance is today, and will continue to be under the bill before us, the federal statute, the Lord's Day Act. For more than a generation the enforcement of the act has been left by federal legislation in the hands of the attorneys general of the provinces.

Having regard to the fact that there is considerable divergence of usage in the matter of Sunday observance in different parts of Canada, I do not see what serious objection should be raised to the principle of section 16 of this act, that enforcement should be left largely in the hands of the provinces. The attorneys general of the provinces, as the chief law enforcement officers, are the persons, in my opinion, best qualified to take responsibility in matters of enforcement of the Lord's Day Act. In enacting this present bill it seems to me that we are not displacing any substantive law that is vital today. We are simply removing legislation that would not be enforced today by any attorney general in any province. We are bringing our laws in some measure up to date.

Mr. McMASTER: During the past fifty years we have seen the executive taking over the powers of legislation, practically taking unto themselves power to introduce nearly all our legislation and to force their followers to vote for it. Now they are going into the judicial sphere, the third main branch of our government. It is true that for some time the consent of the attorney general has been required. But there is no doubt that clause 2—and I think that is the clause with which we are dealing now—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: —is intended to keep in the hands of the attorney general of Ontario at least, because it is the only province to which it refers, the power to decide when a prosecution is to be instituted with regard to the desecration of Sunday. Every argument used by the Minister of Justice as to prosecutions under the Lord's Day Act could be equally applicable to any other act. That is, anybody who thinks that anyone else has broken the law of the country can institute a prosecution, and it is only proper that he should. If the magistrate thinks that the act is one which does not justify prosecution, he can refuse to allow an information to be laid or if the matter goes on and it is found that it was instituted in a manner that was blameworthy, it may be a matter of malicious prosecution.

I submit again that every argument advanced by the Minister of Justice for the passage of this act is equally applicable to any other prosecution under the criminal code. I do not think we should pass this bill. I do not think the attorney general of each province should be the arbiter of what prosecution should be instituted.

Attorneys general change. The attorney general is a part of the executive. This is just carrying on this principle to which we have been objecting in this house on many occasions, that the executive has taken charge of the government of this country, and that the people, and even parliament, are being pushed aside. I shall oppose this bill.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. McMASTER: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. McMASTER: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

INVESTIGATION, CONCILIATION AND SETTLEMENT OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 195, to provide for the investigation, conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes (as amended).

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

[Mr. McMaster.]

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. WINKLER: I should like to move an amendment to subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (i) of subsection 1 of section 2. That paragraph reads as follows:

(ii) A member of the medical, dental, architectural, engineering or legal profession qualified to practise under the laws of a province and employed in that capacity . . .

The result of the amendment would be merely to add the word "dietitian". There are in Canada some 650 trained dietitians who are united in an organization called the Canadian Dietetic Association. Two or three weeks ago they met in Montreal and passed certain resolutions, and it was unanimously requested that they be excluded from the operation of this act along with those other professional people mentioned. I do not wish to misinterpret or give incorrect information as to what the reasons were for refusal by the committee on industrial relations; but if I am correct, it was largely because if dietitians were brought into the section the committee felt they would also have to include nurses. Rather than carry that idea into effect, they decided not to include dietitians.

The dietitians wrote to the committee on industrial relations on May 17 of this year. I have in my hand a copy of their letter, and I should like to read merely the opening and closing paragraphs. The opening paragraph reads as follows:

The Canadian Dietetic Association strongly urges that dietitians should be included with those other professional groups such as the medical, dental, architectural, engineering and legal professions, the members of which are excluded from the definition or "employees" under the terms of paragraph 1, section 2 (i) 2 of Bill No. 195 presently under consideration by your committee and this for the reasons hereinafter set forth.

Then they set forth a number of reasons and the concluding paragraph reads:

For the foregoing reasons, the Canadian Dietetic Association submits that your committee should accede to the present request and amend Bill No. 195 so as to establish clearly that dietitians are excluded from the operation of the act as is the case with members of other professions whose training requirements and the scope of whose work are on a similar level.

The reason submitted by the committee was, I understand, a purely negative one. Had this been the United States of America, where similar legislation operates under the Taft-Hartley Act, the request would have received a positive interpretation. I have before me a synopsis of U.S. 3020, which is from the Taft-Hartley Act, and I should like to quote these positive reasons:

Term "professional employee" means (S2 12):
(a) any employee engaged in work.
(i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine, mental, manual, mechanical or physical work;
(ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance.
(iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time;
(iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institute of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual or physical processes; or
(b) any employee, who:
(i) has completed the courses of specialized intellectual instruction and study prescribed in clause (iv) of paragraph (a), and
(ii) is performing related work under the supervision of a professional person to qualify himself to become a professional employee as defined in paragraph (a).

I maintain that if this proposed amendment carries it will not prejudice the position of any of those who wish to be included in this section, or of those who desire not to be included. As an organization, the dietitians maintain that they are professional people. They had a certain dignity which they wish to have recognized, and they are anxious to be placed in a position where they may command the respect of other professional people. For these reasons, and especially because of the positive request which they make, which in my opinion would not prejudice any professional group, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince:

That section 2, subsection 1, paragraph (i), subparagraph (ii) be amended by inserting the word "dietitian" immediately after the word "medical."

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I should say right away that I cannot accept the amendment.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. MITCHELL: To begin with, if the bill is amended it should be after consideration. This is one of the requests which have come in later. Federally we have not much jurisdiction. Dietitians come under the law of the provinces. They do not stand in the same class as the professions of engineering, architecture, dentistry, medicine and the like. I should think that if an amendment of this kind were necessary it should be done by the provinces where the jurisdiction lies.

May I say to my hon. friend that I am not greatly impressed by quotations from the Taft-Hartley measure; I am not greatly impressed by the words "dignity" or "intellectual." All the brains or intellect are not on one side of the street. I think we would be well advised to keep the section just as it is. If necessary we can take another look at it later in the light of the circumstances as they develop. I think that is the best course to pursue.

Mr. FRASER: Why in the first draft of the bill that was sent out—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is the hon. member dealing with the amendment?

Mr. FRASER: No.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us deal with the amendment.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am happy to be able to support the Minister of Labour in this matter. There are too many exclusions already, and I do not believe we should add any more. Later on I am going to move an amendment to the same section to restore something that was deleted.

As the minister pointed out, if the provinces adopt this bill as it is, or with modifications, as their labour code, they can insert or leave this profession out, as the case may be. We are unduly restricting those who may be included in this section.

Mr. SKEY: As was pointed out in the committee, this section is so worded that difficulties similar to that of the dietitians are bound to arise and will continue to arise. There is already before the government the case, I believe it is, of the chemical engineers. The government should consider the redrafting of this section so that there will not be continuous applications from any number of groups to be included as professionals. This situation will continue so long as the section reads the way it does. It seems to me it might have been much better to leave out subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (i) and say: "'employee' means a person employed to do skilled or unskilled manual, clerical or technical work", and leave it at that. That would be much better than to have a section in the bill which would be a constant cause of friction.

Amendment (Mr. Winkler) negatived.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have an amendment to make to subparagraph (i) of paragraph (i) of subsection 1 of section 2. I move that after the word "capacity" the words "in matters relating to labour relations" be reinstated.

Mr. CROLL: The bill that we have before us was printed on April 6. The amendments that were made in committee are not included in the new bill which was handed out today. Will the minister, in each case, give us the amendments made by the committee so that we shall know exactly what we are dealing with? The minister is now moving to reinstate words which are in the bill as it is before us. Perhaps the committee of the whole does not know that they were struck out by the committee which considered the bill. If the minister would do that, it would be useful.

Mr. KNOWLES: Or the chairman could point it out.

Mr. CASE: We should have copies of the amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL: The subparagraph reads:

A manager or superintendent, or any other person who, in the opinion of the board, exercises management functions or is employed in a confidential capacity . . .

The committee struck out the words "in matters relating to labour relations." I am moving that these words be put back in.

Mr. ADAMSON: This matter was discussed in the committee and the amendment was carried by the committee. The government is reversing the decision of the committee in this matter. The committee approved the deletion; why has the government changed its mind?

Mr. MITCHELL: There was general agreement on the definition of "employee" prior to its going to the committee. I have expressed this opinion before. We have had a great deal of difficulty with the language of this section. Wherever it has been drafted there has always been difficulty. In human institutions you have to place a measure of trust in the people whom you appoint to a board. I am convinced of this, and I know that my legal friends will agree with me. Where you have a board made up of individuals such as we have, and as they have in several provinces, representative of industry and labour, with an impartial chairman, the conclusion reached was that this was about the best language that could be used in the circumstances. There has been no serious objection to it. If we attempted to draft a bill which included what everyone wanted it would be a poor looking document.

So far as I know we have had no difficulty in the national board, nor do I know of any serious difficulties in the provincial boards. They have decided who was an employee within the meaning of P.C. 1003. After the study we gave the matter I am convinced that no serious difficulty would arise in connection with the definition of "employee."

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Perhaps I might give an example. On the railways are section foremen who have been members of trade unions for the last fifty years. The conductor on a train has complete control, because he has charge of the train. He takes and gives orders. Then, in a small industry you may find someone who is called a foreman, and whose position would be the equivalent of a superintendent or executive in a larger industry. The only rule one can lay down is the rule of common sense as applied to the industry concerned. The language must be broad enough to enable it to be properly interpreted by men of intelligence. I know we have such men on the national board, and I can say we also have them on the provincial boards. In the light of the language of the section I am prepared to accept their judgment in the matter.

Mr. ADAMSON: These words were not in P.C. 1003, and I understand it worked satisfactorily so far as the definition of employee is concerned. I have felt, and I still feel, that this would place a restriction on the powers and judgment of the board, because it is confining and restrictive. That is the reason I was opposed to it in committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: Here again I am glad to be of the same mind as the Minister of Labour. I had prepared an amendment restoring these words to the section, but I am glad I did not have to move it. I know that in the house the minister's endorsation carries much more weight than mine. Two of the central labour bodies are anxious to have this section remain as it was originally drafted. The minister shows good judgment in taking action to restore the bill to its original form, and I am pleased to support it.

Mr. SKEY: I share the minister's hope that the section may operate as well as he expects. However, I find myself slightly confused by his argument, because all he said about common sense and broad language if taken logically would apply equally to the deletion of these words so as to permit the board to operate without being confined. If he wishes to trust the board, as he has said, and not to bind it too closely, his argument is certainly more effective for the deletion of the words than for their inclusion.

Mr. MITCHELL: The language is based upon the board's experience in the administration of P.C. 1003. That was their general approach to the problem in connection with the definition of "employee".

Mr. SKEY: The hon. member for York West has pointed out that they were not in P.C. 1003.

Mr. MITCHELL: But it was the practice in matters related to labour relations. That is the way the board approached the matter. Let me say this about the national board, that I do not know a better one—and what I say applies equally to employers and employees. I do not know of an abler board, and I have known the members personally since I joined the ministry, and before. I believe the interests of employers are well protected by men like Mr. Harry Taylor, Mr. E. R. Complin, Mr. A. J. Hills, and Mr. Albert Deschamps, as are those of employees by Mr. A. R. Mosher, Mr. W. L. Best, Mr. J. A. D'Aoust and Mr. Gerard Picard.

Mr. SKEY: The minister is indeed fortunate to have such a good board, because this legislation will not help them much.

Amendment agreed to on division.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I draw the attention of the committee to paragraph (r) on page 3, where the committee added the words, "but shall not include any employer-dominated organization."

Mr. MacINNIS: I have something further to say on section 2(1) (i) (ii). As the subparagraph was originally drafted, and as it appears in the bill, it read:

(ii) A member of the medical, dental, architectural, engineering or legal profession qualified to practise under the laws of a province and employed in that capacity.

The committee had many representations respecting this section. Most of the discussions dealt with the word "engineering". I move—

That the word "engineering" in the second line of subparagraph (ii) of section 2 be deleted.

In industry today large numbers of employees are described as engineers. While some of these are in a managerial capacity, most of them are ordinary employees in mass production.

Mr. CASE: Since we have no copies of the amendments made in committee, and we have had evidence of the methods employed by the minister to reinstate certain words, would it not be better to deal with the sections as they appear here and then move the amendments from the committee as we go along? We would then have something before us, while under the present plan we do not know what we are doing, because the amendments made by the committee do not appear in the bill.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I shall read the amendment as moved in committee when each section is called. Hon. members will then have the amendments before them.

Mr. JOHNSTON: We had a lengthy discussion in committee as to whether the word "engineering" should be deleted, and it was decided to leave it in. I agree with the amendment that has been moved, in view of the fact that there are some 1,100 active engineers who desire to come under this legislation. In my view it is wrong to exclude them. I take that view because this is supposed to be labour legislation for all of Canada, and any labour or other group has the right to come under the legislation if it so desires. By leaving in this word we definitely exclude from the benefits of this legislation 1,100 people who consider themselves employees. I take the view that even if a number of doctors employed by companies desire to have the protection of this labour code, they should not be barred from the right to enter into union agreements with the company.

When we include this word "engineering" in the bill we are without question depriving 1,100 employees of the right to enter into agreements with the companies for which they work. In my view that is not good legislation, nor is it sound judgment. If the other engineers do not wish to come under this legislation, they are not compelled to do so; but if this word were taken out it would permit those who desire to come under the legislation to do so. I do not think we should go so far as to compel people to forgo the protection of this legislation, and for that reason I am in favour of the amendment.

Mr. FRASER: When the original draft was sent to the members the word "engineering" had been written in over the top of the word "architectural". Why was that done?

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is speaking of last year's bill. The word "engineering" is in this year's bill. It was put in after representations had been made by representative organizations. I think it is fair to say that in the committee there was more discussion over this word "engineering" than over anything else, and more representations were made about it. After the matter was discussed it was decided that it should remain in the bill.

I do not want to go over all the arguments that were used in the committee. The engineering organizations spoke for the engineers. It is all very well for the hon. member to say that he takes a certain view about doctors, but I think the doctors have a right to speak for themselves. National and other organizations expressed their views, and as a result it was decided that the word "engineering" should remain in the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: I was a member of the committee and heard all the discussions, but a number of members of this house who are now considering this section did not have an opportunity to hear those arguments. I think the matter is of sufficient importance that at least some of the pertinent points should be brought out. I am not going to repeat what was said by the hon. member for Bow River, because I agree with everything he has said.

I would point out that there is nothing compulsory in the bill. If it applied to doctors, lawyers, engineers and what have you, the first thing they would have to do would be to conform with the mechanics of the bill, form a trade union, get certification and all the rest of it. If they did not want to do that, there is nothing in the bill that compels them to.

There are two classifications of engineers. There is the engineer who is an employee, and there is the engineer at the managerial level. In effect the one is the boss of the other. My understanding of the representations that were made for the exclusion of engineers from this bill is that they were made by those at the managerial level. During the war engineers were permitted to form collective bargaining organizations under P.C. 1003 and come within the scope of that legislation.

As the hon. member for Bow River suggested, there are 1,100 employee engineers who have formed collective bargaining organizations and now have collective bargaining agreements with their employers. If we exclude engineers from this legislation we wipe out the bargaining rights of 1,100 people who have said that they want them because they have made collective bargaining agreements under P.C. 1003, which is being replaced by this legislation.

We hear a lot about democracy. I think the employee engineer has as much right to form a unit of his own under the provisions of this bill and to bargain with the employer as the managerial engineer has to say that he does not want to come under it. If he does not want to come under it there is nothing to compel him to come under it unless he goes through the mechanics provided by the bill and forms a collective bargaining organization.

I do not think this house or the committee has the right to say to employee engineers who want the same rights as are given to others under this legislation that they must not continue the arrangements they made under P.C. 1003 and have been working under for the past six or seven years. We have no right to exclude them from this bill, and thus wipe out the agreements they have entered into which have improved their conditions.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

I suggest that the minister give serious consideration to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver East and restore democracy to these 1,100 engineers who are already within the scope of the present legislation. They should be permitted to continue. If the remaining strata of the engineering profession want to continue as they are, if they want to keep their professional units outside the scope of this legislation, that is their right. They do not have to come in, but I do not think we have the right to exclude employee engineers who have already shown a desire to come under the legislation. It is too serious a step to take to exclude them now.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): My general disposition, unless there is some strong reason to the contrary, is to go along with what a committee recommends. There has been very little indication of the reasoning which led the committee to the conclusion that it arrived at. As I recall it, the minister said that we had a good committee and should abide by the results; but he does not always abide by the results. Therefore I think we might ask the minister to make a substantive argument in favour of this.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have always taken the view that you should listen to the representations made by parent organizations. Every provincial institute of professional engineers and the national organization of engineers asked that this be put in the bill. I am thinking at the moment of the doctors in New Zealand and the doctors and dentists in Great Britain and other countries. I think the case made by the engineering institutes was a good one, as were the cases made by the legal societies, the architects and other professional organizations. In my judgment due weight had to be given to their representations.

It may be proved to these organizations and their membership in the light of experience that their judgment was unsound. If so, then will be the time to amend the section. With labour you listen in the main to representations from the national organizations, and similarly with representations from the employers. The representations we received from the organizations and from professional groups which obtained their status as professional men from provincial legislatures were very powerful.

Amendment (Mr. MacInnis) negatived: yeas, 14; nays, 54.

Mr. CROLL: Was there not another amendment to section 2, Mr. Chairman?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Yes, there was an amendment to add after the word

"employees" in line 6 on page 3 the words "but shall not include an employer-dominated organization". The paragraph if amended accordingly would read:

(r) "trade union" or "union" means any organization of employees formed for the purpose of regulating relations between employers and employees but shall not include an employer-dominated organization.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to know why that is being moved, if it is the minister's amendment.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The amendment was approved by the standing committee.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then I have nothing more to say.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to on division.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Employer or employers' organization interference with trade union.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I wish to move the same amendment to this clause that I moved when the bill was before the industrial relations committee. I have had a sufficient number of copies of the amendment mimeographed for distribution among the members, so that they will have its terms before them.

May I say at the outset that I understand this amendment is still being considered by the Minister of Labour, and also by the Minister of Transport because of the interest of the railways in its provisions. Therefore I would request, if it is agreeable to the committee, that clause 4 stand until this afternoon so that my amendment may be looked into further. The Minister of Transport intimated to me this morning that he might like to move a subamendment, and it happens to be a subamendment I would be prepared to accept. In other words, Mr. Chairman, without attempting to argue the case just now, I shall move the amendment and have it distributed amongst the members. My suggestion then is that the clause stand until this afternoon or some other time convenient to the minister.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East:

That section 4, subsection 2(b) be amended by changing the period after the word "Act" to a comma, and adding thereafter the following words:

and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, no employer shall deny to any employee any pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled by reason only of his ceasing to work as the result of a lockout or strike or by reason only of dismissal contrary to this act.

I would be prepared, Mr. Chairman, to proceed with my argument, but I think you will recognize from what I have said that it would perhaps be better to let the clause stand until the afternoon.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think that would meet the wishes of the committee. I would point out to the members that in committee a seconder of an amendment is not required.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Labour has informed me that my amendment to section 4, subsection 2 (b), is still being studied. I understand that the Minister of Transport is also giving it further consideration, and the suggestion has been made to me that the clause might be allowed to stand until later in the day. If the committee so wishes, that is acceptable to me, and I will reserve anything I have to say until the question is again before the committee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is it the wish of the committee that clause 4 stand for the time being?

Section stands.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Collective agreement conditions allowed.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Perhaps I should read the amendment that was agreed upon by the committee when the bill was before it. It was to add to section 6 a subsection 3, reading as follows:

Upon request of a trade union entitled to bargain collectively under this act on behalf of a unit of employees and upon receipt of a request in writing signed by any employee in such unit, the employer of such employee shall, until the employee in writing withdraws such request, periodically deduct and pay out of the wages due to such employee, to the person designated by the trade union to receive the same, the union dues of such employee; and the employer shall furnish to such trade union the names of the employees who have given and withdrawn such authority.

Mr. LITTLE: Mr. Chairman, I move that section 6 be amended by deleting subsection 3 thereof.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by Mr. Little that section 6 be amended by striking out subsection 3 thereof

Mr. CROLL: Mr. Chairman, I gather that the amendment, coming from a private member, will give us an opportunity to have a free vote on this resolution. I am glad to know as a matter of fact that the committee will have that opportunity, but there are a great number of hon. members here who were not on the committee, and perhaps those of us who were there will give a few words of explanation.

The clause as read by the chairman is what is commonly known as the voluntary revocable check-off. It means nothing more than that the employer collects union dues, which the employee voluntarily asks him to do, the employee having the right to revoke it at any time he likes. There is no hardship on the employer. It does not interfere with any of the rights of the employer, be they managerial or otherwise, nor does it interfere with any of the rights that belong to the general public. It is a voluntary act on the part of the employee, and all it requires is a mechanical act by someone in the office to check it off in the same way that all office staffs now collect income tax deductions, unemployment insurance deductions, perhaps deductions for Red Cross and even for payroll savings of some sort.

If there is a hardship as a result of this clause it can only be on the employee. He is the one who pays the shot, and he is the one who is asking for it. All it does in effect is to give the unions the merest and barest measure of union security, and the purpose of it is to maintain the strength and integrity of the union.

I am sure the committee will agree with me that a responsible employer should welcome a responsible union. As a matter of fact, in a great number of collective agreements they have the check-off. But there are some who refuse to give it to their employees, for some reason or other, and those who deny it do so, I think, with the view that they will keep the union weak, because the inability of the union to obtain enough money in order to carry out administration leads to a weak and struggling union. I think the committee will agree with me that it increases the number and the bitterness of conflicts arising in labour-management relations.

We have seen in the past that unions do not starve very easily. They are used to austerity; consequently it never succeeds. Nevertheless the refusal of the employer to be a help to the union leads to difficulties. I call the attention of the committee to a statement made by Mr. Justice Rand in the famous Ford motor case:

> I consider it entirely equitable that all employees should be required to shoulder their portion of the burden of expense for administering the law of their employment, the union contract, that they must take the burden along with the benefits.

I am not suggesting that we go that far, although Mr. Justice Rand's decision was hailed as a most progressive one, and it has brought us peace in the automobile industry.

This resolution does not suggest that we go that far. It does not suggest that anyone who is not a member of the trade union should contribute. What it says in effect is that when those who are members make the request of the employer, the employer shall comply with it. I think the request is a simple one. Labour has not only earned it but deserves it. For a long time they have asked for union security. I think labour relations in this country will improve as we meet labour at least half way.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to say a few words in support of this amendment. The hon. member for Spadina has clearly explained why the committee on industrial relations supported his amendment when it was placed before them. My own feeling is that there should be no reason for the committee not adopting an amendment, which, as he has pointed out, involves no hardship on the employer and merely facilitates the collection by the union of union dues. The British Columbia labour code, 1947, includes such a clause, and the deduction is regarded merely as an assignment of wages, which it is in essence, as the hon. member for Spadina pointed out. This government uses exactly the same principle in collecting unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, and income tax from all employees.

I would not support here the compulsory or irrevocable check-off. But all this amendment means is that if an employee, in writing, tells his employer that he wishes his union dues deducted at the source by the employer, then the employer must do it, the employee still having the right, by similar written notice, to revoke that check-off. Therefore, both as a member of the industrial relations committee and as a British Columbia member supporting similar legislation in my own province, I would urge this committee to support the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOMUTH: Before the minister proceeds, I think it ought to be made clear that the amendment we are discussing is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming. The hon. member who just sat down is talking about an amendment which is actually part of the act.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The amendment before the committee is the one moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. KNOWLES: The double negative again.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said a great deal about this matter when it was in committee, and I am frank to admit that there is a fundamental difference of opinion as to what a collective bargaining agreement is and what it is not. As I said in the committee, I take the British view. I am frank about that. I was raised in the school in which the union officers collected the dues. They had the contact between the officers or the stewards and the men. I think that is the proper way. I do not believe that a provision which comes within the purview of collective bargaining should be written into an act of parliament. I think that approach is fundamental.

I intend to take the long view. I know that at the moment a great deal of confusion exists in the world. It is seen in France, in the United States, in Great Britain, and to a much larger extent in Australia and in other countries. I do not think there is any substitution for people sitting around the table and negotiating an agreement. It has been stated that the check-off exists in some industries in this country. I have no objection to the check-off as such. I have no objection to a trade union agreement fashioned and negotiated by men sitting around a table. But as I pointed out early in the committee proceeedings, this bill is intended to go down the middle of the road. It is based on the principle of conciliation.

We have witnessed what has happened in the United States, and I offer no criticism of what has happened there. It is a free country, under the two party system, where you get the ebb and flow of opinion on national affairs. The Wagner Act was passed in that country. Let me point out to my trade union friends, and more particularly to those who have had experience in these matters, that some in the United States thought the Wagner Act was a swing too far to the left. Then, by the turn of the wheel—I think it was the hon. member for Calgary West who used that phrase in the committee—they got the Taft-Hartley measure. I well know the position taken by the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And he still takes it.

Mr. MITCHELL: As he has a perfect right to do. But in the United States you have a change in the complexion of congress and the senate. Today you have the Taft-Hartley measure which a great many people must, by the very nature of things, feel is sound legislation in that country. I remember discussing that legislation with some of the higher ranking officials of the American Federation of Labor. After the president had vetoed the bill, they thought it would not get the necessary majority—I forget whether it is two-thirds that is required—in the congress and senate. I said this to them. Most men are activated by the opinions of the people back home. I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if that is not what motivates him. Is it not the fact that you want to continue on, that you want to be a member of congress, or the senate, or of this House of Commons from now on?

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. MITCHELL: "Pourquoi pas," as they say in French. I sometimes wonder myself. But hon. members have seen what happened in the United States. Many of the cherished things enjoyed by labour organizations have been outlawed under the provisions of recent legislation. This bill does not interfere one iota with collective bargaining between employers and employees. If they want a closed shop, they can have a closed shop. Under the Taft-Hartley legislation they cannot have it. In Canada there are industries which have had the closed shop for over fifty years because both employers and employees believed it was in the best interests of the industry. I am speaking now of the construction industry. What I am fearful of is that with the swing of the pendulum you might get a government which would go much farther to the left than this government, or the opposition, or even my good friends of the C.C.F. On the other hand you may get a government which swings much farther to the right, and which will take away from the labour organizations conditions which have existed in this country for a good many years. That is why I say that the soundest approach to this problem is through negotiation. You start off with legislating for the check-off. You legislate in connection with wages and other working conditions. That has happened in other countries, as I said in the committee.

I was in Germany at the time of the revolution when Hitler obtained power. At that time Germany had the most powerful trade union movement in the history of the world. But it was so interwoven with the state that when Hitler got his fingers on the strings, neither the trade unions nor the employers were free agents. They were merely servants of the state. I should like to see our people sit down as free men and bargain collectively, predicated on responsibility.

It has been said, and truthfully, that some employers have made it difficult for trade unions; but let me say that it cuts both ways. I am speaking as a trade unionist. Some trade unions have made it difficult for decent employers. Let us be fair about it. In our approach to this problem we cannot have one law for the rich and a different one for the poor, dealing with the same subject. If we do we are in for trouble. I think that is what is fundamentally wrong with the legislation in the United States. That is what was fundamentally wrong with the Wagner Act. You see the disputes with the typographical union in Chicago and in many other cities of the United States, where legislation has deprived that responsible organization of conditions that it has enjoyed for years, and of some conditions which they have enjoyed for a century in some centres in that country. Therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, I would rather see in our federal jurisdiction the railroad labour organizations sit down with the companies and fashion an instrument predicated on this bill, if you like, having due regard for the difficulties of that widespread organization.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South comes from a tightly-knit organization, the miners' organization, where conditions are comparatively easy. There are not many companies; they all live in the same locality.

I am frank to admit that I do not know too much about the details of the railroad industry in this country. I know it in a broad and general way. Speaking from memory, I think there are twenty-eight different organizations involved. All these different organizations collect dues in many localities. Do not forget that they have enjoyed relations with these companies down through the years not excelled by any other labour organization in this country. What has it been due to? It has been because of the ability to see the other fellow's point of view. I think that is a sound approach.

This afternoon one hon. member referred to the Rand formula. How did the Rand formula come about? It came about through the appointment of Mr. Justice Rand as a commissioner. I played some part in the final conclusions of that dispute. In essence it was straight collective bargaining. Mr. Justice Rand's findings were not compulsory, but they were agreed to by both parties to the dispute. That is the proper approach. I am offering no criticism of the Rand formula, but I question very much, outside of the check-off provisions in that formula, whether many trade unions of this country wish to go the full length of the implications and applications of that formula, taking the long point of view.

I do not think there is much more I need to say. I like to see meetings such as we have in my organization where everybody turns up and pays his dues. We had good meetings. If they did not turn up to pay their dues the stewards collected them. I know some of the implications when that does not have to be done. I agree with the hon. member for Spadina that it makes it easy for the trade union organization, but taking the long view—and I say this sincerely on the basis of principle itself—I think it is in the best interests of the trade unions themselves, and I think my prediction will be borne out in the light of experience, that they do the work themselves and not let somebody else do it for them.

Mr. GILLIS: I am glad to see that we have a fairly well filled house. It is unfortunate to have this discussion take place at this time. The industrial relations committee gave a lot of thought, and had a lot of discussion on this particular subject. The minister used the same arguments in the committee that he is using in the house today. Nevertheless, by a majority vote of the committee the provision for a check-off was written into the bill. It surprised me this afternoon to have a private member on the government benches move for the deletion of a clause in the bill which was put there after a lot of consideration. Had it come from the minister I would have thought it was the government's intention to have it removed, but since a private member moved it, I am assuming that every member on that side of the house will be able to cast his vote freely without being influenced by the cabinet statement made by the minister.

Mr. McIVOR: We always do.

Mr. GILLIS: Perhaps that will happen. I hope that the assumption of the hon. member for Spadina and of myself is correct, namely, that it merely comes from one private member who perhaps is not as well informed on the subject as he should be.

We are attempting to lay down a national labour code. The objective of that code is to bring uniformity in labour relations between province and province. It is a start, and a good one. But if we remove the clause that we are now discussing, it will make it impossible for provinces such as Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to come within the scope of this national code, if the government wish to hand jurisdiction in labour relations over to the provinces; because each of the provinces that I have mentioned has a trade union act, and the check-off provision is written into every one of those acts. In many cases it was not written into those acts with the good will of the employers. It was fought for. The general public of the provinces that I have mentioned are convinced that the principle which we are attempting to lay down in this national code is a good one. I do not think that the governments in the provinces—I am reasonably sure of Nova Scotia—or the general public would want this provision removed. We are defeating the purpose of a national code if we make it impossible for the provinces I have mentioned to come in.

The minister made the statement that in his own union the shop steward collects the dues. That is understandable. Where you have a plant with a small craft union, and the shop steward has forty or fifty men in the shop with him, it is a simple matter to pick up the dues from them. It is not so simple in mass industries. In the gold and nickel mines, the coal mines, and the steel plants, where the unions are organized on an industrial basis, and where you have perhaps four, five or six men administering the affairs of the union, it is impossible to collect dues in that way.

I know that, because we tried it. For years we had the check-off in our agreement in Nova Scotia with the mine workers. In 1932 we thought we would try collecting dues, and we discontinued the check-off by referendum of our membership. We tried that for two years. It is absolutely impossible for union officials in a mass industry to administer the affairs of the organization by picking up the dues individually. It just cannot be done. By a referendum vote we restored the check-off.

In the organization of the steelworkers for example, I know that for years the steelworkers in Sydney tried to form a collective bargaining organization. This was before the provision for collecting dues was written into the trade union act of Nova Scotia. It never succeeded until that provision was written in. Then the membership put their cards in, and their dues were collected.

What we have to remember is what the hon. member for Spadina has pointed out. There is nothing compulsory about this. You put a card in, and you can withdraw it any time you see fit. The principle is well established. The government itself collects income tax in that way. Church dues are collected in that way.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Not in my church.

Mr. GILLIS: And the income tax—

Mr. CASE: What church is that?

Mr. GILLIS: There are church dues collected by the check-off.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: Name them.

Mr. GILLIS: When you are finished squeaking over there and ask me something, I will try to answer it.

An hon. MEMBER: Name them.

Mr. GILLIS: The Catholic church in my own community collects dues in that way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): You are wrong.

An hon. MEMBER: Trying to make propaganda.

Mr. GILLIS: That is why you fellows will be wrong—because you do not listen.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I would like to put these fellows right on that at once. I am a Catholic, and I have paid my church dues in that way for twenty-six years. It is a system which is still in use.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): Because you were willing to do it.

Mr. GILLIS: No, by authorization. That is the simple way. And that is exactly what we are asking you to do with regard to union dues. And when hon. members across the way say no, no, no, they are just about as well informed on that matter, as they displayed a minute ago, as they are on this business of the union check-off.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): It works the other way.

Mr. GILLIS: You are out of touch with the world.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: And that is apparently the end of it. You believe in democracy, do you not? You put the check-off through for income tax, and that is not revocable. Why not extend the same privileges to the unions? But it is not exactly the same privilege, because we wish merely to have it on a voluntary basis. The government has it on a compulsory basis. If it is good for the government, the same privilege should be extended to the unions of this country.

The minister and the rest of the members of the House of Commons will have to come to a realization of the fact that the trade union movement in this country is a permanent institution. Whether you like it or not, it is here to stay. You will have to remember that the unions have gone through the fighting stage; that day is over. The matter has now entered the administrative stage. Today the unions have as well trained personnel in their leadership nationally, provincially and locally as we have in many departments of government. The signing of a collective agreement is a simple matter today when the unions are organized. The mechanics of it are worked out. I think the days of strikes are practically over, if decent and sensible mechanics are worked out and some rule of law applied to the union movement. If they are given recognition as business people, rather than having to go out on the streets to fight things out, that stage is over. It is relatively simple to sign a collective agreement today.

After the agreement is signed, the union then is not just sitting on the side; it is a community affair. A union which has a responsibility in any community is the biggest asset that community can have. When their dues are coming in, and they can budget on their income, they can take their men forward by way of educational programs, the promotion of co-operative credit unions, playgrounds, and all that kind of thing.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The C.C.F. party.

Mr. GILLIS: That is their business. It is just as legitimate for them to do that as it is for the manufacturers association to back you people, or these people over here.

Mr. HARTT: That is not proven.

Mr. GILLIS: That is their business.

Mr. HARTT: It is not proven.

Mr. GILLIS: Check the Beauharnois report—

Mr. HARTT: It is not proven.

Mr. GILLIS: —for action of that kind.

Mr. HARTT: I have seen manufacturers support C.C.F. members too.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, that would be a miracle.

Mr. HARTT: The Dominion Children's Wear Association. You asked me to name one. That cap does not suit you, does it?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor. We shall get along better if that is not done. If hon. members wish to speak after the hon. member for Cape Breton South takes his seat, they may do so.

Mr. HARTT: He can look after himself.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member was trying to prove that the day of miracles is not past. As I was pointing out, if this check-off provision is written in, we are simply doing something nationally that was done provincially twenty years ago. Mind you, I hope the day will come when labour relations will be handed over by each province to the national government, and when we shall have adequate machinery here to handle the problem. I think it will be done in that way. We must not write anything into the national legislation or leave anything out of it which would preclude that kind of development.

I suggest that hon. members give this matter serious consideration, and that they vote quite freely. The amendment has been moved by a private member. I would impress strongly upon hon. members that a committee appointed by the house to study this matter, after much discussion of the subject, saw fit to write that provision into the bill. I do not think we as members of the House of Commons should lightly pass it up.

I feel strongly on the point, because I realize the value of the proposal. I see in this democracy in action. It is a recognition of the fact that a man who has a right to put a card in or take it out has a responsibility. There is no section of Canada today in which the check-off provision is operative under the trade union legislation where the unions are not 100 per cent organized. Not a man is out of them; they come in voluntarily, and they are glad to do it that way. In the final analysis they spend that money themselves, through their meetings and by their vote. They receive regular financial reports showing how every dollar is paid out and what came in. It enables the executive of the union which is a rather small body to do a decent job of administration and carry on considerable community work which is not possible under the other system where you must travel from door to door to pick up your dues.

The minister referred to the shop stewards in craft organizations and the method of collecting dues as advocated by the bill. There is no comparison. In most large industries you just could not have enough men to do it in that way.

I strongly urge that this clause remain in the bill because it is in the best interests of the people of this country.

Mr. McIVOR: When this matter was being discussed in the committee I asked the hon. member for Spadina if it was to be compulsory or voluntary, and I was informed that it was to be voluntary. I cannot see that that is so, according to this bill.

Mr. FERGUSON: I am an employer of some consequence; I have not had a union in my organization, and I have employed hundreds of men and women. There has been complete harmony in our relations. We pay over the union rates; we have cafeterias and recreation rooms, and, as I say, there is complete harmony between employer and employee. In the majority of factories on the North American continent that same harmony exists. This is not due entirely to the terrific activities of the unions on behalf of their brothers; it is due to the fact that the employer is just as human a man as any member of any union. He is keenly desirous of bettering the welfare of his workers, providing better working conditions and proper scales of pay adequate to meet the increased cost of living. That is the thought of most employers on the North American continent today.

Much of the discord that exists at the present time is not the result of discontent between employer and employee. The seamen's unions is an example. In that case the strike is not because of differences between employer and employee. The throwing of bricks, the bashing of heads and the utter disregard of the law of this country is due to discontent between union members. It is not all bread and butter garnished with cheese so far as union members are concerned.

I am in favour of holidays with pay; I am in favour of minimum wages; I am in favour of better working conditions and old age pensions for everybody; I am in favour of giving the people of this country anything that they can afford. But I am not in favour of promising them things that I know they cannot afford. They have to pay the piper. The labour people pay the shot.

I know of unions today that have taken union dues without consulting their members and have given them to a political party. One union called a meeting supposed to be for purely business purposes. The by-laws of this union state clearly that no political questions shall be discussed at meetings. But the by-laws were ignored and they went on to discuss the C.C.F. party and all that they would promise. They attempted to discredit the two old parties. This went on until several members of the union rose and reminded the advocates of the C.C.F. party and their principles that they could not discuss the matter further, that they were using the dues of the union for the purpose of sponsoring the C.C.F. party throughout Canada. We should not attempt to enact a law which would force a man to abide by the decision of radical advocates of certain political parties in this country. Every man should have the right to say, "I will contribute to this if I so wish." The government of Canada has no right at any time to say, "This is what you must do or pay a fine."

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order—

Mr. FERGUSON: The hon. member will have plenty of time when I am through.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, I have no objection to the line of debate being taken by the hon. member, but if he is allowed to carry on in that way—

An hon. MEMBER: What is the point of order?

Mr. MacINNIS: —without any reference to the section we are dealing with, then I shall claim an equal right.

Mr. FERGUSON: There is no other way to deal with this matter than to bring out the true facts to show that this amendment should be supported.

Another reason for supporting the amendment is that they are asking for legislation that will take away the liberties of the working men just as has been done in Russia. As has been mentioned by the minister, there are no trade unions in Russia. Hitler took away the rights of the trade unionists. Certain unions in Collingwood tried to take away the rights of the workers. That was not done by the employers; it was done by the trade unions. Many of these men do not want to contribute to any party. They have the right in this dominion, which I hope they will never lose, of supporting any party which will bring in good and honest legislation for both employer and employee.

I am not seeking the votes or support of any class of person in this country. I am seeking the respect of labour and employers for speaking truthfully and without fear. I hope I shall never deviate from that course. I am strongly against the check-off system because of the abuses by certain unions.

Mr. CROLL: On a question of privilege, the hon. member for Fort William said that he had asked me in committee whether this would be compulsory or voluntary, and he said that I told him it was voluntary. He said that he now finds it is compulsory, and I gathered from his words that he thought that I had misled him. I should like to quote from page 242 of the proceedings of the standing committee on industrial relations, as follows:

Mr. McIvor: I was just going to ask Mr. Croll a question. Does this mean that it will make it easier for the union to collect dues?

Mr. Croll: Yes.

Mr. McIvor: It will be compulsory for the employee to pay dues?

Mr. Croll: No, it is not compulsory. He can either pay or not pay. The matter is up to him. He sends a note to the employer telling him to deduct the dues from his pay. When he does not want that done any longer, he writes the employer not to deduct the dues.

Mr. McIvor: I think any man who receives the benefit of what the union stands for should pay his dues.

That is what I said then, and that is what I said today. If I am wrong in assuming that some reflection was cast upon me—

Mr. McIVOR: No.

Mr. CROLL: The hon. member says "no", but I gathered that from what he said, and I was a bit surprised.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I rise on a question of privilege. I thought I was speaking on the amendment which had been moved by the hon. member for Spadina in the industrial relations committee, but that does not appear in the latest reprint of the bill that we have before us. I tried to make it clear that I was opposed to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: As there are some members who were not here when I read the amendment, perhaps I should try to make the position clear. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming is to delete an amendment which was carried in the committee and inserted in the bill. I hope that is perfectly clear.

The amendment to be voted on would delete the amendment proposed by the industrial relations committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Has the bill been reprinted, Mr. Chairman?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I will read again the amendment that comes from the committee to be inserted as subclause 3 of clause 6:

Upon request of a trade union entitled to bargain collectively under this act on behalf of a unit of employees and upon receipt of a request in writing signed by any employee in such unit, the employer of such employee shall, until the employee in writing withdraws such request, periodically deduct and pay out of the wages due to such employee, to the person designated by the trade union to receive the same, the union dues of such employee; and the employer shall furnish to such trade union the names of the employees who have given and withdrawn such authority.

As I said, the amendment proposed by the member for Timiskaming would delete the amendment I have just read.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): Rising to a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the hon. member for Cape Breton South a moment ago, in order to strengthen his argument in favour of the check-off—I do not blame him for trying to strengthen his argument—said that even religious institutions were using the check-off, and he mentioned the Catholic church and said that it was requesting the check-off. May I say in reply that the Catholic church never requests any named contribution from any one of its adherents. I think it is only fair to the Catholic church that this correction be now made.

Mr. GILLIS: That is not a correction. Under the laws of Nova Scotia, church dues are a legal check-off.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): But not mentioning a specific amount.

Mr. GILLIS: All churches collect their fees in that way. The amount I give is entirely up to me, but the check-off is the method by which it is collected.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am an Anglican and the Anglican church has continued in existence a long time without the check-off. But let us get back to the issue before us. Let us not inject religion into a discussion which is purely material and not spiritual.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think we need generate so much heat over this section. We can approve it or disapprove it. If we approve it, it goes in the bill; if we disapprove it, it is left out.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us vote on it.

Mr. MacINNIS: In a few minutes, after I have explained it so that you will understand it. During the war years the check-off was one of the most important issues in collective bargaining, and it became a part of the agreements which most large industrial firms made with their employees. As the hon. gentleman who moved subclause 3 in the committee has pointed out, Mr. Justice Rand included the check-off in his report on the Ford dispute in 1946, and I think he went further than that. It was not compulsory for every employee to become a member of the union, but it was compulsory for every employee to pay his contribution for the union's upkeep.

The Minister of Labour has pointed out that the check-off is not in vogue in the United Kingdom. That is true, and personally I would much prefer to have every trade union member pay his dues voluntarily as a part of his duty to his union. In a country such as Canada, where large industries have grown up very fast and where some of the members are not particularly concerned with the union beyond the increased wages and better working conditions it brings them, it is to be regretted that they are not interested enough at times even to attend the union meetings. But it is important that the trade union in an industry should be able to speak for all the employees covered by the agreement, and that can only be done if all of the employees are members of the union and pay their dues.

Let me read the first four lines of the proposed subclause 3 to show that there is nothing compulsory about it:

> Upon request of a trade union entitled to bargain collectively under this act on behalf of a unit of employees and upon receipt of a request in writing signed by any employee in such unit, the employer of such employee shall, until the employee in writing withdraws such request, periodically deduct and pay out of the wages due to such employee, to the person designated by the trade union to receive the same, the union dues of such employee. . . .

Could anything be freer than that? If we are to assume that the employee has a duty to his union, he surely could not do less than that. I suggest that every hon. member consider carefully before he votes for or against the amendment, because the check-off has become the customary practice in Canada, and no one, I believe, has been injured by it.

I was glad to hear the closing remarks made by the member for Simcoe North when he said that he was opposed to the check-off, because I have in my hands the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of June 14, 1948, and I find in it an advertisement authorized by the Saskatchewan Progressive Conservative Association. The advertisement says that among the planks of the Progressive Conservative party are:

> The right of the worker to organize in unions of his own choosing.
> The check-off—and union security.

The advertisement carries a picture of Rupert Ramsay, the Progressive Conservative leader in Saskatchewan.

Mr. FERGUSON: Proving conclusively that Conservatives can think for themselves and are not led around by the nose.

Mr. MacINNIS: Proving conclusively that the policy of the Conservative party is determined by how close they are to an election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right. Keep quiet and I will not hit back. I now come to an article by the Progressive Conservatives in a forum, which is run by the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, with all parties in it:

> 1. The guarantee of the right to collective bargaining.
> 2. Two weeks holidays with pay.
> 3. The check-off and union security—the right of every worker to join the union of his own choice, without fear of discrimination for union activity.

That, I assume, is the policy of the Conservative party all over Canada. It is at any rate the policy in Saskatchewan for the next two weeks. And if that is the policy now, it is the policy because it has a certain political appeal in Saskatchewan. I suggest to the rank and file members on the government side of the house that they avail themselves of the freedom they have at this moment to support subsection 3 of this section and to vote against the amendment.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I have the highest regard for the experience and wisdom of our Minister of Labour, but in this particular instance I am afraid I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Twenty years ago I was timekeeper in a logging camp and I did that in the evenings after I got through work. I found it most desirable, instead of having to procure cash and hand it to the boys for the payment of union dues, to have them give me their names, and at the end of the month I paid the money over to the proper official who forwarded it to the union. It was a voluntary check-off.

Many of the large employers in British Columbia resisted it vigorously at that time, but it never seemed to me that there was anything wrong with that system and I regarded it as both efficient and fair. I could never bring myself to feel that if anyone asked me courteously, as in fact they always did, to take that money off his pay and hand it to another person, there was anything wrong in my doing so merely because I did it in respect of union dues. I did not consider it any more wrong than if it were done with regard to the Red Cross, or tobacco or chocolate bars or anything else of value.

I, too, am an employer of labour in a small way, and I should not like to have the committee of the whole turn down the amendment that has been proposed by the industrial relations committee, because I feel that the Canadian people would regard this House of Commons as being ten or twenty years behind the thinking of the provincial legislatures, certainly the thinking of our more progressive legislatures, though judging from some of the acts that have been passed by some of the legislatures one would not suppose that they were far advanced in their thinking.

I am in agreement with the amendment proposed by the industrial relations committee and opposd to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have spoken at least twice in this House of Commons in times gone by in favour of the voluntary revocable check-off and I have not changed my mind. I will therefore oppose the motion proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming, and may I add that I will do so in spite of the speeches made in opposition to that motion by the members for Cape Breton South and Vancouver East.

I do not think it does our cause any good to start political bickering on a subject of this kind, which is quite serious to a great many people. I approach this question in a somewhat different way from that which has hitherto been adopted by persons who have spoken on it, with the exception perhaps of what was said by the last speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

In conversation with different people, I have found that the word "compulsory" has been used by many with reference to this matter. There is nothing compulsory about it. A man voluntarily signs an assignment to give some of his own money to someone else; and at any time, in writing, in the same way as that in which he made the assignment, he may then withdraw that assignment and collect his own money. If there is anything in that which is compulsory I at least am utterly unable to find it.

I know it will be said by some people, who perhaps have no great understanding of labour, that advantage will be taken of this, and that certain persons will back a chap up against the wall and say, "Sign on the dotted line." It may be that there are odd instances of that kind in industrial relations. If there are, I believe it is because of the quick growth of unions, certainly since the beginning of the last war, and any great movement of the kind will produce some irresponsible leaders. The actions of such irresponsible people find their way into the headlines of the newspapers, but I prefer to regard these union organizations as being in the main composed of sensible people, just as sensible as we are on a broad plane in this house.

Let us suppose that I am working for someone. I have an employer and I owe a bill to a druggist or a grocer or someone else. I give my grocer or my druggist an order on my employer to pay that bill. He will not refuse to do it; he dare not refuse, because it is enforceable at law as an assignment of money. The same thing is true today with respect to wages, even though the assignment goes to a union secretary.

My position, therefore, is simply this. All that this amendment does, as moved in the committee, is to affirm a right which the workman has always had at law to assign his money to whomsoever he wishes, be it his wife, a grocer or a union.

We have to go back in our consideration of this matter. Everyone in this house has said he believes in collective bargaining. If we believe in collective bargaining we must mean something when we say that, and collective bargaining is bargaining by people without the cards being all in the hands of a man on one side of the table. It is a complete negation of the words "collective bargaining" if it be between one chap who has all the cards and a gun on his hip, and the fellow across the table who has only a couple of white chips. To give it meaning, it must mean that people have the right to meet together and negotiate on something like an even basis.

It has been said that expense is involved. I believe there is some small expense. I have no doubt that the unions would be quite prepared to meet that little expenditure for an extra bookkeeper or whatever it might mean. But I put this to the committee in the way I have done because I have thought this matter over for years. It is not a recent conversion with me. I have spoken about it in the house ever since I came here in 1945. I have spoken about it all across the country, and I have yet to hear from any person a single argument that I could regard as satisfactory, aside from the small question of expense

That is so with one exception; and that has come to my notice only within the past few days. We have jurisdiction here over railways because they are interprovincial. I have learned that those railways going from one ocean to the other are dealing with twenty-eight different unions. It may be that in that case difficulties will arise because of differences in the amount of dues collected by the various unions. That may mean considerable difficulty and perhaps some expense in connection with those brotherhoods. But it must be remembered that the railway people have not this system, nor have they asked for it. They are a set of unions that have carried on up to this time without feeling that there was any necessity for anything of the kind. But to come back to what was said before, they are craft unions; they are in smaller groups and are spread clear across the country.

So I close, Mr. Chairman, by making this simple statement. I will vote against the amendment as proposed, but not for the reason, as suggested by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Vancouver East, that there is any political kudos to be obtained from it. I have preached it, as they both know, ever since I came here. I continue to do so because I believe it is just, that it is a matter of right and not a matter of a handout from the employer to a union employee.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I desire to express my opinion with regard to this question. I am greatly surprised this afternoon to find out that the minister is now objecting to the amendment which carried in the committee. This question was thoroughly gone into in the committee, and it passed there by a majority vote. Surely the opinion of that committee, which was given the duty of examining most carefully this bill in all its aspects, should be given a little consideration at this time.

I have had a little bit of experience with this union check-off business myself, because when I was teaching in Alberta we had a union known as the Alberta teachers' association. In that union there was a check-off. Those of us who paid dues into the union were obliged to fight all the battles. Then those who did not participate by paying their dues, shared in the profits. I can say that the picture has now been changed in Alberta and we have the check-off there. In fact, in their forward labour legislation, I think Alberta leads all the other provinces in Canada. This is not something new. It was thoroughly discussed in the committee. It was passed there by a majority vote, and for the life of me I do not see why it should be brought up again. It is something that is not compulsory. It is voluntary in every sense of the word, as was pointed out by the hon. member who preceded me. I do not intend to cover the arguments which he and other hon. members have used. I wish to say I am firmly of the opinion that the voluntary check-off is the proper method of procedure. I shall support it, and I shall vote against the amendment which is now before the committee.

Mr. JAQUES: I should like to ask one question. I was not a member of the committee on industrial relations. I have listened to the discussion this afternoon, and I am not clear about this matter. According to those who support the amendment it makes no difference. If it makes no difference, I should like to know the purpose of it. Am I to understand that the members of the union who wish to pay their dues—and I suppose they all do—are so irresponsible that they cannot be trusted to do so but must have them deducted at the source? This provision seems strange to me. As I say, if there is no purpose in it, and if there is no reason behind it, why should it be introduced? Would the mover please explain that to me before I vote?

Mr. MITCHELL: To reply to my hon. friend, I think the matter was fully explained by the hon. member for Calgary West. He put forward one point of view and I think I put forward the other. His point of view was a legal one. He felt that these trade unionists or employees had a perfect right to ask the employer to deduct this money from their pay envelopes at the end of the month. My point of view—

Mr. JAQUES: May I ask this question—

Mr. MITCHELL: Let my hon. friend just sit down for a moment.

Mr. JAQUES: I want the minister to make the point clear.

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot make it any clearer. The hon. member will have to stick my head on his shoulders.

Mr. JAQUES: The question I want to ask is this. Is there any law against the employee asking the employer to deduct his dues at the present time?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, there is no law.

Mr. JAQUES: What is the object of this?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the other point of view. As I said, there are two points of view. My point of view is that this matter should be the subject of collective bargaining—

Mr. MacINNIS: Agreed.

Mr. MITCHELL: —a matter of agreement between employer and employee. One hon. member this afternoon talked about being progressive. I know of some countries in Europe which were thought to be progressive, but which now have a big thick curtain in front of them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Little) agreed to: yeas, 71; nays, 35.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 7 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Conciliation officer conference with parties.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: There was an amendment made by the committee to this section. If hon. members will look at section 16 they will find that the last two lines in the original bill read:

. . . a conciliation officer to confer with the parties engaged in collective bargaining.

The amendment reads: "one or more conciliation officers."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 17 to 31 inclusive agreed to.

On section 32—Function.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The amendment made by the committee to section 32 struck out subsection 8.

Mr. MacINNIS: I intend to move an amendment to re-insert subsection 8. The subsection originally read as follows:

In any proceedings before the conciliation board, no person except with the consent of the parties shall be entitled to be represented by a barrister, solicitor or advocate and, notwithstanding such consent, a conciliation board may refuse to allow a barrister, solicitor or advocate to represent a party in any such proceedings.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East that section 32 be amended by re-inserting subsection 8.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before you put the amendment, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in explanation. This subsection has been in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act since it was first passed in 1907. So far as I know, there was never any strong objection raised to it, nor do I think it has ever interfered with conciliation proceedings. Labour organizations are afraid that if lawyers are allowed to take part in conciliation proceedings it will prove detrimental to the smooth operation of such proceedings.

The minister will remember that the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada gave this bill their endorsation this year and also to Bill No. 338 last year; but he will also remember that a few days ago the executive withdrew the endorsation of the congress from the bill, largely because of the two amendments made to it in committee. One of the amendments made in committee had to do with section 2, subsection (1), paragraph (i), subparagraph (ii). This morning the minister remedied the objection to that section by restoring to the bill what it contained when it was first introduced in the house. Perhaps a stronger objection of the trades and labour congress is taken to the removal of subsection 8 of section 32. I suggest to the minister that he would be improving the bill by putting it back where it was for the last forty years. It gave good satisfaction to all concerned.

I do not wish to create any controversy in regard to this matter, but it should be remembered that representatives of labour and representatives of the Canadian Bar Association have opposite reasons for having this subsection in or out of the bill, as the case may be. Labour representatives are anxious to have conciliation boards finish their work as quickly as possible, because they begin to receive the benefits when the conciliation proceedings are finished and an agreement is drafted. If lawyers are permitted to take part in the proceedings they will receive the benefits as long as the conciliation board is sitting, and the longer it takes to reach an agreement, the more they will get out of it. I can understand why they would want this section deleted. But let us remember that we are now considering a bill to make conciliation of labour disputes as smooth as possible. We are not drafting a bill to give employment to somebody, no matter to what organization he may belong. I suggest to the minister that it would be a good gesture on his part to take the position that he took when this bill was drafted and support the restoration of this subsection to section 32.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think I am far enough away from the legal profession to be able to speak with a certain amount of detachment on this issue. I should think all my legal earnings, if added together, would not support a family of five at the present cost of living for more than about two weeks.

I should like to make a few comments on this. In the first place, I find the speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver East so satisfactory that I wish he would not descend to what he did this afternoon when he suggested that members of the legal profession would regard a conciliation board as a means of spinning out the thing as long as they could in order to make fees. There are lawyers like that, no doubt, but I do not think there are many. I would doubt whether any intelligent organization would be hiring a lawyer like that, because the kind of lawyers who are worthwhile do not have to spin things out. They usually have more jobs than they can perform.

The second thing I wish to say—and here I might seem to be inclining to the views of the hon. member for Vancouver East—is that it is quite often wise not to have lawyers. There are cases where people have a sort of superstitious feeling about retaining lawyers, because of the superstition that they may be able to work magic. They do not work magic at all.

There may be many cases where they should not go in; but it seems to me foolish to suggest that we should have a law or continue a law to keep them out. Why should we keep anyone out who, it is considered by any of the parties to a proceeding, can help? It seems to me just like refusing to let the light in. It seems to me a counsel of darkness, and to my mind it is one of the most retrograde things one might have to consider. Surely we should be ready to let anybody in who has a contribution to make. And if an intelligent union or an intelligent employer wishes to employ a lawyer, why should it or he not do so?

The next point is that there may have been a time, when it would have been suggested—although I observed that the hon. member for Vancouver East did not suggest it—that if lawyers were allowed to come in, the odds would all be tilted against the union. I doubt if anyone will suggest, after the discussion we have heard this afternoon, that in these days unions are poor and down-trodden and cannot get the best lawyers available.

My final point is that it seems to me that to suggest that the presence of lawyers would have the effect of spinning out an investigation and unnecessarily delaying it is to suggest that the chairman is a fool. I do not believe conciliation boards are presided over by fools. They are usually intelligent people. I was one once myself, for a few moments, but I got through very quickly—although I must add that there were no counsel present.

I suggest seriously, however, that to offer the argument that, in order to have proper expedition in carrying out these matters no counsel should be present, is a very poor compliment indeed to those who preside over these boards. I should feel very regretful if we had to continue to countenance a piece of legislation of this kind.

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps lawyers could take care of this thing themselves; but I am in charge of piloting this bill through the House of Commons. The Minister of Labour is fair game for everybody, both in and out of the house. I do not know what some people would do if they had not an opportunity to criticize the secretary of labour in the United States, or if they could not take a pot-shot at the Minister of Labour in Canada, particularly when they lack responsibility and courage themselves—and I do not reflect upon anyone in the committee when I say that.

I must say, however, that, speaking frankly, I believe this is class legislation. That is my view in the matter. It was put in there because it was in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. It was asked for by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and by other labour organizations. But it was put in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act a good many years ago.

I have had some experience in labour negotiations in my day, and I know the hon. member for Vancouver East has had experience, too. I do not know of anyone I would rather be up against than a lawyer. I speak with no disrespect for lawyers, but first of all you have to teach them what you know, yourself. I would rather express my own opinions in my own simple way on the issues in dispute.

And do not forget this, that a disbarred lawyer can get in.

Mr. MacINNIS: He is not a lawyer, though.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know of a disbarred lawyer—

Mr. SINCLAIR: But he has legal training.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know of a case not long ago for which I was severely criticized, in which a disbarred lawyer's argument was used against me, and against others both in and out of the house. He can plead before one of these boards, and can represent anyone. I know of a member of the house—he happens to be on this side—who is a member of a labour organization and who has served his organization with credit and distinction.

I believe I said on another occasion that you cannot pass a law to turn a sinner into a righteous man. Neither can you pass a law to make sure that someone will not hire the best possible advice. Let us consider the men in the labour movement at the present time. I know of a recent board hearing in the city of Montreal which was handled by a man who grew up in the labour movement. I am convinced that, although these people speak in simple terms, they possibly know the intricacies of an industry better than any other people.

Then let us consider the industry with twenty or thirty employees. Someone asks for an agreement. What does the manager do? He flies to his lawyer, because he does not know how to develop the case himself. I hope I shall live to see the day in Canada when, even outside the legal profession, there will be those who will specialize in this kind of work. I do not think it is a forbidden field, or a field into which a man in civilian life, irrespective of his calling, could not make his contribution toward what might be described as normal labour conditions in the country.

I have said there is a powerful argument which can be made on the suggestion that this is class legislation which, in effect, denies the right of a livelihood to a certain group of persons in Canada. We have been discussing freedom, and all that kind of thing—what the hon. member for Lake Centre talks about—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Human rights.

Mr. MITCHELL: God bless human rights, yes. We have been discussing that. Then in the same breath we deny the right to a group of people to earn a livelihood. That is my approach to the matter. I believe it is the commonsense approach and, in the light of conditions as they exist today, I think it is a good one.

What is happening in the United States in this connection? I do not know whether I saw the picture or whether someone told me about it, but the other day John L. Lewis was walking with seven good lawyers along with him.

Mr. FLEMING: Was it Lewis?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, absolutely. What does one always do? What do we do—entirely outside labour disputes—when we get into trouble, whether it be civil or some other kind of trouble? We go to a lawyer. Of course we do.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is not a compulsory measure.

Mr. CHURCH: For many years past I have had connection with labour organizations and industrial strikes in the police department, fire and street departments, the post office, and the street railway departments. It has been my experience that, while lawyers have their usefulness in certain kinds of activities, they are absolutely useless in most industrial disputes.

I have had a wide experience in labour activities. While I am a lawyer myself, I believe those disputes might well be left to the parties, so that they might choose conciliators from among themselves and settle matters. I believe the section was all right as it was drafted. A board of conciliation should be able to settle a dispute as between man and man.

Let us consider the workmen's compensation act. I can remember when the present minister was a controller in the city of Hamilton. The matter came up as to whether they would allow lawyers before that workmen's compensation board which was dealing with the case of an employee who had been injured. It was decided by the Ontario legislature that it would not be in the interests of either the employer or the employee in the case of an accident in industry to allow lawyers to plead before the board when a settlement could be brought about without their doing so.

I understand that, according to the labour law, both federal and provincial, the minister or the deputy minister of labour can intervene and try to bring the parties together. That is the whole principle of the industrial disputes act. I was a member of the committee on industrial relations for nineteen years—I am not a member now—and my experience is that, while lawyers have their place, it is not here. In saying this, I am not against anybody or any business or profession.

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester): I am surprised at the attitude taken by some hon. members against the legal profession. We are led to believe that if lawyers are permitted to appear before conciliation boards the proceedings will be protracted for their personal benefit, but I have not heard one good reason why the legal profession should be singled out. This discussion has been going on for fifteen minutes and nothing has been achieved; yet not one lawyer member has taken part in it. I think that is a clear example of the possibility of obtaining a quick decision in these matters.

I do not think any one profession should be singled out by legislation passed by this house. The parties to a dispute may call in accountants or skilled men from other professions, but the members of the legal profession are barred. Yet the question that may be troubling the conciliation board may be a question of law.

The great majority of lawyers spring from the labouring classes. Thousands of lawyers in this country have worked for years and years for the labouring men without receiving one cent of remuneration. Time and time again I have opened up cases which had been before conciliation boards where the decision had been against workmen when I knew they were right. I have done that in hundreds of cases without receiving one cent of remuneration, and there are thousands like me in this country. It is unfair to single out the legal profession and bar them from appearing before a conciliation board when the parties themselves want such assistance.

Mr. GREEN: I hesitate to say anything about this amendment, because I am not a member of the committee on industrial relations. I understand that, as the bill was originally brought in, it contained this subsection 8 which bars lawyers from appearing before a board. Then the committee in its wisdom decided that the subsection should be removed, the effect being that lawyers would be permitted to appear.

I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver East spoke with his usual fervour and conviction when he moved his amendment today. As he spoke, I thought of the many times when he has spoken in this house on the rights of the downtrodden and of minorities, all worthy subjects, but today I am afraid his tongue was in his cheek.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I object to the hon. member for Vancouver South attributing any insincerity to me in connection with this matter. I debated the matter in committee in the same way as I have debated it today. If the hon. member is accustomed to speaking with his tongue in his cheek, I am not.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member should withdraw that remark.

Mr. GREEN: That was the point I was making, that the hon. member does not usually speak with his tongue in his cheek. If the hon. member objects, I am quite happy to withdraw the remark. This is a most serious matter for the members of the legal profession. I am a member of that profession and I have no regrets over belonging to it. It is a great profession which has contributed a great deal, not only to the public life of Canada but to the welfare of those who have the hardest time. There is no reason why that profession should be singled out in this bill. I have a resolution here which was passed by the Vancouver bar association, one recital of which sums up the picture from the point of view of the legal men. It reads:

> And whereas such provision is the negation of the democratic rights of parties before conciliation boards and is an unwarranted restriction imposed on and discrimination against a section of the public in the conduct of a profession which has contributed much to the public life and welfare of Canada . . .

I think that sets forth the situation. About ten years ago I had the privilege of acting as chairman of an arbitration board considering a dispute between the newspaper proprietors in Vancouver and the typographical union. The case for the union was presented by a representative who was brought in from San Francisco and whose business it was to appear before arbitration boards. He was not a lawyer, but he was a skilful labour representative. I do not think any lawyer in Canada could have made a better presentation than that representative from San Francisco. No one had any quarrel with his being brought from San Francisco to present the case. It does seem to me that there is no reason why a Canadian lawyer should not be allowed to appear, either for the union or for the other side. I urge hon. members of the committee who are not of the legal profession to report the bill as it was reported from the committee.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver South and others who have argued that lawyers are being debarred from conciliation boards are reading the section correctly. There is nothing in the subsection which the hon. member for Vancouver East wants restored that would debar lawyers from attending hearings if they are requested so to do, or if the board chairman feels that they are necessary. There is nothing in the subsection that would indicate any particular discrimination against that profession. If the hon. member will read the subsection he will see that that is the case.

By this legislation we are setting up labour jurisprudence for the handling of labour disputes, wage disputes and so on. This is not criminal law; this is not the type of statute which the legal profession is trained to handle. When we were refusing the right to engineers to bargain collectively I did not hear one word from hon. members who have taken part in this discussion. Apparently there were no human rights involved there. I did not hear them speak when we were refusing the right of check-off on a voluntary basis.

We must recognize the fact that for the first time we are setting up a national rule of law to govern labour relations. Under the section as it was in the original bill and which we are seeking to have restored, authority is placed in the hands of the board and the parties to the dispute to call counsel if they so desire. I do not think the argument that was used by the very capable member of the legal profession who has just taken his seat was valid, as I think he will agree if he reads the clause we wish restored.

While on this matter of lawyers, among whom I have some great friends, I have a clipping in my hand from a United States publication called Labor, which the Minister of Labour probably knows, and this is what it has to say in an editorial on the railway dispute in the United States. The editorial is headed "Lawyers", in big letters and says:

> "Almost from beginning to end, one of the real troubles in this dispute has been that railroads have shifted their responsibilities over to lawyers," a union leader declared. "For example, during the emergency board hearings, they had a battery of 16 lawyers to handle their case, while we had only one.

"Thus, collective bargaining on the 'Iron Horse' has degenerated into litigation. You can't have peace on the rails that way."

Mr. CROLL: He is complaining that you do not have enough lawyers.

Mr. GILLIS: No, he is not. He is complaining that the railroad companies, with unlimited funds, can hire a battery of high-priced lawyers to fight a struggling union which can afford to hire only one.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They are going to spend a million to defeat the president, so they must have money.

Mr. GILLIS: It was sixteen lawyers to one in that case. But the point I want to make is that there is no suggestion in the clause that lawyers should be kept out. It is merely placing the matter in the hands of the judge and the parties to the dispute, and, in the final analysis, in the judgment of the chairman of the board. The minister says he has a wonderful board. I do not see, then, why he should mistrust them. This provision has been in the act for a long time, and if labour is going to accept its responsibilities it should begin to handle its own problems.

I have no doubt that the unions in Canada today have in their own organizations personnel qualified to handle any labour problem that would come within the scope of this act. My experience with negotiations has been this. If we needed a lawyer we went out and got one, and the best time and place to see him was before the negotiations began, having him sit down in an office and prepare a memorandum which would help to get the facts straightened out in our own minds before we went into the negotiations—not after we went in. No one is able to handle negotiations dealing with wages and economic conditions better than the people who are actually involved in the dispute and know the basic facts. If legal advice is required the best time to take it is before the negotiations begin, when you are preparing your brief for submission to the board. I hope that the hon. member for Vancouver South will take another look at this clause, and if he does I am sure he will find that it gives ample scope for the legal profession to appear if, in the judgment of the board, that is necessary.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): This is coming pretty close to home, since up to now I have got my living by the practice of law. Of course I do not need to do that any more, now that I am getting so well paid for being in Ottawa six months of the year.

It seems to me that perhaps we are overlooking the most important thing in this whole discussion which has centred around large corporations and large labour unions. But that does not present a true picture of the industrial situation in Canada at all. Where I live we have only one large industrial organization, engaged in the mining of coal. We had another fast-growing organization, which is not as yet unionized, searching for oil. On the other hand, we have many small industries employing, say from fifteen to twenty men, and in Ontario and Quebec there are many organizations of that kind.

The ordinary labour union is, as a rule, a member of one of the two or three major national labour organizations in this country. In the event of a dispute and conciliation proceedings before a board the union has immediate access to the best advocates that I know of in the labour business, and they are contained within the labour organization itself. They are excellent advocates because they have had much experience in this work. But the employer who must meet the union in conciliation proceedings is a man who, as a rule, has risen from his bench and perhaps got his own shop and has made it grow. He is not equipped to present his own case to the tribunal. He has had no experience in public speaking, and has no conception of putting together things on a paper called a brief in a manner that will be readable, so that he is unable to present his case in the best light. For that reason, if for no other, he should be able to employ a lawyer to assist him.

I have heard this story before about lawyers spinning things out and taking a long time. But the employers could easily circumvent the law. All they have to do is to name a lawyer as the third person on the board, which usually consists of three people. But that would not be right; that would not be honest. So the proper thing to do is to have a lawyer who will present your case in the best way possible.

Furthermore, we know that the large labour organizations are well equipped, not only with lawyers but with research people, economists, accountants and all that kind of thing. So the day is long since gone when there is any virtue or anything bona fide in the cry that labour cannot employ lawyers to meet those of the corporations. The hon. member for Cape Breton South gave as an illustration the railway dispute in the United States, where the railroads had sixteen lawyers to one representing the union. But we all know that this union is among the wealthiest in the world. It could buy out, lock, stock and barrel, all the lawyers it could find in any large city in the United States. My view is that anybody who employs sixteen lawyers in the one case is an ass. In my judgment he could not be anything else, because more than half of them would be surplusage and a clog on the wheel in operating any sort of hearing.

One word about the other aspect of it. I am not so greatly concerned about the money that we lawyers make or may not make in connection with this matter, though perhaps some will be. But I am concerned about its being said to us, "You have been trained to examine a new proposition quickly, to find the bones of it, and from those bones to make up a case and present it". Your lawyer of 1948, if he makes money, is not the fellow who is in the courthouse all the time. That was true years ago, but is quite untrue now. There are not in the dominion ten lawyers who are making a living at criminal practice, if we take the big cities and all. Most of the cases now involve persons who have long since lost the ability to pay a lawyer when they get into that kind of trouble.

The lawyer of today is a businessman. His whole training these days is to go into investigations like milk, butter and so on, coal mining and the rest, which are held throughout the country, because he is trained to think in a businesslike way.

As to his spinning things out, I can give my hon. friend one case. I hate to be personal, but this was in connection with the conciliation board in Alberta, and he knew the parties on one side, headed by Bob Livett. It was before the late Mr. Justice MacGillivray. They were at a deadlock; his lordship telephoned me—I happened to know them—and in that same afternoon we got a settlement. In that case there was no lawyer except myself who was called by the bench, and I did not prolong the case. I settled it. That is a matter of history, a matter of record.

This story about lawyers going into these things to prolong them, whether the implication is or is not that it is done in order to get money, is the most utter and complete nonsense. I know that organizations had a hard job to get lawyers in the old days in connection with workmen's compensation where every case went before the court. They did not have money. We have been debarred ever since that day from taking our place before certain tribunals, but that went out with the horse and buggy. The unions are stronger financially and in numbers. They are equipped with the very best talent, and I can see no reason why we should not be admitted to serve either them or the employer.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question? I would point out that what the hon. member for Vancouver East is doing in this amendment is to restore in the bill a clause that was removed in committee.

Amendment (Mr. MacInnis) negatived yeas, 7; nays, 60.

Section agreed to.

Sections 33 to 44 inclusive agreed to.

On section 45—Prosecution of employers' organization or trade union.

Mr. GILLIS: There was considerable discussion of this clause in committee and I have a simple amendment to move. I am sure everyone will support it. I move that section 45, subsection 1, be amended by striking out the word "and" in the third line and substituting the word "board" for "organization" and by striking out the words "or union".

Mr. CROLL: Will the hon. member please read the section with the proposed amendment?

Mr. GILLIS: The subsection would then read:

> A prosecution for an offence under this act may be brought against an employers' organization or a trade union in the name of the board . . .

The rest of the section would be the same as it is now. My reason for moving this amendment is that in my opinion this section is the meat of the whole act. Unless the board has the responsibility for enforcing the act and the authority to enforce it, I think we are leaving matters of labour relations in Canada pretty much where they are at the present time.

The amendment I now suggest would put the board in the position where, if it considered either side in an illegal position under the terms of the act, it could institute proceedings in the court against the party committing the infraction. I insist upon this, because we argued it in committee. Unless we place this responsibility and authority in the hands of the board, we are leaving labour relations where they are today, a matter of going through conciliation, a matter of going to the board, or of either employers or unions ignoring boards set up by the government, as has happened in the dispute between the lake shipping companies and the seamen's union.

The government appoints a board. The operators refuse to have anything to do with it. They ignore the law completely, with the result that you have anarchy in that industry today, and the Minister of Labour and the government are the goats. If the board were enforcing the act, as I am advocating now, it would have been in a position to take the offending party to court and have the penalties contained in the act applied.

I do not think there is any court in the country in a better position to determine which side in a dispute is in the wrong than the labour relations board that will administer this act when we get through with it. They sit in and listen to the evidence from both sides. They know who is reasonable and who is unreasonable. In addition to that, if this board has some such authority as we are trying to give to it, both unions and employers will approach it with a more respectful attitude. But if the board is to be merely constituted as a forum, and has no authority whatsoever in the matter of enforcement, these people will do as they have been doing; they just go in and argue the thing; and if they are not satisfied, they walk out. What happens after they are through there? The board has wasted its own time and the money of the government. Then it is a matter of the union's applying to the Minister of Labour for the right to prosecute the employer in the courts, or vice versa. In the seamen's union strike we have a good example right at the present time. This legislation does not work out and cannot work out. Unless we intend to enforce the act, I think we are wasting our time in setting it up.

As I said in a previous debate, I believe that we are now applying the rule of law to labour relations. We are setting up a labour jurisprudence. In my opinion this labour relations board should be a court in which would be determined any infractions of the law and so forth. Then it would be a matter of taking the case to the regular courts to have the penalties imposed. But unless we are prepared to change section 45 in order to give the board that authority to use if it sees fit to do so, we are wasting our time. As I say, I do not think it would be used often. But if both sides knew the board had that power and right, I think they would do everything reasonable and possible to settle their disputes in there before the board, without going out and fighting it out, as they are now doing in the lake shipping strike.

Mr. MITCHELL: If this amendment passes, we might as well just wipe out the board and the approach by way of conciliation by the labour department. It is beyond my imagination why people keep on talking and asking why we should not prosecute somebody and why we should not put somebody in jail, when we are dealing with labour disputes; and I would point out that it is not all on either one side or the other, I think the proper view—and it is the one we take—is that if you want a labour court, say so, and establish one.

Let me say this to my hon. friend. The establishment of a labour court is not the answer to the question. It is the easiest thing in the world to make the broad and general statement that if we had a labour court everything in the garden would be lovely. Recently there was a disastrous railway strike in the state of Queensland. A labour organization there defied the machinery—we will put it in that way—of the labour court. I have here a copy of the act passed by a labour government in the state of Queensland. People talk about legislation with regard to peaceful picketing and what have you; but I do not know of any piece of legislation in the world that compares with it. I am not saying that by way of criticism of what happened in Australia—I do not have to live there—but I think it is absolutely unsound to make into a judicial body a board which is composed of private individuals.

Mr. GILLIS: Nobody has suggested that.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not what you are suggesting; it is the end of the road of your suggestion.

Mr. GILLIS: No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL: You would establish a board as a judge and jury. That is what it amounts to. I do not think there is any substance in leave to prosecute in that court which is primarily concerned with the adjudication of labour disputes on the principle of conciliation. I think, if the amendment carried, it would completely destroy the usefulness of the board, and we should have to establish an entirely different agency.

There is another point I wish to mention. If my memory serves me correctly, since the establishment of the I.D.I.A. in Canada we have had only about eighteen prosecutions, and none of them was of a major character. If you make access to the courts too easy, all you do is to make the government, the board, or the minister a gravy train for every little dispute that takes place in connection with the agreement itself or the negotiation of the agreement. In my judgment you must have the common sense to pick out the substantial cases from those that are not substantial. In my department, since I have been the minister, I have often found that one side or the other wanted to prosecute; but by the procedure of conciliation we have been able to adjudicate the dispute. I think I said in committee that it is bad law—and I am not a lawyer but I have heard the expression used—to pass a law for the exception to the rule. In my judgment you would have to transfer completely the whole application of this act if this amendment carries.

Mr. GILLIS: May I say that the minister was talking on a completely different subject from the one I was dealing with. I did not advocate the setting up of a labour court.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course you did not.

Mr. GILLIS: I advocated giving power to the board to enforce this act through the regular courts of this country. I want to give them some authority to do something about their acts; that is all. The seamen's union strike should be an example to the minister. I know that if I were in the minister's position I would at least want some power and some authority, by means of which to protect myself where I have the responsibility, and the minister has not that power and authority now. I am not suggesting the setting up of a court at all. I am suggesting that this board should be able to determine when an infraction of the act is committed, and that the board should then be in a position to prosecute through the regular courts of this country. That is all I am suggesting.

Mr. MacINNIS: Whenever the minister is short of an argument with which to meet any case, he jumps away off to some other part of the world, pulls something out of there, and then puts that forward as an argument. The legislation in Queensland, and what happened there, have no relation at all to this matter. In that state the people were met with a situation with which they had to deal, and they had the courage to deal with it. But with this legislation under which we are now operating, when the minister is absolutely defied by an employer of labour, neither the minister, nor the department, nor anyone else can do anything about it. What is the use of passing legislation unless that legislation can be enforced? I know that all through this legislation penalties are provided. But the action is not dependent, as it would be under any other law, on the government's taking the action if the law is broken; it is dependent on the parties to the dispute. It is up to them to take action in the courts, if one party has the means to do that.

Is this not a case such as that referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West a moment ago? He referred to the small employer. There are small organizations that have not the money to bring cases to court. Surely that should be the responsibility of the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may say so, I think my hon. friend should be the last man on earth to say to me that I go to other parts of the world. For example, I have heard enough about Sweden and what is happening in New Zealand and in other countries. I do not say this in a critical sense. I merely quote the experience of labour courts in these countries where labour governments are in power.

My hon. friend spoke about a case that is before the courts at the present time. I do not know what the decision of the courts will be. I should not like to express an opinion on it. It has gone before the courts through the instrumentality of the parties concerned. Let me say this to my hon. friend. You can easily make a gravy train—

Mr. MacINNIS: What does the minister mean by "gravy train"? What is a gravy train? Who is it made for?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not made for anybody.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is a gravy train?

Mr. MITCHELL: A gravy train is a favourite phrase that is used in labour organizations—

Mr. MacINNIS: Not in mine.

Mr. MITCHELL: —that the government is the instrument for one side or the other to embarrass the other side through the courts in every little dispute that takes place. My hon. friend must know that this is the end of the road. What happens when there is no responsibility? They say, let the Minister of Labour face up to it, whether it is a national dispute or a provincial dispute. The soundest approach is to have to get leave from the board to prosecute. You can have your own machinery cluttered up with prosecutions, instead of sitting down around a table and compromising on the dispute in question. I still hold that opinion. I hate very much to turn the labour department or this national labour board into a police department. They can easily go before the board as laid down in this legislation and ask for leave to prosecute. That is the soundest approach to the matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: The point is that they must go to the minister for leave to prosecute. The minister referred to every little organization that wanted to get on the gravy train. I do not know what he meant by that. He did not explain the phrase to me. I imagine it is something out of which somebody gets something, but they cannot get it in any case until the minister indicates that there is a good reason for prosecution.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the hon. member missed my point.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What change do they want?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know whether I have made my point clear. I will leave the gravy train out of it.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member from northern British Columbia should know something about gravy trains.

Mr. GRAYDON: Put it on the switch.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. Where there is a lack of responsibility on either side, difficulties arise. Often people come to my office, or to the offices of officers of my department, and I can see that they are in the mood to prosecute somebody. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred, or even more than that, through the processes of conciliation they sit down one with another and make an agreement. Governments being what they are, and politicians being what they are, if you make the spending by governments for organizations, whether they be employees or employers, as easy as my hon. friend would have it I do not think this legislation would be worth the paper on which it is written.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think it is now worth the paper on which it is written.

Amendment (Mr. Gillis) negatived: yeas, 9; nays, 56.

Sections 54 to 74 inclusive agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: Clause 4 stands.

Mr. MITCHELL: In connection with an amendment to clause 4, a suggestion has been made. The legal officers are looking into the section and they have not completed their labour. We can agree that all the sections are carried with the exception of clause 4. I suggest that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again today if we can obtain the opinion of the legal officers; if not today, then some other day.

Progress reported.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT

PROVISIONS AS TO ISSUE, CONVERSION AND AMENDMENT

Mr. PAUL E. COTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 343, to amend the Government Annuities Act.

He said: In opening the discussion on the second reading of this bill, I think the house will expect me to give a summary of its amending provisions and the intentions which have governed the recommendations that such changes be implemented. Since its inception in 1908, the Government Annuities Act has not been substantially changed in many ways. The administration of the act was first given to the Department of Trade and Commerce, where it stayed until 1912, when it was transferred to the department of the Postmaster General. In 1922 it was given to the Department of Labour, where it still is. So far as the administrative structure of the act is concerned, there has not been anything done by way of amendment more than to change the minimum or maximum amount of annuity for which a purchaser was permitted to contract. This has been done from time to time.

I believe at this stage I should restrict my remarks as much as possible, and give a sort of perspective of the bill. Net receipts during the thirty-nine years from inception to March 31, 1948, total $462,814,944.90, over 50 per cent of which resulted from operations in the last five years. The rigidity of the present act has become more and more evident with the increasing volume of business. Family responsibilities and the financial status of many annuitants change over the years, and the present act provides little opportunity to alter original contracts to give effect to such changes. The main purpose of the bill is to provide more flexibility by permitting, within limits, the conversion and alteration of annuity contracts.

By reason of the arrangement of section 4 of the act, there is no authority for issuing or changing certain types of annuity contract. This lack of provision in the act defeats to a harmful extent the real objective of the act, namely, to fit each annuitant with the type and, within statutory limits, the kind of annuity best suited to his needs and means and to keep him so fitted during the life of the contract. The proposed amendments to this section extend to purchasers the freedom of choice as to the type and terms of authorized annuity contracts which might be required to meet changing circumstances. Authority to make regulations for the conversion and alteration of annuity contracts which are authorized by the new section is provided under the appropriate section.

The amount of the minimum annuity which may be sold is increased from $10 a year to $60 a year. It has been found that annuities yielding less than $5 a month are of little value to the annuitant and do not warrant the cost or expense involved in the selling, accounting and servicing. The total amount that might be paid by way of annuity or annuities to any annuitant or to joint annuitants has been increased from $1,200 to $1,500.

There is no substantial change involved in the provisions concerning payments in the event of death, but the section has been redrafted for purposes of greater clarity and certainty. In accordance with the authorized rates, when the holder of an immediate annuity dies no benefit is payable except to the extent of any guaranteed instalments of annuity, and immediate surrender of the purchase money is required. If the annuitant should die before having received even the first instalment of the annuity, the terms of the present act may be invoked to return the purchase money with interest to the heirs. This inconsistency in the benefit presumed in the calculation of rates and the provisions of the present act, has been removed by the amendments to this section. In addition, broader options are provided to the purchaser as to the disposition of payments under this section in extending the privilege of naming beneficiaries and of commuting guaranteed payments.

The basis to be followed in establishing interest rates is set out and provision made for a review of interest rates and mortality tables at least once every five years and for the return of premium payments in prescribed circumstances.

The section dealing with the accounts to be kept and the manner in which the liability for annuity contracts in force at the end of each fiscal year shall be calculated, has been redrafted for purposes of greater clarity and certainty. The wording has been discussed with and concurred in by representatives of the office of the auditor general and the comptroller of the treasury.

I submit that for the time being what I have said should be sufficient to open a useful discussion on the principle of the bill. There may be other points which hon. members would wish to clear up and which could be discussed in the house. These latter remarks would be more in order, however, when we reach the committee stage, because they can be related to the different sections of the bill.

I submit that, under these circumstances, the amendments sought to the Government Annuities Act have become necessary. This is the first time in thirty-nine years that an attempt has been made to modernize the administrative structure of the act. In view of the tremendous increase in business which began five or six years ago, it has become necessary to have this matter properly attended to by the house in the manner set out in the bill.

On motion of Mr. Cote (Verdun) the debate was adjourned.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

INVESTIGATION, CONCILIATION AND SETTLEMENT OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 195, to provide for the investigation, conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes (as amended)—Mr. Mitchell—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 4—Employer or employers' organization interference with trade union.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: An amendment was moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly, because I believe someone on the government side wishes to move a subamendment. Hon. members will understand that the amendment I have proposed seeks to achieve the same purpose as that sought by the bills I have introduced on several occasions, having to do with protecting the pension rights of railway and other workers. I withdrew my bill two weeks ago so that I might bring up the matter in this way and thus meet all the objections that have been made on the floor of this house.

One main objection to my Bill No. 24 of last year and my Bill No. 6 of this year was that if this kind of legislation was good it should apply, not just to railroad workers but to all workers. I have met that objection by suggesting that this protection be provided in the labour code.

Another objection made on the floor of this house was that the wording of my bill might have the effect of protecting the pension rights of those who took part in what is sometimes referred to as illegal strikes. By providing this protection through the medium of an amendment to this present bill, the benefits will be afforded only to those who meet the terms of the bill now before us. I suggest that my amendment quite clearly provides this protection only to those who find themselves out on strike after having gone through all the machinery laid down by this federal labour code.

I feel that I have met all the objections; yet if this amendment or some form of it passes it will meet the wishes, not only of railway workers but of thousands of other workers across the country. It would prevent a recurrence of the injustice that occurred in 1919 when pension rights were lost by Canadian Pacific railway employees who were on strike in that year.

This amendment—I regret to say—does not have any retroactive effect. The rights of the men of 1919 is another matter which I shall continue to pursue. However I should like to say, on behalf of those men, that if this amendment or some form of it carries today, even though their case has not yet been rectified they will rejoice in the fact that there is now legislation to prevent it from ever happening again. I know that from what many of these men have said to me, numbers of whom have passed on during the five or six years I have been bringing these matters to the floor of this house.

I commend this strongly to hon. members of the committee on behalf of thousands of workers across this country. I hope that this amendment, either in its present form or in some alternative form which the minister may suggest, may be passed at this time.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amendment that has been moved by the hon. member is to section 4, subsection 2(b). Personally I would have thought that clause (b) as it now stands would answer the purposes and objects of the hon. gentleman. However, he has moved an amendment which perhaps can be accepted in principle. There are one or two objections I should like to make, but I do not want to take up the time of the committee by making them. I think, if the wording of the hon. gentleman's amendment could be changed somewhat it would meet any objections that I would have in so far as my responsibilities for the railroads are concerned. I have prepared a further amendment which I hope will be acceptable to the hon. member and which reads:

That section 4, subsection 2(b) be further amended by changing the period after the word "act" to a comma, and adding thereafter the following words:

"and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, no employer shall deny to any employee any pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled by reason only of his ceasing to work after the commencement of this act as the result of a lockout or while taking part in a concerted stoppage of work due to a labour dispute where such lockout or stoppage of work has been enforced by the employer or called by the recognized representative of such employee, as the case may be, after all steps provided or contemplated by law have been taken through negotiation, collective bargaining, conciliation and arbitration to settle such dispute or by reason only of dismissal contrary to this act."

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If this subamendment is satisfactory, will the hon. member be willing to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. KNOWLES: As I understand the proposal made by the Minister of Transport, this wording he read will be passed as an addition to section 4, subsection 2(b). If that is the case, I am happy to accept it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his amendment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) withdrawn.

Amendment (Mr. Chevrier) agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have one or two questions I should like to ask the minister. Is there an action now pending in the courts to test the validity of P.C. 1003?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, before the Quebec courts.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the government represented?

Mr. MITCHELL: We have counsel there.

Mr. MacINNIS: This act will come into force on proclamation. Would it not be desirable to bring it into effect as early as possible?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is being considered. When the constitutionality of an act is being attacked I think it is the duty of the government to be represented by counsel.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to see that this bill has reached the stage of adoption. As you know, Mr Chairman, ever since you and I came here about nineteen years ago, sixteen years of that time I was a member of the industrial relations committee, and I took part in all the discussions that occurred there during that time. A year or two ago, for reasons unknown to me, I was left off the committee, notwithstanding the fact that I have been a labour man nearly all my life and associated with the operations of labour and big business. Because I did not hear any of the discussions before the committee, I refrained from saying anything on the bill, but I should like to say a word or two at this time.

A few moments ago I voted against an amendment which would have reinserted subsection 8 of section 32 in the bill. That subsection had the effect of barring lawyers from appearing before conciliation boards. During my many years in business and my connection with controversies of one kind and another, I know that many lawyers who were honest in their convictions have rendered good service, both to the employees and to the employers. I have in mind several of these gentlemen, but in particular I am thinking of Mr. Bernard Rose, K.C., of Montreal.

Since there was a possibility that lawyers would be barred from appearing before conciliation boards, I have received many letters of protest. For years it has been the job of Mr. Rose to appear before conciliation boards on behalf of labour, and for that reason I opposed the amendment which would have barred such lawyers from acting in that capacity. Mr. Bernard Rose had the respect of the labour unions and of businessmen. I am glad to see that such lawyers as he is and others like him will now be permitted to appear in the settling of disputes. I am sure the minister knows the man I refer to, and knows many others like him of great ability and honesty of purpose.

I have just a word or two further to say. I was in big business for many years and had much to do with labour and disputes between business and labour. I found that the large majority of labour leaders were honest, upright, devoted men, imbued with the spirit of doing the best they could for the men they represented, but wholly against a strike unless it became absolutely necessary. They have often told me, and it is true, that a strike does not pay either side. It does not pay the working man, because it means he is out of work and without his weekly pay envelope for as long as the strike lasts. It does not pay the employer, because his wheels are not turning and production is stopped. So I am absolutely convinced that the vast majority of labour leaders and of business operators are happy to avoid a strike and happy to see any dispute between management and labour settled by negotiation. That has been my experience. It is only the odd man in either camp who might want to have a row.

If this bill does what everybody hopes it will do, it will be a very good bill. It is along the lines I have advocated in this house for the past fifteen or sixteen years. There is no reason why the honest labour leader and the honest industrialist cannot sit down together with their feet under the same table and settle their disputes. I have seen it done many times. I have seen only one strike in the line industry in which I was engaged, comprising several plants, for many years, because the labour leaders there were sound, sensible, honest men, who wanted the best they could get for their men, naturally, but wanted, if at all possible, to avoid a strike. That is the type of man, both in labour and in management, that I have been dealing with all my labouring and business life. I have served in the labour ranks and paid my dues in a very large organization with which I was associated many years ago.

I am happy to see this bill pass and trust that it will realize the hopes of all of us.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT

PROVISIONS AS TO ISSUE, CONVERSION AND AMENDMENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cote (Verdun) for the second reading of Bill No. 343, to amend the Government Annuities Act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, we have done a pretty fair day's work and perhaps Your Honour will call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, by an interesting coincidence, it is exactly forty years ago tomorrow, June 18, 1908, that the Government Annuities Act was given second reading by this House of Commons. When one considers the individualistic ideas of that time, the act was indeed a forward step, and many Canadians have been grateful to the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for what they did at that time. I am afraid, however, that Canadians generally will not feel so grateful about the changes being made in that act by the present government forty years later.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cote), in introducing the bill this afternoon, referred to some of the changes being made as administrative in character. He also said that in some cases the aim is to loosen up the rigidity of the act with respect to altering contracts, and I agree that those provisions are all to the good.

However, there are, in the amending act now before us, at least two provisions which I very much dislike. One of them is the provision that the rate of interest to be used in computing the rates for the purchase of annuities shall be tied to the rate of interest on government bonds, with certain qualifications which I need not go into at this time. That provision confirms the action taken by order in council just before April 19, which resulted in a considerable increase in the cost of annuities as from April 19 of this year. The other change which is provided for in this act and which I deplore is one that actually introduces an element of rigidity which was not there before.

I use that word, because the parliamentary assistant this afternoon boasted of the fact that in some respects the amendment was to get rid of some of the rigidities. I point out to him that this amending bill introduces an element of rigidity not there before, in that, from now on, government annuities will have to be taken out on the understanding that regular payments of the same amount must be made at specified intervals.

Previously it was possible to take out an annuity contract and make payments at any time in almost any amount. I think the minimum acceptable at one time was twenty-five cents. I have no doubt there have been some abuses of the wide latitude which was provided, but it seems to me that the government is going too far toward the other extreme in making contracts so rigid that people will be frightened from taking out government annuities. It will seem to many people another commitment they have to tie themselves to, which they might not be able to meet, and therefore there will be reluctance to take out annuities because of that feature.

I indicated at the outset that this legislation saw its birth in this house forty years ago tomorrow, and the parliamentary assistant has already given figures to indicate its popularity across the years, and in particular, according to the figures he gave this afternoon, its mounting popularity in the last five years or so.

As at March 31, 1948, 210,796 Canadians held annuity contracts. That number is not great compared with the total population of Canada, but it is a substantial beginning, looking toward the goal which the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated last night, a contributory old age pension scheme that might enable Canadians to provide adequately for their own old age.

May I remind the house again that the preamble to the original act as passed back in 1908, being chapter 5 of the statutes of Canada for that year, in the reign of Edward VII, read:

> Whereas it is in the public interest that habits of thrift be promoted and that the people of Canada be encouraged and aided thereto so that provision may be made for old age; and whereas it is expedient that further facilities be afforded for the attainment of the said objects; therefore His Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada enacts as follows . . .

Then followed the terms of the act itself. This indicated that even in those days, which are looked upon as having been more individualistic than is the case today, there was recognition of the partnership that could be played by individuals and the community in providing for old age.

On the basis of that legislation, despite the fact that until recently it has been given little advertising or publicity, over 200,000 Canadians now hold contracts. This means that as at March 31, 1948, there were 210,796 Canadians who had the beginnings of a contributory old age pension plan. Of that total figure I have given, 118,733 held what are known as individual contracts, and the rest, 92,063, held certificates in group plans.

May I characterize those two groups of people in another way? What it means is that the 118,733 Canadians who, at March 31 of this year, held individual plans were participants in a two-way contributory old age pension plan. The individuals paid and the government paid a small amount. The others, 92,063, were participants in the really desirable kind of contributory old age pension plan, a three-way plan; the three contributors were the individuals themselves, their employers and the government.

The government's contribution in both cases, until April 19 of this year, consisted of the whole cost of administration of the plan, plus an element of subsidy which came into the picture by virtue of the fact that the rates on annuities were calculated on the basis of a rate of interest a little bit higher than the government would have to pay on the open market. But since April 19, that element of subsidy has in effect been removed; and that new policy is confirmed by the bill now before us. From now on, the rates which must be paid for annuities are based on an interest rate which is tied to the going rate of interest on government bonds. In other words, the government is putting into this fund nothing more than what it would have to pay to borrow that money anyway. This means that from now on, when an individual takes out an individual contract, it is a one-way contributory old age pension plan instead of a two-way one. It means that, from now on, individuals who take out certificates in group plans become participants in only a two-way plan, the contributions being paid by the individuals and by their employers, but no longer by the government. It seems to me that this is a step in the wrong direction, and I find it hard to understand the Liberal government of 1948 going back on the good beginning made by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1908.

May I remind the house once again that this change in the basic interest rate that is used for computing the cost of annuities has had the effect of increasing the amount that people have to pay in order to buy them? The increases vary according to the type of plan, the age of the purchaser, and other factors; but in the main, if a person is sixty years of age or so, and is putting his savings into an immediate annuity as a lump sum, he will now have to pay about 15 per cent or 16 per cent more than he had to pay prior to April 19. On the other hand, if a person is twenty or twenty-five years of age or so, and takes out an annuity contract for which he will make periodic payments with a view to the annuity maturing at age sixty or sixty-five, he will have to pay from 36 per cent to 44 per cent more than was the case prior to April 19. That shows up the way in which the element of subsidy has been withdrawn, and it points out the way in which the government's contribution in this contributory scheme has been stopped.

As I have already indicated, it seems to me that is a reversal of a good Liberal policy of 1908, and I am indeed sorry that the government has taken this step. I have expressed this view before on the floor of this house this year, and it was inevitable that a certain amount of correspondence should come to me about this matter. I have been interested in the cross-section of the community from which this correspondence has come. It has come from individuals of small means and from workers, as well as from companies and concerns, who feel that the basis of a good three-way contributory plan has been badly upset.

As I indicated previously, this has the effect of introducing discrimination as between various people. It just does not seem fair that some of us who may have taken out annuity contracts prior to April 19 are able to buy our old age pension at a cheaper rate than is somebody else of the same age who takes out an annuity contract now. The same thing holds true with regard to employees working for one and the same firm. Employees in a particular firm who held their certificates prior to April 19 are buying their retirement at a cheaper rate than are those who have become members of the same company's group plan subsequently to April 19. I do not like it, and I am sure that the people of Canada feel the same way about it.

A good deal has been said, in defence of the government's action, about the need for keeping the fund actuarially sound. In reply to a question I asked on a former occasion, the Minister of Labour gave figures as to the amount of money that the government was having to put into this fund, not only to pay for the cost of administration but to make up the accruing deficit. The minister said something to the effect that common sense would dictate a change in policy in order to avoid these mounting deficits. I believe the figure—and I will give an outside one—ran to something like $1,500,000 altogether for administration and for making up the deficit for the last year for which the minister gave the figures.

To some people this seems to be a final argument, that we should not be spending money which one might call the meeting of a deficit. Actually it is a subsidy; and, as hon. members know, we in this house certainly subsidize a great many things. Some of us want to see subsidized some things that are not yet on the list—such as food and other necessities the prices of which have gone sky high. But surely this is one thing that is deserving of a subsidy from the public treasury, namely, the attempt of people to help to provide for their own old age. I know the argument which is sometimes used is that it means that several million people must pay taxes in order to help a few hundred thousand achieve this purpose; but the result is that you make it possible for those few hundred thousand to keep from going on the other old age pension; that will save money for those who pay taxes. You also get established the beginnings of something that could be enlarged to a universal scheme.

I suggest that the arguments about deficit financing do not hold at all. If we can afford, for example, to forgo $5,000,000 of federal revenue this year in order to make the change in the income tax law that the Minister of Finance made a few weeks ago, then we can afford $1,000,000, $1,500,000 or $5,000,000 a year for a purpose of this kind, namely, to help

Canadians in all age brackets to provide, adequately and in a dignified way, for their own old age.

Another argument put up against the plan as it was in existence before has been that it did not seem logical for the government to pay four per cent on money that was put into annuities when it was paying on other borrowings, say three per cent, or whatever the figure might be. I again remind the government that there is a considerable difference between money that is put in government bonds which you can redeem at a stated period or at any time and money that you put into an annuity which you can never get back except by attaining your retirement age. If the government had to sell bonds with a condition of that kind attached to them, the government would certainly have to pay four or five per cent or more to get money of that kind. Therefore the two things are not at all analogous.

There may be general approval, in this house at any rate, of the proposal to increase to $1,500 the maximum amount of an annuity. That is in keeping with the fact that the cost of living has gone up. Whereas $600 was a good annuity forty years ago when Mr. Fielding brought in his bill, that is no longer the case. Neither is the $1,200 which has been the law up until the present time. I point out, however, that to the great mass of people who would like to provide something for their old age the possibility of taking out an annuity of $1,500, which they cannot afford, is small consolation for the fact that they have to pay more for the $800 or the $1,000 or possibly the $1,200 annuity which they might have been able to afford under the old rates.

We will not object to this increase, but I say it is small consolation. What the people of Canada want, individuals and people who work for companies that are trying to establish these pension plans, and companies themselves, is a return to the admittedly subsidized basis. That was the beginning, as I say, of a contributory plan. I emphasize again that, in the case of group contracts, this had the merit of being a three-way contributory plan.

I have already made reference to the change that is provided for in the act, by means of which payments will now have to be made in a stated amount at regular intervals. I just want to say again that this sort of thing will make government annuities less attractive to a great many people. I have been led to believe that there may be some way in which some exceptions may be made; but the wording looks pretty tight to me in the section that deals with this matter. It has all the earmarks of a change designed to lessen the sale of government annuities.

A while ago I gave the figure as at March 31, 1948. The total number of contracts in existence then was 210,796. That figure includes 14,237 individual contracts taken out in the year ended March 31, 1948, not to mention group certificates. That was the largest number of individual contracts ever taken out in any one year. Even after that, during the first nineteen days of April, 1948, or in other words, prior to the day when the rates were changed, 1,519 individual contracts were taken out. That number of 1,519 individual contracts taken out in the first nineteen days of April, 1948, was larger than the number of individual contracts ever taken out in any single month during the history of the annuities act. In other words, this plan was beginning to become very popular. It looks to us, and it looks to a great many people, as though insurance companies and others, who were finding this plan competition which they could not meet, were able to use their influence in such a way as to bring about a change which makes this plan not nearly the useful one that the Canadian people have found it to be in the past.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government back in 1908 took a forward step when they brought down this act forty years ago tomorrow. I am sorry, and the Canadian people are sorry, that this backward step is now being taken, and I hope that even yet the government might reconsider its position and restore the rates for these annuities to the rates that were in existence prior to April 19 of this year.

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): I should like to say a few words on these annuities. I might say that if you are twenty-five years of age and far-sighted enough to plan ahead to when you will be sixty-five and want to retire on $100 a month, it will cost you $186.12 a year instead of $129.12, or 44 per cent more to do so now with the dominion government annuities than before a recent order in council cut the interest rate from four to three per cent. If you are twenty, the new plan will cost you $151.44 a year instead of $101.28, or an increase of 49·5 per cent; if thirty-five, $295.08 instead of $218.64, or an increase of 35 per cent, and if forty, $385.08 instead of $294.48, or an increase of 30·8 per cent. These figures were listed recently by W. D. Welsford, manager of William M. Mercer Limited, independent pension consultants, to show how cutting the interest rate by one per cent boosted the new rates.

In relation to company retirement plans for their employees, the difference is even more startling. Under the new rates it will cost a firm 130 per cent more to finance the pension of a forty year old worker than under the old. A firm with five hundred workers, considering a retirement plan based on the annuities, will pay an additional $150,000 for past employees' service just to get the scheme in operation. In ten years the one per cent interest cut will mean $200,000 from this one company's treasury.

Setting back mortality tables by three years, in addition to the interest cut, is another blow at the annuities. Such a revision is not justified on the basis of a group plan. Even the insurance companies are not using as stiff a table as this, and they are making money.

Another factor that will affect the popularity of these annuities is that it will no longer be possible to pay odd amounts at odd times at the post office toward the annuity. Hitherto you could pay as little as twenty-five cents a week, or prepay as much as $1,000 if you had the ready cash. Now the annuities are on a firm contract basis, and special arrangements have to be made for prepayment, while arrears must be paid within reasonable limits, according to the government announcement.

However, there is nothing to indicate that people who bought their annuities before April 19 will have to change their method of payment. Keeping the two classes of customers apart may turn out to be an administrative problem of headache proportions. What if the dominion government bonds which now pay 2·95 per cent could not be cashed in at any time? They certainly would not be as popular. Where else can the government borrow money at three per cent, as they will be able to with the new annuities?

Another point is that if the government annuities are made less attractive, it will not mean that pension plans and individual annuities will be purchased from insurance companies instead. It will mean that they just will not be purchased, and the possibility of old age security within the framework of private enterprise will disappear.

Still another point is that if annuities remain attractive, Canada's expanding population and level of business activity would result in more money being collected by the government in premiums than would be paid out and that this could be an anti-inflationary measure.

Unless cash surrender values are offered, a lowering of the interest rate will mean relatively few government annuities sold. A larger part of corporation funds will be directed to plant investment and the payment of dividends and the important deflationary force will disappear.

An upward movement in interest rates has started which should increase the insurance companies' earnings beyond four per cent. If insurance company contracts did not have to bear such a high loading for commissions and expenses, it should be possible to make them quite competitive with government annuity contracts, particularly since the insurance company contracts offer cash values, and the government annuity contracts do not.

It has been suggested that the $1,200 a year limit should be raised to $2,000, because a couple can no longer retire comfortably on $1,200 a year.

Many people bought annuities by the small payment plan. Parents saved this way to educate their children to fit them for different walks of life. I think our government with the huge surplus on hand have forgotten that perhaps never in the history of Canada have our people found it as hard to make a living and raise and educate their children. It is difficult for most Canadian citizens to understand why the government should lower the interest rate on annuities, while at the same time the policy of the Bank of Canada has been changed so that interest yields on government and other bonds are increased.

Mr. JOHN R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure that the change in the interest rate from four to three per cent will not defeat the purpose the framers of the original act had in mind, namely, to have as many as possible of the lower-paid classes take part in a government scheme of this kind, because that will increase the cost to the annuitant.

I am aware that at page 59 of the report issued by the Department of Labour it is stated that about $977,089 had to be transferred from one account to another, evidently because reserves had run down. But the report does not state that this transfer of money occurred as a result of the lower rates before 1936, or how much of it occurred after the rates were raised in 1936, when they were advanced 15 per cent. I think that should have been stated, because perhaps before 1936 the rate was too low. However, the advancing of the rate by 15 per cent in 1936 should have made the program self-sustaining. Those who were interested before that time should not be penalized if the rates were not high enough.

I have the idea that the bill should not be proceeded with at this session. It should be deferred until next session, so that a special committee could be set up to which actuaries from outside as well as the department's actuaries and other experts could be summoned to give the committee facts and figures as to whether the rates should have been again raised.

The rates have already been raised several times; and since 1936, they had to be changed again in 1938. Some rates were up and some were down, which goes to show that whoever prepared those rates was not sure of what he was doing. Perhaps the present state of affairs is not satisfactory. Maybe the rates should be raised again; maybe they should be lowered again.

That is why I feel action should be deferred until next session, so that a parliamentary committee set up by the house would have power to call witnesses to advise as to whether the rate of interest should be lowered from four to three per cent, and whether all the other insurance rates should remain as they are at the present time or not.

I have always supported government annuities and looked upon them as something for the benefit of the ordinary worker. The facts show that the subscriptions are to a greater extent taken up by that earner class, because of those who arranged for payments up to $1,200 a year, about 90 per cent arranged amounts less than that. This shows that the investors were people of ordinary means. I shall not repeat what I said on the first occasion this matter was discussed, when I opposed the reduction from four to three per cent. In my judgment action should be deferred until another session to allow a proper investigation by a parliamentary committee.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, for the second time today I find myself opposed to the government on a matter of policy. At this time it is extremely unfortunate that the government has taken this opportunity to show its lack of co-operation with the employers of Canada in the attempts they have been making in increasing measure to provide security for their employees in their old age. I believe the average forward-thinking industrial concern in Canada has been greatly interested in the welfare of its employees who reach the age of retirement.

I know the minister himself is much concerned with the difficulty the older people are having in finding employment after they reach the age of forty-five. I notice that the C.C.F. party have taken occasion to castigate one of the larger lumber operators in British Columbia. But I would point out to the minister and also to the C.C.F. that this very concern paid a good deal over a million dollars into the government annuities fund this year, paying up back pensions of its employees, thus allowing those employees to take part in the pension plan without any payments being made on their part, and also providing this year's payments of employees' annuities.

At this particular time it might be wise to call to the attention of the government its niggardly treatment of civil servants. I do not wish to be unkind or unfair, because I think there has been too much said by hon. members opposite about judges' pensions and pensions of transport commissioners; but I do feel that in many departments of government the treatment has not been generous. For instance, I know of a lifeboat man who had worked with the Department of Transport for the last thirty-five years and who had never been given an opportunity by the government to contribute toward his security in old age. At a very late date, when this man was getting very old, he was allowed to contribute to the scheme. However, instead of the government doing as forward-looking private employers in Canada have done, namely, paying up the back pension, the government has asked these men to make their own back contributions out of their pensions. The lifeboat man I have in mind retired at the age of sixty-eight with a pension of $40 a month from which the government deducted $17 as back payments, leaving a net pension, after thirty-five years of service, of only $23 a month.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Sounds just like the Liberals.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I do not think the government can be proud of that record. It seems to me that this would be a wonderful opportunity for the government to encourage industrial employers throughout the country to co-operate with their employees, to take an interest in the welfare of the men who helped to contribute to their business, and who made their business successful.

I am sure every dollar we spend this way in connection with these pensions, or the subsidies we pay in these annuity plans, is worth $10 of the moneys we spend in the settlement of industrial disputes. Sometimes I think the higher strategy committee of the government wonders why they lose by-elections. I think today's vote on the labour bill must give them some kind of idea as to why they may not always expect the 100 per cent support of labour.

The very fact that the government has denied people living in the outlying districts the privilege of having some kind of refrigeration, the opportunity of importing even a small number of kerosene refrigerators from the United States, does not make friends for the government. In a case of this kind, every time an employee comes in and finds that he is paying a higher rate for his pension than those who entered the scheme last year, they will be conscious of the fact that they are being discriminated against.

The government has not been wise in bringing in this legislation.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They are just not wise.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to protest against the action taken on April 19 last by order in council in connection with this matter. I can find no better summary of the effect of the order in council than that which appeared in an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen. It summarizes my viewpoint on the question; indeed I believe it summarizes the viewpoint of many thousands of people throughout the country. I quote from it:

> Because of this ill-considered decision sales of annuities to persons of modest means will decrease, the number of employees covered by pension plans will be lessened, the cost of such plans raised unnecessarily and the savings for old age discouraged.

This annuity plan represented an arrangement between the government of Canada and those who would enter into contracts believing that the provisions of the annuity plan would remain in effect. The changes that were made have never been justified by the minister. At the time of the change he did give an explanation which did not appeal to the reason of many members of this house and of many people in this country.

If there is one thing more than any other that will preserve private enterprise in this country it is the encouragement of industry to enter into retirement plans with a view to assuring a measure of security for their employees which too often in the past has been denied. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) has stated, many industries entered into this arrangement with a view to discharging their responsibilities to the end that private industry would not, at the expiry of the period of service on the part of their employees, place those employees out of work and a charge upon the country as a whole.

The annuity plan has been working out to the advantage of thousands and thousands of people who are under these employer-employee contracts. Without any warning, and indeed, without any justification, a decision was made which I do not believe represents the views of the minister and his department. We do not know why that change was made. We do not know who suggested it.

A commission was set up some years ago under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Ives, a former chief justice of Alberta, to inquire into the taxation of annuities. It found that eighty-seven per cent of the recipients of annuities held contracts for less than $900 a year, and that three-quarters of the annuitants were receiving less than $600 a year. It is something that benefited men and women with low incomes; it was not taken out to any extent by those with large incomes. According to the findings of the commission only 131 annuitants, or less than one-half of one per cent, were drawing over $1,200 a year, to which figure the amount of individual annuities was restricted in 1931.

In my opinion the action taken by this government constitutes a backward and improper step. The situation was summarized by the financial editor of one of the great newspapers in this country, who said:

> . . . the change will sound the deathknell for a number of industrial pension plans now in the process of being set up.

One of the arguments used over and over again against private enterprise is that employers in business fail to assure the measure of security that they ought to for their employees. Because of the rates that were available and because the contracts they entered into were with the government, many employers entered into such contracts believing that the government would continue similar provisions in all future contracts. Even yet the minister should give reconsideration to the decision made by the order in council of April 19. Some reforms and changes should be made in the provisions of annuities; but to interfere with the principles of contracts is a denial of principle which cannot be denied.

I realize that it is almost useless to protest against what has been done, but I want the house and the country to know that in my opinion the action taken by the government was unjustifiable and should not be accepted by parliament.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on the second reading of this bill. The case against it was put most excellently by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The purpose of the annuities act when it was put on the statute books forty years ago was to help people with small means to save for the time when they would no longer be able to earn. We should not overlook that purpose.

We are now paying old age pensions to many people who are over the age of seventy years, and there is a growing demand that we begin paying these pensions at the age of sixty-five years. According to the statement given the other evening by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), we know there are now 275,000 persons receiving old age pensions. According to the figures given tonight by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, something over 210,000 are paying into the annuity plan.

Surely we should not place too much emphasis on the actuarial soundness of this scheme. The hon. member gave the deficit as being $1,500,000, including administration. If we take the number of persons paying into the scheme, this means about $7 a year per person. Surely it is worth $7 a year per person to this government to encourage people to pay into a plan of this kind, so that when they reach the age of sixty-five years, or whatever the retirement age is, they will have sufficient to look after themselves and not have to come to the state for old age pensions.

I think it would pay the government—by government I mean the people of this country, because, after all, it is the people who must pay the deficit—to make up this deficit. This government is contributing to a number of old age pensions, some in whole and some in part.

The contributions made by the government in 1946-47 to the civil service superannuation fund amounted to $3,160,000. Let it be clearly understood that I am not objecting to that; but consider the comparatively small number for whose benefit that was paid in comparison with the number of those who are trying to put something aside through the purchase of a government annuity in order that they may have some independence in their old age. It may be said these civil servants are working for the government and, because of that, they have a claim on the government for assistance in building up a superannuation fund. But I say they are no more working for the government than the great mass of the Canadian people who are working on our farms, in our factories, in our mines and in the mills, or wherever they may be, producing the wealth of this country. The minister is not in the house at the moment, but I suggest to his parliamentary assistant and to such members of the government as are now present that they reconsider this bill in all its implications and suspend discussion on it, so that further consideration may be given either to withdrawing it or to amending it drastically.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us decreases the rate of interest paid to annuitants and diminishes the benefits of an annuity bought under this government scheme. It is difficult to understand the policies of the present government in these days. One might expect retreat from good social legislation by a reactionary government. One would expect such a step as this in days of decadence, but it is not the sort of thing one would expect from a Liberal government. Today the Canadian people realize that a government annuity within the reach of the average Canadian citizen is both good government and good business, and the people of Canada are expecting the government to move in that direction. Instead, we find that the government is placing these government annuities a little further beyond the reach of the average citizen. In other words, a government annuity costs more and the returns from it are less. It can mean only one thing. It means that fewer people will buy government annuities and get the benefit of an annuity in their old age from the Canadian government. If we could get twice or three times as many Canadians to subscribe to a government annuity fund and get its benefits, we would save at least that much in the amount we have to pay out in old age pensions.

It is good for the people of a country to feel that they are providing for themselves in their old age through a government annuity scheme. The tragedy of poverty overtaking people in their declining years is only too evident in Canada today. Instead of doing something to relieve that situation and making people happier and more contented, we find a Liberal government making these annuities less attractive; going in the wrong direction altogether by placing these annuities further out of the reach of the people of this country. I do not know why the government is retreating from this field. I do not know whether they favour private enterprise moving in to occupy it, but I know that some day the real cause will be exposed. We cannot do much more than protest against the step that is being taken here, and we shall continue to protest against it. I assure the government of this, that they are moving in the wrong direction.

Mr. HARRY R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am greatly surprised that the government should bring forward this measure to make it much more difficult than it has been for Canadian citizens to make some provision for their old age. I should think, with the social conscience which has developed in this country within the last fifteen or twenty years, that wherever there was some evidence of self-help on the part of our people, the government would certainly not discourage that tendency but would rather encourage it, even though it might have cost $1,500,000 each year, so that our Canadian people might by their own provision look forward to having some financial resources in their old age.

This bill not only reduces the interest rate from four to three per cent, but it makes the mortality table more severe, so that the cost goes up against the annuitant. Administrative costs, which in the case of all social measures such as the family allowance and so forth, have been borne by the government, will now be saddled upon those who are trying to help themselves in a very modest way by providing an income of $1,200 or less per annum for themselves; and the bill increases the maximum annuity by $300, making it $1,500 altogether.

What is the true rate of interest on money? This government, by its managed economy, by the operation of the Bank of Canada, has forced interest rates down, not to four per cent but to three per cent, and in recent years even less than that. We all remember when government bonds sold to yield five per cent; and I can recall Ontario bonds, when the credit of the province was as good as that of the dominion, selling to yield six per cent. Has the minister told us what the average rate of interest on Canadian bonds has been during the last twenty to thirty years? No, he has not. He would probably have to say it was in excess of four per cent, which up to the moment has been the prevailing rate on government annuities. But now, through the government's own manipulation of credit, having forced the rate of interest on bonds down to three per cent, it seeks to apply that rate against our citizens who are trying in a very modest way to provide some financial resources for their old age.

But in addition to having forced the interest rate down, what kind of dollars is this government giving to the people of Canada who, during the last twenty or thirty years, have been paying their hard-earned money into this government annuity scheme? Certainly they are not the same kind of dollars that were paid in. The government has benefited because, through the drop in the value of the dollar, the government, which got paid in three bushels of wheat or in three hours of work, is now paying it back at the rate of two bushels of wheat or two hours of work. Where is the fair play in that? Where is the even break which the government should give to its own citizens who have the foresight to try to look after themselves. The government has gained a tremendous amount in actual dollars under this annuity scheme. The so-called monetary loss of $1,500,000 a year does not begin to offet the actual gain which the government has made because of the changed value of the dollar. You pay in when the dollar is a hard dollar, and the government pays out when the dollar is worth half as much.

I should also like to point out that under our old age pension scheme such as it is today we have the means test, which is an abomination and which accounted for the loss of seats to a certain political group in the province of Ontario recently as much as any other one thing did. Certainly in my own riding, provincially speaking, it was without question one of the greatest factors, and no differentiation was made between the dominion government and the provincial government in regard to the contributions or the administration of old age pensions. The means test, I repeat, is an abomination.

I cannot understand for a moment why a young person starting out in work, who never expects to get a very great deal, because of his position or his contribution to our society, should save, since he is little better off at the end than if he had spent all the money himself. The old age pension comes along, and if the pensioner has some capital that he has saved he will not, because of this means test, get the benefit of his own savings.

To come to annuities in relation to old age pensions, as long as this system obtains, if a person has any income he or she does not get the old age pension, and that is another channel through which the dominion government has to date, although I hope it will not benefit much longer, saved for itself a great deal of money.

It would be interesting to know on whose advice the government has seen fit to introduce this measure. Is it on the advice of certain interested parties in this country, or is it on the advice of its own financial advisers? I think it would be of extreme interest to the house, if the minister, or the parliamentary assistant in charge of the bill, would indicate to us just where the suggestion came from.

There are objections on the part of some institutions which sell annuities that it has been unfair to them for the government to quote lower rates, but I believe the social significance of government annuities far outweighs any objections which they might have.

It has also been pointed out that well-to-do people have taken advantage of the government annuities system whereby they can get four per cent interest on their savings rather than three per cent if they invested those savings directly in government bonds. But there are comparatively few people in that class who take advantage of it; and, as has been pointed out by one of my colleagues, the average annuity under the government scheme is for less than $600.

The bearing of this change upon the employee retirement plans will be of great significance. It has been an inducement for corporations to inaugurate retirement plans, using dominion government annuities as the basis, because there was at least some semblance of a fair return on contributions by employer and by employee when four per cent was allowed on them. It might be said that everyone does not share in these government annuities, and that is so. They are not universal, but they are open to all. Yet the government sees fit to discourage those who are willing to exercise some measure of self-help.

I cannot refrain at this moment from saying a word about the government's attitude, now as in past years, towards government annuities. It is only a matter of four or five years since the Liberal government caused Canada to break its word for, I believe, the first time on record, when, after having sold these annuities on the basis of a limitation of $1,200 per annum, which would be tax free, the government changed the method of taxation and subjected them to income tax. Subsequently seeing the wrongfulness of that action, they retraced their steps to some extent, and a new provision was passed whereby only the income-earning element and not the capital of the annuity was taxed. I think it is now on a fair basis; nevertheless the government has not wiped off the stain left on its escutcheon when it committed a breach of faith and broke the word of the dominion with people who had purchased the annuities.

May I also point out that when it is said that these annuities under the present four per cent rate are costing the taxpayer generally a certain amount of money, even though it is small, there are many things under our system as it obtains today wherein there is not complete fairness or equity. I shall mention the retirement plans which exist under many corporations and institutions, and even under the government itself.

There the worker is allowed to deduct, let us say four or five per cent of his wages and have the amount paid into the retirement plan before taxation, and in practically every case the corporation or employer will contribute a similar amount which does not enter into his taxation bracket. Ultimately, when the employee benefits, when he is retired, the amount he gets is taxed, but it is obvious to all that at that time the former employee's income bracket is such that he is subject to little or no tax. Yet the great bulk of our citizens are not fortuniate enough to belong to institutions, whether the government or large corporations, that can afford to put into operation these retirement plans, so that they cannot save before taxation as can hundreds of thousands of our citizens who do come under these retirement plans which get the authorization of the Minister of Finance.

So there we have one continuing form of discrimination, if the government wishes to rely on discrimination as the basis for making this change in government annuities. I believe, and certainly the Progressive Conservative party believes, that we should make adequate provision for the old age of our people, and we believe that it should be made under a contributory old age pension scheme.

When a young man or a young woman starts working, he or she should start contributions to a plan; the employer should make a contribution, and the state should make a contribution, so that when that young man or young woman reaches the age of retirement, he or she can retire with a competence which is at least decent and not insufficient to keep body and soul together.

I believe it is an essential lack of sincerity in any party which believes in a contributory old age pension plan if it feels that it can support this bill, which makes it more difficult for our people to provide a reasonable measure of social security for themselves. Certainly I for one believe, in fact I not only believe but I think I may say I know, that with the resources and the prosperity of the country we must put a floor of social security under our people.

This government, however, in introducing this change in the annuities act, is making it more difficult for the individual to put a floor under himself. So that the government is not living up to what might be considered its declared principles, and certainly the Progressive Conservative party believes in a contributory old age pension scheme in which there will be a contribution by the state. The amount that is now given by the government under the dominion annuities scheme is a very small contribution. We must have a floor of social security under our people, and we must keep the gates of opportunity open, so that above that floor there will not be a limit which will discourage the best efforts of our people.

Mr. HOWE: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. KNOWLES: Adjourn it for six months.

On motion of Mr. Howe the debate was adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before this item carries, I should like to make a few observations. Having gone over what the minister has said with respect to his general policy—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask hon. members to moderate their voices. It is difficult to hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Having gone over with some care what the minister has said with respect to his general policy, I am happy to be able to express approval of his general outlook, attitude and aim as he has expressed it. He realizes that one of the serious problems confronting the country at the present time is the shortage of United States dollars; and he is undoubtedly seeking to organize the economy of Canada in such a way as to safeguard her against too serious difficulties arising out of that condition. But I believe the minister will have to adopt measures, or at least that he will have to cause the government to adopt measures which are not implied in anything which he has said up to the present time.

I should like to talk for a short time about this United States dollar shortage. It seems to me that not enough attention is being given to it in a general way. The United States dollar shortage is not something new. It is not a postwar phenomenon. It is not a temporary or passing ailment which the world can sleep off, work off, outgrow or, by natural means, recover from. The United States dollar shortage is rather a malignant malady, like pernicious anaemia, diabetes or rheumatoid arthritis, developing from deep-seated, fundamental, organic causes. If we are to cope successfully with this United States dollar shortage we must seek out those causes and remove, cure or counteract them.

When did the shortage of United States dollars become a reality? I find the general impression to be that the United States dollar shortage is something resulting from the recently finished war. But such is not the case. The United States dollar shortage began to develop right after 1919 when the United States became a creditor nation with high tariff protection. It became pronounced by 1926 and continued so through 1929.

I think a word or two of comment is desirable at this point. Great Britain was a creditor nation for a number of years, but you never heard of a shortage of British pounds. Why was it that all through the one hundred years preceding world war I you never heard of a shortage of British pounds, while immediately the United States becomes a creditor nation you begin to hear about a shortage of United States dollars? Why was that? The fundamental reason was that when Britain was a creditor nation she always accepted goods from abroad in payment for her own goods. But when the United States became a creditor nation she refused to accept goods from abroad in payment for the goods she sold. This is one of the fundamental facts that it is necessary to keep in mind in order to comprehend the general situation in which we find ourselves.

I would say that the shortage of United States dollars developed immediately after 1919, just as soon as the United States became a creditor nation. From 1919 through 1929 the United States provided by loan some $7,500 million of new capital to other countries, more than the total of similar issues floated in the United Kingdom, France, The Netherlands and all other capital-lending countries combined. In the nineteen-thirties such loans came to a complete standstill, while a heavy net inflow of capital came into the United States from other countries. Hon. members will find this matter scientifically, interestingly and authentically discussed on page 31 of "The United States in World Economy," a book in the library of parliament. Again, more than $900 million a year had to be paid to the United States by other nations as fixed debt service obligations of those nations to the United States resulting from world war I and from United States foreign investments or loans abroad. Hon. members will find this also discussed in "The United States in World Economy" at page 31.

United States tourists spent abroad more than $6 billion between 1918 and 1939, and only slightly below $500 million in 1929. This is also well discussed in "The United States in World Economy" at page 75. But these tourists' expenditures almost completely ceased after 1929. The reason why it is wise to discuss the matters which I am now discussing is that we are likely to see a repetition of these things which occurred in the United States between world war I and world war II. If we are to have ourselves strong enough and well enough cushioned to resist successfully the impact of untoward conditions in the United States we shall have to govern ourselves with extreme wisdom and vision.

How serious is this United States situation at the present time? The United States normally sells the world $12 billion worth of goods more than she buys from the world a year.

The United States puts the world into debt $12 billion a year. This is the estimate which is made by the London chamber of commerce in a pamphlet which they issued on September 30, 1947, dealing with the economic crisis. Their estimate is given in paragraph 12, in which they say:

> The shortage of dollars is not a United Kingdom problem; it is a world problem. So long as exports from the United States of America annually exceed their imports by some £3 billion, or $12 billion, the world will be short of dollars to that extent. In other words, so long as the United States has a "favourable" balance with the world of £3 billion the world must have an "unfavourable" balance with the United States of the same amount.

This amount has an important bearing on the conduct of our own trade and commerce department, because we must be prepared to meet that situation. The minister has wisely planned his activity, in large measure, to meet this situation.

This tremendous favourable balance of trade which the United States has every year constitutes one of the major economic problems confronting our generation. This fact is one of the major fundamental causes of the world's dollar shortage.

Normal economic trends of our time are aggravating, and must continue to aggravate, this fundamental disequilibrium in the world's trade. The United States productive capacity was greatly expanded during world war II, as hon. members well know. Consequently we shall find the United States prepared to do what it did between the two great wars, only on a much wider scale. Roosevelt made a declaration in October, 1944, in a broadcast which he delivered at that time, in some such words as these: I mean to find jobs for sixty million American people by tripling the United States export trade. The United States is simply determined to destroy British preference. It is determined to destroy the British sterling system, both of which are measures by which the shock of United States economy on the economies of the British commonwealth could have been cushioned. The United States is expanding its carrying trade. The minister himself points out the difficulty which we might encounter by reason of the fact that the United States is insisting on carrying fifty per cent of the ERP goods in its own bottoms. Formerly Great Britain used to carry much of the United States goods; but today the United States is coming more and more to wish to carry its own goods, which makes it more difficult for other nations to obtain United States dollars. The United States people do not seem to realize what the result of this policy is. They are simply following the policy because it looks to them to be good business. They are fearful of unemployment and fearful of depression; consequently they are in a sort of panicky mood at the present time. They are apt to do things much more to the detriment of the world, as far as trade is concerned, than they did before the war. They are refusing also to distribute their goods internally by any means other than those they have already used during the past several decades, and this is not a comforting sign. Besides that, the United States have managed to get most of the other nations depending upon them for goods. This seems a strange thing. We can understand why Canada should be dependent upon the United States temporarily for coal, steel and oil; but how did nations like France, Belgium and other nations in Europe come to be dependent upon the United States for goods to such a large extent within the last fifty years?

There are several reasons which might be worth examining for a minute or two. They are not all the result of the war. The United States productive potential was simply tremendous after world war 1, owing to the variety and richness of their resources, their extensive industrial development, and their great population, all of which enabled them to engage in mass production, which resulted in cheapness. Also United States goods are attractive to most nations because they have a sort of American newness and romance. These various influences have resulted in nations abroad buying United States goods even to the point where they were ceasing to produce their own. The result is that they came to be dependent upon the United States for goods, so that in large measure United States goods have destroyed the industry of a good many nations.

The people of the United States have also insisted upon an application of the unconditional most-favoured-nation clause. I do not propose to go into a discussion of that tonight. There would be a bit too much detail for the purposes of this talk, but that matter has had a great deal to do with the destruction of industry or the arresting of development in the nations of western Europe, and in some other parts of the world. All these things have tended to cause the peoples of the world to be dependent on United States goods.

There are many reasons resulting from world wars I and II which have also had the effect of causing the nations of the world to be dependent upon the United States. There is serious doubt whether we shall ever be able to regain the balance which existed between the United States and the rest of the world before world war II; and it is almost certain that we shall never be able to restore the balance which existed before world war I. To some extent it is because of what happened to Great Britain, because of her losses during these two wars, losses in foreign investments, in shipping, in financial strength and so forth.

So much for that aspect of the situation. What is the international trade position of the United States today in addition to what I have already said? The relative industrial importance of the United States over the years 1925 to 1929 was placed at 46 out of 100 for all countries, including the U.S.S.R., or 48 out of 100 excluding the U.S.S.R. This computation was made by the economic intelligence service of the league of nations, and published in "World Production and Prices, 1935 to 1936" in 1936, at pages 21 to 22, according to "The United States in World Economy" published in 1943, at page 29. This gives us a chance to get some idea of the impact of the United States on the world economy. That impact must be vastly greater today as soon as anything like a condition of normalcy can be brought about.

A comparison of purchasing power as indicated by estimates of national income shows that the national income in the United States in 1929 was as high in terms of dollars as in twenty-three foreign countries combined, including the United Kingdom, Germany and France. We find this discussed in the "United States in World Economy" on page 29. The result of it all can be well summed up in these words which I shall quote, from page 31 of that publication:

> In brief the United States not only has exerted a tremendous influence on the world economy but also has shifted its influence with peculiar force. The impact of domestic economic developments on the rest of the world and the repercussions of its policies in the international sphere can scarcely be over-rated.

Therefore there is a dangerous and persistent threat of shortage of United States dollars facing us.

What should be the policy followed by our government? Here I shall begin to have something to say with regard to the minister's conduct of his department.

First of all, I would say that the policies the government is now following, except in so far as they are directed toward making Canada more self-sufficient, will aggravate the trouble from which we are suffering. I do not propose to go into detail; but I wish to say earnestly to the minister that when his government accepted the Bretton Woods agreement they complicated the situation tremendously for themselves. And when they took part in the Geneva trade agreement and agreed to some of the principles which were discussed and agreed to therein they complicated the situation for themselves far more than they realize today. Probably they will not realize it for two or three years; but they will eventually.

When they agreed to non-discrimination and the most-favoured-nation clause as envisaged by the Geneva trade treaty, and the impairment of the British preference with the establishment of the international trade organization, they took on commitments which will not be in the interests of Canada or of the rest of the world, with the exception of the United States. And at the Havana trade conference, when the nations accepting the agreement agreed that once they had bound imperial preferences, for example, they would never change them, they did something very serious indeed. Especially when the United States were not bound to any such agreement—their policies could change with their governments—we see how serious the situation was.

The present orthodox financial system both domestically and internationally is hopelessly inadequate. I do not propose to discuss that now. Once again may I say most earnestly to the minister and members of the house, and to anyone who might be interested: You simply must change the financial system we are using both internally and externally or disaster will face us.

A nineteenth century international financial sytem has definitely proved itself unworkable; and in a general way the shortage of United States dollars is proof of that. Moreover, nothing effective is being done about the matter by this or any other government, so far as I know. Nothing is being proposed about it. The simple fact is that the world is buying five billion pounds of goods per annum, we will say, from the United States, and the world is selling to the United States only two billion pounds of goods per annum.

Perhaps I should discuss that point for a moment or two. I have noticed in the banking and commerce committee, and in other places I have heard people talk, and in articles I have read, that somehow or another the people in Canada who should know a great deal better seem to have the idea that, in some fashion or another, the United States will get to the point where she will accept enough goods to enable us to get dollars enough to carry on. That is what the United States would have to do. Just imagine that the United States began to buy from abroad $12 billion more goods than she is buying now! Can you imagine that? Can you imagine her doing that in a year? That, of course, would be in addition to all the interest owed. And if she did do it, what would it do to her economy? Why, it is just inconceivable.

On the other hand, let us suppose that the world decided not to buy United States goods or to purchase goods to the value of $12 billion a year from the United States. What would happen to the United States? Nothing more needs to be said to show the absolute—I was going to say "stupidity"—the absolute simplicity and naivety of people who suppose that the United States can be persuaded to buy enough goods to enable people to get the United States dollars they need in order to carry on the affairs of the world. If the United States can never be brought to the point where she will either buy other people's goods, or refrain from selling them her own, then obviously the international financial system has broken down and cannot work any longer.

This is not a matter we can ignore. It is one of the serious symptoms in the patient which may result in death. No other proposal has been made. I have asked personally two of the government's best authorities before the banking and commerce committee in the discussions on the Geneva trade proposals what they thought would be the means of overcoming the difficulty in connection with the shortage of United States dollars. They just seemed completely bewildered. All they had to offer was hope. Well, hope is, I know, a potent force, but, after all, we have to have some technique in order to arrive at results—something in addition to hope.

A presidential speech was delivered at the annual meeting of the London chamber of commerce in Great Britain on April 27, 1948, by the president, Sir Frank Newson-Smith. This is one of the things he said:

> The leaders in the English-speaking world still believed seven months ago that the 19th century international financial system could be made to work with modifications and embellishments. I doubt whether any of them believe this now. At long last it is I think, recognized that if we continue much longer on our present course, disaster awaits us.

This gentleman conveys the same idea I have expressed. Farther on in his speech, he says this—and it has some bearing on the subject we have been discussing, and on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce at this time:

> The crux of the whole matter is the creditor position of the United States vis-à-vis the rest of the world. This has not been faced and is not being faced. The suggestion implicit in what we are doing and saying is that the problem can > and will be solved in the near future, by the world striking a balance with the United States, either by selling them another £3,000 m. of goods per annum or by buying £3,000 m. less. The impracticability of this solution would be realized at once if it were stated frankly and openly in this form. If the world were to cut down its purchases from the United States from £5,000 m. to £2,000 m. per annum or, on the other hand, if the United States were to import £5,000 m. of goods instead of £2,000 m. per annum a major crisis would occur in the United States. To economic chaos in the rest of the world, would be added economic chaos in the United States.

Those are the words of a man who is right in the firing line, who has been there for many years, and whose position requires that he should be. At the close of his address he used these words:

> Until this crucial problem of the dollar is faced frankly and boldly, we shall muddle on from one disappointment to another. Already the five nations of the western Europe have run into payments difficulties. France owes us money and we, France and Holland owe Belgium money. France's exports are of a luxury or semi-luxury nature. Everybody wants them but nobody dares buy them. The nations dare not buy them because, overhanging them all is the fear that they will be the ones left holding the unwelcome child—unpayable dollar indebtedness.

I commend those words to the minister, among all the cares and tribulations with which he is confronted, and with which I do not hesitate to tell him I think he is dealing very well and wisely. I draw this to his attention for serious thought because, after all, we are in an age of rapid change. A few false decisions can mean communism all over the world or, what might be far worse, revolution and distress. If we can just be warned and guided by a bit more knowledge of the facts that actually exist around us we shall be less inclined to live in what might be called a fool's paradise, if one can use that term without too much unhappy implication; we shall be better off and have a better chance of coming successfully through the problems which confront us.

May I say that the current philosophies of trade will not help us. I know there is a great deal of enthusiasm for the Geneva trade agreement, just as this house went into near ecstacies of enthusiasm over Bretton Woods, passed it and then found the thing was not worth even considering. They will find this Geneva trade agreement, which originated in the same brains as did Bretton Woods, in precisely the same position; they will find that it will be just as much good to us, which is almost nothing.

I hope I am in this respect a little bit of a gloomy prophet. I think we would be on the safe side, however, if it was assumed that I was not prophesying too gloomily. But there are others in the empire and in the world who are thinking along these lines, and I should like to quote to the minister some passages which I think he will find worthy of consideration by himself and his department. The Mirror of New Zealand, in the issue of May 1, 1948, had the following to say in an editorial:

> During the last year or so, determined attempts have been made by the international trade organization, both at Geneva and at Havana, to forge another link in the encircling chain of international planning under the shibboleth of free trade. The real objective is not so much the freezing of world trade as the complete elimination of the preferential trading system which has existed between the United Kingdom and her possessions and dominions.

I think the minister will find that this statement is right. The United States was not concerned about anybody else's welfare but her own when she planned the Geneva trade treaty. What The Mirror says is justified. In another part of the article, the following appears:

> What we want are not international entanglements like Bretton Woods and the Havana charter, but a comprehensive and progressive empire development policy, so that national effort, individual initiative and free enterprise may be given a fair opportunity to restore a semblance of economic equilibrium, financial stability and international good will and co-operation.

Perhaps I shall quote further from the same editorial at a later time, but I do not wish to use up too much of my time at the present.

What is the remedy? There are many part-remedies. It is just like trying to find a remedy for arthritis or diabetes or pernicious anaemia. No one cure is a cure-all; you have to have a combination in order to save the patient. Here is one thing which I believe will be worth our consideration. I think we have been too much inclined to cold-shoulder the rest of the British empire. Perhaps the government has not gone altogether too far in that respect, but it has gone far enough. There has been too much disregard on the part of the present government and of our people of the sterling system of finance which worked out so splendidly for the nations in the sterling bloc, until the United States began interfering by means of the Washington loan agreements and other documents which she has been using quite energetically ever since the Atlantic charter in 1941.

We must not allow the sterling system to be disregarded if there is any way in which we can prevent it. I should like to give some figures to show the achievements of the Ottawa agreements of 1932. The figures I am going to quote are obtained from a little pamphlet called, "The Way Ahead." It was issued by the Empire Industries Association and the British Empire League and was printed by Burrup, Mathieson and Company, Limited, 31 Throgmorton street, London, E.C.2. This contains a fine summary of what happened as a result of the Ottawa agreements of 1932.

In a rough and broadly general way, United Kingdom imports from British countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 63 per cent. United Kingdom imports from foreign countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 37 per cent. These figures ought to be quite interesting to my Conservative friends because, after all, it was their party that negotiated the Ottawa agreements.

United Kingdom exports to British countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 52 per cent. United Kingdom exports to foreign countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 35 per cent. May I just pause here to make a little comment? We read the statements of men like Sumner Welles, Cordell Hull and other prominent United States statesmen, and we gather the impression that from 1938 onward United States statesmen considered the Ottawa agreements more or less selfish, because they were designed to be offish toward the rest of the world, that they were adopted and put into effect only for the welfare of the British commonwealth. However, these figures give those statements the complete lie. These figures indicate that the Ottawa agreements resulted in good for the rest of the world quite as much as they did for the British commonwealth.

The dominions, British India and Burma, imports from the United Kingdom and British countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 51 per cent. Those same countries' imports from foreign countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 76 per cent. The dominions, British India and Burma exports to the United Kingdom and British countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 50 per cent. Their exports to foreign countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 48 per cent.

The colonies' and protectorates' imports from the United Kingdom and British countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 49 per cent. Their imports from foreign countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 49 per cent. The colonies' and protectorates' exports to the United Kingdom and British countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 127 per cent. Their exports to foreign countries from 1932 to 1937 increased by 186 per cent.

Those increases in trade are astonishing; they give quite a different picture of the effects of the Ottawa agreements from that which is ordinarily held in the United States and even in the minds of many of the ministers of this government. Empire trade commenced its upward movement immediately after the Ottawa agreements in 1932, and world trade followed that trend in 1934, just two years later. If we take an index of 116 as indicating the volume of total British exports to all countries in 1930, the figures for the following years are as follows:

1932	88½
1933	90½
1934	97
1935	100¼
1937	111¼

If we think in terms of a shortage of British pounds as we do a shortage of United States dollars we shall draw this conclusion, that the British would not have been able to export those goods to other countries, unless those countries were able in return to export goods to Britain to get British pounds.

May I repeat, that the solution lies along the line of imperial preferences and the sterling system of interstate finance for British commonwealth and empire countries. Another development is a modification of the sterling system, which I believe is the one best adapted to save the situation for the world.

In respect of an international distribution of goods, the proposal has been made that the sterling system of international state finance be modified and extended into something like the system of contra account which is suggested by the London chamber of commerce in its report of September 30, 1947. What does this contra account mean? It practically means this in a general way: If the United States were selling a vast amount of goods to the world, as she is, she would say to the nations of the world: We will let you have $12,000,000 more of goods than you can let us have, and we will allow you credit for these goods as long as you are unable to produce and repay us with goods, and then, just as soon as you have goods to send back to us in return, we will accept them. That is to say, we are selling you the goods on a lend-lease basis of credit, and we shall expect back from the nations of the world such goods as they are able to supply us with. That would be, in a way a system of contra account. This method or some modification of it we shall have to adopt if we are to get ourselves out of the dangerous situation in which we find ourselves.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. member that his time is exhausted.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Go ahead.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have practically finished. Along with this, there should be economic self-sufficiency for Canada just as far as possible and as rapidly as possible. The minister is aiming at that very thing. We should aim to produce our own needs and to produce surpluses of many kinds for export on a lend-lease or mutual aid basis where necessary, very much like the contra account. Let us take goods in return if we can get them but if we cannot get them, let the nations have our goods on credit, so that they can be using them and we can go on producing.

I could read a good many extracts to the committee. I have extracts from the New Zealand article to which I have referred, and a number of extracts from what I find to be a very fine issue of the Empire Industries Association and British Empire League, its April letter, bulletin 85. There are many excellent things in this bulletin and also in the May issue, bulletin 86, which I had hoped to read to the committee, but I shall not have time tonight.

In approaching the close of my remarks, it is well for us to bear this in mind, that the empire has all we need. Hon. members will be interested in hearing this quotation from Joseph Chamberlain. I had never heard it until I saw it recently:

> There is no article of your food, there is no raw material of your trade, there is no necessity of your lives, no luxury of your existence which cannot be produced somewhere or other in the British empire, if the British empire holds together, and if we who have inherited it are worthy of our opportunities.

That is a most comforting statement. Canada has rich resources; it has varied resources; it has complementary resources. Hon. members will be interested in a quotation from the Royal Bank of Canada's monthly letter for June, bearing on this very subject. It says—

Mr. HOWE: We all read that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I will not take time to read it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member's time is exhausted.

Mr. CASE: This is possibly one of the most important departments of the government. I have listened with considerable interest to the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and I cannot help but feel that experience is indeed a great teacher. One of the problems we are suffering from today is an over-expansion of credit and currency, and I often wonder, as I listen to my hon. friend and his colleagues, just how they can reconcile their position today with their professed desire in the past to pay out dividends to the citizens of Alberta on a basis of $25 a month. If such a policy were in force today it could but increase the pressure against prices.

As a student of monetary reform and as one who believes that there is much room for improvement in our present monetary system, I have always held to the view that only a dollar earned is a dollar that has any value. You cannot get something for nothing. But it seems to me that the system advocated by my hon. friend and his colleagues is based on providing something for nothing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. CASE: So long as you do not attempt to continue your speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is just a question. Will my hon. friend devote his attention to the subject I discussed tonight. I did not mention money or dividends at all. If he wants to discuss monetary reform I shall be glad to discuss it with him, but he had better come well prepared. I was discussing tonight the world problem of distribution.

Mr. CASE: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, may I say that I hold my hon. friend in the very highest regard. We differ in our opinions, and I was simply reminding him of one of the weaknesses of their program. I like people with ideas; I think they did have an idea which they tried to sell and certainly, in days gone by, in the hungry thirties a shot in the arm would have been good for this nation. I am concerned, however, about the immediate present, and I feel that we are too closely tied with the United States. As a matter of fact, there is great danger of our becoming an economic adjunct of that great republic. They are admirable as friends, but the Americans are pretty hard, cold-blooded dealers. They are two-fisted in their approach to commercial problems, and I regret to find that our whole future is more or less predicated upon the success of the Marshall plan or some plan that is evolved in the United States.

I suggest that, with Canada's great resources, we should stand on our own feet and plan accordingly. We have every reason to determine our own future course, and it would be well to strengthen our position in relation to the British preferential pacts within the sterling bloc. It is perhaps unfortuate that we are one of those countries in the dollar bloc, so closely related to the dollar countries. History reveals that, in the past, three-fifths of the world's commerce and trade took place within the sterling bloc; these two great blocs are now pitted against each other, and we find ourselves in the dollar block.

Is it not most unfortunate that when we were in such a really enviable position we cast it away? It is not long since that Canada had a 90-cent dollar. Bretton Woods had been presented to the house, together with the terms of the international bank. We knew then that we were required to value our currency at the rate of exchange prevailing at the time we entered Bretton Woods. We could not depreciate our currency more than ten per cent without the consent of that international organization, and yet, on the very eve of our entry into Bretton Woods, this government found it convenient, for reasons that I shall never understand, to bring our dollar up to parity with that of the United States. They robbed us of the most enviable position we shall ever have enjoyed in the realm of trade and commerce, because, as long as the United States dollar was accepted as the standard of exchange, we had access to the markets of the world.

Latin America lay open to our enterprise, open to our commerce and our trade, and likewise the countries of Europe enjoying a ten per cent advantage in the Canadian market. We were bound to reach those centres where our goods could be marketed and sold, which are at present denied to us because we have put an artificial prop under our Canadian dollar.

I say, Mr. Chairman, and I think I can discuss the question with some degree of authority, that the moment you put an artificial prop under the dollar, you interfere with the very lifeblood of a nation's trade and commerce. It naturally follows that the dollar should have been allowed to seek its own level in the world's markets, which, of course, there has been some effort to regulate and control. I am not denying that there should be some regulation, but we enjoyed a preferred position as our goods flowed over our borders into distant parts of the world where they were required and desired; and if our dollar had been allowed to seek its own level, by and by, of its own volition, it would have levelled itself with the United States dollar.

But we sought to place a handicap on the Canadian trader and producer, in spite of the fact that our production during the war was sufficient to stagger the human imagination. Indeed, the productive capacity of Canada is unlimited, and when I read in the press items advertising "Canada unlimited" I subscribe entirely to the theory. But we sought to place a handicap on our traders by saying to them, "You must meet the competition of one of the greatest producing nations in the world, the United States, that have not only the productive capacity but the wealth of resources to stimulate that production and maintain their standard of living at a level comparable with Canada's". I am not one of those who say our standard of living is lower than theirs.

Canada, nevertheless, is going to pay a great price, because not only are we losing the present market but we are losing the potential market of the future. Had Canada's goods been flowing into Latin American countries and into other parts of the world we would have established a name for this dominion. The label "Canada" would have been known far and wide and people would have sought to place return orders. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is seeking to stimulate trade, and through his own good offices and the offices of those associated with him, he arranged the world trade conference, or show or exhibition in Toronto.

This government has always professed a belief in greater freedom of trade and exchange. I listened at home to the admirable words of the Prime Minister speaking from Europe when he announced the introduction of the Geneva trade pacts, and that was indeed a step in the direction of greater and freer world trade. But the radio suddenly switched from one program to the other, and the Minister of Finance made his announcement setting up artificial barriers in our own country and placing the obstacle of a 25 per cent excise tax in the way of the production of goods in this dominion.

The government tried to prove to the outside world that our dollar is as good as the United States dollar. We do not wish to be proud of these things, because if your dollar depreciates you have a trading advantage. I would point out, however, that the suggestion that our dollar was worth a dollar in the United States was after all only a joke, because it has been discounted right along, as high as from ten to fifteen per cent even in the border city of Buffalo; and while they endeavoured to prove that our dollar was worth a dollar in the United States they said to the Canadian people that it was worth only seventy-five cents at home, because they put a 25 per cent excise tax upon it.

I am one of those who had much to do with war savings certificates, and I am proud of my contribution in the way of encouraging our people to invest in them. The little $4 certificate was redeemable in seven and a half years at $5. It was said to be the only government bond in the world which bore interest at 3½ per cent, compounded semi-annually. In other words, in seven and a half years it returned $5 for $4 invested. There was also a limit on the amount that one could invest—$480 a year or $40 a month—but at the end of seven and a half years one received back $50 a month.

There are some things I have to answer for myself, not because I have been a follower of the administration, but rather because I believed in their sincerity at the time; but now we find that, while these people are having $5 returned to them for $4 they invested, there is an excise tax of 25 per cent imposed upon their savings, and the dollar is worth only sixty-five cents.

I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce has a great deal of influence with the government—he has managed most of the departments—and my plea is that we be allowed to have an honest dollar. Let us do something to stimulate the productive capacity of the country. Let us remove this doubt and confusion. Today we find our gold mines languishing; and many of our natural resources which could be more properly developed are being neglected, all because of government regulation, bureaucratic control, an army of civil servants going across the land to determine whether a gold producing property is entitled to a bonus. Everything is done to hamper trade rather than to stimulate it.

The taxpayers of Canada are paying a terrific price. We know now there was no thought on the part of this government to reduce taxation, which would have lent the greatest stimulus to production that could possibly have been given to the Canadian people. With the huge surplus of upwards of $700 million, the government failed to bring any relief to the over-burdened taxpayers of Canada, but rather was satisfied to see them remain under the handicap which is of the governments' own making. I say that with every degree of sincerity, advisedly and wholeheartedly, because I am firmly of the opinion that the more you interfere with natural laws, the more difficult will it be to govern.

I say this to the government. If you want to join with my hon. friends on my left and drive this country into a state of socialism where there will be controls and greater controls, then you are in a fair way to bring about that very result. But if you want to encourage and develop the greatest degree of enterprise, enthusiasm, ambition, loyalty and determination in order to see this country through to its greatest destiny, you will encourage private enterprise to play its full part in the onward march of civilization. Not only do there lie before us green fields which look good a long way off; but we have back of us the resources and the productive capacity as well as the enthusiasm, initiative and ambition of the greatest people in the world to carry us forward. My plea to the government tonight is to cut these bonds that are strangling trade and commerce. Give Canada a chance. Let us indeed join with the British commonwealth. Let us determine, as we did in those dark days of the war, that we will stand by Britain and see her through; that we will not become an adjunct of the United States of America, either politically or economically; and that we will stand on our own and develop our own resources to our greatest capacity.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No, the item does not carry. I wish to ask some questions of the minister.

Mr. HOWE: At your service.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. KNOWLES: He said, at your service.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When these estimates were up, I think a week ago tonight, the minister gave me the detailed position of the trade situation vis-à-vis the United States. I then asked him if he would give us a picture of the foreign trade situation in other countries. I have some questions I wish to ask him with regard to certain details of the excise tax, but I would ask him first to give us a picture of the over-all trade position. I suggest to him that in doing that he might indicate to us to what extent our foreign trade, at some distance in the future, will be governed by contract, so that we can count on it; and to the extent that it is not so governed, will he give us his estimate of the trade situation, just in broad terms as he sees it in other countries, so that we can form an over-all picture of our complete situation?

Mr. HOWE: I can say that by and large the trade position of Canada is distinctly promising and rather better than we anticipated it would be at this time. At the last discussion of the estimates I gave the export and import figures with the United States and with Great Britain for the first four months of the year. I can say that for the fifth month, namely May—the figures for which were just received today—the preliminary figures are distinctly better than those in any month to date. This shows that we are making progress toward a desirable position.

One interesting factor is this. Of course the position of Canada depends greatly on its total trade. We anticipated an export surplus for the year of $150 million.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): A month?

Mr. HOWE: That is, we anticipated net exports over imports of $150 million. For the first five months of the year we have achieved our total objective in that direction. In other words, our exports already exceed our imports by $150 million in round figures. The actual figure is $145 million.

Mr. GREEN: That is for all countries?

Mr. HOWE: For all countries.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Can the minister give us the broad details of that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I have the figures here for the United States and the United Kingdom. For the first five months of the year, imports from all countries—and all these figures exclude gold of which we are not an importer—were $1,037,200,000. The net domestic exports to all countries are $1,182,900,000. That leaves a balance in our favour, for the first five months, of $145,700,000. Our trade with England for the first five months of the year was as follows: imports, $113 million; exports $305·4 million, leaving a favourable balance of $192·8 million. Our trade with the United States: imports for the first five months, $730 million; exports for the first five months, $545 million. We have an unfavourable balance there of $185·2 million. However, the May figures are the best to date and we believe that—

Mr. GREEN: May we have them?

Mr. HOWE: The May figures?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: May imports from all countries were $225·2 million; and exports to all countries were $287·5 million, leaving a favourable balance of $62·3 million.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has the minister the figures for May of last year?

Mr. HOWE: That is for May of this year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the minister happen to have the figures for May of last year, so that we may make a comparison?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. In May of last year we imported 240·3 million and exported $267·8 million.

Mr. GREEN: What is the difference?

Mr. HOWE: That is a favourable balance of $27·5 million. With England we had imports of $15,200,000 and exports of $90,500,000.

There we had a favourable balance of $75-300,000, but I might point out that in May of last year we were shipping to England against the loan, and those exports were represented largely by long-term credits; whereas this year they are represented by cash. In May of 1947 our imports from the United States amounted to $184,700,000; our exports amounted to $79,800,000. We had an unfavourable trade balance of $105 million. Therefore we cut the unfavourable balance practically into four parts.

Mr. GREEN: What is the figure for the United States in May of 1948?

Mr. HOWE: I gave that a while ago. We had an unfavourable balance of $29,300,000 for the month of May.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister give us the figures for South America?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry to say I have not the figures for South America. The United States and the United Kingdom are the two largest trading countries.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister said we were getting cash from Britain as distinct from a year ago. Does he mean dollars?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): For everything we send there?

Mr. HOWE: Dollars or goods, yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): United States dollars?

Mr. HOWE: Well, dollars, Canadian or United States. We get Canadian dollars to the extent that they have Canadian dollars, and for the rest we have to get United States dollars. Does it make any difference?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Why not?

Mr. HOWE: Because we can use them in trading in dollar countries.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But they are not dollars that we can use in paying the United States.

Mr. HOWE: That is true, but we have use for dollars other than to pay the United States.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think the minister will agree that it is important, in respect of our relationship with the United States, to know how many United States dollars we get in selling there.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: They get Canadian dollars in selling to us goods or selling us gold, and either goods or gold is the equivalent of United States dollars.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to ask the minister some questions about the 25 per cent excise tax. First of all, I want to know whether any articles have been taken off the list, pursuant to the authority reserved since the bill became law, which I think was last February.

Mr. HOWE: We are getting into another department of the government. This department does not apply the excise taxes, administer them or take them in. I do not recall any that have been taken off, but there may have been some. I would not know.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to press a question which should be directed elsewhere; but I suggest that to some extent, at any rate, these excise taxes affect trade and commerce, because the 25 per cent tax was introduced as a measure to affect United States exchange. That was one of the reasons given. Perhaps I can get that answer elsewhere. First of all, what amounts have been received under it? Can the minister estimate to what extent it has been effective in the way of excluding United States goods? Is that a question which can be answered?

Mr. HOWE: No, I have not any knowledge of how much is collected. We have nothing to do with taxes. It is our duty to stimulate trade. I can give rough figures, but the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue would be the minister to answer that question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I will leave it at that. I have one other question, following what the minister gave us the other night. He gave us a certain interesting general statement as regards new and increased types of exports to the United States. Will he give us one or two typical figures to show the extent of the development which he described.

Mr. HOWE: I think any figure I could give would be misleading. The over-all figures are the most illuminating. The fact is that we have greatly stepped up exports to the United States, and we have reduced our imports from that country. The result is that, counting gold, we are close to balance.

Mr. GREEN: Last November when the Prime Minister spoke from London he announced that Canada had taken the position with Great Britain that our trade agreement with that country must be put on a voluntary basis. In other words, it was no longer a binding agreement, but merely a voluntary arrangement which could be altered or cancelled at will by either party. As the minister will remember, originally there was a resolution on the order paper concerning the Geneva treaties, which included the approval of the letter written by Canada to Great Britain setting out that change in the preference. The approval of the letter has now been separated into another resolution, and that resolution has not yet been discussed in the house. Can the minister tell us whether there has been any change in that arrangement, or whether the preference with Great Britain still remains on a purely voluntary basis, which can be cancelled or varied at will?

Mr. HOWE: There again my hon. friend is in the field of the Minister of Finance. As I have said, we do not make the laws; we simply have to do with trade.

Mr. GREEN: This is a trade agreement.

Mr. HOWE: Certain small variations were made in the agreements, one or two at the request of Britain to allow her to make arrangements under the Geneva agreements which were favourable to Britain, and one or two on our part to allow us to do the same thing. No important changes have been made in the British preferences.

Mr. GREEN: The minister means by the Geneva treaties?

Mr. HOWE: Exactly, yes.

Mr. GREEN: They gave away the preference on apples.

Mr. HOWE: That may be so, but Britain is not buying apples.

Mr. GREEN: Not at the moment.

Mr. HOWE: How can the British preference affect a thing that is not being bought, or will not be? Britain is today self-supporting in apples.

Mr. GREEN: She is not.

Mr. HOWE: I have been over there and examined the situation. I think I know more about it than my hon. friend does.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is wrong. That is contrary to the information which was given in the banking and commerce committee. If the minister will check up he will find he is wrong. Britain is not self-supporting in apples.

Mr. HOWE: Where are they buying them at the moment?

Mr. GREEN: From Australia. They are buying huge quantities, far more than they ever bought from Canada.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member must realize the fact that anything that can be bought in sterling will be bought in sterling.

Mr. GREEN: The minister should know better than to say that Britain is now self-sufficient in apples. I am sure his officials in front of him will confirm my statement that he is wrong.

Mr. HOWE: The last time I was in Britain apples could be bought freely in the shops. They were one of the few things that could be bought, and they were British apples.

Mr. GREEN: That is very far from making Britain self-sufficient in apples.

Mr. HOWE: I know. The point is this, regardless of any trade agreement, we cannot even give apples to Britain now, because they will not accept them as gifts. My hon. friend knows that. Why worry about the British preference on apples when he knows very well that the preferences have nothing to do with the trading position of apples so far as the United Kingdom is concerned.

Mr. GREEN: That is a purely temporary position.

Mr. HOWE: Well—

Mr. GREEN: The time will come when there will be a market for apples in Britain.

Mr. HOWE: This was all fought out in Yale and neither you nor I won.

Mr. GREEN: In the meantime our preference has been given away. Our lumber preference has been cut in half. The preference on canned salmon has been cut in half. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver North will bear me out when I say this is of great importance to British Columbia. The point I am making is this. I wish to know whether the position is that the preference, so far as Canada and Britain are concerned, is on a purely voluntary basis.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: What about Australia, New Zealand and South Africa? The Prime Minister intimated, or perhaps it was in the press release which was issued at the time of the announcement of the Geneva treaties, that the agreements with the other nations of the commonwealth were also to be put on a voluntary basis, so that they could be cancelled or varied at will. Has that been done? Has there been any exchange of letters between Canada and these other nations, or do the agreements still remain binding agreements?

Mr. HOWE: That has absolutely nothing to do with the item. The Department of Trade and Commerce does not make international agreements. I could give the hon. member my best recollection of the thing, but it would mean very little. When we are debating the subject of these empire agreements, as we shall some day, we shall have the experts here and we shall give the accurate facts. But the hon. member is talking about matters which do not fall within the ambit of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GREEN: I submit that the minister is wrong again. These are trade agreements. He is Minister of Trade and Commerce. If he will take the trouble to ask his deputy minister who is sitting in front of him he will find out the answers to my questions, because certainly they are questions which should be answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and by no other minister. I am entitled to answers to those questions, namely, as to what has happened with regard to preferences between Canada and nations of the commonwealth, other than Great Britain. He has already given an answer about Great Britain. I want the answer with regard to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

Mr. HOWE: I do not know the answer, and my deputy says he does not know the answer. I refer the hon. member to the tariff board or the Minister of Finance.

Mr. GREEN: That is not good enough. Here is a responsible minister of the crown in charge of these trade agreements, and—

Mr. HOWE: You told them all about this in Yale. Why do you not give me the answers?

Mr. GREEN: Why talk that way? That is no answer at all.

Mr. JACKMAN: The same answer as you got.

Mr. GREEN: We are entitled to know in this House of Commons from the Minister of Trade and Commerce what the position is with regard to the preference between Canada and the nations of the commonwealth, other than the United Kingdom. If the minister cannot give us that information tonight, then I suggest that the item be allowed to stand until he can get it. Does the minister refuse to get the information?

Mr. HOWE: Refuse to get it?

Mr. GREEN: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: It is not in my department.

Mr. GREEN: Well, where can you get it, then?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. HOWE: Get it from the tariff board or the Minister of Finance.

Mr. GREEN: That shows once more the minister's utter failure to appreciate the type of parliament by which this country is supposed to be governed. Here he is, taking a stand in a Canadian parliament, that if information is wanted with regard to a trade agreement parliament must go and ask the tariff board. That shows his utter contempt for our parliamentary system. If the rest of the members are satisfied with it, I certainly am not. It is a strange position indeed at which we have arrived when a minister of the crown, the one who has the responsibility at this time for most of the business being done by the government, can take that stand in the house, and just say, "Oh, well, it is not up to me to give the information. You just run along and get it from the tariff board, or from somebody else". I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that parliamentary government has reached a sorry stage in Canada when that is the type of answer given by a minister of the crown.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I should like to ask the minister a question, in a kindly way. I have been away from the house for some time, and perhaps I am not in touch with all that has taken place. The day before leaving, I mentioned the matter of fish livers going across to the United States, where there used to be an embargo. The people out west who process by far the greater portion of these fish livers—I refer to the co-operative—are still interested in the matter. I am sure this comes under the minister's jurisdiction, because it was through his department that the embargo was lifted. Has there been any change in policy, or does the minister contemplate any change? There is still a ten per cent duty on processed oils going into the United States. The government would not be embarrassing itself under the Geneva trade agreements by its commitments respecting oils from the Pacific coast. I do not refer to the east coast, because that is a different set of conditions altogether. That was explained to me.

There is a ten per cent tariff on processed oils, and I want to know if the government intends to reimpose the embargo to protect the industry which has been built up on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HOWE: Here again the Department of Trade and Commerce acts on the advice of the Minister of Fisheries. It is all very well to put embargoes on to prevent trade from going across the line, except in finished form. That is a very fine protectionist theory; but it is not very good for the producer. I suppose the man who catches the fish and extracts the liver would not give three cheers for a policy which would prevent his shipping his product across the line, if he wished to do so.

However, the whole matter has been studied by the Minister of Fisheries, and a decision has been made. I am not sure what the decision is, but I shall endeavour to find out and tell the hon. member.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Fisheries is right behind you.

Mr. SKEY: If the minister's department has no control over tariffs and trade, I am wondering why his predecessor took such an extended tour of South America and empire countries, for the purposes, we believed, to build up empire trade. It seems strange to me that tonight the minister should deny his jurisdiction in these matters, or deny having any influence.

Mr. HOWE: The answer to that is quite obvious. The minister did not go to South Africa to make a trade treaty. I might say his trip was very successful, because we are doing an enormous amount of trade with South Africa. Much of that was arranged during the course of that expedition. If my hon. friend wishes to talk about trade, and not trade treaties, I will talk with him as long as he likes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Chairman, surely the minister will not take the position that we cannot properly ask him, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, about the state of treaties on which our trade depends—the state of treaties between this country and other parts of the commonwealth. I cannot believe the minister would take that position. It does not seem reasonable.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will talk about treaties where trade is flowing, we can give the answers. If he is talking about treaties where no trade is flowing, it is difficult to give the answer, because we are not very much interested in them.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Perhaps it would be better if you were, probably there would be more trade. But, speaking seriously, surely what the hon. member for Vancouver South asked was quite reasonable.

Mr. HOWE: His question was a political one. If I knew the answer I would give it to him.

Mr. GREEN: It was not a political question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Now we are coming to it.

Mr. HOWE: He is just back from the hustings, you know.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): So are you; that would explain it. But this is a direct question to which I think the hon. member is entitled to an answer.

Mr. HOWE: I do not know the answer.

Mr. GREEN: Find it then.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Get it. Surely it is not unreasonable—and I want to ask my own question, too. But I put it to the minister that he is not going to leave it in that way, and that he will get the information—because it is reasonable.

Mr. HOWE: I have the answer now. There was a modification with the United Kingdom. With Australia and New Zealand and South Africa there was no modification.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No modification?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister made a statement the other night, which appeared at page 5070 of Hansard, wherein he gave the figures of monthly imports under schedule III. In the items there, I notice a large drop in the first group, covering motorcars, and quite a large percentage drop in film projectors, although that was a relatively small item. Then, with regard to subsequent groups of items, there is very little drop; in fact, in the last group there is an actual increase. What is the policy under this item, particularly with regard to the last two groups where there is little or no reduction. It will be noted that in the fourth group there is an increase from 1947.

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. member referring to table II or table III?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Table II.

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure of the point my hon. friend is trying to make. He will observe that the controls came into force for different items at different dates. In connection with the items in that table, some controls came into effect only on April 1, 1948. That is group 4. Is that the one the hon. member is referring to?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes.

Mr. HOWE: The reason there is very little effect is that during the period covered by the table the controls were not in force.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Except for the month of April. I see the minister's point. With regard to the third group, the controls came into effect in March. Does the minister expect that there will be in these items anything like the reduction there has been in the first group, or are these items where his policy will be to allow the situation to run along pretty well as it is?

Mr. HOWE: There is not the same potential for saving as there is in the first group. Those items are not made in the same volume, but the same policies will apply and I think there will be the same proportion of savings.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): With regard to fabricated steel and so on?

Mr. HOWE: That is in a little different position. This is a deficit country as far as steel is concerned. We manufacture about 3,000,000 tons, but we have to import 1,000,000 tons a year and Canadian industry depends upon that importation very heavily. For instance, our motor industry could not operate at all without a good deal of imported sheet. We just have not the capacity to make it here. There is hardly a heavy industry in the country that does not depend to some extent on imported steel. As far as the construction industry is concerned, all the larger structural shapes are imported.

We have hesitated to apply controls to these steel items because of a fear of retaliation, speaking frankly. It would take some persuasion to have the steel mills give us the sheet we require, because they would take the position, "If you do not want structural, you cannot get sheet." Therefore we have not applied controls to those items for that reason.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): How much would that be effective if our construction turned from large factory construction and such to small dwellings? Would that affect our import requirements of steel?

Mr. HOWE: We would use less structural steel, because there is nothing that I would call structural steel in a house. However, there is a great deal of structural steel used in a hydroelectric plant and in other types of construction that contribute directly to the economic strength of this country. My hon. friend knows we are short of hydroelectric power, and hydroelectric plants have the highest priorities.

Mr. GREEN: As the minister knows, before the war our trading situation depended upon what was called the Atlantic triangle; that is, trade between the United States, Great Britain and Canada was pretty well balanced out. Is it thought that this position will again prevail or must we plan on the inability to re-establish that position?

Mr. HOWE: The triangle is working now up to a degree. The breakdown in the triangle is due to the United Kingdom not being in a position to ship goods in the volume they did formerly. It is working as far as it can work. One of the principal purposes of the European recovery program is to build up the productive strength of Britain to the point where the triangle can work fully. It is not working fully at this time; it is working to a small extent and a little better each month, I am happy to say. There is nothing much we can do about it except to try to make it work.

Mr. GREEN: Is it believed that the plan will work again fully in the course of time, or must we provide some new plan for our Canadian trade?

Mr. HOWE: It is difficult to say. We sincerely hope it will, and all our efforts are being directed toward the restoring of the triangle in full. I will not venture to predict whether we can do it, and I do not think anyone else would. Our trade figures are better each month and Britain's position is improving each month, but the operation of the triangle depends upon the ability of Britain to export more than they import, and today they are importing far more than they are exporting.

Mr. GREEN: Our plan is based on the eventual return of the triangle?

Mr. HOWE: We are trying to develop multilateral trade. We trade where we can trade, and we shall always be in that position. But we are doing all we can to bulid up the economic strength of Britain so that the triangle can work.

Mr. FRASER: Is Britain getting her imports from Canada on the quota basis today as she did a year or so ago?

Mr. HOWE: Is my hon. friend referring to token imports?

Mr. FRASER: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: There has been no change.

Mr. FRASER: Does your department have something to say in regard to how they shall work?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is correct. Of course we do not decide what the token imports will be. We negotiate with Britain to get a list of token imports, and after that we have something to say. We issue the certificates, but more or less as agents for the United Kingdom.

Mr. FRASER: You select the company or the firm that ships the goods?

Mr. HOWE: No. The firms make their sales in the United Kingdom, but we issue the export permits more or less as the United Kingdom asks us to.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What are the conditions underlying imports from Britain? Is it their capacity to manufacture goods, or is it price and tariff conditions here? We did make a special tariff adjustment to facilitate the import of certain rayon goods. Will the minister say what the limiting factor is, because the figures are still disappointing, or at any rate they are quite small.

Mr. HOWE: A larger proportion of Britain's over-all exports are coming to Canada each month than previously, but there is some difficulty about price. Some goods are over-priced. We have done our best to correct that situation; we have removed the dump against certain British goods and are doing all we can to help Britain sell goods here at prices that our people are willing to pay. The great difficulty is that Britain has not the goods to ship in the volume we would like to receive.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I met a British industrialist a few days ago, and I got the impression from him that it was partly a question of more favourable selling conditions elsewhere. I suppose that that is always relatively true. Is there a definite advantage to the British to sell in sterling countries as against us? Are they more in balance? As we turn, as I suppose we shall to some extent, to a buyers' market and not a sellers' market, will the difficulty of their selling goods increase?

Mr. HOWE: I always understood that Britain had a full-out campaign to exchange goods for dollars. I think at the moment the pressure is behind the export of goods to dollar countries. It is easier for Britain to trade with sterling countries because they use a common currency.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are not Britain's trade difficulties with Canada twofold? The main difficulty is, I think, her shortage of goods that Canada wants. If she can increase her production of the kind of goods that Canada will buy she can increase her trade with Canada greatly if Canada will buy those goods, but unless we are willing to buy them there is not much prospect of a great increase in her trade with us.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under which minister does the issuing of permits under schedule 1 come? Is it the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance or some other minister? If it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce I would ask him whether permits have been issued for the importation of any of these articles in schedule 1 from Great Britain. I know that sweet biscuits are coming in.

Mr. HOWE: The Minister of Finance administers schedule 1 and schedule 2 of the act, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce administers schedule 3. I have no knowledge of what has come in under schedule 1.

Mr. JACKMAN: It surely comes within the minister's purview to have something to do with the promotion of trade, and surely he has something to do with the endeavour to make Canada self-sufficient, particularly in regard to products which we ordinarily purchase from the United States. But I find from the trade returns that in the first three months of 1947 Canada imported muskrat skins from the United States to the value of $1,783,000, and in the first three months of 1948, $2,824,000 worth, or an increase of over $1,000,000 worth. Under the embargo measure, no fresh lettuce is coming in this year, but in the first three months of last year we imported $993,000 worth from the United States. Of rabbit skins, undressed, we imported $153,000 in the first three months of 1947, and $781,450 in the first three months of 1948. Cannot we raise muskrats in Canada? Will rabbits not breed in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The fur trade is complicated. Fur auctions are held in St. Louis, and many of our furs are bought there. Rabbit skins practically all come from Australia, but they come to Canada through the United States. We are not producers of rabbit skins, but we are producers of the most expensive fur such as fox and beaver. On balance, we are heavy exporters of skins, and if we were to take measures to exclude small imports from other countries it might have a detrimental effect on our export trade.

Mr. JACKMAN: Can we not encourage the breeding of muskrats in this country? Are any United States funds involved in purchasing these rabbit skins from Australia which come in through the United States?

Mr. HOWE: These international currencies move around. I presume the Americans get some little rake-off on the skins as they pass through the United States. We buy our Australian rabbit skins from the market in St. Louis, I am told. I presume that the Australians get United States dollars from the United States and send them over to us to buy lumber. I could not say that the Americans do not get some dollars out of that transaction.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understand that there is a fur auction in Montreal. The minister is interested in developing trade, particularly with the other parts of the commonwealth. Why is something not done by way of getting these Australian rabbit skins shipped direct to Canada, without having to go through the United States, where a certain amount of commission must be paid?

Mr. QUELCH: The minister knows that one of our troubles in getting goods from Britain is the high price of those goods. The U.S.A. World News Report points out that that is one of the main difficulties. They say that British textiles are piling up on the shelves in Britain, because they cannot be sold on account of their high prices. You could buy English shirts in Ottawa in 1939 for $3, and a year ago you could buy them for $6.50, but last fall they cost $9. The minister mentioned that we have eliminated the tariff to help Britain. I went downtown this week expecting to find some slight reduction, but I found that English shirts had gone up fifty cents to $9.50. Why should the price of these articles go up when we have eliminated the tariff? Has the price level of British goods gone up recently, or are these prices due to action on the part of retailers in this country?

Mr. HOWE: It is difficult to say. If my hon. friend is shocked by those prices I can tell him that I bought some shirts the last time I was in Britain and I was shocked to find that the bill came to $20 per shirt. You can buy British shirts cheaper in Canada than in Britain. I cannot say whether the prices are going up or not. Our dealers in British goods are anxious to reintroduce these goods and their mark-up should be very modest. It is difficult to say, without investigating the particular commodity.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is nearly eleven o'clock and, when we resume, I should like the minister to give us a statement on the total credits we have given to date to facilitate our trade. Just where do we stand at the moment?

Item stands.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Seventh report of the standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cleaver.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask the Minister of Finance when he proposes to bring in the income tax bill for discussion?

Mr. ABBOTT: The one that is being considered by the banking and commerce committee? I hope early next week.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister, concerning the increase in salary of the lieutenant governor of Prince Edward Island, and we hope we shall pass the resolution and the bill in its different stages. The bill is exactly the same as the resolution. It is to increase the salary from $7,000 to $8,000. Then we shall consider amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 228 and Bill No. 300; then take up Bill No. 349, to amend the Diplomatic Service Superannuation Act. Then we shall go into supply, taking the estimates of trade and commerce, reconstruction, veterans affairs, external affairs, labour, national revenue, public works. I cannot indicate in what order we shall take them up.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 18, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCH—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF DEBATE ON LORD'S DAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, in order to call the attention of the house to the fact that a report in a Toronto morning paper states that I opposed the amendment of the Lord's Day Act to repeal the Ontario pre-confederation statute. I did no such thing. As reported at page 5360 of Hansard, I said:

I agree that there should be a repeal of the pre-confederation statute.

PHYSICAL FITNESS ADMINISTRATION—FINANCIAL STATEMENT PLACED ON RECORD JUNE 16

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. As reported at page 5348 of Hansard of June 16, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he would put on Hansard, with the consent of the house, the financial statement of the national physical fitness administration for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948. Permission was given for the printing of that financial statement. But page 5349 of Hansard indicates that the statement which was put on Hansard was the financial statement for the previous fiscal year which ended March 31, 1947. No doubt that was a mistake. Probably the minister, with the consent of the house, would put on Hansard the financial statement for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1948. (See also page 5628.)

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will have the matter looked into at once.

WHEAT

ONTARIO WINTER WHEAT—REMOVAL OF PRICE CEILING AS OF JUNE 18

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have been asked by several hon. members to state the policy of the government with regard to Ontario winter wheat.

In considering Ontario winter wheat policy for the crop year commencing July 1, 1948, the government has decided that the price ceiling on Ontario winter wheat can be removed and this action will be effective as of today, June 18. The present treasury payment of eight cents per bushel is discontinued with the removal of the price ceiling. This means that the price of Ontario winter wheat will be free to find its own level under prevailing conditions.

I am unable at the moment to state whether export control will be necessary or not in the case of Ontario winter wheat. If an international wheat agreement becomes operative on August 1, 1948, the export of Ontario winter wheat or Ontario winter wheat flour will be included under all the terms of such an agreement, and export control will be necessary in this case. The government hopes that this issue will be clarified prior to the harvesting of the 1948 winter wheat crop.

QUESTION AS TO RATIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which I have already sent to him. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the London dispatch in the Globe and Mail of today, June 18, entitled, "Britons feel wheat agreement for world producers doomed"? If so, would the hon. minister make a statement to the house in regard to this important matter?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend has just sent me an extract from the Globe and Mail. The difficulty to which he refers is that the United States government has not as yet ratified the wheat agreement. Whether that government will do so before the first of August is a question that only the United States government can answer. It will be the intention of the Canadian government to proceed with ratification of the agreement, but obviously, if the United States, one of the three producing countries, fails to ratify it, it is unlikely that the agreement can come into effect. Our information is that Australia has ratified the agreement with the proviso that, unless Canada and the United States do the same, the agreement will not become effective as far as it is concerned.

INSURANCE COMPANIES

AMENDMENTS TO CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932, AND FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 350 (from the senate) to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO LOANS WITHOUT COLLATERAL SECURITY, ETC.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the first reading of Bill No. 351 (from the senate) to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 352, for the relief of Samuel Lankszner.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 353, for the relief of Audrey Maude Victoria Giles Findlay.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 354, for the relief of George Elias Heydenreich.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 355, for the relief of Guiseppina Cannuli Catalfamo.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 356, for the relief of Ann Laurie Willett Allan.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 357, for the relief of Leon Schechter. —Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 358, for the relief of Beatrice Evelyn Tutill Bobinsky.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 359, for the relief of Una Mary Phillips Slavin.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 360, for the relief of Margaret Laidley Lawrie Burke.—Mr. Maybank.

Bill No. 361, for the relief of Albert Kenworthy.—Mr. Maybank.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS OF PRIVATE BILLS

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): With reference to the senate bills which have just been given first reading, and others of the kind, I should like to move:

That for the remainder of the session all private bills from the senate when received from that house be read a first and second time and be referred forthwith, and that standing order 105 respecting the posting of bills be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On division.

Motion agreed to.

P.E.I. FERRY SERVICE

WOOD ISLAND-CARIBOO DOCKING FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister provide immediately a tug to assist the ferry boat Charles A. Dunning in docking at the Wood Island pier, as difficulty is found by this boat in docking during the completion of the construction work?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I do not know that there is any urgency about this matter, nor do I know just what the responsibility of the department is in relation to the Wood Island-Cariboo ferry. However, I shall be glad to look into the matter.

FLOOD CONDITIONS

EQUIPMENT FOR REPAIR AND RECLAMATION OF DIKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has he yet had any report as to what equipment is being secured or has been secured to repair and reclaim the Fraser valley dikes?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will make it clear and loud enough, Mr. Minister. Has your department yet made any arrangements to secure sufficient equipment to repair and reclaim the Fraser valley dikes? If not, why not?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I may assure the hon. gentleman that the Department of Public Works is doing its utmost to have proper equipment to dredge the Fraser river, and it has been doing that since 1886 with some success. We will continue to do the same.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A further question. Are we to expect in this emergency the same success that you have had for the past ten years? You will get it every day until you do something.

PRICES

INCREASE IN COST OF BEEF TO HOSPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I should like to address a question to the government. It may be rather difficult to answer at the moment, but perhaps they can accept it as notice and reply at the next sitting.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Next year some time.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The question arises out of a telegram I have received from H. E. Taylor, administrator of the West Coast general hospital. He advises me that in July, 1947, that hospital paid 22¾ cents for a side of common beef. Today the price is 40 cents, an increase of 75·8 per cent. He asks me what I am doing about it. Not being a member of the government, there is not much that I can do about it. What does the government intend to do about it?

COARSE GRAINS

ADJUSTMENT PAYMENTS TO WESTERN GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question. What is the amount per bushel adjustment payment on oats and barley authorized to the western grower?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): An announcement will be made shortly.

SALARIES ACT

INCREASE IN SALARY OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Salaries Act so as to provide an increase in the salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island from $7,000 to $8,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I should say a word on this resolution. As hon. members know, the salaries of lieutenant governors are fixed by the parliament of Canada. They vary in different provinces. For some time past the annual salary of the lieutenant governor in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec has been fixed at $10,000, and in six other provinces at $9,000. The salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island has been $7,000.

During recent years, as hon. members know, the expense of maintaining government houses has risen considerably, and after reviewing the situation carefully the government felt that the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island, while he had not as many duties as some of the other lieutenant governors, had nevertheless to meet increasing obligations which he has not heretofore been called upon to discharge.

I would mention particularly that the lieutenant governors pay income tax on their salaries. In some of the provinces, government houses are provided by the province. That is the case in Prince Edward Island. That is also true in three or four other provinces. Where government houses are not provided, the provinces make other arrangements in the form of providing official quarters, allowances for expenditures and the like.

I understand that in Prince Edward Island the lieutenant governor has himself had to meet practically all the expenses of the maintenance of government house and secretarial expenses. While that is so, his obligations have increased materially during the last few years. In reviewing the whole situation, the government felt that parliament should be asked to grant an increase of $1,000 in the salary of the lieutenant governor of that province.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the Prime Minister indicate when the last adjustment was made in the salaries of lieutenant governors?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand there has been no adjustment for forty years.

Mr. McLURE: May I be permitted to make a few remarks with reference to this resolution? I was pleased indeed when I noticed that this resolution was to be brought before the house, but I was disappointed in the consolation increase of $1,000 being provided; because, as the Prime Minister has already stated, in six of the other provinces the lieutenant governors receive $9,000, and in the two larger provinces the salary is $10,000. When we compare these salaries with those paid to judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the salaries of the lieutenant governors are really on a very low scale, in view of the duties and responsibilities pertaining to the office.

With reference to the salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island, I suggest that if it is based on the cost of living, his salary is out of proportion to the others, because the cost of living in Prince Edward Island is just as high as it is in any of the other provinces, including Ontario and Quebec. What is the price of butter today in Prince Edward Island, as compared with other provinces? The prices of cars and many other commodities are much higher. When we look at the position the lieutenant governor occupies as the representative of the king in the province, we wonder why the salary should be on such a low basis. In addition to the executive work the lieutenant governor of our province is called upon to do, he is the salesman of the province to visitors who come from other provinces and countries.

I should like to see the resolution changed so that it would increase the salaries of all lieutenant governors; and at this time we should make the salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island equal to the salaries of those in other provinces.

Mr. POULIOT: I am glad to support what has been said by the hon. member for Queens. Actually lieutenant governors are like the united nations, in that there are small and big ones—small powers and big powers. So long as there is a lieutenant governor in that province he is representative of His Majesty the King, and I cannot see why there should be any differentiation in the matter of salaries. Many visitors go to Prince Edward Island, and I suggest respectfully to the Prime Minister that if he decides there should be an increase in salary it should be uniform for all lieutenant governors.

Most of these men are gentlemen of means —and rightly so, because the ordinary man could not fulfil the functions of the office. I do not see why we should be so stingy with lieutenant governors in any of the provinces. They should be on the same footing as representatives of the king, carrying the same honours and the same salaries and wearing the same uniforms.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 365, to amend the Salaries Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Salaries of lieutenant governors.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I do not object to this bill, and if we are to have lieutenant governors and pay them salaries, there is perhaps a case to be made out for the point suggested by the hon. member for Queens and supported by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. GRANT: We had a hard time to get that much for him.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish also to say that any remarks I shall make in the next few moments are not to be taken as any reflection upon the gentleman who occupies the position of Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island. It does seem strange to me, however, that it has been so easy during this session to have so many of these salaries increased to meet the increased cost of living and increased obligations of public officials, as contrasted with the difficulty we have in getting increases in pension benefits, veterans' allowances, superannuation for retired civil servants, old age pensions and family allowances to meet the same increased cost of living and the same increased obligations of Canadian citizens generally.

Almost every bill that we have put through this session—

Mr. LENNARD: And you get up and say the same thing every time.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope that is on the record. Almost every bill we have put through this session has had in it a provision for raising salaries from $6,000 to $8,000, from $10,000 to $12,000, or from $12,000 to $15,000. It seems to me if the government admits that Canadians in these upper brackets are hit by the increased cost of living and by increased obligations, it should also recognize that the same is true right across the board. Either there should be an increase for the groups of people I have mentioned, or a serious and aggressive attempt should be made by the government to bring down the cost of living.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, if I am permitted I should like to qualify what I have said. I have suggested that the salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island should be raised to the same level as that of the lieutenant governors of other provinces. In my view however the question was not so much one of increasing salaries as that of putting all lieutenant governors on the same footing. There is a good deal of truth in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said—and, by the way, this is his birthday, and I offer him my good wishes and congratulations.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you—and move on.

Mr. POULIOT: The Prime Minister may consider the reduction of salaries of lieutenant governors who receive more than the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: At the present time it would appear that the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island receives $7,000. I do not know the gentleman, nor do I know who he is.

Mr. KNOWLES: If he is a Prince Edward Islander he is a good man.

Mr. POULIOT: I have no doubt about that. I see, however, that there is considerable discrepancy in the salaries of these lieutenant governors. Those of Ontario and Quebec receive $10,000, while those of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta receive $9,000 each. Under this measure the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island would receive $8,000.

If the program of austerity is imposed on the lieutenant governors as well as on all other Canadians, they would probably curtail their receptions and save money thereby. To start a new trend in austerity, why not reduce the salaries of the lieutenant governors in all provinces to $7,000, so that their salaries would be equalized? Then they would be on a par with Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I had not planned on entering this debate, but I had not read the measure before. It seems that the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia receives only $9,000, while those of Ontario and Quebec receive $10,000 from the coffers of the people of Canada—and this at a time when my people are under water. There is not a chance in the world of my agreeing to that. The Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia five days ago was out with his good lady going through the water to help flood victims. And he should be underpaid? Nonsense! I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that we can raise the salaries of members of parliament, including myself, of the board of transport commissioners, and of everybody else in the higher brackets, but we have to fight to get increases in war veterans allowances and veterans pensions.

If there is to be any increase, then I believe with the hon. member for Temiscouata that all lieutenant governors should be paid the same, or those in the higher brackets should be reduced to conform with those in the lower; and if it is possible to move an amendment to that effect, with these Ontario members, I shall be delighted to move it.

Mr. SINNOTT: Mr. Chairman, it is not often that I have anything to say in this house, but this is one time I am going to say a few words. While I have no objection to increasing the salary of the gentleman mentioned, because it would seem an increase is justified in order to meet conditions as we find them today, I must comment upon the increases that have been made in the salaries of those in the upper brackets during the past few months, increases of $1,000, $2,000 and $3,000. Those salaries must be paid out of the receipts from income tax and so on. I cannot sit here and take it when I see that the poor man is receiving no alleviation this year from the burden of income tax. I will fight with every drop of blood I have to see that some alleviation is provided for the poor man by way of reduction in taxes so that he can at least make a living.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): When I listen to the hon. member for Springfield I wonder if we are not looking at this thing in the wrong way. Under our democratic system we have a governor general and lieutenant governors. The latter are paid salaries of $9,000 or $10,000 a year, but I believe we are getting $25,000 worth of services.

Mr. SINNOTT: Nonsense.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Everyone knows that a man must have considerable wealth to be able to accept one of these positions. The lieutenant governors are willing to carry out these duties which we feel are necessary under our British system, and they sacrifice from $10,000 to $15,000 a year to keep up that tradition in a manner befitting representatives of the crown. I feel that we are getting a tremendous bargain, as it were, when these gentlemen are willing to act in this capacity.

Mr. KNOWLES: I just want to say one more word. I think what has been said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni about the right of these people to carry on the tradition of their position applies equally to the ordinary Canadian. Every citizen of this country has the right to carry on his tradition, and the government should take steps to enable him to meet the rising cost of living.

The CHAIRMAN: May I point out to the committee that this bill deals with the Salaries Act and refers to an increase in the salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island. I doubt if it is in order to discuss the questions which have been raised with regard to income tax and cost of living as they affect other people.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have heard some persons speak who are aspirants for the position of lieutenant governor of Ontario some time in the future. We have an excellent lieutenant governor in British Columbia who is spending from $25,000 to $50,000 of his own money every year. We had great difficulty in getting a citizen of sufficient means who was capable of handling the position. The members of the government know that.

In spite of what has been said by some who have aspirations to fill the position of lieutenant governor in the future, why should one be paid any more than the other? I have the greatest admiration for every one of these people and what they stand for, and I think they should all be paid the same.

Mr. SHAW: I agree with the principle of this bill. I do not think increasing the salary of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island by $1,000 will make any difference as far as the treatment of Canadians in other categories is concerned. We can do this and still do the other. But I do not think that we should pay one lieutenant governor one salary and another lieutenant governor a different salary. They occupy comparable positions. It is true that Prince Edward Island is a smaller province with a lesser population than Ontario, but after all, one member of parliament may represent a constituency ten times the size of another with possibly fifty per cent more population. If we are to apply the principle that is being applied here, we should do the same thing for members of parliament. They are all paid the same because they occupy the same position and bear the same responsibilities. I hope that before long the government will take action to the end that all lieutenant governors will receive the same amount.

Mr. CASE: Is there any other consideration that goes with this office by way of expense allowances?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The federal government provides only the salary.

Section agreed to on division.

Bill reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

ASSESSMENT OF DUTY ON MALT RECEIVED INTO BREWERIES—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 228, to amend the Excise Act, 1934.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. FLEMING: Explain.

Mr. McCANN: The amendment is to section 31, and provides that that section shall come into force on May 19, 1948. The bill was to come into effect upon proclamation, but this particular section had to do with the removal of the tax on vinegar. As that became effective on the date of the budget, it was necessary to have this amendment.

Mr. BOUCHER: I suppose you are trying to justify the vinegar budget.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENT TO ACT OF 1934—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Mr. ROBERT H. WINTERS (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 300, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WINTERS: Mr. Speaker, the definition of "sailing ship" in the act as it was received in this chamber from the senate was "any ship propelled wholly by sails." That meant that all ships equipped with auxiliary engines and sails came under the act for steamship inspection and for certification of officers. Maritime and west coast members thought that would result in hardship to our fishing fleets, which by and large are still of the sail type although they are all equipped with auxiliary engines. We therefore sought an amendment of the definition, and the minister was good enough to bring in a new definition, as follows:

> "Sailing ship", except for the purposes of the load lines rules, means a ship propelled wholly by sails, and a ship solely employed in fishing not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage, provided with masts, sails and rigging sufficient to allow her to make voyages under sail alone, and that in addition, is fitted with mechanical means of propulsion other than a steam engine.

The senate considered the wording of the amendment too stringent, with particular respect to the words "Sailing ship is a ship solely employed in fishing not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons, gross tonnage." The limiting phrase "solely employed in fishing" means that fishermen such as, for instance, the Lunenburg salt fishermen, who in the wintertime run their salt fish to the West Indies and other coastal ports, and other fishing vessels employed part-time in the coastal trade, would be obliged to submit to steamship inspection and certification. The senate therefore struck out the words "solely employed in fishing not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons," and substituted "principally employed in fishing not exceeding two hundred tons," raising the tonnage to two hundred, because there are certain schooners engaged in the trade which are slightly over one hundred and fifty tons gross tonnage. That leaves the spirit of the amendment the same, making it applicable to the same type of vessels but to slightly larger vessels. The amendment in that form, Mr. Speaker, is acceptable to the government.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the final wording of the amendment? We have had the explanation, but the bill has not been distributed.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, from the explanation just given by the parliamentary assistant it would seem to me that the hon. gentlemen in the other place in making this change were solely concerned with the east coast codfishing schooners. When the bill was before the house the provision was that as long as a ship could make a voyage under sail it was to be exempt from steamship inspection regulations. Our ships on the Pacific coast have greater power and are really more seaworthy than those on the east coast, and the senate amendment differentiates between the two types of vessels used on the east coast and on the west coast. I am prepared, however, to accept the senate amendment, with the reservation that if it does not work out to the satisfaction of the west coast fishing operators an amendment may be brought in next year to make the act equitable to both east and west coasts.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATION—PROVISIONS AS TO RETURN OF CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Parliamentary Assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 349, to amend the Diplomatic Service (Special) Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Withdrawal allowance to public official upon retirement or resignation.

Mr. KNOWLES: The other day two or three members asked the parliamentary assistant a number of questions. Perhaps he or the minister could answer them at this time.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): A number of questions were asked on the resolution stage. This amendment to the act of last year does not extend to any group of people who were not covered by the original act, but there are certain provisions in the bill with respect to widows. At the present time thirteen diplomats are enjoying the benefits of the act passed last year. None of them has retired on pension under the provisions of the act. When any of them do, they will receive the pensions set out in section 3 of the original act. Altogether thirteen could elect under some of the provisions of the bill before us, but it is not likely that more than two will at the moment.

The question was also asked whether anybody had been appointed this year who would take advantage of the act. The answer is that since the passing of the act one year ago, Mr. Turcotte has been appointed consul general at Chicago.

Mr. KNOWLES: The parliamentary assistant says that the amendment does not extend the benefits of this act to any persons not already included. May I ask whether it extends to the thirteen persons already included any benefits additional to those granted by the act of las' year.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): The only additional benefit is that under the amendment, if they choose to retire, they can get back the moneys they have paid in, just as civil servants do under the superannuation act.

Mr. HACKETT: With or without interest?

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Without interest.

Mr. MacINNIS: The purpose of section 1 is to permit the withdrawal of any contributions made?

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: Will Mr. Turcotte, Mr. Scully and Mr. Senior come under this?

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Scully and Mr. Senior do not.

Mr. POULIOT: The principle is the same as that governing the salary of a lieutenant governor. Does Mr. Turcotte come under this?

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Here we are again—consuls being put under the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is there any other country in the world where consuls are not under the Department of Trade and Commerce? Ambassadors, high commissioners and officials of that kind come under the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But there is no country in the world where a consul is considered a diplomat. These consuls are not diplomats; they are trade agents. The same thing is true of a high commissioner, but there is some latitude concerning the high commissioner. I do not see how in the world Mr. Scully who must come under this—

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): No, he is not. I answered my hon. friend before and said he was not. The persons who are under it are defined in the original act as being ambassadors, ministers, high commissioners or consuls general of Canada. It does not include consuls.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Scully, then, is a consul general.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): He qualifies under the superannuation act in the normal way. He does not come under this act.

Mr. POULIOT: It does not make him a diplomat. A diplomat is a gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not say that Mr. Turcotte and the other consuls are not gentlemen. I know them as gentlemen. A diplomat is a man who has special credentials. He is a man who wears a uniform, decorations, and things like that. A consul, or even a consul general, is a plainclothes man. His interest is not to serve the policies of his government except in trade matters, and trade matters only. That is the business of Messrs. Scully and Turcotte and Senior. The consuls who have been promoted should be under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not say that to be unpleasant, but it is my deep conviction that the Department of Trade and Commerce should be a complete unit with ramifications outside this country. The Department of External Affairs is an entirely different unit. There is a lot of confusion about it. The finest seats in the gallery have been given to trade agents and so-called diplomats. We have been deprived of those seats for our relatives, friends and supporters who come here. They are empty today. These people pay no attention to our deliberations, even when we discuss matters that concern their confrères. I would say "colleagues" for the diplomats, but I say "confrères" for the consuls. What are they doing? Yesterday we heard something about the triangular trade between Great Britain, the United States and Canada. We have practically no trade with other countries except the gifts that we make to them.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

What is the purpose that is served by these consuls? I shall be answered and told that Mr. Turcotte is in the United States. Very good. He may do a very good job there. But he must not come under the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and he should not enjoy the benefits that are given to these so-called diplomats.

Mr. MacNICOL: "So-called" is right.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. For instance, there is a man named Greene who was appointed high commissioner to Australia because he was president of the Rideau club, and LaFleche was appointed to poor Greece. He was mentioned in the press as having a yacht there. What does he need a yacht for? It should be abandoned. We go on like that. Some of these diplomats are very useful. I would mention Mr. Desy, for instance, who did a lot for Canada in South America. Mr. Chipman is doing very well in South America. I am sure that our friend Mr. Vaillancourt is doing the best he can in Yugoslavia. We go on like that.

I find it rather funny. These so-called diplomats remind me of comic opera, of the Student Prince, with their uniforms and all that stuff. They should have small uniforms because Canada is a small country and therefore we should not have them too big, and they cannot work on stilts.

The other day the Ottawa Citizen had a very good article about the promotion of a high commissioner to ambassadorial rank. The conclusion of the editorial was how could the king raise the standard of men who are representing him to himself. It is a fine and subtle distinction on the divisibility of the crown. A Canadian ambassador would be the ambassador of the king of Canada to the king of England, who is the same person. The ambassador is the representative of the head of the state to the head of another state. If the high commissioner of Canada to England were promoted to be ambassador he would be the representative of the head of the state of Canada, His Majesty George VI, to the head of the state of the United Kingdom, the same man, His Majesty George VI, but to a different crown in each case.

Of course, these men want promotion. It may be well deserved. It would raise their standard. It would raise them in importance and they would walk immediately after the royal family instead of walking after the dukes and barons, and all others, in important processions. It would mean a lot to us, and then it would change the status of Canada. Instead of speaking of commonwealth affairs we would speak of universal affairs and world affairs, and Canada would be changed. We would have another so-called promotion and our diplomats would pass ahead of the king like pall-bearers passing in a funeral procession. The first man in a funeral procession is the undertaker. He walks ahead of the funeral procession. Some of these ambassadors are so conceited that they all want to pass ahead of all royal processions like the undertaker in a cortege or the drum major in a regiment.

I find it funny; I do not find it serious. I find that these men who are there enjoy their positions so much that they do not deserve important recognition. I do not see why LaFleche is the ambassador of Canada to Greece. He did not deserve any reward. Greene did not deserve any reward for being president of the Rideau club, an institution that is nefarious to sound government policy in this country. Some are good; some are no good. Why do we not weed them out before increasing their privileges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member's speech may be very amusing, but this is merely a bill to correct three errors that I must confess we made last year. When the bill was brought before the house last year it did not provide for the rule that if one retires at a time when he is not entitled to any pension he can get his contributions back. That is now the rule which has been put into all the superannuation acts, and this bill proposes to include it here.

Another provision is to correct another error which I must admit. We provided that those who would want to have past service counted should have their contributions based, either upon the actual salaries they received, or the salaries they got when they were first appointed to external affairs. We found in two instances it gave the appointees the right to make contributions on less than the actual salaries they had been receiving, and we do not think that is proper. Therefore we are just taking out that and making it a requirement that their contributions will be based upon the actual salaries that will serve as a basis for determining the pension they will get.

The third point is this. Hon. members felt last year that this was going to be a very generous pension scheme. There are two or three of the thirteen who were appointed who have other military pensions, which means that they would get no benefits out of this. Therefore the third provision is that anyone who is appointed to External Affairs need not make the contributions if he will renounce any benefits from the act. These are the only three things that are provided.

The hon. member has said that some gentlemen appointed to diplomatic rank did not deserve any reward, and he mentioned two. I can assure the hon. gentleman that they were not appointed with the idea of giving them any reward. It was after considerable pressure had been put upon him that Mr. Greene consented to become our high commissioner in Australia and warned us at the time that he did not expect to be able to serve there for more than a couple of years. He is one of those who would be entitled to take advantage of this bill. Since this bill was passed the only appointee who was not taken from the civil service was Mr. Turcotte, who was appointed consul general in Chicago.

The hon. member for Temiscouata says that consuls general should be under the Department of Trade and Commerce and not under the Department of External Affairs. That is a view as to which some good arguments might be advanced. But I can assure the hon. member that the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce co-operate closely and that exchanges of personnel have been made. We have appointed to diplomatic rank, gentlemen who have served efficiently as trade commissioners. The trade commissioners are still under the Department of Trade and Commerce, but the consuls provide excellent service to the Department of External Affairs.

The hon. gentleman mentioned Mr. Scully in New York. The offices of Mr. Scully in New York would have had to be duplicated for the service of our delegation to the united nations if we had not had those facilities there. Elsewhere so far we have limited consular service. The consuls of course assist in the promotion of trade, but they also render assistance to Canadian nationals who happen to be abroad. In some places we require to have representatives of the Department of External Affairs who can come to the assistance of Canadian nationals who happen to need assistance. This house places at our disposal each year a revolving fund out of which we frequently have to make advances, which are returned, to Canadian nationals who happen to get into difficulties abroad.

The suggestion that there should be a division and that the consular service should be under the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce is one that is worthy of consideration, but no solution could be arrived at on this bill. This bill does not provide any extension of benefit beyond that one which, I think it was two years ago, the house generally approved. Hon. members of the house will remember that formerly if a civil servant were dismissed, he did not get back his contributions. The house, I think unanimously, felt that it was improper for such a situation to exist, and that if the contribution for a pension did not mature into a pension, the one who had made the contribution should get it back without interest. That is the only benefit extended here.

The other two provisions are rather restrictive. A man can choose to stay out, not make any contributions and not get any right whatsoever under the bill. The other provision is that he will not have the right to make a smaller contribution than that determined by the actual salary he gets in the period for which he is making the contribution.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has explained the bill satisfactorily, and there is really not much to it. Last year when the bill was introduced, we in this section of the house opposed it as being that sort of class legislation that we so often get in this house. However, the bill being passed, I think these amendments are quite proper.

The hon. member for Temiscouata evidently does not like diplomats. I imagine he would agree with the old definition, that a diplomat is an honest man who is sent abroad to lie for his country. He would make an exception and perhaps say they were not all honest men before they left. However, while we could find fault with the appointments made by the government, I think that once an appointment is made it does not serve any useful purpose to criticize it in this house. It does not increase the respect for or the prestige of our representative abroad, wherever he may be. Therefore I think comments along that line would be better left unsaid.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the information that he has given. As usual, he has been clear and concise; he has explained the purpose of the bill. We may differ, and at the same time respect other people's views. But when there is something funny—and I do not say that in order to discredit my country; I say it because I find it funny, and people from other countries who were witnesses to the fact must find it funny too—we should be allowed to laugh. I am sure that if the hon. member for Vancouver East saw some of the diplomats and the pictures that are taken of them, he would laugh heartily. Nevertheless, he would be a good citizen.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs knows that I have great admiration for him, and he admits the views of people who do not share his own. But I understand that Mr. Turcotte will benefit from this bill because when he was appointed he was not a civil servant; and that Mr. Scully who was a deputy minister, and Mr. Senior, who was with the department, will be seconded to the department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is that so?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are not precisely seconded. They are appointed to the staff of the Department of External Affairs. But under the bill passed last year, only those who did not have any other superannuation rights are entitled to the rights provided for by last year's bill. Mr. Scully and Mr. Senior were already under the superannuation act in the civil service and continue to remain under that act though becoming members of the staff of External Affairs.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for the explanation. As I understand it now, the bill applies to full-fledged diplomats and to consuls who were not previously in the government service.

Mr. KNOWLES: Consuls general.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, consuls general; it applies to consuls. The minister spoke of Mr. Scully, who is doing a good job in New York. That may be so. I heard the same thing said by many others. I hear that Mr. Turcotte is doing well, and I am sure that Mr. Senior will do well too. The thing to do is to centralize the good dispositions of the people of another country and to make them understand the great possibilities of Canada. But I do not think that the positions of consuls and diplomats are interchangeable. The position of trade commissioner is a full-fledged job which is of the utmost importance to this country. What we get through the services of those men, consuls and trade commissioners, is much more than we get from the services of the so-called full fledged diplomats. Our diplomats could disappear and the country would not suffer in consequence except perhaps theoretically; but good trade commissioners, good consuls and good consuls general, with all the assistance of the government, are needed in every part of the world, not only in the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mr. FERGUSON: This nation is associated with all the other nations of the world, and we have a government which appoints diplomatic representatives and trade representatives. I am expressing not only my own views but, I believe, the views of others when I say that it neither decreases nor enhances the ability of our representatives in foreign fields whether they occupy this or that position in a cortege. Whether it be at a duke's funeral or at the funeral of a king, it makes no difference whether one follows the hearse or the gun carriage; such order of precedence has not much to do with the efficiency of our foreign representatives. I do not believe this is the place to criticize these men personally, and I presume they are all Liberals if they are appointed by a Liberal administration.

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. FERGUSON: Well, I believe that there are good men in my own party and if that party were in power I would try to select men of the greatest ability for appointment to these positions. If I could not find them in my own party I might go to the other party.

Mr. POULIOT: You would do much better.

Mr. FERGUSON: The usual course is to appoint men with the greatest ability and the best brains irrespective of whether they are members of the Rideau club or any other club. I do not think it is the wisest thing to have it broadcast from this House of Commons that a man selected for one of these positions to represent this country has been chosen because he is a member of the Rideau club. I cannot conceive that even the Liberal party would resort to that sort of selection in making appointments.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Election not to contribute under section four.

Mr. PEARKES: Would any official who had earned a pension under some other act draw that pension while holding appointment under the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. He would not receive both pension and salary. The salary would be adjusted in the light of the amount of pension that was payable.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

532. Departmental administration, $2,253,340.

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to a speech made by the hon. member for Lethbridge on June 8, as reported at page 4903 of Hansard, on a motion to go into supply, in which he made certain charges and asked specific questions relating to two cases which have been brought to my attention.

I think the reply would come more properly under this item, which covers general administration, than any other. I regret that I and other members of the parliamentary committee were not in the house when the hon. member made his speech. The committee was in session on veterans affairs and was busy at the time. Neither did I have knowledge that the hon. member intended to discuss these matters. I did not know that he was interested in the two cases to which he referred. If I had known that, I would have been very glad to give him correct and complete information regarding them.

It will be noted that the complaints made by the hon. member the other day were apparently based upon representations made to him by Captain Walter H. Kirchner, of British Columbia. The committee will remember that in times past a number of serious charges had been made by Captain Kirchner, whereupon my predecessor appointed a commission composed of Doctor McCann, Doctor Blair, Doctor McGarry, Mr. Probe and Mr. Winters, all members of this house.

Last fall this commission went to British Columbia and conducted a thorough investigation into all charges made. Both cases referred to the other day were looked into by the commission at that time. The commission submitted its report to the government shortly after I became minister, and on March 9 last I tabled that report in this house. Although the report has been available since March, the hon. member made such unwarranted statements the other day, at the same time demanding replies to his questions, that I feel I should place on record the actual facts regarding these two cases. I do so, Mr. Chairman, much as I deplore the naming of individual veterans in this house, unless it is absolutely essential. But since they were named with regard to the complaints, I can do no other than follow suit now.

No. 77732, Sholto B. McClellan: Mr. McClellan is a veteran of world war I who served from November, 1914, to May, 1918, part of his service being in France. On enlistment his age was thirty-nine years. Following discharge from service, entitlement was conceded for myalgia and pension was awarded in accordance with the extent of disability resulting from that condition. Disability was assessed at 15 per cent and pension went into payment accordingly. Early examination took place on four subsequent occasions, but there was no indication of any increase in disability. In December, 1923, application was made for treatment in respect of haemorrhoids and the commission conceded entitlement for this condition, which improved with treatment, and there was no resultant disability. In 1926, following discharge from treatment, it was considered that there was increase in the disability resulting from arthritis and pension was increased accordingly to 30 per cent. Again, in 1928, following treatment, there was considered to be further disability and pension was increased to 50 per cent. In 1929 he applied for bronchitis, which the commission ruled to be a post-discharge condition. This claim was heard by the pension appeal court in March, 1931, and was disallowed, as bronchitis was ruled as not attributable to service. During subsequent years he has been examined on different occasions and the pension continued at 50 per cent, which was in accordance with the degree of pensionable disability.

In 1939 he was in receipt of war veterans allowance, which was discontinued in 1942 owing to his having secured employment. As a result of representations received on behalf of this pensioner a re-examination was ordered, and this took place in August, 1947. The x-ray of both knees, both shoulders, spine and pelvis showed moderate hypertrophic-arthritis, and reports indicate that examination showed joint movements as practically full range. There was no evidence of haemorrhoids at the time of this examination, and pension was continued at 50 per cent, which was again considered to be a very fair one for the degree of pensionable disability.

It should be pointed out that the pensioner by this time is seventy-two years of age. This pensioner appeared before the McCann commission in Vancouver in January of this year, and on February 18, 1948, forwarded a statement regarding his case to the members of that commission. The statement was forwarded for the consideration of the commission, and instructions were issued to the Vancouver office on March 22, 1948, to recall him for pension medical re-examination with particular regard to his complaint regarding the assessment of any disability resulting from haemorrhoids.

In a letter which is dated April 2, 1948, he refused to appear. To sum up the case, this veteran of world war I has been fully compensated at all times in accordance with the degree of pensionable disability found on medical re-examination. It must be remembered that he is now seventy-two years of age, and age alone is quite a factor in his present condition. I might add that there would appear to be no reason why he should not now apply for war veterans allowance.

We come now to the second case, No. V-52017, Connorton, F. W. (R.C.N.V.R.). Mr. Connorton served from December 1942 until March 1946, his entire period of service being rendered in Canada. Following discharge a condition of spondylolisthesis, which I am told by the doctors is something approaching difficulty with the lower spine, was diagnosed. And this I might say is a constitutional developmental condition. The commission ruled it to be pre-enlistment in origin and aggravated to the extent of three-fifths during his service in Canada, which was in Canada only.

His last examination was in January of this year when, to quote his own words, he made the following complaint:

> My back feels fair except if I bend over any length of time it becomes painful at the upper part of the fusion and tends to stiffen up.

As a result of reports and specialists' opinions on file and a very thorough examination, his entire disability was assessed at 30 per cent. He has entitlement to an aggravation of three-fifths of that amount, namely 18 per cent, and pension is in payment accordingly. It is of interest to note that when he reported for examination on March 15 of this year he stated he was working.

Questions were asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge, as reported in Hansard for June 8, 1948, at page 4903, with reference to Frank W. Connorton. The first question was: Did this man's condition partly result from an appendix operation in June, 1943?

The answer is: The man's condition had no relation to the appendectomy performed in June 1943, while he was in the active forces.

The spinal anaesthetic given at this time, for which eight punctures were alleged to be given, was investigated, and competent medical opinion states that there is no relation between the incidents surrounding this operation and his subsequent back disability.

The second question: Did his tragic final condition partly result from his effort to do work for which surgical bungling had unfitted him?

The answer: Careful examination of the medical treatment shows that there was no "surgical bungling" of this case.

The third question: Did his condition result in any considerable measure from a spinal fusion operation on November 15, 1945, apparently unsuccessful, and subsequent mismanagement on the part of government officials in the army?

The answer: While the Department of Veterans Affairs was not responsible for this man's treatment until March 18, 1946, a review of his treatment that is available on his army file does not disclose any mismanagement on the part of government officials in the army.

The fourth question: Was his misfortune partly the result of a second unsuccessful spinal fusion operation on or about September 18, 1946?

The answer: The unsuccessful spinal fusions done on November 15, 1945, while he was under the medical care of the armed services, and again on September 18, 1946, while he was under the medical care of the Department of Veterans Affairs, are not unusual happenings in the treatment of such cases. These attempted fusion operations did not increase his disability even if they did not completely do away with it.

The public inquiry held under P.C. 4980 to which reference was made earlier, included investigation of such cases in Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver. Connorton's case was one of those investigated. Some of the conclusions arrived at as a result of investigation are contained in the report of January 8, 1948, paragraph 9 of which states:

> The commission is satisfied with, and finds no basis for complaint concerning the organization, operation and facilities of Shaughnessy hospital and the other institutions inspected.
> The commission is satisfied with, and finds no basis for complaint concerning the qualifications of departmental doctors. In two cases veterans harboured resentment against the psychiatric service. Some lack of experience on the part of a junior psychiatrist and the inability of these patients to understand the reasons for psychiatric methods—although allegedly the reasons were fully explained to them —were factors which led to this resentment. The commission is satisfied however that this did not detract from the professional value of the psychiatrist's work nor from the adequacy of the treatment. On the whole, the commission is fully satisfied with the high degree of competence of all departmental doctors.
> The commission found that the medical and surgical treatments and the results attained are quite satisfactory and of a high calibre—as high as in any hospital in Canada. The percentage of successful operations at Shaughnessy hospital is, in the opinion of the commission, well in line with that obtaining anywhere in the profession.

The commission examined fully the cases of low back pains and resulting disability because of the emphasis placed by Mr. Kirchner on this group. The commission concluded:

> It was established to the satisfaction of the commission, after detailed questioning of professional witnesses, that while the operation is not always completely successful, the percentage of successes at Shaughnessy is at least as high as that obtaining elsewhere. Back fusion is regarded as a major operation and is only undertaken at Shaughnessy hospital after a consultation at which it has been decided that the operation is in the veteran's best interests and is likely to lead to improvement of his condition. The commission wishes to comment particularly on the high qualifications and exceptional competence of the neurosurgeon specialists at Shaughnessy hospital.

I may say that the part of the report that I quoted was from a unanimous report of the commission.

It will be seen that the commission investigating the type of case of low back pain and investigating specifically the treatment afforded Connorton concluded that the very best of medical attention is afforded this group of cases in the Department of Veterans Affairs and that this treatment is not always successful, but the percentage of successes in the department is as high as in the best treatment institutions in the country.

Further direct questions were asked in the House of Commons on June 8, 1948, page 4906 of Hansard, second column. I believe it is the opinion of the best medical men in the dominion—the report would indicate that this is also the opinion of the commission set up under P.C. 4980—that the treatment services given to veterans by the Department of Veterans Affairs are of a very high quality. I do not feel that from a treatment standpoint there are injustices done in the case of Connorton, and I believe that he, and cases similar to his, have received and will receive the best of treatment without the alleged injustices.

Mr. LENNARD: I wish to assure the minister that we do not want to hold up the veterans affairs estimates, but I should like to make a suggestion. The final report of the veterans affairs committee has not been made to the house, and possibly will not be made for several days. I think it would be better if the first item was held over until the report is received. We could pass the other items that could be passed and in that way make headway. After the final report of the committee has been received and we have had some time to study it, we can then deal with the first item, possibly in a short time.

Mr. GREGG: I agree with that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I know it is a comfort to the committee to have the minister give this report on these two men. The committee will have noticed, however, that the complaint made by Mr. McClellan was in the words which I read into Hansard, as reported on page 4903, as follows:

> What we are complaining about is that our records have been mishandled, or, in real truth, falsified, to make it look as if we were not entitled to pensions.

My evidence clearly shows that the charges are true.

The committee was entitled to expect that the minister would adduce evidence in the McClellan case to show that there was no foundation for his complaint, namely, that there had been falsification of the records as far as McClellan was concerned. The minister has said nothing about this serious aspect of the matter and I submit that the committee is entitled to a thorough treatment of that phase of dealing with veterans. I will leave the McClellan case for the time being.

I return now to the Connorton case. The committee will have noticed that in dealing with the Connorton case the real challenge of the material which I placed on Hansard was not met. I think it would be well for me to give a moment or two to that matter. The report presented by the minister is accurate, it is moderately worded, but it does not meet the challenge. I stated that this young man Connorton was well and strong when he joined the forces.

In order to aid the minister in going still further into this question, which I am sure the committee will want him to do, I should like to ask four questions. First, was Connorton formerly an apprentice machinist who for two years prior to enlistment had been serving with the Vancouver Engineering Works Limited? Second, as such was he engaged daily in heavy lifting work and classified by that company as being well above the average of the employees engaged in that class of heavy lifting work? Third, was he classified by the manager of the Vancouver Engineering Works as a first-class workman, intelligent, cheerful and co-operative, and also as one who had demonstrated that he possessed the qualities of a first-class machinist? Fourth, was he classified by the director of apprenticeship of the province of British Columbia as one who would be a valuable asset to the armed forces at his trade occupation?

If the answers to those questions should prove to be "yes", and if it should be established that there is unchallengeable documentary evidence to prove that the answers should be "yes," then the problem which will confront the minister's department will be to show the committee and the country how it came about that a boy who was eighteen years of age on enlistment and who possessed those qualifications should be turned out of the service in 1946 an almost complete wreck as far as doing the kind of work that he had done before was concerned, and yet was ruled as being the victim of a pre-enlistment disability.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

That is the question. We can use technicalities and doctors' terms and all that sort of thing, but the simple fact remains that that boy of eighteen years of age went into the service in apparently perfect physical condition, at least as far as practical considerations were concerned, and he left the service a wreck and yet is reported as suffering from a pre-enlistment disability.

This young man was discharged broken in mind and body. I shall not ask questions on that aspect of the case at present, but would point out that according to the man's own testimony he was suffering on discharge from a prostate gland; he had a bad leg, with muscles tired and locking and the leg aching all the time; he had lost the use of the toes of his left foot after the first spinal fusion; he could not even stand the work of oiling on the Princess Elaine. Oiling is a kind of work that does not require heavy lifting. He also says that after his operation for spinal fusion on November 15, 1945, he wore a body cast and a leg cast until approximately the middle of March, 1946. After that he wore a Taylor brace until June, 1946, and he never again was able to do anything like the heavy work which he had been able to do.

The minister said in his statement that the boy was working on March 2, 1948—the minister will correct me if I have not the exact date—but he does not tell us what the boy was working at. I will wager that the boy was not able to do the heavy machine work that he was doing at the age of eighteen before he enlisted, and I make this general observation: that in view of the amount of money he is receiving he would simply have to work or starve. The minister's statement was vague and general.

The next question I asked was: Did this man's condition result partly from an appendix operation in June 1943? In order to enable the minister to go into this matter more thoroughly may I ask him to prepare and give to the committee at a later date answers to the following questions:

1. Did Connorton undergo an appendix operation in the service in June, 1943?

2. Was he given a local anaesthetic for the operation?

3. Was the anaesthetic administered by a departmental medical intern?

4. Was a needle inserted in Connorton's spine eight times before the anaesthetic was effective?

5. Did the man suffer excruciating pain in this anaesthetic operation?

6. Did the medical intern instruct the nursing sister and an orderly to "pin the man down"?

7. Was the man fourteen days in bed after this appendix operation?

8. Did he complain of his back being sore all that time, and did the departmental doctors inform him he would experience back trouble for about two months, when the condition would "clear up"?

By the way, it is rather unusual after an appendix operation to wait two months before the condition clears up.

9. Did they say this was the usual experience of men receiving spinal anaesthetics to localize an operation?

10. Was he given pills to relieve the pain in his back?

11. Was the man bothered with prostate trouble after this operation, and was he given sulphanilamide drugs, penicillin and electrotherapy treatment for this condition?

12. Does the man claim that prostate trouble is still with him?

Mr. GREGG: Would the hon. member permit an interruption? I do not question his sincerity in asking the twelve questions, but he will appreciate that the questions he asks refer to an operation conducted in 1943 while the man was within the armed services and under their medical care. The questions relate, I take it, to conversations in the operating room and afterwards. I can assure the committee that it will be impossible for my department, and I doubt whether it will be possible for the defence department, to answer all these questions at this time. I have tried to give the hon. member, as briefly as possible, such information as I have at this time on both cases, and I shall attempt to give him any further information I have. Now that he has put the matter forward, I think that should cover the situation fairly adequately.

While I am on my feet I might refer to one statement he made as to the falsification of documents; I presume he meant army documents. Any evidence there may have been on that question was looked into by the McCann commission, and nothing has been brought to my attention, in the report or otherwise, that would lead me to believe that there was falsification.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad that the minister has made that statement, because according to the terms of reference of the McCann commission and the press release which was made from Ottawa concerning its activities, I gather that the commission was not appointed to examine the question of the falsification of the records. The press release dated December 6, 1947, concludes with these words:

> The terms of reference call for investigation of adequacy of treatment in D.V.A. hospitals, qualifications and competence of D.V.A. doctors, and the adequacy of pension considerations.

May I submit to the minister—and I do this in all kindliness, not with any desire to criticize him or his department but simply to get at the facts—that the McCann commission was appointed apparently to investigate charges which had been preferred by the member for Acadia and the member for Swift Current in 1947, and those charges had nothing in the world to do with the efficiency of the doctors in the department; so that when the McCann commission by its terms of reference was given the task of investigating the efficiency of the doctors, that was something that was utterly beside the main point at issue which everybody supposed the commission was appointed to investigate.

I shall have a good deal more to say about this matter as the days go by. From what I have been able to gather concerning the McCann commission, the reasons for its appointment, and the way it did its work, as well as the terms of reference to the commission, I have a suspicion that quite a lot of explaining is necessary on the part of a good many people in the department before this house can be satisfied with the McCann commission.

The next question I raised was:

> Did Connorton's tragic final condition partly result from his effort to do work for which surgical bungling had unfitted him?

I should like to ask the minister some questions which he might submit to his department on this question. But before I do that may I refer to one thing that he said in his reply a moment ago? He said that all such matters as are called for in the questions which are asked under the last question would have to do with conversations which would take place in hospital and elsewhere. That is true; but the important thing is that Frank W. Connorton has submitted a deposition in which he solemnly declares the facts as called for in each of these questions. Unless the department can show that Frank W. Connorton was falsifying in his deposition it will have to accept Connorton's words as being valid. That would be my general opinion on the matter.

Now for the questions in respect of my second question:

1. After hospitalization, did Connorton join the minesweeper Outard as stoker, November, 1943?

2. Did he complain that his back was then still bothering him?

3. Did he complain that his left leg also began to bother him when doing heavy lifting, the muscles becoming tired and locked?

4. Does he complain that his leg condition is still with him?

5. Was he given a one-man board by Doctor Whitelaw in July, 1944, and X-rayed, and subsequently classed as A-1 physically fit?

6. Did he subsequently complain to another departmental doctor, a Doctor Prior, that his spine was still bothering him?

7. Did Doctor Prior state that he would charge him with "malingering" if he complained again?

8. Was he also examined by other departmental doctors at the Givenchy barracks, Victoria, British Columbia, and did they say there was nothing wrong with him?

Probably the minister will have to say that he has not the information in his department with which to answer these questions, but they are vital. If they suggest the truth, and I am sure they do, then they suggest some pretty serious charges against the men who had to deal with this splendid young man.

The next question I asked was this:

Did Connorton's condition result in any considerable measure from a spinal fusion operation on November 15, 1945, apparently unsuccessful, and subsequent mismanagement on the part of government officials in the army?

I should like to ask several questions to help the minister get the facts concerning that matter for the committee. They are as follows:

1. Was Connorton examined by Doctor Ross Robertson, neurosurgeon, Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, British Columbia, and did that physician allege the man had an immature spine?

This is the first of a series of questions. May I just stop here to point out that if the answer to that question is found to be yes, then everyone in this house and in the country can see that there has been culpable blundering on the part of the medical men who had to deal with this soldier before Doctor Ross Robertson came to him. I continue with my questions:

2. Did Doctor Ross Robertson tell the man he would need as remedial treatment a spinal fusion operation to knit the spine?

May I pause here—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Wentworth suggested a short time ago that the item should stand, and that the hon. member who is asking the questions be given an opportunity to forward his questions to the minister. I wonder whether it would save time if the hon. member would consent to sending his questions to the minister so that he could properly answer them when the committee meets again. If the hon. member would do that, we would save a lot of time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can understand the desirability of sending these questions and having a private answer given so that the country as a whole would not know about these questions.

Mr. LENNARD: That is not it at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to point out that I have the floor. I want to fight this thing out with the hon. member who just rose and interfered. If this young man can be found to have been the victim of a miscarriage of justice through the various agencies which this parliament has appointed to give such young men justice, then there is only one place where hon. members can weigh that matter, and that is before the high court of parliament. Therefore these questions have to be asked and answered in public so that the people themselves can determine the justice of the treatment of this young man. All I am doing in speaking at this time is taking up the case of this young man. I should like to ask the hon. member who rose a moment ago how he would feel if this man were his son.

Mr. LENNARD: On a point of privilege, I should like to answer the hon. member who has just spoken. I want him to understand that I am just as much interested in all these cases as he is. I merely rose to correct a false impression on his part. There has been no suggestion in this chamber this morning that the questions should be privately answered. The chairman suggested that the hon. member could send his questions to the minister, who could answer them later, publicly, in another meeting of this committee. That is all I said when I rose. I want the hon. member to understand distinctly that I am just as much interested in these cases as he is, and always have been.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I apologize to the hon. member immediately and unreservedly.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has a perfect right to carry on this discussion if he so desires. The only thing I had in mind when I made the suggestion was that it would save some time. We do not want to interfere with the hon. member.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate that. I am endeavouring to do only what I conceive to be my duty in the circumstances.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the committee took recess for lunch, I was asking several questions bearing upon the question I asked on June 8: Did the condition of Connorton result in any considerable measure from a spinal fusion operation on November 15, 1945, apparently unsuccessful, and subsequent mismanagement on the part of government officials in the army? I asked two questions. May I ask several more:

3. Was Connorton given a spinal fusion operation on November 15, 1945?

4. Did the man lose the use of his toes in the left leg as a result of this operation?

5. Has subsequent remedial treatment for the toes proved ineffective?

6. Was he subsequently examined in the Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, British Columbia by the neurosurgeons, Doctors Boucher, Naden, Starr, Thompson and Black?

7. Did these neurosurgeons turn him over to Doctor Stanley, departmental psychiatrist, and did Stanley state that there was nothing wrong with the man except in his imagination?

8. Was the man then discharged from the Shaughnessy hospital without pension for his condition, and did he accept employment as a fireman in the engine room of the C.P.R. steamer Princess Elaine?

9. Was he compelled to give up this employment after two weeks on account of his back giving out?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that when those questions are answered, the answers will have an important bearing on the question whether or not this young man's ills are the result of military service. I asked one more question on June 8. It was this:

Was his misfortune partly the result of a second unsuccessful spinal fusion operation on or about September 18, 1946?

I have three questions to ask that will help the minister in his investigations pertaining to that question. They are as follows:

1. Was Connorton again admitted to Shaughnessy hospital on September 18, 1946, and subsequently given an exploratory operation by opening up the spine?

2. Was he in consequence given a second spinal fusion operation? If so, when?

3. Has the man stated he cannot face the operating table again because of the suffering he has undergone during those two operations and because his powers of resistance are now undermined?

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that when the minister finishes answering those questions, in so far as the information will enable him to answer them, he will be ready to agree with me—and I believe I am only one of the total membership of this committee who has this opinion—that this man is certainly suffering as a result of military service and not as a result of a pre-enlistment disability.

I should like to ask the minister one or two more questions which do not bear particularly on the questions I raised on June 8. The first one of these has to do with Connorton. I should like to ask the minister to conduct a careful examination into the whole situation which is involved in this question and then report to the committee all the details of evidence and considerations upon which the Canadian pension commission, after studying the case of Frank W. Connorton, concluded "that this—the condition of prespondylolisthesis—is of pre-enlistment origin", as stated in paragraph 1 of their decision of May 10, 1947, dated at Ottawa.

Then I wish to ask a question on the case of another man who was under review by the McCann commission, whose case somewhat resembles the Connorton case. I refer to Stanley L. Walsh, V-86097. In this case, after considerable correspondence had taken place, Brigadier J. L. Melville wrote a letter to Walter H. Kirchner, dated September 2, 1947, in which he used the following words in paragraph 2:

. . . the condition under review is partly due to a constitutional defect and under the circumstances must be considered as of pre-enlistment origin . . .

I should like to have all the details of the evidence and considerations upon which the Canadian pension commission arrived at that decision concerning Stanley L. Walsh.

There is another matter which I desire to mention at the present time. On June 8 I had some rather harsh things to say concerning psychiatrists. I wish to ask several questions on the matter of psychiatrists and to have the minister get the answers and inform the committee and the house in detail with respect to these gentlemen. The questions are as follows:

1. Has a psychiatrist in such a position as, say psychiatrist to Shaughnessy hospital, power to destroy utterly a veteran's chance for pension by simply reporting "this man is definitely neurotic"?

2. Can a key psychiatrist free the commission from the responsibility of furnishing either the applicant or his representative with a summary of evidence?

3. Does this arrangement give the psychiatrists a stranglehold upon the medical profession?

4 (a). In order for the psychiatrist to exercise over the veteran such fearful power as is indicated in questions 2 and 3, is it necessary merely for the psychiatrist to label the veteran a "psychotic"?

(b). If a psychiatrist labels a man as having "emotional instability", will that fact also deprive the man of pension rights?

5. Do psychiatrists use what is called the pentothal test?

6. What is the nature of this test?

7. Do psychiatrists use what is called the truth serum test?

8. Is there any difference between the pentothal and the truth serum test?

9. If so, what?

10. Does the patient under the truth serum test go into a sort of trance, a state somewhat resembling hypnosis?

11. While the patient is in that state, can the psychiatrist make the patient answer questions according to the way they are framed, thereby causing the patient to say almost anything he, the psychiatrist, may desire the patient to say?

12. Can the answers of the patient obtained in such a trance be used to defraud the veteran patient of his rights to pension and proper treatment?

13. Was this very technique employed against certain Hong Kong veterans so to deprive them? For instance, were Hong Kong men who survived the terrible tortures and privations of Japanese prison camps told in their examinations that they were not suffering from those most harrowing experiences but that they were suppressing childhood fantasies and fears?

14. Did Doctor J. P. S. Cathcart, while in office as a sort of official psychiatrist for the Department of Veterans Affairs, publish the following statement?

Popular belief to the contrary, mental diseases are not common hazards of war even for men in the field. If a man is mentally sound on entering the army, navy or air force he runs no greater risk of having his faculties upset than if he continued in civilian life.

Did he declare the belief that wartime service brings mental upset is unfounded and arises from ignorance fostered by ill-advised propaganda?

15. Did the Department of Veterans Affairs for a time base the treatment of veterans policy upon the principle laid down in that pronouncement, namely, that psychosis or neurosis was automatically a pre-enlistment disability?

16. If so, for how long a period and between what dates was this principle used as the basis for departmental treatment of veterans?

17. If not, when and by what pronouncement was the principle and the policy announced in Cathcart's statement changed?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

18. How many veterans' cases were disposed of by the department on the basis of pre-enlistment neurotic or psychotic disability during the period throughout which the Cathcart principle was in use by the department?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that when these questions are all accurately answered, and members of this house are able to draw their conclusions as to what sort of treatment our veterans have received at the hands of psychiatrists, there will be something like a sensation in the house and throughout the country.

I have just this general comment to make before leaving this aspect of my questioning of the minister. First, the evidence I have indicates too strongly that psychiatrists attached to the Canadian veterans affairs department are employed occasionally to deprive a deserving veteran of the financial reimbursement to which he is legally entitled. Second, certain of these psychiatrists are of the type exemplified by General Brock Chisholm, a man who gave the definite impression that he was distinctly materialistic, if not crude, sordid or even sadistic in his outlook upon human life. And, third, such so-called psychiatrists, men who should be called rather pseudo-psychiatrists, are not to be named in the same breath with those noble psychiatric healers who in Britain, the United States, Australia and other lands are, with Christlike devotion to spiritual values, salvaging wounded souls stricken by the desecrating hand of war.

When I spoke on June 8 I made remarks which had general application to psychiatrists throughout the country who were employed by the veterans department. I know that the true psychiatrists, the men who are genuine healers, can be a blessing to the mentally stricken, and these men wherever they are in Canada will readily pardon me for any reflection upon them which may have been implied, because they will have readily recognized that some of the things which have been done by so-called psychiatrists in this country have brought into disrepute the whole class of psychiatrists. They will recognize immediately also that it is time something was done to rid the country of the pseudo-psychiatrists who apparently are employed by the veterans affairs department as agents to deprive men of their rights rather than to heal them of their mental ills.

Mr. GREGG: Mr. Chairman, during the session it has been my opportunity since January to provide members of the house with a chance to consult with my officers on any individual cases regarding whom complaints have been laid, by themselves or by somebody in their constituency or somebody they knew.

I would have been very happy if the hon. member for Lethbridge had brought these cases to my attention at any time. I do not complain of the fact that he has brought individual cases before this committee, nor do I mind the work entailed by the large number of questions he has placed on the record this afternoon. I will assure him now in the first place that many of these questions are of the kind that a member of parliament would like to ask of my officials across a desk, or to ask me if I could give the answer orally. If it is his desire to sit in with any of my officials, who are quite familiar with all these cases, I shall be glad to furnish that opportunity.

I would point out that many of the questions are based of course on the service period of the veteran. As the committee knows, we inherit the documents pertaining to that service. We have no authority to go back into army service and seek witnesses who happened to serve at that time, but we will undertake, if he wishes, to make that information available to him personally, and, if that is not satisfactory, then to the best of our ability we will attempt to answer questions appropriate to my department and submit them to the committee.

Having made that statement, and in conformity with the request of the hon. member for Wentworth, I am prepared to permit this item to stand for the time being, especially in view of the fact that the final report of the veterans affairs committee has not been submitted. Before doing so, however, I shall make an explanatory statement regarding item 532.

This vote in 1948-49 provides $633,480 for expenditures of the war service records division which in previous fiscal years were provided for through the Department of National Defence. If it were not for the responsibility for the operation of the war service records division by the Department of Veterans Affairs, the moneys provided in this vote for the year 1948-49 would show a decrease as compared with 1947-48. I wish just to make that explanation. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, we might take up the next item, No. 533.

Item stands.

533. District administration, $3,805,120.

Mr. CHURCH: There is a district office at 55 York street, Toronto, where tens of thousands of cases are handled. I understand that instead of making it necessary to write to Ottawa the district principle is to be applied, so that if anyone has a complaint regarding a pension or some other payment—and after the meetings of the pension committee in the last several years, there are many kinds of extra allowances and other payments—that person could get speedy adjustment of his claim at district offices. Is my understanding in that respect the correct one?

I see hundreds of people coming out of that building at closing time. Many of these cases come to my attention, particularly in the summer months when some of the other members may be away. Has the district officer and his staff in the building at 55 York street, next to the Royal York hotel, power to deal with a case, or must such case be referred to Ottawa before a decision can be given? It is pointed out in some cases that the regulations are not broad enough to permit the district office to act. This condition may have been changed since the meeting of the committee last session.

If it is necessary to get in touch with Ottawa it would cause a great deal of delay. Some of the soldiers and their families have no houses. That is one of their complaints, among others.

Mr. GREGG: I am glad the hon. member has brought this point to my attention, because it has been the aim of the deputy minister to do just what he has suggested, namely, in so far as possible to obtain decentralization of authority. Only last Friday I had the pleasure of visiting all the offices in the Toronto region and discussing with the administrator and the members of his staff the very point my hon. friend has mentioned. I am assured that at the present time there are very few bottlenecks.

Mr. CHURCH: Would the minister also consider the matter of telephone service in Toronto government offices? To my mind the telephone service is all wrong, because one cannot find the right number in the telephone book. What I say applies to every department of the public service in the Toronto district. One goes to one building only to find that the office has been moved to some other building. Surely a large business such as one finds at 55 York street, one which runs into an expenditure of many millions of dollars in pensions and allowances, should have a modern telephone system such as would be found in Eaton's or Simpson's stores. Sometimes I have had to spend half a day walking from one building to another before I reached the right spot. Finally I am directed to go to 465 Bay street, where the hon. member for Peel used to have his law office.

Mr. GRAYDON: And you, too.

Mr. CHURCH: A good deal of time is wasted travelling around because one cannot find the correct telephone number. An office for soldiers has now been opened in the city hall, where complaints can also be made.

Sometimes I am asked, "How can one find the number, or find the new office, because the number in the telephone book is not the correct one?"

This causes a serious inconvenience. The office at 55 York street serves several counties. Some of these soldiers and their families come to the city on Saturdays and find that the offices are closed. I am not complaining about offices closing on Saturday—far from it; but surely a skeleton staff could be left which could take complaints and thereby save the necessity of these people returning on another day. They cannot afford to make these trips; furthermore, the trains are congested. I believe if the minister would consider my suggestion much time might be saved. In Toronto these departments are moving every day, and the result is that the telephone numbers are not correct. We do not know where to find the different departments. Will the minister consider making the necessary change?

Mr. GREGG: I believe I can understand how this may have happened. It has been our attempt so far as possible to concentrate all the activities in the Toronto region under one roof. The Veterans' Land Act administration was moved to that building within the last month or two. I can understand how in some instances the new location might not match up with that given in the telephone directory. I can assure the hon. member this condition will be taken care of.

As to the matter of availability on Saturdays, let me say that our offices are kept open until one o'clock Saturday afternoon, in Toronto and elsewhere.

Mr. POULIOT: I want to tell the minister that, up to now, I am satisfied. I consider his appointment a great improvement in the Department of Veterans Affairs. I shall not add further praise, because too much praise sometimes brings trouble.

I have only one question to ask. A friend of mine had a son in the army. The son died. He was a father, and the grandfather has taken charge of the children. In virtue of the legislation about to be passed, will there be some increase in the pension payable to the grandchildren?

Mr. GREGG: If the veteran father was a pensioner over 50 per cent, the children would be in receipt of pension as orphans.

Mr. POULIOT: How much more will they receive?

Mr. GREGG: Their new pension will be increased by 25 per cent.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. MILLER: There is a certain matter about which I have spoken to the minister on several occasions since his appointment. He has promised to look into it, and I believe he has now done so. Today I am asking him to review the situation so that we may know exactly where his department stands in the matter. I refer to the abandoned hospital at Kirkfield Park in the constituency of Portage la Prairie, outside of Winnipeg.

If my figures are correct, and if my memory serves me aright, when the project was started the government spent about a quarter of a million dollars, perhaps more, in construction. At the present time all one sees is some substantial foundations and rough buildings. Two or three weeks ago the minister and his parliamentary assistant looked over the situation. I have not yet received a report, although I have spoken to the minister on several occasions and one other hon. member has discussed the matter in the house several times. Either the original plan to construct this hospital was a mistake, or the abandonment of the hospital was a mistake. That has never been made clear in this house.

It seems to me that if the government do not intend to proceed with the construction and use of these buildings, some effort should be made to find somebody willing to make use of what has been constructed. In view of the large expenditure of money I think the committee is entitled to an explanation from the minister. Was it a mistake to plan to construct this hospital? Was it a mistake to abandon construction? What is intended to be done with these buildings and foundations which are lying there as a not very pleasant reminder of a large expenditure of money and the use of scarce building materials?

Mr. GREGG: During a recent visit to Winnipeg with my officials I visited the site of the Kirkfield Park health and occupational centre, as it was intended to be. In October 1945 the wartime committee on hospitalization approved this project, which would have comprised 200 beds at an estimated cost of $700,000. At that time there was a scarcity of hospital beds in Winnipeg and patients were crowded at the Deer Lodge hospital. Moreover, the type of treatment which would have been afforded in this centre would have been of inestimable value for wounded veterans under convalescent treatment here and those coming back from overseas.

My hon. friend has asked whether it was sound reasoning to decide to construct this hospital. He knows more about the circumstances than I do. It was the opinion of those who were responsible then that it was sound to go forward to provide this accommodation quickly as a health and occupational centre. If it could have been completed at the time it was expected to be finished, it would have served a most useful and important function in the treatment of wounded veterans. That was in 1945. However, factors have arisen which were not predictable at the time which makes the completion of this accommodation at the present time quite doubtful.

Added accommodation was obtained at Brandon military hospital to relieve the congestion at Deer Lodge. Then there were unforeseen delays in construction, and the project was discontinued in July, 1947. At that time relatively little progress had been made. Some $313,000 had been expended, and the completion of the original idea would have called for the expenditure of approximately $600,000 more.

I think it will answer my hon. friend's question if I say that in the opinion of my department it is not considered sound to recommend the completion of the hospital along the lines of the original idea. Perhaps it would answer his last question if I told him that we are actively exploring the possibility of these buildings being used, either by other federal departments or by other public bodies. I shall be able to give a more clear-cut idea of that in the near future.

Mr. MILLER: At the time construction of the building to which I have referred was begun, the department saw fit to close a similar smaller institution at Portage la Prairie. That institution was most favourably located and it was doing good work along these lines. I should like the minister to explain why such a small undertaking as the one at Portage la Prairie would be abandoned when the department was planning for a $600,000 building at the other end of the district. The announcement was made that the Portage la Prairie hospital was being abandoned on the ground that it was not needed, because there were such a small number of beds that were occupied. The hospital at Portage la Prairie was in a much more beautiful location than the other monstrosity on Portage avenue. This undertaking, to cost $600,000, was started and then abandoned. It seems to me that the department must have been working both ends against the middle when they said that they could not use the beds in a small hospital and then started a new hospital at an estimated cost of $600,000. I think my constituents, this committee and the members of the house are entitled to know why the small hospital at Portage la Prairie was closed.

Mr. GREGG: The small hospital at Portage la Prairie was one of some twenty-five hospitals which were part of the camps or other war establishments of the active service forces. It was not considered suitable as a hospital and was discontinued after approximately a year and a half of occupation.

Mr. PEARKES: In what cities are the district administration offices located?

Mr. GREGG: Halifax, Charlottetown, Saint John, Quebec City, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Toronto, North Bay, Hamilton, London, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, with a sub-office at Victoria.

Mr. PEARKES: Are the headquarters of the different branches located in those same centres? For instance, would the headquarters of the Veterans' Land Act be located in all those centres?

Mr. GREGG: The Veterans' Land Act offices are being consolidated, as quickly as we can do it, with the regional offices.

Mr. PEARKES: Are the regional offices and the district offices the same?

Mr. GREGG: We are getting them either under the district office or the regional office as quickly as we can.

Mr. PEARKES: Are they in the same places?

Mr. GREGG: It will be quite a long time before we can bring all the regional offices in, because they are still in the transitional period and performing local services. But just as soon as possible they will be brought in.

Mr. PEARKES: Will the minister indicate at what points regional offices are located where district offices are not?

Mr. GREGG: I shall be glad to give my hon. friend a complete list.

Mr. PEARKES: Is the army benevolent fund being administered through any of the district offices?

Mr. GREGG: No. The army benevolent fund is administered by a semi-autonomous board which includes representatives of the Canadian Legion and of the council of the Canadian veterans association, as well as representatives geographically across Canada. They report to the government through the Minister of Veterans Affairs. During their period of organization, under the chairmanship of the late General Browne, cases of need were coming to the notice of our division right across Canada which it would have been appropriate for the benevolent fund to look after if the organization had been completed, and during that interim period the board asked veterans affairs officers to administer the limited amount of funds in the various regions as a temporary expedient.

Mr. PEARKES: That period has now passed?

Mr. GREGG: Practically, yes.

Mr. PEARKES: I know that representations have been made to the minister by branches of the Legion on Vancouver island asking that a separate district be established in the southern portion of the island. Has consideration been given to those representations and a decision reached?

Mr. GREGG: We have been considering representations, but have not reached a decision. It did not appear to me that the veterans were not unanimous.

Mr. PEARKES: The decision is unfavourable?

Mr. GREGG: We have not reached a decision.

Mr. PEARKES: I have another question which I should have asked under the previous item. How many copies of the departmental magazine, Veterans Affairs, are issued to the various districts? If the minister has not the number by districts, can he tell me the total number of copies distributed, and the cost of publishing the magazine?

Mr. GREGG: I shall be glad to get that information and give it later in the day.

Mr. PEARKES: Perhaps we might have it when we come back to the first item.

Mr. MacNICOL: Last session I brought before the department a matter which since that time has been under discussion with the Toronto office. I was one of those—there were not very many of us in the house—who from the beginning advocated that the South African war veteran should be given consideration under the War Veterans Allowance Act. After that idea had been promoted in the house for a few years the minister's predecessor very generously brought the matter up in the house and it was provided that the South African war veteran should receive the benefit of the act.

Last year in the house I brought up the case of a South African war veteran whom I have known for many years. I will quote what I said in the house on July 16, 1947, as reported at page 5794 of Hansard:

What is the position of the South African veterans? I know a man who is married. His wife has a small income. He himself has no income. Would he be entitled to a war veterans' allowance?

Mr. Mackenzie: If he was domiciled in Canada before he volunteered for service.

Mr. MacNicol: He was born here.

Mr. Mackenzie: It is not necessary to be born here; if he was domiciled here, if living here, if his home was here before he went overseas to South Africa, then he would be entitled to the war veterans allowance under the same rate.

Mr. MacNicol: The veteran is entitled to war veterans allowance?

Mr. Mackenzie: Yes; I think there are four hundred of them receiving allowances.

On the following day I sent to the veteran a copy of Hansard containing the minister's reply. Nothing came of it for quite some time and then on December 11, I wrote to the minister's predecessor and enclosed an affidavit which had been given to me by the war veteran. I do not want to give his name but will refer to him by the letter "W". I said in my letter to the previous minister:

I wonder if you would have one of your secretaries place in your hands the Hansard record of July 16, 1947, referring to my questions and your answers in connection with the case of the South African veteran, Mr. W. of Toronto.

Mr. W. came to see me just before I came down to Ottawa and brought the enclosed affidavit re his case.

That is the affidavit I mentioned a moment ago.

I know Mr. W. intimately and am familiar with the serious condition of his health and his inability to work at all on his doctor's orders. As stated in the house, he is wholly dependent on his wife for whatever finances he requires. Mrs. W. has a small income, scarcely enough to maintain herself and provide for the maintenance of her small property.

I found it necessary to write the present minister after he came into office—and in passing I want to congratulate him upon how well he is taking care of his department. As I have already said, the applause he received in Toronto last Saturday is evidence of the popular esteem in which he is held. I will now read a paragraph of the letter I wrote to the present minister about this case, and I am glad to say that it is the only one I shall bring up on his estimates. In my letter to the minister of February 2, 1948, I said:

Personally, I cannot understand this at all. Here is a man now beyond sixty-five years of age who, in his youth and strong young manhood, offered himself in defence of the empire for service in South Africa. The long marches in that hot climate, so hot in the daytime and so cold at night, undermined his health. During all his life, he has not had the physical strength that he should have had, and now, late in life he finds it necessary to make application for war veterans allowance or pension.

The reason for not granting Mr. W. a pension seems to be that his wife owns a property. I know the property well. It is a duplex. Well, everyone knows that duplexes are next to impossible to sell.

If they were compelled to sell I doubt whether they would get $5,000 for it.

The report sent in about the income of the family gives the income much higher than it really is. Apparently the Toronto office has sent down an erroneous statement on the income of that family. I know it is small. I know the family well. At the present time this noted soldier is in a serious condition. Last Saturday, as I walked down my home city street, I saw him being lifted out of a motor car and carried into his home. I said, "Why, are you not improving?" He said, "I have been in the hospital. They wanted to take off my leg. I cannot stand on the leg, it is in such a state." Surely there is something wrong somewhere.

Here is a man who was in the full strength of his youth. He went into the South African campaign, which everyone who was there knows was not the best kind of campaign for anybody, especially for the health of those who came from a northern climate such as ours. He came back, and all his lifetime he has suffered from disabilities incurred in that campaign. But he never applied for a pension at any time. His record was good. He marched and fought all the way from Cape Town to where the war ended at Bloemfontein or Pretoria. To me it is a shocking shame that he who is penniless himself, who has not a farthing, has to ask his wife for a car ticket if he wants to go downtown. This country never intended that anything like that should happen. He is not asking for the full amount of the war veterans allowance. He would be satisfied with half the amount, because his wife has a very small income. It is so small that I would not call it an income at all. It would not compare for a moment with the ordinary person's income. She and her home can hardly exist on it. That is the state in which he finds himself.

Last year the previous minister said that this man was entitled to the war veterans allowance. What happened after that? Who told the minister that he was not entitled to the allowance? The present minister has been very good. I am one of those who like to support him. I ask him to take this case into consideration and give this noted soldier a square deal. He has not had it. No soldier has a square deal who is treated as this man has been treated. Parliament does not want any soldier to be treated in that way.

This man is penniless. Why should he have to ask his wife for a car ticket? He cannot work. The minister has a copy of the affidavit on file. I will send him another copy of it. His doctors, and the others who have been associated with him, say that he must not do anything because his heart is bad. I said a moment ago that when I saw him he had to be carried out of the car into his home. If that is not a disability I do not know what a disability is.

I will leave the case with the minister. I am not going to ask him to refer to it at the moment. I have urged the case as strongly as I can. I have known this veteran for twenty-five years. I know that he has not earned anything, because he has not been able to work. He has been only an encumbrance to his wife. Why should he not have the war veterans allowance for himself personally?

Mr. GREGG: I assure my hon. friend that I shall be only too glad to look into the case. I would not want to make a statement on it now, but I shall see that it is looked into, particularly in the light of the amendments that have been passed by the house this year, to see if by any chance that should change the situation.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to ask the minister one more question in connection with item 533, district administration, which is a million and a half less than it was last year. I do not like to delay the passage of this item, but I should like to refer to 55 York street. I have seen women and small children on the streetcar going down to 55 York street to try to get some document executed which may have to come to Ottawa. They have difficulty finding the place and getting the proper assistance.

Some people get into minor trouble and are summoned before a magistrate. When I asked this question before, two or three members of the bar association, of which I am a member, said that they were looking after it. On reading the newspapers in the Toronto district I find that that is not so. Many of these young people get into minor trouble over the week end in Toronto and need help. This is an important factor because the department has a very large building with several hundred employees. I admit that this item calls for an expenditure of $1,563,000 less than last year. No doubt a large number of cases have been settled since the opening of the new Sunnybrook hospital, and other units across the country, which will contribute to lessening the item.

Is there a place in Toronto to which these people can go and have these documents issued? Some of them come down to arrange for bringing a relative out from the old country, or a soldier may be in the hospital. They are directed to go to an immigration office or to somebody else. In weather such as we shall have in the next three months it is pretty difficult to bring little children with them. They cannot leave them at home. They have to bring them with them on the streetcar. I should think that some officer should be provided to look after them. They have to take an elevator away up to the top of the building. The ground floor is the logical place for these offices—or close to the ground floor, I should think, because it is very difficult to find the place. The federal offices telephone system is practically obsolete. It is not up to date. Wrong numbers and wrong buildings are given, and so forth.

I do not like to see young people appearing before magistrates as they do in these days. So far as I know, some of them are fine young soldiers. A great number of them are soldiers. In these minor cases I believe the time has come when some senior officer should be provided to give assistance in the Toronto district. When a young soldier is charged, the parents should be notified. I have had a bill before the House of Commons for the last three or four years requiring the parents to be notified before imprisonment or before the case is heard. Some of these young people come from the west and the east. Some are just looking for work, and they get into some minor trouble. They are just sent down, and their parents are not even notified. Money is being spent at 55 York street, and efficient work is being done there. I appreciate the good work being done there; it is valuable work; it is money well spent, but we should have some organization in the large cities to take care of these people to whom I refer because some of them have never been in trouble before. A large number of them are first offenders. In my opinion, a legal officer should be provided who could proceed to the police court in the morning to assist these young people. Some of the Christian churches have a representative in the police court. The time has come when something should be done. Some of these people cannot pay a fine. I tried to get the law of England, the Summary Offenders Act, brought in here to give them time to pay, both soldiers and civilians. In Britain they have thus closed half the prisons. When I look at the reports of the provincial and federal prisons, the Attorney General of Canada's institutions, I find that few of these young people are getting in there. I believe that if they have a proper defence the magistrate would take a different view of the case. These people have not even the right to communicate with their parents or their guardians to tell them what has happened. Will the minister look into the three matters I have brought to his attention?

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. GREGG: I shall be glad to look into the points raised by my hon. friend. In all our offices we have a counselling service where a veteran can get advice and find out where things are. If he wants to have an oath completed he can get it done at our offices. I must admit quite frankly that if he or she should get into trouble over the week-end and he or she is a citizen they will probably have to take care of it the same as any other citizen. On any of the things affecting their service our officers are only too glad to provide any assistance they can for any of the minor difficulties of life.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): A few minutes ago the minister made reference to the small hospital operated in Brandon by his department. It was a former military hospital, and was then taken over by the Department of Veterans Affairs. It is now under the control or the direction of the sanitarium board of Manitoba. I think it is only fair to say on behalf of his officers that that hospital, in the opinion of those who know more about it than I do, was very efficiently operated during the time that it was under the Department of Veterans Affairs, and filled a large place in western Manitoba. I believe the words I have spoken in regard to the minister's department hold equally true with regard to the sanitarium board. I just want to express my word of appreciation for what has been done by the staff and the department in that connection.

Mr. FRASER: A moment ago the minister said these district officers would take the oath of a veteran. Will they also take the oath of a war veteran's widow?

Mr. GREGG: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: They would do that?

Mr. GREGG: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: And will they instruct her how to make out the application for the war widows' allowance?

Mr. GREGG: Yes. They do it every day.

Item agreed to.

534. Rehabilitation services, $4,161,080.

Mr. McKAY: There seems to be confusion between "rehabilitation services" and "benefits". I notice that item 553 definitely refers to benefits. I presume that in that item student veteran benefits will be included. Can the minister give us a breakdown of the amounts that are spent on the various types of rehabilitation services? I refer particularly to page 291 of the estimates, which gives a breakdown of some of these services, and where temporary assistance is referred to. I should like to know what that temporary assistance refers to, because it amounts to $3,377,000. Can the minister indicate just where we stand on the difference between "services" and "benefits"?

Mr. GREGG: Is the hon. member referring to the breakdown on page 291?

Mr. McKAY: Yes.

Mr. GREGG: With the stress changing from year to year, by the very nature of things we have within the department the necessity of having on our staff perhaps too many temporary employees who know they are temporary. When the work discontinues, our department attempts to do what it can to help them find their most useful sphere in other walks of life. I think that would account for the temporary employees there and perhaps under some other headings as we come to them.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us what facilities are available for giving training to veterans of the first war who are out of employment but who could be rehabilitated? I know that problem is worrying his own officials in Vancouver. Perhaps it is one of the most important problems with regard to veterans of the first war in every part of Canada. My understanding is that at the present time there is no statutory provision under which these men can be helped by way of training. Yet there is a great work to be done there. As the minister knows, it is difficult for a veteran fifty years of age to get a job. Yet I understand from the minister's own officials that if these men are given certain types of training, it is possible to place them in positions which may well be permanent. I believe there is a real job to be done there. I should like to know whether the department is tackling it; and if so, in what way.

Mr. GREGG: Yes, we are tackling it. It has its difficulties, as the committee will realize. The average age is fifty-nine for world war I. At that age it is difficult for new tricks to be learned.

Mr. GREEN: Of course many are younger than that.

Mr. GREGG: Yes, many are under that age. We have explored the situation fully and are doing so with the Department of Labour. In these courses which are being conducted by the Department of Labour with the provinces, every effort is being made, with regard to these older veterans, to overlook any age limit that may exist. Down on my own coast I know of some cases in which courses in fishing are being given. I must admit that it is not widespread. But in the special work that was started in 1946 under Mr. Philpotts, the department is exploring the opportunities for employment on behalf of those of world war I who have not any special skills. I am glad to report that my department has co-operated in it in some small way. A special drive, if you like, has been put on to make more clear to the public the role of the corps of commissionaires which is composed of carefully chosen men of integrity and discipline right across Canada, in their units, available for positions of trust. That campaign has turned out, I am glad to say, auxiliary opportunities for work that does not normally come within the sphere of the men of the corps of commissionaires. I can assure my hon. friend that there is no phase of the work to which we are giving more attention that the one he mentions; and we shall continue to give it attention.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I was about to rise to bring up the question which the hon. member has just asked the minister. I am happy to hear what the minister has had to say in this regard. I realize that for twenty-five years this has been a problem; cases have been brought to my attention in which veterans of the first world war have failed to find employment. I think the program must go farther than merely training veterans who have not employment. Sometimes we find veterans who perhaps have been active in the timber industry, and who, for reasons of health, must refrain from such an active life. They could get work as forest rangers or fire patrol workers. I hope the minister will, as he says, give serious attention to this matter, because a great many of our old veterans have not been rehabilitated.

It has been brought to my attention that on the "medical" of some of these old veterans would appear some such comment as "allergic to work." Unless all those veterans could be brought before the departmental officials, given an opportunity of work and placed in certain employment, it is hard to know just whether or not they would undertake such employment if it was given to them.

Mr. SKEY: May I ask the minister if he would like to discuss student veterans under this item, or should we wait until we reach a later one?

Mr. GREGG: It will be quite all right under this one.

Mr. SKEY: Have the minister's officials any figures on the number of students who have started university courses and who have had to discontinue them without graduating?

Mr. GREGG: Surveys have been made on that point. The last survey was conducted just recently. I remember quite clearly that, out of the 53,000 across Canada who had up to that point gone into universities, approximately 400 had discontinued. Of those, it was indicated in this statistical return that less than one hundred had discontinued owing to shortage of money on which to live. As a matter of fact, I am assured that not more than twenty-five were within that category.

Mr. SKEY: When was this return prepared?

Mr. GREGG: During this session, since the first of this year.

Mr. SKEY: Do the statistics say there are less than twenty-five students who were forced to discontinue for financial reasons?

Mr. GREGG: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: Not twenty-five per cent?

Mr. GREGG: No, twenty-five.

Mr. SKEY: Twenty-five single cases?

Mr. GREGG: Where lack of money was the prime cause of their withdrawal.

Mr. SKEY: That is not in accordance with some information which I have here. For instance, in March of this year, when the University of Toronto students came to call on the minister, they reported that seven out of fifty-eight girls taking courses at one college would have to discontinue, and that thirty-five out of three hundred students at St. Michael's college would be forced to discontinue, in both instances for financial reasons. At that time the department said there had been only sixty-five withdrawals across Canada for financial reasons. That was in March. The minister's department said then there had been sixty-five withdrawals, and we are told now that there are only twenty-five. Yet it is reported by the students' association that there are at least forty-two in addition to the sixty-five of whom the minister has spoken. This strikes me as poor economy and a poor investment for the government to authorize university training and then allow these students to get into a financial position where they are unable to continue that training. Perhaps, after a year or two or even three years, they find themselves in this situation. It is most unfortunate that their whole original investment should be lost, as it can be lost in these cases.

Mr. GREGG: I remember distinctly the delegation that visited me from Toronto university and the prophecies and fears that were expressed by that delegation, as indicated by the hon. member and in consequence of which I checked back on the sixty-five figure. I checked back through the universities and I asked: Are those all leaving or have they all left owing entirely to the shortage of money factor? The answer that came back to me, as submitted to the parliamentary committee, was that those who left owing entirely to lack of money numbered twenty-five. I can assure my hon. friend that the fears expressed by that delegation—and I am glad to say this—have not materialized. I checked on that the other night in Toronto with their own advisory officers and learned that nothing like that had taken place.

Mr. SKEY: It is interesting to hear that, and I thank the minister for the information. But when he says "owing entirely to financial reasons", I would call his attention to something that appeared in Toronto Varsity, a statement made by the president of their veterans' association:

> One of the great obstacles in achieving equity has been that the veterans themselves are overly modest and loath to display their financial shortcomings even to D.V.A.

So that the qualification "owing entirely to financial reasons" might be taken perhaps with a grain of salt. One further question on the subject, having to do with ceilings on students' wages. Is there a $75 ceiling on students' outside earnings?

Mr. GREGG: For those at university and under vocational training, what was formerly called the $75 ceiling for the veteran or for the veteran's wife has been removed as from June 1 of this year.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that there is some doubt as to law students. In British Columbia, during the summer, they go into law offices, and one of them told me two or three weeks ago that it looked as though the removal of the ceiling did not apply in those cases. My understanding of the minister's intention was that the ceiling was to be removed entirely, and I think that if the change is being interpreted in this narrow way, in the case of law students and perhaps in the case of other students who are going into offices in their summer vacations, there should be some revision in the methods of the department.

Mr. GREGG: That has been brought up recently. As regards students leaving the cloistered halls and going into hard-boiled legal offices for training only and for no other purpose, there is no question about continuation, but there are some complications which we are ironing out and I am sure we shall be able to straighten them out satisfactorily.

Mr. GREEN: But until the student has been called to the bar, he remains in training, and my submission is that, until he is called, the ceiling should be removed. I do not know what justification the department can have for putting on a ceiling in this case. These boys are probably not making much money out of the law firms for what work they are doing. It is unfortunate that they should be subject to the ceiling.

Mr. GREGG: We are attempting to get an answer to that, though in some cases they are doing as much for the firm as the junior partner.

Mr. GREEN: Has the department given consideration to an increase in the allowances paid to university students? Some months ago there was a small increase for married students, and then some months later the ceilings were removed, at least in part, but there was never any increase for the single students. I believe they are still getting $60 a month, but the cost of living is going up all the time, particularly the cost of foodstuffs. These young men and women are using up their reserves more and more, and many of them are getting in a worse position all the time. I suggest to the minister that it is worthwhile granting an increase now, in view of the increase in the cost of living. Most of the students will have only a year or two to go, and it does seem a shame to inconvenience them during their final years when a small increase in the allowance might make things so much easier for them. It might mean the difference between success and failure.

Mr. GREGG: In the parliamentary committee I reported my views on this question, and as we shall have an opportunity of discussing the report when the chairman brings in his final submission, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to forestall the report of the committee on that point. I shall be glad to discuss the question later.

Mr. SKEY: May I add my voice to that of the hon. member for Vancouver South by putting forward just this one thought: that although students in certain courses of training at the university may have a considerable amount of spare time, there are those in medicine, science and engineering who have practically no spare time; they are exhausted after their day's work because their whole schedule is taken up from nine o'clock in the morning until five or six o'clock at night. They have not an opportunity to increase their earnings in the same way as some of their friends.

Item agreed to.

535. Treatment services, $38,402,200.

Mr. GREGG: May I at this point answer the question asked a short time ago by the hon. member for Nanaimo. The publication Veterans Affairs is published twice monthly at an annual cost of $10,000, or about $400 an issue. The total circulation of the publication is 12,000 copies, distributed as follows: Members of the House of Commons and the Senate, 370; veterans organizations, 2,100; citizens voluntary rehabilitation committees, 800; Department of Veterans Affairs hospitals, 2,600 regional offices, newspapers and other publications, Department of Veterans Affairs district offices, veterans settled under Veterans' Land Act and individual recipients—largely consisting of persons in close touch with groups of veterans—1,400. Those are approximate figures.

Mr. PEARKES: I think this is a great extravagance; and in view of the nature of the publication and the material included, I recommend that a drastic cut be made in the item.

Mr. GREGG: Item 535, as it appears at page 80 of the estimates, indicates an increase of $14,251,560 over last year. By making reference to the details at page 294, one will see that this apparent increase is due to $22,626,000 having been provided in 1947-48 in a separate vote under demobilization and reconversion estimates. So that the true situation is that a total of $46,776,640 was provided in 1947-48 as compared with $38,402,200 in 1948-49. Therefore, in effect, there has been a net decrease of $8,374,440 in the amount provided for treatment services in 1948-49 as compared with 1947-48. As we proceed, it will be noted that an attempt has been made so far as possible to clear out all those items which were formerly carried under demobilization and reconversion and to incorporate them in the appropriate items in the estimates this year.

Mr. PEARKES: I believe it would be appropriate under this item to discuss the amount of money charged veteran patients who are taken into Department of Veterans Affairs hospitals, when such patients are not pensioners and when the cause for their admission to hospital is not attributed to pensionable disability.

I believe I am correct in saying that even chronic cases are not accepted in hospitals unless they are in dire financial straits. I believe there is a limitation of earnings of $100 before they can be admitted free to one of these hospitals.

When an ordinary veteran goes to one of the Department of Veterans Affairs hospitals where he has to pay for his ward accommodation he is now being charged at the rate of $9 a day. I believe that is a most excessive rate. Members of the Blue Cross association of British Columbia, and men who are admitted to the hospitals by the workmen's compensation board, are charged only $6.70 for ward accommodation in those hospitals. Yet when a veteran goes to a veterans hospital he is charged $9 a day.

Only yesterday we heard another minister of the government refuse to pay more than $4.50 for wards of the government when they are admitted to a general hospital. It seems to me that what is right in one case should be equitable in another. Here we have the government refusing to pay more than $4.50 for its Indian wards when they are admitted to hospitals such as the King's Daughters hospital at Duncan or the general hospital at Chemainus. The government says, "We will not pay more than $4.50." Then it turns around and says to the old soldier, "If you want to come into a hospital which the people of this country have built for old soldiers, you have to pay $9 a day."

The price is exorbitant. I cannot see that there is anything shown but a callous indifference on the part of the government for the personal welfare of old soldiers who have been forced to go into hospital, on account of some disability which cannot be attributed directly to a pensionable ailment. This treatment is cruel and inhuman, and I hope the minister will put an end to such diabolical practices.

Mr. GREGG: I do not propose to answer the hon. member's comments, except at two points. One, at the beginning: I would not accept the strong term "dire need" in connection with our acceptance of the old soldier. For a need approximating anything the equivalent of a 100 per cent pensioner, we would give consideration to accepting him under the terms mentioned by the hon. member.

On the other point, a maximum of $9 a day was mentioned. I would point out, however, that this includes medical treatment. It is an all-inclusive figure, which does not apply to the Blue Cross or to the compensation board. Furthermore, I believe that $9 is the maximum figure in Canada, and that it is not as high as that in all hosiptals.

Mr. PEARKES: I have suggested that it is far too much to ask from an old soldier who comes into a hospital built up by the people of this country for the express purpose of looking after the old soldiers. I know it is suggested that you cannot admit them all. But I do ask that an extension be made to the hospitalization so as to include men who have fought in either the first or the second world war. There is a great opportunity to provide more hospitalization at more reasonable prices and also to enable out-patients to be given treatment in a more generous way than at present.

If I were asked what the greatest weakness in the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs was, I would say it was the niggardly assistance given to veterans who are not eligible for hospital treatment because their ailments are not directly attributable to a war disability. We could extend these services a great deal more. Legion branches all over Canada have been passing resolutions on this point, and it is something which should receive the most careful consideration of the minister.

Mr. BLAIR: Does that $9 ward rate charged to old soldiers cover medical services as well? In the east you can get a private room for $9. Even if medical treatment is included I think the price is far beyond that charged by any average hospital in this country.

Mr. GREGG: It does include medical treatment.

Mr. FRASER: So does the $4.50 which the health department pays for the Indians, and that includes operations and everything else.

Mr. FULTON: I am pleased to support everything that has been said by the hon. member for Nanaimo, and I do so on the basis of several cases that have come to my attention, to only one of which I shall refer. This particular case has been taken up with the department. It concerns a veteran who applied for admission to Shaughnessy hospital; but, because the ailment from which he was suffering was not that for which he was pensioned, it was some two or three months before they finally decided to admit him. The seriousness of this situation can be appreciated when I say that shortly after the veteran was admitted he underwent an operation from which he did not recover. There are good grounds for supposing that, had he been admitted when he first made application, the true cause of his trouble might have been discovered and his life prolonged.

As the hon. member for Nanaimo has said, this question of veterans applying for admission to hospitals for treatment of ailments other than those for which they are pensioned requires the most careful study and sympathetic consideration. These veterans should be able to have the benefits of hospitalization. As was pointed out, these hospitals were built by the people of Canada for the treatment of old soldiers.

Mr. GREEN: What is the departmental policy with regard to the hospitalization of veterans for ailments other than their war disabilities? I think we should have that picture cleared up. Apparently this is a new departure, although I believe that for many years a veteran without resources could get hospitalization without any allowances. This charging a veteran the same rate that would be charged in a civilian hospital is something comparatively new, and I believe the minister should give us the whole story.

While he is doing that, will he also say whether consideration has been given to providing hospitalization for war widows? Apparently Australia decided this year to provide free hospitalization for war widows and their children in government hospitals. I have a press dispatch from Brisbane, dated March 1 of this year and reading as follows:

Australia Gives War Widows Hospital Care

Australia's 21,000 war widows and their 13,000 children under 16 years of age will shortly get free medical treatment at war veterans' hospitals.

Under a new scheme they will get specialist care, a full range of medicines and drugs, and X-ray diagnosis.

At present widows and children receive only limited medical care from the government.

What is the policy of the Canadian government with regard to war widows and their children?

Mr. GREGG: May I deal with the second point first? Up to date we have no authority under our statutes for taking care of war widows or their children.

Mr. GREEN: Has any consideration been given to adopting a policy of that kind?

Mr. GREGG: It was discussed this year in the veterans affairs committee and representations were made there. However, nothing has been done.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government considering the question quite apart from the veterans affairs committee?

Mr. GREGG: Yes, we have considered it. I should like to refresh my mind as to the details of the hospital policy in connection with those who are not pensioners, and I will submit full details to the committee later on.

Mr. GREEN: It would be most beneficial if the minister could give us the full picture of what is being done.

Mr. GREGG: It has not changed greatly, but I shall do that.

Mr. FERGUSON: Two weeks ago I asked the department if a veteran who had been ordered by the proper authorities to report to a military hospital for treatment would be entitled to transportation to and from his home, including taxi cabs if necessary. May I ask that question again?

Mr. GREGG: The answer is yes.

Mr. FERGUSON: What would the minister think if the following were proved to be the fact? A veteran went to Christie Street hospital and received treatment. After his treatment was completed, he was told by the nurse to get ready to leave on a certain date, that a taxi cab would be there to transport him to the union station at a certain hour. The veteran got ready and he asked for his transportation and was told that it was not ready for him. Fortunately his son had called at the hospital for him and he paid for the taxi cab. He inquired from the taxi cab driver who had been ordered by the authorities at Christie Street to pick up this veteran whether he had paid, and the taxi cab driver immediately replied that no such arrangements had been made.

This veteran was completely disabled, but fortunately he had his son with him and he paid for the taxi cab. It took several weeks of correspondence finally to obtain the transportation from the institution. I say in all friendliness to the minister that I hope he will make immediate inquiry about the actions of the men and women in that hospital who are supposed to provide transportation for disabled veterans.

Transportation should be sent to these men before they leave their homes. We cannot surmise that they will all be men able to pay for their own transportation. They may be living on a small allowance. Certainly, when they leave the institutions they should be treated in the same way as we were during the last war. When we left the hospital a pass was placed in our hands and they said, "Good-bye and good luck to you." But here a man is sent to the station in a taxi which has been ordered by someone in authority at Christie Street, and when he arrives at the station he finds that no arrangements had been made for his rail or taxi transportation. It may be discovered that some person is doing something that should not be done, something not according to the rules in the book. If a veteran arrives at a hospital and, not knowing the rules, does not ask for transportation, it should automatically be given to him; or if upon discharge he does not ask for transportation he should be followed up with a letter saying, "You were entitled to your transportation and we forgot to give it to you when you left the hospital. Here it is." I am sure that if the minister will make an investigation at Christie Street hospital he will find that every disabled veteran has not been provided with transportation.

Mr. GREGG: If the hon. member will give me the details of this or similar cases I shall be glad to look into them.

Mr. FERGUSON: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. SKEY: I want to take the minister into another phase of hospitalization which I think is important, and to present it properly I shall have to go back into history. I refer to the domiciliary care of veterans on a small pension or receiving the war veterans allowance who are now hospitalized in such places as the Red Chevron in Toronto. If their pension is not sufficient to provide them with certain necessary amenities they are granted $5 a month for comforts and $5 a month for clothes. This policy resulted from the deliberations of the committee of 1922 and was implemented in 1924. Between then and 1936 the amount was raised to $20 a month; I presume $10 a month was for comforts and $10 a month for clothes. But in 1936 the department reduced the amount to $10 a month—$5 for comforts and $5 for clothes. It requires no extended argument on my part to convince the minister that $5 a month in 1936 was worth a good deal more than $5 a month is today. All that has been brought out in the veterans affairs committee and in the prices committee. A lot of these old veterans are chronic cases who will probably finish their days in these hospitals; and, as I say, they are receiving only $5 a month for comforts, for such things as cigarettes, toothpaste, and a lot of other little things that help to make their lives happier. There is another $5 a month available for clothes but that $5 is put away in their clothing account.

I rise this afternoon to protest against any pensioner of Canada or any soldier with meritorious service sufficient to entitle him to the war veterans allowance spending the rest of his days in hospital with an allowance of only $5 a month to buy the ordinary small comforts of life. I feel very strongly that the minister's department is placing these old veterans and the younger veterans of world war II in an impossible position in allowing them only $5 a month for comforts, and that a change in the regulations is imperative. The first change I would recommend would be that the minister bring the rates back to what they were before they were changed in 1936. If the minister cannot do that he could at least make $10 a month available to the veteran to use as he sees fit. If the minister cannot do that, he could at least raise the amount available for comforts just as pensions and the war veterans allowance have been raised on the recommendation of the veterans committee.

Mr. GREGG: I did not realize that there had been a reduction in the amount allowed for clothing and comforts. However I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. SKEY: I am taking my information from a veteran. Of course I may be wrong.

Mr. GREGG: I will check on it. Leaving aside for the moment that question, and without attempting in any way to argue whether $5 a month is enough for comforts for these older men, I should like to say how greatly encouraged I was during the last few weeks in visiting some of these homes in the western part of our country, in Winnipeg, in Saskatchewan at the former lieutenant governor's home, and in Vancouver and Victoria. I think I talked with ninety per cent of the men who were resident there. It may have been kindness or politeness, but I must say that none of them raised the point now raised by my hon. friend. It may be it was something that they did not want to raise.

But leaving that aside as something to look into, I can assure the committee that the conditions under which these veterans were living were such as to make one's heart glad. Old men who would never be able to work were receiving attention and care from charming nurses and visits from the people of the community, and while I was in one hospital, a group of veterans were listening with great gusto to a boxing match coming over the radio, and showing every sign of living a life of contentment during a period of their years when they were no longer able to work. I am free to admit that there are others who are able and anxious to work, and we are prepared to help them gain that opportunity through the national employment service. I will take the point raised by my hon. friend into consideration and see what can be done.

Mr. SKEY: With what the minister has had to say in regard to the hospitals, I must agree in large measure. They are ably staffed, and the people who are in charge of most of them are experienced in their work and do a tremendous amount to make the days of these old veterans of Canada as happy as possible. I am expressing today what may be the only remaining irritation of these veterans. It may seem a trifling matter to the government with a budget surplus of half a million dollars, but these old soldiers are forced to pinch and scrape on the little pocket-money they are allowed, and their lives would be made much happier if a larger allowance were made for comforts.

Mr. BLAIR: There are places in Canada where every once in a while a veteran is transferred from a military to a civilian hospital. In a case like that, how much does the department pay to the civilian hospital in ward rates?

Mr. GREGG: I am told that the average would be $6.70, and we provide the medical service.

Mr. PEARKES: Under what terms are imperial soldiers admitted into D.V.A. hospitals?

Mr. GREGG: If they are in receipt of a Canadian pension or war veterans allowance they are treated exactly the same as Canadians.

Mr. PEARKES: If they are in receipt of an imperial pension, under certain conditions they are admitted into D.V.A. hospitals.

Mr. GREGG: Not unless that imperial pension is augmented by our Canadian pension, indicating that they were domiciled in Canada, but not if it is imperial pension alone.

Mr. PEARKES: I should like the minister to be quite certain that that answer is correct. Suppose a British pensioner has an ailment which is attributed to his service, and that pensioner is living in Canada; can he not be admitted into our D.V.A. hospitals?

Mr. GREGG: If it is a British pension entirely? I understand that there are cases where we do take them in for treatment and all purposes, but at the cost of the British pension commission.

Mr. PEARKES: That is what I was asking. Their hospitalization is paid by the British ministry. Permission has to be obtained from the high commissioner's office here, I presume, or whatever office it is.

Mr. GREGG: The British ministry of pensions.

Mr. PEARKES: Then they are admitted into our hospitals. Are they charged at the rate of $9 a day?

Mr. GREGG: They are charged at the standard rates of the hospital, if it is $9. Under the other arrangement it would be $9.

Mr. PEARKES: That would be paid by the British authorities.

Mr. GREGG: Yes.

Mr. PEARKES: I notice that there is no classification of seamstresses in the details. Recently such a classification was adopted by hospitals run by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The department has classifications for housekeepers and waitresses. It is quite obvious that seamstresses are required in our veterans hospitals exactly as they are required in hospitals conducted by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Until recently they were paying their seamstresses', waitresses' or housemaids' pay in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I suggest that we need seamstresses. Can the minister say whether seamstresses are employed, and if so what rate are they paid, because I do not see it in the list of details?

Mr. GREGG: I believe we have seamstresses, but I do not know how they are classified here. May I refer to that later?

Mr. PEARKES: Yes, if you would, because I do not think you will find it. They should be paid more than the rate paid for ordinary maid service. They should be paid on the same basis as the Department of National Health and Welfare pays.

Mr. GREGG: I will get the information.

Mr. LENNARD: I have one complaint to make which has not been mentioned so far this afternoon. Some months ago enabling orders were issued by D.V.A. headquarters to permit the employment of optometrists on the staffs of D.V.A. hospitals and in clinics dealing with veterans' cases. Up to the moment, to the best of my knowledge, not one optometrist has been employed. Are any being employed? These services are now being performed by ophthalmologists, and they are jealous of their position. My point is this. The ophthalmologist makes the examination and the optician fills the prescription. If some optometrists were employed by the department they would make the examination, fill the prescription and be responsible for it. I know that in many cases today chaps are getting the wrong lenses. I am not saying who is to blame. I feel it would be far more businesslike for the optometrist, the man who makes the examination, to fill the prescription and be responsible for it.

Mr. GREGG: I thank the hon. member for Wentworth for his suggestion. I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. SKEY: I have one further word on the treatment side, and I wish to bring it to the attention of the minister. I do not intend to mention any names, but I have in mind five cases in which veterans suffering from some kind of war neurosis have had great difficulty in getting assistance from the Department of Veterans Affairs. I refer to an article, one of the last written by Kenneth Cragg, of the Globe and Mail, datelined Ottawa, January 30. In this article Mr. Cragg mentions that in the view of the Department of Veterans Affairs pensions should be allowed only in rare and fairly well-defined instances. He goes on to say that if you grant a pension to a neurotic you may handicap him for life. I understand from the hon. member for Lanark that this is also the view of the United States government and of the British government. Therefore I have no quarrel with that view in a medical way, because I would not be well enough informed to quarrel with it.

The point I wish to make is a very simple one. These men are genuinely suffering from a war disability. It may be true that to pension them would do more harm than it would good, but there is one thing to which they should be entitled. I suppose it would require a new definition in the Department of Veterans Affairs. They should be entitled to treatment and hospitalization, when their parents, their wives or their families, or even they themselves, request it. That seems to me to be the least that we can do for a man who has a disability aggravated or caused in part or in whole by the war. He should be admitted to a veterans hospital, because he should receive a category which will make it possible for him to be admitted to any veterans hospital in Canada.

I have had experience in trying to get two of these men into hospital. They had nothing on their records. They were not sick. They were discharged fit, and all the rest of it; yet they had a history of neurosis in the services which in some cases was quite severe. There is the family background in both cases. It was very sad and compelling. I do not want to go into it. In the one case the hon. member for Wellington South and I were forced to co-operate in order to get a man into the hospital in London, Ontario. My only complaint or suggestion to the department in this instance is that some notation should be made on a veteran's document that he suffers from this type of illness or disability, so that he will have free access to our hospitals, should he require hospitalization.

Mr. GREGG: I should like to say that the problem mentioned by the hon. member is one that our medical people recognize fully. I know of cases myself which come within that category, and we are attempting to find something like an answer.

Mr. SKEY: I make the suggestion.

[Mr. Skey.]

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I have something I wish to bring to the attention of the minister under this item, and perhaps it is involved in item 537. It has to do with the Canadians who enlisted in the Belgian army. I believe there are about two or three hundred of these Canadian citizens who fought in the last great war.

One case that has been brought to my attention is that of a young veteran who was hospitalized for tuberculosis after the war. I managed to have his hospitalization taken care of, but he has been suffering from ill health ever since. Since the Department of Veterans Affairs does not pay a pension until the Belgian office is ready to pay their pension—in which case the Canadian veterans affairs department will supplement that pension—the situation is that this young veteran has no income. He is invalided. His only way or means of obtaining a livelihood is by remaining at home. Since two or three hundred other veterans might be in this situation, I should like the minister to comment on it. Can anything be done to hasten payment by the Belgian office? I have been in communication with the Belgian office on several different occasions trying to get some action on this matter, but have had no success.

Mr. GREGG: I will consider that matter under item 537. Offhand I do not see that there is anything we could do except attempting to hasten payment. But I will check on the matter and give a further reply.

Item agreed to.

536. Prosthetic services, $952,584.

Mr. HARKNESS: I should like to ask the minister what the situation is now with regard to the provision of hearing aids. I know that not so long ago the veteran who needed a hearing aid was provided with a certain one that the department had apparently adopted. That was the only one he could get, whether it fitted him, whether he thought it worked properly or whether it was any good to him or not. I know that a change has been made in regard to the matter, and I think the veteran who requires a hearing aid now has more choice. But I do not know whether he yet has a more or less full choice among the various types of equipment. Will the minister say just what the situation is?

Mr. GREGG: The situation now is that the veteran has his own choice. If his choice should be for equipment that our people know is not a good kind, they will tell him so. But with that proviso, under counselling they have their free choice.

Item agreed to.

537. Administration expenses, including chairman of the Canadian pension commission at $1,000 and the deputy chairman of the Canadian pension commission at $500 additional to chapter 62, statutes of 1946, $2,364,452.

Mr. CASE: I wish to ask the minister this more or less general question. I understand that representations have now been made on behalf of the Canadian merchant marine. Can the minister say whether or not the department now has any set policy with respect to consideration for the Canadian merchant marine?

Mr. GREGG: That was one of the points on which item 532, general departmental administration, was allowed to stand. That matter has been fully discussed by the parliamentary committee, and it would be premature for me to discuss it here before the committee submits its report. But there will be opportunity to discuss it later.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Will the minister comment on the question I just asked?

Mr. GREGG: Perhaps it might stand until a little later.

Item agreed to.

539. War veterans allowance board—administration, $229,903.

Mr. FRASER: I have a case in which a veteran is entitled to a burnt-out pension, I imagine you would call it, or veterans pension.

Mr. MUTCH: Veterans allowance.

Mr. FRASER: Yes. But he has a sister whom he has kept for some twenty-five or thirty years. This man has a small bank account, and he is trying to keep it so that he can look after his sister and bury her. But he cannot get the veterans allowance until such time as he gets rid of this money. He could easily go out and spend it overnight, but he does not want to do that. I suppose he could give it away and then come under the allowance. Is there any way in which this man could come under the veterans allowance?

Mr. MUTCH: How much money has he?

Mr. FRASER: About $3,000.

Mr. MUTCH: He has $1,800 too much.

Mr. GREGG: The act was to provide for people who were in necessity and without means of support. The amount mentioned would be in excess of the amount that would enable us to do anything for him.

Mr. FRASER: Suppose this man went out and gave a part of that money away. What happens then? Is he entitled to the allowance?

Mr. GREGG: I think it would be necessary for our officers to say that, if he considered that he could give that money away, he did not have any necessity for it; and consequently that he would not be in necessity in that particular situation.

Mr. FRASER: That is what I was afraid of. Could he give the money to his sister, to look after her?

Mr. GREGG: The deputy minister quotes the words, that if he rids himself of the property for the purpose of entitling him to come under the act, he would not be eligible. The matter of intention would enter into it, as it does in so many things.

Item agreed to.

540. Veterans' insurance, $98,329.

Mr. PEARKES: Will the minister explain briefly the purpose of this insurance? Is it to assist veterans to take out life insurance without a medical examination?

Mr. GREGG: It is to enable veterans to get insurance who may be in a less robust physical condition than normal people. There are some occasions on which a medical examination may be required, but in most cases it is not.

Mr. PEARKES: Can the minister say why veterans who served in the allied forces, who are allowed practically every other benefit under the veterans legislation, are prohibited from taking advantage of this insurance?

Mr. GREGG: As it stands now, if they are in receipt of a pension they may be eligible for insurance. As to the other question, I do not know whether that was taken up in the veterans affairs committee or not.

Mr. PEARKES: It has not been taken up in the veterans affairs committee. That is why I raised it here. Those veterans are entitled to practically every other veterans benefit, with some slight modifications; yet they are debarred from taking advantage of this insurance. I am referring to those veterans who were domiciled in Canada before the war, who fought with an allied force, then came back and are now domiciled in Canada. To all intents and purposes they are Canadians. Why should they not have the benefit of this insurance legislation in exactly the same way as any other Canadian has?

Mr. GREGG: If there should be any demand in that field, the matter might be considered.

Mr. PEARKES: May it be considered now? Will the minister take it into consideration? Will he refer it to the committee on veterans affairs either now or in the future? This seems to me to be an unfair restriction.

Mr. GREGG: I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. McKAY: Will the minister say whether or not veterans insurance is strictly a government enterprise, or are policies underwritten by Canadian life insurance companies?

Mr. GREGG: It is entirely and strictly a government enterprise.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—

541. Pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the civilian government employees (war) compensation order P.C. 45/8848 of 22nd November, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act, $80,014,000.

Mr. GREEN: What are the latest figures on applications for pension which have been turned down on the ground that the applicant was suffering from a pre-enlistment condition not aggravated? In the veterans affairs committee in 1946 we were given figures up to December 31, 1945, and they showed that, of veterans who had service in a theatre of actual war outside Canada, 7,810 had been refused pension on the ground that their disability was pre-enlistment and not aggravated, and that, of those with service wholly in Canada, the figure was 54,207. Last year I got figures up to June 30, 1947, and they showed that of those with service in a theatre of war, the number was 13,321, and service wholly in Canada, 72,340. That was a total of 85,661 whose application for pension had been refused on the ground that they were suffering from a pre-enlistment condition not aggravated. Can the minister give us any later figures? It will be noticed that the last figures are up to June 30, 1947.

Mr. GREGG: We have no figures later than those, but we could obtain them up to the beginning of 1948. I understand that there would not be a great increase at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: They can be got up to the end of 1947?

Mr. GREGG: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask that that be done.

Mr. GREGG: Perhaps under the item that has been allowed to stand.

Mr. LENNARD: There is one class of men who should have entitlement, and that is those who adopted children after the pensionable injury occurred. Usually children are adopted for very good reasons, and certainly not with a view to obtaining the few additional dollars that might be received in the way of pension. Suppose a pensioner is unable to have children naturally and wishes to adopt a child. If the local authorities consider him of sufficiently good character, a man of good calibre, to entrust him with the upbringing of a child, the pension commission turn him down if the adoption took place after the pensionable injury occurred. That is something which certainly does not take place where the child is the natural offspring of the pensioner, even if it is born after the injury has been sustained. This is a class who, in my opinion, should receive serious consideration by the department.

Mr. CASE: I have one question to ask the minister and I think it will be of general interest to the committee. An English subject enlisted with the Canadian army overseas. He served with the Canadian army, later married, now has two children, and is a 100 per cent disability case, receiving his cheque regularly from the Canadian government. He now seeks admission to Canada. Is there anything to prevent his coming to Canada?

Mr. GREGG: Does my hon. friend mean, if he comes to Canada will he lose his pension?

Mr. CASE: No. The question is, can he come to Canada? He has never been able to come here.

Mr. GREGG: By virtue of his service in the Canadian army, one would think he would be a Canadian citizen, but that would be a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the immigration authorities, and I would not care to make a comment.

Mr. CASE: I am bringing up the question because I think it is of interest to the committee generally.

Mr. LENNARD: In that connection, I should think this would be a matter for the Department of Veterans Affairs to take up with the immigration authorities.

Mr. GREGG: I was going to add that. If the hon. member will give me the facts of the case I shall try to unravel it.

Mr. CARDIFF: Has the department considered any provision for a man who served at least five years overseas, without any black marks against him, and who now finds himself in the position where he is unable to hold a job, his condition appearing to have been pre-enlistment? Is there any provision for such chaps? This man served five years overseas.

and he cannot now hold a job owing to his disability, the department claiming that it is pre-enlistment. He had no black marks against him during his five years of service. Surely he deserves consideration now.

Mr. GREGG: It was for such veterans that special arrangements were made under the War Veterans Allowance Act. His physical condition now, which is non-pensionable, is due to a pre-enlistment disorder, and for that reason he is unemployable. He should make application for war veterans allowance, regardless of his age, if he had service outside Canada in the last war.

Mr. QUELCH: In view of the amendment passed to section 11 1(c), striking out the words "wilfully and deliberately concealed", will a review be made of those cases where pension was refused on the ground that the applicant had wilfully concealed disability at the time of enlistment?

Mr. GREGG: That is under way now.

Mr. QUELCH: Upon application only?

Mr. GREGG: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Why should it be necessary for the veteran to apply? There will be thousands of these veterans who will never know that they can apply. One good illustration of the difficulty in that connection is the trouble which the minister's colleague, the Minister of Finance, or perhaps it is the Minister of National Revenue, is having in locating people who have refundable savings coming to them. One would suppose that every person having refundable savings payable to him would let the department know of his whereabouts, but apparently there are thousands of such persons who are not communicating with the department. The same is true of veterans. There will be veterans in places all over Canada who will never learn that they can get pension in consequence of the change in the section, and I suggest that in all cases in which pension has been refused there should be a review automatically by the pension commission and the pensions granted without the commission sitting back and waiting for the veteran to apply. It is most unfair to hold out on the veteran in that way.

Mr. GREGG: In the matter of making known those changes that have been made in all veterans legislation this session, as soon as the session closes there will be a conference on the part of my officials for the purpose of publishing a summary, and also working out plans which we feel can best carry out the letter and spirit of those amendments, along the lines mentioned here. I can assure hon. members that no effort will be spared to attempt to interpret those amendments in the best possible way.

Mr. GREEN: The minister will recall that during the earlier discussions of the special committee there was agreement to recommend to the department that meritorious pensions granted under section 21, should be automatically increased without its being necessary to wait for an application from the pensioner. I am sure that all members who served on the committee would like to have cases which will benefit by the other changes dealt with automatically in the same way, without the necessity of having to wait for applications to be made. If there are other amendments to the act benefiting veterans, then I think those benefits should go out automatically. Such cases should be dealt with automatically, and there should be no need to wait for an application.

Mr. QUELCH: I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South. It would be much simpler to do it on an automatic basis than to wait for applications. There is no question that many veterans will never know this legislation has been passed. As we go across the country, we find that many statutes with which one would think people would be familiar, and which have been given publicity, are not well known. There will be many cases where veterans have been denied pensions on the ground that their disabilities were of pre-enlistment origin. That veteran may still be denied later on, on the ground that it was recorded. I suggest, therefore, that in every case where the pension commission have a file of a list of soldiers or veterans who were denied pensions on the ground that for a time they wilfully concealed their disability, those cases should be taken up and reviewed. There will be some cases where disabilities may have been recorded, and where veterans would not be eligible for pensions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Since I was not a member of the special committee on veterans affairs I hesitate to say anything here, because there are so many other members quite capable of dealing with the matter. However I would associate myself with the hon. members for Vancouver South and Acadia in what they have said this afternoon. It seems to me that where an improvement has been made in the Pension Act or in the War Veterans Allowance Act, where it is on record that a person would be entitled to the improved benefits of the act, the department should not wait for the individuals concerned to make applications. Those cases should now be taken up automatically by the department. They should be advised that they are now eligible for the improved pension or allowance, as the case may be.

Mr. GREGG: I can assure hon. members who have spoken that the object they have in mind is exactly that of the department. Perhaps it has been overlooked, but steps will be taken to do what is desired. The point is this: Is it better for us now to go into files which have been semi-dead, when we have pensions advocates who have under their care cases such as those we have been discussing and who have been bringing them back for review by the pension board. It is a case of having to decide, as I think we must, which appears to us to require priority, to accomplish what has been mentioned this afternoon.

Mr. GREEN: But there are only a handful of pensions advocates across the country. They will be working with a very small number of these cases in which pensions have been refused on certain grounds which have now been removed. There will be only a handful of those cases on the desks of the pensions advocates. If the department does not move to grant the pensions it may be years before these veterans receive any benefit from the legislation. I suggest that a staff should be put to work in the Department of Veterans Affairs right away to go over these cases which have been turned down, and to arrange that the veterans receive the benefits.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is one other point I should like to bring to the minister's attention. As the minister recalls, in respect of the increase both in the disability pension and in the war veterans allowance, it has been made clear that those amounts will be paid automatically. On the basis of that information I have answered letters telling veterans that they do not have to apply for those adjustments, but they need only bide their time and the adjustments will be made. It seems to me that the effect of that will carry over into this stage of the matter as well. Veterans generally will tend to feel that it is automatic, and they will not apply until they discover that it is not.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely veterans bureaux or veterans advocates will not have complete files of cases where veterans have been denied pensions on the ground that disability was wilfully concealed.

Mr. GREGG: Complete files will be available. But I can assure hon. members that this discussion will be kept carefully in mind in working out the plans to review these cases.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

May I reply to a question asked about Canadian ex-servicemen who served with the Belgian forces? They may have their pension awards increased to Canadian rates. They must establish entitlement, and obtain the original award from the country with which they served. There are very few Belgian cases in which decisions have not been rendered. The number is small.

Mr. LENNARD: Are the service bureaux and adjustment offices of the Canadian Legion being supported by the government?

Mr. GREGG: The veterans bureau is a service provided by the department at public expense on behalf of the veterans. Twelve or fifteen years ago it was decided that it was not desirable to instruct the veteran that he must, as a compulsory matter, come to a government advocate, no matter how impartial that advocate might be. It was made optional that he could go to a veterans' organization to receive help and advice in preparing his case.

Mr. LENNARD: The reason for my question is that I have had some dealings with the service bureau in the Hamilton district, and with satisfactory results. I believe these service bureaux officers are taking a great interest in veterans' cases, and they are not now being left to pensions advocates. That has been my experience. The service bureau officer in Hamilton is doing a splendid job. This bureau is replacing the old system of pensions advocates who sometimes were not taking the interest they should in cases. If these cases are dealt with in the manner in which they are in Hamilton I think the situation will be much better in the future.

Mr. MUTCH: To revert to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South about section 21, the situation with respect to a pension granted under that section is that more than half of those in receipt of pension have already been reviewed; the review is proceeding without request from the recipients.

Mr. GREEN: What we are suggesting is that the same procedure be followed in the case of men who have been ruled out because of pre-enlistment conditions.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Are these Belgian soldier cases being handled with dispatch, or is there any reason why there should be delay in particular cases? In the case I have before me the veteran had to wait for over two years before settlement was made. The answer that is always given is that the Belgian office is the cause of the delay. Will it be possible to correct this situation in the near future, so that some assurance can be given that pensions will be forthcoming?

Mr. GREGG: We are receiving the utmost co-operation from the Belgian embassy in Ottawa. In some cases reference must be made to Belgium, but we do not anticipate much delay.

Mr. PEARKES: Are the files to which the minister referred retained at district headquarters?

Mr. GREGG: There is a duplicate file at head office and one at district headquarters.

Mr. PEARKES: That would account for some of the delay experienced on Vancouver island, because they would have to send to Vancouver for the files. It should be remembered that in Victoria we have only a part-time pensions advocate, although I believe he has recently been given a full-time assistant. This illustrates the difficulties which are being experienced there, and it is no wonder that I get resolutions from branches of the legion such as the Britannia branch, one of the largest in the southern portion of Vancouver island, reading as follows:

> That this branch go on record again urging that in the interests of returned men of this area that the D.V.A. be again asked to create a separate district of D.V.A. of Victoria and district, with headquarters here.

I mention this to illustrate the difficulties under which veterans in the southern portion of Vancouver island are carrying on.

Item agreed to.

542. War veterans' allowances, $18,085,000.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): There is a considerable increase in this item, and the details on page 298 of the estimates show that this increase is largely in connection with the veterans of world war I. Is this increase to provide increased allowances to those already receiving allowances, or is it to pay allowances to new recipients? How many new veterans of world war I were added last year?

Mr. GREGG: This amount is to pay the war veterans allowances had they not been increased this year. The amount necessary to take care of the recent increases will have to be provided in the supplementary estimates for the current year, just as an amount had to be provided in the supplementary estimates to take care of the retroactive feature from October 1.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): How many were taken on last year?

Mr. GREGG: On April 1, 1947, there were about 30,000 veterans of world war I, and on April 1, 1948, there were 27,700, or a decrease of approximately 2,300.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): That is not just what I want to find out. I want to find out how many new veterans of world war I were taken on during the past year.

Mr. GREGG: Perhaps that question could stand and I shall attempt to answer it later.

Mr. CHARLTON: Is there any difference between the treatment given to an Indian veteran and that given to a white veteran?

Mr. GREGG: No. The Indian veteran is treated the same as any other veteran for all purposes.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is the war veterans allowance made to an Indian veteran on exactly the same basis as to a white veteran, or does the Indian affairs branch have a finger in the pie and make recommendations in connection with the matter?

Mr. GREGG: The answer is no. The Indian is treated exactly the same as any other veteran.

Mr. FRASER: The Indian agent did have a hand in the payment of gratuities and other things of that kind, and I am just wondering if the Indian always got the full amount, or was it cut down because he was getting a grant from the tribe?

Mr. GREGG: I understand that there are no restrictions against Indians as such under the act. If the board, as in the case of any veteran, considers that the funds would be better administered by some body acting on behalf of the veteran, they have the power to order that.

Mr. HARKNESS: How many Indian veterans are receiving war veterans allowances and in how many cases are the funds being administered by the Indian affairs branch?

Mr. GREGG: We have no record as to the first question, because I do not think that it matters. They are Canadian citizens by virtue of their service in the forces, and I do not think we should keep track of that. I think I can get an answer to the second question and I shall try to do so.

Mr. PEARKES: Are band funds of the Indians taken into consideration when these awards are being paid? Assuming that the Indians have certain band funds; would it be apportioned between the Indians and the Indians credited with so much?

Mr. GREGG: I think not, but I shall verify that.

Item agreed to.

548. Grant to Canadian Legion, $9,000.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): This is a grant to the Canadian Legion out of the taxes paid by Canadian citizens. The N.R.M.A. are Canadian citizens and they are discriminated against by the legion, so that I cannot support this grant. I see members here who voted in favour of conscription. Either that law was good, or it was not. If that law was good, these men who obeyed the law, just like United States citizens, citizens of Britain and citizens of South Africa did, should not be discriminated against. It is time to put a stop to that discrimination. I do not see why parliament and the government could not meet the legion half way and impress on them that this discrimination must stop. The N.R.M.A., I say once again, are Canadian citizens and obeyed the law, and because they waited to be drafted they are not to be banned from social and other privileges. I am not the only one in this country who feels that way about it. I think amendments will have to be brought into the house to put these draftees in the same position as others. Some of these draftees served overseas, and I do not see why they should be discriminated against after having served in a theatre of war. I ask the government to think carefully before making a grant to this association which discriminates against Canadian citizens who are paying their taxes just like other Canadian citizens.

Item agreed to.

549. To provide for the cost of administration of soldier settlement; British family settlement; general land settlement, and Veterans' Land Act, including engineering and other investigational planning and subdivision expenses that do not add tangible value to real property, $5,285,703.

Mr. HARKNESS: Has any further consideration been given to the question of giving veterans who took up land under the Soldier Settlement Act or the Veterans' Land Act title to the mineral rights? I took this matter up in the house two years ago and have had considerable correspondence about it with the department. It is becoming an increasingly serious question to certain settlers in Alberta because of the extension of the oil fields there. The situation has been that even when the soldier settler had paid for his land in full and got possession the board reserved the mineral rights, although in many cases the soldier thought he was buying the mineral rights as well as the surface rights to his property. An amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act was introduced in this house some years ago to deal with this matter, but it was defeated in the other place. The previous minister of veterans affairs intimated to me some time ago that he thought probably that amendment should be reintroduced and the matter fixed up in that way. Is any consideration being given to that, and would the government be prepared to reintroduce an amendment?

Mr. GREGG: I know that a great number of members from the west are interested in this matter. My attention was called to it shortly after I came into this department. We have been taking the matter up in close co-operation with the Department of Mines and Resources, and we have even got to the point of putting forward what appears to be a possible solution for the consideration of the Department of Justice. We will follow that up as soon as we get a ruling from the justice department on the points raised. I am familiar with the history of the former bill which passed this house and died in another place. It ought to be possible by next session, if not before, to bring the matter forward.

Mr. HARKNESS: Is it not possible to get around the difficulty without having an amendment to the law? In other words, is that what you have referred to the Department of Justice for a ruling? Or is it still considered necessary to amend the act?

Mr. GREGG: If we find that an amendment to the act is not necessary we shall be very happy to carry the plan into effect as suggested.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): In my province of Quebec the unit of measurement of land is not an acre but an "arpent", which is a little less than an acre. Our lands are divided into "arpents," and when a veteran buys land from the government he is sometimes obliged by the law to buy a little piece extra of a neighbour's property, simply because the word "arpent" is not used instead of acre. If "arpent" were used many troubles would be avoided. An "arpent" is about seventy feet less than an acre.

On this item, may I be permitted to say a word about the establishment of veterans on crown lands? I understand that sixteen or seventeen months after the law was passed in 1946 my province came to an agreement with the federal government on this matter. The veterans who could have profited by that law in my province by being established on crown lands have not done so to the extent that they could have. If more publicity could be given to this law many veterans could profit by it and would receive the $2,500 grant given by the two governments to establish veterans on the land. We have many crown lands from which the veterans could profit.

Mr. GREGG: I shall be glad to follow that suggestion, because the opportunity is still there for those eligible from world war II, since no limitation is yet placed upon the time.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I ask the minister if he would give greater publicity to it, so that veterans who are not aware of it may profit from it.

Mr. GREGG: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. FAIR: With respect to the question of mineral rights which was taken up a few moments ago by the hon. member for Calgary East, I may say I have been playing around with this on behalf of my constituents for nearly two years. Apparently two or three departments of government have been playing around with it also. Since coming here last December, I have discussed the matter on various occasions with the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Only a couple of days ago he told me to come in to see him on Monday next. That is the reason I have not taken the matter up with him today. I have been assured by the minister that we are nearing an agreement. If that agreement is not reached satisfactorily I can tell the minister that we shall have some more playing around with this question.

I understand that up to 1883 mineral rights went with the land. Since that time, the rights have been reserved by the crown. In many cases, 1,200 or 1,300 I believe, settlers who took out lands under the soldier settlement board did get the mineral rights on their land. Section 57 of the Soldier Settlement Act took away or confiscated these mineral rights. In 1940 the government saw fit to bring in a bill, No. 31, which was passed through this house without very much discussion. However, when it went to the other place there was some discussion there as to the right of a farmer to have mineral rights. The final decision arrived at was that farmers were placed on the land by the soldier settlement board primarily for the purpose of farming, and as a result of that they were not entitled to mineral rights. The soldier settlement board might just as well confiscate buildings and other improvements on a farm as confiscate the mineral rights.

My constituency is vitally interested in this question because we have a lot of oil in the Lloydminster, Vermilion, Wainwright and other districts in that constituency. While a number of our soldier settlers are interested, I feel that the time is close at hand when the government will see fit to return to these people that which they confiscated from them by section 57 of the Soldier Settlement Act.

I am not pressing this question at the present time, because the minister, in whom I have every confidence, told me to see him again next week. I am hoping at that time to get a satisfactory reply from him, but I assure the minister now and the government that unless some satisfactory settlement is made of this, that is, giving back to the soldier settlers that which was confiscated from them, we shall have some lawsuits and some more playing around through the courts, because we have been playing around long enough with the department and with the government.

Mr. GREGG: I have a statement I promised to make in response to the remarks made by the hon. member for Lake Centre which appear on pages 4586 to 4588 of Hansard, in which he made certain comments dealing with the discrimination against certain areas in Saskatchewan, with particular reference to his own constituency. I had intended to send him a map showing the settlers settled in his constituency and in Saskatchewan. I shall send it to his colleagues. With the unanimous consent of the committee, I should like to place this statement on Hansard, so that hon. members may read it.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the minister unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. GREGG: The statement follows:

Discrimination against certain areas of the province of Saskatchewan. In the purchase of land for veterans the department makes no discrimination in regard to any particular area in Canada, but great care is exercised to ensure that veterans are not established on marginal or submarginal farm land. Any deviation from this policy, even for the strongest sentimental reasons, would not be in keeping with the spirit and intent of the Veterans' Land Act. It has always been the policy of the department to assist veterans to re-establish themselves in civil life on a sound, long-term basis. Anything less would be playing false to those to whom Canada owes so much.

However, to be more specific, as far back as July, 1943, a policy was laid down after consultation with senior agricultural officials of the provincial departments of the prairie provinces and the western universities, and a number of outstanding farmers. The departmental officials had had extensive experience settling veterans of world war I, and were well aware of pitfalls to be avoided.

Briefly, that policy restricts land purchases to certain types of soil in different areas, depending on climatic conditions. It was formulated after an exhaustive study of all available information with regard to long-term crop yields, bonuses under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, relief records, soil textures, and fertility and precipitation data.

In practice, each field supervisor is provided with soil survey report No. 12 for the province of Saskatchewan, and up-to-date soil maps. The survey report gives a comprehensive description of the soils of the provinces, discusses their limitations for agricultural use, and contains a soil rating index for each soil type. Land appraisals are made with great care and include a careful examination of both top and sub-soils. Where available, aerial photographs are being distributed to assist the field supervisor to outline the physical features of the farm. Use is made of the economic land classification maps published by the economics division, Department of Agriculture, in co-operation with the department of farm management, University of Saskatchewan. In addition, the administration itself has records of long-term yields and data concerning yield variations in particular areas. Even with all this information available it is again pointed out that under present policy no farm is turned down until it has been individually examined and considered strictly on its own merits as an economic unit, and in relation to the price asked.

Thus, when a farm is declared unsuitable, having been considered from all these points of view, the administration would indeed be false to its trust if it were to permit a veteran to make what is probably the one big purchase of his lifetime on such a property, however much the veteran himself may desire to locate there at that particular time. In fact, instances have occurred when veterans subsequently established on sound propositions have expressed sincere gratitude for having been saved from the pitfalls of settlement on an uneconomic unit.

With respect to settlement in the hon. member for Lake Centre's constituency a map indicates that veterans have been settled on parcels of land uniformly dispersed and comparable to almost any other section of the province.

Reasons for declining purchase of certain parcels of land. Mr. Diefenbaker has quoted an extract from a letter forwarded by a departmental official to a veteran, in which the veteran was advised that the farm in question could not be purchased, and the reasons could not be given as they were strictly confidential. Admittedly, this was an unfortunate letter, but it is certainly an isolated case. A recent survey of copies of letters declining purchase sent to veterans in Mr. Diefenbaker's constituency during the past fifteen months indicates that the following extract is more typical:—

> However, the committee did state that they considered the land unsuitable, and I think if you had looked over the farm, you would perhaps realize yourself just why it was rejected, especially if you compared it with a good farm in a good area. You can also have a very good idea of the type of farm it is by comparing the assessment with land which is of a good class. In this case, one quarter is assessed at $1,050 and the other at $1,000, and according to the assessment commission, ratings below $1,200 are considered sub-marginal.

It might be pointed out that initially it was a custom to state quite clearly to a veteran why a farm was unsuitable, but it was found that it was causing considerable embarrassment to the vendor and other individuals interested in the community. It was then decided that specific reasons should not be given in order that a vendor whose farm might represent his life's work would not have his property publicly condemned. Admittedly it is a choice of evils, but no doubt the hon. member for Lake Centre would be very quick to champion the rights of individual citizens whose assets were being publicly depreciated by a government department.

Delays in obtaining approval for settlement. It is admitted that there were delays in the handling of applications for loans in the past, particularly in the fall of 1946 when the regional offices were swamped with applications just before freeze-up. It will be readily understood that accurate appraisals cannot be made during winter months. It took six weeks to two months to catch up with this backlog in the spring of 1947. This year there was a very small backlog of applications on hand, but as the spring has been very late, with extremely bad roads, there was a hold-up in the appraisals in some areas until nearly the middle of May. The district superintendent for the province of Saskatchewan reported on June 4 that there were only twenty odd appraisals outstanding, and these are being checked rapidly. The district superintendent reported further that for current applications the time from the date of appraisal until the veteran is advised varies from five to twenty days, with the average time being approximately fourteen days.

Increase in the amount of loan as requested by the Govan Branch of the Canadian Legion. The resolution by some of the branches of the legion recommending an increase in the amount of loan to veterans being established under the Veterans' Land Act was turned down by the resolutions committee at the recent dominion convention of the Canadian Legion which was held in Saskatoon, as it was felt that to go beyond the present maximum of the act would be loading the veteran with too large a debt, and that it would be wiser to encourage establishment under section 9 (3) of the act, followed subsequently by an establishment under section 9 (1) when the veteran had sufficient funds of his own to supplement the loan in order to buy a more expensive unit.

Veterans settled on small holdings in Prince Albert. Mr. Diefenbaker made reference to eight veterans in the Prince Albert area who signed an agreement to purchase a small holding at a certain figure, and indicated that subsequently they were asked to sign another agreement at a higher figure. It is assumed that all eight cases are typical of the one specific case quoted, in which the circumstances are as follows:

This veteran was permitted occupancy before the house was completed and the actual cost known and, as he requested a loan for equipment, it was necessary that he sign an agreement for what was estimated would be the cost of the house. It will be recalled that at that time there was a heavy demand for housing, and for humanitarian reasons the department departed from normal practice and permitted veterans to occupy houses which were habitable but not completed. Subsequently, due to the increased cost of construction, it was found that the actual cost of the house had been under-estimated, and thus, in keeping with the act, it became necessary to request a new agreement at the increased figure.

The department feels justified in taking such humanitarian action, even though it has later caused some embarrassment both to the department and the veteran.

The obtaining of machinery for veterans. The hon. member for Lake Centre suggests that some provision should be made for priority in machinery for veterans. It is pointed out that this priority system exists at the present time and has for several years, and has been receiving the wholehearted co-operation of the machinery manufacturers and their dealers. For example, as of March 31 this year 8,731 tractors and 880 combines had been delivered to veterans since the inception of the act. In point of fact, veterans established under the Veterans Land Act are much better supplied with new implements than any other group of farmers in Canada. In Saskatchewan 68 per cent of the farmers have tractors of some kind, many of these twelve, thirteen and fourteen years old; 53·4 per cent of veterans being established have new tractors, and approximately 20 per cent have second-hand tractors of one kind or another.

In order to acquaint the machinery companies with the expected requirements of machinery for veterans settling under the act, their estimated requirements are ascertained from district and regional offices approximately fifteen months before delivery is required. This information is carefully screened and a definite figure as to the quantities of the different models of machines required is established. Implement companies are then approached, and definite arrangements made with them to deliver to veterans coming under the act the machines so ordered at the price in effect at time of delivery, less 10 per cent on general line machines and 7 per cent on tractors and combines. Each year provision has been made to meet the estimated over-all requirements, but there have been many production difficulties which have prevented the implement companies from fulfilling their commitments. Whenever it became apparent that any types of machines had been ordered in excess of actual requirements, the surplus implements were immediately returned to the manufacture to be distributed amongst veterans establishing themselves, or to agriculture generally.

While there were no specific quantities arranged to meet the requirements of veterans establishing themselves outside the act, there has been in effect a working arrangement with implement companies to set aside a percentage of their total production to meet special orders coming from veterans who are establishing themselves and, in addition, when urgent requirements develop, machines are released, wherever possible, from Veterans' Land Act quotas.

Veterans with low disabilities denied settlement. It is certainly not the policy of the department to refuse assistance solely on the ground of a small disability. Already many veterans with high disabilities have been established as full-time farmers. Where any doubt does exist, however, as to the veteran's physical condition, the matter is referred to the medical profession for an opinion. These opinions are, of course, confidential, but if the hon. member for Lake Centre will supply the name of the veteran in question, whose total disability is 5 per cent and who has been declined settlement, the full facts of the case can be made available to him.

Mr. PEARKES: There was a lot of talk going on at the time you were carrying these items, Mr. Chairman, and it was impossible to follow them. Item 553, which has to do with merchant seamen, is one of the matters which is now before the veterans affairs committee, dealing with their rehabilitation. I would ask that this item stand until that committee reports.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 553 was reported as carried.

Mr. PEARKES: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The item was reported as carried and the statement was sent to the officials of the house. However I think it is agreeable to all concerned that the matter be discussed further in the committee. I say that in order to keep the record straight in Hansard.

Item 532 was not carried.

Mr. GREGG: That was allowed to stand until a later date to permit discussion arising out of the report of the parliamentary committee.

Mr. GREEN: Items 532 and 553 are both standing?

Mr. GREGG: That is correct.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Last night I asked the minister if he would give us the figures as to the amounts outstanding of credits which had been extended. If the minister can give us those figures over the last three years, or since the end of the war, showing the amount of credit which has been extended, I should like him to do so. But if he has them for some shorter period than that, I would not object.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have certain rather comprehensive statements here. It might be easier to put them on Hansard, but I will read them just to give the idea. To Belgium the total loan was $100,000,000; the cash advanced to June 12, 1948, was $67,000,000. The interest to that time was consolidated, so that the gross debt today is about $67,707,753.42. The balance of the loan is roughly $33,000,000. It expires on December 31, 1948.

The loan to China was $60,000,000. The cash advanced to date—and I will just give the round figures—was $42,600,000. Orders have been placed at an estimated cost of $8,000,000 against the loan.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does that mean that it would now be up to $50,000,000?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; something more than that, as a matter of fact. Commitments are $8,000,000. That loan expires on December 31, 1948.

To Czechoslovakia the total loan was $19,000,000, of which $15,800,000 has been advanced; and there are outstanding orders of about $400,000.

With regard to France, there was a total loan of $242,500,000, of which $215,500,000 has been advanced; and the $27,000,000 balance has been committed. That loan expires on June 30, 1948 and it is all expended.

With regard to the Netherlands, there was a loan of $125,000,000 of which $119,000,000 has been advanced. That loan expired on April 30, 1948.

To the Netherlands East Indies there was a loan of $15,000,000, of which $13,250,000 has been spent. There are outstanding commitments of $750,000.

There was a loan to Norway of $30,000,000 of which $22,000,000 has been spent, with outstanding commitments of $3,000,000. That loan expires on June 24, 1948. It expires next week.

There was a loan to Russia of $3,000,000, of which $2,866,000 has been spent. That loan has expired.

The loan to the United Kingdom amounted to $1,250 million, of which $1,015 million has been spent. The payments under that loan have been suspended for the time being. It is hoped that they can be resumed before many weeks go by.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You mean advances?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It is hoped that advances under the loan can be resumed before many months go by. It depends upon the economic situation in Canada, which again depends on the size of the crop and other factors. There is $235 million unexpended under the British loan. The net result is that we have lent $1,250 million to the United Kingdom, and $594 million to the other countries. I think that is the story.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the situation with regard to the other unadvanced portion? For instance, let us take Belgium, with regard to which the figure is $33,000,000. Would the situation there be similar to that with regard to the United Kingdom? That is to say, as to the United Kingdom, the minister said that he hoped to resume advances.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Belgium is in a rather peculiar position. They have bought about as much for cash as they have bought for credit, and they have not called on the balance of the $33,000,000. Belgian trade with Canada has stepped up quite well, and apparently they are getting on all right without drawing down the full amount of the loan.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What was the understanding as to Britain being able to take up our loan at the time it was made? Have we been obliged to disappoint them, or have they been able to make other arrangements?

Mr. HOWE: No. It was intended to be a loan over five years. The drawings have been a great deal faster than were anticipated when the loan was made. It is that fact, that we expected about $250 million a year and we actually got over $1 billion in two years, that has thrown our economic calculations somewhat out of gear.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Has somebody else taken up the slack? Has the Marshall plan stepped in, in time to enable them to avoid any serious embarrassment?

Mr. HOWE: I can hardly discuss the United Kingdom's position. I know it is difficult.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to know if I am correct in my understanding that the minister is not able to give us any figure as to the exact savings in United States exchange made by reason of the 25 per cent excise tax. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: I have not that figure. I do not see how it could possibly be segregated.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to make a few general observations on this item. I know I would not be permitted to do so anywhere else. What I have in mind has to do with the general administration of the minister's department. I refer to the recent increase permitted in both raw and fabricated steel, ranging from $5 to $12.50 a ton.

Mr. HOWE: This would come more properly under reconstruction and supply, which deals with controls on steel. I have no objection, but I shall have more information when we reach that department, as I hope we shall in a few minutes.

Mr. GILLIS: That is all right if it is more convenient to the minister.

Mr. CHURCH: On this question of departmental administration, I intended last night, when the hon. member for Lethbridge got the floor, to mention two or three small matters in connection with this vote. I will take the opportunity now and I promise you, Mr. Chairman, that I will not detain the committee for more than five or six minutes. I appreciate the work that has been done by the present minister as well as by his predecessor, evidence of which was visible in the international trade fair that we witnessed last week. It was a wonderful world's fair exhibition of our trade and commerce and I hope it will be an annual event.

The minister has effected some improvements in our trade with the mother country. In this connection, I should like to refer to an editorial that appeared in one of the local newspapers this morning, the Ottawa Citizen, in reference to something on trade I said the other night. I would suggest that it would be well if this newspaper could do something to promote the progress of its own city, as the city from which I come has progressed in different directions. This editorial did not quote one word of what I said on trade the other night with reference to preferential trade or the great loss that this country sustained when we tossed overboard valuable principles of trade in committing ourselves to Bretton Woods and the United States loan at Geneva in 1945. All the well-tried economic principles by which this country has progressed ever since confederation have been discarded. The other night I was simply trying to justify the national policy that has been responsible for the growth of commerce in Canada. I was not advocating the national policy of 1878. What I was advocating was a national policy for the living and not for the dead. The national policy, however, has done a great deal for Canada. It got us steady markets with our best customers, not north and south, but east and west. It got us markets throughout the world for our grain, foodstuffs and various other commodities.

I do not object to the criticism of any local newspaper, and I do not mind whether I am called Progressive, Liberal, or Conservative. They may call me whatsoever they like; they cannot say, nor have they ever said, one word against progressive measures I promoted here for many years. If they would get their own town to take some progressive steps it would be better. The city from which I come made progress twenty-five years ago in connection with the street railway, light, power and hydro, and if they would do the same for their own town in housing and in various other municipal ways it would be better for all concerned. Fifteen to twenty years ago we saw the wooden houses across the river, in Hull, when I was urging a national housing policy for this country and opposing the give-away of power in 1927 in the Ottawa district.

Progress is what is wanted in this country today. What we want is progress and principle, not peanuts and party. That applies to our friends of the Citizen. One of their staff went to Japan and then founded the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Let them look after their own progress and never mind mine. As I said last night, I do not change my politics, nor do I veer from my principles. I have been in this house for a considerable time and have consistently advocated certain principles, and I stick to those principles whether I am in the house or out of it.

Regarding this particular department, I made reference the other night to certain improvements which I think can be effected, and I never referred to the Ontario election. I never mentioned it. What I did say was that a political party that sticks to its principles will never lack for a following, and a political party that has no principles will get nowhere. I was not referring to personalities but to the principle at stake. In the past, the party to which I belong has consistently followed economic principles of protection that have done a great deal for the country; our own work for our own workmen; our own markets for our own production. I admit, of course, that the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier also did a great deal for Canada, but did not alter the tariff much. I say that freely because I am not a hidebound party man; far from it. But I believe in certain principles of trade, certain economic principles which in my opinion should be carried out in this country; and I do not believe that Sir Wilfrid Laurier departed very much, in matters of trade and commerce, from the policies of his predecessors.

I did not believe in union government, and do not now believe in the form of government that is in existence today in Manitoba and British Columbia. But that is none of my business; it is a matter for the electors of Manitoba and British Columbia respectively to choose their own government. I will say, however, that as a result of the policy in Manitoba and British Columbia there is but one alternative for a voter there, and that is the party of our hon. friends to the left.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. CHURCH: I fully appreciate the ability of my hon. friend, who is his party's whip. He is active in the house and is very likeable in many ways. For that matter, so are all my hon. friends to the left. But when it comes to principles of trade and commerce, I repeat, we of this party have never changed our ideas. They can call us anything they like, but we stand by our principles. I was too modest the other night to admit that I was a progressive, but I suggest that there could be greater progress in the city of Ottawa. It is badly needed. As regards a public utility here, the stock was 17; it is now 42½ in the stock markets, and it is still going up.

Last fall I delivered an address to the pupils of one of our schools and I spoke somewhat in these terms: "Some of you will very soon find yourselves on the thorny path of public life. Do not forget, while paying the closest attention to the welfare of your constituents, the important principle that nothing that anyone says should alter your own opinion of doing what you think is right." I said to those students to remember that the greatest crime that had been committed in all history was the crime perpetrated by one who paid too much heed to popular opinion and the populace, and that was Pontius Pilate. One fact that should be borne in mind by leaders in every walk of life and by politicians the world over in these dangerous times is this. It is not cleverness but independence of character that counts, that independence of character which is so often lacking not only in our own country, among our own public men, but in many other countries the world over. It is the lack of that independence which has led to the present state of affairs. We find that politicians the world over tend to follow rather than to lead public opinion, for it is easy and more profitable to swim with the tide than against it. If you go against the tide you may be submerged.

I do not know that I have much more to say with reference to that article which commented upon what I had to say—without quoting a word of it—about trade and commerce. I have only this to say, that it would be far better if the leaders of all parties decided, instead of keeping their ear to the ground so much, to lead public opinion rather than follow it. That is the attitude we need. It is this cause and effect that loses elections.

I voted against Bretton Woods because I saw what was coming; I foresaw the disaster in connection with our dollar. I knew what the dollar situation would be. I also criticized the United States loan. In my opinion, we lost our best customer when we threw overboard the principles of preferential trade. By it, our province, more than any other, western Ontario particularly, did a great deal to improve trade between this country and Britain, as well as between Canada and all the other countries on the seven seas. Those hon. members who saw the magnificent exhibits in the international trade fair the other day at the exhibition grounds in Toronto must have rejoiced to see the extent to which the trade of Canada has been and could be developed with the sterling countries by empire trade.

I wish the present Minister of Trade and Commerce every success in his work, now that he has taken over this department. I recognize that he did a great deal of good work during the war. I appreciate that and I am fair enough to say it. He has worked hard and I hope he will be a success. I trust that as soon as he can he will rid this country of its austerity program, restore preferential empire trade, do what he can to rectify the dollar situation and give to the small businessman and the big businessman as well a chance to flourish and to conduct his business in his own way by free enterprise, which is very necessary at the present time.

I was sorry we did not stay in the sterling area, largely because people voted down these free trade and unrestricted reciprocity policies away back in 1911. Today we have nothing but unrestricted reciprocity, free trade with the United States. So much is this true that Time magazine, which I quoted recently, said that we are becoming the 49th state of the union.

These are very involved matters for trade and commerce. This is the 109th day of the session. It has been a strenuous session and the minister has worked hard. All the ministers have done that. I appreciate the fact that we have in this party today a party which has given the government substantial aid and support since last December. I hope that we shall have a recess from our duties beginning next Friday night, and that the government of today will see to it that as soon as they can they will restore preferential trade with our best customers, the mother country and the dominions. After all is said and done, that is where the cream of our trade is—and when I say that I refer to trade in manufactured goods, food and other raw commodities.

The resources of Great Britain and her dominions both in manufactured goods and in raw materials are far greater than those of Russia or the United States. As was said by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir John A. Macdonald, the mother country, with the dominions, is our best customer. And there has not been much change in policy since the days of those statesmen. We might add the countries of Europe which were with us in the first war, and which served as a market for our grain and other food products.

I rejoiced to see the exhibition in Toronto recently, because I know it will restore much of the trade we had with the sterling countries.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to say this to the hon. member for Broadview. I have sat in the house with him for a good many years and he has been here longer than I have. I believe the hon. member has made something of a record in the public life of this country, in that he is impervious to newspaper or any other kind of criticism. He has shown many acts of kindness and done many constructive acts of statesmanship in both municipal and dominion affairs. We know where he stands. He stands for the city from which he comes and for the community he represents. I hope he will be with us for a good many years to come.

Mr. FRASER: A short time ago the minister mentioned that goods to the value of $400,000 were to go to Czechoslovakia. Are they still going forward? Has there been any change?

Mr. HOWE: Such orders as are placed are going forward. It is about $400,000, I believe.

Mr. FRASER: What arrangements have been made for collecting that debt?

Mr. HOWE: Payments are being made when due.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister make his announcement respecting the United States motion picture industry under the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce or those of Reconstruction and Supply?

Mr. HOWE: I have nothing much to add to my previous statement.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister said he would make an announcement.

Mr. HOWE: I hope to be able to reduce it to paper, but I have not done so yet. Arrangements have been made for a considerable amount of Canadian publicity to be put out at the expense and through the agency of the moving picture industry. Certain shorts have been made by the industry and a few by the government of Canada which are being circulated through United States outlets. A comprehensive plan has been studied and partly agreed upon. I am not in a position to announce it today; I wish I were. I think hon. members will agree however that Canada is getting good value for the exchange privileges being allowed the industry in this country.

Mr. GREEN: Last night the minister gave figures with regard to trade between Canada and the United States and between Canada and the United Kingdom. No mention was made of trade between Canada and Australia and New Zealand. On the Pacific coast we are interested in that trade. Would the minister give us some information with regard to it?

Mr. HOWE: The only 1948 figures I have are for our two principal customers, the United States and the United Kingdom. I believe I have the 1947 figures for other trade. The position of trade with Australia and New Zealand is that their imports are being reduced substantially by an austerity program very much like that of England. Certain dollar funds are allocated to Canada, and imports are cut back to keep within the over-all allocation. However, we are shipping the usual exports to Australia and New Zealand, although in smaller quantities than was the case previously. Exports to British dominions, which would be largely Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, stood at $17,300,000 a month, average shipments. In 1946 the figure was $14,300,000. Exports to Australia in 1947, I find, were $60,294,201, and imports in that year were $14,222,487. Those are the largest exports on record, and the rate of imports is about the average.

Mr. GREEN: I am keenly interested in this, because about a month ago there was a press dispatch reporting a submission that was made to the government by the Canadian exporters' association. The dispatch is dated at Toronto, May 17, and states:

> The Canadian exporters' association, in a submission to trade minister Howe, said that the falling-off of export sales to British empire markets is so alarming that steps should be taken to counteract it. Canada, the submission says, finds herself in the peculiar position of being the sole member of the British commonwealth unable to trade more or less freely in empire markets which have become increasingly important to Canada in the development of our world trade.

Then the dispatch goes on to say:

> Unless some action is taken with alacrity Canadian exporters feel that they might be faced with the permanent loss of the empire markets.

Would the minister make a comment on that dispatch? If conditions are that serious, are any steps being taken by the government to meet the situation?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Our exports to empire markets at the present time are, I believe, running the highest in peacetime history. There is a cutting back of manufactured goods. That has been noticed by exporters who are interested in manufactured goods. When Canada ran into dollar difficulties the first thing that was cut off was manufactured goods such as automobiles and goods of that kind. It is the same in Australia and New Zealand. As a rule, the cut comes in manufactured goods of the semi-luxury type. Those industries are feeling it badly, just as are the people who are accustomed to ship to Canada. But our over-all export position to British countries is good.

Mr. HACKETT: Is it not true that Australia became industrialized during the war and is now producing to a substantial extent many of the commodities that it previously bought in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: That is true, but not to an extent that would interfere abnormally with Canadian exports. Usually, when new lines are opened up it really stimulates exports from other countries rather than the opposite. The difficulty in Australia at the moment is a lack of dollars and a strict limitation of the expenditure of dollars on this continent.

Mr. HACKETT: When the minister speaks of our export trade and its volume he is including our export trade to Great Britain, much of which is on Canadian credits.

Mr. HOWE: We include exports to Great Britain, because Great Britain is our second largest market. We include exports to South Africa, India, Australia, New Zealand and the British West Indies. The only serious drop is in our exports to Australia and New Zealand and the British West Indies, and in those cases the drop is chiefly in manufactured goods, although they are also buying less lumber and other raw materials than formerly.

Mr. HACKETT: If we exclude or write off the credits, has there been a drop in purchasing by Great Britain as compared with before the war?

Mr. HOWE: Britain is not drawing on credits at the moment.

Mr. HACKETT: She has been, according to the figures the minister gave.

Mr. HOWE: She was drawing until the middle of April; in that period the total was $52,500,000. At the moment they are not drawing on credits. We cannot say when they will resume, but it may be just as soon as our financial position permits.

Mr. GREEN: Has any attempt been made to improve our trade with Australia and New Zealand? Is there any way by which Canada can help them overcome their shortage of Canadian dollars?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know of any. We are most anxious to buy anything from Australia and New Zealand that they can ship. We have actually promoted imports from those two countries, but there is only a limited amount of goods that they can ship here. If they could ship sugar it would help a great deal, but all the sugar goes to the United Kingdom. Anything that we can buy there we are buying. Of course that is the only real way to build up trade under conditions such as we have today. The balance of trade is very much in our favour.

Mr. GREEN: Fourteen million dollars as against $60,000,000.

Mr. HOWE: About that.

Mr. GREEN: The people on the Pacific coast are also interested in trade with China. I understand that there have been some difficulties in opening up that trade and the people on the coast are complaining. What is the trouble there?

Mr. HOWE: Nothing is coming out of China; exports are almost nil. As my hon. friends know, China is suffering from an unlimited inflation and civil war and production has just dropped to negligible proportions.

Mr. GREEN: Are any goods going from Canada to China?

Mr. HOWE: In 1947 we exported nearly $35,000,000 worth and we imported from China $2,300,000 worth.

Mr. POULIOT: There is something more important than trade with China and the Fiji islands or other countries that cannot send exports to Canada. I refer to our whole trade policy. I pay a tribute to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am ready to stand by him to the limit, because I consider that his task at the present time is vital for the welfare of this country, provided that trade is real and not imaginary.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Stanstead in the questions he has asked with regard to the trade policies of this government. During the war it was impossible for me to find out what exports were being paid for and what exports we were paying for ourselves. That sort of trade was a false trade; it was not trade at all. Santa Claus does not trade with anybody, he gives things away to children. He cannot be called a general merchant or a businessman. Santa Claus is a giver, and Canada was acting as Santa Claus to the United Kingdom during and after the war.

I do not consider that trade financed by credits which are obtained by taxation is real trade. Our trade policy should be realistic. If countries have not the currency to purchase our products, let us get their goods. Let us trade with all countries in the world that have goods to send us. Let us exchange goods; let us barter goods, and then we can consider paying the difference with some kind of currency.

The idea of trade within the British empire is detrimental to real trade. In matters of trade England is not a friend; the United States is not a friend; France is not a friend; they are all competitors. If Canada has not the ability to sell her products in competition with those of England, to discuss with everybody the purchase of Canadian goods in preference to British goods, then it is useless to have a Department of Trade and Commerce. If Canada in matters of trade is to be like the little porpoise attached to the mother porpoise and following her through the seven seas, then let us abandon the discussion of trade and admit that we are just serfs without dignity, that we are not interested in the welfare and progress of this country.

Why do we have British preference conferences? They were just reminders of the old colonial trade policy when it was forbidden to Canada to trade with any country except England. When those barriers disappeared we had free trade with the United States, during which time Canada was more prosperous than she had ever been before or has been since. Why are we not realistic with regard to trade? Why do we think we have to trade only under the shade of Great Britain? Why do we not give every possible encouragement to our own trade commissioners and consuls general and free them from the influence of the United Kingdom ambassadors? One of the great errors made by the Prime Minister was when he said, at the time the consulate general was set up in New York, that the consul general would confer with the British consul general. What a mistake. Is there any other country in the world that does the same thing? Australia competes with England; New Zealand competes with England; South Africa competes with England. Every country, except small islands in the Caribbean seas or the South seas, is bold enough to face England and fight her in the markets of the world, and by doing that they are more respected by the merchants of London and Manchester and other English manufacturing centres than are the bloated colonials we have here who think we should creep under the petticoats of Britain to trade on the markets of the world.

Let us be realistic. I want the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be the big boss of his department, just as I want the minister of external affairs to be the big boss of his department. But the purposes of the two departments are entirely different. The aim of the Department of External Affairs is to keep Canada at peace with all the countries of the world, and the aim of the Minister of Trade and Commerce should be to boost the trade of Canada against every competitor, British, American, French, Japanese or that of any other country.

We should stop that false banking policy of advancing money to those who are to buy from us. It is the Canadian taxpayer who pays for these goods, and now our taxes are piled high just on account of those gifts that I was one of the few in this house to denounce during the war, for they were perfectly nonsensical. The Conservative party then led by the former member for York-Sunbury, right down to the last leader of the opposition, never said a word against those policies. They said, let us wait until after the war to settle accounts. Now it is after the war and the same thing continues.

I said to the leader of the C.C.F. party once when he was complaining about high taxation that he had no right to complain about high taxation because he was in favour of that prodigality which has been the cause of our high taxes and strikes and troubles throughout this country. That is that. We must be realistic and keep sentiment out of trade. I said to a Tory imperialist like Mr. Hanson that we should be economically independent of Britain in regard to trade. We may be politically dependent, if the parliament of Canada desires that; but even if we are politically dependent we must be economically independent of England. That is obvious, but a dyed-in-the-wool Tory, a Tory to the core like Mr. Hanson, had nothing to say when this question was raised by myself during the war in the House of Commons. Fanaticism then ran high; the thing was forced through the house, and it is still through. I hope that the minister will be independent of England in matters of trade and that all the trade commissioners and consuls general under him will not act in virtue of instructions that come from the officials of external affairs but will act under instructions that come from himself, and that they will be independent of the English ambassador and the English high commissioner and of every British official where there is no Canadian ambassador.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce has made enough sacrifices during the war and after the war to convince me that he wants to make a success of his job and that he wants to be just as successful as Minister of Trade and Commerce as he was as Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I wish him good luck. I hope that he will succeed; but he will succeed only if there are no obstacles in his way, no obstacles because of undue interventions by other departments and no obstacles coming from uncalled for and untimely sentimentality which is most prejudicial to Canadian interests. It has been prejudicial to Canadian interests in the past, but I hope it will not be prejudicial any longer because the policy will have to be changed. I hope that the minister will understand that I want him to succeed by all means, so that Canada's trade will be firmly established and have a chance to develop in order that once more we may see happy days.

Mr. MacINNIS: Surely this is old-time stuff we have been listening to, no matter how ferociously it is expressed. Surely it is nonsense today to talk about being economically independent in the matter of trade, particularly for a country like Canada. Surely it is nonsense to say that Australia and New Zealand are in competition today with Britain. Anyone who knows anything about trade knows that the trade of Australia and New Zealand is much more integrated with the trade of Britain than is Canada's trade. I venture to say that New Zealand to 75 per cent of her trade is dependent upon Britain. The people of New Zealand today are rationing themselves so that they can sell goods to Great Britain and buy goods from her. To talk today of carrying on a trade war against any country is the essence of nonsense. We cannot do that. The world is becoming aware of the fact that, instead of competitive trade, there must be co-operative trade. New Zealand and Australia are more dependent on world trade for their prosperity than is Canada; but Canada, because of the nature of her industry and her resources is tremendously dependent on trade with other countries.

If we made loans to Britain during the war, surely Britain paid for those loans with the blood and sweat and lives of her people. We did not give anything for which we did not get a return. As a matter of fact, Britain took the blows that would have ultimately fallen on us if she had not taken them. We ought to be proud to have been able to do our share.

There is no sloppy sentimentality in Canada's trade policies as I see them. Surely it is not sentiment to be realistic and to understand what must be done in the world we are living in. I am not saying this for the minister's benefit, because I am satisfied that he realizes perhaps much better than I do the necessity of co-operation in trade, and the need for building the economic resources of other countries so that they may trade with us.

Mr. HACKETT: I wanted to ask the minister something about the trade with China, and I wanted to say a word on trade with Australia. I understood that our exports to China were about $30,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, $34,984,000.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister mention two or three of the principal items? Are they lumber and cereals?

Mr. HOWE: No. The biggest item is wheat flour, $7,000,000; newsprint paper, $4,000,000; fertilizer, $3,000,000; copper wire, $2,000,000; wheat, $2,000,000; metal-working machinery, $2,000,000; railroad ties, $1,500,000; ships, $1,500,000; machinery and parts, $1,200,000; planks, boards, et cetera, $942,000; aluminum bars, $860,000; mining machinery, $758,000; air compressors and parts, $670,000.

Mr. HACKETT: I understood that a substantial item was armaments. That is what I really wanted to know.

Mr. HOWE: No, not in this list.

Mr. HACKETT: Is there any other list in which that would appear?

Mr. HOWE: No; about $1,500,000 might be considered armaments; that is all, out of $35,000,000.

Mr. HACKETT: Do the preferential agreements still obtain with Australia?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; no change.

Mr. HACKETT: Are sales to Australia still under the preferences which were negotiated in Ottawa in 1932?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I understood the minister to say that there was a disturbing falling-off in some of our external markets for foreign goods. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would it be correct that there is no such falling-off in the natural products markets, that that is still good?

Mr. HOWE: Natural products are in a worldwide short supply, so that if there is a drop in one market they are sold in another market. Necessity is driving all countries to buy raw materials to meet their requirements.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That leads me to ask this question. It seems to me that we talk a great deal about the cost of living and are all worried about it. I read a letter today which interested me, in which it was pointed out much better than I could do it, what seems to be the great trouble into which we have drifted. We have, unintentionally, of course, deprived the countryside of a great many of the people who should be raising food, and in plain words that is largely what is driving up the price of food. Are we out of balance? Have we by our policy so stimulated factory plant, and all that kind of thing, that we have drawn people by high wages into the cities and away from the business of raising food? Are we now in the position where we may find that some of these installations which we have built, no doubt in good faith, may get into trouble and not be able to manufacture their goods? On the other hand, those people who have been drawn into that kind of production might have been producing other things which we need so much at home and which we could also sell abroad. Will the minister tell me how much there is in that?

Mr. HOWE: It is a fact that we are raising far more food now than we ever did in pre-war days, and doing it with fewer men.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Not enough.

Mr. HOWE: Our farms are being highly mechanized, and the labour requirements of producing food are not nearly as high as they were. I know of nothing that is badly out of balance so far as demand and supply of food in Canada are concerned. Our surplus of wheat is less out of proportion than it was before the war, because our population is larger and our consumption is higher. Dairy products seem to be touch and go, but I think they always were. That is about the only marginal product that I know of.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister has mentioned dairy products. He may tell me that he is not the Minister of Agriculture. I know that. But I have endeavoured, and without success, to learn from the Minister of Agriculture what justification there is for the policy that has shorn the hills of the eastern townships of their dairy herds. The price of feeds and butter were fixed; the margin between the two was insufficient to enable the dairy farmer to live. If the minister can throw any light on that situation I shall be grateful to him.

Mr. HOWE: I am afraid we are out of the field and off the subject. I am not an expert on agriculture, as my hon. friend knows; I am a city man.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister mentioned the fact that there was a falling off in our exports of manufactured goods. Is it noticeable in any particular line? Perhaps the minister can enlarge on that a little bit. I would be interested to know in what manufactured goods there is a falling off in exports.

Mr. HOWE: There is a market for manufactured goods. If they fall off in one market we ship the goods to another market. Anything that Canada can manufacture today, with very few exceptions, can be sold in some market. But in speaking of a particular market such as Australia or New Zealand, there is a falling off in shipments of manufactured goods to those markets.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No over-all falling off.

Mr. HOWE: No; quite the reverse.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We still have a market for everything we can manufacture?

Mr. HOWE: Pretty well.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the minister want the committee to understand that there is a market for our manufactured goods outside the stimulated and bonused market, if I may use that phrase, to whom we have advanced credits? Are we not dependent upon those to whom we advanced credits to buy our surplus products?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no. Far and away the biggest market we have, and always has been for a great many years, is the United States. We sell in South America; we sell in the countries of Europe. A good many of them pay cash. Practically none of the credits is operative today. We are still selling our goods and expect to do so. We are an efficient country. Our goods are well priced for any market, we have been able to sell them, and we expect to continue to sell them.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the minister think we are doing all we can to keep up our good will in connection with our empire trade agreements, our commonwealth trade? Are we doing everything we can to keep that market? Before the war, Great Britain had assets overseas to the amount of probably £4 billion. Today she owes about £4 billion. This is the time when we should do everything we can, so far as the countries in the commonwealth are concerned, to keep the good will of those countries, so that we shall have their trade in the future. It causes me a little anxiety to know whether everything is being done to foster that commonwealth trade which has stood us in such good stead in the past. I visualize that with the aid of the commonwealth countries Great Britain will be back on her feet inside of five years and be as great a country as she ever was. I do not think she is done for by any manner of means. Are we doing everything we can possibly do to keep the good will of the British people and the good will of the people of the commonwealth?

Mr. HOWE: It seems to me that the record speaks for itself. When the war ended we lost no time in sending help to the United Kingdom and to our old customers in Europe. People talk about this stupendous help being given under the Marshall plan, ERP. Since the war, Canada has been extending relief to Europe, in proportion to our population, at more than twice the rate of the Marshall plan; well over twice. We have a record unequalled by any other country in the world. There was one purpose in it, and that was to aid in the recovery of the United Kingdom and in the recovery of our traditional customers in Europe. I am surprised that anyone would question it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have one more question to ask, and it is in connection with the ban which we have placed on certain goods coming from Great Britain. I spoke about this before, and the minister said it came under the Minister of Finance. For instance, I wonder if the people of Great Britain appreciate the reason—and if there is a reason I cannot see it—for the ban being placed on any of the goods that they can manufacture and send to this country. It is all very well to talk in millions of dollars; nevertheless plenty of $5,000 items count just the same. I should like to see that ban taken off British goods coming to this country. I see that ban as something that does not help to foster good will between the two countries. I never could see any real reason why that ban should be on goods coming from any member country of the commonwealth.

Mr. GREEN: What about trade between Canada and Japan? In February of this year the Vancouver Daily Province issued a leading article entitled, "MacArthur pledges speed-up of Canadian-Japanese trade." At that time they had apparently been in touch with him and he had made some statement with regard to the opening up of trade between Canada and Japan. What is the present position?

Mr. HOWE: All the trade with Japan is done through SCAP as they call it, or the supreme command, allied powers. It is the American military administration. We do a fair amount of business with the administration, but you can hardly call it trade with Japan. It is trade with the United States army in Japan.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister tell us what the approximate figures are?

Mr. HOWE: It is a small amount, covering coal, wheat and so on. We shall have the figures in a minute. It is a matter of a million or two, I think, on items such as coal and wheat.

Mr. GREEN: Sales?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Sales or purchases?

Mr. HOWE: Sales.

Mr. HACKETT: Is the coal from Vancouver island?

Mr. HOWE: It is from Alberta, and perhaps from Vancouver island. It goes out through Vancouver.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister has said that there has been no falling off of our export of our manufactured goods; that if we cannot send them to one country, there is such a demand that we can send them to another. Do manufactured goods include processed foods? The reason I ask that question is that I understand that processors of fish are having considerable difficulty in disposing of their products.

Mr. HOWE: I have referred to that matter several times. It is difficult to sell fish when every country in the world touches the ocean and catches its own fish. As they get back to normal, fish is the first item to suffer. However, fish from the maritime provinces is being sold and, as far as I know, at a good price.

Mr. HAZEN: I was wondering if the minister would make an exception in the case of processed fish.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend call processed fish "manufactured goods"?

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to know what the minister calls it?

Mr. HOWE: I do not call it that. The hon. member can call it what he likes.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister says he does not call it that. That is what I want to find out. When he used the phrase "manufactured goods" he did not include processed fish. That clears that point up as far as I am concerned.

I should like to ask the minister another question and to get an answer to it, if I could. I do not know whether I am quite in order but the question is this. I am informed that a certain make of automobile manufactured in Great Britain sells in the United States for approximately $1,300, whereas in Canada the price is approximately $1,800. What I should like to know is how this difference in price is explained? Why must we pay so much more for this car in Canada than is paid in the United States?

Mr. HOWE: I am not aware of the facts. I do not know.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HAZEN: No; just a minute. I have given the minister the facts.

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. member sure he has given me the facts?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes.

Mr. HOWE: Show us the documents. We get all kinds of these rumours.

Mr. HAZEN: I have given the facts as they have been given to me.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I know; but are they the facts?

Mr. HAZEN: Does the minister say that the facts as I have given them are not correct?

Mr. HOWE: I say that I doubt if they are correct.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HOWE: Before the item is carried, as I was asked in another session to table the list of availabilities, I might make a little statement on that subject preparatory to tabling the list tomorrow.

I have already given to hon. members the general headings used in these programs, and the information has also been made available to Canadian exporters through the medium of "Foreign Trade", the official publication of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I have previously expressed the view that it was not desirable to publish the quantities and dollar values because of their susceptibility to misinterpretation. I must emphasize that the quantities are estimates, and estimates only, of what we believe, given certain conditions, our exporters would have available for shipment to Europe. The quantities, however, depend on many factors: for instance, the weather where agricultural produce is concerned; the availability of steel where manufactured products are concerned; and also the extent to which manufacturers may have made prior commitments. Furthermore, the statement is not exhaustive. The important recovery items have been included in accordance with the specific request of the ECA, but information regarding a number of other commodities is being constantly made available to participating countries through our trade commissioners and to ECA officials in Washington through the Canadian embassy. With this emphasis, however, I am now prepared to table this statement which, I repeat, is not a forecast of our exports to these countries, but is an estimate of availabilities.

These estimates have not only been made available to ECA officials in Washington—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What is ECA? There are so many of these things that I have difficulty in identifying them.

Mr. HOWE: Economic co-operation administration. It is the Marshall plan; it is the operating part of the Marshall plan.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was not trying to be smart. We have so many of these things that I cannot remember them all.

Mr. HOWE: I know. I cannot remember them myself. As I say these estimates have not only been made available to ECA officials in Washington, but have also been sent to our Canadian government trade commissioners in each of the participating countries. The trade commissioners make this information available to the pertinent authorities in each of the participating countries who are responsible for drawing up their country's import requirements, and they invite these officials to indicate Canada as a preferred source of supply for those commodities which we know we can deliver advantageously and in competition with other countries. However, it must be realized that no one in Canada knows more about the availability of Canadian commodities than do Canadian exporters themselves; and the Department of Trade and Commerce has, therefore, repeatedly advised Canadian exporters not to depend entirely on government assistance, but rather to follow normal commercial procedures and sell their produce to European countries through their European representatives. If the commodities are such that they can be considered as recovery items, there is every likelihood that such transactions will eventually be financed by ECA dollars. It follows, therefore, that unless the Canadian exporter is attempting to sell that type of product which is recognized as a recovery item, it is not likely that he will obtain any direct ERP business. There will, however, be other indirect ways in which he will benefit.

I have here the printed list of Canadian commodities available to ERP countries which I will table on the orders of the day tomorrow.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. GREEN: I think the main commodities which were eating up our United States dollar funds were coal, oil, cotton, iron and steel; at least those are the four commodities set out in the advertisement published by the government last fall upon the announcement of the austerity program. Can the minister tell us what the position is at the present time with regard to imports of those particular commodities? Has there been any marked change in the quantities imported, or just what is the picture at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: Those imports depend on the economic activity of Canada, which is high.

Mr. HACKETT: Upon the controls, too.

Mr. HOWE: No. Those are necessary raw materials. For instance, we must have petroleum, and I am happy to say that the outlook for the future is greatly improved by the new discoveries in Alberta. The Leduc field may make a difference of as much as $100 million a year in United States funds by 1951, and that is encouraging.

Mr. GREEN: By 1951?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and progressively up to that in the meantime. As far as coal is concerned, our properties are working to full capacity. We are exporting a certain amount of coal for United States dollars, which helps to offset imports, but our geography is such that there is a limit on the amount of coal that can be used from western Canada in central Canada, and I would say imports of coal would be about the same this year as last year.

Mr. HACKETT: Steel must be down.

Mr. HOWE: The reason is we cannot get it. We are short of steel.

Mr. HACKETT: Short of dollars.

Mr. HOWE: We have the dollars to pay for it, but we cannot get the steel. It is in short supply.

Mr. GREEN: What about cotton and iron?

Mr. HOWE: Cotton depends on the activity in textile manufacturing, and it is about the same as last year.

Mr. HACKETT: We are bringing some from Britain?

Mr. HOWE: These are our basic raw materials and we have to have them.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any prospect of the development of iron ore in northern Quebec making a difference in importations from the United States? If so, to what extent?

Mr. HOWE: Steep Rock has made a difference. We produced over one million tons of iron ore last year. The Sault Ste. Marie Helen mine is stepping up its output each year.

Mr. GREEN: What does it produce?

Mr. HOWE: Around 600,000 tons, I believe; and of course we have a great potential in northern Quebec. The trouble is that it is difficult of access. It means a large investment in railroad facilities and harbour facilities before the product can be marketed commercially.

Mr. GREEN: How many years will it take?

Mr. HOWE: Three or four years of development work.

Mr. GREEN: Do the deposits there compare in extent with Steep Rock?

Mr. HOWE: They are much greater. They have proved up over 200,000,000 tons of iron ore already, and it is known that there are over 300,000,000 tons.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Good quality?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, 64 per cent hematite.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the minister any information about falling off in shipping in and out of the port of Montreal this season, and in and out of the port of Vancouver?

Mr. HOWE: Our Canadian fleet is busy, but I presume my hon. friend refers not to the Canadian fleet but to all fleets. The volume of exports this year is about the same as last, and I presume shipping would be about the same.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): One question about Steep Rock. Are we milling, or whatever the proper word is, that steel in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Are we not shipping concentrates across to the other side and buying steel back?

Mr. HOWE: That is not exactly a fair statement. Every steel company uses ore from several sources. Different ores are used for different purposes, and all ore that is mined around the great lakes goes into what is called the great lakes ore pool. We sell the ore into the pool and it goes to dealers who handle that ore. Some comes to Canada, but the larger part goes to the United States. It is good quality ore, sold for United States dollars. We either get the ore or we get the United States dollar equivalent which we spend to buy other ore. There is no great significance in shipping Canadian ore to a Canadian steel plant when you have a situation such as exists on the great lakes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The major portion does go south of the line in the form of ore or concentrates, or something of that kind, and we get it back here. What I have in mind is this. Where we have fuels in western Canada—I notice the Steep Rock people are draining another lake and hope to double their production within a comparatively short time—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member speak louder? I should like to hear what he is saying.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am glad you think what I am saying is worthwhile.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I always think what you say is worthwhile; you are from Alberta.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am getting flattery today; I got spanked the other day, I am glad to think these things alternate anyway. What I was saying was this. If we are to develop at Steep Rock, obviously they are not doing that with any small amount of ore, and is it not a possibility that, with the growth there which might easily be expected, and with fuel lying from that point not so far away, one might reasonably anticipate rather a large steel plant somewhere between those two bases of supply? That is not all imagination, is it? Is it not a possibility, the realization of which we can perhaps look forward to?

Mr. HOWE: It is a possibility, but my hon. friend knows that the Mesabi ore deposits back of the Duluth area have been coming through in great volume, and there is no steel plant near Mesabi, or near Duluth.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is running out.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and we hope that Steep Rock is helping to take its place. I do not know that it follows, because you have ore in the country, that you must necessarily have steel in the country. If you had a combination of ore and coal in the same locality, undoubtedly you would have steel manufacture, but it is difficult to imagine either hauling coal from Alberta to the head of the lakes or hauling ore from Steep Rock to Alberta or some intermediate point.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

462. Export permit branch, $124,260.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): When the import-export act was passed we had a statement from some of the staff, indicating the basis on which export permits were granted and the extent to which the ordinary conduct of business was being supervised by the officials. I wish the minister would say a word or two on that.

Mr. HOWE: There are two bases for controls; one is the basis of shortage. There are certain commodities we must keep in the country to an extent sufficient to keep our own economy going.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Notably?

Mr. HOWE: Steel is an excellent example. When it comes to permitting the export of steel in the form of manufactured goods we tend to give a preference to the most highly manufactured, for instance, steel for at least $1,000 a ton. Therefore we permit the export of steel in the form of locomotives and in various other forms—

Mr. HACKETT: Machinery?

Mr. HOWE: Machine tools, and agricultural machinery, which is a sort of border-line case. We do not get very much for steel per ton in agricultural implements, but they are badly needed abroad and we allow them to be exported. That, however, is the criterion. If someone wants to export tin cans we are not allowing them to do so. We do not allow manufactures which mean very little other than rolling plate into some form and sending it out.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Rails?

Mr. HOWE: No; nails are absolutely barred.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I said rails.

Mr. HOWE: We have rail capacity. It is a finished product made both at Sydney and at Sault Ste. Marie. It is one of the few products they can make; and therefore we allow them to manufacture into rails steel not required for other purposes. If there is an excess beyond the requirements of our own railways we allow it to be exported. There is very little exported, though. Most of the rails manufactured at both places are used in Canada.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I take it that the fact that there is a decrease in the item indicates that the business of controlling exports is not growing too fast. May I take it that perhaps it is actually lessening.

Mr. HOWE: We have taken a good many items off control, as they have moved into adequate supply. At the end of December we had 520 articles under control, and at June 15 we had only 466. The list is going down.

Mr. FRASER: Is fish on the export list? An article appeared in the Montreal Star, which stated that dealers in Puerto Rico or Costa Rica—I am not sure which it was, but it was one of those Central American countries —were complaining about the Canadian fish going to their country. It was coming in short supply, and they felt that this was because the people bringing it in wanted to keep the price up.

Mr. HOWE: There is not and never has been any export control on fish.

Mr. FRASER: I suggest that the minister's department should check that complaint.

Mr. HOWE: I shall do so.

Mr. SINNOTT: In view of the fact that several large pulp operators in Ontario are exporting raw pulp, is it necessary for them to get permits to do so from either the dominion or provincial government?

Mr. HOWE: Pulpwood, yes; manufactured wood pulp, no.

Mr. SINNOTT: Does the minister not think it would be more beneficial if that pulpwood were made into paper here, instead of the raw material being shipped?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT: Will the government take steps to see if it can be done?

Mr. FRASER: The Ontario government is doing it now.

Mr. HOWE: It means building more paper mills. They are being built right along.

Mr. CHARLTON: What is the situation with regard to the export of wheat, oats, barley and buckwheat?

Mr. HOWE: All wheat is exported and sold abroad through the Canadian wheat board. This being a year of a short crop, it is chiefly being delivered to the United Kingdom to fill an existing contract. Any wheat we have surplus to that is being sold in other traditional markets. Our difficulty is not to sell wheat; it is to find enough wheat to fill our obligations.

We had a short crop of coarse grains, and it was estimated that our supplies of oats and barley would not be more than enough to meet domestic requirements. We find at the end of the year that we have a small surplus of about ten million bushels of oats and about the same amount of barley, which at the present time is being sold in the world market at the best prices obtainable.

We have allowed rye to move freely. It is not a food grain in Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: It is a beverage grain.

Mr. HOWE: Well, not much of that, either.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No whisky is made out of rye now. Do not let us get this mixed up.

Mr. HOWE: Rye has nothing to do with rye whisky, I know.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is right.

Mr. HOWE: Flax seed has been under control, and under the international allocation. We dispose of our flax seed as directed by the international food organization. Just now we have a small surplus and are selling it freely in the world market.

Mr. CHARLTON: What about buckwheat?

Mr. HOWE: Buckwheat is not an export commodity. It is fed to hens.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is the department still charging for the permit in connection with coarse grains the difference between the Canadian and export prices?

Mr. HOWE: Where there is a pool, as there is in wheat, oats and barley, an equalization fee is charged where grain is sold to other than contract countries. For example, if a man wishes to sell oats in the United States he is charged the difference between the domestic price and the export price and pays an equalization fee. The money so recovered is put into the oats pool.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is he charged for his permit?

Mr. HOWE: He is charged the equalization fee.

Mr. McLURE: Out of the amount of this item I see that $98,400 is for temporary assistance. Would the minister explain why the expenditure for temporary assistance is about 90 per cent of the total vote?

Mr. HOWE: The branch is a temporary one. We hope that export controls are a passing phase of the Canadian economy. Therefore we cannot put on too many permanent employees to administer a temporary job.

Mr. BRACKEN: How much oats and barley went to the United States from this country last year?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry I have not that figure, but I shall be glad to make an announcement on the point when the orders of the day are called.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

Demobilization and reconversion—

407. Departmental administration, $1,009,992.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should think the coal problem comes under the departmental administration item?

Mr. McILRAITH: That is item 396.

Mr. HOWE: Under the rule we have followed, the hon. member may discuss anything he likes under the departmental administration item.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak about coal. From about the middle of March to the end of the month people in Ontario who were users of coal were still in a daze over the trouble they had to obtain it during the winter. I was one of those people. The problem of coal had a great deal to do with the recent provincial election. People were still exasperated over their inability to get coal, and from reading in the daily papers that they had better place their orders immediately for next winter's supply.

Quite a number of people in Ontario—I have forgotten exactly how many—got together and consulted with some gentlemen in Toronto about holding a dinner meeting here in Ottawa so as to bring before the authorities the absolute necessity for Canada to make every possible effort to produce coal in this country, particularly for use in the two central provinces. The other provinces either have coal or are close to a supply of it.

On April 28, as a result of the organization of coal users, a big dinner was held at the Chateau Laurier hotel in Ottawa. I have forgotten whether the chairman was there—

Mr. HOWE: I was not there.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know the minister was not; he sent me a note saying he could not attend. However, his parliamentary assistant was there. That evening 206 distinguished men from all parts of Canada, and two ladies, were there. Among those present were the vice-presidents of the two railroad companies, the head of the Bank of Montreal and many outstanding financial men. When the meeting was over many letters of appreciation were sent to me from all over Canada, because men were present at that meeting from all parts of the country. A delegation was there from the mayors' association of Canada. I want to deal briefly with what went on there in the hope that I can persuade the minister to make a gigantic effort in regard to coal, such as he has done in connection with other matters.

As far as I was concerned, I was so distressed toward the end of last winter that I decided to sell off my own properties. The problem of obtaining coal led simply to distraction. No one wants to be told that he can get only one or two tons of coal when he has buildings which require a lot of coal. Others were in the same position. The people in this central province of Ontario do not want to go through that horror again next winter, especially when we have the coal here in Canada.

I am not going to blame anyone because we cannot take care of our own requirements, but I wish to urge that we attempt to do so. We are only ten weeks away from the time when we shall again be burning coal. I do not know how much can be done in ten weeks, but certainly something must be done. Outstanding men were invited to speak at that meeting in the Chateau Laurier, men who were conversant with the problems of producing coal. I was sorry the minister was not there; but his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, made a fine speech. Among those present was an outstanding coal producer from Great Britain, Sir Albert Braithwaite, D.S.O., M.C. His pleasant demeanour and his manner of handling the problem met with general approval. I think he is a wonderful man.

This gentleman had considerable experience in the strip-mining of coal, the method used to mine soft coal in Canada, in Saskatchewan. He told a most interesting story about what he had done during the last years of the war. I should like to quote what he told that audience about strip-mining in Great Britain. He said:

> However, the results of the operation were these: We started in June, 1942, and in six months, starting from scratch, without any preliminary preparation, we raised 1,112,000 tons. This increased in the next year, 1943, to 4,672,000 tons, and in 1944 the amount was increased to 8,570,000. I could go on giving the figures for each year, but I should not want to weary you with too many figures. However the fact is that it has increased ever since, until this year we expect to raise by this method 15,000,000 tons of coal.
> I am very proud that during war time we were able to contribute 20,000,000 tons of coal at a critical time.

That was a remarkable achievement. I have just forgotten how much stripping they had to do, but my recollection is that it was somewhere from twenty-five to forty feet, just about the same amount they take off in southern Saskatchewan where they strip-mine lignite coal which is sold in Manitoba. A little further on, Sir Albert said:

> Working on this type of mining one does not require any underground miners, and you can get eight times as much coal per man-shift with proper machinery as you can from deep mining operations.

I have heard the hon. member for Cape Breton South speak of the difficulty they have in raising coal because of having to go down under the sea. After Sir Albert had said that he wanted to come to Canada and that if he were permitted to do so he would bring $1,000,000 with him which he had in New York and which would be used to buy machinery and in production, he went on to say:

> I wanted to do something in Canada. I have always wanted to do something on this side. I sent out two or three years ago a team of engineers to the province of Alberta to look at the coal out there—

That was to the Highwood area which has never been developed.

> —with a view to strip-mining it. They spent a long time in that province and made a very exhaustive survey. Those men came back to London with an extensive plan and with the practical drawings as to how they would obtain this coal. They have assured me that if I can get the machinery there, within six months I can be raising 3,000,000 tons, and that within eighteen months I can have an output of 10,000,000 tons per annum, from the particular sites we investigated.

I have no reason to doubt the statements made by that outstanding coal producer. His statements were substantiated at the same meeting by Mr. Mervyn Brown, whose company, the Alberta Canthracite Coals, controls a large area in Alberta where a tremendous production of coal is possible. That coal is just as good as hard coal. I saw some of the coal myself that had been shipped to Toronto, and I found it difficult to break with a hammer. Mr. Brown stated that they were taking coal out by the use of a steam shovel and that they had already shipped many tons to Ontario. The steam shovel simply dug into the side of the mountain.

Assuming all this to be true, and it is supported by figures; all that is needed is a spur line about fifty miles or more in length from the Canadian Pacific into the coal area.

Mr. HACKETT: How much would that cost?

Mr. MacNICOL: About $1,500,000 or $2,000,000. That does not mean anything when one considers what could be brought out and what it would save in United States dollars. At the present time we are importing $150 million worth of United States coal. We bring in four to five million tons of anthracite coal from the United States, mostly to the Ontario market. For that we pay $150 million in United States funds, plus the freight charges to bring it to the border, which totals another $75 million. There is a grand total of approximately $225 million in real United States coin that is paid out every year.

We would not be able to save all of that in a year or two, but the sooner we start to try to save it, the better it will be for our dollar situation. Even if Sir Albert Braithwaite could produce only two million tons of hard coal next year, it would mean a great deal. Some people in the department try to tell me it is not hard coal. I have read a report from the department, a report I do not like at all. It does not strike me as an honest effort—I do not mean it is dishonest—to produce Canadian coal for the Ontario market. If we can buy four million tons a year of hard coal from Alberta, what a tremendous business that would mean back and forth between Alberta, Ontario and Quebec, and think what it would mean in Canadian employment and in Canadian freight. The Canadian railroads now get only $5 a ton for hauling United States coal from the border.

Mr. HACKETT: How does the coal compare in B.T.U.?

Mr. MacNICOL: One hundred per cent. I have seen engineers' analyses, and they show that the coal is very high in B.T.U. and very low in ash, a good coal from every point of view.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And low in moisture.

Mr. MacNICOL: And low in moisture. I am hoping that the hon. member for Calgary West, who must know Alberta coal much better than I do, will support what I say in this regard. It is a No. 1 coal and would save the situation in the central provinces, and save also many millions of United States dollars.

The last clause of this report says:

The commission is convinced that if these ventures—

That is these two big mining areas in the Alberta foothills.

—result in the opening of new mines, the coals produced will exhibit marked friability, thus presenting serious marketing problems.

I do not think the man who wrote that knows the first thing about it. He was not talking about the coal I am talking about. I take the statement of those who have had to do with it. I take the statement of Sir Albert Braithwaite, who has no axe to grind except to help Canada produce coal. There is a lot behind this story, if it all came out, and it would be a sorry story if all I have heard is true.

At that same meeting a capable minister of this government, the Minister of Agriculture, made an outstanding address. I never heard a better one. I told him afterwards, "If you make an address like that you will sweep the Liberal convention." I am taking no sides in that, of course, but I do like to hear a man talk who knows what he is talking about, and he certainly knew what he was talking about that night. I am going to read what he said. I do not want any minister to think I am boosting the Minister of Agriculture; I am not boosting anybody; but I was overjoyed with his address, as the whole audience was. This is what he said.

I am not going to tell you how little was left of the money at the time that I took it over.

He was speaking of the money that was left when he was made minister of labour and resources in a former Saskatchewan government. He had used some money for the development of coal at Estevan, which was later shipped to Manitoba. It changed over the whole process of coal production in the west by substituting Canadian coal for Manitoba, for coal that formerly came from the United States. He went on:

We know a great deal of him—

He was speaking of Mr. Mervyn Brown.

—in the province of Saskatchewan as a promoter of the welfare of industrial development in the western part of Canada.

The Minister of Agriculture came out strongly in favour of developing these hard coals in the Highwood area for shipment to the central provinces. Like everybody else present, I was delighted with what the Minister of Agriculture said, because that is the program I had been advocating for years and years, to develop our own coal resources in Canada and exchange trade back and forth between our own provinces.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the long haul cause any trouble?

Mr. MacNICOL: No. The coal produced by strip-mining, including the haul, would sell in Ontario at $14 a ton, thereby saving the Ontario coal user no less than $5 a ton, which would amount to $40 to $50 during the winter, to the average householder.

Mr. HACKETT: Is it all rail, or rail and lake?

Mr. MacNICOL: All rail. When the coal is loaded on the train it comes through just as cheaply one way as the other.

I received a telegram from Mr. Greenfield, the day of the dinner, a former premier of Alberta, regretting that he could not attend the meeting. I should like to read it:

Regret previous engagements prevent acceptance your kind invitation to dinner Chateau Laurier April 28. Alberta possesses undeveloped hard coal in abundance proven by analysis and by tests in Ontario household equipment to be of a quality that can successfully compete with American anthracite in Ontario markets and stand up to outdoor storage without deterioration.

You do not need anything better than that.

I trust that the important gathering on the 28th will convince those present of the urgent necessity of developing Canadian coal resources both hard and steam coal for the benefit of Canadian citizens east and west and in so doing make a substantial and helpful contribution towards easing Canada's pressing dollar problem. The time for action is now—not years hence.

I take the same stand. An investment $1,500,000 to bring out millions of tons of coal from Alberta mines to save United States dollars would be a tremendous worthwhile investment for us, besides saving the coal user in the central provinces $5 a ton.

Reference was made to what happened between 1920 and 1925 when a policy of using coal from Alberta revolutionized coal usage in Manitoba and meant a changeover from ninety per cent of the United States coal that had formerly been imported, to Canadian coal. We can do the very same thing now if we only wake up and develop our own resources. If I were sitting in the minister's chair I would not pay a particle of attention to his coal board, if they say Alberta cannot do it; I would be all the more inclined to tell them to pick up their hats and move on. We want Alberta hard coal and we shall be glad to get Nova Scotia soft coal. By using Alberta coal, the coal user in the central provinces would save $5 a ton; the country would save millions in United States dollars, and freight would go to our own Canadian railways. In a few days time we shall have an estimate before us to make good a deficit of $85,000,000 on the Canadian railways. I am for giving that to them, but the speediest way of getting rid of those deficits is to bring more freight to our railways. One way is by letting them haul hard coal from Alberta to the central provinces, and then they will not need to come to parliament so often for fifty, sixty or seventy-five million dollars.

I know that others would like to speak on this question, and I should like to hear from the hon. member for Calgary West, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the hon. member for Lethbridge and others. Mr. Chairman, the time has come for action. Canadians must wake up. The money we paid in United States dollars for coal and freight on it from the United States amounts to $225 million a year. That would be one of the soundest ways for the minister to overcome his difficulties. If he gets my conception of this I know he will put his teeth into it and do the job. That is one sound way to save United States dollars, and to save Ontario coal users $5 a ton. One company—there are two of them—guarantees to deliver hard coal at not more than $14 a ton to Ontario users. This coal looks to me to be as good as United States anthracite. It is just as good in every way. It looks to me to be sound business to do that. Besides that it will give Canadian workmen employment.

I was sorry the minister was not there that night. His parliamentary assistant was there, and I am sure that he was impressed by Sir Albert Braithwaite and his statement. If we give him a chance by investing just $1,500,000, and build a short spur line not more than fifty miles long, he will at once invest $1,000,000, and the company would invest $1,000,000, to bring in a million dollars worth of machinery and build tipples, et cetera. That looks to me like sound business. I cannot understand why in the intervening two months the parliamentary assistant has not encouraged the minister, the coal board and the railways to get busy and do something for Canada, so that they will not be coming to this parliament over and over again for more and more money, but will be hauling freight produced in Canada, and spending the money in Canada.

I do not intend to go any farther, because I want others to say something on this. With all the strength I have, I plead with the minister to adopt a Canadian coal policy, of which one program would be moving hard coal from Alberta to Ontario, as well as Drumheller coal. I use it myself sometimes. I understand that all the Drumheller coal that can be produced can be sold in Alberta and the west and that the companies undertake not to try to sell any hard coal in the west but to send it to the east. There should also be a program of moving Nova Scotia coal to the central provinces. Let us have a national coal policy now—the sooner the better.

Mr. GILLIS: I started to speak on another subject on the Department of Trade and Commerce administration item. While I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Davenport, and agreed with everything he said on the subject of coal, I am going to reserve my remarks on that subject until we come to the item which has to do with the operation of the dominion coal board. I think my remarks on that subject would be more appropriate there.

The remarks I have to make tonight deal with a general situation that I think is not covered by any particular item, but definitely comes within the scope of the minister's activities. The reason I am going to make a short statement tonight is that I believe the recent increase permitted in steel calls for a statement and explanation by the minister.

In the light of present inflationary prices in Canada, I cannot understand how the minister or the government can justify permitting another price increase in one of our basic commodities that is going to have a terrific effect on the whole price structure in Canada. I do not think it was justified, according to the figures that I have seen. I do not think it was fair to the workers employed in steel plants who entered into agreements with their employers in 1946, a two-year agreement, and a slight adjustment in wages in 1948, which was done with the view of stabilizing the industry, trying to increase production, lower costs and in general stabilize that basic industry. This increase in steel permitted to the steel companies of Canada, without any consultation with the steel workers' union, was a breach of good faith. It definitely brings into focus what was proposed by the steel union workers when we met with them in the industrial relations committee early in 1946. At that time they proposed that a joint council for the industry should be established consisting of representatives of the union, of the industry and of the government, so that they might from time to time sit in and consider the kind of matter about which I am now speaking, namely, a general increase in the price of basic steel.

That was not done. They were not consulted. I consider it was a breach of good faith on the part of the government in at least not letting them know, in view of the reasonable stand they took in 1948 with regard to the adjustment of their wages.

It is unfortunate that we have to pick up our information in the press in matters of this kind. Announcements like these should be made in the house rather than through the medium of the press. I picked it up in a press report. I am going to place a few figures on record to bear out what I am saying. I do not think the minister can justify the increase at this time, on the basis of profits or production, to say nothing of the upward trend in prices generally in Canada. The price increase permitted is practically the same as was permitted in 1945. We know when that first steel increase was granted in 1945. In my opinion that was the increase which wrecked the whole price structure. That is my honest opinion. If steel had been held at that time, and controls had been maintained for another couple of years at least, we would not have got away to the inflationary spiral we are now in.

On rods there is an increase of $5 a ton permitted; plate, $12 a ton; bars, $5 a ton; sheets, $7 a ton; skelp, $12 a ton, or an average increase of $8.20 a ton on all steel, both raw and processed. I do not think the increase can be justified for this reason. Three of the large steel producers in Canada are Algoma, Dosco and Stelco. Their profits in 1946 were $4,306,928. In 1947 they were $8,608,447, a terrific increase. The total tonnage in 1947 was 2,155,261.

According to the Financial Post which is out ahead of time—I notice that the paper I have here is dated June 19, which is Saturday—the Dosco company at Sydney have broken all records in steel production. If that is true, it should lower costs and should eliminate the necessity for an increase in the price of steel. There is quite a story in the Financial Post, but I do not want to take the time of the committee in telling it. On the basis of the average increase of $8.20 a ton, the profits of the three companies in 1948, based on the production I have just mentioned, should be approximately $17,673,140.20, or an increase of approximately $9,000,000 in profits to the three operating companies.

How does the government justify its action in permitting the increase at this time? According to the press report that I have here, the government justifies the increase on the ground that it was removing the $2,500,000 subsidy that it was paying on steel. In the face of the huge surplus, the government had in the last budget, it saved the $2,500,000 subsidy that it was paying on steel. The government grants a price increase that will cost money to the consumers in Canada, because in the final analysis it is the consuming public that will have to pay it. The government throws back the load of subsidizing these companies—and it is a subsidy—to increase their profits by approximately $9,000,000, in order to save $2,500,000 by way of subsidy. It does not add up. The reason I am making the statement now is that I want the minister to make to this committee some statement as to why this increase is permitted at this time.

The timing is terrible right now when everyone you meet in this country is talking about the price of beef and the price of butter, with prices jumping five to six cents in a day on a pound of butter. When that kind of thing is going on, the minister must have some idea of the mental attitude of the people toward this kind of thing. What I am fearful of is this. I know how difficult it was in 1945 to get a settlement with workers in the industry; and then, being closely in touch with them because that large steel plant in Sydney is in my riding, I know how reasonable and fair those boys were in 1948 in adjusting their wages. The one thing they did not want was any disturbance in the industry. Their minds were made up that they would increase production, try to lower costs, and try to get some stability in the industry after the transfer from war to peace. I know that from going through the shops. I have letters from them in which they say, "Not consulted"; "We know nothing about it"; "This thing is thrown at us through the press. Try to get some information from the minister." They did not think this action can be justified.

I do not intend to say anything more about the matter. I have made my statement. I have set out figures there that I want the minister to try to clarify for the benefit of the general public in Canada. If that process is continued until that increase gets into farm machinery, enters into the cost of the things the farmer produces, and then is reflected in the general cost of living across Canada, it will be the thing that will break the camel's back. The people will revolt against that kind of thing. In my opinion that increase is not justified. The extra profits given these companies by reason of this increase cannot be justified. The removal of that $2,500,000 subsidy and the passing of it back to the consumers of Canada is something the minister must explain. I should like to have it explained.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be happy to explain the increase in the price of steel, but I can do it more conveniently on the item of steel subsidies when I shall have my officers here. If my hon. friend thinks we are free of subsidies in Cape Breton Island, I think I can open his eyes. I would just ask him this question. When the workers get a wage increase of from ten to eleven cents an hour, who pays it? It has to be paid by the cost of the product? When the freight rates are increased by 21 per cent, who pays that? It has to come in the cost of the product. When various other costs which I will enumerate to him later are increased, who pays it? My hon. friend seems to think it just comes from heaven or something.

He spoke of breaking the price ceiling and starting the spiral going in 1946. I agree with him absolutely. But what caused that? It was because the workers insisted on breaking the wage ceiling that we had at that time—

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOWE: —and taking an increase that we said at the time industry could not stand without starting the spiral of inflation. I call that to his attention. If he looks up the facts, I think he will find that two wage increases have been granted since prices were raised. You can stand only so much. The pressure got so high, something had to give; and up your prices went. I fought that increase in the price of steel for two years. I did everything I could to prevent an increase in price. You had so many influences, so many things happening at one time, that the lid blew off and an adjustment had to be made.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to say this to the minister, and he knows it as well as I do. By the granting of a wage increase, it does not necessarily mean an increase in costs. That can be offset.

Mr. HOWE: That is a beautiful theory—

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: —but you will find it is not true.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not a theory at all. It is proved in practice. I have given examples in the house. An increase in production can offset the increased cost of the wage increase, because it does not amount to a great deal in the over-all picture. We showed you where, in the Sault Ste. Marie plant, despite the fact that wages had gone up by about 25 per cent, production had increased so greatly during the same period that the increase in wages was wiped out completely by the increase in production. I think you will find that is true at the Sydney plant right now—

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GILLIS: —if the figures given in the Financial Post for increased production in that plant are true.

Mr. HOWE: What are the figures? How much have they increased production?

Mr. GILLIS: They have broken all records; doubled production and all that.

Mr. HOWE: Doubled production? Nonsense.

Mr. GILLIS: Do you get the Financial Post?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GILLIS: You should.

Mr. HOWE: I try to get more reliable figures.

Mr. GILLIS: It is most interesting.

Mr. HOWE: If you believe what it says.

Mr. GILLIS: There is a maritime section in it. I do not intend to carry on an argument with the minister. If he says he will answer when the proper officials are here with him, I shall be quite satisfied to have an answer then, because I am really serious about this. However I want to say this in the light of statements he has made just now. If you will examine the picture, I think you will find that increased profits for these corporations are largely responsible for the spiral of inflation we have in Canada now; and unless you start to control it, in my opinion you will not control anything.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to speak about Alberta coal, but before doing so I cannot avoid making a remark or two in reply to at least a few of the things that were said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and to one of them in particular. I have heard all my life about that last straw that breaks the camel's back. I should like to recall to him something that happened in his own union in Nova Scotia. An increase in wages was granted there, on the basis that the employees in those mines should increase their per ton per man production in that mine; and they did, may I say, increase it. But there are other things that may break the camel's back. One of them is this. Any industry which is unable to produce per man a certain volume, just cannot live. In that case—the one I referred to in his own union—that was proved conclusively.

Mr. GILLIS: Do you want me to explain how that was done.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would you mind letting me have a little go? Then you can take all the time you want to explain.

Mr. GILLIS: I want to clarify it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It was because of your men working harder and using their machinery better.

Mr. GILLIS: No, it was not.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Calgary West has the floor.

Mr. GILLIS: I am telling the hon. member he is absolutely incorrect; and if he does not want the matter clarified that is up to him. I can tell him how it was done.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You can give me theories, and no one can equal you in this House of Commons in theorizing.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not theory.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): A moment ago the hon. member said, Mr. Chairman, that an increase in wages did not increase costs.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, I am sorry if I misunderstood.

Mr. GILLIS: I said it could be offset.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member said it did not necessarily increase costs. But it does.

Mr. GILLIS: That is where lawyers are at fault. They do not know economics.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What I have said applies to every intake product in your operation, whether it be labour, goods or anything else. Simple arithmetic is still good, and that indicates that if your cost increases for the things you buy, then, of course, it increases the cost of your product. Never until tonight have I heard that principle departed from anywhere; and I had to come to this House of Commons, this place of such a high level of intelligence, to hear that principle disputed tonight.

With respect to our coal position, I am not unmindful of the fact that the hon. member for Davenport had an excellent dinner, and I am not disputing the fact that there is a problem to be solved in this coal business in my own province. I wonder if I might take a moment of the time of the committee to explain geographically what the whole situation is out there. On the prairies, practically wherever you drill holes in the ground, you will find lignite coal, which is a soft coal containing plenty of moisture, and of course when you ship that coal you ship moisture. It is rather hard to pay freight on moisture when it does not help to heat your house or anything of that kind. But going back into the mountains, on the eastern slopes of the rockies, you begin at the south and fortunately it does not extend beyond the United States border. I am not being unkind to the Americans, but fortunately for our economy it does not.

If you go along the Crowsnest pass a matter of twenty miles or so, you will find coal seams exposed through there, all of which are being worked at the present time, and that is what is know as bituminous coal. In other words, it is industrial coal used in our engines. Then you follow that line north, and the next place which is worked in quantities is at Nordegg, which is west of Red Deer. You go farther, following the same line pretty much, until you come to excellent bituminous mines in what we call the coal branch, which is the branch running out of Edson, south of Edson, Edson being roughly 150 to 160 miles from Edmonton.

There we have good bituminous coal. Of late years, particularly in the northern area, strip-mining has become something of real value. You see, Mr. Chairman, it is all right to talk about strip-mining at Estevan, Saskatchewan, because the over-burden is soil or clay or something of that kind. The operation is a simple one. You do not need to be a miner. You go out with a big scoop, and you throw the stuff to one side and scoop the coal out with the same kind of machinery and throw it into boxcars and ship it. Then you fill the trench you have made, and on and on you go. They have an over-burden that is rather heavy but easily got up. These better quality mines in the mountains have an over-burden that is mostly rock, which is difficult and much more costly to remove.

And so, up in that northern area, we have some strip-mining, but on account of physical conditions it does not amount to a great deal. At Cadomin they have new strip-mining and at present they produce five tons to one with deep-mining or shaft-mining. Anyone therefore can readily see that that operation is a comparatively cheap one.

That coal varies greatly in that sweep from south to north. Some of it will coke. They are coking, and they are using it at the International at Coleman and a good deal at Michel, the Crowsnest Pass Coal Company property some miles further away. Then you come to Nordegg, immediately west of Red Deer, midway between Calgary and Edmonton, about 100 or 200 miles. It is right in the middle. There you have good coal, but it is so fine that they have had to put in a briquetting plant, and briquettes are produced because they mix with this very fine coal in order to have it made useful in the running of locomotives. The product is almost completely sold to the railways.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

At this place, on these rivers which are southwest of Calgary, and of which the hon. member for Davenport was speaking, there are two rivers coming out; one is the Sheep river and the other the Highwood river. They rise in the Highwood range close together and then spread, one going through Turner valley; and the Highwood, which is farther south, goes through High River, the Sheep into Highwood, and the Highwood into Bow, and that ends the confluence of the waters there. The mine which the hon. member for Davenport spoke about is on the Sheep river which is directly west of Turner valley.

The other property or mine, if you like, is on the Highwood river, and I would think the distance between the Sheep river mine, which we know as the Burns mine, and the other on the Highwood river, which we know as the Ford mine, is about twenty to twenty-five miles. I am guessing, but I would think there is continuous coal between these two mines.

When I speak of continuous coal, I have no personal knowledge of the mine which has been discussed tonight. All I know is hearsay. But this other property on the Highwood I have visited. I have been there and stayed for days, and there are five seams on that property which I have seen, varying from five feet, which is the narrowest strip, to forty feet in width. I do not know how high this chamber is; probably it is twice that height, or something like that. Conceive, Mr. Chairman, a seam of coal half the height of this chamber. I have seen them mining some rather thick seams, and the only way they can do so is by building benches in it. In that way they take down the coal.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Davenport say—at least I got the impression from what he said—that this coal may be mined in lumps. That may be so, but one thing I know about the Highwood end of the picture, that is the Ford property, is that it is coal which is very friable. It breaks up into fine particles when it is mined. We also know that in your market here in the eastern provinces, in Ontario and Quebec, you have been used all your lives to dealing with Pennsylvania coal which used to come in pieces which were about half the size of an egg and were bright and shiny black coal. That was years ago. Even from observation of coal cars as I ride in the trains, I know you are not getting that now or anything like it. You are not getting the Pennsylvania coal you got here some years ago.

I think I should say I know something about the heating quality of this coal on the Highwood. I was there with the chief engineer and he asked me to watch him and time him. In the cabin we had a round little stove. It was not a Quebec heater but an ordinary little stove made of tin, I thought, or thin iron. At night he put in the stove a shovelful of what appeared to me, used as I was to Drumheller coal, to be lignite, which is mined in big shiny pieces as big as you want. He put that in at eleven o'clock at night. I never was a very early riser, and I was not then. But at ten o'clock in the morning there was the grandest little cone of very hot fuel under the ashes in that stove that one could ever see. So let no one have any doubt about the heating qualities of that coal, or about its ability to maintain a fire overnight.

I now come to something of which I am not sure. We hear of lignite, bituminous, subbituminous and anthracite coal. I know all about B.T.U.'s. One B.T.U. is the heat required to raise a pound of water one degree, if my memory serves me correctly. But to most people the difficulty is this. Is that coal an anthracite? The division is an artificial one. I am not sure about this; but I do not think we have any generalized term, such an anthracite, which would apply to a given coal. In other words, if your volatility, your lack of moisture, your lack of ash or your British thermal units—B.T.U.'s—are of a certain quality, it means that this coal is just as good as the coal over there which it is said has those various qualities within the coal itself.

A coal commission sat for some considerable time. Two of the members came from my own province. They were, and are, close personal friends. The man Brown, to whom the hon. member for Davenport referred, appeared before the hearing. It is part of the record of that commission that the solicitor for Mr. Brown wrote to the commission saying he would not appear further before them on account of his objection to two of the members at the commission—those two being my two personal friends I mentioned a while ago.

I am sorry that attitude was taken. I am not giving an ex post facto judgment. I am not saying anyone was right or anyone was wrong; but I do know that this coal which the hon. member for Davenport has introduced into the discussion tonight is not thoroughly considered in that report. Let me say in passing that I am not placing fault or blame anywhere. Certainly I am not in any position to do that. But at one time my office acted for this Highwood end of the picture, which was supported largely by a man from New York, one from Cincinnati and one from Montreal. I may say it is years since my office has been solicitor for this concern. It is now largely in the hands of Mr. Sweezey of Montreal, and they are trying to build their own railway.

But what I am saying is this, that from the observations of an amateur like myself, I have no doubt whatever as to the heat there is in this coal. I have no doubt whatever as to its ability to maintain a fire for a long time. That, of course, is not true of our lignite coal. I also have no doubt whatever as to its ability to be stored for some considerable time because, as I say, it is almost completely lacking in moisture.

Many of us have travelled up and down our railways in years gone by, and we have seen immense piles of coal stored along the rights of way of both the railway companies. It is true that occasionally we have seen some smoke rising, and we know there was fire down there. But the railway people will tell you that that loss is practically nothing; it is only one in ten or twenty piles that ignites at all. The loss is nothing because, as the minister well knows, coal burning without oxygen, or practically without oxygen, makes very little progress.

We have mines afire out there in the bituminous field. For example, the first Cadomin mine has been afire for many years. True, they abandoned it; and yet the progress of that fire has been practically nothing. It is a very, very slow process. That is the mine—and let me say, it was a wonderful mine—which was on the top slope with the railway right below. They never had a tipple; all they had was a coal chute. They mined it and took it down onto the cars. Then the thing caught fire. What did they do? They went up top, took two creeks and diverted them into the mine, closed it up at the bottom and shut the works off for a month. When they were through, the fire was still going, so they abandoned it and went across that great ravine the minister knows is there to do their mining on the other side.

What is all this about? I am not going to repeat what was said by the hon. member for Davenport, except to agree with him most heartily that this coal program, particularly for people in eastern Canada, is one of the most serious problems with which you are faced. I can remember the minister telling us, either last year or the year before, when we had some difficulty with shipping, that he was trying to get cars to bring it around the end, or through the middle, to avoid water transportation, to keep this province of Ontario from being cold, or even from freezing.

So I repeat what I said before, that to me this matter is one of grave concern to the dominion. We should not be dependent upon a foreign country; and not only upon a country, but dependent upon the facilities of transportation in which strikes, lock-outs or anything you like to mention may take place, which in the net result may freeze—perhaps that is too strong a word—but may destroy our industry and even cause physical suffering to people in this part of the country.

It may be said, and I think figures can be brought to show it, that to ship coal from Alberta to Toronto is a big item. Until now, we have regarded the rate as prohibitive. I am not one of those who will argue that a railway should haul coal for nothing, or at a loss. My ideas are completely the opposite of that. I was down there many years ago when Sir Henry Thornton and Sir Edward Beatty were the presidents of those railways, at the time when we got one of the first subventions—I think that is what they are called—for hauling coal from the west and from Nova Scotia.

I do not know where a subvention should end. I do not think even the coal commission which sat some time ago made any calculation, loose as it may be, from which it could be considered that they tackled this coal problem as a national problem, rather than as one pertaining to individual sections of the country.

It does seem to me that for many reasons we should have a national coal policy. I say this now to the minister, so that I shall not be misunderstood. What I am saying is not by way of placing blame upon him or his successor. I do not mean it in that way at all. What I do mean is this: Never—or perhaps that is too strong a word—rarely has a greater challenge been put to the ingenuity and imagination of the government and of parliament than is involved in the solving of this problem. There is no question about the quantity, but we do seem to be up against a geographical difficulty which, until now, we have all regarded as something which we could not cure.

I realize that perhaps the competition, if we could get the coal in here, would not come so much from the Pennsylvania product, which in my judgment is nothing like what it used to be as far as heating value is concerned. I have been told that in Kentucky they are opening up some new mines which will produce coal nearly as good as this which can be laid down at Hamilton for from $9 to $10 a ton. I do not know the truth of that, but I heard it from the solicitor for the coal commission, who is also an old friend of mine.

I do not want to be critical of failures or successes of the past. The minister who is in charge of this matter has accomplished many things, not only as a minister of the government but in his own business. He has constructed elevators where people thought it would be almost impossible to construct them. He overcame physical difficulties not much greater than we meet with here. I am sure that the Dominion of Canada is big enough not to think I am talking about making another dollar or two for our coal operators there. The great difficulty in that section of the country is to get miners. There are not enough of them today to take care of the markets we have at present. I realize that that is true, but I realize also that there never yet was a business in this world possessing any initiative or imagination which, when greater markets offered, did not find means of increasing production in order to satisfy those greater markets.

After all, the incentive that drives men to doing more is not altogether a matter of money. Man can use only so much money; he cannot take it away with him to the place where most of us are going, because it might be melted or something of the sort. The thing that keeps the world moving is initiative and ambition to accomplish things. That is true of every man who has any right to be in business.

I know that applications have been made to the minister for the building of a railroad. I know that will not be an expensive proposition because, while it would be right in the mountains, the route to Highwood is through a broad valley and there would be little rock work. I am not advocating with my poor knowledge, and it is poor knowledge, that this government should give somebody $1,500,000 or anything of the sort; but I do think that since the problem affects the interests, not only of the people here and out there but of the railroads themselves, with assistance and direction this end can be ultimately accomplished.

You do not need to worry about the two railroads. Although the Canadian National have never built on it, they have a right of way through Okotoks where the railroad would leave the Calgary-Macleod line. As a lawyer I procured the land for them, so that I know what I am talking about. I want to support the hon. member for Davenport who has shown such a wonderful interest in the western country. He has urged that the government should regard the maintaining of industry in Ontario and Quebec, should regard the keeping warm of the people in those two provinces, as a major problem, to say nothing about United States dollars or anything like that. I am perfectly certain that if the minister and those who advise him really put their minds to it the impossibility of the thing will become, first a possibility and then finally an accomplished fact.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the information that has been given on the coal situation, but I suggest again that the proper place for me to discuss this subject will be when we reach the item concerning the coal board. The officers will then be here, and I shall have the figures at hand. However I think I should say a word about the remarks of the hon. member for Davenport, which have been referred to by the hon. member for Calgary West.

Everyone seems to think this is a new discovery. I think it was thirty years ago when I first visited the Burns leases in southern Alberta. I have been on the ground and, like the hon. member for Calgary West, I know the area. Everyone has known about the Burns leases; they have been on the market for about that long.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Quite true.

Mr. HOWE: About three years ago an intensive drive was put on to market these leases. A gentleman who is perhaps a veteran among promoters, who has been promoting ever since I knew him when he was mayor of Medicine Hat, has been promoting this property, and has spent, I think, easily $100,000. He has had full-page advertisements in newspapers throughout Canada and has put all the effort on it that could possibly be put on it.

It is suggested that the reason he cannot promote this is the necessity of a railroad spur costing $1,500,000. Surely that should not be a large item in a project of that kind. Other people have gone into Alberta and located coal leases and built railroads with their own money. They opened up prosperous mines and they are operating today successfully and have been for many years. New mines are started up from time to time, and in fact several new mines have been started up in the area while this promotion has been going on.

If this were the only coal in Alberta there might be some reason for the government getting excited about it and thinking that perhaps this situation was different from any other. It might be thought that this was a different proposition; but the government has never built a railroad to a coal mine; such railroad lines have always been built and paid for by those interested.

As, however, the hon. member for Calgary West has said, the production of coal in Alberta is not limited by the capacity of the mines to produce; it is limited by the number of coal miners who can be employed in the industry. If we had fifty per cent more coal miners we could get fifty per cent more coal. Opening up this coal mine will not produce any new coal, because the miners who might thus be employed would probably come from existing mines.

Mr. MacNICOL: This would be strip-mining.

Mr. HOWE: There were other strip-mines started in Alberta during the war.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They are all out on the prairie.

Mr. FRASER: Soft coal.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not hard coal.

Mr. HOWE: It is not hard to open up a strip-mine in Alberta.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not hard coal.

Mr. HOWE: Let us analyse the thing. Hard coal is not something that is subject to anyone's guess as to whether it is hard or soft, as to whether it will burn a long time or a short time. It is subject to absolutely accurate analysis. When an industrial firm buys coal it buys it on a B.T.U. basis and knows its value down to the last nickel.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I agree with all that.

Mr. HOWE: This is a low volatile bituminous coal of good quality, but it is just that. We have reports in the office which give the B.T.U., which are all right for that class of coal. My hon. friend resents this coal being called friable. The hon. member for Calgary West knows this coal and referred to it as friable. That quality of coal is always friable.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I spoke only of the south end of Highwood.

Mr. HOWE: That bed is continuous, I think, from Highwood. We had samples in the office. The coal is all right. There is nothing wrong with the coal or with the project, and if someone went in there and built a railroad and developed it he would do very well.

There is another fallacy in discussing this matter, and that is talking about coal in Alberta as being analogous to coal in Toronto. The two have no relation. In the war we had a serious shortage of domestic coal in Toronto, and I went out, regardless of expense, to bring western coal to Toronto. I think I used every transportation facility that was available, and the best I could do was to bring about half a million tons of Alberta coal to Toronto a year. We have never moved as much as one million tons of Alberta coal into Toronto in a year, and unless the railway facilities are tremendously increased we never can. Coal is bulky and a carload of coal does not contain many tons. The number of carloads involved in moving a million tons of coal presents a serious transportation problem.

I wish we could get enough Alberta coal to fill the requirements of the prairie provinces. Today the Alberta mines are working to capacity twelve months in the year, and still we have to move United States coal back as far as Saskatoon.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There is an answer to that. Alberta coal during the war has gone west. Before the war we moved it into two divisions beyond Kenora.

Mr. HOWE: I know it was able to fill that market, but with the great step-up there has been in industry, all the coal the mines are producing is being used and we are still moving United States coal into Saskatoon. Let us take care of the western problem before we get down to Toronto.

The government has a policy of subventions; that policy is sufficiently elastic and will be administered so that all the coal that Canada can produce both east and west will be moved to Canadian markets, and we will move it as far as is necessary. But that is not a national coal problem. Alberta is capable of a far greater production if we could get more miners. All the coal that Alberta can produce will be marketed. It is not a question of this particular mine being related to some particular market. We can find a market without any difficulty whatever for all the coal we can produce.

The only difficulty with Brown and his associates is that they want someone else to furnish the money to develop a mine. They had the idea and they want someone else to furnish the money. That is laudable, but the problem is theirs, not the government's. I am quite frank in saying to my hon. friend that I did not go to his dinner because I thought I would be getting a free meal under false pretences, for I have been following that situation for two and a half years.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was not the answer the minister gave me. I thought the minister told the truth always.

Mr. HOWE: I am telling the truth today. Sometimes one has to be diplomatic. As a matter of fact, I went out of town.

[Mr. Howe.]

That is the situation about the leases. It is not a government problem. If there were a great national interest involved in that particular operation it might be a government problem. But it is just like any other mine. There are lots of mines in Alberta and in the mining sections of British Columbia which are very much alike. They may mine a slightly different coal in one mine, but not very much different from the coal that is mined in the others. The problems are the same, and we think this particular project should be treated like all other projects in the area. That is a plain statement of the situation.

Mr. MILLER: What railway facilities are short for moving this coal?

Mr. HOWE: Boxcars.

Mr. MILLER: No steel cars required?

Mr. HOWE: If Alberta coal was shipped in open cars it would absorb moisture, and if it absorbs moisture, it will not store, so that it is no longer a domestic coal. Boxcars are required to move it, and the movement comes about the same time as the wheat movement. Both wheat and coal are moved in the autumn of the year, the coal before the heating season, and the wheat after the harvest, and they compete seriously for the same type of railway equipment.

Mr. GREEN: Could coal be brought around by ships through the Panama canal any cheaper than across Canada by rail?

Mr. HOWE: I would not think so. It is a long haul from the coal mines to the Pacific coast, six or seven hundred miles.

Mr. HACKETT: There is coal on Vancouver island.

Mr. HOWE: Just enough to keep Vancouver island warm.

Mr. GREEN: There is coal in northern British Columbia.

Mr. HOWE: But it all involves movement. We have no trouble in marketing the coal that is brought to the Pacific coast. We deliver coal to Japan and South America. I do not think you would bring it through the Panama canal to eastern Canada, because you can market it nearer home.

Mr. MacNICOL: I accepted Sir Albert Braithwaite's word. He is an outstanding coal producer. I accepted the statement he gave us about the number of tons he could produce with machinery and equipment and his willingness to bring in the necessary machinery and invest $1,000,000 of his own money.

I thought that was a pretty fair offer. The money is lying in New York and he is willing to bring it here, but he does not feel like building a railway too.

Mr. HOWE: There again we should be clear on that. I met Sir Albert Braithwaite. He is a contractor. His business is to strip-mine coal, just as the business of a building contractor is to erect buildings, and he expects to get paid for his work. He expects to put $1,000,000 worth of equipment on that property and expects someone to pay him for operating it, which is fair enough, which is like any other contractor would do. But I was not greatly impressed with his offer, so far as showing confidence in the property was concerned. There is lots of coal there, the seams are thick, and it is a fine mining proposition. I wish somebody would go in and develop it, but it is not a job for the government.

Demobilization and conversion—

408. To provide for the liquidation of contracts, including commitments of previous years related to the acquisition of assets operated by the department or an agency of the department; and for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $500,000.

Mr. HACKETT: I want a little information from the minister with regard to contracts which have yet to be liquidated. I should like to know what were the principal amounts paid and how far the contracts have been liquidated.

Mr. HOWE: I was going to make a statement on the work of the department; and since this is a disappearing department. I think I should do so. I have a preamble dealing with the greatness of the department which perhaps I can omit. This shows the present position pretty well.

The Department of Reconstruction and Supply resulted from the amalgamation at the end of 1945 of the wartime Department of Munitions and Supply, and the Department of Reconstruction, established in June, 1944. The department was considered necessary to discharge certain temporary functions in connection with the liquidation of Canada's war effort and the re-establishment of Canadian industry on a peacetime footing.

The department has been in process of dissolution from the time of its establishment. The department's staff and functions have continued to contract during the past year. In some cases this has taken place because work has been wound up. In other cases functions of a more continuing nature have been transferred or are in the process of transfer to other departments.

The liquidation of the war program involved four responsibilities: (1) the termination and settlement of war contracts and the renegotiation of war contracts where participating firms had realized large profits; (2) the liquidation of surplus war plant and other forms of war equipment; (3) the dissolution or other disposition of crown companies established during the war, and (4) the disposition of controls in existence at the end of the war.

This is what my hon. friend was asking for. On the first point, as indicated before, war contract cancellations, in the closing phases of the war and immediately thereafter, involved $2,500 million. In many instances these cancellations have not involved any claims, but where claims were made they were dealt with by the contracts settlement board of the department. This board has now approved claims for the settlement of these contracts for about $290 million, which represents about 96 per cent of all the claims submitted. In other words, we have about four per cent of the claims still to be settled.

The department has also been engaged in the renegotiation of contracts made during the war. The result of these efforts was to reduce war contracts by over $475 million, of which all but $80,000,000 have been fully settled.

On the second point, the liquidation of surplus war plant and other equipment has been in the hands of War Assets Corporation. This corporation has now disposed of most of the war surplus in the hands of the Dominion of Canada. Sales of war surpluses brought $430 million to the treasury by the end of May, 1948. However, it will still take some more time to clean up the tag ends of disposal work.

On the third point, the disposition of crown companies established during the war has been completed by now. Of the thirty crown companies operating under the Department of Munitions and Supply at the conclusion of the war, twenty-six have now been liquidated. The four which continue to function on a peacetime basis in the same or altered form are: Canadian Arsenals Limited; Polymer Corporation Limited; Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited; and Wartime Housing Limited, which has now been absorbed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These companies have hitherto been reporting to parliament through the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Since this portfolio is a temporary one while the crown companies have continuing functions to perform, arrangements are being made to have these crown companies report to parliament through the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Similarly, the dominion coal board, established last year, will henceforth be reporting to parliament through the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

On the fourth point, we have abolished all controls formerly exercised by the Department of Munitions and Supply and its successor, the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, except for allocation controls over steel, timber and building materials and the use of priorities to assure an adequate supply of building materials to priority projects. The administrators of the controls are finding it possible, by negotiating with the interested parties, to obtain the desired allocation of materials on a voluntary basis. These informal arrangements work very well and are much more desirable from the point of view of both the government and industry, and give a flexibility that could not otherwise be obtained. These allocation controls are continuing on a temporary basis, and we hope to dispose of them as soon as economic conditions warrant it. We are hopeful that this will be possible at the time when the Department of Reconstruction and Supply is folded up.

In connection with the administration of the foreign exchange regulations brought into force on November 17, 1947, an emergency import control branch was set up in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply to control the import of capital goods. Personnel for this division have been recruited within the department, and in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act, provision was made for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to administer import controls over capital goods. This is an advantageous arrangement, because it permits the co-ordination of import controls with the work done by various commodity officers in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Therefore, as soon as administrative details can be dealt with, the personnel of the emergency import control branch, now with the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, will be transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The rest of the statement refers to other continuing functions which can be dealt with as we proceed with the estimates.

Mr. GREEN: When is it expected to dissolve the Department of Reconstruction and Supply?

Mr. HOWE: Some time between now and the next six or seven months.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister has said that the cancellations amounted to $2,500 million; that settlements had been made of 96 per cent of the claims, and that $290 million had been paid out in settlement of these claims. Can the minister mention a half dozen claimants to whom the largest amounts were paid?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: This is a brief statement from the settlement officer of the contracts settlement board.

The following is a brief summary of the operations of the contract settlement board up to May 31, 1948, which may be treated as supplementary to the report dated May 29, 1947, submitted by the secretary of the board.

The board received a total of 3,252 termination notices up to 31st March, 1947. All contracts current at that date were taken over by Canadian Commercial Corporation.

The board has received a total of 3,707 claims, of which 455 were cancelled or withdrawn, leaving a balance of 3,252 claims amounting to $301,183,453 to be dealt with.

A total of 3,251 claims amounting to $289,142,367 have been approved, or 96 per cent of amount claimed. The value of the uncompleted portion of the terminated contracts was $2,479,339,070, and the total of claims approved represents 11·6 per cent of this amount.

One claim for approximately $2,037,411 is awaiting final review. The production under this contract for maintenance kits for wireless sets was only recently completed. Included in the amount approved are seven claims by one contractor totalling $1,148,397, which are being amended as result of further audit investigation. There is also one claim outstanding awaiting further audit investigation which may take some time.

Payments have been made to contractors in accordance with amount approved, and the contingent liability due to revision in the claims is comparatively small and should not exceed $150,000 in all.

Mr. HACKETT: I suppose the minister has the names of the companies and individuals to whom the $290 million was paid?

Mr. HOWE: I am sorry I did not hear that.

Mr. HACKETT: I say the minister must have the names of those companies and individuals to whom the $290 million was paid.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but I do not think I should put it on Hansard. The amounts have to do with the state of completion of the contract, when the claims were made and would be large in one case and small in another.

Mr. HACKETT: This is public money. It being public money, Mr. Chairman, I thought it would be a matter which might be required to be made public.

Mr. HOWE: It is public money. If the hon. member asked for the total expenditures to any one contractor, I would say that is all right. But when you ask for termination claims of a contractor, that is a matter of coincidence. It has no relation to the total work done or anything of that sort. It just represents the stage of the contract at the time the war ended.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, but it represents a payment made of taxpayers money. I submit that the minister should make available the names of the persons and companies to whom these amounts have been paid. Will the minister have that at the next meeting?

Mr. HOWE: There are approximately 3,000 of them. I do not know that I want to put them on Hansard. There is nothing secret about it; if my hon. friend wants to know about any particular one, I shall be glad to give him the information.

Mr. HACKETT: I asked the minister if he would give the names of the six to whom the largest amounts had been paid.

Mr. HOWE: That is on the termination claims?

Mr. HACKETT: No.

Mr. HOWE: Or on the contracts?

Mr. HACKETT: The minister said the contracts aggregating $2,500 million had been made and 96 per cent had been settled for $290 million.

Mr. HOWE: No. I said contracts totalling $2 billion—

Mr. HACKETT: Two and a half billion.

Mr. HOWE: —had been cancelled.

Mr. HACKETT: And that claims had been made arising out of the cancellation.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: That 96 per cent of the claims has been adjusted, and that to effect the adjustment $290 million had been paid out by the government to the claimants.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. HACKETT: I asked the minister for the names of the six companies or individuals to whom the largest payments had been made.

Mr. HOWE: We will give you the names of the six.

Mr. HACKETT: And the amounts.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I do not think there is any particular objection to that.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BRACKEN: Will the minister tell the house what the business is to be for tomorrow?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We shall go into supply at the outset and take up the following departments: reconstruction and supply, external affairs, labour, mines and resources, national revenue, public works, and agriculture, but I cannot state in what order we shall proceed with them.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister not say which will be first?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I do not know which minister can be here at eleven o'clock.

Mr. HACKETT: I understood that it would be external affairs. Is there anything to the contrary?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes, that was my understanding. But we thought we would get through with mines and resources. That has been up seven times.

Mr. KNOWLES: Reconstruction and supply.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Reconstruction and supply. That has been up seven times.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is an important department.

It being ten minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

533. District administration, $3,805,120.

534. Rehabilitation services, $4,161,080.

535. Treatment services, $38,402,200.

547. Last Post fund, $125,000.

549. To provide for the cost of administration of soldier settlement; British family settlement; general land settlement, and Veterans Land Act, including engineering and other investigational planning and subdivision expenses that do not add tangible value to real property, $5,285,703.

550. To provide for the payment to the government of the United Kingdom on account of losses under the 3,000 British family agreement of August, 1924, and the New Brunswick 500 British family agreements of August 4, 1927, and August 27, 1935, $25,000.

551. To provide for the payment of grants to veterans settled on provisional lands in accordance with agreements with provincial governments under section 35 of the Veterans' Land Act, 1942 (as amended by order in council P.C. 2122, dated 13th April, 1945), and payment of grants to veterans settled on dominion lands, in accordance with an agreement with the Minister of Mines and Resources, under section 35 of the Veterans' Land Act, 1942, as amended (P.C. 1550 of 18th April, 1946), $3,000,000.

552. To provide for the payment of grants to Indian veterans settled on Indian Reserve lands under section 35A of the Veterans' Land Act, 1942 (as amended by order in council P.C. 2122, dated 13th April, 1945), $800,000.

554. Hospital accommodation and facilities, $7,750,000.

548. Grant to Canadian Legion, $9,000.

555. Campaign stars and medals, including cost of distribution, $2,500,000.

Veterans Affairs—Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

561. To provide for protection of security—soldier settlement, $40,000.

562. To provide for purchase of land and permanent improvements; cost of permanent improvements to be effected; removal of encumbrances; stock and equipment; refunds of surplus to veterans (section 19); and for protection of security under the Veterans' Land Act, $50,000,000.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

440. Departmental administration, $272,600.

461. To reimburse the Canadian Commercial Corporation for expenses incurred in purchasing materials, supplies and equipment, etc., on behalf of the Department of National Defence under chapter 51, statutes of 1947, $480,000.

462. Export permit branch, $124,260.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

407. Departmental administration, $1,009,992.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, June 19, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificate of the election and return of the following member:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO RELEASE FUNDS CONTRIBUTED AT EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works, for the Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Department of National Defence Act to release from the consolidated revenue fund certain moneys which were contributed to contingents of the Canadian officers training corps established at various educational institutions throughout Canada by the members thereof by way of assigned pay and otherwise and by other persons.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

REMOVAL OF TIME LIMIT IN APPLICATIONS FOR CERTAIN PENSIONS

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to remove the time limits in which an application for pension in respect of death may be made under parts I and X of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

GRASSHOPPERS

DISTRIBUTION OF POISON IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question, either of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture, or of the appropriate minister. What steps have been taken by the federal government to assist Saskatchewan in combating the serious scourge of grasshopper infestation which is destroying thousands of acres of prairie crops?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Minister of Agriculture, who is in Saskatchewan, considerable quantities of poison have been flown in from the United States, and are now being distributed.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are right, there.

COMMUNISTS

PRESS REPORT AS TO INVESTIGATION IN CIVIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice with respect to a press dispatch appearing yesterday to the effect that some investigation was being made in the civil service with regard to communist propaganda. I should like to ask whether that is so, and what is being done, and in particular whether a statement made in the house last February by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) to the effect that meetings were being held in Ottawa, including members of the civil service, designed to sabotage the service in case a call should come from overseas, has been investigated. Is there any foundation for that statement?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not read nor have I seen the news item in question. I did notice a headline—I believe it was in the Montreal Gazette—but I did not have time to read the article; therefore I am not in a position to answer the hon. member's question. I doubt whether I am the minister to answer it. Of course the question which relates to meetings to be held in Ottawa would come under the jurisdiction of my department.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Was any investigation made of the statement?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall give consideration to the answer which ought to be given to the hon. member's question. I doubt whether I should give an answer as to any investigations being made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister say that investigation in the civil service is or is not taking place? Surely as the head of his department he knows that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall give consideration to the answer which should be made to the hon. member's question. As usual, he gave no notice of his question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Notice is not required in a matter such as this.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to ask a supplementary question, so that the minister may answer it when he is answering the question of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on Monday. Can he say by whose authority the questionnaire now being circulated in certain departments was prepared, and will he give some explanation as to the form in which it was drafted? It does seem to me that this question about "his uncles and his cousins whom he numbers by the dozens" is a silly way of dealing with a serious matter.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR RECODIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Justice be good enough to say whether any special provision has been made for the recodification of the criminal code? I heard what he said the other day when we were discussing the revision of the statutes, but I do not see in the bill any provision for this recodification.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): No provision was made in that bill for the recodification of the criminal code. As the hon. member knows, recodification of the criminal law is proceeding rapidly all the time. Extensive amendments are being made every year, but no special provision has been made for a complete recodification of the criminal code.

RAILWAYS

REFERENCE TO PASSENGER SERVICE BETWEEN OTTAWA AND TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JULIAN H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to use his best efforts, in conjunction with the Canadian Pacific Railway, to improve the day coach service on the different trains operating to the capital of Canada. At the present time some of the oldest coaches owned by the railway are travelling from Toronto to Ottawa. They are not air-conditioned. I hope that an effort will be made to ensure that railway transport serving this area shall be in keeping with the status of Ottawa as the capital of Canada, which we all hold so dear.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

Demobilization and Reconversion—

408. To provide for the liquidation of contracts, including commitments of previous years related to the acquisition of assets operated by the department or an agency of the department; and for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $500,000.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the right hon. gentleman the information which last night he said he would make available?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I expect to be able to give it as soon as my officers arrive.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the minister give us any further information about the four per cent of the claims from cancelled contracts which are still outstanding? Is litigation between the department and the claimants pending at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: Referring to the earlier question, the ten largest claims were as follows:

Canadian Car and Foundry Company (aircraft)	$18,802,764
Fairchild Aircraft Limited (aircraft)	6,185,886
Chrysler Corporation (motor vehicles)	2,094,388
Ford Motor Company of Canada (motor vehicles)	14,591,767
General Motors of Canada Limited (motor vehicles)	9,975,479
Montreal Locomotive Works Limited (tanks)	4,881,588
R.C.A. Victor Company Limited (wireless sets)	10,054,530
Northern Electric Company Limited (wireless sets)	3,313,566
Canadian Pacific Railway Company (gun contract)	2,824,731

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister outline briefly the method followed in determining the adjustment?

Mr. HOWE: The contract was terminated as of a certain date, an inventory is taken and a complete audit of the books of the contractor made by the treasury audit staff. The surplus inventory is valued and arrangements are made to move it from the contractor's plant for government account. The amount of the balance owing to the contractor is regarded as an appropriate claim.

Mr. HACKETT: Who was the arbiter who determined what the amount was in each instance?

Mr. HOWE: The department and the treasury officials.

Mr. HACKETT: Was it a matter of determination by the department, or was there something in the contract that enabled the minister or the department to determine what was owing, or was it a matter of arbitration or agreement?

Mr. HOWE: The contract was terminated, the contractor filed a claim for work in process and for materials on hand for the contract, and the government sent in its treasury auditors to check the contractor's accounts. Officers of the department who were familiar with the contract were also consulted. A claim was adjusted more or less to the satisfaction of the contractor and the government—certainly to the satisfaction of the government—and after that the claim was paid.

Mr. HACKETT: Was the adjustment made by virtue of some section in the agreement?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; each agreement contained a termination clause setting out the conditions under which the contract could be terminated.

Mr. HACKETT: In that way ninety-six per cent of the claims have been disposed of?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. There are a number of claims outstanding—five or six with one company—but the amount in dispute in connection with all claims is less than $500,000, although payments outstanding are more than that. We have had certain claims audited, and the contractors have challenged the government audits. In some cases a re-audit is being made in the light of the contractor's representations. At the moment there is no claim in litigation. We settled one yesterday that threatened to be in litigation.

Item agreed to.

409. Reconstruction projects, subject to allocation by the treasury board, $1,000,000.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. HOWE: Under the government's high employment program a reconstruction fund was set aside to take care of spotty unemployment in certain areas. If a serious unemployment situation developed, funds could be allocated to various departments of the government in order to proceed with needed public works in the area. As employment has been high, it has been used only to a limited extent.

Mr. GREEN: To what extent?

Mr. HOWE: There was a survey of the St. Lawrence waterway project, $63,000; a survey of the Red Deer river project, $107,000; a survey of the South river project, $120,000; reconditioning and altering of M.V. Huascaran, now the S.S. Beaverbrae, for the carriage of immigrants, $300,000. The actual expenditures last year under this vote were $591,419.21.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister stated that the purpose of this vote is to develop projects in sections of the country where employment may be spotty, but he went on to say that in view of the high level of employment across the country it has not been necessary to use it. I notice that the surveys that were made were in Ontario and the west.

[Mr. Howe.]

I cannot accept the minister's statement that there is a high level of employment in all parts of the country, because that certainly is not true in the maritimes. It is evident that the maritime provinces have been neglected completely as far as expenditures under this vote are concerned. The committee of reconstruction of this house functioned in 1942 and 1943 and brought in a comprehensive report dealing with projects that it regarded as necessary in the aftermath of the war in order to keep a high level of employment. That committee recommended the carrying out of one project in Nova Scotia having to do with the strait of Canso. That recommendation was accepted, and I am wondering why a survey has not been made.

This matter has been passed on to the Department of Transport, and yet this particular vote is provided to relieve any unemployment situation that might exist. I expect to see very little done by the department which now has the matter under consideration. I submit that if this vote is used for the purpose for which it was intended, this particular matter should receive serious consideration by the department of reconstruction.

Mr. HOWE: A survey of the strait of Canso has been made, and studies have been prepared of three alternative solutions of the transportation problem. However, it seems to be impossible to obtain agreement between the government and the local and provincial authorities as to a solution that will be acceptable to all parties. The project is in good hands as far as this government is concerned. At the moment there is a commission sitting on it made up of three engineers, one appointed by the province and two by the federal government. I dare say this commission will throw new light on the subject and great things will result.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think there is any disagreement as far as the provincial and local authorities are concerned. They are unanimous that the job should be done. The difficulty is with the engineering department of the federal government. I think one of the main difficulties which developed in connection with the project was the tying-in of the realignment of the railroad from that point to New Glasgow. That would add terrifically to the cost. I ask the minister, who is an engineer, to give the matter consideration, and to separate the tunnel, causeway or bridge from the railway project; it would then come within the terms of this vote.

I think the reason for the attitude of the Department of Transport is that railway realignment was tied in with the bridge or causeway or tunnel project across the strait of Canso. I strongly urge upon the minister that he consider the bridge project separately under this vote. He himself has already said that the purpose of the vote is to relieve unemployment in certain areas where it is spotty. Department of Labour statistics show that in the last three years four thousand people have been moved out of Nova Scotia alone to relieve its unemployment situation. Personally I think that bad policy. The people of Nova Scotia today are more or less in the category of displaced persons. Instead of moving the unemployed from Nova Scotia, an endeavour should be made to find employment for them there and to develop this country from coast to coast. It is hard for me to understand the necessity for bringing in a large number of displaced persons from Europe so long as there is unemployment in a large area of Canada. The policy is all to the good from a humanitarian point of view, but it requires re-examination from the point of view of unemployment of our own Canadian people.

I again ask the minister to consider separating the bridge project from the realignment of the railways, because they do not really go together, and see whether the Department of Reconstruction cannot co-operate with the Department of Transport on the bridge project. It would go a long way towards relieving unemployment in that part of the country, and would demonstrate to the people of Nova Scotia that at least one section of the government is thinking in terms of something east of Montreal. In the maritimes the people are acquiring a complex that in the eyes of the government the area east of Montreal is not Canada. Once in a while mention will be made of Halifax and the national harbours board, but there is a stretch of territory three hundred and sixty-five miles long east of Halifax that seems to be ignored by this government. I sometimes wonder when we are discussing national questions in this house whether members know their geography and realize that there are sections of Canada whose people are entitled to consideration from the government other than in the matter of paying taxes.

This is a reconstruction post-war project. I speak of it now because the purpose of this vote is to relieve unemployment. This project was recommended to the house and approved. I do not think much more information can be gained than is now available in the large return that was tabled the other day. It contained report after report by engineers, letter after letter between departments of government, the opinions of coal company engineers and of government engineers. The feasibility of the project and the necessity for it have never been questioned. The only thing about which there was a difference of opinion was the cost, and I do not think that should be considered at all in a project of this kind. In building such a structure you are creating new work and doing something for coming generations.

If the pioneers of this country who built the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways had thought just in terms of money, had allowed money to be the dominant factor, we would still be without railways. We still pour millions of dollars into the C.N.R. because that railway is a national necessity, and this bridge project should be looked upon in the same light. Money is only a medium of exchange to be used to get things done. The government should go ahead in co-operation with the provincial government and spend some of the taxpayers' money in creating new wealth in this country by proceeding with this bridge project, which coming generations could look at and say: The government in office at that time certainly recognized when they built these improved facilities that there were generations still to come. As it is now, we are using the same old equipment that we had seventy-five years ago, and the government is spending another five or six million dollars in perpetuating that antiquated equipment. It is a waste of money.

I think the minister knows that the island of Cape Breton produces one-third of Canada's basic steel, and it has to be shipped across that strait, which proved to be a bottleneck during the war. When the St. Lawrence river was partly closed because of enemy submarines, equipment had to be provided to unload and transport the coal up the St. Lawrence, at a cost very nearly as much as a permanent bridge would cost. That was done because there was an emergency; the war was on. Today I am thinking in terms of linking up that part of the country with the rest of Canada. Even if the bridge or causeway should cost $54,000,000 —which I doubt, and which engineers who have submitted estimates of cost also doubt— we should be building something for ourselves and for future generations. It would create employment and help to develop that part of the country so that people would have an incentive to come there and invest their money.

The one thing that militates against the development of the maritimes is the lack of transportation facilities. This bridge project was recommended unanimously by a committee of this house which was charged with examining post-war projects that were necessary and of national importance. This is one of them.

When the minister has a responsibility I know there is no ducking of the issue with him. One thing I like about him is that he puts the cards on the table face up, and if he undertook this responsibility and gave an opinion on it based on his own knowledge, I would be quite satisfied to accept it. But I am not satisfied with all the quibbling and manoeuvring and manipulating that has gone on with regard to these surveys and borings since 1901. As one member of the house who has given a lot of thought to the subject and read the reports of the engineers pro and con, I am convinced that the project is feasible. It will not cost too much money, and it is the direct responsibility of the government, and of the minister, under this vote, as a post-war project.

Mr. HOWE: Let me say this. The Minister of Transport brought down an engineering report from the officers of his department. That report contained a recommendation for improving transportation between the mainland and Cape Breton island. It is only because of local protests that that work is not under way today. I suppose that people who are not prepared to invest five cents in the enterprise can bring down suggestions for the next fifty years, and nothing will be done. If the project could be reduced to reasonable proportions, it seems to me we could get on with it and give the island of Cape Breton transportation facilities equal to the requirements of the situation.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the minister mind telling us where these local protests come from?

Mr. HOWE: I could tell the hon. member the names of the people who have come to me in delegations, and to the government in delegations, but I do not know that it would improve the situation. They have come from the province and from the locality. Nothing that the government proposes is any good. If that situation could be remedied, perhaps we could get on with the project.

Mr. GILLIS: The reason that I press the point, Mr. Chairman, is that I hold in my hand documents which have been sent to me representing the whole opinion of the community.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: They are not insisting on a tunnel, a causeway, or a bridge. They demand that the project be built in accordance with whatever plans the government may have; that is all. I have read engineering reports in the returns that I have, and the opinions of engineers who are competent. They do not doubt the feasibility of it. I am surprised to think that anybody locally would object to the government going ahead and making a permanent crossing there in accordance with whatever views of it they may have themselves.

Mr. HOWE: At the moment a commission is sitting on the project. Why? Because it was demanded by the province and by the local interests. I presume that the report of the commission may not satisfy everybody, and someone will demand something else. If the people there would cease making this a political football, and try to get some practical result there, I think they would have no complaint about getting on. Certainly, if I were the responsible minister, so long as the controversy raged I would do just what the government is doing—wait for the opinion to crystallize on some particular method.

Mr. GILLIS: I resent the remark of the minister that this is being made a political football. I do not think he intended that, because the reverse is true. I know that every shade of political opinion in Nova Scotia today, particularly on the island of Cape Breton, is organized into a permanent organization known as the Canso Crossing Association. There is no political opinion in that body. They are meeting weekly, and they represent the whole section of the country. They write to me. I know who they are politically, but that does not enter into the picture at all. It is one thing on which the people of that section of the country are solidly united.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member will agree that the local organization demanded another report from a board of engineers which is now sitting. The hon. member will agree with that?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, for this reason—

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing we can do until the last demand is fulfilled and the report is made by the board of engineers.

Mr. GILLIS: The reason they demanded that should be well known to the minister. Perhaps he does not know it, because this has not been under his wing. I think it would be further advanced if it were. He would build the bridge.

Mr. HACKETT: He will build it before we adjourn if the hon. member is not careful.

Mr. GILLIS: Why did they demand the board of engineers?

Mr. HOWE: Because they did not like the last one, and I am sure that after this report is brought down they will demand another.

Mr. GILLIS: First, the board took a whole year to find out how deep the water was, and spent a lot of money on that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: The Minister of Transport made a report to the house. They knew how deep the water was in 1901 because the Waddell Hardessy Company made a survey. After the borings were completed the minister reported to the house. His report was to the effect that it was not considered financially feasible. The cost was too high. That report led the people of Nova Scotia and myself to believe that as far as the government was concerned it was out; that the government was not going to touch it. That was further supported by an appropriation in the estimates of the Minister of Transport's department for improvements to the existing facilities costing $5,000,000, plus all the maintenance costs. When I saw the improvements there, and the new ferry, it led me to believe, as it led the people to believe, that the tunnel project or the bridge or the causeway was finished, that it was not going forward. That did not satisfy the people. It did not satisfy me. That is why they demanded a board of competent engineers. I think it came from the Premier of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOWE: They have that.

Mr. GILLIS: They have the board of engineers now. What I am suggesting to the minister now is that under this vote he should endeavour to separate the realignment of the railways from the project itself, which would take away that frightening cost, and decide on a permanent crossing, based on that project alone, rather than allow the matter to rest completely with the transport department. I suggest that he exercise his influence on this department and try to have the project come under the vote having to do with reconstruction, relief and employment, which is a necessary project in Nova Scotia. I suggest that he use whatever influence he has to separate the costs. In my opinion what has retarded the whole project has been the hooking up of the realignment of the railways. That is where the Minister of Transport became involved.

I am not going to argue any further with the minister. I know he agrees with me a hundred per cent, but he just cannot say it publicly. I ask him to give it consideration.

Mr. QUELCH: I notice that this item includes the cost of survey and engineering work on the Medicine Hat irrigation project and the diversion of the Red Deer river in Alberta, and the South Saskatchewan. Can the minister tell the committee just what is the status of the Red Deer river diversion project? Is it being held back as a project to provide employment in the future, or, on the other hand, is it the intention of the government to go ahead as rapidly as possible just as soon as men and materials are available for the work?

I know that a small project in connection with the larger one is being carried out this year, but it would be dependent upon surface run-off water for irrigation. Unfortunately in that area in the extremely dry years there is very little run-off, with the result that at the very time when water is most needed for irrigation it is not available. We can never expect irrigation in that area to be a success until we can obtain water from the rivers in the extremely dry years. A tremendous loss of wealth is occurring in that area on account of drought. For the past three years the greater part of that area has been under the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme. Although there was a heavy run-off this spring, complaints are already coming in that crops are drying up. The federal government is having to put out large sums of money in that area for prairie farm rehabilitation, and in certain years feed has to be shipped in. This irrigation project would provide feed lots so that the area could be largely self-supporting. In addition it would provide for an additional population of around 30,000 people.

It is generally agreed that this irrigation project would make the area largely self-supporting, thereby relieving the federal government of a large bill of expenses. Is it the intention to proceed with the project as soon as men and materials are available, or is it being held back as one of the relief projects to provide employment in the future?

Mr. HOWE: The project is in the hands of P.F.R.A. The department merely allocates certain funds from this vote to permit P.F.R.A. to go ahead with the survey. When the time comes to proceed with the project, appropriations will be made from the P.F.R.A. vote in the usual way. Only the Minister of Agriculture can give the information asked for.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Minister of Agriculture within the last few days did give some information in regard to the South Saskatchewan river project; he said that $110,000 had been spent during the year on survey proceedings. The total amount of expenditure for the coming year, according to the estimates, is to be $1,000,000. I should like to find out what projects particularly are in the mind of the government, how that expenditure of $1,000,000 is to be made, and how it is to be distributed.

The South Saskatchewan river project, according to the present views of the Minister of Agriculture, cannot be proceeded with for a period of two years. I think it should be proceeded with now. Extensive exploratory and engineering work has been done, but the government's attitude is that the work shall not go ahead. Is the minister able to say how much of the $1,000,000 will be expended, or is to be expended, this year?

I wish to bring to the minister's attention another project in Saskatchewan which, if properly developed and encouraged, would attract to that province many tourists who today are not coming in. I refer to Watrous lake, some ninety miles east of Saskatoon, a lake which for over two hundred years has been recognized by the Indians living on the plains as possessing peculiar medicinal qualities. In the last few years that lake has gone back because of drought and because the springs that ordinarily feed it have been covered over by an incrustation of chemicals resulting from heat and evaporation. Is that the type of project which the department of reconstruction would consider a proper one on which to expend moneys under this item? I am not asking for the expenditure of money on anything but self-liquidating projects, and I suggest to the minister that this is one that would pay large dividends in increased tourist traffic and in the numbers who would come from various parts of the United States for treatment in this lake.

About three years ago the minister stated that his department had plans ready for public projects and was prepared to go ahead on short notice. He said that particular attention would be given by his department to projects designed to develop basic industries and to press forward vigorously, improvement in transportation and the opening of northern regions. I would ask him what is being done to carry out the views he then expressed.

Today our only hope for the development of the north country is through the instrumentality of private enterprise. In Saskatchewan—and I am not entering into any controversy on the subject—no government can afford to invest risk capital in exploratory work for the development of our natural resources. In fact, as far as gas and oil development is concerned, that has been turned over by the government of Saskatchewan to private interests. We all realize that governments, however great the potentialities in natural resources, cannot afford to risk the taxpayers' money on projects without knowing for certain that they will actually return dividends.

There is great risk in the development of these resources. Recently I noticed that the total amount of return to private companies in Alberta since the development of the oil resources in that province has been $55,000,000, while the total amount expended in risk capital since oil was first discovered there has been $65,000,000.

I should like to know what the government intends to do during the coming year to open up communications with the north country, so that opportunities will be available to private enterprise to go in and develop. We need in Saskatchewan, as in the other western provinces, the opening of roads and the development of power, which after all, in the northland, must be a matter of government expenditure—as in the Yellowknife district by virtue of legislation introduced the other day and now, I believe, passed by parliament.

What plans has the minister to encourage the development of the eighty-five per cent of our country which is largely undeveloped today? I do not think that any government can enter into that development but I believe that one of the responsibilities of the minister, as head of this department, is the surveying of the country. Indeed, he himself said three years ago that these were his plans, and then, a general survey having been made, funds would be advanced on behalf of the state to the end that opportunities would be made available to private companies prepared to risk their capital in the uncertain development of our resources.

My questions therefore are these: (1) How much will be expended this year on the South Saskatchewan development? (2) Does a project such as I have mentioned, the one at Watrous lake, come within the purview of this estimate? (3) Will the minister give the country the benefit of his experience in the matter of the expansion and encouragement of development of our natural resources, to the end that in our north country we shall give to private enterprise the opportunity which too often is denied it because of the costly expenditures private enterprise would have to undertake to make these resources accessible?

Mr. HOWE: This $1,000,000 refers to no known project at the moment. If the project were known, it would not be included in this vote but would be in a special item. This vote is to meet unforeseen conditions. The vote was originally $5,000,000 and was reduced to $1,000,000, because we have learned over the years that in times like these there are not many unforeseen situations that have to be met apart from those provided for through the normal estimates. The drawings on the fund have been small. We have started projects where some unusual situation made it imperative that no time be lost.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How much was drawn out of the fund last year?

Mr. HOWE: I gave the figure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, but I am asking for it again.

Mr. HOWE: $591,000. Watrous lake is wholly in the province of Saskatchewan. Any development of the type indicated must be sponsored by the province. The same remarks as I made regarding the Red Deer apply to a dam on the South Saskatchewan river. It is a project which is being carried out by the P.F.R.A. Certain expenditures were made for borings last year, and money was appropriated from this account. But this year and in the future, appropriations will be in the estimates of the P.F.R.A.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No part of the million dollars will be used on the South Saskatchewan project?

Mr. HOWE: Not unless an emergency arises which indicates that it should be so used.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What does the minister mean by an emergency?

Mr. HOWE: Some necessary and unforeseen expenditure that the government believes is sufficiently urgent to warrant an appropriation from this vote. The South Saskatchewan is one of the most difficult engineering problems that has ever been tackled in this country. Part of the problem is to build a high earth dam on material that has no known bottom. In building grain elevators in that country we used to drive all the piles we could get, of as great a length as we could get, build on it, load the elevator, say a prayer and watch it settle a few inches. You cannot do that with a dam. You must find something to put a dam on in order to make the project feasible. That is involved in the present exploration. It is no easy problem. However, it is being tackled by the best engineering skill that can be made available.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Do any of the engineers in the minister's department make reports on this matter?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Or make any investigation?

Mr. HOWE: No. We do on occasion, but not on this particular project. It is too big a project for casual engineering. It requires a special staff.

I think that answers the question. Was there another one?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What about the northern area? What is being done there?

Mr. HOWE: Where the province has shown an interest in an area, we sometimes render assistance in opening it up. A case in point is the road from Alberta into the Yellowknife region. The road has been built, or is under construction, connecting Alberta with the Northwest Territories. That road within the Northwest Territories is being paid for by the federal government, and some assistance has been given to the Alberta section of the road. The federal government is just completing a power plant in the Yellowknife area. A bill has been before the house at this session to set up a power commission. Ordinarily it is the job of each separate province to develop power within its boundaries. That is a job the provinces are glad to undertake because it is usually a profitable operation. But in the Northwest Territories the federal government is the government, and it is carrying out there the duties that would ordinarily be carried out by a province if that area were included in a province.

With regard to northern Manitoba, some important discoveries were made in the vicinity of Flin Flon. There again the government is giving some assistance to the province in building a road to open up the area. Certain assistance has been given to British Columbia in opening up certain areas.

Mr. GREEN: Which ones?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say offhand. It would not come from this estimate or this vote. The votes were made in the usual way. I cannot say which ones. The Department of Mines and Resources will be able to tell my hon. friend that.

Mr. POULIOT: Construction is made more difficult because of the difficulty in getting cement. Some builders have told me that last year the Canada Cement Company closed a manufacturing plant in Ontario, and that at least one million bags of cement would have to be provided from the province of Quebec in order to fill the gap. I wonder if that is true. I would ask the minister, who must know about the matter, for some information with regard to the closing of the Ontario plant of the Canada Cement Company and the possibility of securing cement by those who intend to build houses. At the present time it is most difficult for those who are building to put in the foundations of any building they are constructing. I would be grateful to the minister if he would give us some explanation about the matter.

Mr. HOWE: The position of cement is vastly better this year than it was last. The addition to the plant of the Canada Cement Company in Montreal has been completed and is in full operation. The addition to the cement plant at Belleville is in full operation. The addition to the Exshaw plant is in full operation, I believe; in fact, I am sure it is by now. I think the capacity has been expanded—I hesitate to give the amount—by something of the order of a million barrels a year as compared with last year.

Mr. POULIOT: Was one Ontario plant closed last year?

Mr. HOWE: Only for repairs or expansion. All the cement capacity of the country is operating, and I am told by the industry that it is expected that there will be plenty of cement this year.

Mr. LENNARD: There is a plant at Lakefield which has been closed for some years. Is it to be reopened?

Mr. HOWE: If the plant has been closed for some years, the chances are that it could not be reopened.

Mr. GREEN: Last night the minister stated that the department of reconstruction would be wound up within six or seven months. As I understand it, one of the principal functions of the department has been to take a look at the country as a whole, from a broad view, and to decide where projects will be undertaken. I think that was a useful job. But what is to happen when the department folds up? Is some other department of the government to take on the function of viewing the picture across the country as a whole and deciding where this help should be given? That of course is important, not only from the point of view of furnishing employment in bad times, but also for the long range development of the country. I think it is important that we should know just which department of the government is to carry on this useful work once the department of reconstruction folds up.

Mr. HOWE: The department of reconstruction was formed for the purpose of looking after the transition from war to peace. We feel that that work has been accomplished. However, there are certain continuing functions which we believe should be merged into the permanent plan of operation. Two branches were concerned with the work suggested by my hon. friend. One was the economic research branch, which studies the figures collected by the bureau of statistics, and also collects figures independently and prepares reports from time to time on the state of the country, calling attention to any situation that requires special attention. The other was the public projects branch whose duty it was to encourage self-liquidating or necessary public projects, and to have them available whenever the manpower and materials situation make it possible to carry out such projects. That will be a continuing branch, and both those branches will be merged in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. GREEN: This will not be under the Department of Public Works or the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. HOWE: The plan at the present time is that it will be under the Department of Trade and Commerce. There may be some re-adjustment later. At the moment, consolidation is going on between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. MILLER: Has the minister's department done any survey work across Manitoba in connection with a new trans-Canada highway? I know certain work was done, but I believe it was done by the provincial authorities in connection with the re-routing of the highway. Actually I should think the trans-Canada highway would be in the mind of the minister, because it is related to the employment part of his program. If no survey has been made, is it in contemplation; and is it the ultimate intention of the department to build the trans-Canada highway across Manitoba and western Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The policy has always been that the route of the trans-Canada highway is a matter for each province to recommend and the federal government to approve. Highways are the responsibility of the provinces. The federal government has neither the authority nor the machinery to build highways in the provinces. Any surveys having to do with the trans-Canada highway in Manitoba would be made by that province.

Mr. STEPHENSON: In connection with the closing out of the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, what would happen to housing projects? Also, will the minister make a statement about the rumour that any community wishing to begin a wartime housing project must make application before a certain time?

Mr. HOWE: All the housing functions of the government have been concentrated in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a crown company. It has been customary every year to draw a deadline at a certain date as the cut-off for the program of that year. Obviously a house started in September, 1948, cannot be considered as part of the 1948 program, because it will not be completed in that year. The government does not desire to begin the building of houses in the autumn so that they will have to be completed in the winter. The process is too expensive. The program for 1948 was cut off, I believe, on June 1. This autumn we shall probably be considering the program for 1949.

Mr. STEPHENSON: But it is the intention of the government to carry on the housing program under another department in the future?

Mr. HOWE: Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will continue to be that body. At the present time it reports to the Minister of Renconstruction and Supply. In future it will report either to him or to some other minister, and its functions will be carried on.

Mr. CASE: The minister has intimated that the provinces are responsible for the designation of the route. Is there any set contribution that the dominion government makes towards that project, or is it a matter of negotiation?

Mr. HOWE: There is no policy which provides for contributions from the federal government toward the building of any highway at the present time—except by special arrangement; and that is usually confined to the opening up of new areas.

Mr. CASE: That is, there never has been any such—

Mr. HOWE: Oh, there has been a policy, yes—other days, other policies. There was a policy in the thirties, when employment was a key consideration, at which time the cost was divided fifty-fifty. At the present time, however, it is impossible to tackle a big project on account of lack of manpower. When it becomes possible to consider such a project, a new policy will be established.

Mr. MILLER: Is there among the future unemployment relief projects or programs of the government any blueprint for the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. HOWE: If we see any sign of widespread unemployment we will proceed to make a blueprint. But at the present time we have not a blueprint and we do not think one is necessary.

Mr. KNOWLES: In connection with the matter raised by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, may I call the attention of the minister to a recommendation recently forwarded to the government by the Winnipeg chamber of commerce, over the signature of Mr. E. C. Gilliat, the managing secretary. I understand this recommendation was sent to the Minister of Public Works. It seemed to me at the time, however, that it was a matter which would come under this department, and I am glad the hon. member for Portage la Prairie has brought it up.

I shall not take the time of the committee to read the whole of the letter, or even all the terms of the recommendation, but I would call attention to this concluding paragraph, which sets out the views of the Winnipeg chamber of commerce:

> It recommends, therefore, that a dominion-provincial agreement respecting federal support for highway construction under conditions and conforming to specifications as may be set out in the agreement be negotiated forthwith.

Has this been considered by the government? If not I hope the minister will do his part to have this recommendation from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce considered favourably, with special reference to the completing of a dominion-provincial agreement respecting federal support for this desirable project.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has intimated that there is no intention of taking any steps with regard to the trans-Canada highway—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I wonder what this item has to do with housing and the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. GREEN: We are not on the housing item.

Mr. HACKETT: We have not reached that one.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: We are discussing item 409, which deals with reconstruction projects, subject to allocation by the treasury board.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister has said it covers anything and everything that may develop from an emergency.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I do not think the item would cover housing and a transcontinental highway.

Mr. GREEN: It would certainly allow us to discuss a trans-Canada highway; I agree it does not cover housing.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: If we would confine our remarks to the item under discussion we would make greater progress. Let us deal with these specific matters when they are reached.

Mr. GREEN: The construction of a trans-Canada highway would certainly come under reconstruction projects. The minister has intimated that the present policy is to do nothing about the trans-Canada highway until there is a period of comparative unemployment. We all hope that will be many years hence.

Mr. HOWE: I did not say that; I said when manpower would be available. I wish my hon. friend would not put words in my mouth. I did not talk about unemployment; that is the specialty of the opposition.

An hon. MEMBER: You did talk about it.

Mr. GREEN: My statement—and I think everyone here will agree—was in accordance with what the minister said.

Mr. HOWE: Quite different.

Mr. GREEN: If he wishes to change his policy, it is all right with me.

Mr. HOWE: I want to point out that it is not the responsibility of the federal government to build highways on its own initiative. The provinces initiate plans for highways and then ask for consideration by the federal government. It is not appropriate for me to talk about building highways unless they lie in the Northwest Territories or in areas controlled by the federal government.

Mr. HACKETT: Or over the strait of Canso.

Mr. HOWE: I suppose we could do that. I can give no commitment about any highway, and I do not intend to answer any questions.

Mr. GREEN: I do submit—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I do not believe that this item has anything to do with the trans-Canada highway or housing. Hon. members should confine their remarks to the item under consideration.

Mr. GREEN: I point out with all due respect that I am about the sixth or seventh speaker who has mentioned the trans-Canada highway. As other members were allowed to make their statements, and as the minister has been allowed to interrupt me before I had time to complete my submission, I submit that I should not be ruled out of order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member will admit that the item does not cover either housing or the highway.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: The item covers reconstruction projects.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Now—

Mr. GREEN: I am entitled to make my submission.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Just a minute. If the committee consents that anything and everything can be discussed under this item, the Chair will agree. I have simply drawn attention to the fact that the item does not cover these things.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the point of order, if the chairman says that this item does not cover such projects as the trans-Canada highway, then I think it is up to the chairman to say what subjects can be discussed under this item. It seems to me that the item should permit a wide-open discussion of any projects that might be initiated.

Mr. HOWE: Costing not more than $1,000,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree with the minister that he should not set an amount now, because he has stated that the government would consider this at the appropriate time. I submit that the trans-Canada highway can be discussed under this item, and I think, Mr. Chairman, you should rule accordingly.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I suggest to hon. members that they should not spend time talking about the chairman's ruling. Apparently it is the wish of the committee that the discussion be wide open.

Mr. HACKETT: It will not take long.

Mr. GREEN: The minister's statement indicates that the government has no intention of proceeding with the trans-Canada highway project until there is a period of unemployment, and that the government also believes that the initiative must come from the provinces. I am afraid that that is not a proper policy. Certainly it is not in line with the wishes of western Canada. We believe that there should be a paved highway from coast to coast, and that it will never be built until the dominion government takes the lead.

At present if anyone from British Columbia wants to drive to the east, or if anyone from British Columbia happens to be in the east—for example, a member of parliament—and wants to drive back to British Columbia with a new car, he does not think for one minute of going through Canada. He gets into the United States by the shortest route, travels across the United States as far as he possibly can, and then comes back into Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And spends United States dollars in the process.

Mr. GREEN: If he can get them. That has been the position for a long time, and it creates a serious situation. It makes it that much more difficult to build up a strong nation. I think one of the most important policies that could be adopted by any Canadian government would be the completion of a paved highway from coast to coast.

A person in British Columbia never thinks of driving to Alberta; it just never enters his head. If he goes for a drive he goes to Washington or Oregon or California; he would not think of driving across to Calgary. The same thing applies to most of the people on the prairies. They seldom think of driving through the mountains to British Columbia, because the road is poor. It is a ridiculous situation to have in a nation which we hope will be one of the leading nations of the world. It is not good enough to put off the construction of the trans-Canada highway until—

Mr. KIRK: Who builds the roads over in the United States?

Mr. GREEN: We tried to get you a bridge a few minutes ago. It is not good enough to put off building a first-class trans-Canada highway until there is a period of unemployment or until we can get the nine provinces to take a lead. The lead in this connection must come from the dominion. I am sorry to learn this morning that the policy of the government is as it has been enunciated by the minister.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have received from British Columbia many letters and resolutions indicating a great interest in this matter. I do not concede that the dominion government cannot have any interest or responsibility in connection with a trans-Canada highway. A trans-Canada highway, because of changed transportation conditions, is as much a necessity today as were the railroads before and after confederation.

I do not believe the trans-Canada highway can be built by the provinces. Some of the provincial roads already in existence could be used as part of the trans-Canada highway, but I am satisfied that sooner or later the federal government will have to give some assistance. If it has to give assistance, then I think it should have some say in deciding what the route should be. I do not agree that the federal government should provide funds for projects and then have no control over them.

With the relatively high employment existing at the present time perhaps this would not be a good time for the provinces or the federal government or both to start actual construction on a project of this kind. But a policy should be announced and the necessary surveys made so that when labour and materials are easier than they are now, the provinces and the federal government will be able to go ahead with the project in a properly planned way.

I am not sure whether the minister and the government have such a policy in mind, but ultimately they will have to have one, because the people of Canada will demand it; and they are demanding it now.

Mr. FULTON: For three years I have been trying to bring this matter separately before the house under a resolution which would deal with this matter alone, but that has not been feasible. I support what has been said here this morning, except that I do not agree with the member for Vancouver East that the time is not ripe to make a start on this construction. Our provinces are building roads now which might form part of a trans-Canada highway system, and they should have now the financial assistance that will eventually be given to them under a trans-Canada highway policy.

I agree that the federal government should not be expected merely to contribute funds, but should have a say in the standards of construction and maintenance, and in the location of the highway. The most logical way to proceed would be along the lines followed in the United States, where a federal highways commission is set up, which, in conjunction with the states, works out the location of the roads and the standards of construction and maintenance. When the states have built the roads in accordance with the agreed specifications, the federal contribution is payable. That would be the logical way to do it in Canada. In the United States if the road is maintained in accordance with the agreed specifications, a yearly contribution is made towards the maintenance of that highway system. The policing of the road, traffic laws, and so forth, are in provincial hands. But the federal government, through the highways commission on which the states have representation, lays down the standards of construction and of maintenance. The federal government's contribution is fifty per cent. I think we should follow that precedent here and make a start now, so that the provinces which have to build and maintain their roads would be entitled to federal assistance in respect of the roads which fall within the trans-Canada highway system.

The commission might well take into consideration also the question whether we should have only one, or two or more trans-Canada roads, and should be making its plans for the location of these roads to encourage the provinces in the road building they are now doing which will become part of the highway system. The provinces should receive assistance in that work now. Then the provinces, particularly the western provinces, could devote their own resources to their own main problems, which include the building of roads in the new areas to be developed; and the federal funds would help to take care of the main road question.

While I agree with all the principles put forward this morning, I do not agree with the member for Vancouver East that no start can be made on actual construction now. I feel that we could make a start along the lines I have suggested, without making extra demands on labour and building materials.

Mr. CHURCH: I am not objecting to what the British Columbia members do, who are well represented on both sides of the house. But houses are needed ahead of highways. I point out to the minister that an agreement was made by the city of Toronto with this government and the provincial government under which the federal government was to pay one-third of the cost of some housing projects, and I hope that commitment will be lived up to.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not propose to discuss the trans-Canada highway, except to point out that last year thirteen of us, including members from various parties, supported a program in favour of the southern route for a trans-Canada highway. Therefore I am thoroughly in favour of what has been said this morning in support of a trans-Canada highway.

I wish to say a few words on the Red Deer diversion scheme. There are several aspects of this scheme which are worthy of consideration by the minister of reconstruction. In the first place, the Red Deer diversion scheme is designed to put water on pasture land in what is known as short-grass country. The short-grass country extends in various directions from Medicine Hat, and the same kind of country is to be found in the area to be served by the Red Deer diversion scheme.

Those who are not familiar with western terminology may not know the significance of short grass. Short grass is exceedingly nutritive. Cattle will finish more rapidly on short grass than on any other kind of natural forage that I know. We can therefore see that this area is exceedingly valuable as a source of feed. The soil is very rich. The grass grows rapidly and abundantly as long as there is water on the land. The soil is not inclined to alkalization. We do not have to worry about spoiling that land with too much water because the land is well drained.

May I say for the benefit of those who are interested in irrigation projects in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, that there is danger in irrigation schemes of spoiling the land through alkalization if it is not well drained or susceptible of being well drained. The land I speak of is well drained and is not subject to alkalization.

There are 500,000 acres of land involved in the Red Deer diversion scheme, using water only out of the Red Deer. If you add water from the North Saskatchewan, 900,000 acres could be brought under water, all exceedingly productive.

The land is gently rolling, the slopes not precipitous; the water will not run off—a very important factor in any irrigation scheme.

There is one reason why I am particularly interested in the Red Deer diversion. I may seem to be looking too far into the future, but I do not think I am. The Red Deer diversion is naturally a complementary scheme to such a project as the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project which the minister has done so much to help forward, a scheme designed primarily to put water on agricultural land on which it is proposed to raise sugar beets, canning crops and other cultivated crops. The Red Deer diversion scheme is not so valuable for cultivated crops as it is to provide forage for stock. There are, in the area adjacent to the Red Deer diversion scheme, great stretches of land which, being in the Palliser Triangle, do not receive sufficient precipitation to enable the land to support regular settlement. It does receive just enough water to make it pretty good pasture for cattle, so that probably four acres would supply the needs of one animal. A person could not make a living on a small amount of that land. But if it is not used in production of stock it remains idle and of no value to the Canadian economy.

The minister can readily see that such an area could well be used in the Canadian economy for the production of beef which would be fattened down in the areas where the sugar beet factories are. It is thus extremely important, especially if we go forward with an extensive development of the beet sugar industry, as we should, in the area which the minister is now proposing to irrigate under the Lethbridge southeast conservation project, involving, as the minister knows, about 350,000 acres of land.

Considering the fact that we are going forward with the St. Mary river project, the Red Deer diversion scheme ought to be developed as a complementary project.

May I give a few other facts about this project?—and then I shall resume my seat. I am informed that the main dam for the Red Deer diversion project will back up water to a depth of 150 feet on the Red Deer river, which means a great deal of water. From the reservoir produced by the dam it is proposed to carry the water by canal to lake Hamilton. It is thought that the cost of building the dam and carrying the water to lake Hamilton would amount to around $7,000,000, which in days like these is not a great deal of money, especially bearing in mind the tremendous value to the Canadian economy which could result from the expenditure of this money.

There is another important aspect of this particular project. At the present time, as the minister knows, all over the west there is a great deal of run-off. Where the land is covered with short grass, nearly all the water that falls in anything like a rapid rain, or in a snowstorm, which melts quickly, runs off and we get no good from it at all. In this particular area there is a broad basin from which a vast amount of water yearly runs off. That water could be arrested without too much expenditure in the Red Deer diversion scheme by constructing appropriate dams here and there at the mouth of lake Hamilton and various other small lakes. Thus a great deal of good could be derived by saving that amount of water which now runs away into the Hudson bay to waste.

There is another lake beside lake Hamilton which is also important to this scheme, namely, Buffalo lake. When I tell hon. members that Buffalo lake is fourteen miles long and eight miles wide, they will realize that we are not talking in terms of small matters when we discuss the Red Deer diversion scheme. The cost of the whole project is estimated at about $15,000,000. That is about the amount which is to be spent on the St. Mary river project.

There is one more aspect of the matter. We have had bitter experiences this year in the floods on the Fraser river. In any area in which there occurs occasionally abnormal precipitation, either of snow or of rain, we are apt to have serious floods. We might have serious floods on the prairie rivers. I have seen very serious floods at Lethbridge, Medicine Hat and Cardston. We did not happen to have them this year, but we could have had them. The Red Deer river is capable of giving us a serious flood problem. The town of Drumheller suffered this year. The construction of this project would help to overcome the danger of floods on the Red Deer river, because it is proposed to draw the water from the main reservoir into lake Hamilton, and this, as the minister can see, would automatically distribute the water over a wide area. From the canal which draws the water from the main reservoir into lake Hamilton it is proposed to cut a canal of about a mile into Buffalo lake. There another tremendous amount of water can be stored, which could be used either to replenish the water of the Red Deer in case of low water, or to supply water to lake Hamilton and the land under the project.

The minister can see from what I have given in this rough outline that the project is really in a class by itself and worthy of special consideration.

May I deal with one or two other matters? It is the responsibility of Canada at the present time to supply food. Nearly everybody is worrying about food. The world is actually short of food. I wish to refer to an article which I shall not go into in any detail. It is headed "Want still threatens the world." It appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 22, 1948. The subtitle reads as follows: "Sir John Boyd Orr reiterates his grim warning that the nations should be growing food instead of making preparations for war." In the article appeared these words:

> But as he showed in notable reports, most of the people of Britain were not adequately nourished and half the world's population normally suffers disease, disability, and premature death because of not having enough food. Now the world's high birthrate is intensifying the problem.

As the minister very well knows, when people get hungry they are capable of doing a good many extreme things, including going to war. Nations which are abundantly blessed by Providence, such as the United States and Canada, simply must be prepared to assume a greater and greater responsibility in the world's program of producing food for a hungry people. We cannot afford to defer this matter long; the people are hungry now, and they have been ever since the war. The population is rapidly increasing. This is important in connection with this project because of the fact, as I have indicated, that by developing this project we can produce great quantities of beef which can be finished in the sugar beet areas, greatly to the advantage of the whole country. The Red Deer diversion scheme is not necessarily a reconstruction project or part of a reconstruction program for Canada; it is rather a part of the reconstruction scheme for the world. This gives the matter considerable importance.

I trust that hon. members of the committee will pardon me for having detained them as long as I have, but I did think that this matter was worthy of special attention at this time.

Mr. McIVOR: I see bright prospects for the completion of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. GREEN: You have good eyesight.

Mr. IRVINE: Where do you see it?

Mr. McIVOR: During the provincial election the Premier of Ontario, along with his supporters, promised that the Ontario part of the road would be completed. Of course there are a good many people who think that the premier of the province keeps his promises. I think he will keep this promise if he considers it of practical use. Since he has visited the head of the lakes and knows what we have there as an attraction for tourists from the east and from the west, we are sure that he will do his part.

In the past the Minister of Trade and Commerce has shown a willingness to co-operate with anybody and everybody for the good of Canada. When we think of what we have at the head of the lakes to sell to the rest of Canada, we believe that the province will do its part, and I am sure the dominion will do its part.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is evident that there is a national need and a national demand for a highway system across Canada. The organization of highway associations, resolutions from boards of trade, and meeting of the highway ministers from various provinces have revealed that there is not only a need but a willingness on the part of the provinces to co-operate with the dominion in any such scheme. The debates in this house reveal that there is a demand from the Canadian people for a highway system which would be worthy of this country.

It is evident also that the nine provinces cannot build this road by themselves. Some of the provinces have extensive highway programs, which take in practically everything they can possibly do. By means of co-operation between the federal government and the provincial authorities, along lines similar to those followed in the United States, I think it is possible for the dominion to inaugurate a system, and I am surprised that steps have not been taken towards laying the foundation for negotiation between the provinces and the federal government with respect to this important project.

It is evident that in the prairies not only the provincial governments but the people themselves are willing to assist. It is fully realized that the people do not want construction materials to be used in the building of highways if they are necessary for housing, for houses at the present time are more important than highways. At the same time there are vast stretches in the prairies over which highway construction would not be very expensive. They have the tar sands, and they could proceed with highway construction that would be both cheap and easily done, compared with British Columbia. But British Columbia has shown its willingness to act.

I should like to know whether or not any steps have been taken towards negotiation between the federal government and the provincial authorities in order to lay plans for proper co-operation so that this important national project may be undertaken. Has there been any negotiation at all, or any approach from the provinces in the matter?

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for the past twenty minutes to get the floor in order to add my little piece on the question of a trans-Canada highway, but I have been unable to get the eye of the chairman because I am so far away from him.

I should like to comment briefly on the reply given to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. The minister stated that it was the responsibility of the different provinces to plan and construct a trans-Canada highway. In my opinion the federal government should take the initiative. We shall have no continuous highway if we leave it to the individual provinces, for the reason that there are a number of people who feel that the routes which they advocate should be constructed.

In my opinion the government should adopt the suggestion made by an organization set up recently at Saskatoon—last November 29, I believe—which recommended a trans-Canada highway commission to co-ordinate the efforts of the different provinces in co-operation with the dominion, because that would be the proper solution of the project.

The Yellowhead route for the trans-Canada highway has been advocated by many people in the prairie provinces. At my home town of Vermilion, on October 15 last, a meeting was held, attended by 127 delegates representing the district between Edmonton and North Battleford inclusive, and I understand that a report of that meeting has been forwarded to the dominion government, as have been briefs on former occasions dealing with the trans-Canada highway Yellowhead route. In these briefs it was pointed out that the Yellowhead route is shorter, and presents fewer engineering difficulties than the others that have been proposed. There is much less snow on it in the winter, and therefore it is passable for more months of the year than the other suggested routes. I understand that route was picked out by the engineers of the Canadian Pacific Railway many years ago, but for some reason it was later abandoned.

A survey by engineers would show, I believe, that the proper route to take would be from Winnipeg to Saskatoon, Lloydminster, Vermilion, Vegreville and Edmonton, then on to Vancouver, with another branch to be built to Prince Rupert.

I have said on this vote part of what I intended to say on the estimates of the Department of Public Works, in case I am not here when they come up. I see the Minister of Public Works in his seat, and I hope he will take note of my remarks. Many things can be said in favour of the Yellowhead route, and I believe the time has long gone by when it should have been built.

Like many other members from the west, I have motored across Canada at different times, but I have not taken a chance on motoring all the way through the dominion. I have followed routes to the south where there are good roads. I think it is a disgrace to this dominion that there is not an all-weather highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. MILLER: I have been trying to get in my main question on this subject of a trans-Canada highway, and I should like to make a suggestion to the minister.

Mr. HOWE: This has nothing to do with the trans-Canada highway, I know nothing about the trans-Canada highway; I will not answer questions about it, and after that you can go on with your questions.

Mr. MILLER: I will not make a speech, but I wish to offer a suggestion. I suggest that the minister confer with the Minister of Mines and Resources, the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of National Defence, and perhaps also, as has been suggested, have someone originate discussions with the provinces, with a view at least to having someone take the lead in this matter and co-ordinate the whole thing so as to have a plan prepared. From the standpoint of bringing in tourists it is important to the Department of Mines and Resources. Public works might also be involved, and certainly national defence. The provinces are interested, and I do not think there is one of them which would present any obstacle to the federal government stepping in and taking the initiative in the construction of a trans-Canada highway. I think the minister of the department whose estimates we are now considering is the one who can best take the lead in originating discussions among the various departments concerned, and in giving consideration to this project, the necessity for which has been emphasized so much this morning by various members.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I say, in connection with the recommendation which I read to the committee a few moments ago, that it is contained in a letter from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce to the Minister of Public Works. My suspicion is that when the Minister of Public Works receives it he will say that it does not come under his department, and he will probably refer it to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have not yet seen that resolution, but I can give an answer now. In public works we have no jurisdiction over roads in this country. Furthermore, I will say that even reconstruction does not cover highways. All this debate may be good from the standpoint of the individual provinces, but it is not advancing the progress of the estimates before the committee. It is not relevant to the estimates.

Mr. KNOWLES: Part of my suggestion, at any rate, as to what the Minister of Public Works would do with the letter when he received it, is correct, in that he says it does not come under his department. It seems to me that when these requests come in, the government should consider them; and I ask again for consideration of this simple, straightforward recommendation: that a dominion-provincial agreement respecting federal support for a highway construction be negotiated forthwith.

Mr. FERGUSON: I am sure that when the minister receives the letter to which reference has been made he will pass it on to the proper authorities. Why waste time talking about it?

The CHAIRMAN: This question of a trans-Canada highway does not come within the item. Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McLURE: I wish to speak on this item, Mr. Chairman. I have been trying half a dozen times to get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN: In order that the committee may know which item is to be considered when it reconvenes at three o'clock, I put the question, shall item 409 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Queens wishes to discuss the item.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. McLURE: When the hon. member for Cape Breton South was speaking on item 409 he stressed once again the strait of Canso connection—that is, between Cape Breton Island and the mainland of Nova Scotia. I do not wish to deal with this matter any more than to say that I concur in what the hon. member has said; and whether it should be a causeway, bridge or tunnel, I would be prepared to leave to the best judgment of capable engineers. I wish to say that this is not a community matter, nor is it a maritime matter. It is a national necessity for the business that is being done in that part of Nova Scotia. Therefore as a maritimer I am glad to support what the hon. member for Cape Breton South has already said.

I was surprised to learn from the minister of reconstruction that this department is now what might be termed a passing show. A few years ago when this department was organized it was heralded across Canada with trumpets sounding as one of the greatest departments of government for the benefit of Canada and all the provinces that was ever inaugurated at Ottawa. At the same time this department advises the provinces to set up similar offices or organizations by means of which to get in contact with the federal government and bring before them what the provinces desire with regard to the different projects they have in mind in their own interests.

What has this reconstruction department done? We find—and I intend to speak of our own province in particular—that the work of this department has been practically nil. However, it has been of some service to the government. It was an excellent vote-catcher in 1945, and again in 1947, in the provincial election. The projects that have been outlined in my province to the federal department were projects such as the West Point-Buctouche ferry system, a super-highway from Borden to Charlottetown, and the construction of the Brighton bridge, by means of which, in conjunction with the super-highway from Borden, the distance from Borden to Charlottetown would be shortened by some twenty miles. Both major political parties made definite commitments with reference to those projects that were placed before the federal government. As I said, they were given prior to an election, but the people had some faith, and believed that the government, if elected, would fulfil those promises. So far, however, we have nothing but the bare promises.

In this connection I might say that we have been advised today by the minister, and also by the chairman on several occasions, that we should not have anything to say about these projects at the present time, that we must simply forget them. In other words, they have told us that we are not supposed to speak about road building as one of the projects. In the course of the discussion I learned from various people who were discussing this matter—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I hardly think the hon. member is stating facts when he says the chairman requested that hon. members should not go into the different departments. I said that on item 407, general administration, the hon. member had the opportunity of discussing anything he wished to discuss.

Mr. McLURE: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member is discussing Prince Edward Island politics.

Mr. McLURE: —I am not discussing anything that has not already been discussed under item 409. What I am doing is particularizing the matter with reference to my province. I think that is a fair conclusion to draw. However, I will not develop it quite as far as I had intended; I will simply say that the proposed projects would have been of great benefit to our province.

I shall now mention a matter which was much in the limelight prior to the last two elections—the West Point-Buctouche ferry proposal. The people in Prince Edward Island were not asking for too much. They have already secured at Buctouche a guarantee for a landing pier at no cost whatsoever to the federal government. They have also secured, through the Saint John Dry Dock concern, the use of two suitable boats for this ferry route again at no cost to the federal department. All the people are asking with reference to this project is that a pier be built at West Point for the benefit of the farmers in that community. Besides, of course, they will be looking for a subsidy in connection with the service that is to be rendered. If under these circumstances that project is not to be definitely taken up at this session or during this fall, I believe the people should be definitely so advised so that they may take upon themselves the responsibility of making other arrangements for transporting their crops instead of having the long haul to which they are now subjected.

I wish also to mention in passing that we were definitely promised, under this reconstruction policy and reconstruction department, that consideration would be given to harbour improvements in the city of Charlottetown. Consideration was to be given to the building of a marine railway slip. I mention these things so that we may not be brushed off too easily with regard to the promises that have been made. I for one do not intend to be brushed off by these promises, which were definitely made by the government; and from time to time as opportunity arises I shall bring the matter to the attention of the ministry.

In compliance with the decision of the chair I shall not go into details, but if the government intends to take any action whatsoever with reference to the highway from Borden to Charlottetown, and the building of the Brighton bridge, then a definite decision should be made. I believe it was the minister who said that the federal government did not take any active part in the building of highways in the provinces. For his information I would say that in 1935 construction of the super-highway from Borden to Charlottetown had been begun, and two or three miles of it were built of solid concrete. We were hoping that after 1935 the work would be completed, but nothing has been done, with the exception of the repeated promise that this super-highway would be built.

Another highway was built by the federal government from Hunter river to Rustico. This highway was built entirely by the federal government, without one cent of cost to the provincial government. These projects have been started, and the federal government should take upon itself the fulfilment of what the Department of Reconstruction and Supply has led people to believe would be implemented.

I hope the minister will give us some assurance that the projects which have been mentioned will have some chance of completion within the next six months.

Item agreed to.

411. Home conversion plan, $50,000.

Mr. LENNARD: In what I shall say I am not holding the minister responsible, because he will remember that some few months ago when he took over this branch I told him he was asking for trouble. I am interested in some twenty projects in the Hamilton area. These projects were taken over from the owners in 1944, I believe it was, and these owners were all more or less given to understand that the work would be let on a contract basis. I learn that in every case it was let on a cost-plus basis, and in some cases the cost of conversion was almost double that of the understanding between the owners and the department.

I have in mind particularly the building at 72 Victoria avenue, south Hamilton. The conversion in 1944 was to cost $7,500. The building permit was issued from the city for the sum of $5,600. On completion the conversion cost $12,600. I bring this to the minister's attention because I feel that the people who had these properties converted should receive some consideration from the government.

I would draw the minister's attention to another matter in which I have some interest, and that is the salvage items in connection with the majority of these projects. A return I received some months ago shows that the average salvage for fourteen of these projects was $5 each. That amount was for water heaters stored in a garage somewhere in Hamilton. This means that there was salvage to a value of $100 on these twenty projects costing several hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps they deducted the postage.

Mr. LENNARD: Then I received a later return in which the amount shown was a little over $200. I wrote the minister's department and inquired about the salvage in connection with one project, and I was told that the salvage to the value of $5 was for a jacket water heater; and that was valued at $5.

In connection with this same project the original owner has an itemized list of certain items. I believe in this list he is modest, because it amounts to only $125. Among the items I see five cut-glass doorknobs at $1 each. I doubt if one could buy cut-glass doorknobs today for less than $10 a pair. This later return in connection with the project shows miscellaneous fittings at $14, a used basin at $10, one jacket heater at $5 and one imperial heater at $5, making a total of $34. The amount was increased by $29 in the second return.

I draw this to the attention of the department to show that while I am not holding the minister responsible, it would appear that contractors walked in and took everything they could lay their hands on. They took walnut staircases, mahogany pieces, lighting fixtures and everything else. Nobody knows where those things went; it is just one of those things that happened.

I urge upon the minister and the members of his department that every consideration be given to these people when these projects are being turned back to them.

Item agreed to.

412. Emergency shelter—administration, $3,000,000.

Mr. McLURE: Both the minister and his parliamentary assistant have given assurance that something will be done with regard to the Maple Hill emergency housing project at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. I would ask for a definite statement now, and some assurance to these people that they will not be ejected. I have received word today that the provincial government has ordered the closing of the school at that point on June 30.

Mr. HOWE: I do not know what the situation is in Prince Edward Island, but I think most schools close on June 30 every year. I would suppose Prince Edward Island is no exception. The situation is that certain buildings owned by the government were converted to emergency shelter under an agreement with the city of Charlottetown. The city withdrew from the agreement, and at that time the project was taken over by the provincial and federal governments on the basis of each sharing fifty per cent in the loss. The situation today is that the provincial government has advised the federal government that it does not wish to continue the agreement beyond September 1. An offer has been made by the province for the purchase of the buildings and that offer has been accepted. The result is that the federal government is out of the emergency shelter business in that province.

Item agreed to.

413. Wartime Housing Limited, $50,000,000.

Mr. FULTON: When, as the minister indicated, this department closes up in six or seven months, who will be responsible for the supervision of wartime housing projects and other housing projects under construction?

Mr. HOWE: The present minister is the one designated to be in charge of wartime housing. Until some change is made, the present arrangement will continue.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a question having to do with the request made by certain municipalities in British Columbia for increased returns from the lots now occupied by wartime houses. I know this is the case with Kamloops and I am informed the same condition applies to other municipalities. The municipality finds that it can no longer service these lots at the figure agreed upon with the government when the houses were first built, which was from $24 to $30 per lot per year. I understand that the government has entered into an arrangement whereby the city will receive in the neighbourhood of $80 per year, but the tenants now find that there will be an increase in their rental.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. FULTON: How is it to be done?

Mr. HOWE: The rent is just the same.

Mr. FULTON: I have received a petition from practically every tenant of the wartime houses built in Kamloops protesting against being charged increased rentals.

Mr. HOWE: The rental is just the same. The city of Kamloops in its judgment has made a certain assessment against the tenants for taxes, and the government has agreed to collect the additional amount and remit it to the city.

Mr. FULTON: Although it is not rent that the government is collecting, it is—

Mr. HOWE: It will be collected by the government and paid over to the city which made the assessment.

Mr. FULTON: These projects were intended to provide low-rental houses, and as far as I can make out from the correspondence I have had with the department, so far it is not denied that the city requires a greater amount in respect to these lots than it is now getting. If they continue at the present rate they will have to impose an unfair tax burden on the ordinary property holder in the city.

An agreement, which the minister has just mentioned, has been arrived at between the city and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If that agreement is carried out, it means that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is in effect the federal government, will not bear any portion of the increased administration costs with which the city is faced. The result is that these houses are no longer the low-rental houses they were originally intended to be.

Although it is not rent that the government is charging, to the tenant it amounts to an increased rental. If it is the purpose of these projects to provide low-rental housing to those in the low income brackets, particularly returned veterans, I think it would be proper for the federal government to pay a portion of the increased costs of the municipality. The government should assume at least half and let the tenant pay the other half.

As I say, I am in correspondence with the department about the matter, and I have not as yet received a definite reply. They suggest that they do not understand the purport of my representations. I hope they understand it now. I think the federal government should pay at least half of the increased costs, with the tenant making up the other half.

Mr. HOWE: The position of the crown is quite clear. The houses were built under a tax agreement with the city. The rentals provide for a reasonable return on the capital investment and also for agreed taxes. The city agreed that the charge per house would be $25 a year, or thereabouts. However, the city has since changed its mind about the taxes that it requires from these houses. The crown has not changed its position one iota. It requires so much as a return on the investment; an amount which has not changed. The federal government has not imposed any greater burden on anyone. The city has increased its requirements from $24 to $70 or $80. As a convenience the crown agreed to collect that for the city, although it is under no obligation to do so. It could easily have said, "Make your own collections," but it did not. It is co-operating with the city to the extent that it is collecting the city's levy along with its own rentals. The rentals have not changed.

Mr. FULTON: In other words, the crown will not assist the city by assuming some portion of the increased burden? Is it not admitted that the city erred on the side of generosity when it fixed its charges at from $24 to $30 per lot per year? Surely it cannot be denied that that is too little to charge for servicing a lot?

Mr. HOWE: All I can say is that the amount was agreed upon with the city. They signed an agreement voluntarily, and we assumed that there were intelligent people in Kamloops. We have to assume that. If my hon. friend owns a house and the city requires more taxes, I am sure he will pay them.

Mr. FULTON: But the city entered into that agreement only because it was under compulsion to do so. It is not quite correct for the minister to say that they were not under any compulsion. They were under compulsion because they regarded it as their moral duty to try to supply low-rental accommodation for their citizens. All costs have gone up since then. The return to the city was low enough at that time, but the city was willing to accept it because of the compulsion I have spoken of. Costs having gone up, the federal government should assume at least a portion of them. The city would still be getting less than it receives from private taxpayers, and therefore the other taxpayers would still be helping to provide this low rental accommodation. My suggestion is that the whole burden should not be placed on the city.

Mr. HOWE: I am not placing any burden on the city; the city is placing a burden on the tenants.

Mr. FULTON: Do not permit the city to assume the whole burden of increased costs; the federal government should help.

Mr. HOWE: The city is not assuming any burden.

Mr. FULTON: The minister has said that the crown requires a certain return as interest on its investment. The investment of the crown is to be returned by the payments made each month. Why should not the city get back its investment? Why should the city assume the burden of servicing these properties at less than cost?

Mr. HOWE: We do not ask them to.

Mr. FULTON: No, but you say that if they do not do that, they have to pass on the whole cost to the taxpayers. In other words it is no longer a low-rental housing project. The whole investment is to be returned with interest, and the tenants will have to pay full taxes or the city will have to service these properties at a loss. These projects are certainly not fulfilling the purpose which the city understood they would when it entered into the agreement, that of providing low rental housing with an element of subsidization.

Mr. HOWE: The city knew exactly what the houses would be like; they knew that they involved a rental of some $19 or $20 a month to the government, plus taxes of about $24 per year to the city. That was well known to all. The government has not changed its position. Its amortization and interest charges are exactly what they were then. My hon. friend is trying to say that the government has changed something, but the government has changed nothing at all. Will he explain wherein the government has done any great injustice to the city?

Mr. FULTON: I will try to do it again. All costs have gone up. That is not the fault of the city, nor is it the fault of the taxpayer.

Mr. HOWE: Nor of the government.

Mr. FULTON: I will not enter into a debate as to whether it is the fault of the government, but these costs have gone up, and what I am asking the government to do is to change their present position. Let them enter into a further arrangement with the city to share the burden of the increased cost, fifty per cent each, and do not ask the property owners, the taxpayers, to pay any share of that increased cost. This will be doing what we have in effect frequently urged the government to do—provide low-rental housing with an element of subsidization.

Mr. CASE: I would like someone to take care of me in regard to my property.

Mr. HOWE: This discussion is getting back to subsidized housing. The position is this. The city is not sacrificing anything. It is getting taxes from these houses just as from any privately owned houses. That is the business of the city. We cannot interfere between the city and the taxpayers, and we are not inclined to; we are co-operative.

Mr. FULTON: The city would be glad if you were to share the increased cost.

Mr. HOWE: I know that. My hon. friend may think that is the logical thing to do with the public purse, but I differ. The increase in the old rental is trivial in comparison with the increased costs. It is still the lowest rental housing in Kamloops or anywhere else.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain why the government undertook to collect these taxes for the city? Apparently the position in Vancouver is that originally an agreement was made between the city and the corporation and the houses were rented at an agreed figure. Then the city threatened to levy a tax on the tenants as distinct from a tax on the land. The government negotiated a contract with the city, without consulting the tenants at all, and apparently agreed to collect the assessment that had been levied on the tenants.

The next thing that happened, according to a brief I have here from the Wartime Housing Tenants Association of Vancouver, dated early in May or about the end of April, a copy of which has been submitted to the minister, was that Central Mortgage and Housing then sent to these tenants what it is referred to in the brief as "a notice to quit," but it seems to me a notice of increased rental. It reads:

> Under the terms of a resolution passed by the city of Vancouver, dated February 24, 1948, this corporation (Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation) has been requested to provide increased payments in lieu of taxes to the city of Vancouver. In order to provide these requested increased payments in lieu of taxes, your rent will have to be increased by a similar amount.

That was the notice sent by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to these tenants, who apparently knew nothing about the deal made between the city and Central Mortgage and Housing for an increased rental. Apparently it was done in the face of an understanding between the city and the tenants association that no change would be made without the tenants being permitted to make representations. I admit that the government is not responsible for any agreement of the kind made by the city, but the agreement makes it just that much more unfair from the point of view of the tenants. I should like to know why the government agreed with the city to collect these taxes, which were being levied, not on the government but on the tenants, without the tenants being given an opportunity to make representations.

A further question is this. This brief says that throughout there has been a suggestion that the tenants would be able to purchase the houses, but no sale terms have ever been announced. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not yet told the tenants on what terms they may buy these properties. Many of the tenants might like to purchase the properties; if they did so, they would become the assessed owners and would pay the ordinary taxes on the properties, which, it is suggested in this brief, would be lower than what they are now required to pay.

I think that the final request which the tenants make in their brief to the minister is a very reasonable one. It is this:

> On behalf of the Wartime Housing Tenants Association we respectfully urge, Mr. Minister, that you negotiate and conclude an agreement with the city council of Vancouver to have the increased taxation held in abeyance until such time as the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are prepared to have these houses properly appraised and a purchase plan submitted to the tenants.

I would ask the minister to answer my two questions: first, why did Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation step in and make a deal with the city over the heads of the tenants; second, what is the reaction of the minister to this request made by the tenants for a proper appraisal and a purchase plan so that they will at least have the option of buying the houses and becoming taxpayers in the ordinary way?

Mr. HOWE: I am surprised at the notice sent out by Central Mortgage, which does not represent the true situation. The houses in Vancouver were built under an agreement with the city in the ordinary way. The land was transferred by the city to the crown, the federal government, and the houses were built. The initial rentals were worked out on the basis of an agreement with the city which provided the usual terms, that we should pay from $22 to $26 a year in taxes to the city, and that the rental would be based on the cost of the project, plus taxes provided for in the agreement. However, the city, as my hon. friend knows, has the right to tax tenants of rented property. It exercises that right quite freely in British Columbia. What actually happened was that the city exercised that right by agreement with the department of municipal affairs of the province. We said that we would collect the tax which the city assessed, provided that we consider the tax reasonable in amount. We thought the tax imposed by the city was reasonable, and we agreed to collect the taxes. It was simply a matter of co-operation. We did not agree to the taxes being imposed. The only part this government had in it was that we said we would collect the taxes for the city if in our opinion the tax was reasonable.

Mr. GREEN: Was any order obtained from the respective tenants authorizing the dominion government to take out that amount?

Mr. HOWE: No; the city imposed the tax.

Mr. GREEN: Was any authority given by the tenants to the government to pay that amount?

Mr. HOWE: No; we are simply acting as tax collectors for the city in that regard.

Mr. HACKETT: If the tenant did not pay, the city would have to sue.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: It might have been much better to let the city collect the tax from the tenants. Then the matter would have been brought to a head, and I doubt very much whether the city would have tried to collect.

Mr. HOWE: That may be so. The city had the legal right to impose the tax. The tax was legally imposed, and if we choose to collect it, we do so simply as a matter of co-operation. We try to co-operate with the cities in which we have houses. We did that in this case. We are doing it in every similar case across Canada. If the tax is legally imposed, and we think it not unreasonable, we co-operate with the city by collecting it from the tenants. If the tenant refuses to pay the tax, but is willing to pay the rent, it then becomes a matter between the city and the tenant.

With regard to the second part of the question, about selling the houses, we sell houses wherever the city permits us to do so. The houses were built under an agreement with the city which did not provide for the sale. Many municipalities and cities have released us from that agreement. For instance, the town of North Vancouver released us from the agreement, and we are selling the houses there to veterans. I think we have sold eighty per cent of all the houses we owned in North Vancouver. The former tenant is now the owner, and the city collects the taxes in the ordinary way. The difficulty in Vancouver has been that we have not yet been able to work out a price for land at a level which we believe should be included in the sale price. My hon. friend will understand that. While the city transferred the property to the crown for a dollar a year, there was an agreement that if the property was sold, the city would recover a reasonable price for the land.

Mr. GREEN: Many houses are involved in that transaction. Is it not possible to reach finality on the purchase price and the terms of sale?

Mr. HOWE: It has not been so far. We think we are pretty close to it in Vancouver.

Mr. GREEN: How long have negotiations been going on concerning these prices?

Mr. HOWE: About eighteen months.

Mr. HACKETT: What proportion of the $50,000,000 is allocated to the construction of wartime housing in rural areas as distinct from towns and cities?

Mr. HOWE: Wartime housing is not built in rural areas under the usual terms, for reasons that I think my hon. friend will understand. The farm section of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act has been applied to farming areas. In other words, people in the rural areas can borrow money under the National Housing Act to build houses, but houses are not built for rent in rural areas.

Mr. HACKETT: What proportion of the total amount invested by government in housing has been spent in urban areas as distinct from rural areas?

Mr. HOWE: The direct investments in housing have all been made in urban areas. Government ownership of houses for rent is confined to urban areas, for reasons that I think my hon. friend will understand. The government has built houses in mining and logging areas by arrangement with the mine owners and others, where the industry has guaranteed the rentals for a period. Ordinarily the government does not build houses for rent in rural areas.

Mr. HACKETT: I took this matter up once with the minister, but we came to the end of the session and I did not get the answers. I understand that a large percentage of amounts invested by government in shelter for the people has gone into urban dwellings, and in consequence into shelter for the industrial population. I was endeavouring to find out from the minister what proportion of our total production is sold abroad, and how much greater it is than before the war. I understood that before the war it was somewhere around 35 per cent, and that it would have to be much greater than that now.

Mr. HOWE: The proportion of our total production is about 35 per cent.

Mr. HACKETT: In the United States it is six per cent or seven per cent.

Mr. HOWE: Something less than ten per cent. My hon. friend will realize that the bulk of our exports is in the form of wheat and wheat products, newsprint, forest products and metals. In other words, the vast bulk of our exports is in raw materials. I doubt whether the bulk of our manufactured goods exported is larger in proportion than similar goods from the United States.

Mr. FULTON: It appears that any further houses which are to be built under the wartime housing project, now administered by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, are to cost the tenants a great deal more in rents than some of the houses built previously. In the city from which I come, a two-bedroom house, without basement, now rents for $22. Under the arrangement which we have just been discussing, they will cost the tenant approximately $25. In the negotiations recently carried on with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the city has been informed that in the future it will only be possible to construct two-bedroom houses, without basements, owing to the greatly increased costs. In other words a two-bedroom house with basement, or a three-bedroom house, is right out of the picture. Even the two-bedroom house, without basement, on account of the increased cost, will result in a rental of $37.50 a month to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. On top of that, the city has to impose an amount for taxes which, let us say, will be another $3 or $4 a month—or does the rental include that?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. FULTON: The minister says that the rental includes the city's taxation for services. We shall then have houses already built and occupied, with rent and taxes charged, renting at $25 a month, with new houses of exactly the same type at $37.50 a month. It seems to me that this will be regarded by tenants, and with some justification, as unfair. Would it not be possible for the dominion government, under these extraordinary circumstances, to absorb some of the cost of construction, or amortize the collection over a longer period, so that the tenants of the two houses virtually side by side would be paying the same rent, instead of a rent of $12.50 more in one case than in the other for exactly the same house? Could not something be done there?

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend had built a house in 1942, the cost would have been a certain figure. If he had built it in 1948, the cost would have been eighty or ninety per cent more. The government is in exactly the same position. The government cannot perform miracles. A reasonable rental for a house built in 1942 would not represent a reasonable rental for a house built in 1948.

Mr. FULTON: Could the minister not amortize it over a longer period?

Mr. HOWE: We are doing that. We are doing everything we can to hold the line. It will be noticed that whereas the cost has gone up eighty or ninety per cent, rents have gone up about only fifty per cent.

Mr. FULTON: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: Which is not too bad. To do that we have had to lengthen the time of amortization, lower the cost of the money, and make several moves which are getting us closer to subsidization than—

Mr. FULTON: Why not go the whole way?

Mr. HOWE: There is a limit to where we want to go. We are holding the costs as best we can. We put a ceiling on the rentals at $37.50, and if we cannot build in a town, cannot build houses which can rent on the new formula—and that includes $70 to $80 a year in taxes to the municipality, which were not included, I may say, in the early houses—if we cannot build houses to rent at that maximum, then we do not build them. We think we must draw the line on what constitutes low-rental housing, and we believe that today $37.50 does represent low-rental housing in most of the cities of Canada.

Mr. FULTON: In view of the fact that this whole matter was discussed when the minister's bill was before the house, although I am not satisfied with the policy he has indicated I will not deal with it any further. However, I wish to ask about another matter in connection with wartime housing, I refer to those projects where arrangements have been made to sell properties to tenants. I have had complaints which I have raised in the house earlier, one being in connection with one of the projects in Montreal. The complaint was that the tenants were virtually being forced to buy alternative accommodation. I had a similar complaint from Fort William. The answer given by the minister was that nobody was being forced to vacate. While that is technically true, the answer is that the tenant is told, "If you are not prepared to buy this house you are now in, you will have to move into a similar house". Is that the policy?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: Move only once.

Mr. FULTON: An hon. gentleman says, "Move only once". There was no assurance of that. Some of the officials, I am told, told the wives—not the husbands—and said, "You might as well buy your house now, because if you don't, you will have to move, and if you are not willing to buy that one you will have to move again. Why not settle the thing and buy now?" I have information with reference to the project in Fort William. I understand that one of the tenants there said —and this was in March or April: "No. My lease says I can rent this house, and I stand on my rights and will continue to rent. I will not buy this one nor will I move to another". He was told, "In that event we terminate your lease and you will be considered as an overholding and illegal tenant." Is the minister aware of that situation?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. FULTON: That is the case of a man who is to be evicted. How can you say there will be no evictions under this program to sell houses? The two are not consistent.

Mr. HOWE: The tenants have been enjoying low rent for a number of years.

Mr. FULTON: Under a lease entered into with you.

Mr. HOWE: But not a long-term lease; a lease from month to month. The tenant has no leasehold right whatever, being a month-to-month tenant. In disposing of these properties, it is quite in order to sell the more desirable houses first. The worst that has happened to any tenant is that he has been asked to move into a similar house in a different location. Not only that; the cost of moving is compensated to the tenant to the extent of $15. There is no hardship involved, and there is little complaint from the tenants. My hon. friend is going a long way from home when he takes over the work of the hon. member for Fort William, who has been co-operative in working out this situation.

Mr. FULTON: That is an interesting observation on the part of the minister. At Kamloops, I may say, these houses are not yet being sold. I am glad the minister appreciates the co-operation of the member for Fort William, but I can tell him that when I was in Fort William I was sought out by a group of tenants who brought their complaints to me, and also showed me a little pamphlet put out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation last July. The pamphlet contained a series of questions and answers. The first question reads:

> If the present tenant does not wish to purchase the house in which he is living, will he be asked to vacate?

The answer is:

> It is not the intention of Wartime Housing Limited to disturb any tenant at the time houses are offered for sale. However, a tenant is expected to live up to requirements of his rental lease, making payments on or before due date and taking proper care of the property.

That is the only requirement that is laid down. It states that it is not the intention of Wartime Housing Limited to disturb any tenant at the time houses are offered for sale. This means: So long as you continue to make your payments regularly, and to maintain the property, you will not be turned out.

Mr. HOWE: It does not say that at all.

Mr. FULTON: It is not the intention to disturb any tenant at the time of making sale.

Mr. HOWE: It does not say, "at the time of making sale".

Mr. FULTON: At the time houses are offered for sale.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: That is what is going on.

Mr. HOWE: Sales have been actually made.

Mr. FULTON: Yes, and the tenant, when his house is offered for sale, is required to buy or to move to another one. That involves a great deal of disturbance.

Mr. HOWE: Don't read into it something that it does not say.

Mr. FULTON: I did no such thing. I said that the only meaning that could be taken from these words is exactly what they say: that when these houses are offered for sale it is not intended to disturb any tenant, and the only way of avoiding disturbance of the tenant is not to move him. But you are moving him.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think my hon. friend knows very much about the situation.

Mr. FULTON: Of course I do not hold myself up as an expert, but I think I can understand the plain meaning of words, and the meaning I have ascribed to these words is the meaning they bear.

Mr. HOWE: Let me ask my hon. friend this question. What does it mean when it says the tenant will not be disturbed when the house is offered for sale—that is, when it is advertised for sale?

Mr. FULTON: It means that the tenant will not be required to move.

Mr. HOWE: It is one thing to offer the houses for sale and another thing to close the sale.

Mr. FULTON: Is this intended to fool the tenant?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A play on words to fool him.

Mr. FULTON: What is the meaning of the other words, that a tenant is expected to live up to requirements of his rental lease? What is the meaning of those two sentences placed side by side?

Mr. HOWE: Read the other nine clauses and you will get to the one that is pertinent.

Mr. FULTON: I have already read all the other clauses. The second question is: "Who has first opportunity to purchase a house?" and the answer to that question is: "Tenant now occupying the house." Read that in conjunction with No. 1 and you will see that the obvious intention is: If you don't wish to purchase, you will not be disturbed.

Mr. HOWE: You are reading there something that I do not find in print.

Mr. FULTON: It states that it is not intended to disturb any tenant "at the time houses are offered for sale". It does not say at the time his house is being offered for sale, but at the time houses are being offered for sale. But tenants are being disturbed, and the obvious intention is not being carried out. There is a change in policy. Here is a letter from the minister addressed to a tenant of the Montreal project on March 2 in which he himself admits that hardship will be imposed on tenants. He says in part:

. . . we intend to proceed as planned.

That is, with this sale and the moving of tenants.

We realize that circumstances will arise where even alternate accommodation within the same project will impose hardship upon the tenant being asked to move.

It certainly cannot be maintained that the first position held out in this pamphlet is being followed, and that hardship is not being imposed on tenants who are asked to move. I would ask that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation revert to their plan as put out in this pamphlet, and that the tenant who is unable to buy the house when offered for sale be not required to move.

I conclude by drawing the minister's attention to this. These tenants in many cases have put in special work on their houses. They have made gardens and have had fixtures installed and they do not wish to move to some other place that has not a garden.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why don't they buy them?

Mr. FULTON: Because they cannot afford to, as the hon. member for Vancouver North knows. Many of these tenants cannot afford to buy at the time houses are offered for sale.

Mr. HOWE: The man is a munitions worker. He moved into one of these houses in 1942 or 1943 because the rent was favourable and we were anxious to get him there. We needed his work in a particular plant. Does he think that the fact that he moved there in 1942 should guarantee him occupancy of the house for life? Is that the thought of my hon. friend? What divine right has he to have greatly preferred rentals for life just because he happened to move into a house in 1942? Why should he not buy?

Mr. FULTON: The minister asks what divine right a tenant has to stay in a house into which he moved during the war. I do not intend to answer that question in the way in which it should be answered, but I will say this without going into a theological argument. The tenants in many cases, as they have themselves told me, were asked to go there. The minister himself has admitted that they were anxious to get these men to go to work in the munitions factories, in the tank building or gun building factories and so on. So they said to them, "If you will come and work in our factories, we will give you low-rental houses". They went in there on those undertakings and they are continuing to work in the same plant.

Mr. HOWE: Very few of them.

Mr. FULTON: The ones I have spoken to. It is peculiar that the minister and I do not seem to see the same people or the same set of circumstances, especially when it comes so close to his own home. But the ones I have spoken to are continuing to work there. They tell me that they have moved there, in some cases from great distances, admittedly partly because an attractive job was offered to them, but also because the government said, "We need you here and we will provide you with accommodation". So, having assessed the need, they perhaps changed markedly their whole course of life. They moved from the prairies to Fort William or to Montreal or from Vancouver to the prairies, or vice versa, with their families. Having sized up the situation they said, "We are going to make this move and stay here". Certainly nothing was told them at the time to indicate that some months or some years later they would be required to buy or to leave the houses in which they were settled. I do not think even the minister, with all the power he has, can confer a divine right on himself or any tenant. But I certainly think the tenants were given the understanding that they would be permitted to enjoy possession of the property so long as they continued to pay their rent promptly.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to say a few words following what the hon. member for Kamloops has just said. I will speak only about my own riding of Vancouver North in which we had one of the first and largest wartime housing projects in order to provide, as the minister has pointed out, cheap available rental accommodation for the men who worked in the shipyards.

Instead of criticizing the ministry at this time—and I think I do my share of that—I wish heartily to commend Wartime Housing for the job they did during the war and for the job they have done since. In my own riding the great bulk of the people were anxious to buy these houses. We had two years of difficulty with a city administration; and in the end it was necessary to change the city administration over this one issue. But, although sales have been going on for only three months, the contractors say the people of North Vancouver have gladly picked up these wartime houses. They want to buy the houses.

I wish to tell the hon. member for Kamloops that it is precisely those people who have done something to their houses—who have built fences, put in nice gardens and electric fixtures—who are the ones who are so anxious to buy. When you see the wartime housing development, you see a fairly good cross-section of human nature. Every house on the North Vancouver property started out the same, and the people moved in. Some took the finest care of their homes and made those little wartime houses as attractive as any in North Vancouver. Other people drawing the same wages on the same job, moved into these houses just as the builders left them; and now five years later the houses are still the same way. Those are the people who—

Mr. FULTON: Those are the people who have an opportunity to buy a better house.

Mr. SINCLAIR: No.

Mr. FULTON: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The people who are able to buy better houses are already buying houses. The hon. member for Kamloops was talking about divine right. These people think it is their divine right because they worked in the shipyards during the war.

Mr. FULTON: I was not talking about divine right. The minister was.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend was talking about a theological argument.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I suppose my hon. friend does not know the meaning of the words he is using. He was saying he did not want to get involved in a theological argument. However, these people are the very ones who think that now they should be allowed to continue to get these houses for $25 a month, despite the fact that there are over three hundred married veterans in North Vancouver, men who fought overseas, who are most anxious to get into these houses. I do not know about Fort William or Montreal. I just know about my own riding, and I had a considerable amount to do with the negotiations. The people of North Vancouver as a whole are glad to see that these houses at last are paying their proper share of the tax burden; and the people in the houses are now glad to be, as they themselves describe it, not second-class citizens getting a free ride at the expense of the people of North Vancouver through just paying $25 taxes instead of $100. The same situation applies in the city of Vancouver, as the hon. member for Vancouver South knows. The only criticism I have heard—

Mr. GREEN: They are nearly all veterans there.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is quite right. North Vancouver was not a veterans project.

But a veteran has been put in every house that has become vacant. Today there are over three hundred overseas veterans with two or more children, who were resident on the north shore before enlistment and who are anxious to get in to buy these houses, and I say they should have that right.

In North Vancouver the only criticism with regard to this plan was that it was not consummated two years ago. Even many of the shipyard workers have complained to me that they have been paying rentals which should have been going toward capital payment for the last two years, because of the failure not of Wartime Housing but of civic administration—the mayor at that time—to consummate the deal. I should like to commend the minister in this matter, and I think they could well afford to build even more of this type of housing for the veterans in the Vancouver area.

Mr. McIVOR: I think I know something about wartime housing in Fort William. The first criticism was that the government was extravagant in building these houses in the first place, that in the first year after the war they would be pulled to pieces, and that this would be the fault of the government. Now these houses are worth more than they were then.

Mr. MacINNIS: Prices have gone up.

Mr. McIVOR: I saw a number of people who came to me wanting an opportunity of buying these houses because of their associations. Some of them made some improvements. But when a young veteran and a young mother live in a home, and a little happy coal oil stove comes into it to light it up, you can see that there is an association in that home that is fine. It was my urgent plea to the minister and Wartime Housing to give to those people who wanted it an opportunity to buy those houses. In Fort William we have people who own houses they moved into as war workers and who never owned a home before; and I have commended several of them for it.

I know some people were not satisfied. They said, when the agent called on them during the daytime, he should not have called then but should have called at night. It was impossible for agents to make all these calls in the evening. I placed all the different arguments and discontents before the minister; and if hon. members want to see a fine bit of literature, with arguments thoroughly answered to the satisfaction of a great many people in Fort William, with the exception perhaps of one or two, I say they should get from the minister's office a copy of that brief. I commend the minister for his generosity and for his outstanding patience with regard to this matter of wartime housing.

Mr. FULTON: I want to answer some of the comments that have been made by the hon. member for Vancouver North, because I am not speaking against the tenant who wishes to buy his home being allowed to do so. I agree that he should be not only permitted but encouraged to buy his own home if he is in a position to do so. My point is that the tenant who is not in a position to buy at the moment or who does not wish to buy the house should not be forced to move because somebody else from some other house in the project wishes to buy the particular house which this tenant is in.

The hon. member for Vancouver North spoke as though all tenants were in a position to buy the houses they are living in and there would be no hardship done. I want to read him an extract from a letter I have received from the tenant of a house in one of these projects which were thrown open for sale; this is from the wife of the tenant. They did not wish to buy, and the agent of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation came around to call on them and said they had from somebody else an offer to purchase the house these tenants were in. She went on to say:

> He then went on to tell us that seeing as we are on a corner lot, and have cupboard doors on our cupboards in the kitchen—

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman is ready to read the whole letter and give the name. That is the rule. Extracts from letters should not be read without the names being given.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not so.

Mr. FULTON: That is not the usual custom.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): It is.

Mr. HOWE: You cannot read from a document you are not prepared to table.

Mr. FULTON: It is the custom in this house to read—

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Not letters from a private individual; you cannot read extracts from letters.

Mr. FULTON: I am prepared to give the name of the tenant. I am not prepared to read the whole letter.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Why not?

An hon. MEMBER: Put it on the record.

Mr. FULTON: I will give the name, if the minister wants it.

Mr. HOWE: You must table the letter.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; a private letter need not be tabled.

Mr. HOWE: A private letter should not be read in the house.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. Let the hon. member proceed.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask that a ruling be given.

Mr. FULTON: I certainly never heard of that suggestion.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a point of order, may I call the attention of the committee to citation 316 in Beauchesne; second edition?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is that 316?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, 316, in Beauchesne, second edition. You have the third edition there.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You know it all. I am more modern than he is; I am up to date.

Mr. KNOWLES: It states:

It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest. The same rule, however, cannot be held to apply to private letters or memoranda. On the 18th May, 1865—

Comparatively recent.

—the attorney general, on being asked by Mr. Ferrard if he would lay upon the table a written statement and a letter to which he had referred on a previous day, in assuming a question relative to the Leeds bankruptcy court, replied that he had made a statement to the house upon his own responsibility, and that the documents he had referred to being private, he could not lay them upon the table. Lord Robert Cecil contended that the papers, having been cited, should be produced; but the Speaker declared that this rule applied to public documents only.

Mr. IRVINE: Hear, hear.

Mr. FULTON: The portion of the letter continues:

He then went on to tell us—

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Does the hon. member undertake to give the name of the party?

Mr. FULTON: I will do that. It continues:

He then went on to tell us that seeing as we are on a corner lot, and have cupboard doors on our cupboards in the kitchen, and have just put in wiring for an electric stove, that there are lots of people who would be glad to buy our house. He said he would give us ten days to think it over.

It is this letter which contains the statement that if the tenant did not buy at this time, they were likely to be moved until they did buy. Then, the name of the correspondent, if the Minister of Public Works is still interested—and perhaps he is not interested; perhaps he merely made the request as a formality—

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): You are being silly now.

Mr. GREEN: He has forgotten all about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Proceed.

Mr. HOWE: Give us the name of the tenant.

Mr. FULTON: The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply would like to have it. It is Mrs. Jacqueline C. Hayne of Fort William. The point I make is that the tenant, who is not in a position to buy, and does not wish to buy, is being put in an unfair position by being required either to buy or to move. I most certainly think that the policy should be changed, and that a tenant who is not prepared to buy should not be required to buy or to move.

Mr. HOWE: I will say that the tenant is the most fortunate person in the world, from my hon. friend's statement of the facts. He has the absolute security of a house for life. He can leave it any day, without any obligation whatever. He is on top of the world. Who would buy a house if he could get that kind of terms? He has security forever to live in a house as long as he likes, and pay the same rent. Yet he can walk out of it any day he likes. He came there because of a government requirement to work in a munitions plant. But because of that he has that wonderful privilege for the rest of his life. Does the hon. member really believe that?

Mr. FULTON: The minister is overlooking something. He overlooks the fact that many tenants took possession of their houses before mention was made of the fact that they would later be required to purchase. These are the ones I am speaking of, and they should be allowed to rent them as long as they continue to pay rent promptly. If the minister wishes to give notice that from now on tenants will only be admitted into these houses subject to a condition that they must buy or vacate on receiving a notice requiring it, that is a different matter. But these tenants took the house before any such policy was in effect. I believe it is an injustice to change the policy and require them to buy.

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member realize that when these people moved they were informed that they were moving into houses which were required to be dismantled and removed within one year, I believe it was, after the end of the war.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Six months.

Mr. HOWE: Six months. That was the term under which they moved into the houses.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has overlooked one point. Does he think it is fair that the tenant of another wartime house should be allowed to come along and push out a person who does not wish to purchase? Apparently that is the complaint, that this particular tenant was in the house and some other tenant was permitted to come along and push out the tenant who did not wish to buy. Does the minister think that was fair?

Mr. HOWE: The first man has already had an opportunity to buy. The second man does not come as a tenant; he comes as a purchaser. He lived in the project, and he is anxious to buy a house. The other man does not wish to buy a house. He does not want to tie any strings to the property at all. He came there on a temporary basis, a month-to-month basis. He came there, believing the houses would be removed from the property and dismantled six months after the war ended. Nevertheless my hon. friend says that three or four years after the war ends he is entitled to security against all comers. Because another tenant wishes to buy the house, my hon. friend says he should be permitted to stay there. It seems to me that is absolutely absurd. You are setting up a class of tenant which does not exist in any other part of Canada. The tenant owns nothing beyond his lease.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that it would be fairer to have the person who is going to buy a home buy one in which he lives and not be permitted to walk down the street, pick out the finest home in the block, and then force out the person who was in it, simply because the second person does not wish to buy. I think that is the unfair feature of it.

Mr. HOWE: That is the great gift the man has. He is tenant in the home; he does not want to buy. But he has some inherent right to stay in the house under any condition—what is the situation there? How does that work?

Mr. FULTON: At the present time no other proprietor can give notice to quit, except the government. That is one example—not as long as he pays rent regularly.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but like any other house built after 1940, no rental restrictions apply at present.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I have had some considerable correspondence in regard to these houses, some of which are in North Vancouver, and I know something about what was discussed earlier in the house, where rents have been increased.

Mr. HOWE: May I correct the hon. member. No rent has been increased.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand; that was a technical term. But it is increased so far as the tenant is concerned. He is paying more than he was paying before.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He is paying his taxes now.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, and I think if the increased price he is asked to pay is not more than the ordinary taxes, it is justified. I do not see why some taxpayers should support other taxpayers by low taxation. But what I was going to say was that the question is somewhat confused. I was never satisfied that Wartime Housing, which has the administration of these projects, was not dealing justly. At least I do not feel constrained to criticize. Before I do that, I should like to understand the situation better, because with so many other things to attend to I have not had time to get around to this.

I do not think there is much point in what has been said that a person should not be compelled to vacate if a buyer of the property is available. If the government are to be in the housing business, and I agree that they should be in that business under present circumstances, then they should be in it on a proper business basis and on no other. I asked some questions with regard to wartime housing in North Vancouver which were answered on May 10. I should like to read the last question as well as the answer which was given by the parliamentary assistant. The question reads:

> If the present tenants do not purchase, will they be compelled to vacate?

And the answer was as follows:

> Tenants who do not wish to purchase may be asked to move to suitable alternative accommodation. If a tenant is moved to a smaller house than he now occupies, it must be suitable to house his family without overcrowding. A tenant will not be required to move more than once and a veteran will not be moved to accommodate a non-veteran. Furthermore, tenants who are required to move will be compensated for moving expenses by a grant up to but not in excess of $15.

It seems to me that that is not too bad. Perhaps ordinary business people, particularly when the controls are removed as my hon. friends want to have them removed, would not deal as fairly as that with tenants. I am not speaking now to protect or in support of Wartime Housing, but I want to say I cannot find anything to get particularly heated about.

Mr. FERGUSON: I do not know whether the government run wartime housing any differently in one part of Canada from what they do in another, but I do know how they run it in my own community. At my request the government erected 100 houses and we were delighted to get them. The city council, which at that time was typical of most city councils, said that fifty houses would be plenty. When I asked why they had written that letter they did not know. The government built another fifty and they are now building another seventy. I wish they would come back tomorrow and build another 100.

We have eighty applications for wartime houses. Let us be reasonable about this. They can be purchased on terms that the average workman can afford. They are asked to pay ten per cent down, and I am all for any man in Collingwood who wants to buy a home. If he is too lazy to buy one, he should be thrown out. This is just nonsense. There are some tenants who have deteriorated their houses, but, thank goodness, the majority of the people have improved the houses for their own benefit.

If a man does not want to buy the house; if he does not want to pay fair taxes along with other citizens, he should be put out. We want people to buy their homes in our section of Canada. I hope that these men will buy all these houses, and I hope that the government will put up another 100, so that they can be purchased at the reasonable figure at which they are available today.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): How many houses have been built by lumbering, mining and fishing companies under the amendment passed last year?

Mr. HOWE: I think I can get that information a little later.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Have the minister and his officials given any consideration to altering the specifications for these houses? Wartime houses must be built to certain definite specifications which are not always suited for houses built out of town. I know one concern that took up with the minister's department the borrowing of $175,000; but, after considering all the features and factors involved, such as having to meet the specifications, they decided it would be infinitely cheaper not to borrow the money from the government.

One company has found that for about $1,000 it can get a roof over a family's head. Working as they do only forty hours in the week, these men are left with a good deal of time during which to improve their houses. Apparently there is at the present time no provision in the legislation to permit people to fix up homes in that way for themselves. Actually Central Mortgage will not approve anything that costs less than about $4,000, whereas many homes out of town could be built for something around $2,000 if the specifications were not so rigid.

The minister and his officials should give serious consideration to permitting more flexibility in this connection. After all, the only security the government has for its money in a case of that kind is the integrity and business ability of the concern building the houses. I think the business concern would be the best judge as to what would be adequate housing for its employees. You will find that progressive employers in this country do not want sub-standard homes for their employees. The present specifications almost double the cost of these houses.

Mr. POULIOT: I subscribe fully to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said. I should like to ask a favour of the minister. Will he send the hon. member for Simcoe-North over to England and have him make the same speech he just made to the British social government and the coal miners who are producing only a limited amount of coal?

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister say when an agreement will be reached concerning the houses in Vancouver, so that the tenants can enter into purchase agreements?

Mr. HOWE: I am told by the vice-president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that agreement was reached within the last few days. I may say to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the government feels that it must maintain certain minimum standards. It is all very well to build houses which may be satisfactory to the people living in them, but government housing must be kept up to a minimum standard. I quite agree that lumber companies can do better by borrowing money in other ways, but I do not think that is any reason for making a change.

Mr. POULIOT: What about the $475 house of the hon. member for Renfrew North?

Item agreed to.

414. Cost of moving houses from one locality to another to meet emergency shelter requirements, $500,000.

Mr. HACKETT: What type of emergency could arise to make necessary the moving of houses from one locality to another? I thought that was incidental only to the necessities of war when production simply had to go on and houses were moved to replace tents. With all good will, I suggest that this is a type of item which might with benefit disappear.

Mr. HOWE: In some places we have overbuilt. A case in point is the town of Pictou, where we had a large shipyard during the war. The shipyard has gone, and we have vacant houses there. On the other hand, there is a shortage of houses in the nearby town of Stellarton. This item would cover the cost of moving the vacant houses in Pictou to Stellarton, where they will be occupied.

Mr. HACKETT: I can see that, but this item rests upon emergency, and the minister knows that the pretext of emergency does not arouse a great deal of enthusiasm in me. I can understand the transfer but I do not like it being made dependent upon an emergency.

Mr. HOWE: My explanation was not very good. The emergency refers to removing air force or similar buildings from their present location into the town for emergency shelter purposes.

Item agreed to.

415. Incentive bonus to industry to expedite the production of strategic building materials, $370,000.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the incentive bonus to industry, and just what does it all amount to?

Mr. HOWE: There are only two cases covered by this item. We were very short of plumbing fixtures, and we made an agreement with the Port Hope Sanitary Manufacturing Company Limited for an incentive bonus payable on increased production of enameled sanitary ware. The contract runs to December 31, 1948, during which period it is anticipated that increased production will amount to 8,100,000 pounds at two cents a pound, which means a subsidy of $162,000. That was to induce Crane Limited to build an addition to their plant.

Mr. HACKETT: Were they given any write-off in connection with that plant?

Mr. HOWE: No, a straight subsidy. We were also short of cast iron soil pipe. We entered into an arrangement with Anthes-Imperial Limited for an incentive bonus payable on increased production of cast iron soil pipe. The contract runs to December 31, 1948, during which period it is anticipated that increased production will amount to 9,900,000 pounds at two cents a pound, or a subsidy of $198,000; and ten per cent was added in this appropriation for contingencies to cover overproduction. That accounts for the total vote of $370,000.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Are these plants working twenty-four hours a day?

Mr. HOWE: I would imagine so, but I am not sure.

Mr. IRVINE: I was of the opinion that private enterprise had sufficient initiative in itself without the government's having to bonus it, but apparently private enterprise has not enough initiative, since this industry finds it necessary to receive something from the federal treasury in order to carry on. I suggest that the prices for these commodities are already high enough to stimulate the initiative of any industry, and it would be much more to the point if subsidies were paid to the consumer rather than to the producer, if subsidies are to be paid at all.

Mr. FAIR: Is any subsidy being paid on the production of nails?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. FAIR: Is there any ceiling now on the price of nails?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. FAIR: I have information that in western Canada quite high prices are being quoted by manufacturers of nails in Ontario. My information is that the wholesale price of two-and-a-half inch common nails in Calgary is $8.30 per 100 pounds, which includes the tax, and I have here a rush telegram from a Toronto firm quoting two-and-a-half to four inch common nails at $12.25 per 100 pounds.

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend give me the name of the company?

Mr. FAIR: Interstate Sales.

Mr. HOWE: That is an outfit which was importing nails from the United States and offering them in western Canada.

Mr. FAIR: Cannot you stop these high prices?

Mr. HOWE: If people want to import nails from the United States, where the cost of nails is very much higher than in Canada, if people are so desperate for nails that they are willing to pay these prices, I do not know that there is anything we should do about it.

Mr. FAIR: What about the dollar shortage? Do these imported nails not have to be paid for in United States dollars?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Item agreed to.

416. To provide for production and transportation subsidies on steel and iron under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $5,000,000.

Mr. GILLIS: Last evening I discussed at some length the increase in the price of steel, and the minister advised me that he did not have the officials concerned before him. I wanted to know the reason for the recent increase in the price of steel. I said I thought it could not be justified. I should like to hear an explanation from the minister. I do not like to get the information through the press all the time; I think we should get it here.

Mr. HOWE: For something like two years we held steel at the former price. In the meantime there were two increases in wages for all steel employees, amounting roughly to twenty-five cents an hour.

Mr. GILLIS: The two increases were six and 11½ cents, or 17½ cents altogether.

Mr. HOWE: That probably is right. Then there was a freight increase of 21 per cent. Transportation costs have been rising steadily. The cost of coal went up about $2 a ton. Scrap iron went up considerably; and it became necessary for the mills to rely on foreign scrap, costing around twice the price of domestic scrap. It was a combination of all these increases that had to be met. We met it for a while through subsidies, but the pressure got so heavy we could not carry on. Therefore, after studying the entire industry, we decided that price increases were necessary. We believe that the profits for 1948 will certainly be no higher, and probably lower, than for 1947 and earlier years. To keep the steel industry operating, we were convinced that price increases were necessary.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to argue the matter with the minister; it has already been done. But I did say last night I thought it was short-sighted, and I put the figures on the record. If the minister will check them he will see that they show, based on the production of steel last year and the profits made in 1946 and 1947, that the increase which has been permitted at this time will just about double the profits of the companies. In the light of present price conditions in Canada, that increase in one of our basic commodities was not warranted because of the companies' positions. It was something that should not have been permitted at this time. However, it has been done, and I am afraid that when the increase begins to hit farm machinery and all the things it will affect in our whole economy, we shall find that we have done something we shall not be able to control very easily. Another thing, it has created a feeling in the minds of those who actually work in the steel plants that they were ignored. Hon. members will remember the difficulties we had in 1946 in getting them straightened out on a wage agreement. It will be remembered that in 1948 the workers took a very slight increase. I know that all throughout the steel workers union, from top to bottom, the objective was to stabilize the industry. There has been quite an increase in the production of steel. Last night I referred to an article in the Financial Post.

Mr. HOWE: The production of steel is not as high as it was in wartime.

Mr. GILLIS: Maybe not.

Mr. HOWE: Two furnaces had been down for a while. They are producing more steel at the moment than they were when the two furnaces were down.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. This is a short sketch which appears on the front page of the last issue of the Financial Post. It reads as follows:

> Dosco breaks eleven output records
> Open hearth operations at the steel plants of Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation at Sydney, N.S. showed a monthly ingot production mark of 53,774 tons in May. The previous high was 51,802 in May, 1940.

That is higher than the war years. I continue:

> Three blast furnaces shattered a six-year record by producing 40,379 tons, edging the previous mark of 39,866. Eleven production records were broken during May, P. J. Power, industrial relations superintendent announces.

Mr. HOWE: The press agent has, of course, his own way of figuring these things. If my hon. friend will get the production records of that plant for 1944 he will find that they are not breaking any records in that plant. They were manufacturing much more steel in 1944 than they are today.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not know. This gentleman says that the high was in 1940, and the record for May, 1948, was higher than it was in 1940. If that is so, if production is on the up-grade, it, in effect, would to a large extent offset even the wage increases that were granted.

Mr. HOWE: The year 1940 was the first year of the war. The plant was then on a peacetime basis.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. I wanted to put that article on the record for the benefit of the hon. member for Calgary West, and to tell the minister that I am completely unsatisfied with his answer. Perhaps it is the best answer he can give at the present time. On sober reflection and further checking, perhaps he may find out the answer and go back to his subsidy arrangement, because the saving of $2,500,000 in subsidy and then dumping the load on the back of the consumers of this country will add about $9,000,000 more to the cost of the goods that the consumers have to purchase. That is the wrong way of facing up to the present situation.

Mr. HOWE: It does take $2,500,000 off the backs of the taxpayers.

Mr. GILLIS: But in the final analysis $7,000,000 is being added to the price of the goods the consumers have to purchase. In the light of the vast budget surplus, there is no justification for having taken off the subsidy. It has created an upward trend in prices, and it has a great influence on increased prices.

I want to say this for the benefit of the hon. member for Calgary West, who last evening suggested that wage increases inevitably increased costs. That is not so. That has been proven in this house. We put the actual figures of the steel plant at Sault Ste. Marie on the record. These figures showed that, despite the fact that wages were increased by 25 per cent, because of increased production during the same period the increased wage cost was completely offset. As a matter of fact, despite the wage increase, costs were actually lowered.

Last evening the hon. member for Calgary West made the observation that in my own union, the miners' union of Nova Scotia, the answer was increased production to offset the increased wage cost. I told him at that time that it was absolutely incorrect. He said production had increased. It has slightly increased, but not for the reasons he gave. The wage increases that were granted in the mines of Nova Scotia during the war—I think it applies also to the steel plants—did not come out of the pockets of the corporation. It was handed back in the price increase to the consumers of coal. The man on the street paid the bill. If hon. members will check up they will find that every time a wage increase was granted to the coal miners the companies improved their own financial position. They really made money out of it.

Production was down during the war years. Why was it down? I do not think anyone knows the reason better than the minister does. The government was Santa Claus during the war. Under the circumstances they had to be. Huge sums of money were poured in. In fact, these mines were operating on a cost-plus basis. The greater the loss, the more money the companies made. That is quite true. Their losses were made up, plus a certain percentage of profit. The higher the losses the higher the profit.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I ask one question?

Mr. GILLIS: No. Wait until I am through and I shall answer all the questions the hon. member wishes to ask. The minister knows that what I am saying is correct. In the coal mines there grew up the system of an overloading of datal men. The result was that the younger men, who should have been mining coal, had gone to the war. We had to bring some of them back. A large percentage of the older men and the younger men who did not understand mining were in the coal pits. A bad situation developed from the standpoint of management. When the war finished, production per man-day was down. There was no doubt about that. How did they increase it? They are not producing much more coal; but they can show a man-day production increase, because in 1946 when the strike took place 1,500 of the older men were laid off the datal force. They were taken out of the industry, which affected the man-day production. Younger men were put on the face. The datal force was cut drastically. It did not take very many more tons of coal to increase the man-day production. That is what happened in stepping up the production per man-day in the mines of Nova Scotia. The older men were relegated to the streets.

I shall have something to say on that when the estimates of the coal board are up for discussion. I am wasting time now, but I did think I had to say that for the benefit of the hon. member for Calgary West, who last evening attempted to say that wages are the reason for the inflated prices today. If he will check the balance sheets of the corporations of this country today as against 1945 he will find that huge profits are responsible for the inflationary spiral which we have today, and the wage cost in the picture is so slight that it is hardy noticeable

Mr. FERGUSON: My hon. friend is apparently trying to imply that an increase in wages does not increase costs in any way, shape or form. The hon. member for Calgary West made a statement which was quite correct and I may say I am repeating his exact words.

Mr. GILLIS: Is the hon. member asking a question or making a speech? He said a moment ago that he wanted to ask a question.

Mr. FERGUSON: The hon member will recognize it when I am through, I hope.

Mr. IRVINE: No, he will not.

Mr. FERGUSON: The hon. member for Calgary West made the positive statement that one ingredient in any commodity, namely wages, will increase the cost, but I am sure he did not say that this was the entire reason for the increase in the final price of the commodity. Undoubtedly wages are as much a factor in the cost of the commodity which is produced as the materials that enter into it. There is no doubt about that.

The question I wish to ask is this. Was the hon. member for Cape Breton South trying to imply that for one moment any corporation in Canada during the war would deliberately curtail production in order to make more money through such curtailment on a cost-plus basis? Would he say that any corporation was guilty of that? If so, would he care to prove it.

Mr. GILLIS: As regards the first part of the question, what I said to the hon. member for Calgary West last night, and if it went over my hon. friend's head that is not my responsibility—

Mr. FERGUSON: Some things go over my head, but that certainly did not.

Mr. GILLIS: I said a wage increase did not necessarily mean a cost increase, because it could be offset by an increase in production. That is No. 1.

Mr. FERGUSON: It still creates a cost increase. The cost is still increased by the wage increase.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no need to argue that further with the hon. member, because I do not expect agreement.

Mr. FERGUSON: I am glad you agree with me.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not agree with the hon. member, but I am wasting my time by arguing with someone who does not understand the question at issue.

As to the second part of the question, and I am glad I am taking the heat off the minister for a while, I understand it to be this. Did I think there was any corporation in this country who would deliberately slow up production because they had cost-plus contracts during the war years? I will say, I think the minister and the officials of his department who had to do with pay and subsidies, and checking them, will agree with me when I say that perhaps 80 per cent of the cost-plus contracts let during the war operated on that basis. Let me go further.

Mr. FERGUSON: I cannot listen to any more of that stuff.

Mr. FULTON: Is there any estimate of the amount of increased costs to the construction industry which the increase in the price of steel will cause in, say, one year?

Mr. HOWE: What industry?

Mr. FULTON: Is there any estimate of the amount of the increase in cost which this increase in the price of steel will give rise to in one year? On the average consumption of steel in Canada, what will be the annual amount of the increased price?

Mr. HOWE: It is an average of about $7 a ton on steel. Anyone using steel will find the cost increased by about $7 a ton on the quantity he uses.

Mr. FULTON: What is the average consumption of steel in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The consumption is about 4,000,000 tons but Canadian production is about 3,000,000 tons.

Mr. FULTON: Approximately $20,000,000 would be a reasonable estimate?

Mr. HOWE: I was talking about ingot tons, and the hon. member is interested in finished tons. It would be about 2,500,000 tons, or about $17,500,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): While it was not my question, I think we had better get an answer to the question which the hon. member for Cape Breton South was answering when he stopped in the middle—

Mr. GILLIS: My questioner left.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): —because he left an impression which I hope he did not intend to leave. The question asked him was whether he was suggesting that, during the war, corporations actually slowed down production, there being an innuendo that they might thereby, on the cost-plus basis, get more profits. I should like to have that answered.

Mr. GILLIS: Does the hon. member wish to have me answer it?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: I have already answered it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think the minister of reconstruction had better answer that question because, if that is true, it is one of the most serious imputations that can be made against the activities of industry in Canada during the days of the war. The statement suggests that—

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend wants to know whether cost-plus work is as efficient as lump-sum work, it is not. You get cases—my hon. friend knows of one and I know of some—where management practically abdicates and permits inefficiency to take charge. He speaks of the disproportion of datal workers to face workers. That would not have happened had it not been for subsidies. You get cases like that, but when he says that 80 per cent of industry followed that practice I would say that perhaps five per cent did and ninety-five per cent did the best they could.

Mr. GILLIS: I said cost-plus contracts; I did not say industry.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is such statements that, unchallenged, do more harm to the profit system in this country than anything else, and I think the time has come to answer suggestions such as that. I have a high regard for my hon. friend, but I do not believe that industry in this country in the days of the war—I am not going to deal at the moment with the days of peace—to the extent of eighty per cent, ever tried to take advantage of the state in the midst of war. If that statement remains unchallenged it casts on Canadian businessmen a reflection which I think is entirely unwarranted, having regard to the contribution that private enterprise countries made in their respective war efforts.

Mr. HOWE: It shows the danger of generalizations. The ordinary citizen has intentions that are probably ninety-five per cent good, five per cent being not so good, and I suppose it is the same with business. It is a challenge to industry in the case where there is no subsidy. Production is then stimulated by competition. Industry must be efficient to survive. The moment you introduce subsidies into the picture, or cost plus, you introduce a factor that tends to take away the incentive. Ninety-five per cent of business does the best it can under the circumstances and five per cent is inclined to coast. That is my estimate of the situation. It is unwise for the hon. member for Cape Breton South to generalize on the basis of one industrial unit he knows about, and it is just as dangerous for the hon. member for Lake Centre, who knows a great many firms who are doing a good job, to generalize on the strength of that knowledge.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. GILLIS: In answer to the indignant statement of the hon. member for Lake Centre—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think we are all dishonest, as my hon. friends to the left suggest.

Mr. GILLIS: I will not generalize, but my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre will remember this. A statute was passed early in 1939 limiting profits to five per cent on all war contracts and when this house met in September, 1939, the present minister was questioned as to why that profit limitation in war contracts was removed by order in council. His answer at that time, as I remember it, and I am speaking from memory, was to this effect, that for months he had tried to let war contracts for industry but he could find no one to accept a war contract until such time as that profit limitation was removed. That is when Britain had her back to the wall, and that does not suggest that patriotism took precedence over profits even in the dark days of 1940.

I said a moment ago I was speaking from memory. The statement will be found in Hansard of September 12, 1939, at page 179:

> The provision of 5 per cent was put in the last act after a good deal of consideration as a minimum return for the service rendered, but it was one which men of considerable experience believed to be unworkable. I can say to my hon. friend that from that day to this the defence purchasing board has done its very best to place contracts on that basis and has used every pressure that could be brought to bear in the form of patriotism and so on, but to date it has not succeeded in placing a single contract on that basis.

Mr. HACKETT: What is the date of that?

Mr. GILLIS: September 12, 1939.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend describes that as though the limitation—

Mr. HACKETT: Three days after the war began.

Mr. HOWE: —were five per cent on cost. It was not five per cent on cost. It was five per cent on the money invested in the productive equipment. It was worded—

Mr. HACKETT: September 12, 1939, was three or four days after the war began. Therefore no contracts had been let as yet.

Mr. HOWE: I know. But it described events in the period of some seven or eight months between the passage of the legislation and the date when I was speaking. The actual profits in the munitions works were nearer two per cent. I think the average profits throughout the war averaged about two per cent. But that two per cent profit is two per cent on the value of the product. The five per cent that my hon. friend was talking about had nothing to do with the value of the product. It had to do with the capital invested, which is quite different and quite unworkable. It was devised by our friends in the east block without a great deal of knowledge of the productive problems.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is a good admission.

Mr. HACKETT: I should just like to get this fact on the record. The hon. member for Cape Breton South stated, if I understood him correctly, that eighty per cent of the cost-plus contracts during the war were dealt with dishonestly.

Mr. GILLIS: No. I refuse, Mr. Chairman, to allow the hon. member to put words into my mouth. I said that if the hon. member who was questioning me at that time would question the minister and his officials, they would likely inform him that eighty per cent of the contracts operated on a cost-plus basis during the war militated against the best interests of this country from the standpoint of spending money. I did not say anything about dishonesty, and I do not intend to let the hon. member put words into my mouth. My hon. friends over here to my right can become as indignant as they like. That statement of mine still stands. If any of them have any evidence to the contrary, let them put it on the record here.

Mr. LENNARD: Have you any evidence to that effect?

Mr. GILLIS: I am reasonably sure. I tell my hon. friends to talk with their own members on the war expenditures committee. I say to them to go and talk to some of those who were probing those cost-plus contracts. I have had members of their group show me evidence which they wanted me to use, but which I thought was too rotten to use. I am quite willing to face facts and be honest about these things. But when the hon. member for Stanstead gets up in this house and tries to put words into my mouth, that is something I will not stand for. My statement is on the record that these contracts militated against the best interests of this country from the financial standpoint; and all the evidence given to the war expenditures committee will bear that out. Profits were placed above patriotism when this world was in a bad state, on the removal of that five per cent profit limitation. That is my interpretation of it.

Mr. HACKETT: I was interrupted by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. We will take his restatement.

Mr. GILLIS: It is not a restatement at all. That is the first statement.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HACKETT: We will take the last statement of the hon. member for Cape Breton South as being the statement by which he wishes to stand. The allegation is that eighty per cent of the cost-plus contracts were carried out in a way that was prejudicial to the interests of Canada. Then, in support of his charge he reads a statement that was made to the house on some day early in September.

Mr. GILLIS: September 12, 1939.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes. War was declared on September 10, 1939. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is relying upon a statement that was made in the house two days after war was declared as proof that eighty per cent of the cost-plus contracts were carried out in a way that was prejudicial to the interests of Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: That is plain nonsense.

Mr. HACKETT: Those are the facts.

Mr. GILLIS: No.

Mr. HACKETT: I merely wish that they appear in sequence in the record.

Mr. GILLIS: That is just plain nonsense.

Mr. IRVINE: I think the facts are that there were not in Canada any big interests or any capitalists in 1939 who were more than five per cent patriotic; that is to say, they said they could make five per cent on their capital, but that was not enough for them. They were not patriotic enough to accept that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. IRVINE: That is the story the minister himself has acknowledged.

Mr. HOWE: There is no occasion for my hon. friend to make twisting speeches. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. IRVINE: What did you say?

Mr. HOWE: I said that the basis or the provision of the act was not workable. The provision was for a maximum return of five per cent on the capital involved in the particular operation. In the first place, it was exceedingly difficult to allocate the capital involved in the particular operation. In the second place, no one dared to take a contract because the terms were so vague as to the limitation.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not think I have twisted it.

Mr. HOWE: People use the five per cent limitation quite loosely. It needs to be carefully defined.

Mr. IRVINE: While I am on my feet, I also wish to say that I should like the minister to be a little bit more consistent. With respect to subsidies he has just said that as soon as you introduce a subsidy you discourage incentive. I assume that is true. But in the very item before this he has given $370,000 as an incentive bonus to industry. If subsidies are to be taken as destroying incentive, why should the people of Canada pay taxes to destroy incentive, as evidently it would do?

Mr. FERGUSON: Here, Mr. Chairman, is a member of a party which, long after the war had started, advocated not sending any troops to help dear old Britain with her back to the wall; they said to keep the men in Canada to defend the world—keep them right here; make Canada the battlefield. That is what they advocated during the war. Now they are trying to create class hatred more than ever by saying of a man who allowed his factory to be used on a common-sense, reasonable basis for the purpose of making munitions of war that he gouged the public, and that, unless he was paid blood money, he would not have put forth any effort on behalf of the war.

Mr. GILLIS: That is correct.

Mr. FERGUSON: That is what is being expounded here today by the group which, on the whole, advocated keeping their sons right in this country and not fighting for the British empire. I say, shame on you.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the hon. member for Simcoe North if his speech was prepared by the hon. member for Vancouver East?

Mr. FERGUSON: I have never been fortunate enough to have anyone prepare my speeches for me.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think we might leave it at this, that if Canada got good value for the money spent during the war, in connection with war production, we got it because we had good inspection. I have had something to do with contracts, in a small way, in the city of Vancouver, and I was told that the value we got from the contractors in any contract work that was let was just as good as the inspection, and no better. If the inspection was poor, the value received was poor. If the inspection was good, the value received was good. And if we will throw our minds back to the first world war we will remember that paper-soled shoes were sold to the troops; we will remember that bacon was filled with brine and fed to the troops; we will remember that beef was embalmed and fed to the troops. I do not suppose we have improved morally very much from 1914-18 to 1939-45.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I think it is very unfortunate that if, as has been suggested here, there are five per cent of business concerns whose morals are not 100 per cent perfect, their lapses of moral turpitude should always be quoted by the C.C.F. That does not prove anything so far as the free enterprise system is concerned. I am confident if I had to depend upon hon. members opposite to produce very much, either in war or in peace, we would not have much wealth in this country at any time.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I just wish to add a word. There are times in this house when I am impressed by the sincerity, and sometimes even by the logic, of those to my left. But when they get down to smearing—

Mr. GILLIS: Who started it?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You did. When they get down to this smearing of business, and trying to create the impression that except in the rarest of cases, which we all despise, there is any concerted attempt on the part of business to deal unfairly, I resent it. The hon. member for Vancouver East, under the guise of dealing fairly with the matter, said the goods received were only as good as the inspection.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not care whether you resent it or not; it is the truth.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I think it is unfair, and I think that kind of smear campaign will get them nowhere.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The reason the minister indicated for the increased cost of steel and iron products was the increase in the cost of scrap metal. Can the minister tell the committee what amount, if any, has been exported to other countries in the last five years, and to what countries such exports were made?

Mr. HOWE: There has been a prohibition against the export of steel scrap, except for an occasional swap. I think a little steel was exchanged on the Pacific coast. Canadian scrap delivered to Seattle against Buffalo scrap moving to Hamilton, the reason being to save freight charges. But, other than that, on balance Canada has been an importer of scrap and has not permitted exports.

Item agreed to.

417. Administration, reconversion and operation of Canadian Arsenals Limited, $2,900,000.

Mr. GREEN: How much did we spend under this item in 1947-48?

Mr. HOWE: This represents the difference between the cost of administering all government arsenals, which is $4,400,000, and the estimated earnings of about $1,500,000.

Mr. LENNARD: What would be the amount allocated to reconversion?

Mr. HOWE: I think the reconversion work at the arsenals is pretty well finished.

Mr. LENNARD: My point is that there would always be more or less of an amount for conversion. It would always be changing to a certain extent.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: I was wondering why this was put in. I should think it would be more accurate to say that this amount was for administration and operation. Would there not always be conversion going on in connection with the making of munitions?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so. The hon. member will understand that when the war ended we allocated certain war plants as arsenals. I believe we have seven or eight arsenal plants. We moved into those plants machinery from others sufficient to make it possible for the arsenals to make anything made during the war. There was a good deal of expense attached to that operation. Some of this money may be used for that purpose. In any event, it is the total expenditure estimated to maintain the arsenals, less earnings.

Mr. GREEN: Is the production entirely for government use, or are sales made to the public?

Mr. HOWE: We make sales as we can. The countries to whom we can make sales are rather limited. However, we have made sales occasionally from the aresnals.

Mr. GREEN: What amounts are required to maintain the other crown companies? I have in mind the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company and the Polymer Corporation.

Mr. HOWE: Eldorado Mining and Refining is healthy. Operating profits for the twelve months ended March 31, 1948, amounted to $1,087,318.97.

Mr. GREEN: What about Polymer?

Mr. HOWE: Polymer made its depreciation, plus about $25,000.

Mr. HACKETT: How many crown companies have been brought into existence since the war? The minister told us last night that all but five had ceased to do business; but there have been some new ones since.

Mr. HOWE: The Canadian Commercial Corporation was brought into being to take over the purchasing functions of the Department of Munitions and Supply. The Export Credits Insurance Corporation, which was incorporated by act of parliament a year or two ago, is another one. They are the only two I can remember.

Mr. HACKETT: Were there any others?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would the minister inform me—

Mr. HACKETT: I was in the middle of a question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would the minister inform me under whose advice the arsenal was constructed at Kamloops, where it is subject to flooding?

Mr. FULTON: What arsenal are you talking about?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Munitions stored in that area.

Mr. FULTON: That is different from an arsenal.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right; munitions storage depot. On whose advice was it constructed and who is in charge? What military command advised the construction at that spot?

Mr. HOWE: Obviously the hon. member must ask that question of the Minister of National Defence. I am not aware of the details. All I know is that the Department of National Defence chose the location and ordered the construction there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That answer partly satisfies me.

Mr. HOWE: It is not an arsenal. It is a storage dump belonging to the armed forces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes, but obviously it was constructed on somebody's advice. I should like to know, through you, who advised its construction in its present location.

Mr. HOWE: The Minister of National Defence will be in the house next week and will be prepared to answer all questions. I suggest that the hon. member ask him that question.

Mr. HACKETT: Are there any other crown corporations apart from the two which are under the administration of the minister?

Mr. HOWE: There are statutory crown companies; I suppose you could call the Canadian National Railways a crown company. We had some thirty crown companies during the war, but today only four are left. By crown company I mean a company operating under the Companies Act. There are other crown companies set up by statute, which are in a different category. I have mentioned two connected with the department with which I am associated, but there may be others of that type. I think we now have only four which had been set up under the Companies Act.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the minister know of any other companies, apart from the two under his administration, which have been set up since the war?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What was the total production of Polymer during the year ended March 31? How much was deducted by way of depreciation, or at what amount was depreciation computed?

Mr. HOWE: The net profit for the year's operation was $25,623, after provision was made for $2,192,967 for depreciation of plant and equipment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the value of the plant and equipment today?

Mr. HOWE: I think it stands on the books at about $38,000,000; that is the net total cost of the plant, less repayment of capital from operating profits. The value of the production was $17,000,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I read in the press that the manager had been abroad in an effort to get markets in Europe for the production of Polymer. To what extent did he succeed, and what were the values of the exports during the year ending March 31?

Mr. HOWE: The trip was successful. For instance, he sold the entire requirements of the Michelin company of France for butyl rubber to be used for inner tubes. The Michelin company ship crude rubber of an equivalent value to New York. It is sold for United States funds which are applied against the purchase of butyl rubber at Sarnia. The exports of G.R.S. rubber were 11,784,000 pounds to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and 21,392,000 pounds to other importers. Exports of butyl rubber were 95,000 pounds to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and 2,379,000 pounds to other export buyers.

Mr. HACKETT: Can Polymer compete with natural rubber?

Mr. HOWE: I think Polymer has had its worst year last year. The price of natural rubber dropped to below fourteen cents and, in order to hold its customers, Polymer had to drop its price to fifteen cents a pound, which is very close to production cost. Later, the price of natural rubber moved back to around twenty to twenty-five cents a pound, and Polymer advanced its price to eighteen and nineteen cents a pound. During the period the price was at fifteen cents, the corporation was operating very close to the red ink.

Mr. HACKETT: What salary is paid the chief executive?

Mr. HOWE: Twenty-five thousand dollars a year.

Item agreed to.

418. To provide for research and development of jet engines and aircraft, $2,000,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Recently two tragic accidents have occurred in which the lives of gallant airmen were lost. Were those aircraft produced in Canada, and have investigations taken place in regard to those fatalities?

Mr. HOWE: Here again the hon. member is asking the wrong minister. Those accidents did not occur during the testing of jet planes; they occurred during operations by the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Those planes were not produced in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are any being produced in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Canadian-built jet engines have been tested on the test block, but they have not been put into service. Jet planes are in the development stage, but no Canadian-built jet plane has flown.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Where are these developments taking place?

Mr. HOWE: At Malton.

Item agreed to.

National research council—

398. Salaries and other expenses of the national research council, $6,820,000.

Mr. GREEN: Have any crown companies been set up under the national research council?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, one small company to handle patents. There was no machinery for the marketing of patents which had been taken out by employees in the national research council or workers in the universities in the name of the government. Most other countries have patent corporations. The advantage of having a patent corporation is that it provides not only marketing facilities for Canadian patents but permits agency arrangements in connection with patents originating in the United States or the United Kingdom which can be offered to the market in Canada. All patents owned by the government have been transferred to this corporation, and it has made some marketing arrangements of considerable advantage.

Mr. GREEN: How does the national research council come into the picture?

Mr. HOWE: By arrangement between the governments, patents held by a similar corporation in the United States are made available to Canadian users through the Canadian Patent Corporation. In other words, they can apply through the corporation for Canadian rights to United States patents.

Mr. GREEN: Private firms?

Mr. HOWE: That is right. The purpose of the corporation is to sell public patents to private firms.

Mr. HACKETT: In Canada and abroad?

Mr. HOWE: This corporation works with corresponding corporations in other countries. For instance, our Canadian patents will be listed with the United States and the British government corporations. If there is no appropriate corporation to handle patents abroad they can be sold from Canada, but it is believed that in handling publicly owned patents it is better to work through government corporations.

Mr. HACKETT: Are these patents that recently originated in Canada, or are they patents that have become public property by reason of the activities of the custodian of alien enemy property? There were a great many German patents registered here, and I assume that the custodian had a vested right in them for a time.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the corporation is to market patents taken out by government employees in the name of the crown. I cannot say whether the corporation has taken over the German patents that were lodged with the custodian. There was some talk of their doing so, but whether it was actually done or not I cannot say. That will be between the national research council and the patent office.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: You passed over items 396 and 397, Mr. Chairman, with a rapidity which is ordinarily appreciated, but may we be given the opportunity to revert to these items because they went through so fast we could not follow them?

Mr. GREEN: There is an increase in item 398 of $776,000 over the previous year. Would the minister explain the increase? We are all in favour of helping the research council, but why this increase?

Mr. HOWE: We are trying to stabilize the expenditure of the research council around $7,000,000, which is only a little higher than the present level.

Mr. GREEN: Has the research council been engaged in commercial business at all? The minister will remember two years ago, when the National Research Council Act was amended, the debate as to the extent to which they would go into business. What is the picture?

Mr. HOWE: The council can be and often is retained by private industry to work out a certain problem, but if my hon. friend means, do they buy and sell—

Mr. GREEN: That is what I meant.

Mr. HOWE: No. A firm may wish to develop an item of radar, and they will come to the national research council to have one unit made which can be used as a model for production. The council does that sort of work. It will make a prototype, but it does not manufacture in volume.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have we made progress in the production of oil from coal through hydrogenation? Have we been able to obtain any German patents? Have we anything along that line by which we can produce oil from coal?

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure. That particular activity comes under Mines and Resources.

Item agreed to.

399. Expanded research on the utilization of farm crops, $260,000.

Mr. CHARLTON: This item is for expanded research; yet there is a decrease in the vote. One ordinarily associates expansion with increased expenditure. Would the minister explain what results have been obtained and the reasons for the reduction in what I consider an important and necessary item?

Mr. HOWE: This is to cover the construction of the laboratory at Saskatoon. The amount voted in 1947-48 was $401,400, and the amount expended, $141,400. We are revoting $260,000 to complete the building. I understand that the building is now practically completed.

Mr. CHARLTON: Is there any idea of doing further development work along this line?

Mr. HOWE: This item is to cover the cost of building the laboratory at Saskatoon. The operation of the laboratory comes under the over-all vote in the previous item.

Item agreed to.

403. Maritime regional laboratory, $150,000.

Mr. GILLIS: I am sorry I was out of the chamber for about a second when the dominion fuel board item went through. The item now before us has to do with experiments in regard to the utilization of Nova Scotia coal, which all comes within the work of the dominion fuel board.

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, this is a building item.

Mr. GILLIS: What are you building it for?

Mr. HOWE: We shall decide that later when we look the building over.

Mr. GILLIS: There has been a great deal of political propaganda that the government was going to set up experimental stations in the maritimes. Since this is the first time that the minister has brought before the house the vote for the dominion fuel board—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. We had better deal with this item. We do not want to go back to items we have passed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After all, Mr. Chairman, one does not very often ask for reconsideration of an item, but we cannot keep up on all occasions with the speed with which you are presenting these items. A number of us wish to say something on items 396 and 397 and my submission is that the opportunity should be made available to us. We have sat here all day waiting for these items. As soon as the committee disposed of one you, sir, very properly and with meritorious speed passed on to the next, but we have not had an opportunity to deal with some of these items and I suggest that the opportunity to revert be granted.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: I try to get the estimates through, of course, and my hon. friends had every opportunity to speak on them as they were called from the chair. I would remind hon. members that we have had a long discussion on coal.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It should not interest you, sir, how long a discussion we have had.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: My hon. friend knows that the rules are that the committee deals with the item before it, but if he wishes to ask for the consent of the committee to go back to a certain item—

Mr. HOWE: We do not want to be unfair to anyone, and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we continue with the items and, when we have finished with them, revert to the coal item.

Item agreed to.

404. Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, $77,272.

Mr. GREEN: This and the next two items have to do with the atomic energy control board, and I think it would be appropriate if the minister would make a statement concerning the activities of that board. As he knows the house has had very little opportunity to find out just what is being done by the board, and this is the occasion when we should have an explanation.

There is one other point in connection with the board. When the bill was passed in 1946 there was agreement, I think on all sides of the house, that there should be a watchdog committee, similar to the committee in the United States where they have nine members of the senate and nine members of the house of representatives constituting a committee on atomic energy. At that time, in 1946, the present minister took this position, which will be found at page 2401 of Hansard of that year:

> Then my hon. friend mentioned watchdog committees.
>
> In opening the debate, I had suggested that there should be watchdog committees, one of which would be composed of members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons. As I have explained, that was supported by several members from each of the parties. I continue:
> I dare say that, as developments proceed, it may be desirable to have committees, and perhaps a standing committee of this house on problems of atomic energy may be warranted; I do not think that is so at the moment. We should obtain more experience in the work of atomic energy before a standing committee is established. But that may very well be a logical development of the future if and when atomic energy takes a more important place in the Canadian economy. There is nothing in the bill that would prevent the establishing of advisory committees or the setting up of a parliamentary committee, should the future indicate that that is desirable.

Two years have gone by. Last year the minister explained to the house that the work being done in Canada on atomic energy had to do with the use for civilian purposes, and not for war purposes, which I suggest removes some of the need for secrecy; that was the main basis on which this house was refused any hand whatsoever in the development of atomic energy back in 1946. I suggest to hon. members that atomic energy may be of the utmost importance in the economic life of Canada in the years that lie ahead. We all hope that it will be.

It is an unsound position that on this question this house should be working entirely in the dark. We know absolutely nothing of what the possibilities are, or what progress has been made. I do not think that condition exists with regard to any other activity of government. Here we have a board operating without any real control by parliament, and without parliament having any knowledge of what is being done. The board is not even a full-time board; it is more or less of an honorary board; the chairman has other duties which take up most of his time. I suggest that the time has now come when there should be set up some sort of parliamentary committee on atomic energy. If that cannot be done, then parliament should be given some more direct control over the activities of the atomic energy control board.

Mr. HOWE: I had expected that this subject would come up earlier in the session, and I had gone to the trouble of preparing a brief but eloquent speech, telling about everything that Canada is doing on atomic energy. Perhaps I can dig out of the speech about as much as I can read from now until six o'clock, and give an idea of what we are doing, and after that we can discuss the other problem.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to hear the minister give us the whole story.

Mr. HOWE: I would love to, but time moves on.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Put it on the record.

Mr. KNOWLES: No.

Mr. GREEN: It is of great importance.

Mr. HOWE: An undelivered speech is a great asset. Perhaps if the committee does not want it I might deliver it at some other forum.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to hear it all.

Mr. HOWE: I shall start from the point that tells what we are doing at the moment at Chalk River; that is, the peacetime use. I could hold in my hand a small cylinder of natural metallic uranium. The cylinder I had prepared for this demonstration was about the size of the little jack-knife I now hold in my hand. We now know that if every bit of this very heavy metal could be turned into energy —which theoretically it can be—we would get the same quantity of power that could be developed by about 500,000 tons of coal, or about the power we now get out of the large Shipshaw plant in one year. There is little doubt that some day we shall be able to fly to remote areas, in one small aeroplane, more potential power in the form of nuclear fuel than can be hauled today in a hundred railway coal cars. One does not require an extraordinary imagination to envisage what that may mean to future developments. But as I have said, there are many problems to be solved before commercial atomic power is an economic reality. Our Chalk River plant is working vigorously on the fundamental problems involved, and we are keeping in as close touch as possible with what is going on in other countries.

While commercial atomic power is definitely not "just around the corner", there are immediate dividends in connection with radioactive isotopes and their use in medicine, biological research, and industrial applications, which I shall mention in a few moments and which some people feel may ultimately yield greater and more significant returns than all the conceivable applications of ordinary power.

Now, as to what we are doing at the moment at Chalk River. The pile is running satisfactorily; plutonium is being made in the rods; but, since it takes some time to build up that material in the rods, the chemical extraction plant is not yet functioning, although extraction on a laboratory scale is being carried on. We are producing, using, and distributing, a series of radio-isotopes, and the research and engineering staffs are extremely busy on an extensive series of investigations on the chemical, biological, medical and industrial uses of isotopes. Also fundamental nuclear investigations on the effect of radiation on structural material are being carried on, which are necessary before commercial atomic energy plants can become a practical economic reality.

It might seem that, since we are now running a pile or nuclear furnace which gives off heat, it should be easy to develop power on a commercial basis. It is true that the Chalk River plant is now discharging into the river hot water which might be used to heat buildings. This could be done, of course, but the temperatures are so low that it would cost more than it does by the use of conventional steam heating. This is not because higher temperatures cannot be produced; but because, at the moment, the structural materials available that will stand high temperatures are unsatisfactory from the standpoint of absorption of neutrons. This means that much research must be done to develop new materials, because unfortunately materials of the engineering standard textbooks are not satisfactory.

We also know little about the effects of intense radiation on structural materials. Here again we have a revolutionary new force that engineers in the past never had to take into account in structural design, and we must accumulate the necessary fundamental facts before we can design high-temperature power reactors with confidence.

In the field of radioactive isotopes, the situation has more immediate promise, and we are now making dozens of different kinds and are regularly distributing to workers in ten universities quantities of thirteen of the most important radio-isotopes such as radioactive phosphorus, sodium, carbon, calcium, iodine, et cetera. In addition, of course, even larger quantities are being used in the national research laboratories at Chalk River and elsewhere.

I think most hon. members realize that radioactive isotopes have three main uses. They are useful as tracers in research and analytical procedures. They hold great promise in the field of medicine for clinical use as a radioactive source, and they have almost limitless possibilities in the broad field of industry for control and other purposes. Perhaps a few examples will be helpful. For instance, iodine is known to concentrate in the thyroid gland; hence, if a compound containing radioactive iodine is given a patient, the course of its path through the body may be traced and the rate of accumulation in the thyroid can be determined by instruments outside the human body which record intensities of radiation. It can be easily seen that in a similar way, where treatment by radiation has proved helpful, it may be possible, in the future, to carry that radiation to the proper tissues by radio-isotopes.

There is surely an immense field for the use of tracers in research work in chemistry, in biology, and in medicine. In determining just what happens in biological processes, the tracer techniques provide a new wool as potentially novel and useful as was the microscope when first introduced. In the treatment of disease, there is a future so hopeful that many believe the benefits from medical research alone will some day repay manyfold all our considerable expenditures.

I could go on giving scores of examples of the use that is now being made of radio-isotopes by Canadian scientists, but time will not permit. I do want, however, to say that in the field of agriculture also the experiments being carried out in western Canada have already given most important information about the way in which plants take up elements from fertilizers, where the various nutritional elements in feeds go, and how they are assimilated. It is predicted that the use of tracers will have a profound effect on agricultural science and production.

But perhaps the greatest quantitative use of tracers will be in industry. Even today, isotopes and radiation are being used in scores of industries, in chemical plants, in metallurgy, in textiles, in the oil industry, and in thousands of plants, particularly in the United States, where intensive studies are being made everywhere to see if industrial processes cannot be improved and costs cut down by the use of this new technique. For instance, in mixing chemicals, tracers can indicate accurately how much of each type is in the final product. Again, where raw materials from different parts of the world go into one product and where quality is effected by blending, tracer techniques can provide easily the definite answer wanted as to just how much of each ingredient is in the final product. In metallurgy the uses are obvious and many. In studies of the wear of bearings it has been possible to detect the migration of atoms of metals from one piece to another; information that was heretofore impossible. Also the phenomena of annealing, grain growth, and transformation of one type of iron into another can be closely studied.

Again in control operations, in industries where it is desirable to know the composition of wastes; in dye industries, where it is essential to follow the strength of solutions; in the oil industry, where control is essential; in these and hundreds of other cases, the use of tracers for analytical purposes is proving most useful. In addition, other unsuspected uses for radiation are being worked out, such as the instrument which will follow and chart the internal corrosion of a metal retort or vessel from an external location, the gauge which will record levels of liquids in tanks, and the device which measures and controls the density of solutions in large tanks. There is also a useful device for removing the static from paper and textile machines which has shown real economies. That device is being sold commercially by the government. In fact, so attractive are the potential uses in industry that one might almost say that within two or three years the real initiative and enterprise of a country's industries will be measured by the use they are making of isotopes and radiation techniques.

From what I have said I hope the committee will appreciate that our enterprise at Chalk River is not an ordinary industrial undertaking which can be judged by the immediate output of plutonium. It is really an exploration expedition into a land of great promise. We have a staff of about 250 scientists and technicians, with an additional 750 employees and, beside the output of isotopes and plutonium, there are now being turned out hundreds of original scientific papers which are rapidly establishing the scientific quality and reputation of this Canadian scientific centre, which even now is a place to which the great scientists of the world come for discussions and information.

While the tangible and immediate results in production, in research, and in development, are impressive and worthwhile, I should like to remind hon. members that the ultimate results of the best research can seldom be immediately discerned. We know by experience that where we have first-rate research in any field, there is almost sure to be an overflow into adjacent fields, and the unexpected harvests are often the most valuable.

In closing, I suggest that this rather large enterprise which we undertook at Chalk River in a time of war is turning out to be an absolutely first-rate effort that will continue in the years to come to be a credit to Canada in every sense.

Mr. GREEN: The minister did not deal with the suggestion that we have a committee of the senate and this house.

Mr. HOWE: I doubt whether a committee is necessary. Since the work done is chiefly confined to peacetime uses, control is more or less obvious. The work is being laid out by the national research council; the council has its medical committee and men interested in plant research, and other research of various types, and these committees are directing the experimental work that is being carried out.

If a committee of the house wishes to go there and see the work at Chalk River that will be possible. The atomic energy commission has no great decisions to make. We have freed control of material in the ground. Its duties are confined to purchasing fissionable materials after they are mined, and controlling their refining and sale. That today is concerned only with the Eldorado operations. There is no private operation either present or contemplated, which we know of, although there are rumours of the finding of new deposits of ore. I can think of no reason why any formal board should be set up, but if the house at the next session wished to appoint a committee on atomic energy and bring experts before that committee to discuss these matters it might be appropriate to do so.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister consider making a move of that kind at the next session? I know that nothing can be done during the present session; but in the intervening months, between now and the session of 1949, perhaps the government could give some thought to the advisability of setting up a committee of the house or a joint committee of the senate and the house.

Mr. HOWE: I would certainly have no objection to doing that. I would be glad to consider it.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member for Vancouver South belonged to such a committee he would turn into a statue of salt.

Mr. IRVINE: Is there any co-operation between the research going on in Canada and that which is taking place in the United States and Britain with respect to atomic energy?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. There is close co-operation.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): The minister said that knowledge of atomic energy would be used more particularly in the United States. By that, does he mean that United States industry is using to a greater extent than Canadian industry the knowledge that we also have of atomic energy?

Mr. HOWE: Industry in the United States is about ten or fifteen times the size of industry in Canada, and therefore more people are interested in research, and in the application of atomic energy to industry. Our industry is also active, but there is a larger use in the United States.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): Because it is larger, it does not follow that it is more progressive or up to date, or should be, in the use of the technological knowledge which we have. I think attention should be paid to that phase of the matter to see that our Canadian industries utilize the atomic energy knowledge that we have.

Mr. CASE: Is Canada the principal source of fissionable material for the United States?

Mr. HOWE: No, not the principal source.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I have seen metals—I believe it is uranium—coming from the Flin Flon deposits. Is there any danger of such metals or ores finding their way into the hands of people who should not have them, in view of the fact that the government has removed the controls in that regard?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has never seen uranium metal.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I do not know. It is an ore.

Mr. HOWE: He could have seen low-grade ore. But there is no great danger with low-grade ore. The refinement process is a complicated one. The ore is no more dangerous than any other kind of ore. The ore is not fissionable, but it can be made into fissionable material.

Item agreed to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will you, Mr. Chairman, tell us exactly what our position is? Are we going on at eight o'clock? Are we to go on from eight o'clock until eleven o'clock tonight?

The CHAIRMAN: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are we to come back to item 396 as though it had not been passed?

Mr. HOWE: It was my understanding, and I hope that the chairman will agree, that at eight o'clock we will take item 396, on the coal board, and rather hurriedly examine it.

Mr. KNOWLES: We hope.

Mr. HOWE: If anyone has a forty-minute speech, perhaps he can cut it to twenty minutes and let us get on fairly quickly, as a sort of compromise with the situation.

Mr. GREEN: What department will be called after that?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): External affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: And then what after that.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Labour.

Mr. KNOWLES: And after that?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Sunday morning.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Although items 396 and 397 for the dominion coal board were carried, I believe it was agreed that there would be some further discussion.

[Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia).]

Mr. GILLIS: I know, Mr. Chairman, that the minister hates to see me get up just as much as I hate to get up.

Mr. HOWE: I would not say that.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): No. We are glad to see you get up.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not intend to take long on the subject. I was anxious that the minister should make some statement on this item, the dominion coal board, because it is a new piece of machinery established nationally to try to do something about developing the Canadian coal industry, and also about developing a national fuel policy in the field of marketing. The coal board itself was appointed as a result of a recommendation of the royal commission, and it has functioned for a year. I thought the minister might have something to say as to how it has worked, what new fields it has opened up or it has in mind with respect to a national fuel policy. That is mainly the reason why I rise at this time.

I shall not talk about what the fuel policy should be, or to any extent about the development of the resources of Canada. I have done that so often in the house that I hate to see myself doing it all over again.

Mr. GRANT: You must be getting fed up with it.

Mr. GILLIS: No, not exactly. I think the setting up of the board itself and giving to it the function it has to perform is a step in the right direction. I said that when the board was set up. According to the Financial Post, the board has a scheme under way now for the further mechanization of the coal mines of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOWE: Does that paper in the hon. member's party now correspond with the Toronto Globe and Mail in the Progressive Conservative party?

Mr. GILLIS: It is rather unfortunate that one picks up in that paper a considerable number of things that we do not get in the house. This issue of it had about eight pages on maritime industry, as to the things that were to be done and the things that the government were doing. Among the items was a fairly comprehensive statement as to the negotiations being carried on between the dominion government and the corporation; and I presume that is the dominion coal board.

Last night the argument with regard to the development of the hard-coal areas in Alberta reminded me of the arguments we were making twenty years ago along the same lines. The factor that has always prevented the development of the Canadian industry has, in my opinion, been the question of markets. The coal is east and west and our main market is in the centre of Canada. In that respect you were bucking geography. I always contended that the only way to overcome it was to zone the markets in Canada that were as economic as possible. Then, your subvention arrangement would enable our coal from the east and west to go into the markets as far to the centre of Canada as possible and compete, with government assistance. Under the present scheme of things, under free enterprise, I do not think there is any other way to work it.

One thing, however, of which I am convinced is that as far as Canada, the government and—as far as I know—the coal board are concerned, there does not seem to be any initiative being taken by any body of government with respect to the development of our own resources. In my own end of the country the resources are there. The coal industry has a reallocation of colliery policy going back to 1926 under the old Duncan commission report, when they were shrinking the thing, centralizing the operation as far as possible, and catering to the maritime market only. That is our position today. I do not see any program for expanding the industry.

There is a program of further mechanization, with loading machines at the face, to try to increase production in the collieries that are now operating. But that is not expanding the industry, and it will not free us from almost complete dependence on the United States for our supply of coal. I was wondering if the board had anything in mind with regard to new openings in order to expand our own industry. It would not happen overnight, of course. Some planning would have to be done, keeping markets in mind. But I think it is about time that we at least began to take a long-range view with regard to developing our own resources.

I wish to read, for the minister's benefit, a passage from a letter I have here. I was surprised when I obtained this letter, and I have authority to use it. It is a letter from Mr. R. C. Vaughan, president of the Canadian National Railways, in reply to a letter from Mervyn Brown, president of Alberta Hard Coals Limited. He was writing to the president of the Canadian National Railways —and I will not read all of the letter—probing the possibilities of this resource about which we were talking last night. The pertinent part of the letter reads as follows:

> In normal times the problem has been to find a market for the coal produced not only in western Canada but also coal produced in eastern Canada and the government of Canada has expended large sums of money by means of subventions to enable that to be done.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who wrote that?

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. R. C. Vaughan, president of the Canadian National Railways. The letter continues:

> It is quite likely that in three or four years, or sooner, that condition will again exist.

That is all of the letter that I need to quote. But it shocks me that a man in that position would make the statement that the condition which existed prior to the war with regard to the marketing of our own coal in Canada would likely be the condition with which we shall be faced within the next three or four years or sooner.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that all the talking I have done in this house about coal during the past three or four years was based on that assumption. I myself could see a drift back to what we went through after the last war when we lost the Quebec markets, and the struggle we had to get back into those markets. In the many conferences and discussions we had with the operators and with government officials in the years when our collieries were working only two or three days a week, that was always the story. They said, "You find the markets for us and we will make new openings", or "We will produce more coal", or "These collieries will operate on a five-day week basis". But it was always the question of markets. I am wondering if that kind of thought, coming from a high official of the Canadian National Railways who knows something about the field of fuel—and he must know something about it; the Canadian National Railways consume a great deal of it and haul a great deal of it across the country—is at the back of the minds of the coal board, for example, the minister himself or government officials. We are sitting back, fearful of developing our own resources in Canada, because we think that three or four years from now there may not be the markets which would permit the operation in this country. Has the board considered attempting to get away from dependence upon the United States, to the extent we are now depending upon them, by developing and extending our own resources, and trying to develop some zoning of markets in this country so as to develop the industry here?

My own opinion is, of course, as I have stated on many occasions in the house, that under the system of so-called free enterprise I do not believe the coal resources of Canada will ever be developed. I do not think we shall find risk capital in this country from coast to coast, or in the central provinces, which will put money into that kind of business. I believe this resource, which is basic to our whole economic set-up, is something which will have to be managed and taken over by the government because, in my view, the government is the only organization with the necessary funds for development as it should be carried out.

I shall not discuss the matter further. My main purpose in rising was to inquire from the minister if there is any substance in the thought expressed in this letter by Mr. Vaughan, that there is a chance of our swinging back to a no-coal situation in Canada, and returning to the operation of collieries for two or three days in the week. Or has the board a program of extending and developing our own resources from a long-range standpoint, in order to get away from our dependency upon the United States to the extent which is now necessary?

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to follow what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. I do so because I am deeply interested in coal, coming from a province where we have about 24 per cent of the known lignite deposits in Canada, and most of which lies in my own constituency.

I support the hon. member when he says we have to have a policy with a social consciousness at the root of it. We cannot discuss the fuel policy intelligently unless we discuss it on the basis of development across the country, not only as it applies to coal, but as it applies to oil and other fuel deposits.

I would bring to the attention of the minister the fact that it was only last year that we had a tremendous shortage of fuel in eastern Canada. During the war, too, we were dependent upon the United States for supplies of coal for our industry. I am sure that with the proper type of development in this country, and with our known deposits, we can safeguard ourselves by developing those deposits. At the present time we are imposing upon our people rigid restrictions in an attempt to save United States dollars. We must remember that we import about $150 million worth of United States coal, and pay out about $75,000,000 in freight charges to bring it to Canada, making a total of $225 million, or a quarter of our national deficit in United States dollars. This fact should bring before the government the necessity of developing our own coal fields.

In my own constituency some weeks ago one mine was shut down, and the workers in the mine were given notice by the company that their services were no longer required because the mine was shut down indefinitely. I believe the government should take some responsibility in this regard. I am glad that the coal board has been set up, but I believe it should undertake the development of coal throughout the country, so that our nation will be safeguarded both in peace and war against any restrictions which might be placed against the importation of fuel from other countries, and so that our industries will be able to operate with the help of our own resources.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the dominion fuel board is to keep informed on all problems of Canada related to fuel, and to see that no difficulties arise which may be avoided. It is the duty of the board to see that the industry functions as efficiently as possible.

There are many problems connected with fuel in Canada, the first of which is the problem of production and distribution. I can say that this problem has been handled better during the past twelve months than ever before in our history. Every mine has been kept operating at capacity, and the fuel has been sold either domestically in Canada, or in export markets. That is something which I believe was not done as well even in war years, because there were interruptions in those years which have been avoided during the past year.

Then there is the problem of supply in the central provinces. It is necessary to have sufficient coal in the country, so that no hardship results either to industry or to private citizens through a shortage of coal.

There is the further problem of fuel oil. Canada has been dependent upon outside sources for about 90 per cent of that product. I am happy to say, however, that the ratio is going to change rather rapidly, as we hope to develop in western Canada a source of supply which to a considerable extent will offset the quantities being imported at the present time.

Then there is the problem of natural gas. This is a provincial matter, because gas is not distributed outside the province in which it is produced. Nevertheless the government and the coal board have been able to give some help in western Ontario, where an effort is being made to bring in gas from Texas.

All these fuel problems require constant study. If any serious failure occurs in any of these problems, the result may be calamitous. In a country with the climate of Canada, nothing could be more serious than to be without fuel in the midst of a Canadian winter.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): In that connection, does not the minister think it would be better to have a board set up which would take into consideration the development of all types of fuel?

Mr. HOWE: This board is charged with that responsibility. It has no mandatory powers over fuel oil, but it can be given those mandatory powers under the act, simply by the passage of an order in council.

People speak a good deal about development, and suggest that we should open new mines. The hon. member for Cape Breton South, who probably knows the problem better than I do, will agree with me that the limitation is one of manpower, the supply of qualified miners. If we had more qualified miners in western Canada we could produce more coal. If we had more workers on the face in Cape Breton we would produce more coal. The simple method of opening up new mines will not produce new miners.

Mr. GILLIS: Why was the apprenticeship scheme, which was established during the war in connection with the coal mines, abandoned? Miners were being developed rapidly, but that scheme was abandoned. That is why you are not getting men at the face today.

Mr. HOWE: Because in wartime we had control of labour which we have lost in peacetime. My hon. friend knows how that happened.

Mr. GILLIS: Could this board be given that authority now?

Mr. HOWE: I am afraid not. It is impossible to order men to do anything these days. If men come forward and volunteer for apprenticeship, I am sure it could be arranged. The other matter, about which the hon. member speaks, was more or less a mandatory affair.

Mr. GILLIS: I am sure you would get hundreds of apprentices if you re-established the scheme.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to confer with my colleague the Minister of Labour and suggest that he re-establish his school. But it would be a different kind of school from the one which operated during the war, as my hon. friend will appreciate.

Then, reference has been made to the lignite deposits in Saskatchewan. The hon. member knows as well as I do that lignite cannot be stored in any quantity. As the hon. member knows, the mines in Saskatchewan have always closed down in June, July and August since he was a small boy and probably they will in future, because the coal must be moved from the mine into use immediately, or otherwise it will not be coal; it will be just a pile of dust. I do not know that the coal board with all its magic can do anything about that situation. An attempt has been made to briquette the coal, I think perhaps with some success. I am not sure how that briquetting process is working out.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I do not pose as being a coal expert, but I know they are briquetting coal there and have been doing so for years. They have developed a good binder, and the briquetted coal can be shipped any place in Canada. I think the minister will admit that it is high-grade fuel in that condition.. I submit that the capacity of the briquetting plant should be increased, either by private enterprise or by the government. It would then be possible to ship the larger quantities to those parts of Canada where fuel is needed, and to sell the by-products.

Mr. HOWE: I am not familiar with the briquetting plant, but I should imagine that the mines at Estevan can produce in one day sufficient coal to keep the briquetting plant in operation for a year.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): That is true.

Mr. GILLIS: Then why not expand the plant?

Mr. HOWE: Expand it 365 times? We must be practical about these things.

Mr. GILLIS: Put in a few more retorts.

Mr. HOWE: The only reason the plant is operating today is that its capital cost was written off. It was sold to the present owner for one dollar. There is no great encouragement, either for the government or for anyone else, to make the capital investment required to briquette Estevan coal and expect to do the country any great good.

Mr. GILLIS: I was out there and had a look at that plant. The plant was set up in the first place by the Saskatchewan government, which was Liberal at that time, at a cost of $1,000,000, but it was never used. It is a low-temperature carbonization process, the process upon which Germany built her whole industrial set-up. There are only two of these plants in North America. This was simply a small pilot plant, and it was sold later by the government for a dollar. It is just a small affair that is struggling along.

If the coal board took hold of it and, as suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia, put in a few more retorts, the fuel could be sent to any part of the world, once it was briquetted, and the by-products could be utilized. I suggest that there is a possibility to do something with Saskatchewan coal. The board should have a look at that plant and see what can be done about expanding it.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the coal board is to see that coal is produced as efficiently as possible in all parts of Canada; that it is distributed as efficiently as possible; that sufficient coal is brought into the deficient areas to meet their requirements; that the distribution of oil is in the best interests of Canada, and to promote the efficient production and use of fuels across the dominion. I think the board has got away to a good start.

Mr. IRVINE: Could the minister give us the names of the personnel of the coal board and also tell the committee if some of the members have been or are still closely connected with United States coal companies which are shipping coal into this country?

Mr. HOWE: The chairman of the board is Mr. Uren, who had charge of the distribution of materials throughout the war years. Mr. D. W. Morrison was the mayor of Glace Bay. He is an old coal miner and was the unanimous choice of the miners in that area. Mr. P. Streeter is a coal operator in New Brunswick. Mr. MacLaren was associate coal controller for the dominion during the war years. He has a distributing business in Toronto and is familiar with the problems of Ontario. Mr. A. Vissac is a consulting engineer who has been operating in the western provinces for many years past. Mr. W. Whittaker is secretary of the coal association of western Canada, and Major-General Renaud is a gentleman who is familiar with the distribution problems in Quebec. He was not previously associated with the industry.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Last evening there was a discussion with regard to the Highwood property in Alberta, and reference was made to the findings of the royal commission on coal. Has any investigation of the Highwood property been made at any time by the fuel board?

Mr. HOWE: The fuel board have received samples of the coal and have had it analysed in the dominion laboratories. There has been no opportunity to visit the property, which is not a coal operation; rather it is a coal lease. There are really two leases. My hon. friend has referred to the Highwood property. The property our friend Brown is interested in is the Burns leases, on the other side of the river.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Reference was made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South to Mr. Vaughan, president of the Canadian National Railways. When Mr. Brown, to whom reference has just been made by the minister, communicated with Mr. Vaughan in regard to the building of a branch line of some fifty miles to the Highwood property, Mr. Vaughan, among other things, said this on May 18:

> The royal commission on coal, appointed by the government, in their report of December, 1946, dealt with the Highwood area (pages 37 and 38). I understand the fuel board at Ottawa has also made some investigations into those areas in relation to the general coal supply of Canada.

As the minister has just said, apparently the fuel board did not make any investigation of this area, apart from an investigation with regard to the quality of coal to be found there. I have read over the statements made last evening with regard to this matter, and it seems to me that it is rather unfair to the application which is being made to rely on the findings of the royal commission on coal. The reason for this was set out last evening by the hon. member for Calgary West when he referred to the fact that the evidence of Mr. Brown and the representations of Mr. Charles McTague, council for Mr. Brown and his associates, were not completed. Indeed, their representations were withdrawn and they themselves withdrew from the commission. That being so, I do not think the findings of the royal commission should be accepted in any way in connection with deciding upon the value of this property and the need of a spur being built.

To keep the record clear, I have in my hand a copy of a letter written by Mr. McTague. Incidentally, Mr. McTague was for some years a judge of the court of appeal of Ontario. He resigned some years ago. He is a man who would be most careful in any representations he would make, and on October 1, 1945, he wrote the following letter to Mr. J. H. Frawley.

> Dear Mr. Frawley:
>
> Re Allied Industrials Limited
> With reference to your letter of September 25, and subsequent telephone conversation I have to advise that my clients wish to withdraw their applications from the commission and consequently it is not deemed necessary to file the material to which you have reference.
> My clients are of the opinion after their experience at the hearing in Toronto that no good purpose will be served . . .

The reasons for that statement are set out, but I do not need to place them on the record. The letter then goes on:

> Therefore, I should appreciate it if you would place on the records of the commission this letter of withdrawal.

So far as this property is concerned, I feel that those who advocate the opening of this area do not deserve, in the interests of the country as a whole, to be met by the argument that a royal commission had met and come to a determination finally or indeed partly conclusive, because representations were not made for the reasons set out in that letter.

My hon. friend mentioned Mr. Brown, and last night certain references were made to him. I am not going to place his views before the committee, but if there was any intention on the part of the right hon. gentleman in referring to Mr. Brown as a promoter, as he did, to convey any innuendo—

Mr. HOWE: Promotion is an honourable profession, is it not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to hear my right hon. friend say that, because it removes any suggestion that might be conveyed by the use of the words in the manner in which they were used.

Reference was made to the personnel of the coal board. I do not know anything about the members of the coal board, but it is the contention of Mr. Brown that their attitude has been far from co-operative. He points out that one of its officials was a member of the western coal association, which is unfavourable to the opening of this area. He further states that another member of the board has been the president of the Rochester and Pittsburgh Coal Company, a United States coal company, which has been exporting millions of tons of coal into Canada. He also points out that Mr. Vissac, to whom my right hon. friend referred, and who was the consulting engineer for Mr. Brown in 1944, approved the opening of the Highwood coal area. These are the representations that Mr. Brown makes, and these representations, as I see it, deserve to be answered by the minister, to the end that any sense of unfairness that is felt by Mr. Brown will be removed, if not dissipated.

My right hon. friend said in answer to the hon. member for Cape Breton South that, regardless of the properties which could be developed, lack of available miners would prevent any development. He stated that the proposal of this group with whom Mr. Brown was associated was to mine millions of tons of hard coal by strip-mining methods, thus avoiding the necessity of having underground miners. I do not know anything about this proposition from personal knowledge, but if what the Minister of Agriculture said at a dinner that I attended along with other members of this house is to be seriously regarded, I again bring this matter to the minister's attention, to the end that further consideration be given to this application.

The minister said last night that other coal companies had built their own spur lines, but my information is that none of these spur lines has been longer than five miles or so, and in no case is there one approaching fifty miles in length. The hon. member for Davenport, who has given his usual close study to this matter says there is no spur line at all to a hard-coal mine which has been built by the operator.

One of our major responsibilities as members of this house is to see that fairness is done to all, and if the allegations and contentions of Mr. Brown be correct, then I think the whole question deserves to be reconsidered. Certainly Mr. Brown and those associated with him should not be faced with the findings of a royal commission report that was not based upon full evidence and, indeed, is based upon evidence, the representations covering which were withdrawn prior to the conclusions of the royal commission.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot understand what this is all about. I have read full-page advertisements attacking myself personally for something I failed to do in connection with this venture, and I have seen this group issue full-page advertisements in the press. So far as I know, Mr. Brown has never made any proposition to the government at all.

There is in the neighbourhood a mine operated by John Boyd, which is trucking its coal to the nearest railroad and getting along all right. I cannot imagine what magic there is about this particular property that requires us to build a railroad. Sixty miles is not an uneconomical trucking distance. There has been tremendous excitement and tremendous pressure about this property, but absolutely nothing done in the way of development.

Mr. Brown asked for permission to appear before the royal commission on coal, which was made up of men who had no prejudices in the matter that I know of. They heard him for a time, and then he withdrew on the advice of counsel. I would judge from that, that he did not have very much to present or that it did not carry very much weight. He applied to the Canadian National Railways. I must say that I disagree absolutely with Mr. Vaughan as to the future of the coal industry in this country; nevertheless I cannot imagine Mr. Vaughan building sixty miles of railroad into this particular property when he could build fewer miles of railroad and get an equally good product. There is no magic in this particular property. I have known about the Burns' leases since I first went to western Canada thirty years ago. I have actually visited them. Probably I am the only man in the house who has ever seen this property. What is all the shooting about? Who wants to do what? I have never been able to discover it.

Mr. FERGUSON: I saw this man's advertisement in the paper. Naturally, as a Canadian, I was interested. I went to the Royal York hotel. I heard him contend many things. I said, "If you wish I will meet you in Ottawa." I made arrangements to meet him here. He never met me. I got a wire at the last moment. I told him I was willing to meet him at eleven a.m. I think the man does not know where he is heading. Why waste any more time in this House of Commons and expend many more dollars of the people's money on a man like that? The man is all talk.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to refer to this matter. As a pioneer in this national fuel policy, twenty-five years ago on the 13th day of March, 1923, I introduced a resolution calling for a national fuel supply. I asked for the adoption of a policy to that end. I am too modest to call myself a Progressive; I am a Conservative. I asked for the adoption of a national policy of bonuses, subventions and subsidies, so that all the coal we use in Canada could be mined and coked under the British flag. I referred to Wales, Alberta and the maritimes. I find that the minister has made some progress. There is no doubt about it at all. We had the same difficulty when I raised this problem, on March 13, 1923. At that time we had not enough miners, no help from the national railways, no merchant marine, and all that kind of thing which we needed for the policy.

Ten years before that, we had an experiment made. In 1912 a ship left Swansea, Wales, with several thousand tons of Welsh coal and landed at the harbour improvement in my constituency, in Ashbridge's bay. One hundred and four members of parliament were down the ship channel the other day. They saw the large piles of coal, about 800,000 tons, brought in, instead of by all-rail, by water through the Welland canal from lake Erie ports; Buffalo; Erie, Pennsylvania; Ashtabula; Cleveland; and many other coal centres in Pennsylvania. We have had experiments made.

We have the same problem today. It is not a new problem at all. We knew of this problem when we started the harbour improvements. I believe the time is coming when the government should try to get more miners into the country. There are many displaced persons from Europe today who could go into the coal industry in this country. If we could get 1,000, 2,000 or 3,000 of them it would help.

[Mr. Howe.]

Many of them have been deported from some of the mines in eastern Europe, and are now slaves working for the Russian government. If our friends at the UNO would only make some representations I believe we could get some miners into these three parts of the country.

I proposed an embargo on coal in 1923. The debate lasted three days. It is not a new problem; it has been going on since I have been in the house. It is 95 per cent a transportation problem plus a labour problem. The very same state of affairs prevails today. The same situation exists with regard to Alberta coal moving westward. We had hoped to bring in a whole lot of it. One of the western papers said they had to bring United States coal as far west as Saskatoon and other places farther up from the border, on account of Alberta coal going west. I predicted this in 1923. Hon. members will see that if they look up Hansard of March 13, 1923. It was said that the government of the day could do nothing. Five or six years before that, it was suggested that maritime coal be given bonuses, subventions and subsidies. The minister made some progress last year. I give the minister some credit for having made some progress. He should consider further the question of giving subventions to miners and mines that produce large amounts of coal.

The minister knows more about this matter than I do. I am speaking from memory. I referred to the Burns matter near Calgary at that time. They had some mines in Alberta when I brought this matter up before. I believe the government should consider the policy now along the same lines, because it is all a protectionist measure to use Canadian coal to try to save dollars. Look at what we would have saved in dollars since 1923. In 1923 we were sending out $52,000,000. We were sending that out in wages to Pennsylvania coal barons. Sir Henry Thornton was head of the Canadian National Railways at the time. He did not think very much of my policy. It would be far better for us to consider that policy and do something to develop our mines and bring them forward. Although I do not pose as a Progressive, I predicted in 1923 that the prairie provinces, which were then largely agricultural, would become, in the not too distant future, great manufacturing and mining districts. To the great credit of the Dominion of Canada, that has been proven true in the west, as the minister knows. Mining discoveries have been made. About eight or ten different types of mineral wealth have been discovered, and that is a great credit to the western natural resources of this country.

I believe a policy of some system of reasonable subventions or bonuses should be adopted to develop the mines. That policy has been adopted in some of the departments at the present time. The principle is a principle whether it is applied to coal or some other class of mineral. The provinces have applied that principle. Some of the mining areas of new Ontario have been subsidized.

Some progress has been made. I was told in 1923 that I was talking nonsense when I proposed a national hydro-electric policy for the Northwest Territories and for all Canada then. The day is not far distant when this question will be solved. It is true that in Toronto there is not as much Alberta coal as we should like to get. At the present time I believe they are down to a few hundred thousand tons. We have the docks at Ashbridge's bay piled up with coal as high as the galleries. In Alberta coal they are down to two or three hundred thousand tons. We could use 500,000 tons or vastly more. That has taken place since I was the head of the harbour board. A solution of the problem is transportation, plus mining, plus deposed person's extra labour. In Alberta and the maritimes, they have the sites; they have the mines. The only trouble is transportation. The merchant marine is not doing as much as it could do in the maritimes. If we had additional miners in the country to open up the mines we could produce in Alberta and the maritimes a large part of the coal we require.

The school board is willing to take Alberta, Welsh and maritime coal. We should like to get it for our public schools. The boards of education would like to get it. Many of the businessmen would like to get it. I know that the Toronto board of trade which hon. members met the other day would like to get it. They were very glad to see my hon. friends. We hope it will be an annual visit. I see my young friend the hon. member for Fraser Valley here tonight. He is one of those who believe in the policy that I have been pressing here. We hope we shall have hon. members all back next year. If not there, at the trade fair.

I am not going to detain the committee longer tonight. We had a long day today and a long day yesterday. I want to commend the minister for the policy he has inaugurated. I hope it will be extended, so that if an ordinary citizen comes forward and gives security, either through the bank or in the way of a guarantee, the government will not lose any money.

I believe the same principle should be applied to the development of coal as the government has used in connection with housing. Money has been lent through the banks and the banks have been guaranteed. We have spent $89,000,000 in this work and the loss has amounted to only one-fifth of one per cent. We should have some such policy in connection with coal development, because next winter will be a disastrous one for the Canadian people. This has a direct bearing upon public health in Canada. I do not know what our situation will be next winter if we cannot obtain some substitutes for coal to eke out our fuel supply.

I have visited homes of soldiers, and of other people as well, in the riding I represent, and I know what conditions they are living under at the present time. In the lower part of my riding there are a great many soldiers. There are many poor families in that working men's district who are suffering severely. As a matter of fact, it might be called a soldier district. I was indeed surprised to witness the state of affairs in some of the homes I visited. There are people who are living in cellars without any fuel at all. This is a serious state of affairs. It directly affects the public health and is something that is closely related to the housing problem.

The minister is a progressive man and, during the war, he did good work. I would ask him to apply the same policy as in homes to the development of our coal mines. There is no reason why we could not make use of more displaced persons in the coal industry, and at the same time make every effort to solve the transportation problem. We should have proper cars for removing the coal. I have seen Alberta coal in transit once or twice and it was being moved in dilapidated wooden box cars. Some of the coal was falling out. It was being moved in the type of cars used before the war. There was a large vote for our national railways, and I suggest that we should have proper cars for the transportation of our coal and at the same time make use of displaced persons, where possible, as miners to aid, bringing them in for the development of the coal mining industry. If the government would introduce a proper coal policy I am sure it would receive the support of everyone. As it is, I think they have made some progress since the last session.

Mr. CASE: I have listened to the presentation by the hon. member for Calgary West and the hon. member for Davenport. I have known Mr. Brown for some time and he has always been associated with fuel enterprises. I am thinking now of the promotion of natural gas, artificial gas, peat bogs and western coal. That seems to be the latest venture.

I have followed advertisements in the press and have listened to much of his propaganda with respect to this tremendous field.

I recognize that Canada is vulnerable so far as fuel is concerned, and I am inclined to think the minister is interested in finding a solution for our fuel problem. He is as much interested as any other good Canadian would be. He has no ulterior motives and he is anxious to see our resources developed. I should like to have his assurance that geologists connected with the department are acquainted with the quality and the character of the coal.

I have made inquiries, because I had something to do with the handling of Drumheller coal in western Canada. Some would slack easily and would not store over a great period of time, but if this is a rugged type of coal that could stand handling I think some method could be evolved to solve the transportation problem. This coal could be delivered to the head of the lakes, dumped in huge mounds from which it could be transshipped by water so as to get the full benefit of the water rates, which are cheaper than the rail haul.

This may have been all considered and carefully studied; but that is the thought I have in mind, because, after all, it is a transportation problem. When Alberta coal is advertised in my own city of Owen Sound and in the adjacent municipalities, people are glad to have the opportunity of using it. But, as the minister said on a previous occasion, they have not so far delivered more than 500,000 tons to the province of Ontario. Be that as it may, I still feel that if we are to consider, as we are doing at the present time, our disadvantages and disabilities in the matter of United States exchange, we can well afford to consider the advantages of subventions or otherwise in encouraging the use of our native fuel.

I do not think I have much more to say on this question. I believe that the transportation problem could be solved and that the necessary carriage facilities, the railway cars, could be provided so that a great deal more coal could be delivered in Ontario. After listening to the discussion that has taken place in the committee, I do not think this is any new discovery. There is ample coal available in Alberta. They are calling it canthracite, associating it with anthracite, but it is either a lignite or a bituminous coal, as I understand. Having served on the public utilities commission in my city, I may say we bought thousands of tons of coal, and I agree with the minister that we bought our coal without seeing the product at all. We bought it on the strength of its analysis, the B.T.U.'s and ash content. It is a free market as far as we are concerned; if Alberta coal had been available at anything like competitive prices our sympathies would have been with the Canadian product and we would have used it.

We happen to be a lake port, and my suggestion is compatible with our own best interests. If the coal could be hauled to Fort William or Port Arthur, when grain haulage does not make a great demand upon the use of our boxcars, there is no reason why it could not be brought in. I received a good many carloads of coal in my day, delivered in boxcars; not open dump cars. The coal could be rolled down there and piled up for water carriage, and as soon as transportation opened in the spring we could take advantage of the water.

Mr. Brown should be encouraged in his endeavours to interest capital in this venture, and our Canadian railways, both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, should have a sympathetic understanding of the situation. It is only a sixty-mile spur that is involved. I hope their purpose will not be defeated on this account. I have no quarrel with the ministry. I think they are as much concerned about this matter as we are. In the trying days of the war we valued the efforts that were made, and perhaps I should be more complimentary than critical.

Mr. HOWE: This item was passed this afternoon and we have had an hour's discussion. It is obvious that we have reached the stage where every speech is a repetition of what has been said before. Can we not pass the item and allow the Minister of External Affairs to get on with his estimates?

Mr. McLURE: What I am about to say will not consist of repetition.

Mr. HOWE: There is no coal in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. McLURE: I wish to make one statement. It seems that we have got down to personal matters and the personnel of the company. I think the hon. member for Simcoe North made a mistake in his reference to Mr. Brown.

Mr. HOWE: Under what item does Mr. Brown come?

Mr. McLURE: Under the same item under which this discussion has been taking place.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: There is nothing in the item to justify the hon. member.

Mr. McLURE: Then, as a matter of privilege may I say this? I have known Mr. Brown for years. He was one of the best citizens of our province, and he left that part of Canada as a young man. His background of parentage and training at home cannot be duplicated by any man sitting in this house. As one who listened to the hon. member for Brandon introducing him the other night, as he knew him in the west, I can say that no one can have anything against Mr. Brown as an excellent citizen of Canada.

Mr. FERGUSON: Let us be brief about this matter. Let us get down to business and stop wasting time. Personally I have nothing against Mr. Brown. I believe everything that has been said about Mr. Brown is quite correct. I believe no one else in Canada can equal him. But let Mr. Brown, in a businesslike manner approach the minister of reconstruction and, in a businesslike manner—with a stenographer taking down everything he says—for co-operation purposes—lay his case on the table before the proper authorities in this government. If he has anything worthwhile, he will not need to put it in the newspaper as he did and call my attention to it. I have wasted time over Mr. Brown. I waited for Mr. Brown to come to the city of Ottawa on a certain day at eleven o'clock, on the assurance that I as an independent man would lay his case before the house of parliament, and he said he was too busy to keep the appointment. I have never heard any more from the gentleman.

There is a proper channel through which to operate. This is the most important business in Canada to be discussed. Let Mr. Brown lay his case before the government of Canada. If he does not get proper attention, let Canada know the facts, and I will be one of the first to take up his brief. Otherwise, let us dispense with it tonight.

Mr. POULIOT: What about Mr. Jones, Mr. Smith and John Doe?

Mr. IRVINE: I have one question that is not about Mr. Brown. It is well known that we must import a large quantity of coal each year from the United States. It is also well known that we have a great deal of coal in Canada. We have appointed a coal board. Before this item is passed, I should like the minister to say in what way this coal board is expected to increase the production of coal in Canada next year. Exactly what is its function?

Mr. HOWE: The whole purpose of the board is to see that every coal miner in Canada is enabled to work as many days as he can work, to produce all the coal he can, and to see that the coal is marketed appropriately inside or outside Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: The policy the minister has outlined is a good one. With regard to what the hon. member for Beauce said not long ago, it is unfortunate that the same thing is not done in England, that the coal miners there do not work as much as they should, and that the British government does not see to it that they do. If they did that, England would be able to export coal to the value of a billion dollars more each year. Then they would need no help from any other country and there would be no dollar problem. It is socialism that is the cause of all the trouble.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

52. Departmental administration, $1,915,860.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Some six weeks ago we had a full discussion in the house on the general policies of the Department of External Affairs. With respect to the operations of the department, they are reflected principally in items 52, 53 and 54, which provide the funds required for departmental administration, passport office administration, and representation abroad. The increase in the field of activities of the department is reflected in an increase of $286,000 in the amount asked for in the main estimates for departmental administration, and $1,074,974 in the amount asked for in representation abroad.

In the course of the calendar year 1947, ten new missions were opened and two have been opened since January 1, 1948. It is planned to open a consulate general in San Francisco on July 1, and a consulate in Boston on October 1. None of these missions was operating on a full basis during the past fiscal year, and their operation during the current year accounts for substantial increases in the expenses provided for in these estimates. The increased number of missions has resulted in larger staffs both in Ottawa and abroad. A year ago the total staff of the department was 866. It is now 1,095. This increase in numbers, together with an increase in civil service salaries, has resulted in the greater payroll requirements in the department, which accounts for most of the increase in the estimates.

The other major change compared with last year's estimates is in the contribution toward the expenses of international organizations. The percentages have not been changed but, the budgets of these international organizations having been increased, our proportion has increased. These estimates were considered in detail by the standing committee on external affairs and were reported the other day as approved by that committee. I have no doubt hon. members will have some additional questions to ask about some points which may not have been brought out in examination in the committee. So far as I am able to do so, I shall be glad to attempt to answer those questions; but I do not think hon. members would wish me to make any more detailed comment at this time.

Mr. HACKETT: It is true that the minister made a lengthy and complete statement on external affairs about six weeks ago. Nevertheless, in the interval there has been a great deal of tension and anxiety; and while, as the minister says, an opportunity was afforded in the external affairs committee to discuss external affairs, there remain a few matters concerning which I am sure the committee would be glad to have a little additional information.

I am not aware that any other department has sent its estimates to a committee. I am not prepared to pass final judgment upon the practice, but I think I am stating a prevailing view among members of the committee when I say there are some advantages in the practice when applied to this particular department. We had the benefit of meeting a number of departmental officials. Mr. Pearson, Mr. Chance, Mr. Matthews, Mr. MacDermot, Mr. Riddell, Miss Burwash, Mr. Moran, Mr. Rae and possibly others were before the committee. On several occasions when questions were asked of these witnesses, the ever-vigilant and paternal parliamentary assistant indicated to the committee that it might not be fair to persist in certain questions to a departmental official; and I think he was right.

We had hoped—and I am sure the minister had hoped—that he would be able to come to the committee. I am sure he could have answered questions by various members of the committee concerning aspects of policy which departmental officials did not consider that they should discuss.

The great preoccupation of the government in the sphere of external affairs, and the principal preoccupation, I believe, of the department, is the maintenance of peace and the entering upon those negotiations which are necessary to give effect to policies which will lead to agreements and understandings that will make peace enduring.

I am going to ask the minister to state what events of importance have taken place in the international field since he made his general review of the international situation some six weeks ago. I ask him to state what negotiations are under way with regard to the partition of Palestine, with regard to the establishment of a government in that portion of Germany which is not under Russian rule, how much longer he expects the Canadian representative on the court in Japan to continue at that post, what are Canada's relations with China at the present time, what further steps if any Canada is taking with regard to the inclusion of Newfoundland in the federation, where there has been any modification in the relationship with the United States concerning seaways, whether anything further has been done in considering the royal style and titles of the king, whether any change in the relations between this country and South Africa has followed in the wake of the recent election in that country and, generally, what has been done toward completing any relationship between Canada and the countries of western Europe, and, in particular, with the other members of the commonwealth, with regard to resisting any possible breach of the peace from any quarter whatsoever.

These are headings concerning which I suggest the minister may feel inclined to make a few comments that would be of interest to the committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I should not like to attempt to make an all-inclusive statement of events which may be of consequence to Canada and which have taken place in the last six weeks. I think we must recognize that practically all happenings of international consequence in the whole world are of pretty direct and immediate interest to us. I would not wish it to be concluded from anything I may say or avoid saying tonight that I regard as matters of consequence only those I mention.

The hon. member has listed quite a number of topics to which I may refer; but I should not like to give the impression that there may not be other matters of importance which have happened in the international field within the last six weeks.

With respect to Palestine, I think the most important and satisfactory event has been the acceptance by both parties of a truce, and their apparent acceptance of the offices of Count Bernadotte as mediator to try to arrange that strife will not again break out in the Holy Land. Canada has been extremely careful to avoid doing or saying anything which might prejudice the peaceful situation which momentarily exists. We have felt that we should be very careful to avoid doing anything that, rightly or wrongly, either party might regard as making any change prejudicial to it, while the truce is in operation.

Mr. HACKETT: Has Canada sent any personnel to Palestine and, if so, under what conditions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, Canada has sent no personnel to Palestine. So far as I am informed, a very small guard of fifty is being recruited voluntarily from the ordinary staff of the secretariat of the united nations, and I believe that that guard was being flown from New York today. It consists of fifty of the regular personnel of the secretariat of the united nations, who volunteered to act as a token guard to assist the mediator in his undertaking to bring about a settlement there.

Mr. HACKETT: Have any Canadians joined that unit?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No Canadians have joined that unit. My information is that all but five are United States citizens. Two are French citizens who were in the employ of the united nations at Lake Success; one is of Swedish origin, and another is of Danish origin.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Do they go as civilians?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They go as civilians employed by the united nations in a custodial capacity. They were guards of the premises at Flushing Meadows and Lake Success, and they probably went in the uniforms they wore as members of the custodial staff of the secretariat, but about that I am not sure.

Mr. JAQUES: Will those fifty people who are going to Palestine be the nucleus of an international police force?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that there is any international police force other than the custodial force the united nations have at Flushing Meadows and Lake Success. They go as bodyguards for the mediator and to assist him in the organization of his office on the island of Rhodes. I think it is for the purpose of bringing together the parties to this dispute and trying to get them to recognize that certain solutions are inevitable and should be accepted without bloodshed.

With respect to the constitution or semi-permanent constitution for the three zones occupied by the forces of the United Kingdom, the United States and France, as I stated some time ago in the house we did not ask to be invited to attend the discussions which took place in London, although we were kept informed of everything that was going on. The reason we did not insist upon being brought in at that time was our recognition of the fact that if we had been brought in, a great many others would also have been brought in and it might have hampered the negotiations which were taking place for this semi-permanent solution. However, we reserved our position that when the peace treaty was being considered we wished to have a role commensurate with the role we had in carrying on wartime operations.

Mr. HACKETT: I understood that Canada has submitted a memorandum suggesting a form of government based on the principle of federalism which might be applicable in Trizonia. The suggested form of government differed slightly from that of our own system, in that the component states were to be the residuary legatees of all power, whereas here the dominion is. If my information is accurate, I should like to know whether we submitted that memorandum on our own initiative or upon invitation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was submitted to the officials of six governments participating in the London talks, as a comment upon the information that was being communicated to us. We have not published the memorandum we submitted, because we thought that, by doing so, it might further complicate the negotiations which were being held. We had nothing of a serious consequence to comment upon in the drafts that we were receiving as being then under discussion in that meeting.

The hon. member asked when we might expect the Canadian representative on the war criminal court in Japan to return to Canada. I am not able to give the exact date, but I may say I had the privilege of having a long conversation some days ago with Brigadier Nolan, who had acted as Canadian prosecutor in these trials. He informed me that the trials had been completed and the cases taken under advisement. He told me that the members of the tribunal would be there only as long as may be required for them to prepare their judgment and reasons for their judgment. I hope that within weeks Mr. Justice McDougall will be back in Canada. At that time I am sure he will be glad to take up his ordinary duties as a member of the court of appeals of the province of Quebec.

The hon. member asked about Canada's relations with China at the present time. There have been no recent developments in that regard.

Then he asked as to what steps, if any, were being taken with regard to the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. As hon. members know, the first vote was not decisive and the second vote, which will be held on July 22, is to be on two questions only, responsible government and confederation. We have maintained and are maintaining the attitude that, after having made what we consider is a fair offer, it is exclusively the right of the people of Newfoundland to express their acceptance or rejection of that offer. We have been most careful to avoid doing anything that either party might regard as an attempt to influence the votes of the inhabitants of Newfoundland.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: During the past couple of days I have received a number of representations from Newfoundland in regard to the question to which the minister has just referred. I should like to refer to these and then ask a question. The first representation is in the form of a telegram which was sent to the Hon. the Secretary of State for Commercial Relations in London, and reads:

> The undersigned members of the bar of Newfoundland are of the considered opinion and firmly maintain that the address to His Majesty by the Newfoundland legislature and the Newfoundland Act of 1933 enacted by the British parliament provided specifically that Newfoundland's constitution would be merely suspended and would be restored to the people at their request when the country again became self-supporting. As the national convention has decided that Newfoundland is self-supporting, therefore only two forms of government can be considered and submitted to the people in the referendum, namely, responsible government and commission government.

That was signed by what I am informed is a majority of the members of the bar there. Today I received a telegram which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. This reads:

> Forwarding information King stated Newfoundland should "indicate clearly and beyond all possibility of misunderstanding their will to become a province."

This telegram then asks if 50 per cent of total electorate or 70 per cent of vote cast would be considered sufficient on the part of the government of Canada to warrant their accepting Newfoundland's application to join the Dominion of Canada. At what point will the government consider that the Newfoundland authorities and the people as a whole desire to be included within the Canadian confederation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I cannot say anything that would be binding in that regard. I do not think the government of Canada will attempt to examine the various representations that may be made to the commonwealth relations office or that may be made to others.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

There was received from the Governor of Newfoundland a communication asking us to receive a delegation from the national convention and then submit such conditions as we would consider fair for the entry of Newfoundland into Canada. Those conditions were submitted. If the authorities recognized as speaking for Newfoundland report that the people of Newfoundland wish to join Canada on the conditions expressed in the proposals that were submitted, it will then, I think, be the responsibility of the government to bring to parliament a recommendation that those conditions be made available to Newfoundland, and it will be for the commission of government or the parliament of the United Kingdom under which that commission of government functions to complete the arrangements, which will in my view no doubt require legislation by the parliament of the United Kingdom and possibly also by the Canadian parliament.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It would require legislation by the Canadian parliament to be consummated?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would require action by the Canadian parliament. I do not think this government or any other government would venture to consummate a thing of such magnitude without having it decided by the parliament of Canada. It will be the responsibility of the government to make a recommendation to parliament, and the government, of course, will have to accept responsibility for the acceptance or the rejection by parliament of its recommendation. But the government will not attempt to say that it could complete the union without the approbation of parliament.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the minister not say it would require an almost overwhelming vote of the people of Newfoundland in order to justify Newfoundland being joined to Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The degree to which the consent of the population of Newfoundland would require to be expressed would have to be appraised by those who are responsible at the present time for Newfoundland affairs. If the government of Newfoundland, having consulted the population, represented to us that the population wished confederation to be consummated I think we would not go behind that declaration to examine to what extent they were justified in making such a representation.

At the present time the constitution of Newfoundland is still suspended, and it is the parliament of the United Kingdom that has legislative jurisdiction over Newfoundland. It exercises that through a commission of government, but it is under the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament at Westminster and I do not think the British government or the British parliament would act in a manner that it did not feel was proper in the interests of the inhabitants of Newfoundland, after consulting them in these two plebiscites.

Mr. HACKETT: I understand that the government might wish that a statute express the will of parliament on granting to Newfoundland access to the dominion. Does that mean that the minister considers that the provision in the British North America Act concerning the admission of Newfoundland into confederation is but a power to be exercised in the ordinary way, that is, by legislation enacted by parliament. I do not recall the exact words of the British North America Act, but it contains a provision which anticipates the possibility of Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada, and my query is: Does the minister consider that enactment merely as a power which parliament may exercise, or is it something more than that which would only require executive action to carry the admission into effect?

Mr. POULIOT: What difference does it make?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It makes a difference as to the proper procedure to bring it about. The British North America Act contemplated that there might be union between Canada and Newfoundland on a joint address of the houses of parliament of Canada and the legislature of Newfoundland. That principle could be resorted to; but it would require, in order to be resorted to, the restoration of self-government in Newfoundland, and then joint addresses under the terms of section 146 of the British North America Act. On those joint addresses, union could be consummated by order of His Majesty in council without legislation in the parliament at Westminster or legislation in the parliament of Canada. But if that method is not resorted to, the matter is not expressly provided for and would have to be accomplished by new legislation that could, I suppose, be adopted only by the parliament at Westminster if there were joint addresses from the houses of the Canadian parliament asking that it be done. The parliament at Westminster amends the British North America Act and makes provision with respect to Canada, but only on the request of the houses of the Canadian parliament; and that could probably be the method adopted. The one provided for in the British North America Act would require, as a condition precedent, that self-government be restored to Newfoundland, that a legislature be elected in Newfoundland and that there be an address from that legislature as well as from the Canadian parliament for an order in council.

Mr. HACKETT: I had a little difficulty in following the minister when he seemed to consider the disability of Newfoundland as creating a disability in Canada. I readily understand that the government might wish to pass a statute. I understand that, but I was not certain whether or not it would be necessary in order effectively to carry out the union to do more than pass addresses in Canada; it, of course, being necessary that Newfoundland, in view of the suspension of parliamentary life there, go to Westminster for the authorization which results—I do not say this in any disrespectful way—from its temporary tutelage.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member is technically right that it would be sufficient to justify legislation by the parliament at Westminster placing Newfoundland within Canada to have addresses from the houses of parliament in Canada, and the agreement of Newfoundland to the legislation would be a matter that would be the responsibility of the parliament at Westminster.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: One question arises from that. Has the minister given consideration to the Newfoundland Act of 1934? A perusal of that act would indicate that the United Kingdom pledged itself to restore self-government there at any time that Newfoundland became self-supporting. In view of the section of the British North America Act which the minister has just read, and having regard to the Newfoundland Act of 1934 that self-government is to be restored in Newfoundland, would it not be a condition precedent before confederation between the nine provinces of Canada and Newfoundland could be consummated?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think so. I think all we have to do is to look after our responsibility, and leave it to those who have constitutional responsibility for the fate of Newfoundland to ascertain whether they are fulfilling their obligations, whether the obligations arise out of the Newfoundland Act or otherwise. I think we can in perfect confidence leave it to the Newfoundland and British authorities to clear everything required on their side to enable a proper union to be consummated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister received any representations from Newfoundland, or the people of Newfoundland or any group in that country, against any action on the part of Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The department would, of course, receive courteously and file anything that would come from any group in Newfoundland, but the department would not act on anything that does not come from those who have the constitutional responsibility for the government of Newfoundland at the present time.

Mr. MacINNIS: With noted lawyers on my right, I was wondering, since the position is now that a referendum is to be taken on two questions—union with Canada or responsible government—if the vote decides for union with Canada it decides against responsible government. Surely the United Kingdom would not then insist that Newfoundland should have responsible government before it could have union with Canada. It seems to me that the question we are discussing is purely academic.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not academic so far as the people there are concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: But the people there are going to decide. If they decide by whatever majority they do decide I do not think Canada can say to the authorities in Newfoundland or to the authorities in the United Kingdom, if they should be acting for Newfoundland, that we cannot accept Newfoundland as a province because the decision of the people has not been decisive enough. I claim that this discussion is purely academic until such time as the referendum is taken and we begin to work it out. Certainly we cannot do anything about it tonight.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say something on the administration item.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The discussion is on Newfoundland. We should try to complete that discussion before discussing other subjects. If the hon. member is to speak on Newfoundland it will be proper for him to speak now. If not, would he mind waiting until we have exhausted the discussion on this subject?

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to be here all evening waiting for others to speak. I have made a study of this question since I came here in 1921, and am not like some of the amateur diplomats who are now appearing on the scene. I have been following this situation for many years past. I want to find out from the Secretary of State for External Affairs what is or what is not the policy of the government at the present time regarding foreign affairs. We may have an invasion just like a thief in the night, the way it came at Pearl Harbor. What are you going to do about it? There is no use in our pretending that we are a first-class power when we are not. I have never been at one of those UNO conventions because I do not believe in them.

In his opening address this session, the minister said that the foreign policy of Canada was wrapped up exclusively with the UNO. That is the present policy of the government. There is no use in our pretending that we can rely on such agencies any longer. That was shown by the action of Gottwald regarding Czechoslovakia in the deposing of the late president. It shocked the whole human world, and shows us the grave danger we are in. What is this famous UNO in which the minister has confidence? We used to have an empire parliamentary association. They safeguarded our interests so far as foreign affairs were concerned. They forgot all about the empire and became pan-American. We are not a first-class power. We have had two wars to teach us that lesson. You have had this second UNO league of nations. We had the first league of nations on which this country expended nearly $5,000,000 in sending deputations over to Geneva. They built buildings costing fabulous sums of money, millions of dollars in Switzerland and Geneva, and, after that was done, it was found that it was a hollow mockery, a sham and a humbug, and drove us into a second war.

There was not a newspaper in the country except one or two which had three or four lines about the collapse of Geneva, and the buildings there are wasted. We sent these deputations over there, which was supposed to be a consolation prize for those members of the government and others to have a little side trip after the session was over. My hon. friends to the left believed in it. My hon. friends to the left, away back in 1938, six months after Munich, right up to the opening of the war years, asked what was the use of depending on Glasgow and London for defence, when we would get all the defence we wanted in Washington; but we had a rude awakening in 1939.

The second war was caused by whom? It was caused by the very people in England, in Canada and in the other dominions who were members of what they called this league of nations society, which we are now recommending for a $5,000 grant, consisting of well-meaning highbrows, parlour pinks, professors, and others. Britain will come to life again in Canada. There is no use in our depending on any such agencies as UNO and similar societies. It was the proposal of the late great president of the United States to bring Geneva to San Francisco, and New York to Lake Success. Now the congress at Washington wishes to get rid of the UNO. Congress wants to get it out of the country. Next week a Republican convention is to be held in Philadelphia for the purpose of selecting a candidate for the presidency. Opinions were expressed in congress in favour of getting the UNO out of the country. The second world war had hardly ended when people started their efforts once more to establish a second league of nations, now known as UNO. There was, as everyone knows, a great gathering at San Francisco, and we had our own ambassadors there, ambassadors from our own party and others. They were there trying to learn diplomacy in a day, just like this magnificent institution that the minister has at the present time at Lake Success.

The government has been spending vast sums of money on this UNO institution. It has gone up to nearly $10,000,000, there being an increase this year of $1,074,974 for salaries alone, or a salary total of $5,083,082. Just imagine that! And what did they do at San Francisco? They divided the nations into powers, large and small, and our own representatives were there and agreed to give the Big Five a veto power. Foreign affairs will always be a political issue in this country. It always has been and it is a blessing that it has, instead of a non-party one, by giving a few a trip to such farces as Lake Success. Canada's policy in foreign affairs is the UNO, and "Let us pretend".

In the first war we were not prepared, and yet a million men went from the dominions to participate in the first war. They went under the individual sovereignty status and autonomy of every dominion, and of those men 130,000 fell on the field of battle. Those men enlisted and died of their own volition, and the men of the dominions repeated it in the second war in five times the number. But in the period between the two wars another organization was started up. Efforts of this kind in league of nations societies or peace societies have been a failure for 100 years or more. We remember the concert of Europe from 1815 to 1823, when Russia, Prussia, and Austria formed what was known as the Holy Alliance. They were going to survey conditions in Europe every five years and when war seemed imminent they would endeavour to bring about peace. It was such a humbug that a great prime minister, George Canning, proposed that Britain get out of Europe altogether. It simply led to the Monroe doctrine. The Holy Alliance lasted from 1815 to 1823 and culminated in what has come to be known as the Monroe doctrine. What was that doctrine? In a word, Mr. Chairman, it was nothing more than the supremacy of Britain on the seas. And that is what has maintained the peace of the world for 100 years from 1815 to the great war of 1914—British supremacy on the seas.

There has been talk, since the end of the second war, about a new UNO, and they have opened up in New York, at Lake Success after San Francisco. They have opened up another agency there, and two of the principal supporters and boosters of UNO, the London Economist and the London Times, have been compelled to say recently it has been a disappointment and a failure, and to demand an end of it.

The fact is that there is no use in our depending on that organization any longer. Are we going to spend another $10,000,000 this year on that organization? What is the use of deceiving ourselves? Why cherish the delusion that UNO can keep the peace? We are as close to war as Churchill has said, as Truman has said, as General Bradley, before the congress committee at Washington, has said, and as the admiral of the fleet at Washington said not so long ago. We are as close to war today as we were in August 1939. We are back where we were then. Conditions have not changed a particle. There is no use in pretending that we can depend for peace on any such agency as the united nations organization at Lake Success. I call it a Lake Failure.

I have been trying to find out what the foreign policy of this country is and I am bound to say that I have failed in the attempt. We have no foreign policy and we never did have one. The foreign policy the minister announced earlier in the session was simply dependence upon the united nations organization. That was the cornerstone of our policy, and if it is the cornerstone of that policy, then I regret to say that I fear invasion. We did nothing to encourage parliamentary association within the empire. We tried to bring on a debate in the spring of 1947 regarding the scuttling of the empire. The empire has been cut to pieces. We have seen what happened in Egypt. We lost our lifeline in the Mediterranean; we lost the Suez canal. And there is Palestine. I will say nothing about that tonight, because we all know what the situation there is.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, this government has no foreign policy and never did have one; neither did our delegates to the UNO in New York have a policy. Not a soldier was to be sent by Canada or the United States to fight in Palestine. What is the use of Trygve Lie and all his works at the UNO? This second league of nations has tried many agencies, and what does Trygve Lie say about it all?

In my opinion we are simply wasting the people's money at Lake Success. We are throwing $10,000,000 into the sink-hole.

The situation in the Atlantic today is dangerous. The British government, Canada consenting, gave up all its bases from Newfoundland to British Guiana to the United States for ninety-nine years. I pointed out at the time what the result of that would be. I pointed out the effect it would have upon Newfoundland's joining confederation, and my predictions have been justified. What was that lease for? It was a 99-year lease, practically a freehold lease, entered into for a consideration that proved of very little practical value. The lease should have been cancelled long ago and charged up to lend-lease. It was entered into in the darkest days of the battle of the Atlantic, and in return for that lease Britain was given some fifty old, out-of-date ships. Many of them had to go into dry dock, being of no use. Others had no coal. Then Pearl Harbor broke and we got a lesson, and Canada was nearly invaded.

I have been talking about a foreign policy. The United States has never had a foreign policy any more than we have had. For 100 years it has been without such a policy. Its foreign policy was that of Andrew Jackson, George Washington and Madison. And what was the essence of that policy? Simply this: no foreign entanglement unless the shores of America are invaded. When the United States fought the Spanish-American war in 1898 that was the ground they took. Afterwards they wanted to abandon Manila. Our foreign policy now is to depend upon the league of nations at UNO and that we have no commitments; we simply yet take the attitude that "Parliament will decide" if war comes. That attitude, as I have pointed out before, has led to the scuttling of the British empire during the past two years. Britain, together with the dominions, stood alone for two and a half, nearly three years, from 1939 to 1942, against the mighty forces of the enemy, and if the war was to have been lost, then surely it would have been lost in those three years, before aid came. But Britain weathered the storm. If Britain and the dominions do not hang together there is little hope for peace so far as the British empire is concerned.

But not only have bases been given up in the Atlantic; we have given up bases in our own country, Canada, to the United States. Why, I do not know. Surely the United States have enough to do to look after their own country. We have a great ally in the country to the south of us. The Anglo-Saxon race, the British peoples and those of the United States, are the hope of the world for peace in the future; but they must be up and doing, because we are living in an armed world in which there has been no peace and in which there is no real peace now. This will prove to have been a forty-year war before it is all over, from 1914 to 1954. Let us not talk about peace when there is no peace. Look at the situation in India where millions of people are left to be massacred. Look at the situation in Palestine. Look at the Suez. And we know what the consequences were from the invasion of Czechoslovakia. Thousands of men in the Russian satellite countries in the Balkans and eastern Europe are being put to work on dry docks and more are sent to the Arctic circle as slaves from Russia's satellite states. It is impossible to find out from the united nations organization how many people are so treated. No one can find out anything about them, so what use is the UNO? Roumania is gone; the Balkans are gone and all that kind of thing. I am far from satisfied with what has been done in the British corridor over in Germany. Canada has no say over there. We are just a minor power. We consented to be a minor power at San Francisco when the Big Five insisted on and obtained the veto power and all that kind of thing. You will have nothing to say about the peace plans whereas, if you had hung together with the mother country, you would have something to say about them. The situation in South Africa is hopeless. There are those in this house—and I have never been one of them—who speak in eulogy of the late prime minister, Lieutenant General Smuts, of South Africa. He is a republican. He has all along wanted to set up a republic in South Africa. He has always been against having a British governor general, and would not give the ballot to the black troops who marched across the desert with Alexander and Montgomery. He was one of the cabinet of the pro-Germans there before world war II. He also signed the charter of the league of nations. Yet he says now the UNO have no power and no jurisdiction over the colonies.

No country in the world is going to give up its control of its own affairs or sovereignty to any foreign power or any foreign body like the UNO, unless the country is so small or has such poor defences that it could be captured in any event. Who is going to give up his sovereignty? Are we in Canada to do that? One of the minister's deputies went away down to Lake Success and Washington. He has been making some speeches and he is in favour of giving up sovereignty over our bases in Canada to the UNO. Where would we have been in the first war if Britain had given up these bases at the Cape, at Gibraltar, at Suez, or at Hong Kong to a foreign country or a league of nations? We would have had to remain neutral also in the first and second wars and we would have lost both wars. That is what giving up bases would have meant. Yet we have mischievous representatives away down at the UNO at Lake Success telling us to give up our sovereignty and to let foreign powers establish bases here in Canada and to let them keep the bases they have.

I think that is about all I have to say about that, but there is another point I wish to mention. The minister has referred to the situation in the Suez, in Palestine, in Germany, in China and in India. It is a tragedy. Wait till history is written about the situation in India and all these places. Britain maintained peace, justice and freedom in India for over one hundred years. She did the same thing in Palestine. She took a mandate there. As I said the other evening in the house, there are about eighteen powers claiming a say in the Palestine situation. The Arabs have been there for hundreds of years. Turkey had it. When the first war broke out, Turkey was opposed to us. The Arabs had it. Egypt had it. Rome had it. Persia had it. Greece had it. Syria had it. All these nations have ruled Palestine.

A great mistake was made in what was done at the close of the last war, after General Allenby marched into Palestine. I was on the same platform when he spoke at the exhibition a few years ago and explained the situation. If you are depending on the UNO, you are depending on something that does not exist. It has no defence force. Who is going to be in a defence force to go to Palestine in a situation like that? If you read the articles in the papers and know the truth about it, you will realize the situation.

Wait till the truth is known about the scuttling of the empire in India and the Suez, giving up the whole lifeline through the Mediterranean to a foreign power and the UNO, so that we have no control at all over the Mediterranean. If war came, the enemy could come down through the Red sea and right across into Canada in about half a day. I can tell you this: We are just pretending. What is being done in Germany? Nothing. In Japan the situation is the same. China is on the verge of civil war.

What are we going to do about the title of the king? It is not divisible, in my opinion. We have had legal authority for that. The king is now king of Canada, but no longer is he emperor of India. The scuttling and the dissolution of the British empire have gone on. A large body of public opinion in this country thinks the same way as I do about the state of affairs.

Canada, which was first in the diamond jubilee procession, is today nowhere. We have no foreign policy except that of the UNO, a sham organization, with the extravagance of the external affairs department that goes on down there, $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 being spent in this work, and no security at all. If you look over the estimates you find that thousands and tens of thousands of dollars are just wasted in administrative offices.

Just recently in the city of Toronto we had a trade exhibition to which came people from the seven seas. It was magnificent to see what these trade agents had done the world over, long before we ever had this magnificent organization of ambassadors and consuls general. Wait till the return is brought down for the travelling expenses. Here is a new group of seven or eight of the health department now on the ship bound for Geneva. Several hundred thousand dollars are being spent in one department on travelling expenses. When it is all added up it amounts to $1,000,000, $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 for Canada's travelling expenses. Canada, a small nation with ten or eleven million people, cannot stand that any longer.

There should have been a conference of Britain and the dominions long ago. Mr. Curtin and Mr. Fraser from New Zealand and Australia, from where the Deputy Speaker is now sitting, addressed this house. They wanted to have an empire conference like the ones we used to have every ten years, to take up questions of trade, defence and migration. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had one while he was in power. He proposed a policy for this country that when Britain was at war, Canada was at war also. That was the policy we had in two wars. I have referred to the first war when a million men went voluntarily, under their own status and autonomy, and 130,000 fell. In the second war the situation was the same, except that ten times the number went. That was the policy: when Britain is at war, Canada is at war. If we go into a third war I venture to say the policy will be the same.

Are we to wait until the enemy sails up the St. Lawrence? They were pretty close to it the last time, in 1943, 1944 and 1945. They were up to the St. Lawrence when a secret meeting was held in this chamber in the second war, and they came up fairly far. Thousands of us, if not the whole House of Commons, might have been carted away overseas. They got a long distance up the St. Lawrence. Are we to wait until that happens again? I say no. The way to avoid it is to pretend no longer. There is no use in spending any dollars on the UNO at Lake Success. As I have said before, if they would only close up for about a year, and Canada get out of it altogether, we would be better off and have a chance of peace and security. ERP or the Marshall plan is just a blueprint. As the Archbishop of Canterbury said the other day in England, he was greatly disappointed in Lake Success and the way the empire had been dissolved. I quoted his remarks in the house the other night and I will not do so again.

I am absolutely opposed to the policy of this government on foreign affairs. I believe that this item should be reduced to reasonable proportions, to about $1,000,000 a year. That would be plenty to spend on such agencies as are now proposed, because you have no foreign policy except the UNO. That is the cornerstone of it. What has the UNO done? It has just dissolved the whole British empire. They want us to give up our bases on the seven seas. If we do so, you know what will happen. We shall have the enemy out here. Owing to this league of nations, we lost two of our great allies in the first war. In the second war you have lost one of them already. I can tell you this, that if you just keep on pretending for another year we shall be just as close to war as we were in 1939, when the second war broke out.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I believe I had the floor, but I took my seat to allow the hon. member to ask a question—and with the result the committee has seen. However I am quite willing to sit down again if the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario wishes to ask a question—because I hope it will be a question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It will be a question, and one in regard to Newfoundland—which I take it we can now return to. I wish to ask this question on the point made by the minister as to the constitutional position. I understand that position clearly, and I would ask another question, which, it seems to me, is relevant.

Supposing in fact that the constitutional requirements the minister has outlined are complied with, but that nevertheless we know there is a strong minority—perhaps almost half the people in Newfoundland—who are opposed to any union with us; in the minister's opinion would that be a matter of indifference to us?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think it would be a matter of indifference to us. But we have made an offer to the constituted authorities of Newfoundland, and I do not think we could back away from that offer if the constituted authorities came to us and said, "The majority in Newfoundland want confederation." Of course this parliament might be disposed to say there is not such a decisive majority, in spite of the statement made by the constituted authorities, as would require or justify the carrying out of the offer we made.

My own personal view with respect to these negotiations has been that it would be a serious responsibility to do or say anything which would prevent the entry of Newfoundland into Canada. I may be an optimist, but I do believe that the Canadian nation is destined to occupy an important place in world affairs. I do believe, further, that that place in world affairs would be better preserved by a territory which extended right out to the broad ocean and if access thereto was not closed to Canada by another sovereignty over the territories of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Because of that attitude, we made offers which would involve quite costly requirements from the Canadian people at the present time. But I think we would have been remiss in our duty to future generations of Canadians not to have done so. That offer having been made, if there is a desire on the part of the people of Newfoundland to accept it, I think the government will be disposed to recommend to parliament that it be implemented.

It might be that there would come about in Newfoundland a division of opinion that would show that the time was not ripe for union to take place, and that it would not be easy to have it work satisfactorily in what would then be a new province. That is something which I hope we shall not have to face, and about which I would prefer not to have to express any views, unless we do have to face it. I hope there will be a clear-cut decision in this second vote. I hope it will not be so close as to leave us in the embarrassing position of having to take in a large group of recalcitrants, or having to renounce the opportunity of completing what the fathers of confederation originally intended.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): One further supplementary question, if I may. I did not understand the minister to say—at least I hope I did not—that by our action we have put it beyond our power to go back if, in fact, there is now a legal acceptance, legally given to Newfoundland, but with a strong and large dissenting minority.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That matter would be one which would have to be faced in a statesmanlike manner by the authorities in the United Kingdom and those in Canada. They are the ones who have legal jurisdiction. I am reminded of the view I expressed about democracy. In a democracy the will of the majority must prevail; but a majority should not impose a decision that is not in the real interests of the community, or without giving careful consideration to the views of the minority and the reasons for those views. And I think that when the time comes for a decision as to whether this will be proceeded with or not, the Canadian government and the United Kingdom government will have to take into consideration the facts as they will have appeared from the vote of the people of Newfoundland.

Then the hon. member for Stanstead asked me to deal with two or three other questions, one of which had to do with the St. Lawrence seaway. Members of the committee will recall that the basic agreement was signed in March, 1941, was referred to the senate committee on foreign affairs in the United States, and favourably reported upon this year. But it was recommitted to the committee on foreign affairs by a vote in the senate of the United States on February 27, 1948. That was a vote of fifty-seven to thirty. It is therefore not being proceeded with expeditiously by the United States senate.

There have been reports in the newspapers as to the desire of Ontario and the state of New York to proceed with certain power developments; but there have been no official communications to the government of Canada in that regard and, so far as I know, no application to the international joint commission with respect thereto. There is nothing I can communicate to the committee beyond the information I have obtained from the reading of reports in the newspapers.

Then the hon. member asked me about the royal style and titles. As hon. members will recall, an act of this parliament was passed last year expressing the acquiescence of Canada in the dropping from the royal style and titles of the words, "Emperor of India". We are informed that a proclamation will be issued by His Majesty fixing June 22 as the date from which those words will be dropped from the royal style and titles in the United Kingdom, and the governor in council has adopted a minute of council to have a notice to that effect published in the official gazette, when we get confirmation that that is the date to be acted upon in the United Kingdom.

The hon. member asked if there had been any changes in our relations with the South African government since the election. There have been no changes.

Then he asked what has been done toward building up our relations with western Europe and other members of the commonwealth. There has been nothing accomplished, but what we have been doing was recently reported in the Ottawa Journal as a crusade by Canada for the completion of a western union or north Atlantic regional pact. I think that title, of course, perhaps justly describes the attitude we have adopted. We feel that, should war break out that affected the United Kingdom and the United States, we would inevitably be involved and that there might be great value in having consummated a regional pact whereby these western European countries, the United Kingdom and the United States and ourselves, would guarantee each other's security.

We had hoped that the united nations would guarantee the security of all of us, but that has not been accomplished, and we think there would be value in a regional pact whereby these western European democracies, the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves agreed to stand together, to pool for defence purposes our respective potentials and co-ordinate right away our forces, so that it would appear to any possible aggressor that he would have to be prepared to overcome us all if he attempted any aggression.

We do not think a pact that did not include those major powers would be sufficiently impressive to require us to be a party to it. We think this western union is a good thing, but our adhesion to it without the United States would add very little to it. We are hopeful that it will develop into something which will comprise the United States along with those who are already members, and in that event we think the people of Canada would wish that we also be associated with it, not because we want to assert domination over anyone, but because we realize that if the group in this regional pact became involved in war we would necessarily be involved with them.

That is something that the people of Canada might prefer to avoid, but it is something which they could not avoid even if they wished to. That being so, if there is any value in preparedness we think the people of Canada would be glad to see us making that preparation in a co-ordinated fashion with others whose way of life is the same as ours and whose security is part of our own security. That has not proceeded very far, although there has been the adoption by an overwhelming majority in the United States senate of Senator Vandenberg's resolution recommending the setting up of such a security group.

The hon. member asked what our relations were with the members of the commonwealth. Our relations with the members of the commonwealth revolve around the United Kingdom as being the pivot of the commonwealth. We do not think anything that the United Kingdom and these western European democracies and the United States would be in is something that we could avoid being in.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have we had any consultations or agreement with the other dominions within the commonwealth that if one is attacked we stand together?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There have never been any commitments among the members of the commonwealth. They are all subjects of the same crown, which is the living link between them. That has always proved sufficient to have the members of the commonwealth recognize their joint and mutual interests. Of course, during the last war one member of the commonwealth remained neutral, which was its right to do, because there was no commitment. We did not take the same course in Canada. I think there has been a mutual reliance on each other; that the security of all is essential to each. I believe it is a matter of general feeling, but in fact it has never been set out in any signed commitment.

Mr. JAQUES: The minister said, very truly, that some weeks ago we had had a fairly full discussion on external affairs. I understood him to say that we should be careful at the present time not to do anything which might worsen the international situation. But there have been changes in that situation since we last had an opportunity to discuss international affairs.

I wish to make a few remarks on a subject about which I have spoken several times in the past, and I do this for three reasons at least. First, those who are opposed to political zionism find that, because of zionist control of the press and radio, they have no opportunity to obtain publicity for what they themselves stand for.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the hon. member mean control in this country or where?

Mr. JAQUES: Everywhere.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In every country?

Mr. JAQUES: Yes.

Second, the zionists are busy holding public meetings. I see one was advertised in yesterday's and today's papers for Ottawa.

Third, those of us who have opposed the designs of political zionism in the past have been smeared with anti-Semitism, and it is about time that people realized that those who have supported political zionism are, as a consequence, now shown to be anti-British and pro-Soviet, as I shall prove before I have finished.

First of all, I should like to congratulate the government, if I may, upon resisting the pressure which has been put upon them, particularly by the leader of the C.C.F. party and others outside the house to support violent means of settling partition in Palestine. I say that because, owing to the general ignorance of the public, which has no opportunity of being informed, the government may need some support in their present stand in resisting zionists and Red and Pink pressure. I think I have the satisfaction of being perhaps the only member on the opposition side of this house who can say that a policy which he has advocated from time to time in this house for several years has now been adopted by the government. I am not suggesting for a moment that this has been due to my influence, but just the same it is a fact and I am glad of this opportunity to congratulate the government on their stand.

Since I asked the minister a few minutes ago whether the UNO force which is being dispatched to Palestine would form the nucleus of an international police force, I have been handed a copy of yesterday's P.M., which, on page 9, under the heading "UN's 1st 'Army' of 50 Will Aid Bernadotte," says:

> Clad in blue-gray uniforms, and equipped with standard New York city police department weapons, the half hundred young men of "Lie's Legion" will become the world's first "international police force," responsible exclusively to an international authority.

There are two columns of the article, and toward the end it says:

> The UN secretariat looks upon the newly-born 50-man force as the "core" of a legion which may grow in the near future.
> Sooner or later, Lie is expected to request the general assembly for a permanent budget for such a force, thus by-passing, in some small measure, the big power deadlock which has so far prevented the creation of the international army originally contemplated by the charter.

The present situation with regard to Palestine is one of the utmost danger. I am, of course, not making these remarks with the idea of informing the government or even anybody in this house. I am speaking solely for the benefit of those people outside the house who, thanks to the boycott of the press of any other than zionist views, have had little or no opportunity of judging the situation for themselves. It all comes back to the original Balfour declaration, and I shall read it because it is quite evident, when you read the zionist statements, that they misquote the declaration for the purpose of misleading the public. The Balfour declaration stated:

> His Majesty's government views with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for Jewish people and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.

The violence in Palestine since the partition plan was approved by UNO surely is the answer to this statement in the Balfour declaration:

. . . it being clear that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine.

The fact that the various Arab states are now united and are determined to defend with their lives what they conceive to be their rights is proof enough of that. Yet the whole world is being deluged with a propaganda that nobody has any rights in Palestine except the zionists and that we must all join with them and implement partition by force of arms. Already some two thousand people have, I believe, lost their lives in the fighting, and who can say how many more will not be killed if this policy is pursued?

I have collected a few statements by men whose knowledge of this question and whose standing cannot be questioned. The first I shall quote is Mr. George Hall, now in the House of Lords, but who in 1943 was colonial secretary in the British government. Mr. Hall said:

I must say the attitude adopted by the members of the deputation—

That is the zionist deputation.

—was different from anything which I have ever experienced. It was not a request for the consideration by His Majesty's government of the zionist decisions, but a demand that His Majesty's government should carry out these decisions.

That was George Hall, colonial secretary, 1943.

Then we have Mr. R. H. Crossman, who is a well known member of the British Labour party and a member of the present House of Commons in Great Britain. He was also a member of the Palestine commission which went to Palestine to study the question. He said, speaking of the situation as he found it in the United States when he was a member of the Palestine committee in the United States:

The public and the press—

That is in the United States.

—are almost entirely pro-zionist and anti-British. So we have lots to listen to. Rather we are submitting ourselves to the process of total immersion in the zionist flood. By shouting for a Jewish state, Americans satisfy many motives. They are attacking the British empire; they are espousing a moral cause for which they have no responsibility. The zionists are terrific. They are passionately anti-British and have obviously organized nearly all the American Jews and all the press. The case for the Arabs and the problems of putting a million Jews into Palestine, simply goes by default here.

That is a quotation from the diary of Mr. R. H. Crossman, January 19, 1946. Then, as a possible reason underlying this zionist policy, we have the opinion of George Antonious, one of the great authorities on Palestine.

Mr. POULIOT: Who was he?

Mr. JAQUES: He is a man who has a wide knowledge of Palestine and has written a number of books on the subject which are standard works. He says:

Long ago I came to the conclusion that financial Jewry, both zionist and non-zionist, was furthering the aspirations of fanatical zionism for its own ends, namely, in order to gain possession of the colossal mineral resources of Palestine and greater Palestine, and that they would be kept fallow until such time as they can be developed for the benefit of financial Jewry, preferably under the aegis of a Jewish state.

That is taken from the book, "The Arab Awakening", by George Antonious, at page 387.

Then we have the opinion of Mr. R. R. Stokes, who is also a Labour member of the present House of Commons in Great Britain.

Mr. POULIOT: Who was he?

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Richard Stokes, member for Ipswich. When I was back in England four years ago I had the pleasure and privilege of discussing various questions with him. He says this:

The UNO committed political suicide when it came to this decision. The Jews have been warned to get rid of these evil zionist advisers. The Americans have an anti-communist policy in Europe; but what is happening now? Communist powers are being brought into the middle east. That is a fact.

I know that Mr. Stokes has visited Palestine and has studied the question on the spot.

Then we have Mr. Zuckermann, who has written a book, "The Jew in Revolt". He says:

The basic tenet of our foreign policy must be friendship with Russia, whose stand in the UN will never be forgotten.

That supplies a very good reason for the fact that the communists are so strongly in support of the C.C.F. at the present time. There is no doubt about it. Mr. Zuckermann continues:

A Jew can do nothing but follow the road shown by the Soviet Union. There is no other way for him. He must fight for social revolution or perish.

These are quotations from men who certainly cannot be accused of any anti-semitic tendencies. Several of them are socialists and have been to Palestine. They have studied the question on the spot.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend knows that some other socialists are on the side of the Arabs.

Mr. JAQUES: There are always exceptions, of course; but, generally speaking, I should say that the vast majority of what I call the Reds and the Pinks are strong supporters of political zionism.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member means that the Reds and the Pinks shake hands under the table.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not know. Perhaps the hon. member can tell me where the red leaves off and the pink begins. It is something that I have never been able to decide for myself.

Mr. POULIOT: Tell me who are the Pinks and who are the Reds?

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the hon. member explain? If the socialists are on the side of zionism, why are there all the difficulties between the Jews in Palestine and the British socialist government?

Mr. JAQUES: Is it a socialist government? I thought it was a Labour government.

Mr. MacINNIS: Find out what they say about it. They will tell you that it is a socialist government. There is no doubt about that. Ask my hon. friends to the right. They say it is a socialist government.

Mr. JAQUES: It calls itself a Labour government.

Mr. MacINNIS: It calls itself a socialist government.

Mr. WYLIE: Why argue about it?

Mr. JAQUES: I do not see the point.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is just as sensible as what we are getting.

Mr. JAQUES: That is all right. Three times in this session your leader has risen in his place and demanded of the government that they force the partition of Palestine, and each time—

Mr. MacINNIS: That is a misstatement of fact. The leader of this group has never demanded any such thing of the government. I am quite satisfied that the government will not say that he has.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not know what else you would call it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I know what you would call it. I also know what I would call it.

[Mr. Jaques.]

Mr. JAQUES: He certainly has opposed me in my stand—and not only that—

Mr. MacINNIS: That would be sensible, in any event.

Mr. JAQUES: When I sit down you can rise, and I shall be interested to hear a member of the C.C.F. party defend their policy of pro-zionism and pro-sovietism in the house at the present time. That is the policy which they have followed consistently in the past.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, that is another misstatement. This party is neither pro-zionism nor pro-soviet. I insist that the hon. member withdraw it.

Mr. JAQUES: I am not going to withdraw it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will tell you what it is. It is a lie. You can do with that whatever you like.

Mr. JAQUES: The C.C.F. are certainly judges of lies; they are experts.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have been listening to lies for a long time.

Mr. JAQUES: Point out one that I have told and I shall be obliged to you.

Mr. MacINNIS: I will tell you one right now.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must not interrupt.

Mr. JAQUES: Of course you C.C.F. do not like being reminded of it. You cannot defend the line you have been adopting in the past. You have been pro-zionist, and today, for all the world knows—it is known today—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. member not to refer to other members. Let him make his speech without bringing in other members.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. gentleman is trying to defend his anti-semitism by labelling us as pro-zionist. The thing will not work.

Mr. JAQUES: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman, for not addressing the Chair. I have been trying to state that the foreign policy of the C.C.F. in the past has been consistently pro-zionist, and it is now plain for all the world to see that the zionists are, by their own statements, blatantly anti-British and pro-Soviet Russia.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. gentleman is going too far, Mr. Chairman, and I insist that he withdraw the statement that we are pro-zionists.

Mr. JAQUES: I was going to say a word—

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, are you going to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the statement, which he has repeated several times? I make a point of it, that he withdraw the statement that this party is pro-zionist. There is nothing on the record here that justifies that statement.

Mr. JAQUES: I think—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is expressing his own opinions. I have no right to stop him from expressing his own opinion, but I would ask him to deal with the estimates of external affairs without bringing in other members of the house.

Mr. JAQUES: I will do that, Mr. Chairman. Thank you. I was going to remark that Sir Ellsworth Flavelle, whose advertisement on behalf of zionism is in today's local papers, has as much right to espouse political zionism as I have to oppose it. I am not quarrelling with that. But I would remind the house that Sir Ellsworth was formerly chairman or president of the Canadian Soviet friendship council.

Mr. POULIOT: Who was that, please?

Mr. JAQUES: Sir Ellsworth Flavelle. He is president of the Canadian zionist league and is advertising in the local papers on behalf of political zionism, calling upon Canadians to implement partition. I merely quote it to remind the committee that formerly he was president of the Canadian Soviet friendship council, which may or may not have any significance.

I should like to quote the New York Times to show what the situation is in the United States. I have here the New York Times of Monday, June 7, in which there is a column headed "Stand by Israel". The article is a long one, and I will read only one paragraph:

> Meanwhile, the Bronx, Brooklyn and Long Island regions of the zionist organizations also held conferences. The meeting at the Riverside Plaza hotel heard Daniel Frisch, vice-president of the Zionist Organization of America. He asserted that "whether a boycott is officially called for or not, I cannot visualize any American worthy of the name, be he Jew or non-Jew, who will in the light of current events purchase any British-made goods, utilize any British services, or associate with the British, because to me they are the untouchables of this generation."

So now these people who have been so busy supporting the zionist cause and who have smeared those of us who ventured to disagree with them, because we knew the danger that was bound to come as a result of zionism, are in this position. They are on the side of those who consider the British—certainly we are British; I am anyway- -to be untouchables, and they call for a boycott of all British goods and services. I am thankful I do not have to reverse my policy of the past in respect of zionism.

Of course, the dilemma of Americans is this, that in Europe they are anti-soviet, but they are pro-zionist in Palestine; therefore they are pro-communist in Palestine and, as a consequence, largely pro-communist in the United States. And the Canadian pro-zionist dilemma is this, that if they are pro-zionist they are anti-British and pro-soviet. Speaking of boycotts—

Mr. MacINNIS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. JAQUES: I realize that this is painful for you, but we have agreed to go on until we finish the estimates.

Mr. MacINNIS: Who agreed?

Mr. JAQUES: I think we all did.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not. Eleven o'clock.

Mr. JAQUES: Anyway, I was about to mention—

Mr. MacINNIS: Eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JAQUES: —an incident in regard to the boycott which the zionists have declared in the United States. That is all right; it is their privilege. But when an insignificant little man in Vancouver ventured the same idea with regard to the zionist Jews the whole force of the law descended upon him.

Mr. POULIOT: Who is that insignificant little man in Vancouver?

Mr. JAQUES: I do not know that I can remember his name.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it the former minister of veterans affairs?

Mr. JAQUES: I believe his name is Graham. It is a case that was decided in Vancouver some time this spring. I have not seen what he wrote, but I understand that he was advocating the boycott of zionist Jews until they learned to behave themselves.

Mr. POULIOT: He was not the former minister of veterans affairs.

Mr. JAQUES: No. He is quite insignificant, but in this case the whole weight of the law descended upon him and he was sentenced to three or four months' imprisonment and ordered deported. Are we to learn from this that in Canada we may not criticize another sovereign state, which the zionists claim to be today? They claim that the state of Israel is a sovereign state. Is it to be a criminal offence to criticize the policies of that country; because, if it is, it is just as well to know it? In my opinion, that was a shocking miscarriage of justice, though I am not a lawyer.

In conclusion, may I say that those who think communism is an economic threat, that the Tim Bucks are the threat to the country, and that we can prevent communism by socialistic reform, are either very stupid or very misleading, because communism is not mainly an economic policy. When you come right down to the bottom of it, you will find that it is based on a religion and that the drive of world communism is nothing but the drive to enforce an alien, anti-Christian culture on the world.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore your address is more of a sermon than a speech.

Mr. JAQUES: You can call it what you like, but I think I can say this. I am possibly the only one in this house, as far as I know, who so far has had the courage to tell the truth about this zionist question as I see it. Perhaps others do not see it. What I have said, I believe. As I said before, I have at least the satisfaction of knowing that the government has veered against the demand of political zionism to enforce partition; and I can only say in conclusion that I congratulate them upon that.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MacINNIS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: If it is eleven o'clock, I will sit down.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is after eleven o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: If the sitting goes on, I have questions to ask.

An hon. MEMBER: Ask the question.

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member ask his question?

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to know if the Palestinian problem is racial, religious or economic.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a poser.

Mr. KNOWLES: A little of all three.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Palestine question is an unfortunate fact that must be recognized. I think it arises out of grounds that are at the same time religious, racial and economic. It would be difficult for anyone to assess exactly the proportionate influence of religious feeling, racial antagonism and economic interests in the difficulties that create that problem.

[Mr. Jaques.]

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No. I thank the minister for what he has said, and I appreciate the fact that he has answered the question that was put to him. But I have in my hand here what was said about the new streamlined Conservative party—

Mr. MacNICOL: What is that?

Mr. POULIOT: It is from the Journal. It is a dispatch of June 11 in the Journal. Today I listened to the excellent speech made by the hon. member for Broadview and to the satisfactory explanation given by the minister. But I find that the debate on external affairs has not been serious. When I consider the ability, experience, geniality and knowledge of the hon. member for Stanstead and the questions he has put, I do not think they are questions that a man of his experience and gifts should have put on such an important matter, a matter that would be one of life and death for so many citizens if we were to be at war. I read what has been said about the Progressive Conservative party in Canada:

> The Progressive Conservative party in Canada has reached a point where "we must have our efforts bent in a common direction," Ivan Sabourin, Quebec provincial party leader, today told the closing session of the Progressive Conservative Association of Manitoba convention.

Then he made some remarks about the Liberals, and the article continues:

> He advocated a "firm, decided direction" and said that "under the efforts of our leader the ship is being righted while the Liberal ship will continue to sink."

Where was the leader of the Progressive Conservative party when this most important discussion on this matter took place? He became a backbencher.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, we have been sitting in this house from eleven o'clock in the morning until eleven o'clock at night, and I do not intend to stay here beyond eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. KNOWLES: What is the business for Monday?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): On Monday we shall consider a resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to approve the international wheat agreement. Then we should like to move forward a step the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture to continue the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, for a further period. Then there is to be dealt with a resolution in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to remove the time limit in which an application for pension in respect of death may be made under the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act; then Bill No. 362, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act; Bill No. 363, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, and Bill No. 364, to amend the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Act. If we conclude those different items we shall move to go into supply and take up the estimates of the departments of external affairs, agriculture, mines and resources and public works.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister if he is able to tell the house how many items of supply are yet to be called?

Mr. MacINNIS: How many departments?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): All the departments are in, but we undertook to make, during the first three days of each week, a formal motion to go into supply.

Mr. KNOWLES: About half the items have been passed.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Yes. I think more than half have been passed.

Mr. MacNICOL: I heard someone say today that there were three hundred or four hundred items yet to be called, but the minister is not able to tell us just how many?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I can give the departments that are not completed. There are about ten or twelve items left in the Department of Agriculture; one item in the auditor general's department, and fifteen or sixteen items in external affairs. Then there is finance, fisheries, legislation, labour, mines and resources, national defence, national revenue, the Prime Minister's office, with regard to which there are few items, and public works.

Mr. HACKETT: Is the minister able to say if Bill No. 351, to amend the Quebec Savings Bank Act, which stands in the name of the Minister of Finance, is apt to come up on Monday?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): No. I believe those two bills in the name of the Minister of Finance will be called on Tuesday, unless there is some change. But they will not come up on Monday.

It being ten minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

409. Reconstruction projects, subject to allocation by the treasury board, $1,000,000.

Housing development, including commitments of previous years—

410. To provide for payments of amounts owing under guarantees pursuant to item 571 of schedule A to the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1947 (and pursuant to corresponding items in previous appropriation acts) to approved lending institutions in respect of loans made for the purpose of financing the conversion of existing houses into multiple family houses, such payments to be made out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, $1.

411. Home conversion plan, $50,000.

412. Emergency shelter—administration, $3,000,000.

413. Wartime Housing Limited, $50,000,000.

414. Cost of moving houses from one locality to another to meet emergency shelter requirements, $500,000.

415. Incentive bonus to industry to expedite the production of strategic building materials, $370,000.

416. To provide for production and transportation subsidies on steel and iron under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council, $5,000,000.

417. Administration, reconversion and operation of Canadian Arsenals Limited, $2,900,000.

418. To provide for research and development of jet engines and aircraft, $2,000,000.

396. Administration and investigations of the dominion fuel board, $82,608.

397. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council, $4,500,000.

National research council—

398. Salaries and other expenses of the national research council, $6,820,000.

399. Expanded research on the utilization of farm crops, $260,000.

400. Industrial chemistry building (formerly included housing research), $65,000.

401. Grant to the Royal Society of Canada, $8,000.

402. New waterline—Montreal road laboratories, $125,000.

403. Maritime regional laboratory, $150,000.

Atomic energy control board—

404. Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, $77,272.

405. Researches and investigations with respect to atomic energy, $142,500.

406. Chalk River project—capital and operating expenses, $5,796,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 21, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the House has received from the chief electoral officer certificates of the election and return of the following members, viz:

Of Owen Lewis Jones, Esquire, for the electoral district of Yale.

Of Arthur Williams, Esquire, for the electoral district of Ontario.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Owen Lewis Jones, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Yale, introduced by Mr. Angus MacInnis and Mr. J. H. Matthews (Kootenay East).

Arthur Henry Williams, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Ontario, introduced by Mr. Angus MacInnis and Mr. Clarence Gillis.

Rodney Young, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Vancouver Centre, introduced by Mr. Angus MacInnis and Mr. H. G. Archibald.

PRINTING COMMITTEE

Second report of the joint committee on the printing of parliament.—Mr. Emmerson.

QUESTIONS

BATTLE OF THE ATLANTIC—MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has any action been taken to compensate the 18,000 merchant seamen who aided the transport of food on the Atlantic during the battle of the Atlantic?
2. If not, what action will be taken this session?

Mr. WINTERS:

1. This information may be found in the answer given to a question at page 1651 of Hansard of March 24, 1947.

2. The question of additional benefits to merchant seamen is under discussion by the special committee on veterans affairs.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HOTELS

Mr. MOORE:

1. What is the estimated cost of the new hotel being built by the C.N.R. adjacent to the central station in the city of Montreal?
2. What is the estimated tonnage of steel planned to be used in its construction?
3. What is the cost per ton of this steel?

Mr. WINTERS:

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The C.N.R. is not engaged in the building of a new hotel adjacent to the central station in Montreal.
2. See answer to No. 1.
3. See answer to No. 1.

INDIANS—TUBERCULOSIS—USE OF VACCINE

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf):

1. Has any scientific research been made in Canada concerning the effect of the B.C.G. vaccine against tuberculosis upon Indians?
2. What use was made last year of such vaccine in the case of the Indians of the province of Quebec?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Yes. A study financed by an annual grant from the national research council was started in 1932. It has been carried on by a medical officer of the Department of National Health and Welfare, Dr. A. B. Simes of the Fort Qu'Appelle Indian hospital, under the direction of Dr. George Ferguson, medical superintendent of Saskatchewan Anti-Tuberculosis League. Since 1932, every other baby born in the area served by the Fort Qu'Appelle Indian health unit has been vaccinated with B.C.G. and records and frequent X-rays of all these cases have been carefully studied. The vaccine itself was obtained through the co-operation of Dr. Armand Frappier, of the university of Montreal. Results indicate that the vaccinated children are not as susceptible to tuberculosis infection as the unvaccinated, and of the vaccinated children who developed the disease, a higher percentage of cures is obtained than in the unvaccinated.

A report was made this year at the annual meeting of the Canadian Tuberculosis Association by Doctors Simes and Ferguson, which showed that 600 Indian children had been included in this study and that infection occurred approximately five times as frequently among the unvaccinated as among the vaccinated.

2. With the co-operation of Dr. Armand Frappier, director of the Institute of Microbiology, university of Montreal, and his assistant, Dr. Roland Guy, helped by the personnel of the directorate of Indian health services, eight reserves with a total population of 2,479 were given a tuberculin test and all the negative reactors amounting to 837 were vaccinated with B.C.G. Coinciding with this program, six field nurses of the directorate of Indian health services were given instruction in B.C.G. vaccination, so that this program can be carried on at other reserves this year. All newborn babies of these reserves were vaccinated with B.C.G. at birth. There were about 50 newborn babies who received this vaccination.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

H.M.C.S. "TEMERAIRE"—ACCIDENT AT TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will an inquiry be held into the accident of H.M.C.S. Temeraire at the foot of Dowling avenue in Toronto last Sunday when a loaned launch blew up injuring several officers of this station, and other guests?

2. What action has or will be taken in the matter?

3. Has the government any liability in the matter?

4. Who owns this station and what uses does it perform?

5. Will a court of inquiry be held, and when?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Return tabled.

BUILDING USED IN CONNECTION WITH LOADING OF CARGO AT HALIFAX

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Did the government or the Department of Labour have a "dispatching building" or "hiring hall" at the port of Halifax during the war to accommodate men employed in loading cargo or for other work?

2. If so, from whom was such building secured and what was the cost or yearly rental, stating period?

3. What has been paid yearly for (a) equipment; (b) caretaker; (c) fuel, and to whom have payments been made?

LEGAL SERVICES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What lawyers practising in (a) city of Montreal; (b) city of Toronto; have performed legal services or have been retained as solicitors or counsel by any department of government since the 1st of January, 1947?

2. How much has been paid to each of said lawyers?

[Mr. Martin.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN MARITIME COMMISSION

Mr. ISNOR:

For a copy of all letters and other communications which have passed since January 1, 1947, to the present time between the Minister of Transport or any of his officials or members of the Canadian maritime commission, and any board of trade organization, group or individual respecting appointments to the Canadian maritime commission.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand from the hon. member that the information he requests has to do with appointments to membership of the Canadian maritime commission and not to its personnel. If that is what is in the hon. gentleman's mind, there would be no objection.

Mr. ISNOR: The reference in the motion is to appointments to the Canadian maritime commission.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried as amended by the minister.

OATS AND BARLEY—AMENDMENTS TO WHEAT BOARD ACT

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters and correspondence that passed between the federal government and the governments of each of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba since the 1st of January, 1948, respecting the amendment to the Wheat Board Act in any manner relative to the handling of oats and barley.

PURCHASE OF FORD HOTEL BUILDING, MONTREAL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of all letters, documents, memoranda of telephone and other conversations since the 1st of January, 1947, in possession of the dominion government, regarding the negotiations concerning the offer to purchase or the purchase of the Ford hotel in the city of Montreal?

EXPENDITURES BY GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANT

Mr. HANSELL:

For a copy of all governor general's warrants for expenditures other than moneys voted by parliament as from March 31, 1947, to date.

WHEAT

APPROVAL OF INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT OPENED FOR SIGNATURE AT WASHINGTON, MARCH 6, 1948

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve the international wheat agreement opened for signature at Washington on March 6, 1948, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution I am asking the house to approve Canada's participation in the international wheat agreement which was opened for signature at Washington on March 6, 1948, and signed on behalf of thirty-six countries, including Canada. No additional legislation is required to implement this agreement so long as the present authority remains under the Canadian Wheat Board Act or under the Export and Import Permits Act.

Formal acceptance of this agreement is required by July 1 of each of the countries whose legislative bodies have been in session since the agreement was signed. For example, I understand that the agreement is now before the United States senate for ratification as a treaty, in order that the United States government may give its formal acceptance by July 1, and in order that the agreement may become operative commencing with the new crop year on the first of August.

I think that members will be interested in hearing something of the background leading up to this agreement. I need not dwell on the pre-war period, or on the international agreements and proposals of those days, beyond pointing out that the terms of those earlier agreements were quite different from the terms of the agreement we have before us for approval today. The old idea was to influence prices indirectly by regulating or restricting supplies. The present agreement is a multilateral contract covering the sale of wheat. It is a price and quantity agreement drawn up between three exporting countries and thirty-three importing countries, and does not in any way affect additional wheat transactions, either between member countries or with non-member countries once the transactions provided in the agreement are met.

Since the end of the war, this government has consistently supported the objective of obtaining a measure of stability in international wheat prices. With the hearty support of our wheat producers' organizations we instructed our officials to further these views with other governments, both through the international wheat council and through the food and agriculture organization.

By the spring of 1946 it was apparent that an international agreement on wheat prices could not be reached in time to affect the 1946-47 crop year, and in lieu thereof Canada concluded a bilateral contract with its principal wheat customer, the United Kingdom. In the meantime, negotiations toward an international wheat agreement were continued, one conference being held in London in the spring of 1947, at which agreement was almost reached, and the second conference being held in Washington early this year, at which the present agreement was concluded.

The agreement involves the annual sale of 500 million bushels of wheat over a period of the next five crop years, of which Canada's share is 230 million bushels. This figure represents our normal export surplus from crops grown on our existing acreage. The agreement provides for a range of prices all based on No. 1 northern wheat, in store Fort William-Port Arthur, with a uniform ceiling of $2 over the five-year period and floors commencing with $1.50 in the first year and declining by ten cents per year until the floor of $1.10 is reached in the fifth crop year. Each of the importing countries is assigned a share of the total 500 million bushels, and they have the right to buy and the exporting countries have an obligation to sell these quantities at the ceiling prices. Conversely, the exporting countries have a right to sell and the importing countries an obligation to buy these same quantities at the floor prices. In brief, this means that the importing countries have an assurance of supplies at not more than ceiling prices, and the exporting countries have the assurance of a market at not less than floor prices to the extent of the agreement quantities.

As I mentioned before, the agreement in no way affects wheat purchases by the member-importing countries in excess of their commitments under the agreement from any source whatever, nor does it affect the sales of the member-exporting countries if they have wheat for sale in excess of their commitments. The 500 million bushels in the agreement by no means exhausts the current volume of the world wheat trade, which is running upwards of 850 million bushels per year.

It has been frequently mentioned that Argentina and Russia are not parties to this agreement. They were given every opportunity to join, but they declined. Because the agreement is in the form of a sales contract, its operation and the interests of its member countries are not affected by the absence of these two countries. Under surplus conditions, it can be assumed that Argentina and Russia will offer their wheat below the floor prices set out in the agreement. Canada, Australia and the United States, however, have the protection of floor prices on their normal export surpluses, and are free to meet Argentine and Russian competition on any additional quantities they may desire to sell. On the other hand, should the importing countries produce more of their own wheat, their imports will be maintained from Canada, Australia and the United States, while diminishing from other sources.

The international agreement does not limit our rights under the Canada-United Kingdom wheat agreement. The fixed price of $2 per bushel for the third year of that agreement will continue in force for the 1948-49 crop year on our sales under the contract to the United Kingdom. The price for the fourth year of the contract is to be negotiated under the terms of the contract before December 31 of this year.

The agreement is noncommittal on the issue of state versus private trading between the member countries. Under the same agreement the Canadian and Australian wheat boards will continue for the present to make wheat sales for their respective countries, while wheat sales from the United States will be made by the private trade. Flour exports from each of the three exporting countries are to continue under private trade. Because of the breadth of the price ranges there is ample room for the operation of markets within the limits of the price ranges. What the agreement accomplishes is to rule out the extreme situations beyond either end of the price range which have hitherto brought undesirable consequences in their wake and which have been the main source of resentment against the open market system as it has operated in the past.

Because of the variations in our crop yields and consequent uncertainty of supplies, it has been impossible for us to deal as a single exporter with a number of our other wheat customers on the same basis as we have been dealing with the United Kingdom for the past two years. By combining the resources of the three wheat exporting countries under an international agreement, it will be possible for us to deal with all our wheat customers alike in return for like obligations on their part, and on the same terms in which they are being dealt with by the United States and Australia, if the international wheat agreement is formally accepted by the countries concerned.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this wheat agreement is very much in the interests of Canada, and I recommend its acceptance.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us asks us to approve a wheat agreement between three exporting countries and thirty-three importing countries. So far as the facts are concerned the minister's statement, I think, covers the situation very well. I do not propose to take up very much of the time of the house, but the situation does deserve some comment, even though the measure will no doubt pass the house unanimously.

No one in Canada, I think, would have any opposition to the objective of this agreement. The difficulty in connection with wheat in the past has been its wide fluctuations in price, due partly to widely differing volumes of production, and sometimes to international interference. Within a very few years the price of wheat has varied from 40 cents to $3.40 per bushel. When the price is $3.40 a bushel our wheat farmers are prosperous, while those who import wheat feel very differently about the price. When it is 40 cents a bushel, or anything approaching that figure, our wheat farmers go broke and our economy becomes disturbed. It is for this reason that for more than two decades efforts have been made to lessen these wide fluctuations in price, but for the most part, I am afraid, not with much success.

The objective, I say, of this measure is most laudable. But the plan now before us is in my judgment inadequate and unfinished, and far from being a perfect instrument to meet the situation. The results, therefore, from its passage are likely to be disappointing to Canadian producers if they are expecting large results from this measure in its present form.

The minister has referred to the background leading up to the present situation. I should like also to refer to that background. As the minister stated, this is not the first wheat agreement into which Canada has entered, and it is not the first wheat agreement into which this government has entered. The experience of this government in connection with international wheat agreements has not been such as to offer much promise in the way of good results. Nevertheless, that is no argument against our continuing to try to get an instrument that will get us the results we want.

What have been the experiences of recent years? In 1942 the Canadian government entered into a temporary wheat agreement seeking to achieve some price stability when the war was over. One provision of that agreement was that if a final agreement as to price had not been completed by six months after the end of hostilities, the price charged for export wheat would be the amount received per bushel by the largest exporter for the last bulk shipment to the chief importer. It turned out that that was a shipment from Canada to the United Kingdom and the price was $1.55 a bushel. This agreement of 1942 was agreed to by several different nations, but what happened? The Canadian government alone adhered to that agreement, and no other party to the agreement did. The result was that other nations sold their wheat at much higher prices, and Canada and Canadian farmers thereby lost scores of million of dollars. There were no doubt other reasons why that particular price was accepted by the Canadian government, but that agreement to which Canada alone adhered was the initiation of this price of $1.55 a bushel.

Then in the year 1946 this government entered into another international wheat agreement called the United Kingdom-Canada agreement, commonly known as the British wheat agreement. It was an agreement between those two countries providing for the sale by Canada of four crops of wheat, or the huge volume of 600 million bushels, at a price starting at $1.55 a bushel and subject during the four-year period to adjustment, but never to go below, I think, $1 a bushel. No other nation followed that policy. Every other nation sold its wheat for what it could get, and many of them got in different years twice as much, and some of them nearly three times as much, for certain sales of wheat as Canada got. Yet Canada sold at $1.55 and let her farmers take the loss.

Now we come to the present agreement of which the minister has spoken. Three exporting countries, Canada, the United States and Australia, undertake to deliver 500 million bushels of wheat per year to thirty-three importing countries under certain conditions with respect to price and amounts.

My first observation with respect to this agreement is that the Argentine is not in it. There was an earlier wheat agreement entered into in 1933, not only Canada, the United States and Australia were in that agreement, but the Argentine was in it too, and certain of the Danubian countries. That agreement of 1933 collapsed. Why? It collapsed, according to report, because the Argentine broke the terms of the agreement. Well, if the Argentine's withdrawal from that agreement caused its collapse, what prospect is there of an agreement with the Argentine not in it at all? Not only is the Argentine not in it, but as the minister pointed out, the Danubian countries are not in it, and Russia is not in it. I am not aware that Russia was ever in any of those agreements, but certainly the Danubian countries and the Argentine were.

Let me refer now for a moment to the 1933 agreement, which was made before the present government came into power. The discussions regarding it started in 1929, almost twenty years ago. The agreement itself was consummated in 1933. The discussions arose at that time not because conditions were similar to those of today, but surpluses were depressing prices. Prices were low; the producers were concerned, and even purchasers in Europe were concerned. Because of those low prices, certain governments over in Europe, which used to import large amounts of our wheat, had put tariffs against our products until in certain of these western European countries they were paying two or three times as much to their own growers to produce wheat as they needed to pay to Canada to get our wheat.

It was under these circumstances that these discussions took place. If my memory serves me correctly, five groups of exporting countries, the chief exporting countries of the world, entered into an arrangement with about tweny-five others which I might call importing countries. It might be more correct to say that the surplus-producing countries entered into an agreement with the deficit-producing countries, the countries that did not produce enough of this commodity to feed their own people.

Let me refer now to this immediate agreement. We are told that Australia has approved of this agreement, subject to the United States approval later on. I do not know whether Australia gave its approval subject to Canadian approval also, but probably that is so. Of the three exporting countries in it, only one has given it qualified approval.

With respect to the United States—now probably the most important member in this agreement—because if that country does not come into it, it will never be consummated—the matter is before the senate committee of the United States. Reports would indicate that the senate committee is not likely to give a favourable decision on the matter in time for it to be approved before July 1. I think that is the date the minister gave.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is ten days from now.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. BRACKEN: If it should not be approved by the United States within the next ten days, it will not go into effect for the present crop year.

What are the points we should examine in an important agreement such as this in order to arrive at a wise decision as to our attitude with respect to it? I suggest there are three. First of all there is the question of the price to be received by the exporting countries, and to be paid by the importing countries. The second important point is the amount to be delivered by the exporting countries and to be taken by the importing countries. The third, of course, is the prospect of its success or failure.

Let us look for a moment at the question of prices. We are told that during the life of this agreement the maximum price of wheat will be $2 a bushel, and that it may be as low as $1.10 a bushel. We are talking about selling one of Canada's greatest export commodities over a long period of future years at a price between $2 and $1.10 a bushel at a time when the actual price of wheat is much higher than the highest of these figures.

In the year 1946 we entered into an agreement to sell wheat at $1.55 a bushel. In one year it got up as high as $2 a bushel. In the first year of that agreement we found that the average price of wheat which was not locked up in this agreement was $2.44. In the second year of the agreement the average price of wheat not locked up in the agreement was around $3 a bushel, and we are now undertaking to tie this nation to the acceptance of a price between $2 and $1.10 a bushel when the price today is much higher than that.

In addition to that I want to draw attention to one other feature. Wheat at $2 a bushel today, with the prospect of going as low as $1.10, would be equivalent to what on the basis of pre-war values of money? Today we have a 60-cent or a 63-cent or a 65-cent dollar, or whatever it is. On the basis of pre-war prices this would mean a maximum of $1.20 or $1.25 and a minimum of 66 or 70 cents. I ask hon. members, if we had been entering into an arrangement such as this prior to the war would we have agreed to a maximum price of say $1.25 and a minimum price of 66 to 70 cents a bushel? Would we have done it? I respectfully suggest that we would not. No one has any doubt as to that. The facts speak for themselves. In 1935, under a similar situation, this house approved of a policy of paying not 66 cents to 70 cents as a minimum, but paying 87½ cents a bushel as an initial price. That was the price decided upon when there was a surplus burdening the market and the dollar was worth one hundred cents. At that time we said we should not sell our wheat at less than 87½ cents a bushel. If we translate the present inflationary figures to pre-war values we would be agreeing to sell our wheat at a price of somewhere between $1.25 and 70 cents a bushel. That would not have been high enough.

The agreement sets out also that Canada will provide 230 million bushels out of the total of 500 million bushels from the exporting countries. I do not think any reasonable man will criticize the share allotted to Canada. United States was allotted 185 million bushels, and Australia 85 million bushels, making a total of 500 million bushels. In the early agreement away back in 1933 the United States was not the important exporting country that she is today. She then occupied about fourth place. Today she is up to second place, and the action which that nation takes will largely determine whether an agreement of this kind will ever be consummated or whether, if it were consummated, it would be any good.

What is the chief weakness of the agreement? Some people say there is a joker in it, but I do not like that term. I do not think anyone is joking about this thing. I believe the government and the people of Canada want to find a way to lessen the wide fluctuation in prices of this commodity, which has such an important bearing upon the stability of our economic life. But the weakness of the agreement is that some of the large exporting areas of the world are not in it. I refer to the Argentine, and to the Danubian countries, and to Soviet Russia. The chief weakness is that the Argentine is not in it.

There is another weakness in bringing this proposal forward at this time. I regard it as being in an unfinished state. I believe that any proposal that this nation is prepared to accept prices ranging from $2 down to $1.10 for wheat, suggests to the world that the price of wheat will go down, and go down pretty far and maybe pretty fast. And I am not one who believes that it is inevitable that prices will go down like that.

If the world wants this commodity it can have it, provided it is prepared to pay the producers enough to grow it; and if it is not prepared to do that, a lesser supply will be produced, and the price will be high. I am wondering if we are not bringing on ourselves the worst of two worlds, suggesting to others that the price will go down, without the assurance that this agreement will even be entered into or that it will be successful if it is entered into. In that respect it is a short-sighted procedure.

I can summarize our position briefly on this matter. We will not stand in the way of any efforts to arrive at some international agreement to provide some insurance against surpluses depressing prices. We will not stand in the way of any endeavour to get an agreement that will prevent these wide fluctuations which play such havoc with the economies particularly of exporting nations. We must keep on in that effort.

My second point is this. In my judgment this measure is far from a finished product. There are not enough nations in it, and particularly not enough exporting nations. The fact that the Argentine is out makes it, I was going to say, impossible to expect success from it. The fact that Russia and the Danubian countries are out makes it difficult. I am not hopeful that Russia will ever be in it, but certainly the Danubian countries were in it once, and it may be difficult to get them in again. With the United States now ten days from the final date of ratification, and there being considerable doubt whether that country will ratify it this year, the chances are very slim that the agreement will go into effect this year. That is not an argument now against our indicating that something of this kind is wanted. In the position in which I find myself, it does raise doubts of its immediate need or its eventual success. It is moving in the right direction, but I am afraid its weaknesses are not very promising for its success.

The third objection in my judgment is that the prices agreed to under these inflated conditions are too low.

If producers in Canada are counting on this agreement, in its present unfinished state, to provide anything in the way of better conditions for them, I want to be on record as indicating that, in its present state, I do not think we can expect much advantage from it. Nevertheless I agree that we must continue in these efforts and hope to reach the time when, if not all the nations, at least enough nations will stand together to see that these wide price fluctuations, which we cannot prevent unless we do stand together, are lessened.

These four or five points outline our general position on this resolution.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I wish to speak on this subject because I think it is of greater concern than any other topic that has come before the house this session. I do so because, since I am both a producer and a consumer as well as a citizen of Canada, I think we recognize it as one of the great problems to produce and allocate food throughout the world, so that where we have a surplus it can be moved to places where food is needed.

Some of us have been greatly concerned about press reports which indicate that some of the signatories to the agreement may not ratify it before the close of the session. I speak particularly of the United States government, which has indicated that it may not sign the agreement before the close of the session of congress.

As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has said, there have been attempts over the past fifteen years to reach some sort of international agreement between producer and consumer countries so as to allow for the intelligent flow of agricultural products to the countries that need them, and at the same time maintain a decent price to the producer. In the western provinces we have often been forced to take our grain to the elevator and deliver it far below cost of production. I myself have delivered many thousands of bushels of oats, wheat and barley for less than it cost to produce them. As far as our own Canadian economy is concerned, we have seen in many parts of our province, as a result of low prices, that though the people did get large crops they were as hard up as other parts of the province where there was not a large production, the land being dried out.

We as producers rightfully ask that we be given cost of production for our commodity, but at the same time we wish to have these products go to the consumer at a fair price. In dealing with this whole intricate subject we have to realize that there are many phases of our economy which are interdependent in the production and distribution of foodstuffs. As I have indicated since coming to the house, one of the things we need is to put into practice the principle of the ever-normal granary. To do that we would need to store in years of plenty at least 1,000 million bushels of wheat and other grains.

When there were short crops in the dominion we could live up to some of our international agreements, and that would be one deterrent to resistance on the part of importing countries to any sort of international agreement. However, in the past, under the open market system, we have found that when we had 200 million or 300 million bushels on hand, the product became a drug on the market, and prices were depressed.

In an effort to break down the negotiations for an international wheat agreement we have seen certain interests in Canada, namely the Winnipeg grain exchange, attempting to undermine those negotiations. A letter came to my office this morning from the Winnipeg grain exchange, a portion of which I intend to read to the house. The last paragraph, which makes reference to the agreement now under discussion, reads as follows:

> For fifteen years a plan along those general lines has been actively promoted, but at every stage final action has failed to result because of disagreement among the nations or from non-observance of the conditions laid down. It is a hard thing to get agreement among sovereign states and these states are bound to follow certain constitutional processes which take time. Another failure on this occasion will be but another evidence that governments are not suitable agencies for operating the details of a great commercial business like the wheat business.

If, Mr. Speaker, we are to get any basis of stability for our producers, the government must take a hand in this great operation in our country. It cannot be left to free enterprisers, or to the fluctuating markets of the grain exchange; rather we must enter into commodity agreements, preferably on a multilateral basis; whereby we can export to and import from other countries on a true value basis. It is just not intelligent to expect other countries to accept our wheat and other farm products unless we are ready to import from those countries on a decent and equitable basis. If we try to export our commodities, as has been done in the past, and ask for a price structure which is out of line with the price we are prepared to pay for commodities from those countries, we cannot hope for any sort of workable international agreement.

I am also concerned because of what is taking place in the United States. I have in my hand a report which appears in this morning's Globe and Mail headed "U.S. wheat export will be returned to private hands." It says that the Commodity Credits Corporation are to put back in private hands the handling of wheat exports in the United States. The latter part of the article reads as follows:

A spokesman for the ECA—

Which is the economic co-operation administration, in the United States, administering the Marshall plan for aid to Europe.

—says the move to put wheat exports back into private hands would be completed within a month. The committee is agreed that the change should be made as soon as possible. The report of a fairly large wheat crop in the United States has encouraged the committee to act more quickly.

Here we have seen perhaps some success on the part of private individuals to thwart the efforts toward international agreements handled by governments. I think that if once more this international agreement is washed up, so to speak, we shall be back into the cutthroat competition we had prior to the last war; indeed, it will be a large factor in creating world conditions which tend toward another world war.

Among the people who want such agreements as this wheat agreement, we have the international federation of agricultural producers. At their second annual conference, held in Paris this year, they unanimously passed a resolution calling on all governments to sign the agreement, and the agreement now under discussion is the one referred to. That conference passed three resolutions which I intend to read to the house. They are as follows:

(a) It is essential that effective machinery should be provided to deal with surpluses which may develop, to ensure that they are directed to the areas of the greatest need, and that such surpluses should not be allowed to undermine the world price structure.

[Mr. McCullough (Assiniboia).]

(b) In conformity with these aims IFAP should exert the utmost influence with the appropriate international authorities, and through its members, with national governments, in order that such machinery should be in a position to operate before such a situation arises.

(c) For this purpose the executive committee and the secretary-general are requested to initiate immediate studies in an effort to develop a practical plan capable of accomplishing these aims as nearly as possible.

I am in full accord with those resolutions. I feel that unless we can plan, both in Canada and in the international picture, for such agreements as are indicated in those resolutions, we cannot hope for world peace.

I remember that when I was attending high school, one of the things that history taught us was that the first great war was caused by a fight for world markets. That is what we shall have again unless we can truly say that we are a Christian nation. Unless we can say that we want to move our surplus food from Canada to other countries so that hungry people may get it at reasonable prices, and at the same time protect our producers by handling this matter on a national basis, we cannot truly say we are a Christian nation. If we once more allow the Winnipeg grain exchange to operate, then once again the producers of this country will be at their mercy.

I want to give full support to this measure. I am convinced that there are many dangers connected with it, simply because we have not seen fit to set up our own internal economy, and to establish appropriate import-export boards to handle such commodities as wheat and others which enter into the field of world trade.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that we in this group believe in the principle of long-term international wheat agreements. We believe that such agreements are essential to the welfare of both the consuming and the producing nations. We believe they are in the interests of the consuming nations in order to guarantee adequate supplies of food at fair prices, and we believe they are in the interests of the producing nations in order to guarantee markets at fair prices. Moreover, we believe that under such a program it should be possible to build up adequate reserves of food in good crop years to cover shortages that may occur in short crop years. It should be possible, moreover, to build up those reserves without allowing them to be used as an excuse to force prices down, as has invariably been the case under the open market system in the past.

When the minister spoke in this house upon the introduction of this measure, as reported at page 2004 of Hansard, he concluded with these remarks:

> By balancing the interests of both producing countries and consuming countries in an agreement covering the bulk of the world's trade in wheat, the agreement represents a major development in international economic co-operation.

I do not think there is any doubt that this agreement represents a major development in international economic co-operation. It represents many years of striving on the part of farmers to obtain an international agreement. No matter what may be said about this agreement, I think most farmers will be glad to know that for the next five years at least they have a guarantee of a minimum price, even though that price may be considered too low.

On the other hand I think it would be a great mistake for the farmers to place too much reliance upon this agreement, because it has a number of major weaknesses. I wish to deal with what I consider to be two of its chief weaknesses.

In the first place, there is no guarantee that the importing nations will be able to buy the wheat that they undertake to buy under the agreement. In the second place, there is no guarantee whatsoever that the interests of the producing and consuming countries under this agreement will be balanced, as stated by the minister.

The main essential of sound international trade policy is the right of a nation to pay for its imports with its exports. No agreement can succeed which flouts that fundamental economic principle. That is why the Bretton Woods agreement has failed, and that is why it will fail in the future, as all previous multilateral trade agreements have failed—because they compel the importing nation to pay either in gold or in the currency of the exporting nation, instead of allowing the importing nation to pay with its own goods.

If the nations desiring our wheat under the agreement are unable to secure dollars, they will be unable to pay for that wheat; and they may very well seek to get that wheat elsewhere, using the currency of soft currency countries. On the other hand they may seek, as they did after the first war, to become more self-sufficient.

It is true that under the agreement provision is made whereby the quota of a country which cannot meet its commitments may be allocated to other countries. But suppose Great Britain were unable to meet its commitments, and we had to redistribute its quota of 170 million bushels; obviously the whole agreement would collapse. Yet Great Britain has had great difficulty in finding the dollars to pay for food under agreements we have already made with her, and it is probable that that same situation may develop in the future and become aggravated.

Then, on the second point—does the agreement balance the interests of the consuming and producing nations?—I would say that if it does, it will be purely accidental, because the whole international agreement as laid down at the present time is nothing more or less than a gamble. The nations under this agreement are guessing future values instead of establishing them on a basis of fact. By their haphazard methods they may very well discredit what is in reality a sound principle. Because if this agreement fails and becomes discredited, we all realize it will be very difficult to get another wheat agreement in the future.

The agreement establishes the following basis for the price of wheat; For 1948-49 a minimum price of $1.50 and a maximum of $2; that maximum continues throughout the agreement until 1952-53; the minimum price is reduced ten cents each year, so that by 1952-53 the minimum will be only $1.10 a bushel. How do we know that that will be a fair basis or a fair price upon which to establish prices? If the price levels of other goods remain up in 1949, 1950 and 1951, why should the minimum price be dropped ten cents in each of those years? The price level may go higher, or it may drop; but to say that the minimum price shall be dropped ten cents each year, without any regard for general price levels, is gambling upon the future, and it is not a sound basis upon which to establish a minimum price.

On the other hand, if the price level rises, why should the ceiling be held at $2 during that period? Many people today are comparing this agreement with the British wheat agreement. I should like to emphasize one essential difference between this and the British wheat agreement. This wheat agreement is supposed to be a straight business deal between nations, while the British wheat agreement was not. The government asked the house to support the British wheat agreement more or less as a moral obligation, in order that we might give Great Britain wheat at a fair price, or at a low price, having in mind the great sacrifices that country made during the war. At the time the British wheat agreement was discussed in the house, we in this group said that we would support it as a moral obligation, but as a moral obligation of the Canadian people as a whole, and that any losses suffered under that agreement should be borne not by the farmers only, but by Canadians as a whole. We pointed out that it would be Canada's responsibility.

On the other hand, at that time the government said that the losses of the first years would be offset by the gains in later years. I do not think anyone would care to argue that way today. It is evident now that as a result of the British wheat agreement the farmers of this country will have suffered losses amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. I have in my hand a letter I received from H. G. L. Strange, date March 15, 1948, in which he says:

> My department has recently figured them out—

He is referring to losses.

> —from August 1, 1946 to March 4, 1948. The difference between the $1.55 for our wheat sold to Britain and the price at which our class II wheat was sold by the board to all countries of the world comes to $306,621,592, and the additional losses for the same period on wheat sold to our millers to be made into bread and flour for domestic consumption comes to $157,338,000 or a total of $463,959,592, because of the low price set under the British-Canadian wheat agreement. The loss will be still greater I fear by July 31, next, which will be the end of the second year of the British-Canadian wheat agreement.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could we have got the price for all our wheat that we got for our class II wheat?

Mr. QUELCH: That is based upon a comparison between $1.55 and class II wheat.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any indication that we would have got a higher price for all our wheat than we got for class II wheat?

Mr. QUELCH: In view of the fact that Great Britain needed wheat, she would have been a bidder for it, and that would have held the price up. There is no reason to think that the world price would have been less, because if Great Britain had not bought wheat from us under the agreement she would have bought it on the open market. Wheat was in short supply.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Britain is buying wheat from other countries today at a price greatly above the price of Canadian class II wheat.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; the world price is considerably higher.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Great Britain would have had to pay it.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; therefore we sold her cheap wheat as a moral obligation, and I say it is the responsibility of the Canadian people.

The cost should be borne by the Canadian people, and not by the Canadian farmer, as has been the situation up to the present.

It is evident that if the losses suffered by the farmers during the first two years of the agreement were to be offset, the price of wheat during the last two years would have to fall far below a dollar. That is obviously impossible, in view of the fact that the nations are agreeing to a minimum of $1.50 for this year.

Some may say: You must admit that it was as a result of the British wheat agreement that nations agreed to the new wheat agreement. But the reason we are getting this new agreement has nothing to do with the British wheat agreement, because Britain was the only country which got cheap wheat, while all other nations had to pay world prices. So that we could have got this agreement just as easily, whether we had embarked upon the British wheat agreement or not. It cannot be argued therefore that this has to be taken in conjunction with the British wheat agreement.

As the Canadian government entered into the British agreement undoubtedly in order to give Great Britain cheap wheat, it is up to the government to pay to the farmers the difference between the price obtained from Great Britain and that obtained for class II wheat. Of course the same applies to wheat sold for domestic consumption, because it is being sold at the same price as wheat sold to Great Britain.

In signing the British wheat agreement and giving Great Britain cheap wheat, the government no doubt expected that the price of wheat would fall. They had in mind what happened after the first great war, and no doubt they expected that the same thing would happen after this war. It is now up to the government to pay the farmers the money they lost in the gamble. I urge the government to stop gambling in that way. Mind you, I am not criticizing the idea of a long-term international wheat agreement, but I am criticizing the basis upon which the price is being established. We feel that in a long-term international agreement the price should be established on the basis of parity rather than by guessing at future values. Under the agreement there is no relationship between the guaranteed price and the future price levels of other commodities.

We feel that an international wheat agreement should be a sound business proposition based upon realities and not upon guesswork. We feel that there is a sound basis for agreement. Nations can agree upon fair prices for the first year; seldom is there any difficulty in arriving at a fair price for the first year, because you know the prices of other commodities and you can reach an agreement. But just as soon as you try to set a price for future years you run into guesswork unless you use some yardstick. We insist that in establishing a price for future years it should be tied to the general price level of the importing country; it should be based on the rise and fall of the price level of the importing country. That would unquestionably be parity. Then our exports of wheat to that country would buy from year to year a comparable amount of that country's goods. For instance, if we export wheat to France and in the first year the agreement price is set at $2 per bushel, then the price for future years should be based upon the price level. If the price level in France went up ten per cent, automatically the price of our wheat would go up ten per cent. If the price level in France went down ten per cent, then the price of wheat would go down ten per cent. The result would be that the exports of wheat to that country would bring back the same amount of imports. In other words, you would be establishing the future price upon parity instead of guesswork.

We feel that such a policy would help to insulate the Canadian economy against external fluctuations in the price level, and would thereby facilitate the setting of a parity price for wheat internally, which of course might vary from that obtained under the international wheat agreement. The internal price would not necessarily be the same as the price externally, but there would be a relationship between the price level in Canada and the external price level.

If the objection is raised that that proposal would mean bilateral agreements when we are trying to get multilateral agreements, let me point out that there would be nothing to prevent the exporting countries from trading the credits obtained in any one country for those of another country—that is, where it was not feasible to take payment of goods from the country to which the wheat had been exported. There is nothing unique about the proposal I have been elaborating. It is similar in principle to that which has been proposed for many years by the London, England, chamber of commerce, a body which perhaps has had more experience in international trade than any other commercial body in the world.

There are many points in this agreement which I think need clarification. I understand that the agreement will not be passed this year in the United States, and I cannot see the need for rushing the matter. So far as Great Britain is concerned, we are tied up for another two years, and we would have no difficulty in that regard. Therefore I urge the minister to send this resolution to the banking and commerce committee in order that we may have a thorough discussion of some of the points to which I have referred, and also other points which I have not mentioned.

The question of price is most important. We in this group do not consider that the basis upon which the price in this agreement has been established is sound. It is purely a gamble. It may work out all right, but on the other hand it may place great hardship upon the farmers of this country. No doubt the government hoped that the prices guaranteed in the British wheat agreement would work out fairly well. I have had talks with different members of the government, and they admit frankly that they expected that the world price of wheat would fall. It did not fall, and as a result the British wheat agreement has cost the farmers of this country around half a billion dollars. That is too great a sum to expect any body of workers in this country to pay. The farmers still hope that the government will make up that loss, but so far we have not had any statement.

We should not make a similar mistake with this new agreement. I have indicated one way in which we can avoid doing that—by tying the price of our wheat to the price level of the country to which we export, so that our exports will at all times bring back to this country a comparable amount of imports, which in reality means nothing more or less than parity prices on an international level.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, no doubt hon. members from the western prairies will wonder why a member from the maritimes is taking part in a discussion on the wheat agreement, but I can assure them that this wheat agreement is of real interest to all parts of Canada, particularly the eastern section, of which I have the honour to represent one portion.

The international wheat agreement is really a sales agreement which has been entered into by thirty-six countries, thirty-three of which are importers and three of which are exporters. I was at a loss to understand the remark of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) to the effect that there were too few exporting countries in the agreement. I would have thought that the fact that there were just three exporting countries would make our position that much stronger, because we would have thirty-three countries to which to sell. In making a sales agreement of any kind the endeavour is usually to cover as great a field and to secure as many customers as possible.

I rose more particularly to discuss the matter of transportation. On June 11, when the estimates of the bureau of statistics were under consideration, I endeavoured to bring up this matter of transportation as it affects the wheat agreement. I was quite properly called to order by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and I accepted the ruling that I was wrong in attempting to bring it up at that time. I am therefore taking advantage of this opportunity to place before the minister and the house one or two points that I have in mind.

The first point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister has to do with the basis upon which the prices are established, that is, No. 1 northern in store Fort William-Port Arthur. While the prices are based on Fort William-Port Arthur, I think there should be a definite relationship to the Atlantic and Pacific ports for shipping purposes. We should at all times have a sufficient quantity on hand at those ports to avoid a situation similar to that which arose last year and which was referred to in the British house by Conservative members of parliament.

I shall refer to that in just a moment, but before doing so I should like to ask the minister to take into consideration one or two points which I wish to mention specifically in connection with the clauses of the agreement.

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), who is always interesting and presents an intelligent picture of matters pertaining to wheat and the west generally, is in accord, I was pleased to note, with the general principles of this agreement, and favours the action being taken by the government. From a business standpoint Canada is indeed fortunate in being able to enter into an agreement under which she will sell twenty-three fiftieths of the total 500 million bushels.

I wish to refer the minister to clause 7 of the agreement, to be found on page 10, which deals with the records to be kept. It says.

> The council shall prescribe the records which shall be kept of the transactions reported in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 6 of this article.

I am anxious to know whether that clause will be interpreted as applying to the total grain on hand in the various elevators, including, as we would naturally expect, the elevators at Atlantic ports. To us that is an important thing which should not be overlooked in this agreement. It should be clearly understood that the records shall be interpreted as referring to the elevators at the shipping ports, particularly in the extreme eastern section of our country.

I want to couple with that the definition of "f.o.b." in article XIX on page 34 of the agreement. Paragraph 7 of the definitions says: "'F.o.b.' means free on board." If that means the price quoted at any Atlantic or Pacific port, it answers one of the questions I have in my mind, and perhaps the minister would be good enough to say later whether or not my interpretation is correct.

Paragraph 11 of the definitions defines "marketing costs" thus:

> "Marketing costs" means all usual charges incurred in procurement, marketing, chartering, and forwarding.

I again contend that this wheat should be transported direct to the nearest port to Europe, in other words to the nearest port on the Atlantic which will give the cheapest transportation by water. I need not point out to the minister that Halifax to Liverpool is the shortest route; under this agreement, therefore, the port of Halifax will expect a greater shipment of wheat than we have had in the past.

Paragraph 13 of the definitions defines "stocks":

> "Stocks" means in Australia, Canada, and the United States of America the total of the stocks of old wheat held at the end of their respective crop-years in all elevators, warehouses, and mills.

And so forth. Again I urge upon the minister that he make use of that clause to see that we on the Atlantic coast have our elevators at all times filled to take care of the requirements of ships which enter our ports from time to time and which sometimes have been unable to procure the shipments we so urgently require.

This shortage of wheat shipments from Atlantic ports was brought up in the British house, as reported in the Halifax Herald of June 8, 1948:

> Critical of at least two phases of the British government's policy of buying wheat in bulk to meet national needs, the Conservative party in Britain raises one point of particular interest to Nova Scotia generally and to the port of Halifax in particular.
>
> After discussing the arrangements covering a four-year period, in the course of which a tribute is paid to the Canadian farmer who receives less than the market price for his wheat, the party's statement says Canada fell short on deliveries in 1946, though other countries received proportionately more than their share. Then it adds:
> "When the St. Lawrence froze, the government had to make frantic efforts to ship wheat from Pacific ports, which must have meant an addition of 10 to 15 cents a bushel to the cost."

I think the minister was aware of that situation last year. It was treated with a certain amount of humour by members from the east, but at the same time it was serious. Of course there is no such thing as the freezing of Halifax harbour. The same thing applies to some extent to Saint John, but so far as Halifax is concerned we do not know what it is to have an ice-bound harbour. I urge upon the minister that he take into consideration and make provision in the agreement by which we shall have proper protection.

The article goes on to refer to that official statement, that we were unable to ship from eastern Atlantic ports, and says:

> At that the gap was such that wheat purchases had to be made in the Argentine at $3 a bushel!
> Nova Scotia will recall the situation as it developed in the autumn of 1946, as it was disclosed in the British House of Commons by Food Minister Strachey. He said at that time that he had pressed the Canadian government to hasten deliveries. He said that he had urged the Canadian government to use Canadian Atlantic ports because shipping was short and it was costly in terms of shipping alone to move the wheat by way of the Pacific and Panama.

I recall that at that time I took the liberty of personally wiring the Hon. Anthony Eden, pointing out that Halifax harbour was always free of ice, that I hoped this fact would be made clear to the British food minister and others interested, and that we would have no more official statements such as that so far as Halifax was concerned. The article goes on:

> But no wheat moved. Finally the situation became so grim that the British government had to appeal to the United States transportation authorities to expedite shipments of Canadian wheat by way of United States railways and ports.

Again I take exception. There is no need of that. From time to time I have advocated, and I emphasize this point, that there should be a clause in every wheat sale agreement made by Canada that the shipments be made through our own Canadian ports. If we are selling the goods, surely we are in a position to say: Yes, we will give you the agreed price at an Atlantic port. I would urge upon the minister that he take that into his serious consideration as an amendment to the present agreement.

Again I say I am pleased that Canada is not waiting for the United States but is now taking steps to seek the approval which I feel sure the house will give to this agreement. Some have advocated that we should wait until the United States has made its position clear. But I say this is a good, clear-cut sales agreement, covering a four-year period, and representing 230 million bushels of wheat, and that we should by all means take advantage of the agreement by approving it as soon as possible.

Hon. members have brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) this matter of shipment through Canadian ports. Had the present Minister of Trade and Commerce held the office that he holds today we might have had more definite action, and action which would have helped us. No explanation was ever forthcoming from Ottawa in respect of the complaint I raise as to why shipments of wheat were made over United States railways and through United States ports. Perhaps even at this late date the Minister of Trade and Commerce will tell us why that happened, and guard against such occurrences in the future.

I think I have accomplished what I had in mind. I did not deal with the question of the price of wheat. I am not in a position to do that. There are wheat growers in the house who know whether these prices are fair and whether a long-term policy is a good one. I ask the minister to give every consideration to the transportation of Canadian wheat through Canadian ports.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the presentation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this morning in respect to the international wheat agreement. He pointed out that it was necessary for the various countries to ratify the agreement not later than July 1 in order that it may operate for the 1948 crop year. He said that this agreement provided for a ceiling price of $2 a bushel, and that the floor price ranged from $1.50 down to $1.10 a bushel. That is not the net figure to the farm producer. I would judge it would average about 20 cents a bushel less than that, net to the farmer, if the agreement is carried out.

It seems rather strange that we should be tying into an agreement such as this at a time when there is a great scarcity of wheat in the country and prevailing wheat prices are much higher than $2 a bushel on the world market. In fact during the past year wheat has sold at considerably over $3.40 a bushel, which is a great deal higher than $2 a bushel.

In recent days I have been in touch with a number of millers, especially in western Canada, whose plants are closed down because they cannot purchase wheat to mill into flour. This is a serious state of affairs for these mill operators. The majority of the small private millers have their plants actually closed today because they cannot purchase wheat in the country with which to make flour. That is also true of the flour export business. It proves that at this particular time there is a great demand and a great shortage of wheat in this country.

The minister said that Australia and Canada would handle all their wheat through their wheat board. That means that under present government legislation, all wheat in Canada will be handled compulsorily through the Canadian wheat board. The farmer has no choice other than to deliver his wheat to the wheat board at the prices set by the board. Of course these prices are agreed to or set by the cabinet committee, which is in charge of the Canadian wheat board. I repeat, it is a compulsory method; the farmer has no choice. On the other hand, the United States government has told its people that the open market will be continued in that country, and if the price in that country, or the world price, is considerably over $2 a bushel, the wheat producer of the United States of America will receive the existing price at whatever figure prevails over the $2. In fact, in that respect the United States Department of Agriculture on May 25 announced a government loan or support price for the 1948 crop as follows: Chicago, $2.25 a bushel; Minneapolis, $2.22 a bushel; Kansas City, $2.20 a bushel, and Portland, Oregon, $2.15 a bushel. This means an average loan rate on wheat to farmers on their farms of $1.96. The farmer in the United States is guaranteed that, no matter where the price may fall, because he receives the loan, and he receives on top of that at a later date whatever is obtained over and above that figure. He may receive a great deal more than the $1.96 that he is guaranteed. Therefore hon. gentlemen will readily see how much more fortunate the wheat producer in the United States is than the farmer in this country is and has been throughout the crop years.

I have to agree almost entirely with the speech delivered by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) this morning. He handled the situation very well. I agreed with him when he said that the wheat farmers of this country have made altogether too great a contribution to the consumers of Great Britain, and also to the consumers of Canada. He pointed out that it was not a straight business deal, that we had to do something to assist Britain. With that we all agree, and I have always agreed that that contribution should be made. Let me repeat what I have often said: the contribution should have been borne by all the taxpayers of this country, and not by one class of people.

In another debate on May 26 I gave a list of figures showing what it would cost the farm producers of this country. For the first nine months of 1947-48 crop year alone, under the United Kingdom wheat agreement, our farmers lost $191,891,763. That is the difference between what they received and what they might have received, had they received the average class II price of wheat. The prices were averaged month by month from August 1, 1947, to April of this year—nine months. On the same basis, on the flour and wheat used for consumption in Canada they lost another $8,401,104, a total of $274,292,867 in the first nine months of this crop year. No other producers in Canada are asked to contribute on that basis, nor were they throughout the war years. That policy is continuing, and we do not know how long it may continue in the future. It has been most unfair.

I also pointed out, then, that if the proposed wheat agreement went into effect, it would be absolute proof that the farmers, who continue in the future to operate under this policy would never have an opportunity to regain that very great loss running into many hundreds of millions of dollars. I am satisfied that that is the situation. I agree that over the past fifteen years these nations have been trying to work out an international wheat agreement, and that many farmers of this country want something of that kind. I do not think any farmer will be satisfied with these prices under these conditions.

I remember the argument we had on the United Kingdom wheat agreement. Along with many other hon. members of this party I argued that with the rising costs at that time it would be disastrous for the farm producers of this country, and as I read the statements over and over again I find that every word of the prophecy has come true, and much more. The costs of the wheat producers are rising daily. Not long ago an average increase of 21 per cent across the board was granted in freight rates. I will admit that that increase does not apply to wheat, but this parliament permitted that increase.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not parliament.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Parliament stood by the board which passed it. Parliament did not do anything about it. The board, under this government, passed the freight rate increase. I agree that all of the opposition parties tried their best to prevent it and have something done about it. That increase will enter into the cost of everything that the wheat producer buys in this country. The cost of the oil that he uses in his tractor has increased at least fifty per cent in the past year. These costs are increasing all the time. Every time somebody talks about another inquiry into freight rates or something of the kind, the oil companies increase the cost of their products. There have been periodical increases right along. I am sure we have not yet reached the peak. Every few months sees an increase in the cost of farm machinery.

I want to see the farm worker get everything possible. I have always been in favour of the workers of the country obtaining all they can, but all these things enter into the cost of production. According to the bureau of statistics, the farm labourer receives three times as much in farm wages today as he received in 1939. There are many other items I might mention, the prices of which the economists of this country say have not yet reached the peak in Canada. These must all be taken into consideration.

I say, therefore, that when you ask people who have borne such a heavy loss since 1939, and who are bearing the burden today, to sign this international wheat agreement, under which the maximum they will receive will be $2—and even that not net, since it will be twenty cents less than that, with a minimum of $1.10—you are providing that these wheat producers shall continue to suffer this great loss for many years to come.

I am sure that, while they want an international wheat agreement, the people who ask for one will not be as satisfied with the prices set forth in that article. If the government are determined to ratify this agreement at the present time, I must say that I see no urgency about it; because, as was pointed out by my leader this morning, the United States, through its senate committee, is now considering the matter, and if that committee reports favourably, which I doubt, it will require a vote of two-thirds of the senate of the United States before the agreement can become law. Only ten days are left to the first of July, and according to press reports they do not intend to have a report in before that date. Therefore I fail to see the urgency of ratifying this agreement.

Australia has ratified the agreement with the proviso that its signature stands only if the United States government ratifies it by the first of July. Surely, if this government is determined to ratify the agreement at this time, it will adopt a similar proviso. I suggest to the minister that he amend the resolution by adding a clause, "subject to ratification and approval by the senate or other competent legislative body of the United States of America". I hope the minister will do that. I was prepared to move such an amendment, but I have suggested similar amendments in the past and they have been ruled out of order at a stage in debate corresponding to this. I understand that this resolution is not going through committee stage. We are merely discussing it on this motion. Judging from past rulings of the Chair, I think I would be out of order in moving such an amendment, but I appeal to the minister as earnestly as I can to insert in the resolution a proviso such as I have suggested. I do not think the agreement should be ratified without some such safeguard. I hope the minister will adopt that suggestion.

I have no wish to take up much more time. I have pointed out how unfair it will be to the farm producers of the country.

Mr. HOWE: Are you going to vote for it?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No, I am not; not personally as the measure is now drafted. I have also pointed out that when the minister intimated to me before that we had voted for the United Kingdom agreement he could not show me in Hansard any record of the fact. He could not point out where we had ever voted for it, and at the first opportunity, under his predecessor's estimates, we argued against the agreement. I repeat that assertion now. He has not been able to find in Hansard anything to show that we acted at that time as he suggested.

I wanted to bring these points to the attention of the house. Many members, I suppose, are tired of hearing me discuss wheat, but I was sent here to represent the people of one of the finest wheat producing constituencies in the west, and my first duty is to my constituents. They are divided on the subject. Many are not satisfied with the agreement as drawn; even those who favour an international agreement embodying some general principle are opposed to this particular agreement as drawn.

If the minister and the government are determined to pass this agreement, I hope they will consider a proviso such as I have suggested, a proviso which I would have moved myself if it were in order for me to propose such an amendment at this stage.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the agreement before us is to assure supplies of wheat to thirty-three countries and to assure a market to the three countries which, under the agreement at the present time, will be the producer countries. I would like to point out to the last speaker, who suggested that Canadian legislation will be passed, subject to ratification of the agreement by the United States government, that at page 36 of the international wheat agreement there is this provision:

> This agreement shall be subject to formal acceptance by the signatory governments. Instruments of acceptance shall be deposited with the government of the United States of America by July 1, 1948; provided, however, that an additional period shall be allowed by the council for the deposit of instruments of acceptance on behalf of those importing countries which are prevented by a recess of their respective legislatures from accepting this agreement by July 1, 1948.

We support any move which will assist in the proper distribution of foodstuffs throughout the world. It is significant that the international federation of agricultural producers of the world has supported this agreement. It is an effort on the part of producers and consumers to distribute properly the essentials of life without the gambling that goes with the open market system, of which we have had too much in the past, and still have. We regret the news items which indicate that this agreement will not likely go into effect at all because the congress of the United States will not sign it.

The world is moving away from the old ideas which prevailed in connection with the grain exchange open market and the cotton exchange. It is moving towards the place where distribution of the essentials of adequate living shall be made to all people, and privileged groups shall not have the power to gamble with these essentials and extract for their own benefit large profits to the detriment of producer and consumer. Because, therefore, this is a step in that direction, we support it with everything we have.

World prices are becoming a myth. People talk about the losses Canada has suffered because of failure to sell commodities at world prices. These have not been world prices. What are world prices? Prices quoted on the Chicago stock exchange are not world prices; and as for what Canada has lost in this regard, I would like those people who have been talking about the loss to Canadians in the past under the United Kingdom agreement to compare the prices at which producers in Canada sold their commodities on the grain exchange with prices on the world market over the past fifty years, adding up all that was produced and sold at the low prices to the line elevators. Compare the prices there with the prices at which the Winnipeg grain exchange sold the produce, not to mention prices which might have prevailed in the United States. The Canadian producer never got the grain exchange prices of the United States.

This agreement commits Canada to a five-year distribution or export of 230 million bushels a year, the United States to 185 million bushels a year, and Australia to 85 million bushels a year. The producers support this principle, because, in spite of the fact that prices are low, there is an element of stability which they never had before.

I am not satisfied with the prices, cost of production being what it is today. The Canadian producer stands to lose heavily by it if costs continue to rise. I would point out, however, that there is an arrangement for adjustment in the last three years of the agreement. The world has not been producing foodstuffs to the extent that we expected after the last war, but it is possible that within the next five years we shall see a great deal of production. I do not think the farmers should have to take the risk of the loss involved in the difference between their cost of production and the prices which may prevail here. I believe, with the hon. member for Acadia, that Canadian prices should be tied up with cost of production and commodity prices within our own country. That is a valuable suggestion, and I agree that it would be a good thing for the Canadian government to guarantee the Canadian producer a tying-up of the domestic market prices and the foreign market prices so as to afford him cost of production with a little margin. If we have not this agreement, are we going to allow the grain exchange to handle our produce? That is the alternative to which the average producer objects, and that is why he supports this move in the direction of stability such as he has not had in the past.

Those who oppose the agreement do not offer any satisfactory alternative. If things are left as they are, what guarantee has the farmer? He will go back to the old conditions. The grain exchange give him a price one day and get him to deliver his produce. He has now sold it. They manipulate the market, and the price goes up. The grain exchange buyer sells the commodity to the consumer at a high price, pockets the difference, so the Canadian consumer and producer lose. That is what makes producers in Canada and producers all over the world support something which will give them stability. On the basis of that principle we are supporting this measure with everything we have. If those who oppose it have something else, let them bring their proposition forward and let us support it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): How much wheat are you going to market through that agreement?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How much wheat are we going to market?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How much am I going to market?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Just about as much as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie.

Mr. MILLER: I take issue with that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I regret that the board has not been assigned the handling of the flour portion of this agreement. The agreement provides that Canada can export flour in place of wheat. I think it operates on the basis of some seventy-two pounds of flour in place of one hundred pounds of wheat. I do not see any reason why we should not do the same thing with flour as we do with wheat—link the two together and let the Canadian board handle the whole thing.

Mr. C. C. MILLER (Portage la Prairie): Before I say what I wish to say in connection with this bill, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal first with one or two points that were raised by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), and also with some raised by the minister.

In the first place, most of the objections I take to this agreement are based on the fact, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), that the farmer is being tied to a maximum price fixed over a period of five years for the commodity which he has to sell, without any assurance that the commodities which enter into his cost of production will not rise to greater heights than those to which they have risen today. It seems to me that I, as a lawyer, or the hon. member for Yorkton, as a school teacher, would hesitate to enter into a contract for the next five uncertain years. I think he, as a school teacher, if he were not a member of parliament, would hesitate to take a contract, for the sake of security and stability which provided that he should be paid only $200 for his teaching year. That would mean security and stability, but it would be a mighty poor living for the hon. member for Yorkton. I know of no lawyer who would wish to contract himself, for the next five uncertain years, into the position of working for fees below the cost of doing business, as the farmers are now being asked to do if this international agreement ever becomes an actuality.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It would be better than what he got under the grain exchange.

Mr. MILLER: The hon. member for Yorkton refers to the grain exchange. I can remember earlier days when my hon. friend was not so much concerned about the rights of farmers. I can well remember the days of the pioneers in the area from which I come—and it is a splendid area—when the people did not have the benefits of the grain exchange; when they brought their grain thirty or forty miles to Portage la Prairie and offered it by the box load or the sleigh load on the streets. I know of many old timers in Portage la Prairie who do not join with the hon. member for Yorkton in condemnation of the grain exchange. I know of men of just as good judgment as the hon. member for Yorkton, but with greater farming interests than he has, who even in this day and age of the wheat board, or anything else that we have, would hesitate to see the grain exchange put out of business.

I never traded one bushel of wheat on the Winnipeg grain exchange or on any other exchange. I hold no brief for them. But in my judgment, formed from talking to men who have lived in my area since the pioneer days, it would be a mistake to put it out of business. I know there are many who condemn the grain exchange. But I have heard some of these old timers say that they would hate to see the day come when they would not be able to go to some place where they could be sure of selling their grain instead of having to peddle it by the box load and take what they were offered for it or else go back home with it.

I do not know whether the grain exchange is good or bad, but I know that it is not always deserving of the unfair condemnation of some hon. members of the C.C.F. party. I know they are delighted that I am making this speech, and I know it will be represented that I am a supporter of the grain exchange. They will likely say that in my constituency. But the people who live in my constituency know where I stand. They know that I have supported, and still support, the Canadian wheat board, and that I have never wavered from that position. They will believe me when I say this from the public platform. I have said in the by-election and at other times, regardless of whether it got me votes or lost me votes, that if it ever came to a vote in the House of Commons I would not vote for the abolition of either the Canadian wheat board or the grain exchange.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Neither will the wheat pools.

Mr. MILLER: And I still say that. That was just a little by-play into which I was deflected, I imagine much to the appreciation and delight of hon. members in the C.C.F. party.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. MILLER: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was just going to deal with one or two matters referred to by the minister. Press reports this morning indicate that both houses of the United States congress have risen, with the result that it would appear completely improbable, if not impossible, that the agreement will be ratified by the United States; therefore there will be no sufficient degree of ratification by the signatory powers before the deadline of July 1.

The United States senate will probably have a committee dealing with this matter; nevertheless it cannot be dealt with by the whole senate. I notice the minister said that the senate of the United States had the matter in hand. This only serves to strengthen the argument we have made today, that there is no haste in dealing with the matter, particularly in the dying days of the session.

I agree, and I think hon. members of this party agree, with what was well said by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), when he pointed out that the proper way to dispose of this resolution would be not to pass it now but to have it referred to the committee on banking and commerce, there to be further studied and dealt with. That is what we now urge upon the government.

I should like to deal with another statement of the minister. He said that the price range really operates to give importers the right to buy, and exporters are obliged to sell at ceiling prices, if a deal can be consummated at those figures. On the other hand, importers are obliged to buy, and exporters have the right to sell at the floor price. In other words I do not see where there is any certainty about it. There is still the matter of dealing between exporting and importing countries as to the price to be charged between the maximum and minimum prices each year. I maintain that the price spread between maximum and minimum is completely out of line with the necessities of the occasion. I do not think this should be. Actual sales, if there are any, and if this agreement ever comes into force—which I doubt—will likely take place somewhere between the maximum and the minimum in each year. And as between exporting and importing countries, if we cannot agree on a price between maximum and minimum, there will be no deal, unless the importers will say to the exporters: We will give you the maximum; or the exporter will say to the importers: We will accept the minimum.

In other words, if there is any certainty about this entire agreement, it is that it is completely uncertain. There is no stability and no certainty. And there is another uncertainty in it too. With that large spread between maximum and minimum, large exporting countries outside the agreement altogether can put the pressure on the market and without any question can put our countries in such a position that if they wish to deal at all with importing countries, they will have to deal with those importing countries at the very minimum rates set out in the agreement. If we are driven to the expedient of relying on these minimum rates, there is no minimum in the agreement which by any stretch of the imagination can be deemed proper and sufficient for our farmers and for our people generally in western Canada. There is the great danger, I repeat, that countries which are normally exporters of wheat can put such pressure on the importing countries, by means of offerings, as to compel us, if we wish to deal at all, to accept the minimum. In other words, instead of helping ourselves we shall establish a minimum and betray ourselves.

The minister did not tell us this morning—at least I did not hear him tell us—the number of countries which have initialled the agreement. I believe it was twenty-two or twenty-eight.

Mr. HOWE: Thirty-six.

Mr. MILLER: The minister did not tell us, either, how many countries have actually ratified it. So far as I know, only Australia has ratified it.

Mr. HOWE: No; there have been others.

Mr. MILLER: Perhaps the minister will tell us, when he closes the debate, how many of the importing countries have already ratified the agreement. In any event, the minister and I are united in this, that if the United States does not ratify it, the agreement will not be of any worthwhile benefit and will not come into operation.

When the minister speaks again he should clear up for us unequivocally this question: If we sign this agreement, and if it is filed with the registering party, the United States government, are we bound by its terms to offer our wheat for export regardless of how many importing and exporting countries actually ratify the agreement by legislation? There are so many pitfalls which have not yet been explained that it is the part of folly, in my humble judgment at least, for us blindly to ratify this agreement, simply to be the first, second or third among the countries ratifying it. It affects a commodity that is important to our whole economy, and we should give it the closest study.

The trouble is, particularly with those of us who come from the west, that we still remember the scare we got in 1929 and succeeding years when huge surpluses were piled up and had to be offered at almost fire-sale prices. The government and its advisers, perhaps, and many of us in the west, are fearful that again we may have a surplus piled up at low prices.

I submit that this agreement, and some other agreements which have been made with regard to wheat, have been entered into because of that great and underlying fear. We should not enter into improvident agreements with respect to wheat, because while an ageement may be right in principle, it may be very wrong in details as to prices and the like.

The time has come when, as a large exporting country, we should take our courage in our hands in dealing with our wheat supplies and endeavour to get a decent price for our farmers. So far as the United States farmer is concerned, probably this does give him some security. I understand their government will continue to buy wheat on the open market, and anyway their exportable surplus is not a substantial part of their crop. But even then they will be getting more benefit than our farmers will be getting, unless our government also provides that if our farmers have to sell their wheat cheaper, they will protect the farmers by buying it in the open market, or at least giving an additional price to the farmers for their grain; because our farmers cannot get along at present proposed prices.

Even if that were done, there are two things to consider. The first is that our farmers took the low prices at a time when they could have had high prices, and when the United States farmers got their high prices. It is not so bad for the United States farmers to say: Oh, well; we had good prices during the war which the Canadian farmers did not have, and we will now take low prices for security's sake. Our farmers had to take low prices, and now we do not get any more security or any greater price—in fact not as much as the United States farmers will get if their government enters into this agreement.

It is true that most of our people want some sort of agreement like this. It is the duty of the house to see that we do not ignore the body of the agreement that we sign, just to secure an agreement which we approve in principle; let us also seek an agreement that will be fair to the people who are chiefly affected.

I would like the minister to say, when he speaks in closing the debate, what the effect will be if no countries ratify it other than those who have already done so. Is it or is it not to be enforced this year? According to the agreement, it should be enforced this year, but it cannot be enforced until it is ratified. In order that there may be no confusion I think the minister should tell us whether this agreement will be in operation this year if we ratify it. How many nations must ratify it before it will be in force?

The various countries can get out from under if they have exchange difficulties. For instance, if Great Britain decides that she is having exchange difficulties, and goes to the council and says that she has a contract under the agreement to buy 180 million bushels of wheat, the council can reallocate that wheat. But I ask the minister to whom could they reallocate Britain's huge share of 180 million of the 500 million bushels under the new agreement? Who would have the money to buy Britain's 180 million bushels if Britain cannot? What countries among the thirty-three can be expected not to have exchange difficulties? These important problems should be settled, and that is why this resolution should be referred to a committee, as I have suggested.

There are no means of enforcing the agreement. It depends simply on the honour or good faith of the countries involved.

There is another point which has not so far been referred to. Article VI, section 9, restricts to some extent our own control over the domestic price of our grain, and perhaps over grain which we might sell outside the ambit of this agreement.

The agreement presumes that there will be disputes, because elaborate machinery is to be set up for the settlement of disputes between countries. I contend that the elaborate and roundabout and indefinite machinery that is to be set up will not settle any disputes. If there is a dispute, it will involve delay in the marketing of our grain, and before these tortuous methods of arriving at a settlement are carried through to a logical conclusion, our grain will be piling up. In the meantime our farmers will have no money, and there will be the gravest insecurity.

Under an annex to one of the articles in the agreement we undertake to retain at the end of each crop year 70,000,000 bushels of old wheat in reserve. Will that 70,000,000 bushels include what we have to keep in reserve for domestic requirements, or will it be in addition to those requirements? If so, it will be most difficult for us to carry out that section of the agreement. I should like that question cleared up when the minister replies.

Article XVI deals with expenses of the secretariat, council and so on, which are to be apportioned among the different governments according to the percentage in which they share in the exports, and so on. Those expenses will be paid first by the government, but will they then be charged up against the operations of the wheat board? I hope they will not constitute an additional burden upon the western Canadian farmers.

Article XX provides that the United States or any other nation may ask for additional time if their legislature is in recess. How long must we wait until the various recesses have expired? How long will it be before our farmers know whether we are to have this agreement? How many legislatures are now in recess, and when do those recesses conclude? When will this agreement come into force? When will the western Canadian farmers know that their grain is to move to the markets of the world under this agreement?

Even the importing countries seem to be getting a little shaky about whether this agreement will come into force. Why are we spending time debating an agreement that might never see the light of day? Are we doing it simply for the sake of notoriety and publicity?

If this agreement comes into force, the undertakings of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), both on the hustings and in this house, will go by the board. Under the United Kingdom agreement, undoubtedly the grain produced by the farmers of western Canada has been sold at a lower price, but the minister has promised that the farmers would be reimbursed in the final years of the United Kingdom contract by being given a price exceeding the world price. If this agreement is to be put into force, I ask the minister to tell us how the farmers are to be reimbursed for the low prices they accepted for their grain during the war years. At the best they can be reimbursed only to the extent of $70,000,000 to $100,000,000, or possibly $140,000,000, even if grain goes down to the minimum provided by this agreement. They cannot possibly get those hundreds of millions of dollars which they have lost already and which they were told would be accounted for in the last great accounting under the United Kingdom agreement. It looks to me as though that great accounting which we were promised has already been submerged in the Atlantic ocean under the terms of this new wheat agreement.

If this agreement comes into force, there will never be enough as between the United Kingdom and our government to reimburse the western farmers for the losses they took during the war when they compulsorily delivered their wheat at less than its true value. The problem will be solved for the government if this trade agreement is finally adopted.

I agree with some of the other speakers, and I think it is a self-evident truth, that the prices of our grain have been fixed at the lowest point that was discussed by the importing and exporting countries. I am not minimizing the difficulty faced by the government in marketing our grain. The thirty-three importing countries would try to get grain as cheaply as they could, while the government would try to bargain to get rid of as much grain as they could. But apparently this government, along with its agricultural advisers, are still labouring under the delusion from which they suffered in the days when we had those terrible prices and those large grain surpluses.

Frankly, I hesitate to vote against this resolution. I have studied the agreement as well as I can. We can only study it to the best of our individual ability. I submit again that a matter as important as this should be sent to one of the standing committees—I suggest the committee on banking and commerce—so that we can get all the facts and not have to decide a matter so important, not only to the farmers of western Canada, but to their children and their children's children. The government should give us every bit of available information when they ask us to make such an important decision as this.

There is no need to be hasty. If we go on like this, we will regret our haste. I cannot see how any harm could be done to any person, to importers or exporters, or to any government, or how our position could be in any way prejudiced, if this matter were referred to a committee where all the facts could be brought out and we could ascertain whether there was any danger in delay. We from western Canada do not want to do anything that would be prejudicial to the farmers of western Canada. We do not want to be hurried into a decision unless we are confident that it is the right one. Without a full knowledge of the facts, and without further study, I shall be inclined to vote against this resolution unless the minister agrees to refer it to a committee.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the people of Canada realize the importance of this international wheat agreement. Many people do not realize how great a loss the farmers of western Canada have suffered through the British wheat agreement. As has been often stated, we have not objected to the low price which was given to Britain under that agreement, because we realized that there was a moral responsibility, which was pointed out at the time. But it should have been the responsibility of the whole Canadian people to supply that wheat to Britain, and I ask whether it is the intention of the government to make good to the farmers the loss imposed upon them by that agreement.

It would seem that by this international agreement we are again tying up the farmers of the prairie provinces, because in it no consideration is given to the costs of production to which the farmers of Canada may be subjected—no consideration whatsoever.

Under the terms of the agreement the minimum price for the first year of the contract will be $1.50 per bushel, and in the remaining years the price will be allowed to drop ten cents a bushel. Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) tell us on what sound business these stipulations are made, and the reason for the $2 per bushel maximum price in the contract, which runs for five years? That price is much better than the price that prevailed during the depression years, but in view of the market price for class II wheat, even the price of $2 a bushel is not as high as it should be. Why should our farmers be deprived of the rightful price to which they are entitled for their produce?

It has been agreed by everybody that our farmers have been taking the rap since 1929, almost twenty years. Why tie them up again for another five years under this agreement? The farmers are not against a long-term agreement in respect of wheat and perhaps other farm products, but I do not know of any farmer who will sacrifice price just for the sake of a long-term agreement.

The member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) placed our position clearly before the house this morning, and I do not think I can improve on what he said. It was stated this morning that the British wheat agreement in the first two years will cost the prairie farmers half a billion dollars on wheat alone. That is quite a lot of money. Many people do not realize that while there was a price ceiling on coarse grains, it was based on the price of wheat in the British wheat agreement. They do not realize that the price of our pork and beef was based on the price of coarse grains, thus tying the price of all these products to the price of wheat in the British wheat agreement. That has cost the farmer many more millions of dollars than anybody in the house realizes, and here we are being tied again by a contract which is vague in the extreme. To me it does not look like good business.

I ask the minister whether he is agreeable to sending this measure to the banking and commerce committee, where definite information can be secured so that we shall know what we are doing. This agreement is of vital interest to all the people, not to the farmers of Canada alone. The money the farmers received for their products is spent in Canada, and for that reason all Canada benefits when our agriculture is prosperous.

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this question of an international wheat agreement is essentially a western problem, but as it will affect the economy of the whole of Canada I should like to say a few words about it.

The agreement involves 500 million bushels of wheat a year, of which Canada's share will be 230 million bushels, or 46 per cent; the share of the United States 185 million bushels or 37 per cent, and the share of Australia, 85 million bushles, or 17 per cent. So far the minister has not told us how many governments have ratified this agreement. He has told us that Australia has, with a rider that if it is not ratified by the United States the agreement will be voided by Australia. There are two great wheat-producing countries still outside of the agreement. Probably 800 million bushels of wheat is the yearly world trading figure, but the total production is much greater. What will happen if 100 million bushels, or even 50 million bushels of this 800 million, are traded outside of this agreement at five cents a bushel less than the amount stipulated in the agreement? Does the minister think that the nations approving the agreement will hold to it and pay the extra price in the face of that offer? How can we expect a foreign government, or even a government of a sister nation in the commonwealth, to guarantee our growers what we feel to be fair prices?

I contend that only our own government in co-operation with our own growers can possibly bring about this stability. Obviously in any agreement of this kind which seeks to stabilize world prices, the importing nations must realize that they will have to pay a little more than the world price when there is a large surplus of wheat in the world. Why? Because under the agreement they are buying wheat at less than the world price. The ceiling price in the agreement is thirteen per cent below the world price of wheat today. Why is the ceiling not fixed nearer to the world price?

I wonder whether any labour union in this country would sign an agreement for five years with the maximum wage twenty-two per cent below existing rates? I base these figures on the fact that the guarantee to the farmer will net to him only $1.80 of the existing $2.31 world price, or approximately 22 per cent below the world price. Would a union sign an agreement on the basis of a possible drop of forty-five per cent in wages within the next five years? Would any manufacturer sign such an agreement? It is my belief that they would not do so. Why, therefore, should we ask the farmers of this country to do something that we know the unions or the manufacturers would not do?

I believe, and it is the belief of many hon. members who have spoken in his debate, that during the war the farmers of this country took a great deal less than the world price for their products. In view of the fact that the farmers have taken this loss during the past five years, it would appear to me that the government is asking us to ratify, in the dying days of the session, an agreement which asks the farmers to turn the other cheek and let it be slapped also.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Before the question is put I should like to ask the minister, who will close the debate, to explain the basis upon which the agreement was arrived at, in respect to the actual amount that is to be paid to farmers for the wheat. Was any thought given to the price in Canada itself? It is conceivable, for example, that our farmers might not be able to produce wheat at $1.10 a bushel if the costs of their production were as high, or any thing like as high, as they are today. Therefore it would appear to me that we ought to have some assurance that the farmer's costs will go down as it is expected the price of wheat will go down. I would like the minister to give us some idea of how the amounts to be paid were arrived at. In asking that question I wish to say that, like hon. members around me, I am in full accord with the principle involved in this agreement, and should like to support it, because I believe it aims at stability for agriculture.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Charlton) bemoaned the prices that the farmers received during the war. If we were to abandon all this regulation and price fixing, would he guarantee to the farmers that two, three or five years from now they will be getting as much for their wheat as they are now? He would have to take a great risk to do that. This is the only sensible way to go about the thing; but, I do insist that there ought to be some relationship between the costs of producing wheat in Canada and the floor price which is expected under this agreement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question? If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): As hon. members are probably aware, the question before us is whether we shall or shall not ratify an agreement that has already been made. The agreement was made by delegates of the government, among whom were included the leaders of the three largest wheat marketing organizations in Canada, as well as other men whose reputation as market experts is well established. The unanimous recommendation of Canada's delegates was that the agreement be ratified, as being in the best interests of the Canadian producer. It is significant that the favourable report was not confined to farm organizations in Canada. The leading farm organizations in the United States also recommended to their government that the agreement be ratified. The leading farm organizations of the United Kingdom made the same recommendation to their government. The farm organizations of other countries supported this agreement as being a satisfactory outcome of the efforts of the thirty-six countries which during the past several years have met together in attempts to bring about stability in international wheat trading.

What is the purpose of the agreement? The purpose is to take out a mutual insurance policy. The three producing countries obtain a firm guarantee, first, that they will be able to dispose of the quantities allocated to them under the agreement—in the case of Canada 230 million bushels—and second that they will be able to dispose of that quantity of wheat at a price. It is interesting to hear people laugh off the idea that there may be surpluses in this country, and that there may be difficulty in disposing of surplus wheat. Memories are very short. I was around in the thirties and I know that the most difficult problem of the country in those days was the disposal of our wheat. I know that if any minimum price had been available there would not have been much question as to what the minimum was; if we could have moved the quantity and got any price that seemed reasonable even in those days, that privilege would have been a very welcome insurance policy indeed.

As I say, the insurance policy for the producing countries is that they will be able to sell a definite quantity of wheat at a definite price. The insurance to the consuming countries is that they will be able to buy a definite quantity of wheat at a maximum price of $2 a bushel. As I say, the experts of all these countries believed that that is a desirable arrangement. I believe it is a desirable insurance policy. I believe that it will do a great deal to stabilize world markets and world price. I believe that Canada should ratify the agreement.

The question has been raised as to how many countries have ratified the agreement. I cannot say the number; I do not know how many. The date of ratification is the first day of July, and we have not as yet reached that date. We have had informal but definite advice to the effect that the United Kingdom intends to ratify the agreement. Several countries on the continent already have ratified the agreement. Australia has done so. The United States senate has adjourned temporarily without ratifying the agreement, and it is obvious that that country will not ratify it before July 1, but indications are that there is a fair chance that it will be ratified later this year.

As far as the position of the Canadian farmer is concerned, based on whether the agreement is or is not ratified within the next month, may I say that it does not make the slightest difference. Canada's export of wheat is contracted for, for the 1948 and 1949 crops.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Miller) says it is obvious that the promises of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and the promises of the Minister of Agriculture of the United Kingdom, would not be carried out if the agreement was signed. I may tell him that he is mistaken about that. Conversations have taken place with the United Kingdom government, and it is clearly understood between the two parties to the United Kingdom wheat agreement that the settlement of the current wheat agreement will be made whether the multilateral agreement is signed or not.

It is all very well for hon. members to make speeches about the price of wheat, and to compare the prices obtained under the Canada-United Kingdom agreement with the domestic price in the Chicago market; for the latter is the price they are talking about. They can call it the price of No. 2 wheat if they like. The price of No. 2 wheat has been the price in the Chicago domestic market. Our No. 2 wheat price is the quotation from day to day on the Chicago grain exchange. The quantity of No. 2 wheat that Canada had to sell was small, and as a price had to be fixed, the day to day Chicago price was adopted as reasonable in the circumstances. We know that dentists, doctors, oil men and persons engaged in various professions were dabbling in the Chicago market at that time, and that the United States government was itself alarmed at speculation in that market. Nevertheless hon. members opposite like to talk about $3.20 wheat and compare that with the price obtained for Canadian wheat. We never hear the fact mentioned that the price already paid the western farmer for the 1945 Canadian crop is higher than that obtained for the 1945 crop by any other country in the world, and the final payment on that crop has not yet been determined.

No one knows what will be the final price for the pool wheat of the crops of 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949, and I suggest it might be well to wait for the determination of that price before comparisons are made. I say that any man who attempts to base a comparison on the peak Chicago price for domestic United States wheat is attempting to deceive his listeners, and I say that without qualification.

It has been suggested that this resolution should go to the banking and commerce committee. If there were any possibility of varying the terms of the agreement, that might be worth while; but when it is a simple decision, whether Canada will or will not be a party to the agreement, it seems to me the question is sufficiently clear to make unnecessary any reference to a committee.

Questions have been asked about the details of the agreement. The agreement requires no great comment. The price fixed is the price between countries. It does not interfere with the policy of any country regarding its domestic wheat. We know that the United States intends to fix wheat prices for the current year somewhat above the maximum price provided for in the agreement for wheat sold to any export markets. Any country can do the same. I think that covers the situation.

Mr. MILLER: What about stocks?

Mr. HOWE: The 70,000,000 carry-over at July 31 includes domestic requirements. That is not wheat available for export. It is the smallest carry-over, I believe, this country has ever had at the end of a crop year. Last year it was about 75,000,000 bushels. It is necessary to have some carry-over to take care of requirements before the new crop moves into all domestic markets.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it not true that under article VI the minimum price for the last three years is subject to negotiation?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the minimum price is subject to negotiation. If it appears that the minimum is too low, it is possible to reopen the subject, but we have definite assurance that the minimum prices stated will be the minimum. Any renegotiation will be upwards.

Mr. MILLER: Would not the two other years also have to be negotiated? How would you fix a price between the maximum and the minimum?

Mr. HOWE: It would be fixed by the law of supply and demand, between the upper and the lower limits. In the old days trading had no upper and no lower limit. Now it has both.

Mr. MILLER: You might have a spread of fifty cents, and you might have the minimum of $1.10.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly, and we might be glad to take it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McCUAIG: May I ask a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The debate is closed.

An hon. MEMBER: It is only a question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On division.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE ON JUNE 19

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JULIAN H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday evening last I spoke on the question of coal mines, and a certain gentleman met me in the halls of this building and threatened me by saying that for what I had said in the House of Commons, on behalf, I believed, of the people of Canada, he would come into my riding and defeat me. I do not think this man should make such assertions or threats. Furthermore, if he is not more successful in defeating me than he was with his coal project, I shall be a member for a long time.

WHALE MEAT

QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL INSPECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the whale meat now being sold in Vancouver subject to the same federal inspection as good Fraser valley beef?

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): No notice has been given me of the question, though I have been around all day. When I get notice I will look into the question and give an answer.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You have notice now.

[Mr. Miller.]

PRICES

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION—REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell the house whether, should the prices committee report or even if does not, this house will have an opportunity to debate the matter before the session ends?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Unless I am seriously mistaken, the question appears to be one concerning domestic rather than external affairs, and I must confess my inability to answer it.

Mr. THATCHER: Is not the right hon. gentleman house leader? I was asking him the question in his capacity as house leader.

[Later:]

Mr. THATCHER: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the house leader, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), if he is the house leader. Is it the intention of the government to allow a debate, before the session ends, on the matter of prices, whether the prices committee reports or does not report?

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): My experience as leader is limited, but I would say that the intentions of the government are generally announced by the government when they have made a decision. I will refer this question to the real leader of the house.

CANNED AND PROCESSED FISH

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REQUEST FOR COMPULSORY INSPECTION—SALES PROMOTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. He was here this morning but I did not get an opportunity to put the question and I should like to have it on the record now. Has the request of the Prince Edward Island fish canners and packers for compulsory inspection of all their canned and processed fish products, been granted? If not, why not?

A second question I wish to ask is this: Will the fisheries prices support board or the Department of Fisheries endorse and support a participating advertising sales promotion plan for their canned and processed fish products from the province of Prince Edward Island? If not, why not?

P.E.I. FERRY SERVICE

WOOD ISLAND-CARIBOO DOCKING FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT H. WINTERS (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on June 18 the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) asked a question which was taken as notice:

Will the minister provide immediately a tug to assist the ferry boat Charles A. Dunning in docking at the Wood Island pier, as difficulty is found by this boat in docking during the completion of the construction work?

The answer is: The Department of Public Works is carrying out considerable repairs and improvements on the Wood Island pier, and I understand that the nature of these repairs is such that they can only be done in the wintertime. A start was made during last winter by Public Works, and while their equipment was at Wood Island their tug assisted the Charles A. Dunning in docking. Work has been suspended until late next fall and the tug has been removed elsewhere to perform other work.

The ferry company operating between Cariboo and Wood Island is a private concern in receipt of a subsidy through the maritime commission. If and when tug assistance is necessary, the company should undertake to provide it at its own expense. The repairs to the pier at Wood Island were undertaken at the company's request.

FARM PRICES

POWERS OF AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT BOARD EXTENDED BEYOND MARCH 31, 1948

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that section nine of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, dealing with the powers of the agricultural prices support board, shall be deemed to have continued in force after March 31, 1948, and that it may be continued in force for such further period as the governor in council may fix by proclamation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss briefly the flood situation in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is not a motion to go into supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want an opportunity to speak on that matter. If I do not get it now, I will get it later.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a motion to go into committee on a resolution dealing with the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the parliamentary assistant to the minister whether he prefers to make a statement now, or to wait until we are in committee?

Mr. McCUBBIN: I would just as soon wait until we get into committee, if that is agreeable.

Mr. BRACKEN: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. McCUBBIN: The purpose of the bill to be founded on this resolution is to continue in force section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, which, through a technicality, expired on March 31, 1948.

Section 9 of the act defines the powers of the agricultural prices support board. This section did not come into force immediately upon assent to the act itself, but was brought into force on April 1, 1946, by proclamation of the governor in council. At that time it was thought that another proclamation could be issued extending section 9 for a further period. In fact, a proclamation was authorized by order in council dated March 25, 1948, but the Department of Agriculture was then advised by the Department of Justice that section 9 could be continued in force only by act of parliament. Consequently this amendment is presented for the approval of the house.

The amendment does not change the act, either in principle or in detail. It merely provides for the continuance of the act as it was prior to March 31, 1948.

Mr. BRACKEN: I think perhaps at this preliminary stage, in view of the fact that the house wishes to proceed with its work as rapidly as possible, it might be better to defer further comment until the bill itself is before us.

Mr. McCUBBIN: That is perfectly agreeable.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. McCubbin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 392, to amend the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

REMOVAL OF TIME LIMIT IN APPLICATION FOR CERTAIN PENSIONS

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to remove the time limit in which an application for pension in respect of death may be made under parts I and X of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister not intend to make a statement on this resolution?

Mr. GREGG: Yes. This resolution is with respect to two brief amendments to the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act to enable the dependents of personnel killed to obtain pensions as was intended in the original act; owing to certain circumstances, it has not been possible under the act for them to obtain those pensions. The resolution and the terms of the amendments to be introduced have been recommended by the parliamentary committee on veterans affairs, and the bill is ready.

Mr. GREEN: Will the amendment apply to the merchant navy men themselves, or only to their dependents?

Mr. GREGG: These amendments will apply only to the dependents of certain personnel of the Canadian merchant marine, salt-water fishermen and R.A.F. ferry command who are dead, permitting their dependents to come under the act. It does not apply to the living survivors of these services.

Mr. GREEN: I ask that question because the act itself gives these men only one year in which to apply, does it not?

Mr. GREGG: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Apparently that one year provision is to be continued; unless the merchant sailor applied within a year of receiving his injury, he still is prevented from making application for pension. Is that right?

Mr. GREGG: No difficulty has been experienced in that regard. Perhaps I might give a little more detailed explanation at this stage.

The effect of the bill to be introduced is to remove the time limit for application for pension in respect of a deceased Canadian merchant seaman and salt-water fisherman. It seems unreasonable to deny pension to dependents, who are otherwise entitled to it, simply because through ignorance of the statutory rights or other reasons, they did not comply with the statutory limit of twelve months. That applies to dependents. There are some cases in which they did not know that they were eligible; consequently the date will be extended. The bill should conform to the war pensions act on which it is based. In view of the limitation in section 7, the removal of the time limit in respect of death only will affect a comparatively small number of cases, but will permit of an award in certain instances of hardship. That is the first one.

The other portion of it deals with dependents of deceased members of the R.A.F. transport command. As hon. members will recall, it was necessary for necessitous circumstances to exist for them to be eligible. This amendment is to cover cases where necessitous circumstances may not have been in existence earlier, but now are.

Mr. GREEN: Is the time limit to be removed entirely in connection with the dependents of merchant seamen and ferry command men, or is it simply to be extended?

Mr. GREGG: It is a matter of removal, rather than extension, as applied to the dependents.

Mr. GREEN: And also in respect to men in the ferry command?

Mr. GREGG: That is right, for dependents.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that in all fairness the time limit against merchant seamen themselves should also be removed. Merchant seamen must apply within one year of suffering disability; otherwise they cannot obtain any pension. I suggest that is unfair. There should be no time limit against them, any more than against the dependents of a man who lost his life. It is difficult enough, goodness knows, for either a merchant seaman or his dependents to establish the right to pension, because the disability or death must have been caused directly by enemy action. I do suggest that there is no reason why there should be a time limit against merchant seamen themselves.

Mr. GREGG: In the discussion which took place on this general subject there were no indications that any were suffering hardship because of the time limit. However I shall undertake to follow up the matter in the coming months, and if there should be such cases they will be taken into consideration.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why there should be a time limit of one year or any other period of time against merchant seamen? There is no time limit for members of the army, the navy or the air force; they need only show that the disability was caused by war service. In those circumstances they can qualify for pension. Is there any reason why the same rule should not apply to members of the merchant navy, particularly in view of the fact that it is so much more difficult for them to establish the right to pension?

Mr. GREGG: I should not like to answer the hon. member without looking more deeply into the matter. Like the hon. member, at the moment I cannot see any reason. However I should like to look into the background, and into the discussion concerning this matter, before I reply.

Mr. GREEN: I take it there will be some time between the passing of this resolution and the debate on the bill. Perhaps in that time the minister could give consideration to my suggestion. As he knows, once an act is amended it is difficult to have another amendment in the next year. The tendency is to delay, and the act may not be amended again for several years.

Here is an amendment which should be brought in, in the same bill which amends the right of the dependents. I would urge that the minister give consideration to extending his amendment so that it would cover the merchant seaman himself, as well as the dependents of those who lost their lives.

Mr. GREGG: While I have no knowledge of any hardship being experienced with respect to the time limit for the men themselves, I do know of a number of cases of serious hardships which this bill will seek to correct. I would prefer at this stage, therefore, that these amendments now before us might be passed, and that the other matters might be given close attention.

Mr. GREEN: One reason the minister has not seen the effect of such cases is that the restrictions against merchant seamen, and for that matter against the dependents, are so very strict. It must be shown that the disability arose directly from enemy action. According to the figures given on June 15 to the committee on veterans affairs, there are only sixty-six merchant seamen drawing disability pension at the present time, although there were about 18,000 who served. There have been 490 favourable decisions for dependents of merchant seamen. Those figures show what a ridiculously small percentage of these people qualify for pension. As the minister knows, the merchant navy suffered a higher percentage of casualties, speaking relatively, than either the navy, the army or the air force. These men have not had a fair deal. Perhaps that is one reason why now there are no further applications being made for pensions—simply because they were shut out one year after they suffered disability.

As the minister knows, that is an unfair situation. Men who went out from our ports —from Halifax or from Vancouver—and who were disabled, could not qualify for pension unless disability resulted directly from enemy action. For instance, I know of one man who stumbled during a black-out in England. He fell over the edge of his ship, and was killed. His dependents could not qualify because the death was not directly caused by enemy action. Another young lad went out from Vancouver and contracted a tropical disease, with the result that his health was ruined. He can get no pension because the disease could not be traced directly to enemy action.

Surely that is unfair. Not only should the time limit be removed for the men themselves, but the basis upon which pension is granted should be broadened. It is much too restricted now, when it states that a man must have suffered disability or that death must have been caused by direct enemy action. That portion of the act should be changed. I am sorry this is not being done in this amendment. This is a basic injustice which should be remedied, and now is the time to do so.

Mr. GREGG: Perhaps I am completely out of order in continuing with this discussion. The hon. member, who sat on the committee, knows that it has discussed these points raised this afternoon, and many others. At this time the committee is preparing its final report to the house. A request was made that this matter be brought before the house while there was still time to get the amendment through—although I imagine I am out of order in discussing what a parliamentary committee may be preparing this afternoon for presentation to the house.

The point raised by the hon. member is, I know, on the agenda of the committee. I would suggest, therefore, that we permit first reading of the bill and have it stand for second reading, and later the committee will have made its report.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to support the hon. member for Vancouver South on the point he has raised. While doing so, may I compliment him upon his steadfast effort to get a better deal for the merchant seamen. As the minister well knows, merchant seamen have felt all along that they have been discriminated against, as compared with members of the various branches of the armed services.

The minister has suggested that the matter be left until next session, and that if he finds there are cases such as have been described he will be prepared to amend the act at that time. Unless the time limit is removed, the minister is not likely to have any cases before him, because the matter would be closed as far as merchant seamen are concerned. He will have nothing to report or no reasons for reporting at the next session.

I suggest that the time limit should be removed and then, if there are no cases presented, there at least would be no cost to the treasury. If cases are presented they can be investigated and, if justice demands, pensions should be allowed. If the time limit is not removed these men are shut out. I suggest to the minister that, before the bill is up for second reading, he give careful consideration to having the time limit removed.

Mr. FERGUSON: I should like to add my support to what has been said. If the government of Canada feels that any man who served in the merchant marine is entitled to compensation for injuries he may have received while serving during the war, I am sure that this country will be ready to grant such compensation. To have a time limit of one year is not fair to these people, and it would deprive the country of an opportunity to do what is reasonable and just and fair.

I am sure that the minister, the government and the people of Canada do not want anything placed in the way of a man receiving compensation when he is justly entitled to it because of the services he gave during the war. By having a time limit of one year, this country cannot make the contribution to these people to which they are entitled.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gregg thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 393, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SASKATCHEWAN NATURAL RESOURCES

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SALE OF SCHOOL LANDS TO VETERANS

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 364, to amend the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT

AMENDMENT TO SUBSTITUTE "GOLD COMMISSIONER" FOR "COMMISSIONER" ETC.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 362, to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 to 19 inclusive agreed to.

On section 20—Schedule H.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The legal branch of the Department of Mines and Resources was kind enough to submit these amendments to the Yukon Placer Mining Act to me. I discussed them fully with the officials and I consider the amendments are necessary and proper.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

AMENDMENT TO SUBSTITUTE "GOLD COMMISSIONER" FOR "COMMISSIONER", ETC.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 363, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the bill receiving second reading, but I should like to say something on certain sections of it. With the consent of the minister, I should like to have this bill considered in committee tomorrow rather than this afternoon.

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon spoke to me about this, and I am quite agreeable to following his suggestion.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

SUPPLY

FLOOD CONDITIONS—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to say a few words in connection with the floods in British Columbia. I shall not go into details as to why the floods occurred or as to what might have been done to prevent them. My personal friend and colleague the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair), speaking on my behalf, made an excellent speech in that connection. I should like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who protected me during my absence in the way of a pair.

On behalf of my riding in particular and all the people affected by the flood, I wish to express our appreciation to all the people of Canada for the way in which they came to our assistance in what has become a national calamity. To the members of the armed forces and to everyone who has contributed in any way to our assistance, we express our appreciation.

I should like to mention one or two things on which the government should take action immediately. The government should immediately put a ceiling on hay and other feed. Already in British Columbia we have people going around trying to secure what feed will be available for next year and all available feed now for cattle. If the government has not already done so, it should immediately put a ceiling on all feed stuff for cattle in Canada.

I do not think the government has gone far enough in its concessions respecting income tax. I understand that the government has generously extended to the end of June the period during which farmers whose land is now ten to thirty feet under water may file their returns. The government could very well afford to wipe out income tax entirely for farmers in any of the flooded areas. I strongly urge that that action be taken by the government immediately.

I would also ask the government, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) makes his announcement, which I hope will not be later than tomorrow, to state what the eventual financial set-up is to be for the rehabilitation of our farmers. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver North it would have a great effect on the morale of the flood victims if they could know exactly where they stand and what is to be done in their behalf. I realize that the details cannot be worked out overnight, but surely by this time the government should be in a position to say what the federal government will do for the victims in all parts of British Columbia who have been flooded out.

I had the privilege of taking the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) over certain portions of my riding, and I was very glad of that privilege because I know his sympathy with everybody in Canada and it must have affected him to see those flooded-out homes. I do not think we have ever had, in my time at least, a calamity which has affected the people of Canada so much as the recent floods in British Columbia. I for one shall make no attempt to estimate the damage. When you have from eight to thirty feet of water over your home or farm, how can even an engineer or other expert estimate the damage?

I am particularly interested to see that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is listening to me, because I have been trying to catch his ear in this connection ever since 1940. I am not a diking expert, but I heard 20,000 of them tell me what ought to have been done in my riding, and I honestly believe that if governments of the past had done their duty we would have had no flood, at least in the immediate district in which I live.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and I have consistently endeavoured to have the Department of Public Works secure adequate dredging equipment for the great Fraser river, which is one of the largest rivers on the North American continent. The only dredge we have available to keep that channel clear is a forty-year-old dredge which is constantly busy at the mouth of the river. I remember, as a boy, that where large boats used to go up the river you can now throw a stone across. Last summer at Calamity Point near the mouth of Harrison river I got out in my gum-boots and waded half way across the Fraser river. It does not take any engineer to know that if the water of the Fraser river cannot get out to the Pacific you will have river bank erosion and disastrous floods. I do not think we would have suffered half the damage that was done this year if proper dredging equipment had been secured when it should have been secured. I want the Minister of Public Works to tell me what steps he has taken to secure adequate dredging and other heavy equipment to restore the dikes and repair the damage that was done. One of the dredges that was brought in to construct Sumas dikes came from Panama. If we are to save this fertile valley from floods next year construction on these dikes must be started immediately. We cannot wait for six or eight months. The necessary equipment should be ordered today.

I had the pleasure of showing the Secretary of State for External Affairs how high the water was on the telegraph poles along the great Canadian Pacific railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have never paid five cents on the construction and maintenance of dikes. There have been at least three wash-outs on their line. They cannot deny what pictures show, and I can assure hon. members that I took good care to take plenty of pictures showing the water in front of my own home and throughout that whole area. I have a letter here from the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I am going to take time to read it. I would not feel so bitter about this if I had not seen neighbours, sixty-five and seventy-five years of age, with their entire investment flooded out, with pianos and everything else floating down the stream, all of which could have been prevented if governments over the past twenty-five years had had any initiative and had taken the proper action. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have never done anything in western Canada that they were not paid plenty for doing. They have refused to accept their responsibility. Either the president of the Canadian Pacific and his officials were deliberately giving false information to the minister, or he has otherwise been misinformed.

This is a letter sent to me by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) under date of November 3, quoting the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company:

> The Mission subdivision extends from the main line at Mission, B.C., southerly for a distance of 10·1 miles to Huntingdon. It was placed in operation in June, 1891, that is, prior to the construction of the Matsqui dike. The company, from time to time, has been requested to contribute toward the cost of the Matsqui dike, but has consistently refused on the ground that the dike does not benefit the lands of the railway company. Under the Drainage, Diking and Development Act of British Columbia, provision is made for the exclusion from a diking district lands not benefited. In 1895, a court of revision, because the company's land did not benefit, exempted the company from assessments in connection with the dike.

That information was supplied to me in a letter dated November 3, 1947, and was given to the minister by the president of the company. I shall be glad to give pictures to the minister showing that the company put a dam across by rock filling near the Mission bridge, and did it for years. I asked a question whether rock had been dumped, and the answer I received in an order for return was that the department had no authority and no information. I, as a private member, was told that if I wanted this information I would have to ask the company for it.

The story is a little different this year. I have pictures which were taken in 1938 by a professional photographer, showing the rock being dumped in, rock which caused five feet of silt to flow over the British Columbia Telephone Company cables. They were not able to raise the cable because of that silt. It also caused the bridge to go out two weeks ago, and took 100 feet of the Matsqui farmers' dike with it.

Apparently the government found out something different in the meantime, because on April 19, 1948, I received this letter from the Minister of Public Works telling me that they could now get this information, but that last year they did not know anybody with authority who could, and that I as a private member, last year, had better ask the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. This is the letter:

> During the years 1937 to 1945, the company has deposited approximately 44,000 tons of rock around the piers of this bridge and soundings taken indicate that the dumping of this rock has raised the river bottom near the piers, but has scoured the channels between the piers so that the cross-section of the river at this point is approximately the same. Gauges placed above and below the bridge indicate that there has been no retarding of the flow due to the placing of the rock.

It was at this spot that a span of the famous Canadian Pacific railway bridge went out, taking with it a hundred feet of our dike. In 1894 or 1896 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company themselves drove the piles, some of which are still remaining, to protect this river bank. I shall be glad to produce these pictures for the minister.

I do not believe in recriminations. In May, 1948, I was not scoffed at exactly, but I do not think I received the entire approval of certain members of the government when I said that the two great trans-Canada railways would be out within twenty-four hours. Actually they were out within ten hours. I pointed out that it was not a Fraser valley matter; that it was a national matter. When you cut off the third city of the Dominion of Canada, which affects the economy of Canada, it must be a national matter. Recriminations will not get us anywhere.

It is up to the government of Canada to make known to the people of my riding and to the people of the Dominion of Canada what they intend to do. They should issue a definite statement now as to what they intend to do to rehabilitate, in so far as money can do so, these pioneers and these people who have lost their all.

What is to be done for the municipalities? I should like the government to state definitely, in conjunction with the provincial government, what is to be done. How are our municipal taxes to be met this year? Our schools must go on. I am speaking particularly of the Fraser valley because that is the place I know most about. Other hon. members can speak of the whole of British Columbia. I am primarily interested in my own district and know more about it than I do of other districts. How are the municipalities to carry on their schools, how are they to re-establish their bridges, culverts and roads that have all been washed out, to say nothing at all of the personal loss of the individuals concerned? It is up to the Prime Minister to make a definite statement in that connection. He should tell us what action the federal government is going to take. He should make that statement tomorrow.

Perhaps I am a little overwrought. But when you have lived all your life in a district and you see such suffering among the people as I have seen, you are bound to get that way. Fortunately there has been no loss of human life. That is the most fortunate thing that came out of it. It is also fortunate that we have found out who our friends are. We found that the people of Vancouver, and the people of the entire province, responded to our call for help. Since that time, arrangements have been made, in part, by the two governments to recompense the people who have lost their all. I shall give one instance, and it is typical of others. The Johnston Cartage Company of Vancouver sent their trucks and equipment out there, not knowing whether they would get them back or not, and knowing they would not be paid five cents. One of those trucks is under fifteen feet of water today. They did not ask whether they were to be paid or who was to replace the truck. The people of Vancouver sent equipment and other help at once.

I admit that the government has gone a long way so far in conjunction with the provincial government. What are they going to do to replace the dike? We in the Fraser valley will not be satisfied until we have the river controlled from top to bottom. We will not be satisfied unless we have a proper dike constructed, what we call a two-truck dike. You can stop any break in a dike if you are able to get at it with material and equipment. After all, we are a part of Canada. We demand that this dike be reconstructed, so that we can defend it, not only on behalf of the farmers of the Fraser valley but also on behalf of the entire people of Canada.

Two great trans-Canada railways have to be defended. The British Columbia Electric Railway Company have a railroad to Chilliwack which must be defended. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I am urging the government to give an immediate answer, indicating what is to be done by the federal government. I am urging the Minister of Public Works to tell us without further delay whether or not they are endeavouring to procure suitable dredging equipment, so that such a catastrophe as this may never happen again in British Columbia or anywhere in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): First I should like to compliment the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) on his moving and able outline of the conditions in the Fraser valley. From the descriptions I have had of that area and from what I have seen of it, it is a major catastrophe. One of my friends told me that perhaps it will be the thing that will stand out in his memory as the greatest catastrophe that he has ever witnessed or will have to witness. The suffering is intense and the uncertainty of the people is terrific. They do not know whether to go to their lands and start all over again. Therefore I should like to support the hon. member in asking that rehabilitation measures be announced immediately in so far as replacement of equipment, crops and so on is concerned.

I should like to point out to the government that other areas as well have suffered loss. I have not mentioned my own area before, because of the outstanding difficulties of the Fraser valley. They were of first importance. Not so many people are affected on the Skeena river, but they have suffered just as intensely as the people of the Fraser valley. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) has pointed out what happened in Kimberley and so on. Areas are affected all over the province. I wish the federal authority would step in and help flood victims wherever they are. It will be noticed how swiftly the United States federal authority steps into the picture when there is flood damage.

In my own area along the Skeena river, especially around the towns of Terrace and Usk there has been suffering. The province simply has not been measuring up to its responsibilities. I do not wish to be too harsh. I think the thing is too big for them to handle. I know the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) has able and willing men in his department who could step in and assess difficulties and carry out the rehabilitation measures that are necessary on the Skeena river.

I do not want to hold up the time of the house any longer because the question has been outlined before, but I thought it was about time that I brought in the Skeena so that the general picture could become apparent, and that an over-all flood policy would be brought into being by the federal authority and measures taken wherever there are flood victims.

Mr. HOWARD C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in support of the stand taken by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald). I do not think it can be questioned that this is a national catastrophe. Certainly it is by far the worst situation the people of British Columbia have ever had to face, and we feel that the people of eastern Canada have been wonderful in the way in which they have given help at this time. The people of different cities, Montreal and Toronto, and many other centres, have helped out, and that very action has done more to create good will in British Columbia toward eastern Canada than anything else could have done.

Now, however, we are asking that the government make an announcement with regard to plans for rehabilitation. I believe it is necessary that the lead should come from here. The provincial government has been very good also in the way in which it has come to the rescue of those who have suffered so much, but there is need for the two governments to get together and decide upon and announce some plans for the rehabilitation of these sufferers. We hope that an announcement will be made before the parliament prorogues. The need is great, and it will make all the difference to these people if an announcement is forthcoming before prorogation.

Mr. O. L. JONES (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this matter; but, having flown over the area discussed, I am 100 per cent behind the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I should like to point out, however, that other areas of British Columbia were flooded as well, and therefore, in dealing with this matter, it should be, not only relief for Fraser valley but relief for the whole of British Columbia. There are areas in Yale, such as Keremeos, Hedley and Grand Forks, that have suffered, though not on so vast a scale as the Fraser valley; but definitely, as individuals, men in those areas have suffered as greatly as individuals in the Fraser valley. I suggest, therefore, that any relief to be given should be given to all who suffered in British Columbia.

While this is an act of nature that could have been prevented to a certain extent, there is another danger to which I would call attention, and that is the level of Okanagan lake. This lake is now at least twelve inches higher than it has ever been before at this time of the year, and I would ask the Minister of Public Works whether it is his intention to implement the report that was made on the lake level and flood control about four or five years ago.

[Mr. Green.]

This was a splendid report. It covered controls of the Columbia river basin and the Okanagan valley, with all adjacent rivers and waters. If this report were implemented, the danger facing the towns of Penticton, Kelowna and all towns along Okanagan lake would be absent today. But it is greater than it ever was. Five years ago several buildings in Penticton were affected by water. Most of the cellars were full of water and many buildings could be reached only by boat. The condition in the next month will be equally grave, if not graver than it was at that time. In this case steps could have been taken and should have been taken to carry out the report made years ago by the engineers. Had that been done, there would be no danger today. I would ask the Minister of Public Works whether it is his intention to implement the report on flood control in the Okanagan valley in the immediate future.

RECENT BY-ELECTIONS—SUGGESTED TAX CHANGES, COST OF LIVING, ETC.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are some events of recent days which I think call for some brief comment in this debate. They were given direct point by the fact that three new hon. members took their seats in the house today.

A statement was issued by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the ninth day of this month concerning the reasons for the defeat of government candidates in three by-elections held this month. I do not propose to read the entire statement, but the first paragraph is as follows:

> The lead which the C.C.F. has gained in the recent by-elections reflects the inevitable dislike felt by persons of all classes for high living costs, and privations and restrictions of any kind.

The statement concludes with this paragraph:

> It is, however, the long run rather than the short run which counts for most. It would be a mistake to attach too much significance to C.C.F. gains in the present.

I am no alarmist, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think for one moment that the government defeats in these three by-elections, and the election of twenty-two C.C.F. members in the recent provincial election in Ontario, can be traced to the fact that all who voted for candidates of that party were socialists by any means. Far from it. They were prompted no doubt by unrest, and certainly by the failure of the government to grapple with the twin problems of high cost of living and high taxes. However, the result of the government's failure to grapple with these problems has been that the normal danger from socialism with its policies of regimentation and the peril it presents to our conception of individual freedom, is now accompanied by a further threat. Whether the C.C.F. like it or not—and they have indicated that they did not like it—the fact is that the C.C.F. candidates in those elections, both in Ontario and in the three federal by-elections, did receive the votes of the Labour-Progressive party in all except two provincial ridings in the city of Toronto. That is the fact.

The Labour-Progressive leader in Ontario has already been boasting of the fact that the C.C.F. candidates elected in the provincial election owe their election to communist support. I am not going to dwell on that theme, because I think the situation has been well known for some time, but I do wish to lay the responsibility where I think it belongs.

The responsibility for the apparent rise of the socialist threat in this country, with the assistance of communist support, I should like to trace back to the point where I think it properly begins. I think it began in February, 1942. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that in that month there were some federal by-elections in this country. You will remember one of them well. There was another one held in the riding of York South, and for the first time a C.C.F. member was elected to the House of Commons from an Ontario riding because he received the full support of the Liberal machine in that by-election campaign. The Liberal party and the government kept a candidate out of the field in that by-election campaign.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman knows that was a courtesy accorded by the government to one of many new leaders of the Tory party.

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. member knew the whole story he would not put his neck out with such a silly statement. What he has said refers to the guise under which the whole trick was planned, but when one saw how it worked out in execution, this is what happened. The government did not put a candidate in the field—

Mr. SINCLAIR: As a courtesy to Arthur Meighen.

Mr. FLEMING: The hon. gentleman professes that they were extending a courtesy to the leader of the Conservative party, as it then was.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We offered the same courtesy to John Bracken for three years and he would not take it.

Mr. FLEMING: The by-election campaign wore on and the Liberal party began to take a direct interest in it. When election day came the whole trick was exposed and we saw the Liberal organization in York South riding lined up bag and baggage behind the C.C.F. candidate. That is why the C.C.F. won that by-election in York South in 1942. Let there be no mistake about that.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Tories were so derelict in policy that no Liberals would vote for them.

Mr. FRASER: You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I certainly do.

Mr. FLEMING: The present Prime Minister of this country saw fit, in the statement he made following the announcement of the result of that by-election, to express himself as being grateful to the electors of York South. If anyone is still so naïve as to think the full weight of the Liberal machine was not put behind the C.C.F. candidate in order to elect him in York South on February 9, 1942, it is high time he took the scales off his eyes and woke up.

That was the beginning of the rise of the C.C.F. in Canada. Until that time there had been some slight success in the middle prairies, but that was the beginning of the C.C.F. climb, and it can be laid directly at the door of this government, because it was their deliberate policy to support the C.C.F. there in order to defeat the Conservative candidate.

Mr. SINCLAIR: You are mad because the Liberals won.

Mr. FLEMING: That is the beginning of the story; and the story continues through a long series of compromises made by this government with the socialists in this house and outside it, apparently toying with the idea that they could somehow bring the socialists to climb on the Liberal band wagon.

An hon. MEMBER: What are they doing in Saskatchewan?

Mr. FLEMING: That is why responsible sources in the Liberal party apparently saw fit in the years 1945 and 1946 to make the now well-known offer of the Liberal leadership to the present leader of the C.C.F. party. What we have been seeing in recent days are the chickens coming home to roost. This government, after that series of compromises, of attempting to play along with the socialists, is now reaping the fruits of its policies. The chickens are coming home to roost.

An hon. MEMBER: Coming home to roost with the Tories.

Mr. FLEMING: At the moment we see this government going through a process of complete disintegration. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is out in Saskatchewan today fighting desperately to win some seats and making statements out there with respect to which we ask the government for further light in this house, but we cannot get that light.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Is he co-operating with the C.C.F.?

Mr. FLEMING: Of course the questions were prompted by reports from the fighting front in Saskatchewan, of statements attributed out there to the Minister of Agriculture concerning the removal of the embargo on the shipment of beef cattle to the United States. We have asked the government day in and day out what its policy is with regard to that question, but government policy is wrapped in silence. We cannot get any information about it. Apparently the government has no policy with regard to this question until after June 24. In the meantime, the untoward effects that could be anticipated from the removal of the cattle embargo have already occurred, because prices of beef have been going up. Producers, on the other hand, have not been getting any benefit at all. Prices to the consumer have been going up.

Then, to complete the picture of disintegration of this government, we are faced with another change a little farther to the east. We see the whole Liberal machine—

Mr. KNOWLES: Joining forces with the Tory party in Saskatchewan.

Mr. FLEMING: —and its campaign chest geared to be thrown into the provincial campaign in the province of Quebec in order somehow to try to wrest a Liberal victory in that province. Of course that will not succeed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FLEMING: The attempt will fail, but it just illustrates the degree of desperation in which the government finds itself today. It has had a long series of defeats, a crushing body blow in Ontario, in the provincial elections there, and it is faced with another crushing blow in the province of Quebec. So, in this moment of desperation, all the federal resources of the Liberal party are to be thrown into Quebec in an attempt to redeem the situation there.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the hon. member a question?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. member promises to be brief.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, it will be brief. Whom does the hon. member want to win in Quebec?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Arthur Meighen.

Mr. FLEMING: If my hon. friend is interested in that question I shall be glad to give him an answer.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Privately.

Mr. FLEMING: Certainly, I know quite well whom I should like to see win there.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: It is not Mr. Godbout.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Orange order in Ontario and the coalition in Quebec.

Mr. FLEMING: Some interesting events have taken place within the precincts of this house in recent days. On June 17, six members sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, attended on the Prime Minister and asked him to take certain steps. According to the press dispatch, the statement issued to the press by the six Liberal members after they had waited on the Prime Minister—

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask what paper the hon. member is quoting from?

Mr. FLEMING — was to the effect that they had asked for the reimposition of food subsidies, removal of the sales tax from foods and the "austerity" excise tax from household goods.

Mr. MITCHELL: What paper is the hon. member quoting from? May I ask him to tell us that?

Mr. FLEMING: I am quoting from a very reliable newspaper, the Globe and Mail of June 18. The statement continues with an extract directly attributed to the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt) who, we are told, headed the delegation. These are his words:

> In other words, we asked the government to get out of the kitchen.

I am sure that many of us will welcome this evidence of the fact that there is stirring on the government side, even if in only a few bosoms over there, some concern with regard to the problems which we of the official opposition have been putting before this house for a long time past, which we put directly before the house during the budget debate and on which members sitting to your right, Mr. Speaker, were eloquently silent at the time.

That was followed up by a letter written by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) to the Prime Minister and a similar letter written by him to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). The hon. member for Springfield undertook to address words like these to the Prime Minister:

> This is a post-mortem of the reasons why we have been unsuccessful in retaining for the Liberal party the three seats in the federal by-elections. These are the public beefs. The public wants:
> (1) Old age pensions without a means test.
>
> (2) Some income tax relief for those in the lower income brackets, both salaried workers and wage-earners.
>
> (3) Repeal of the 25 per cent excise tax on certain goods manufactured in Canada.
>
> (4) Restoration of at least 30 per cent of the excess profits tax. This would compensate for the loss in revenue resulting from those in the lower income groups being stricken from the federal tax rolls.
>
> (5) Reduction of the cost of living and reduction of the profits now being taken by wholesalers and retailers.
>
> If some swift action is not taken in the very near future we may look forward to the annihilation of the Liberal party.

Listen to that. Then the letter continues:

> Trusting you will take immediate steps whereby the prestige of the Liberal party will be restored.
>
> Yours faithfully,
> John S. Sinnott, M.P.

The Prime Minister replied to that letter in these terms:

> I thank you for letting me have your estimate of the reasons for the results in the recent by-elections. I am bringing the representations of your letter to the attention of my colleagues in the government.
>
> With kind personal regards,
> W. L. Mackenzie King.

Then the Minister of Finance replied to a similar letter from the hon. member for Springfield as follows:

> I am very glad to have your views and you may rest assured that they will be given careful consideration.

Mr. SINNOTT: They are doing that now.

Mr. FLEMING: There are some things in the letter from the hon. member for Springfield with which I agree, and there are some with which I disagree. But I draw attention particularly to his present advocacy. May I interject this, that I hope the hon. member for Springfield is not alone among those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, in entertaining these views. I think it is a hopeful sign that at last someone to your right is beginning to wake up to the fact that there is a very serious problem here to be faced. I do hope that a number of other members to your right will follow his example to try to stir up the government to some action with regard to these tax questions.

Here is the hon. member for Springfield calling for the repeal of the 25 per cent excise tax on certain goods manufactured in Canada. We on this side of the house raised this question and asked for the same thing, not only in the budget debate this year, but in the budget debate a year ago; but we got nothing but silence from those who sit to your right. Now it is interesting to see some awakening on the part of a member or two to your right. One might express regret that the awakening had not occurred sooner.

Then we hear him appealing also for income tax relief on behalf of those in the lower income brackets.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The house has already decided this year in the budget with respect to the rate of income tax. It seems to me it is not in order to discuss the matter at this time.

Mr. FLEMING: I am not discussing rates of taxation as such. I am simply drawing attention to the fact that this is a matter which apparently is now giving some concern to at least one hon. member opposite, as a result of recent events. I am suggesting that it ought to be a matter of wider concern. And I have drawn attention to the fact that this hon. member, and six other hon. members to whom I have referred, are now concerned. Those people, who are now as brave as a lion on the subject, were as silent as the tomb only a month ago in the budget debate. This being a problem today, it was a problem then. Why did we not have some assistance from those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, in our demands in the interests of those in the lower wage and salary brackets, when we asked that they be given some relief?

This process of disintegration in the Liberal party has gone a long way. It will be remarkable if the party maintains any semblance of unity until that first week of August when the national convention is to be held.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Tory party?

Mr. FLEMING: On every side we see such abundance of proof of the fact that this government is out of touch with the people. The attitude of its own members today, in condemnation of government policy, shows just how far the government has become out of touch with the feeling of the people. One could find no better proof of the fact that the government has been in office far too long.

Finally, here is the legacy—and what a legacy—to be passed on to the national convention and to whoever will be assuming the mantle of leadership! Here is revolt in the cabinet and revolt in the ranks of the Liberal members in the House of Commons! Here we have the picture of a government and a party, to use the language of the hon. member for Springfield, facing annihilation. Annihilation of the Liberal party is the right expression—you cannot get a better one. This process of disintegration which is going on apace will unquestionably lead to that annihilation of the Liberal party, unless this government wakes up and takes concerted, heroic, vigorous and immediate action to reduce taxes and to combat the soaring cost of living.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak about another matter for a few moments.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on the subject which is before the house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Cape Breton South may proceed.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why do you not apply for leadership of the Tory party?

Mr. GILLIS: It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) introduced this subject matter at this stage of the session, when we are trying to get through the business of the house—

Mr. FLEMING: That was why I was brief.

Mr. GILLIS: —in order to get away. However, we are in no hurry. We are quite prepared to stay here and to discuss any business which may come before the house.

Actually the hon. member for Eglinton is supposed to be raising a grievance at this point in proceedings. Sitting here and listening to him, to me it did not sound like a grievance. It sounded more like the wailing of a lost soul.

Mr. MARTIN: Speaking on behalf of a lost party.

Mr. GILLIS: No doubt about that; he is speaking on behalf of a lost party.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The missing link.

Mr. GILLIS: Throughout his speech he was trying to prove why Mr. Drew lost a certain number of seats in Ontario.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Including his own.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, including his own. He was trying to show that the three federal by-elections went to C.C.F. candidates because of the failure of certain government policies; and the whole trend of his discussion was to the effect that the government were assisting the C.C.F. to power and that the communist party also was trying to push the C.C.F. to power.

What the hon. member fails to understand is that what he is witnessing today is not the disintegration of the Liberal party or the disintegration of the Tory party; what he is witnessing is the disintegration of a system for which both of those parties stand. What the hon. member did not tell the house is what his party would be doing were they on that side of the house, which would be any different from what the government is now doing.

Mr. JACKMAN: You did not talk about socialism in the Ontario election, I will tell you.

Mr. GILLIS: You do not know what socialism is even. You know only what the Globe and Mail or some of your Tory papers in Ontario tell you.

Mr. JACKMAN: What about the Daily Worker?

Mr. GILLIS: If you have a speech to make, then, when I have finished, get up and make it. At the present time I am trying to put the hon. member for Eglinton straight, because I believe he is an honest little fellow, and that he is really feeling his way along. He is trying to find out something—and I am trying to tell him something.

An hon. MEMBER: What a teacher!

Mr. GILLIS: And, believing that he is honest about it, I will try to prove conclusively to him that what is happening in Canada and on the North American continent is what happened in Europe. In trying to sell the old machine of profits, you dragged the world down to ashes. The philosophy of the Liberal party in this house and in the country and the philosophy of your party, is the same thing—private enterprise. You cannot divorce yourself from and still be part of that machine; you cannot condemn the government for maintaining the kind of thing for which you yourselves stand.

I wish to focus the hon. member's attention to this point. He talks about the C.C.F. and the government in coalition. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) put him straight on one point. When the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen left the other place and decided to assume the leadership of the Tory party, or what was left of it, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) was good enough to say, "Well, we will not oppose him. We would like to have him in here, and have some fun with him." If the electors in York South at that time were not prepared to go down the line with the Tory machine, they showed good judgment when they supported an organization they knew was a little more progressive than even the government pretended to be at that time. And in doing that, they sent a C.C.F. member to the House of Commons, and showed good judgment in doing so.

What is taking place today nationally, and what the hon. member for Eglinton does not understand, is that the machine of free enterprise from outside, and pressure from "Jesse James" street in Montreal, and King street in Toronto, is forcing you into a coalition with the Tories on that side of the house, whether you like it or not. Let me tell hon. members a few truths about the whole situation. What have you in British Columbia today?

Mr. SINCLAIR: Floods.

Mr. GILLIS: You have a coalition. You sit on the same set seats with the Liberals and you pass the same legislation. The people of British Columbia smartened up and got wise. The C.C.F. is driving you into social change; it is driving you out. The same is true in Manitoba. You formed a coalition government there.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The C.C.F. were in it.

Mr. GILLIS: Was it not the Hon. John Bracken, the gentleman who leads the Tory party in this house, who was at its head? Certainly it was. He put the old machine together; they painted up the old buggy and John became the coachman. Then he rode down here to Ottawa to do the same job here nationally as he had succeeded in doing provincially in Manitoba.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He had the C.C.F. with him in Manitoba.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the trend throughout Canada today. There is a continuing realignment of the parties. The people are beginning to think. What the hon. member says about communists electing so many candidates in Ontario is just so much nonsense. Nobody knows who voted for whom. The fact of the matter is that the majority of the people in Mr. Drew's riding elected a C.C.F. member, and in twenty-one other ridings the people of Ontario did the same thing. All this about who voted for whom is just so much nonsense.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): There are things the hon. member does not want to know.

Mr. GILLIS: I am assuming that you have a secret ballot in Ontario. You just cannot use that kind of loose language in the House of Commons where you are supposed to make responsible statements. The parties are no longer in existence in British Columbia and Manitoba; they are coalitions.

What is going on in Saskatchewan today where a provincial election is in progress? The old machines of free enterprise are having to take off their tags. I understand that the Tory leader in Saskatchewan, Mr. Ramsay, has moved into Liberal quarters, because he said it was better to get together under the one roof and it would not cost as much to run the election. But the people are smartening up about that kind of thing, and we are putting more members into this house and into the legislatures who have a social conscience, who realize that you cannot continue to support a machine which has been relegated to the past. It has disappeared in every other section of the world except on this North American continent.

Unless we smarten up in this house and eliminate this kind of thinking, we shall repeat the performances of Europe. I am sorry the hon. member raised this question this afternon, because I consider it has been a waste of time. His talk was completely off base. With his training, I do not like to see him do that kind of thing. There is a future for him if he will just smarten up and get in with the right people and begin to think in terms of progress. I should like to read an article that appeared in what I think is a good Conservative paper, the Ottawa Journal. I want the hon. member for Eglinton to listen carefully, because this comes right from Saskatchewan. It is headed, "Some Fusion of Anti-C.C.F. in Saskatchewan".

Mr. KNOWLES: Confusion is what it is.

Mr. GILLIS: It reads:

> The pattern of official nominations for the Saskatchewan election presents sufficient opportunity for a uniting of the anti-C.C.F. vote to give the government a severe set-back.
>
> Briefly that pattern is:
>
> There are 50 seats to be filled on June 24; two constituencies have deferred elections.
> Of the 50 seats, some clear-cut form of fusion has been effected in ten.
> In 34 more of the 50 there is no overlapping of Liberals and Conservative nominations. Either one or the other, but not both, has been nominated. In some of them this circumstance has been brought about by agreement between the constituency organizations, in others it has gone that way because no one took the lead in arranging an agreement.
> Although there is an element of fusion in them they are not, strictly speaking, fusion seats.

The hon. member spoke about subterfuge, backstage manipulation and that kind of thing in the York South by-election. The set-up in Saskatchewan at the present time proves, whether he or other so-called Liberals and Conservatives of this country are aware of it, that backstage manipulation is going on with regard to the maintenance of the present order of society. Unless we clear our thinking with regard to changes in our whole economy, we also are headed for disaster and chaos.

I think the main reason for unrest in this country today is that we failed to maintain controls on prices in the two years immediately after the war. A measure of responsibility for that must be accepted by the Conservative party. We listened in this house to a continuous barrage on the part of Conservatives urging the government to take off controls, to get back to free enterprise because the law of supply and demand would regulate prices, and all that kind of stuff. Unfortunately the government fell for that line of chatter, with the result that we have the conditions which exist today. We are in hope that, even before this house closes, we may have some indication from the government that a reasonable degree of control will be reimposed, that there will be some roll-back in prices and a re-implementation of the excess profits tax arrangement.

Unless these things are done, all this nonsense about guessing that this section or that section of the country has done this or that, will not correct anything. We have to do something about it, and the responsibility for doing something about it rests with the government. I am sorry that I had to get up and waste the time of the house, but the hon. member for Eglinton provoked this discussion and his remarks required an answer.

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I think we have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech just made by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). At times this House of Commons has been used by the C.C.F. as a sounding board for their C.C.F. political propaganda. Hon. members of other parties have not challenged the irresponsible statements that have been made by members of that party.

We hear them deprecate the free enterprise system. I should like the hon. member for Cape Breton South to name any country in the world which enjoys the freedom and privileges and standard of living enjoyed in Canada and the United States under free enterprise.

Mr. GILLIS: Do you want an answer?

Mr. STEPHENSON: The hon. member can speak when I finish; he had his turn. The statement was made some time ago in the house by one of these C.C.F. members that free enterprise was a non-risk-taking vulture policy. On that occasion I challenged the statement. I can imagine what we would have in this country under a system such as they propose. Statements have been made by the C.C.F., and I think it is time that the people of this country realized where we are going.

There has been some indication that the people are leaning socially and are following along not realizing where they are going. We should begin to realize what may happen in this country in the light of what has happened in several European countries, particularly in Czechoslovakia. A great number of the extreme Leftists infiltrate into the party and eventually shove the other people out of bed and take over the government. I believe that there is a tendency in that direction in this country today and that the people do not realize what is happening. It is interesting to note that the leader of the Labour-Progressive party made a statement some time ago that the communist party which they represent would support the C.C.F. across this country wherever they did not have their own candidates. Using the House of Commons as a sounding board again, the C.C.F. members get up and try to repudiate and dissociate themselves from any communist movement. Following the statement that Tim Buck made, we find the leader of the C.C.F. party in this house getting up and saying, as reported at page 1938 of Hansard:

> The C.C.F. will not collaborate with the Labour-Progressive party in any way, direct or indirect. It will not enter into any electoral arrangements with it or with any other party, whether on a national, provincial, or constituency basis.

Further on, he said:

> Whatever the future fortunes of the Canadian people and of this particular party may be, it is certain that we shall keep our hands clean and our skirts clear of any association with any totalitarian group.

It is interesting in this connection to note a dispatch from Regina which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 19, reading as follows:

> A. A. McLeod, Ontario leader of the Labour-Progressive party, said last night the efforts and policies of his party were largely responsible for the gains made by the C.C.F. in the Ontario election.
>
> "We played a big part in the election of the twenty-two C.C.F. members," he said in an election campaign address to approximately eighty-five people. "I say here categorically, they would not be in the Ontario legislature today if it were not for the efforts and policies of the Labour-Progressive party."

Mr. KNOWLES: Since when did you accept him as an authority?

Mr. STEPHENSON: I think that is an indication of what is happening in this country today, and the members of this house and the citizens of Canada should know the answer. I think the C.C.F. has something to answer for and I should like to hear their answer.

Mr. RODNEY YOUNG (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak today, but I feel sure I have some information which should be of value to the members of the house, particularly to the hon. gentleman who spoke last. I have, as you know, recently been taking part in a political campaign, and it is interesting to note that during that entire campaign the official organ of the Labour-Progressive party in British Columbia, the Pacific Tribune, never once mentioned that there was a by-election contest in Vancouver Centre. I would be very happy to show to the hon. member the results of the polls in that constituency and to point out that there are two polls which he would find most interesting. Those were the two polls which voted in the last federal election by very large majorities for Labour-Progressive candidates. The same two polls voted in the recent by-election with the same majorities for the Progressive Conservative candidates. Those polls are 102A and 101. They are situated in the very centre of the slum area in the constitutency which I represent in this house today. All the surrounding polls voted, as they have always done, by large majorities for the C.C.F. candidate, but the two particular polls I mentioned voted respectively seventy-six per cent for the Progressive Conservative candidate and seven for the C.C.F.; and sixty for the Progressive Conservative candidate, and seven again for the C.C.F.

The provincial committee of the Labour-Progressive party, when it gave those instructions in defiance of the national policy laid down by Mr. Tim Buck, received the resignations of two of its members. It is an odd thing that in the very last days of that by-election, large advertisements appeared in the local press on behalf of the Liberal candidate, calling upon Conservative party members to withdraw their support from their own candidate and save the riding from the socialists. By that time it was obvious that the socialist was not being supported by the Labour-Progressive party.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of hon. members, that the position of the C.C.F., well known as it has been made on all possible occasions by members of that party speaking in this house, has had the result of causing the communist party or the Labour-Progressive party to withdraw its support from the C.C.F., and it will continue to do so for the reason that the C.C.F. is opposed to all forms of authoritarianism.

An hon. MEMBER: That has been heard before.

Mr. YOUNG: Someone says, "That has been heard before", but it has not yet been heard of the two old-line parties, because the net result of the policies pursued by those two parties leads to authoritarianism, to the possession of economic power in the hands of a few corporations, and to the abolition of private property in the hands of the small holder. For that reason the people in Vancouver Centre, the people in Yale, and the people in Ontario riding, who are anti-authoritarian as most Canadians are, voted in favour of a policy that will preserve and extend for them the rights and privileges which 150 years of struggle have procured for the people of this country. In this matter I would say to the hon. member that there is no such thing as standing still. We either go forward or go backward. There is only one way to go forward; that is, with the progressive forces, and those forces are concentrated in the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish, in the first place, to congratulate the hon. gentleman to my left (Mr. Young) on his maiden speech, which I am sure the members, irrespective of their opinions, will agree was a very well delivered and creditable performance. I will not say it all sounded unfamiliar. There were passages in it which are familiar to us here; I have no doubt they were familiar to his electors, and I am bound to admit that they must have been not only familiar to his electors, but apparently for the moment somewhat successful. But dealing with the matter which is under discussion, and which was raised by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson), I think it is desirable that we should get the record straight. Therefore I wish to read an extract from the Vancouver Sun of April 28, and after that I shall read an advertisement from the Vernon News of May 13. The headline from the Vancouver Sun is as follows: "C.C.F. asks labour aid in 'Centre' ". The body of the article is as follows:

> Campaign heat will be turned on in Vancouver Centre by-election, C.C.F. candidate Rod Young promised Tuesday night. Young appealed to Vancouver Labor council delegates for election campaign workers and for financial support.
>
> Questioned if he wanted the support of Labour-Progressive party members in his campaign, Young replied, "We do not intend to make any alliance with any other party. Speakers from the L.P.P. will not appear on C.C.F. platforms."

Hon. members might notice that, Mr. Speaker, because of the advertisement which I shall subsequently read. I continue:

If there are any L.P.P. members who have officially stated they have changed their minds, and if they support the C.C.F. candidate and his policy, I do not think any part of the C.C.F. will say these people cannot turn out and work with us.

I want to interject here, and I come back to the words "if there are any L.P.P. members who have officially stated they have changed their minds". I am not quite sure what "changing their minds" means. I continue to read from the article.

The question of union support for the C.C.F. campaign was left to the individual delegates to take up with their unions.

I come now to the advertisement which appeared in the Vernon News, which is published in Yale riding. This is an interesting comment on the statement that L.P.P. members should apparently change their minds before they would be allowed to support the C.C.F. At any rate, this is the advertisement from the Vernon News:

Public Meeting. Minerva Miller, Provincial Election Director L.P.P. will speak at Burns Hall, Thursday, May 20, at 8 p.m. Subject: "Why we support C.C.F." Minerva Miller was an L.P.P. candidate in the provincial by-election for North Okanagan.

The only comment I have to make on that is that I think, when you have people come in and help you to gain a victory, you ought to be very frank and ready to admit the part which they have played.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was speaking I interjected with a question. He had indicated that he did not want to see the Liberal party win the forthcoming election in the province of Quebec. I asked him whom he did want to win. He replied that he would indicate to me privately, but did not do so on the floor of the house. My reason for asking the question arose from something that I read in the Winnipeg papers not long ago about the Progressive Conservative provincial convention which was held in Manitoba earlier this month. I quote a sentence or two from the report of the convention as it appeared in the Winnipeg Citizen of June 12:

During the debate, John McDowell, member for Iberville, who opposed coalition, urged that the Progressive Conservative party make an all-out effort to win Manitoba at the next election.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario).]

"Let us stand up as Conservatives," he said. "Let's change our name as has been done in Quebec. Let us call ourselves Union Nationale."

Therefore it would seem that it is something of that kind which the hon. member will be vouchsafing to me in private, namely, that his party is supporting the party of Duplessis in the province of Quebec.

Mr. FLEMING: I did not mention saying it in private.

Mr. KNOWLES: Now it is out in public. May I point out to the hon. member that the remark made by Mr. McDowell at the Tory convention in Manitoba was made in the course of what appears to have been the main debate at that convention. If one reads about this convention in all three Winnipeg papers he will find that the main question was whether to stay in or get out of the Manitoba coalition. Those who argued on both sides had the same aim in view, namely, to take whichever course would be most likely to keep the C.C.F. out of power.

Other hon. members have already referred to the fusion candidates or the confusion candidates in Saskatchewan. There was drawn to my attention this morning an advertisement for the two non-C.C.F. candidates in the constituency of Saskatoon. Saskatoon is a two-member riding where there has been one of those saw-offs such as was referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). The Tory leader, Mr. Ramsay, is a candidate there, and there is one Liberal candidate. There now appears in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix an advertisement for these two candidates, one Tory and one Liberal. The whole theme of the advertisement is that both of these candidates oppose socialism. Below the advertisement one reads two lines. First, this line:

This advertisement is inserted by a group of independent voters.

Then there is another line which says:

This advertisement is not inserted by the authority of either the Liberal or the Progressive Conservative party.

That is a symbol of the confusion that things have reached in Saskatchewan, so far as both old parties are concerned.

The hon. member for Eglinton who raised this matter this afternoon made it pretty clear that his chief concern was not with the question of why the Liberal party was losing ground, as set out by certain members opposite to their leader; his chief concern was why both the old parties are losing ground, including his own.

I have before me a table which I am not going to ask the house to put on the record, because it is not up to date anyway, having to do with federal by-elections that have taken place since 1945. This table was made up after the by-election in Yale, and does not include the figures for the by-elections in Ontario and Vancouver Centre. Up to that time there had been eight federal by-elections since the general election of 1945. This table, which I say I shall not take the time to read, gives the total votes that each of the three main parties, Liberal, Progressive Conservative and C.C.F. had in these ridings in 1945. Then it gives the votes that each of these parties had in the by-elections in these same ridings. When you add them all up you find that the Liberal vote dropped from 92,453 to 87,365, or a drop of 5·5 per cent. When you add up the vote of the Progressive Conservative candidates on the same basis you find that they had dropped from 62,134 to 51,937, or a drop of 16·4 per cent. Therefore, when the hon. member for Eglinton talks about the disintegration of the Liberal party he cannot but be conscious of the even greater disintegration that is going on in his own party.

Contrast the decline in the total votes of the two old parties in these elections with the figures of the votes for the C.C.F. candidates. These include ridings like Pontiac where, as a matter of fact, we dropped. But when you add them all up—including Pontiac—you find that the C.C.F. went up from 27,218 votes to 43,216, or an increase of 58·7 per cent.

Let me repeat these percentages. The Liberal vote dropped 5·5 per cent; the Tory vote dropped 16·4 per cent, and the C.C.F. went up 58·7 per cent. That does not include Ontario and Vancouver Centre, which would make an even sorrier picture both for my hon. friends opposite and for the hon. member for Eglinton, who raised the question this afternoon, and an even better picture for the C.C.F.

What the hon. member for Eglinton and others of his party, who have spoken, do not seem to realize is that the figures I have given of the progress being made by this movement indicate something far more than just a partisan political game. The hon. member for Eglinton, like his colleagues in Manitoba, thinks not in terms of policy, but rather in terms of politics, a case of trying to put the other rascals out so that they can get in.

What is actually happening in this country today is that the people have not forgotten the high hopes expressed during the war that this time, having won the war, we would also win the peace. The people of the country have not forgotten the idealism expressed by the Prime Minister when he indicated during the years of the war that we had to lay then the foundations for a better society after that struggle was over.

The people today want all the freedoms we have had in the past and more. They want those freedoms protected and enhanced in every possible way. They want, with all that, security and justice. They know that if there is not security, if there is not justice, freedom can be lost. The Canadian people think of security and justice and freedom not merely in abstract terms. They realize that security and justice and freedom mean good homes, steady employment, educational opportunities for the children of all, the best care that is possible of the people's health, over-all security against all the things that hit us over which we have no control, and dignified security in our old age.

The people of Canada do not see these things coming under the old, worn-out competitive free-enterprise system. The people of Canada have come to realize that social thinking has been moving away from the competitive dog-eat-dog method to the co-operative method, to the attempt to establish our lives on the basis of a community of human beings whose concern is to achieve, not big salaries for the few and the short end of the stick for the many, but a good life for all our people.

What my hon. friends do not seem to realize —and I do not blame them, because it is inevitable that in this political life we cannot but get into arguments back and forth—is that this conception is very deep in the hearts of the Canadian people, as expressed, Mr. Speaker, by the introduction this morning of three new C.C.F. members who walked up the aisle and were presented to Your Honour. They came to express the hopes, the desires and the determination of the Canadian people that we turn our backs upon the old dog-eat-dog, cutthroat competition of the past and attempt to achieve the kind of society that we believe to be our destiny in this our Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: Are you advocating monopoly?

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friends would do well, in view of the figures I have given, in view of their decline and disintegration—even worse since that table was compiled—to sit down and think these things over. As my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) says, there is a future for the hon. member for Eglinton and for other parties in the country. They can play a part, too, in the onward march of society. They do not have to be reactionary all the time. They can come up to date; they can wake up; they can smarten up, and my hon. friends would do well to consider the changes that have taken place in social thinking. They would do well to consider the progress made by mankind and try to keep up with it, instead of forever trying to hold it back.

Before I sit down I should like to say a word in relation to the part of my hon. friend's remarks which was serious, although I think he trifled with it. Perhaps he was to be pardoned for that, because it does lend itself to that. I suggest that this division among my Liberal friends opposite, which has been widely publicized, is serious and is something that calls for some statement to this house and to the country before parliament prorogues.

The hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) has written a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and we have seen six members opposite, led by the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt) calling upon the Prime Minister and insisting that the government come out of the kitchen, insisting that there should be a removal of austerity taxes on electrical and other household equipment, dropping the sales tax from any foods or commodities on which it still remains, and the use of subsidies again to bring down the high cost of basic food necessities. In addition to that, there is this quotation from the hon. member for Waterloo North:

> Mr. King told us he believed our proposals were very wise.

At another place in the account of that interesting interview, the hon. member for Waterloo North is reported as having said:

> Mr. King agreed with us that a housewives' budget would be very much in order.

The other day I asked the Minister of Finance whether it was the intention of the government to take any action to curb the still rising cost of living, and he told me in reply that he had nothing to add to what had been said on former occasions. He indulged in the usual attempt to tie price control and wage control together, and he left the whole thing on a very unsatisfactory basis. In the meantime there has been this wide publicity of a sharp division within the ranks of the party opposite. It is more than that. It sounds like a division between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, because the Prime Minister is reported as having agreed with these six or seven rebel Liberals who want a different policy from that pursued by the Minister of Finance.

With the cost of living still going up, and prices of foodstuffs and the necessities of life still rising—another one was called to my attention a few days ago, namely the price of textbooks, which will be from 50 to 75 per cent higher by the time the schools open in the fall than they are now—with this sort of thing happening, I suggest that this division in the party opposite is not just something to be trifled with from this side of the house; it is not just something to poke fun at. It is something that lays a responsibility on the government. It lays upon us the responsibility of asking the government for a statement as to which line it intends to follow. Does it intend to follow the line of austerity taxes and no consideration of subsidies, as pursued by the Minister of Finance, or the line of a housewife's budget and the use of subsidies to bring down the cost of living, as proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo North and five or six of his colleagues, and as agreed to, according to the newspaper reports, by the Prime Minister.

These things are of a somewhat different character from the line I was following a few moments ago. I was talking about a long-range idea, coming out of the heart of the Canadian people, as expressed by the C.C.F. victories recently. That trend will continue. There is no doubt about that. This other thing is immediate. The question is more important than whether it involves the disintegration of the Liberal party. It is a life-and-death matter to the Canadian people now, whether the cost of living will be allowed to soar still higher, or whether some action will be taken to deal with the situation before it is too late. I hope that in this debate we shall have this question cleared up. If not, there should certainly be an answer before this session concludes.

Mr. JULIAN H. FERGUSON (Simcoe North): It has been interesting to listen to the new member of this house for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Young). He has come in here with his new additional theories and has expounded them regarding C.C.F. tactics. They are similar to the tactics and theories to which we have listened before. Practically every member of the C.C.F. advocates something different as long as it is a vote catcher. The hon. member is probably not aware of the fact that many members of his party in the past have advocated the taking over of the small farms of the farmers. That has never been repudiated. One of his members made that statement and it will never be forgotten by the farmers of Ontario. They were to be permitted to hold these small holdings the hon. member for Vancouver Centre spoke of until such time as the farmer's death, at which time they became state property. That was the statement made by one of his colleagues who is still a staunch member of the C.C.F. It will be most interesting when all three of the new members introduce more vote-catching ideas. It will be interesting, but they will not amount to much in Ontario. The winning of a seat in Ontario is no criterion of what will be the general reception that will be given in a dominion election to C.C.F. tactics and theories throughout the remainder of Ontario.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should certainly like to refrain, Mr. Speaker, from having any part in a discussion such as the one we have been having here which is, after all, just washing dirty linen in public. But lest it should appear that Social Credit has nothing to say in a situation of this sort, I think it would be well for me just to say a word or two.

First of all, let me point out to the Liberals and Conservatives in this house and in the country that, in so far as they are advocating a change or making a change, they are going C.C.F.; that is all they are doing. They are increasing taxes in order to find money with which to pay for additional social services, to the extent that additional social services are being provided. I will defy any member of the Liberal or the Progressive Conservative party to question what I say, or to gainsay it. If that is the only conception the Liberals and Conservatives have of reform, no wonder the people say, "Let us have the C.C.F. and get reform in a hurry"; because the C.C.F., I tell you, have nothing in the world to offer except what the Liberals and Conservatives are working to gradually.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): And are producing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is all there is to it. I am quite positive that the election results which we have seen, reflecting the success of the C.C.F., have been the direct results of Liberal policy, and the direct result of what the Conservatives have advocated. If the Liberals and Conservatives would just recognize that and stop whining against the C.C.F. because the C.C.F. have won a few votes, they would really get somewhere. There must be some form of change which can be brought about without socialism. If there is such a change, why do the Liberals and the Conservatives not find it out and advocate that change? Why do they not do that and not get up and whine like a lot of spoiled school kids because they are beaten by a party that is just a little bit farther along their own way than they are. That is the first thing. There is a change, Mr. Speaker, that could be made.

Mr. POULIOT: What is it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The change is social credit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You see, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what happens. The Liberals and the Conservatives are laughing themselves into oblivion. They will not listen to a proposal that would get them out of their difficulty. They have men like the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) who have scoffed at the idea of social credit. He said he would not bring in social credit, no matter what happened.

An hon. MEMBER: Socialism is worse.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And I think it was this same gentleman who would not favour a subsidy to the railroads to avoid the increase in railroad freight rates! What can you expect the people to do, in sheer dismay?

Mr. POULIOT: What is social credit?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can explain what social credit is. As a matter of fact, social credit has been explained time and time again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Here is more nonsense again from hon. members who interrupt. Social credit has been explained time and time again, and the hon. member has never done anything but just try to make fun of it. He will keep on making fun of it until the C.C.F. put him out of his position, or until the communists, who are along exactly the same line, do it. I think this attempt to try to blame the communists for the C.C.F. victories is the sheerest kind of nonsense; because in 1940 the Liberals had a good deal of communist support to win their victory.

Mr. KNOWLES: That was in 1945.

Mr. SINCLAIR: In 1940 it was the C.C.F.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What we want to do is to find out the source of difficulty and go after a solution.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not making fun by asking that question. I should like to know how the Liberal party, according to my hon. friend, could absorb the social credit policy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In the first place, as I have said time and time again, the Liberal party could adopt a system of the limited creation of debt-free money. The Liberal party itself has advocated that policy for over twenty years, when it has been out of power. But when Liberals get into power, they will not even hear about debt-free money. They will not even allow those in the Liberal party who favour debt-free money to talk for it. Look at the way they treated Gerry McGeer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I move the adjournment of the debate. I will go on after eight o'clock.

Mr. KNOWLES: We take that for granted.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, before the house took recess I had yielded to the temptation to express my exasperation, and I mean now to say a few more words bearing upon the discussion going forward.

I was not privileged to hear all the discussion that had taken place but I gathered that there was a certain amount of complaint on the part of certain Progressive Conservatives because the C.C.F. had won some seats. They were endeavouring to say the C.C.F. had won those seats because they had the assistance of the communists. I say to the Progressive Conservatives that is one of the most inane things they could possibly say. If they had proved that the C.C.F. had won every seat because of communist support, where would the Progressive Conservatives have got themselves? Just distinctly nowhere. What, then, is the sense of trying to smear the C.C.F. by trying to make it appear that the communists are behind them?

What this country wants to know is whether anybody in either the Progressive Conservative or the Liberal party has sense enough to know anything they can do that will render communism unnecessary. To me, if the Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals, henchmen and leaders, the brain trusts in charge of the two organizations, will go to work on that problem and answer that question for the people, they will be doing something worthwhile in this dangerous day in which we live. The simple fact of the matter is that we have got to a position in which change simply must come; and if we do not have intelligent change we shall have unintelligent change.

An hon. MEMBER: The C.C.F.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not want to be unkind to the C.C.F. I can say this concerning the C.C.F., that the members who have come to this house are among the most earnest and well-informed, conscientious and industrious members of the house—every one of them. I do not find any fault, except in this respect that the C.C.F. in Canada today are leading the country into a ditch. They are leading the people up a blind alley. I do not hesitate to say that right in their presence, and I challenge them to gainsay it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the country was up a blind alley.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member thinks it was up a blind alley. It has been led far enough up blind alleys by Liberals and Conservatives; it does not need any blundering C.C.F.'ers to lead it up any further. That is where the C.C.F. are going. Let us see if we can find some way out of the difficulty.

I am going to stop for a moment or two to analyse the C.C.F. policy as I see it. I believe I am correct; and I shall ask to be corrected if I am not correct, or if I do not analyse it correctly. The C.C.F., in common with socialism everywhere, every brand of socialism—

Mr. SINCLAIR: National socialism?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Every kind—in common with every kind of socialism, stands for three kinds of development. The first one is government ownership of the means of production. The second one is a taxation structure that tends to level everyone down to a certain dead level. The C.C.F. people will say, "Yes, and level everybody else up to that certain level". We will accept even that. But let us bear this clearly in mind, that the C.C.F. involves taxation, and very severe taxation.

The third trend of socialism everywhere is toward the centralization of power. Socialists may talk about democracy until they are blue in the face, and people may believe them, until they are completely deluded; but the simple fact of the matter is that the application of socialist principles everywhere leads to the centralization of power and ultimately to dictatorship. And regardless of what the men and women who are administering the system may desire to do, the unavoidable trend is and must be toward dictatorship, or the centralization of power. There is nothing more to the C.C.F. than that. There is nothing more to socialism than those three things.

Tell me, now, in what direction the Liberal party is tending today, and in what direction the Progressive Conservative party is following them and pushing them. It is exactly in the direction of the three principles I have indicated—more and more rigid taxation, until motivation tends to be destroyed; more and more bureaucracy, which means the centralization of power—

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —and ultimately they will have government ownership of industry, because industry will be entirely unable to carry on under the conditions under which they are now labouring.

An hon. MEMBER: They are doing pretty well now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Some one of the C.C.F. members has just said, "Well, they are doing pretty well". Yes, just a few at the top are doing well. But even they will find the situation rendered impossible for them if we continue under the present system, exactly in the way in which the Liberals are administering it, and exactly as the Progressive Conservatives would administer it if they were in power over on the treasury benches instead of sitting in opposition.

Mr. KNOWLES: Which they never will be.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not know whether they will be, because you never can account for what the people will do.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They may even vote C.C.F. now and again.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is an alternative. I was telling the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) just before six o'clock that if the principle of the creation of debt-free money, in accordance with the production of the country, were adopted, that would be the key to a solution of the difficulty. I lay this down right now, that if that principle is not adopted by the Liberal party or by the Progressive Conservative party, or whatever party succeeds them, then the country will go toward a socialist dictatorship, just as sure as Canada is Canada. And so will any other country that tries to carry on under the system under which we are now carrying on.

If debt-free money is adopted we shall find that it will then be possible to render financially possible what is physically possible. All a country like Canada needs is to have what is physically possible, in this majestic and marvellous country, rendered financially possible. Then everyone of the fondest dreams of the people of Canada can be realized, because we can use the resources God has given us to accomplish a standard of living such as we ought to have.

I have already told what the C.C.F. stands for. Let me now say that social credit fundamentally stands for the use of debt-free money in accordance with the surplus production of the country, the production which, under normal circumstances, people are unable to obtain the money to buy. If the C.C.F. would adopt that principle, as I suspect a number of them would, they would be able to avoid—

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The only kind of money they will ever have.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no use in mincing matters. I want to be frank; if the C.C.F. did adopt the principle of debt-free money, then they would not be under the necessity of stealing every bit of money they use from the people who have it.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All they are advocating at the present time is nothing in the world but organized highway robbery. They propose to take from the men who have, the money that they have. That proposal will discourage initiative; it will discourage people from producing. That is the difficulty the socialists run into all the time; they get to the point where they cannot get production and then they are in real difficulty.

If the C.C.F. will adopt the principle of debt-free money they will not have to have government ownership of industry, because they will be able to get their money without trying to take it way from those who have it. If the Liberals and Conservatives will adopt the principle of debt-free money, wisely used, they will be able to overcome the dangers they are running into. I have not much more to say and I am sure all will be glad to have me finish.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): No; it is a good speech.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Give the C.C.F. another belt.

An hon. MEMBER: Go after the Liberals again.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think I have been going after the Liberals just about as hard as I have been going after anybody. When we rose for the dinner recess I was pointing out the strange ways of the Liberals. One member of our Social Credit group stated in this house one time that a certain man with great experience in Canada had once said that the Liberals were false to true principles while the Conservatives were true to false principles.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): The C.C.F. have no principles.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just the truth.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe the C.C.F. are true to the principles they have, but those principles are false and will lead them into trouble. I was just pointing out what the Liberals have done with respect to debt-free money. The Liberal Advocate is supposed to be a Liberal party organ, or at least that is what it pretends to be. If you go back to the issues of that publication from 1930 to 1935 you will find that in every single issue they talked about debt-free money. But just the minute the Liberals took office they stopped talking about debt-free money and they stopped all Liberals from talking about debt-free money.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What about Gerry McGeer?

Mr. QUELCH: They made him a senator.

Mr. BLACKMORE: One of the most striking memories I have is of Gerry McGeer standing up in this house while the war was on and telling the then Minister of Finance, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), how to conduct the affairs of this country with respect to money. I can remember the present Minister of Justice standing up and wringing his hands and pleading with the hon. member to stop embarrassing the government—by advocating principles which Liberals had been advocating for ten or fifteen years!

Mr. KNOWLES: What did they do to Tucker?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Tucker started talking debt-free money enthusiastically, and he persisted in such talk. I remember how earnestly he used to do so. What did the Liberals do with him? They sent him to the Bretton Woods conference.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It was hard to take.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What did they send him there for? I presume it was done in order to give an air of respectability to the Bretton Woods conference or to try to make people think that, because the Canadian government sent a monetary reformer to the Bretton Woods conference, the Bretton Woods conference stood for monetary reform. You could not have a bigger lie put out anywhere than that, for the Bretton Woods conference stood for everything but monetary reform; it stood for reaction, the gold standard and restriction in every direction.

What did they do with the former member for Rosthern, Mr. Tucker? When he came back here they made him parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and that was the end of Walter Tucker. We heard no more from him regarding monetary reform. I could go right on through the list and refer to member after member. You rarely heard a man on the Liberal side rise in his place and talk in favour of monetary reform. Why? They were told, I suppose, to lay off. You can hardly get anywhere with a party that does things like that.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Oh, yes, the Liberals advocate these things like debt-free money in order to get into power, but they desert and betray them as soon as they get in. The Conservatives have not had courage enough to stand up and talk in favour of monetary reform.

What they need in the two parties are new ideas. The ordinary person on the street knows that some new ideas have to be brought in. but he does not know where in the world to turn to for them. So he votes for the C.C.F. because he thinks he can understand them a little better than he can understand anybody else. As I said a few minutes ago, it is easy for anybody to understand highway robbery. Even back in the days of Adam they understood that two or three could gang up on somebody who had some goods and take them away from him. That is all the C.C.F. are advocating. You hear them everlastingly talking about profits, but you never hear them say a word about losses. They pick out a few companies that happen to be fortunate enough in a given year to make profits, and they cry out against those profits as though the making of profit was the greatest crime of today. But they never tell you about the scores of others that made losses; they never tell you what the C.C.F. government would do to help them out.

Mr. KNOWLES: We do not have any losses.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You do not have any losses because somebody else is running the businesses. Just as soon as you run them yourselves you will have nothing but losses. That is precisely the sort of thing that socialism runs into.

Mr. KNOWLES: Wait until Thursday.

Mr. BLACKMORE: C.C.F. people think everything will be fine just as soon as they are voted in. They are in that respect just like the Liberals and the Conservatives. The Liberals think that, because they win an election, they must be perfect. If the C.C.F. also get the idea that, because they win an election, they must be all right, they are going to run into some terrible disappointments.

The members of the C.C.F. are well-meaning; every single member that is in this house means well. He is just as fine a man as you could possibly meet, but there is not a member of the C.C.F. in this house who has the slightest idea of what it would cost to put into operation the ideas he advocates.

Mr. SINCLAIR: He does not know.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, yes, we do, right to the last cent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What a terrific shock the C.C.F. will run into if they take over the government and discover that there is limit to the amount of money that can be either taxed or robbed from the people of Canada. After they get all the money that can be taxed or robbed from the people, they will find they are far short of having enough money to run the affairs of Canada as they now tell the people they could run them.

Mr. KNOWLES: The only limit is what is physically possible.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Somebody has been talking about the social credit "printing presses". No one has ever heard anyone in the Social Credit group speak about printing presses, but you find that talk about printing presses taking place among Liberals, who are always trying to delude the people with falsehoods. How can you hope to run the country successfully when members of parliament are that kind of people? You just cannot do it. The people are becoming completely sick of the whole thing, but they do not know what to do.

Almost every country in the world, including Canada, is faced with two alternatives. Either they will have to adopt a system similar to social credit, which is based fundamentally upon the principle of debt-free money to render what is physically possible financially possible, or they will have to adopt socialism. There is no middle way. If they adopt socialism they will ultimately run into the same thing they have in Russia. That is inevitable. You may scoff at it all you like, but you cannot scoff the truth of my statement out of my statement.

This country faces those two alternatives. Either it will adopt the social credit concept, or it will adopt the C.C.F. socialist concept, and the two are diametrically opposite.

Mr. KNIGHT: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Somebody says, "No", but I tell him that I know just about two things about it for every one he knows. I think I knew as much about socialism as the ordinary socialist in this house when I was twenty-five years old. I knew it then and I know it now. I used to wonder whether socialism was acceptable as a way of life, but I never was able to convince myself that it would lead to a sound state, and I do not believe it will now; not because I have any prejudices against it, but because the principles it advocates are unsound if you want freedom.

Just a word about enterprise. Social Credit stands for individual enterprise, for it says that individual enterprise will produce goods abundantly. It has proved that it will do so all down through the centuries. At no time was the proof more evident than during the recent war when the nations that were under individual enterprise were able to smother with their production the nations not under free enterprise. I prefer to say "individual enterprise" rather than "free enterprise", because free enterprise suggests that enterprise is free to do whatever it likes, create monopolies and charge what it likes. Social Credit does not favour that sort of thing at all. Social Credit says that if you take individual enterprise, with the wonderful motivation that is in it naturally, set it to work producing goods, and regulate that enterprise by the social credit just price system, which allows for a fair profit, allows enterprise to recover its costs plus a fair profit, you will have a powerful engine, harnessed and controlled as a powerful horse might be, so that it can go ahead and produce abundantly without being able to destroy itself or others. There you have the concept of social credit.

We find our C.C.F. brethren very fond of trying to smear social credit in Alberta by trying to make it appear that social credit stands for big business, monopolies, et cetera.

Mr. KNIGHT: Where is Mr. Low?

Mr. BLACKMORE: He is in Saskatchewan trying to tell the people of Saskatchewan some of the truth.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have been trying to grasp the principles of social credit. My understanding is that it is controlled free enterprise. Is that correct?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think you could say "controlled" or "regulated". It is difficult to get a word which will carry the exact truth without an unfortunate connotation.

Mr. MacINNIS: If it is controlled, how can it be free?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It can be free just as a man who has been taught good manners and who exercises a certain amount of restraint can move about freely without offending anybody. He does not lose his freedom through such restraint. Just as soon as individual enterprise is taught that the state will co-operate with a company—let us take the Aluminum Company of Canada or the Canadian Pacific as an example—just as soon as the Canadian Pacific would be assured that the people of Canada would co-operate with it in an endeavour to see that it could recover its costs of production, plus a fair profit, and that the people of Canada would be behind it right through to accomplish that objective, the Canadian Pacific would become in every respect one of the finest and most efficiently managed services in the state.

Mr. KNOWLES: It will be the government then.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is just nonsense —no attempt to get the truth! What I have said holds. Just as soon as the Canadian Pacific would be assured that it could recover its cost of production, plus a fair profit, and it knew what that profit would be, and everybody knew it; once it was assured that the government and the people would co-operate with it, the Canadian Pacific would have no further anxiety. It would not have to be afraid that, in case of a slump or a depression, it would lose so much money that it would become impossible for the company to keep on running the road. The same holds true of any enterprise you may take in this country. The Canadian Pacific would be regulated or controlled, not only to prevent it from going too far but to keep it from falling too far short of its objectives.

Now you have the social credit concept of individual enterprise just as clearly as it can be briefly defined, and you know what social credit stands for as regards enterprise. It stands for a carefully regulated price structure which prevents any enterprise from exploiting either the people it serves or employs or buys its raw material from. We say that if you put individual enterprise in a set of circumstances like that it will produce in adequate abundance, and all you will need to do then will be to find a market for what it produces. Social credit says: We will find a market for your goods through the use of debt-free money.

You see how vastly different that is from socialist concept.

I say once more to the Liberals and the Conservatives that if they adopt that debt-free money principle, if they set out with it to build a policy which will commend itself to the people, they can put that policy at an early date into operation. And, once the policy is put into operation, the people will never listen to socialism or the C.C.F. any more, and communism will disappear.

I say once more, Mr. Speaker, that Canada shall have either social credit or socialism. We may just as well recognize that and govern ourselves accordingly.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I have pleasure in welcoming the three new members to the house. They have just been elected in by-elections in various constituencies, and I am sure that they will be happy with us and that they will learn to appreciate being members of this club, the House of Commons. I wish them success. I am not panicky at all about their election. It was due to entirely different causes from those enumerated by the speakers of that party this afternoon.

I have just listened with great pleasure to the entertaining speech of my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). He told us that this country will go socialist or social credit. If the country ever goes socialist, which God forbid, we shall know where we are going, but if the country ever goes social credit, we shall never know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just as we do not know under Liberalism.

Mr. POULIOT: I have listened attentively to my hon. friend, whom I admire. He tells us of the marvels that will be accomplished by social credit, but he failed to do one thing. He failed to tell us what social credit is. I have been listening to him for many years, and always with a great deal of pleasure. It may be on account of my deficiencies, but I am still wondering what social credit is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If my hon. friend would permit a question, does he remember I said it involved debt-free money created by the state?

Mr. POULIOT: It may involve that, but my hon. friend did not tell me what social credit is.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does he remember that I said social credit involves the creation of debt-free money?

Mr. POULIOT: That is the same thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the hon. member remember that I said social credit involved what is called the just price, which guaranteed to producers the cost of production, plus a fair profit.

Mr. POULIOT: These are things that my hon. friend has said a number of times, and each time I could not understand the working of it. I remember that one day I asked him, as an example, if the population of the world were one hundred people, how many would work to permit the others to live, and he answered me "two". Two people out of a hundred would make it possible for the others to live happily. It was beyond me. I asked him again how it would be done. He said it would be done by the machine. I asked, what machine? Well, I do not know what machine.

An hon. MEMBER: The Liberal machine.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: These are things beyond my understanding. I listened with great care to my hon. friend, and until he explains satisfactorily to me how two men can make it possible for the other ninety-eight to live happily—the whole population of the world being a hundred—and with contentment, feed them, clothe them, find shelter for them, I shall not understand him. The machine that can do that must be pretty good, but I do not know if it is invented yet.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will the hon. member permit another question? Will he tell us what Liberalism is?

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell him what Liberalism is. Liberalism is the thing that my hon. friend believes in. When he makes sensible speeches they are Liberal speeches. When he denounces the socialist party he speaks as a great Liberal. It is unfortunate that he does not do so all the time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will my hon. friend permit one more question? Will he tell the house how Liberalism works?

Mr. MacINNIS: Backwards.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, Liberalism works when—

An hon. MEMBER: In competition.

Mr. POULIOT: Very well. Provided that it does not lean on socialist and Tory policies. So long as the Liberal party remains Liberal the policies are always excellent. That is what I want, and that is what they will have to be even before the convention. Having said that, I regret very much to be unable to understand all the points made by my hon. friend.

I will tell the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Young) that if he was elected it was mostly for two reasons: in the first place, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not create that vacancy when I asked for it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Why did you ask for it?

Mr. POULIOT: For the reasons that my hon. friend used in the campaign. In the second place, because he complained that the official Liberal candidate had been imposed on the people of Vancouver Centre against their will. Parties may make mistakes at times, and when we make mistakes we admit them. This is no discredit to the hon. gentleman who, because he seems to be genial, must be personally popular in spite of the fact that he may have preached—I am not sure of it—wrong doctrines during the campaign. He preached wrong doctrines if he preached the C.C.F. doctrines.

I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He said that the people thought of security, justice and freedom not merely in abstract terms. That is true. He said that the people of Canada—this may not be textually accurate, but I was careful in taking my notes, and I want to do him justice—generally wished good homes, steady employment, educational opportunities, more of public health and over-all security than that given under the old, worn-out competitive free enterprise system. That is his view. That is the socialist view which is in conformity with the teachings of the late Mr. Woodsworth. On the other hand, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre this afternoon said that the policies pursued by the two old parties led to authoritarianism, the possession of economic power by the few and the abolition of private property in the hands of the people. How can both statements be reconciled? It is impossible. If my hon. friend thinks private enterprise is wrong I do not see how the new member for Vancouver Centre can make himself the advocate of the right of ownership by the private individual.

Mr. GILLIS: He was absolutely correct. How much private property is in the hands of the ordinary people of Canada?

An hon. MEMBER: All of it.

Mr. SINNOTT: Ninety-five per cent.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend has only to ask for the list of those who bought victory bonds, and he will see the number of people who have private property and the number of depositors in the banks.

Mr. GILLIS: They are all back in the hands of the banks.

Mr. POULIOT: Anybody who has an account, provided that he has enough funds, can get his money out at any time. My hon. friend knows that, and he does the same thing himself. In spite of his theories, he does not put his money in the hands of the C.C.F. party. I hope he puts it in the bank in his own name, and when he needs it he draws it. He gets the private property while he draws it.

Mr. GILLIS: That is apart from ownership altogether.

Mr. POULIOT: Those who preach common ownership of property are just theorists and are not practising it. They do as the ordinary citizen does. They have what they own. They make use of it as they see fit, and they are happy under that system. It is an old system.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke, not of the disintegration of the old parties but of the disintegration of the system for which both old parties stood.

Mr. GILLIS: Right.

Mr. POULIOT: I want to quote him correctly. He also spoke of the disintegration of free enterprise. He said that pressure from St. James street has forced the Liberal party into a coalition with the Tories. He spoke of the conditions in some provinces and of the continuing realignment of the parties. He said that free enterprise had disappeared everywhere except on the North American continent.

Mr. GILLIS: Correct.

Mr. POULIOT: It is precisely because free enterprise disappeared from other countries that we, the countries in which free enterprise still exists, have to finance them completely for their recovery. That was admitted by no less a gentleman than the leader of the hon. gentleman when he said that the shipments and the advances for North America, from the United States and Canada, were a guarantee of future peace in Europe. That was the language used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. GILLIS: With which I agree.

Mr. POULIOT: If the policies advocated by the hon. gentleman were in force in this country it would be impossible for the United States and Canada to go to the rescue of Europe and of other countries. We have an experience in England. The government there is a socialist government. I have great respect for Mr. Attlee, much more than I have for his colleagues. But that government has been described as a government of incompetents by Mr. Churchill, who is undoubtedly considered a great man, not only by the hon. member for Cape Breton South but by all the members of the C.C.F. party. Then he advocated controls.

On the other hand, the new member for Vancouver Centre, who represents the new generation of the C.C.F., said that the electors in Vancouver Centre, Yale and Ontario voted C.C.F. because they are anti-authoritarian. How can it work? One says his electors voted for him because they were anti-authoritarian and my hon. friend the member for Cape Breton South says the policy of the party should be to impose controls.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope the hon. member will not mind my putting him straight on that. Surely he does not mean to tell me that the system of controls in effect during the war was that of an authoritarian state, does he? He is not really confusing the two?

Mr. POULIOT: Surely it was.

Mr. GILLIS: What you have today is a managerial form of society, and that is what the C.C.F. intends to unscramble. I have heard the hon. member criticize it so often that I am surprised at the statements he is now making and his complaint about bureaucracy, management of the government from outside. That is what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is fighting against.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Cape Breton South has been just as clear in his remarks as the hon. member for Lethbridge. They argue the same way. One speaks against authoritarian methods and the other is for controls. I am against controls. During the war I did not insist so much because it was for a common end, to win the war. But immediately the war was over I declared in this house and outside the house, and I also wrote similarly in newspapers, that I was against controls. I do not believe in controls, but apparently there are different views in the C.C.F. group.

The hon. member for Eglinton started the issue. I like him. I think he is the most brilliant member of his generation on that side and he is well gifted. He made an interesting speech. He said that all those who voted for the C.C.F. members were not socialists, and he spoke of unrest, housing, high taxes. He said one thing that I liked, and that is that he was not an alarmist. It is well not to be an alarmist in these days. He said that the danger from socialism was accompanied by a further threat of communist support, and he said that in York South in 1942 the Liberal organization lined up bag and baggage behind the C.C.F. candidate to defeat Arthur Meighen.

I will tell you, sir, how Arthur Meighen was defeated. He was defeated with this number of Hansard, Hansard of January 30, 1942, which was shown from house to house, not to elect the C.C.F. candidate but to defeat Arthur Meighen. And the success was evident. Mr. Meighen was defeated and the C.C.F. candidate was elected, but only for one term. After the constituency of York South had defeated Mr. Arthur Meighen he took a well deserved rest.

Mr. KNOWLES: He will be back next time.

Mr. POULIOT: Even if my hon. friends support him, he will surely not be elected. He is marked for defeat.

Mr. KNIGHT: I meant that Mr. Noseworthy will be back.

Mr. SINCLAIR: We thought you were referring to Meighen.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend knows me better than that.

Mr. POULIOT: I thought the hon. gentleman meant the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen.

Now I will say something to the socialist party, a thing I have wanted to tell them for a long time. They are fine fellows and likeable personally, but their doctrine is wrong, and that has been established before. We have only to read what was said by Mr. Woodsworth some years ago when he founded that party to see exactly what the tendency of the party is. If we turn to Hansard of February 1, 1933, we find that Mr. Woodsworth moved a motion to set up a co-operative commonwealth, and he said:

Last year the United Farmers of Alberta, in order that there should be no doubt about their ultimate objective, stated their position in very clear terms, adopting the following short definition of a co-operative commonwealth:

A community freed from the domination of irresponsible financial and economic power, in which all social means of production and distribution, including land, are socially owned and controlled either by voluntarily organized groups of producers and consumers, or—in the case of the major public services and utilities and such productive and distributive enterprises as can be conducted most efficiently when owned in common—by public corporations responsible to the people's elected representatives.

That is the cornerstone of C.C.F. policy, holding everything in common—farms. I remember Mr. Woodsworth said one day that farmers should work an eight-hour day, and they were not familiar with the problems of farms—

Mr. IRVINE: Will the hon. gentleman permit a correction? The quotation he has just given was taken from the United Farmers convention, not the C.C.F.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a moment. That is true, but it appears in the speech delivered by Mr. Woodsworth in the House of Commons on February 1, 1933, on page 1687 of Hansard.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And the hon. member for Prince Albert made a similar speech not so long ago. He was going to socialize the land.

Mr. IRVINE: I am not objecting to the hon. member's quotation, but I am pointing out the source of it.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Woodsworth quoted it in his speech and he made it his own. He probably had something to do with the drafting of that sentence. I do not know. I am not familiar with the workings of those groups. The hon. member for Cariboo has a very good memory and he must remember all those circumstances. He must remember also that I asked more than fifty-five questions of Mr. Woodsworth, some of them based on that very statement. He was never able to answer them, and the C.C.F. party has never answered them. For instance, after that statement that all social means of production and distribution, including land, should be socially owned and controlled either by voluntarily organized groups of producers and consumers, and so on, I asked a number of questions. Take these:

1. What is the definition of the words (a) "socially owned" and (b) "socially controlled"?
2. What would be the function of the dominion parliament and provincial legislatures in a co-operative commonwealth?
3. By what process would privately owned lands be turned into societies or become socially owned and controlled property?
4. How would such groups of producers and consumers be voluntarily organized?
5. Would such groups be amenable to the laws?
6. Would the co-operative commonwealth compensate private individuals or corporations who presently own land and property, for their loss, and if so, to what extent?
7. How many people in each province would be affected by their private property becoming "socially owned and controlled"?
8. Would such change in land ownership take place in urban as well as rural centres?
9. What are the social means of production and distribution (excluding land) which should be socially owned and controlled?
10. Would movable as well as immovable property be socially owned and controlled?
11. How and by whom would socially owned and controlled means of production and distribution (including land) be managed?
12. How, by whom and for how long would each of the above mentioned managers be appointed?
13. Who would decide the kind, area and location of the land or property to be assigned by society to each individual?

Those are serious questions and they have never been answered by the C.C.F. party. Then, with regard to another sentence of the quotation from the remarks of the late Mr. Woodsworth:

Major services and utilities and such productive and distributive enterprises as can be conducted most efficiently when owned in common (should be owned—and controlled?) by public corporations responsible to the people's elected representatives.

I asked the following questions:

1. What major public services and utilities could be conducted most efficiently when owned in common?
2. Would socially owned and controlled social means of production and distribution (including land), and mentioned in the first place, be owned in common?
3. If so, what would be the difference in ownership between (a) the aforesaid socially owned and controlled social means of production and distribution (including land), and (b) such productive and distributive enterprises as could be conducted most efficiently when owned in common?

4. Would the voluntarily organized groups of producers and consumers aforesaid mentioned be (a) public corporations and (b) responsible to the people's elected representatives?

5. If so, what would be the difference between "socially owned" and "owned in common"; and "socially controlled" and "controlled by public corporations"?

6. How many groups of producers and consumers would be organized voluntarily in each province and for what purposes?

7. How many public corporations would own and control such productive and distributive enterprises in each province, as could be conducted most efficiently when owned in common, and how and for what purposes would each of such public corporations be organized?

Those are serious questions.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They are good questions.

Mr. POULIOT: We must know about the matter. We must have some information about it. We hear the hon. gentleman saying, "We will make life better for you; we will make you happier; you will have less trouble; you will have over-all security; you will have a good house." How will it be done?

Mr. SINCLAIR: With other people's money.

Mr. POULIOT: During the last four years the C.C.F. party was successful in one province just the same as the Social Credit party was successful in another province. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I would be greatly concerned if the C.C.F. made progress in Canada, because I do not know what kind of legislation they would pass, and I fear that legislation would be detrimental to the small holder.

What happened in France? France was the bulwark in Europe against communism. Why did France become a communistic country? It was precisely because—

Mr. GRANT: Too many parties.

Mr. POULIOT: —of the devaluation of the franc, because those who were holding property lost it as a result of smart financial policy, and the people who had nothing were ready to accept any dangerous, subversive propaganda. Undoubtedly the hon. gentlemen who belong to the C.C.F. group are honest. They mean well.

I will conclude these short remarks by reading them some other questions which I asked of the founder of their party, Mr. Woodsworth, who was personally a highly respectable citizens but who had a wrong view about general policy. I asked the following questions:

1. Would the whole retail and wholesale trade be "socially owned" or "owned in common," and "socially controlled" or "controlled by public corporations"?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

2. In the latter case, would such "public corporations" be "freed from the domination of irresponsible financial and economic power"?

3. By what process and how would all the stores and trades now privately owned be turned into the co-operative commonwealth?

It cannot be half commonwealth and half private property. It must be all private property or all commonwealth. To continue:

4. Would the co-operative commonwealth compensate the private individuals and corporations who presently own stores or trades, for their loss, and if so, to what extent and how?

5. Would all natural products be turned from "voluntarily organized groups of producers" to "voluntarily organized groups of consumers," without any profit to the producers?

6. What, if anything, would the groups of consumers give to the groups of producers in exchange for their means of production and how would it be done?

7. How would the social means of production be distributed by the consumers groups to private individuals?

8. What would be allowed to private individuals forming the groups of producers for their work and how and by what means would it be done?

9. Who would enact the regulations relating to production and distribution of primary products and what should they be?

10. Would the production of primary products be based upon the annual consumption in order to be distributed only to the consumers in this country?

11. If so, would such policy prevent any exports of home products?

12. Without any exports,—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker.

—would it be possible for the co-operative commonwealth to trade with foreign or other countries who have not adopted the co-operative commonwealth system; in other words, would it not mean the end of all foreign trade?

Except the trade we practise with England by advancing credits.

13. What industries would be "socially owned and controlled," on one hand, and on the other hand "owned in common by public corporations responsible to the people's elected representatives"?

14. Would the system for the distribution of primary products be the same for manufactured products?

15. Would all private and public industries be turned over to the co-operative commonwealth?

16. Would the co-operative commonwealth compensate the owners of private or public industries for their loss and if so, to what extent and how?

17. Would it not be the policy of the co-operative commonwealth to abolish and repudiate all federal, provincial, municipal and other public and private debts and obligations?

18. Would the co-operative commonwealth supply free shelter, food, clothing and medical attendance to every man, woman and child in this country?

19. What would be the reciprocal obligations of every man, woman and child to the co-operative commonwealth and vice versa?

Mr. KNOWLES: Put them on the order paper.

Mr. POULIOT: No. It is not for the government; it is for the C.C.F. party; and those questions would not be allowed on the order paper.

It continues:

20. What would be the kind and length of work to be done each day by each private individual?
21. Who would assign same to each one?
22. What would happen (a) to the amounts of money deposited in chartered banks by private individuals; and (b) to life insurance held by them?
23. If "the supply of human needs" instead of the making of profits were the basic principle regulating production, distribution and exchange, would there be any necessity for any kind of currency?
24. If so, what would be the standard of such policy or means of exchange?
25. Would there be any kind of private ownership in the co-operative commonwealth?
26. If so, what would it be?
27. Would the co-operative commonwealth demolish all churches, as has been done in Russia?

That was fifteen years ago, and I do not ask that question now. But all the other questions should be answered. They are fair questions, and they should be answered so that the people will understand the working out of the claims of the C.C.F. party. Whether some Labour-Progressives have voted for the newly elected members is a matter of no concern. They may vote for whomever they wish. But the point is that pure socialism is the ante-room of communism, because it deprives people of private ownership and puts all their wealth in common, as the name of the party implies.

This is why I oppose the very basis of the policy of that party. As I have said, I am not concerned by the election of three new members of the C.C.F. party, any more than I am concerned by the election of a score and two members of that party to the Ontario legislature. It is inevitable that sometimes the people become dissatisfied and elect members who belong to new groups. But in most instances they have been elected, not because of the policy of the C.C.F. party but because of local conditions. That is not said often enough, but the people must be informed. This is why I attach very little significance to the election of some C.C.F. members.

I wish them good luck, however, and I ask them to propound Liberal policies instead of C.C.F. policies, and to urge upon the government the necessity of keeping away from Toryism as well as from socialism. It will take some time, but I hope it will be done.

The basis of prosperity in this country is private ownership; private ownership by the masses of the people, private ownership by the little fellow as well as by those of larger means. I do not want any excess; I do not want any abuse of the privilege. That is why we have legislation against combines. It must be used in due course. It is a Liberal policy that fights combines; on the other hand, it is a Liberal policy to protect private property, and to protect the small owners of private property, so that they may enjoy the happiness to which they are entitled in this land.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the debate continues, I believe I should draw the attention of the house to the rule with respect to raising this question on a motion to go into supply; and I do not do this for the purpose of restricting debate unduly. I thought I should refer hon. members, however, to Beauchesne, third edition, citation 467. I shall not read the whole of it, but the pertinent part states:

When such motion—

And this is a reference to the motion to go into supply.

—is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance.

That, of course, would be grievances which the dominion parliament has power to redress.

It does seem to me that the debate has gone beyond that rule, and I would ask hon. members if they would endeavour from now on to try to confine their remarks to the rule I have read.

Mr. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in my first attempt in this parliament I wish to say, in order perhaps to gain your co-operation, that I agree entirely with the quotation you have just made. All through this, if I may term it, "debate", I have been amazed that this kind of thing should have been permitted to go on in a parliament of Canada.

I am a trade union official, and we are often told in our trade union meetings about parliamentary procedure. I know perfectly well, however, that if even the most amateur president of one of our local unions were presiding over a meeting and he heard such an irrelevant item discussed or raised, as was raised by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), the person who raised it would have been ruled out of order immediately.

But this, of course, is the parliament of Canada; and I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not going to trespass very long upon the time of the house. I have taken this opportunity only because, being one of the newest of the members of the House of Commons, it would seem that apparently everybody else in the house knows why I was elected. Apparently they know also not only why I was elected, but even who voted for me.

Perhaps I might be permitted to express an opinion as to why I think the people of my riding voted for me in the by-election. One thing I am certain of is that they did not vote for me to come here to waste time in this kind of debate. If there is one thing more than another about which I am certain, it is that the people in my riding voted for me in order that some effort could be made to secure for them the things they want, the things they never had, but the things they hope to get.

I do not care whether hon. gentlemen to my right know the answers to these questions or not. I do not care whether the supporters of the government know the answers. I do not even mind whether the representatives of the Social Credit group know the answers. I do know the people of my riding want a health plan. I do know they want security in their relations with their employers. I do know they are not a bit impressed nowadays by the large advertisements in the newspapers advertising the program of the Progressive Conservative party on behalf of labour, or when they see written into that advertisement item after item that the party says it will do for labour—including the check-off. I say I know they are not a bit impressed by those advertisements, when they find that as recently as last week these very same people, in this very chamber, were not unanimous as they have stated in the published advertisement, even about the check-off. You can fool all the people part of the time; you can fool part of the people all the time; but you cannot fool all the people all the time. That is one reason why the people revolted in the by-election in Ontario and voted C.C.F. It is no good to tell the people in advertisements what you are going to do for them and then show by your actions in parliament that you cannot do it.

I was very much impressed with the ceremony that took place this morning when three C.C.F. members were led up to the Speaker and were permitted to take their seats, particularly since I was one of the participants. I knew there would be some rumbling in the old-line parties; I knew they would be disturbed about it, but I never thought for a single moment it would cause the great alarm evidenced by this debate. I know hon. members on both sides of the house will say that that is not true, that they are not alarmed. If they are not, then they certainly are whistling very loudly going past the cemetery.

I feel that my first day in parliament of approximately ten or twelve hours as a new member has been wasted in the main. Somebody whispers that I shall get used to that. I hope not. I hope that the same fervor and the same earnestness that prompted my desire to get into this house will continue during the time that I am here. I hope sincerely that I shall not get into the habit of treating serious matters in a sheerly and crudely political sense such as I have been unfortunate enough to have to listen to today.

I was impressed by the statements made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and also by the C.C.F. member, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald), who was assisted by my new young colleague, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones). They spoke of the distressful conditions facing the flood victims in British Columbia. I thought their presentation would have stimulated this parliament into the urge and desire to do something for these people, I realize not immediately, but quickly. Instead of anything of that kind happening, I found out that that did not matter, that all that mattered was that we should discuss this thing that we have been discussing all these hours, this political thing. I think the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) should be ashamed of himself. That may be unparliamentary and if it—

Mr. FERGUSON: There has never been a speech that was more political, delivered in this house, than what the hon. member is delivering now.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has withdrawn his remark.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It is his first speech.

An hon. MEMBER: He will learn.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him a little leeway.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I hear someone say that I will learn. I know I will, because I do not think I know it all.

I have no further comment to make about this situation. I am more than sorry to find out, during my first day in parliament, that we appear to be concerned more about trivial things than about really important things. To me the important thing was to help the people in British Columbia, but apparently I was wrong.

As long as I am a member of this parliament I hope to keep before my eyes and my mind the needs of the people of the country, not just those in my own riding but throughout the whole country, and to do everything I can, and encourage other members of parliament to do likewise, to see that the people get the things which we have always heard they will get but which up to the present they have not had.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, listening to the new hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Williams), one would think some of the things mentioned by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) were not worthwhile. Among the things he mentioned were old age pensions without a means test, income tax relief for those in the lower income brackets, the repeal of the 25 per cent excise tax on certain goods manufactured in Canada, a reduction in the cost of living and so on. If those things are not important, I do not know what are.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton upon bringing up these matters. This is one of the most important subjects we have discussed this session. It also gives us an idea as to where true Liberalism is. I think we in this house who are Liberals will have an opportunity to get up and express our views. If we belonged to the socialist party or were under a dictatorship we would not have that opportunity. I would refer hon. members to what happened recently in Manitoba when a certain member of that party got up and expressed his view and was immediately read out of the party.

I do not think enough people in this country realize what true Liberalism is. I do not think they realize what free enterprise is. If they had a taste of socialism and communism as they have in Russia, they would possibly think more about it. In this democratic way of life of ours we have an opportunity to express our opinions as we see them.

Under the private enterprise system we have seen Canada rise from eleventh place among the trading nations of the world, to fourth place. That has all been done under private enterprise. We have seen conditions in Canada improve greatly, so that today our industrial production is at the highest pitch of any in the whole world.

I was not born with a silver spoon in my mouth. In 1926 I had to haul all my provisions to the bush to cut pulpwood for which I was paid $1.85 a cord. In 1933 I milked cows and shipped milk for seventy-five cents a hundred pounds. I know something about budgets, because I was the reeve of a municipality for eight years. I took over the reins when things were not very good and I know what all this means.

We hear a great deal about the Labour government in England, how they have no troubles over there, how everything is nice and rosy. Today ten ships are tied up at the London docks loaded with Canadian produce which is rotting because of strikes and labour troubles in London. Every time any labour trouble crops up in this country, up pops a C.C.F. member with a cure-all for everything. Yet their socialist friends in Britain cannot solve their own labour troubles.

There is one thing I believe in, Mr. Speaker, and the people of the constituency I represent would consider me remiss in my duty if I did not say it. Under our democratic system in this country we are the servants of the people, and not their masters, and if we do not pattern our programs to the liking of the people, they can vote us out. But never let it be forgotten that under socialism and communism, once it is in office, that power of the vote which for years has been the sacred right of our people under our democratic system, will be lost forever.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

52. Departmental administration, $1,915,860.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister tell the committee whether there is any relationship between his department and that part of the Department of Trade and Commerce which used to come under the heading of "trade commissioners". I do not know that the committee is quite clear as to any distinction that may exist between the consular service and the trade commissioner service.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Canadian consular service is of very recent vintage. Until a few years ago, all the consular work for Canadian interests was performed by the British consular service, which, as hon. members know, exists all over the world, and which is still rendering valuable and appreciated services to Canadian interests wherever there is no special Canadian representation. The department which is now known as the Department of Trade and Commerce established many years ago a system of representation known as trade commissioners, but those trade commissioners received no official recognition whatsoever, and they were not in a position where they could perform official acts such as authenticating documents and so forth, which are within the jurisdiction of consuls who have obtained an exequatur from the state in which they carry on their operations. The relationship is of the most co-operative and most helpful kind; but the trade commissioners are still officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce, responsible to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and reporting to the Department of Trade and Commerce. We have a consulate general in New York; one was established late last year in Chicago, and one will be opened in San Francisco on the first of July. We are gradually but not too rapidly developing our own consular service, which will be a part of the Department of External Affairs, just as the British consular service for the last century or more has been a part of the foreign office of Great Britain.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the minister representatives in the cities of Boston and Detroit?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have a consulate in Detroit, and a project is in process of being completed for the opening of a consulate in Boston some time in the autumn.

Item agreed to.

53. Passport office administration, $138,500.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should like to say a few words on the practice of giving Canadian children to people in the United States for adoption. I shall not go into the matter at length; but I find that a great many Canadian people are unable to get babies for adoption and they have been going across to the United States in considerable numbers. I placed a number of questions on the order paper, and I find that in 1947, passports were issued to infants on the application of their guardians to the number of 189, and this year, up to May 31, fifty-nine passports have been issued. This is a practice that should be stopped. If it is not possible to get Canadian parents to adopt these infants there might be some excuse for this practice; but, as it is, I think the minister should seriously consider putting a stop to it.

Mr. HACKETT: Would the minister, when dealing with that subject, state how many infants were, if I may use the term, imported from the United States, because I know that a few years ago, a number of married couples who were childless sought and found children in New York and brought them to Montreal.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member for Stanstead that information. He would have to get it from the immigration branch.

The question raised by the hon. member for The Battlefords has been giving great concern to the department and to the attorneys general of several provinces. The hon. member will know, as we all do, that the matter of adoption comes within provincial jurisdiction, and we have endeavoured to avoid giving passports unless it was established to our satisfaction that all the requirements of the provincial law, where the infant happened to be, had been complied with. Correspondence is going on between the Department of External Affairs and several provincial governments to try to devise some joint method whereby effective steps can be taken to see that the true interests of such infants are properly safeguarded. Of course there is no obligation to issue a passport, but it is difficult to refuse to issue one unless there appears to be some reasonable ground for doing so. I can assure the hon. member that the officers of the department are much concerned about the matter, and anxious to use all proper means to see that all the requirements of the laws of the various provinces are complied with before the passports are issued.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Just another word. While I realize that the adoption of children lies within the jurisdiction of the provinces, I think that if the minister's department refuses passports, the question can be solved in that way. We need these children here. We have many good Canadian families who want children for adoption. It is a crime to allow these children to go to another country where we have absolutely no supervision over them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From the application that comes in, it is not always possible to tell that it is an application which is apt to lead to an adoption. It would be difficult for a federal department to refuse to issue passports to children, infants or minors, unless there appeared to be some failure to comply with the laws of their provinces. This, we are happy to assert, is a freedom-loving country. We endeavour to place as few restrictions on the movement of individuals as possible, provided, of course that there is no infringement of the rights of others.

The hon. member will recall that a question arose about foreigners who wished to return to their native country. We felt that we could not lock them into Canada. They were warned that they might forfeit their naturalization certificates or their rights to naturalization. We felt that we did not wish to attempt to enforce the kind of regime we complain about when it is enforced by other countries. We have been making representations to other governments about their refusal to allow some of their nationals, who had married Canadians, to get exit permits, and that is something about which I think we have to be very discreet. I think, with the wholehearted desire that exists between the provincial administration and the Department of External Affairs to deal with this problem of the adoption of children in as careful a manner as possible, we shall not be too much concerned with the niceties of jurisdiction.

We are going to give each other as great help as can be given to see that all possible care is taken.

Item agreed to.

54. Representation abroad—including salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $5,083,082.

Mr. CHURCH: There was just one question which I hoped to raise this afternoon, because I rose at the same time as the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I do not know whether it comes under the minister's department or not. My question is this. The department is spending a million dollars more this year on this item. It is up to $5,000,000. We are just about through June now, and only July and August remain for us to try to get in coal, food, vegetables and things like that by water. I was wondering, with the difficulty we had in our city, which is spreading right across the great lakes, whether we could not do something. As I see it, charity begins at home in many of these matters. Something should be done to protect the people of Canada. If we can spend all this money to pacify Europe I am wondering why we have no funds to try to pacify the seamen on the great lakes. I was wondering whether charity does not belong at home. There are a few more months left to bring in by water the fruits, vegetables, coal and all that we need, but nothing is being done.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I know the item that we are on, but I proposed to bring this up on the motion to go into supply today. I believe charity begins at home. If we are ready to pacify Europe we should start with the seamen and bring them together. Labour and capital should not be on strike. They should not be fighting each other on the great lakes today. In our city on Saturday there were a couple of hundred seamen on the docks, taken away from traffic and all that kind of thing. I believe charity begins at home. May I ask the Minister of Public Works to try to pacify the people in Canada before we pacify Europe.

Mr. KNIGHT: I feel that I ought to say one word in support of the protest which has been made by the hon. member for The Battlefords. I think that in these days—

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. The item before the committee is 54, which has to do with representation abroad.

Mr. KNIGHT: Item 53 was not passed in my hearing.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Yes, it was passed before the hon. member rose to speak. I called the item before.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I ask you, sir, whether you reverted to it?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: No, we did not. It was passed as the hon. member rose to speak and then we called item 54, representation abroad. The amount is $5,083,082.

Mr. KNIGHT: May I have only one minute? If the hon. member for The Battlefords was out of order, perhaps I might be allowed the same privilege. I wanted to add my voice to the protest which he made. I think enough has not been said upon the subject he raised. It is somewhat ridiculous at this time when we are looking for a desirable type of citizen that we should allow our own citizens to be exported from the country.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think the hon. member should discuss that matter any further, because if he is given an opportunity to do so, many others may follow him.

Mr. HLYNKA: I should like to ask the minister a question on item 54. What policy is being followed by the Department of External Affairs in repatriating Canadian citizens who have been trapped in territories which were annexed to the Soviet Union during and after world war II? I have several cases referred to me of Canadian citizens who today find themselves in territories controlled by the Soviet Union. When I took the matter up with the department the reply I received was that nothing could be done for these persons unless they themselves obtained exit visas from Soviet authorities. It seems to me that that is an unfair attitude to take. Could not our Canadian representative undertake to place a request before the Soviet government to return these people to Canada?

I have in mind one person, an elderly lady, whose husband, a Canadian soldier, was killed in the war. Her son is now endeavouring to bring her to Canada. Apparently the department seems to be helpless in aiding him in the problem of bringing her over. Personally, I am not satisfied with the answer that all we can do is to say that we will help her, provided that she obtains an exit visa from the Soviet authorities. I think that is placing the onus on a person who is not in a position to bargain with a totalitarian government. Surely we as a government can make a request of the Soviet authorities that they return to Canada certain persons who are Canadian citizens. Following such request, we would know, of course, whether the Soviet authorities would agree to allow these persons to leave the country. To leave this matter entirely to these helpless people is unfair.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are two categories of persons who may be considered as being in the position described by the hon. member, persons having dual nationality and persons with only Canadian nationality. As to persons with only Canadian nationality, under international law we do make requests. I cannot say we are very successful. We have been carrying on the negotiations for nearly three years now with respect to a young lady who, according to our contention, has only Canadian nationality, and we have not yet succeeded in obtaining an exit visa for her.

As to those who have dual nationality, in certain cases we have made representations, and the answer to us has been that the person is a national of the Soviet republic, where he or she happens to be, and it is a matter of Soviet domestic policy that will have to be decided by the Soviet authorities. There is not much else that we can do about the matter.

With respect to a person, perhaps persons, who, we feel, is or are truly of Canadian nationality, we have considered bringing the matter before the united nations as a violation of fundamental human rights, and the matter is under consideration. We would certainly have done that even at an earlier date, had we not feared that it might be detrimental rather than beneficial to the person concerned. The situation is a difficult one.

I can assure the hon. member that we will do everything possible to be of assistance to those who have Canadian nationality, even though they may have dual nationality, but my own experience in connection with cases that have been brought to my personal attention does not allow me to extend very much hope of getting the kind of treatment that we would expect from a government maintaining friendly relations with us.

Mr. HLYNKA: Can the minister give an estimate of the number of Canadian citizens who are within the borders of the Soviet Union at the present time; that is, persons who are actually Canadian citizens.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At the moment I remember only one case of a purely Canadian citizen. We are informed that she has now succeeded in proceeding as far as Roumania, and we hope that the representations we are making will finally bring about her return to people of hers who are in Canada. I could not give an estimate of the numbers of those having dual nationality. Very few have applied to us for assistance. If the hon. member knows of any case and wishes to bring it to our attention, I can assure him that we will lose no time in communicating it to our representative in Moscow, or Budapest or Belgrade or wherever the appropriate official may be located.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister referred to dual nationality. I want to see if I understand what constitutes dual nationality. Would a woman, a Soviet citizen, marrying a Canadian, be considered as having dual nationality?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, not under our present citizenship act. She would not become a Canadian citizen merely by the fact of marriage. She would have to comply with the requirements of our citizenship act to become a Canadian citizen; but she would probably, even after that, having become a Canadian citizen, be still considered under Russian law to be a Soviet citizen. That is what I meant by dual nationality. To give a concrete example, a person, born in Canada of parents who are French nationals, is, under French law, a Frenchman, but under Canadian law he is a Canadian and has for international law purposes dual nationality.

Mr. HACKETT: If a male, such a person is liable for military service in France.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under French law. But we do not recognize that obligation under our Canadian law, though if he does not comply with that obligation he is unable to travel in France.

Mr. McLURE: How many commissioners, ambassadors, ministers, consuls general and plenipotentiaries have we abroad? In selecting these persons to go abroad, what method is followed? In my opinion they should be representing us in the same way that commercial ambassadors or commercial travellers would. They should be able to talk wheat, potatoes, bacon, fruit, cheese products, fish, such as lobsters, oysters, cod, salmon, mackerel and also furs and manufactured articles. Even if they could not play a good game of golf or mix the latest kind of highball, it would be far better to have them well educated and able to talk the products of Canada abroad.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At pages 116, 117, 118 and 119 of the estimates the hon. gentleman will find an enumeration of countries where we have such persons. Of commissioners, on page 116, there are seven. Then there are the countries where we have embassies, on pages 116 and 117; there are thirteen. Then the countries where we have legations, pages 117 and 118; there are nine. There are four consulates general, there are two consulates and one vice-consulate. The hon. member inquired about plenipotentiaries. I believe an officer we could describe under that title, though he really is not a plenipotentiary, is our representative on the allied commission in Berlin, Major-General Pope. He is the chief of our representation on the allied commission in Berlin.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to make a few remarks on our representation abroad. I am not speaking from direct personal knowledge, but I have had an opportunity throughout the year to talk to representatives of prominent Canadian firms who have been in South American countries. Some have been all over South America. The people to whom I have talked I regard as responsible people not given to complaining in a petty way. They know what they are talking about. Therefore I think there must be some basis for their criticism of some of the representation abroad.

As to the South American countries, I have heard the criticism expressed that we have two types of representatives, namely, either older men who are past their days of usefulness or their days of activity—when those who have not passed that stage are so necessary at the present time adequately to represent any country—or we are represented by younger men who are graduates of universities and are without doubt men of ability but who, these people tell me, have not had sufficient training in diplomatic work.

With regard to South America, I was informed that the major criticisms were, first, that few of our representatives abroad actually spoke well the language of the country to which they were sent, and I should like the minister to comment on that; in the second place, that many of them, the younger men particularly, were academic in their approach to life and did not appear to have a sound understanding of business principles; and in the third place, that they were not experienced in the diplomatic service sufficiently to understand the ways of the country to which they were sent, the sensitivity of the people of other countries to certain practices and customs, and so on.

With reference to European countries, I heard this criticism expressed. People who, I think, are well informed, consider that some of our representatives are kept at their posts far beyond the age of usefulness.

With regard to the South American countries, I am informed that some of our representation is of such an order that South American firms are dealing directly with Canadian firms, not taking advantage of the trade services and not taking advantage of our Canadian diplomatic services. As I said before, I have no personal knowledge on these matters. but I should like the minister to comment on my remarks and to explain to the committee the qualifications that are required for appointment to these positions, particularly the senior positions, and to say if it is the regulation that those representing Canada in a given country shall be able to speak well the language of the country to which they are sent. That is a serious matter from the point of view of being able to represent this country anywhere abroad.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is difficult for me to make any comment on the observations the hon. member has made, because they are so contrary to the comments I receive from numerous travellers abroad who write to me to compliment the department on the efficiency of the services performed by its representatives. If the hon. member would be kind enough to bring to my attention personally and confidentially—I know he would not wish to do it here publicly—the complaints he may have heard concerning these missions, I shall be obliged to him, and I think he will be rendering a service to the country. We are expanding quite rapidly; we are spending taxpayers' money on these representations abroad, and it is our keen desire to be as well represented abroad as possible.

It is probable that there are in some of these legations ambassadors or ministers who do not speak fluently the language of the country. In South America, Spanish is the language spoken in all the republics but Brazil. But in the capitals of all those South American republics, a large element of the population speaks French or English. It is a decided advantage to be represented by someone who acquires the facility to speak in the language of the country to which he is sent and even to make public addresses in that language. We know that from the glowing reports we receive, for instance, of the success of Mr. Jean Desy in Brazil. He took the trouble, and it did not take him long, to master the Portuguese language. The reports we have had say that Mr. Desy had created in Brazil the impression that Canada was a modern Athens where practically the whole of the people were of the highest order of culture, both in letters, in the arts, and in music.

An amusing article was published in one of the United States magazines to the effect that we were taking some time in finding a successor to Mr. Desy, because we felt that it would be difficult to maintain the kind of impression about Canadians that he had created there. But Mr. Desy has been replaced by Mr. Scott Macdonald who had his training in perhaps the same spheres, but also in other spheres as well, and who speaks English and French. He speaks some Spanish, but I do not know whether he speaks Portuguese. Nevertheless, the reports we get are that in the short time has has been there, he has also been making a good impression. I am saying quite frankly to the hon. member that in general we get glowing reports of the efficiency of our representation; and if he has information about any one or more of these missions and will convey that information to me confidentially, I shall be grateful to him, because it is our desire to have the best possible representation.

The hon. member says we are suffering from the fact that we have some men who are beyond middle age and some who have not reached middle age. The hon. member will recognize that, as a consequence of the first great war, there was a gap in our population, and we are feeling that in many walks of life. I am proud to be able to say that the Department of External Affairs is attracting a high class of men from our institutions of learning. Some time ago we advertised for fifteen appointments as third secretaries. The educational standards required were high. Over 300 applicants took the examinations, so that for fifteen appointments we had 300 who had the academic qualifications, who wrote the examinations, and from whom we were privileged to select fifteen. I think we are getting into the service men who will be able to serve Canada with credit to themselves and advantage to the country. It takes some time to train them, and we have had the advantage of securing several well qualified public servants from other branches of the civil service. We are using our best endeavours to make our representation abroad truly representative of Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to ask a question about an item which appears at page 119 of the estimates. It reads:

Office of the Canadian delegation to the united nations, New York, U.S.A., operational expenses, $167,500.

That is the amount for 1948-49. In the right-hand column no amount is set out. Why is there no amount for the previous year?

My second question is this. Immediately under the operational item is the item, "Capital item, $23,000". What is that $23,000 for?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no amount mentioned in the column opposite the $167,500 for 1947-48, because no such amount was voted for that year. We were elected to the security council at the general assembly in the autumn of 1947, and that required the establishment of permanent offices at the united nations. The expenses incurred for the portion of the fiscal year expiring on March 31, 1948, had to be provided out of votes other than the special vote for this service. The capital item of $23,000 was placed there before we had succeeded in renting a furnished house for the Canadian representative. We anticipated that we would have to furnish the premises to be provided for our representative. When the estimates were prepared that was what we had in mind. Since that time, however, we have been able to secure for our representative furnished premises, and the things we had in view when the estimates were provided will probably not be required.

Mr. HAZEN: We are asked to vote this $23,000, although there will be no need for it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member knows that in these votes we sometimes borrow from one item for the advantage of another, with the authority of treasury board. When this was provided it was intended to furnish the premises to be placed at the disposal of the Canadian representative. Since that time we have succeeded in renting furnished premises. There may be some small portion of this appropriation required; there may be some things which will be necessary in the course of the year to complete the furnishings there. But at this moment I must say to the hon. member that I do not know of anything we shall have to furnish in the course of the year which it would be proper to charge against this item.

Mr. KNIGHT: I have often wondered whether the Canadian government ever takes a hand in the early education and training of potential consuls or representatives abroad. I should like to recommend the system which the British have used for many years—at least back as far as 1900—whereby the British government sets competitive examinations open to men of a certain age and written usually by those who have proved themselves to be brilliant linguists at school. Probably the minimum age—perhaps I should not use the word "floor" which has been used in other discussions—is eighteen years. Competitive examinations are open to men between the ages of eighteen and, perhaps, twenty-four, who are graduates of recognized universities. These boys write competitive examinations, at which those required are chosen.

May I say there are not many examinations because, as the minister knows, the men are not required in large numbers. Two or three are selected by the process of competitive examination out of perhaps 400 or 500 who may write at the same time. These men are then given scholarships, perhaps to Oxford or Cambridge—and I know certainly that this is true with respect to Cambridge in this connection—and there they take another two years' intensive study in languages.

They are then sent out on their first appointment in a foreign field to act as student interpreters in one of the countries with the language of which, through their early training, they have become perfectly familiar. From there they become career members of the consular service.

I do not know whether the Canadian government is doing anything like that. I am sure, however, that there are brilliant linguists in this country, that there are just as brilliant boys here as there are in the old country, who might be given an early start along the road in this manner. I believe it would be for the benefit of the younger students, who by themselves could not afford that intensive training, if the Canadian government were to invest some money in that direction. Is any such system practised in Canada and, if not, would the minister consider it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not aware that there are scholarships in the United Kingdom for anything but the study of oriental languages. There are, I understand, some scholarships for the study of oriental languages, and we have nothing of that kind here. We have competitive examinations, and we do provide assistance for the study of languages to the extent of $25 a month by way of tuition fees. We do add to the ordinary classified salaries of officials $15 a month for those who are fluent in the language of the country in which they are exercising their functions.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I notice an item here of $10,000 for the chief of mission, and another item of $250,000 for new offices. Then there is $340,400 for the purchase of premises for missions abroad. What are these items for? Where is the chief of mission?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The word "mission" is used to cover embassies, legations and offices of high commissioners. It is a general term. We have a chief of mission in Tokyo, but we have no specific organization there. This $250,000 is to apply to all the foreign establishments.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understood the minister to say a moment ago that if there were a deficiency in one item it was customary to borrow the money under another item. Is that allowed by the auditor general, and how is it repaid?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is another item within the same group, and it has to be by allocation of the treasury board.

Mr. JACKMAN: These estimates total $9,685,000. Are you allowed to borrow from one item in order to make up the deficiency in some other item?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Only within the vote.

Mr. JACKMAN: It must be within the same vote?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Within the same vote.

Mr. JACKMAN: In looking over the details, I was interested to note that the high commissioners come first and then follow the amounts for the various ambassadors abroad. I understand that in the table of diplomatic precedence our high commissioners follow ambassadors and probably ministers. Would the minister explain why it is that the high commissioners do not take what I would call their rightful place according to seniority in the diplomatic ranks?

For instance, here in Canada we have the high commissioner for Eire, an able gentleman in the person of Mr. Hearne. If seniority were to count from the date of appointment he would probably be the doyen of the diplomatic corps. However, any ambassador from a foreign country now takes precedence over him, and the same thing must work in regard to the high commissioners representing Canada in the other countries of the commonwealth.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The tables of precedence are established by His Majesty. The high commissioners are not representatives of what we would term "foreign countries"; they are representatives of countries of the commonwealth and have not the rank of ambassadors. Ambassadors are accredited by the head of a state to the head of a state. Ambassadors or ministers in Canada are accredited to His Majesty the King by the heads of the states they represent. The way the constitution has developed, His Majesty the King would as King of England be accrediting a high commissioner to His Majesty as King of Canada. It is not done. The high commissioner represents the government of the United Kingdom and is accredited to the government of Canada, not to His Majesty the King.

I think that is an anomaly; it is a vestige of the way things have developed. It has been under discussion for some time with the various governments of the commonwealth, and I hope the time will come when it will be removed and when these representatives of the sister nations of the commonwealth will have within the commonwealth the precedence that normally would be theirs if we were not all nations of the commonwealth. I do not think that would mean any loosening of commonwealth ties, and I hope some day it will be recognized in that light.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the question of giving the high commissioners their proper seniority still developing, or is the matter stalemated at the present time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not say that the matter is stalemated at the present time. It is tied up with the use of the title "high commissioner." This is something which is not understood in foreign capitals. Of course there are matters which must not be dealt with too lightly, but which I think will come about as one of the consequences of the declaration of equality of status which preceded the Statute of Westminster.

Mr. POULIOT: Why should ambassadors who represent heads of states come after high commissioners who represent governments? It seems to me that ambassadors representing heads of states should be ahead of high commissioners who represent governments. That would also be following the alphabetical order. I make that suggestion in connection with the estimates of next year. Have consuls and those under them who look after trade matters been transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Answering the first question, may I say that ambassadors precede high commissioners in the table of official precedence for social purposes, but our estimates have developed in this way because we had high commissioners before we had ambassadors. I do not think there is any reason for changing the order now.

With respect to the second question, consuls in foreign countries operate under the jurisdiction of the foreign offices, while trade commissioners are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Consuls have an official function which is recognized by international law as being of a semi-diplomatic nature. In order to fulfil their duties they must get, from the state in which they are to operate, a certificate of recognition commonly called an exequatur. That is signed by the head of the state in which they are to carry on their functions. It would be a departure from general international practice to have consuls under any other department than the department dealing with foreign or external relations.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. POULIOT: Do they get their instructions from the Department of External Affairs or from the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They get instructions on trade matters from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. POULIOT: Direct?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Direct; they report direct on trade matters to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. POULIOT: Do Canadian ambassadors represent the King of the United Kingdom or the King of Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They represent His Majesty in his capacity as King of Canada.

Mr. BRADSHAW: Could we have a breakdown of the item of three-quarters of a million dollars?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Is the hon. gentleman speaking of the item of $956,906? These amounts are broken down in two ways. One is a breakdown by heads of expenses. These are the allowances for all the missions abroad. The hon. gentleman will find the detailed breakdown of the operational expenses of these missions listed on pages 116 and 117 of the estimates. So you have the two. One is the total amount of allowances, and then you have them broken down for each mission abroad under the total of operational expenses, on pages 116 and 117.

Mr. HLYNKA: I should like to say a word on the point touched upon by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I am not in a position to express an opinion as to the type of men who are employed in our service in South American countries, but I should like to say a word about those whom I met while travelling in western Europe last year. I am proud to say that just about every Canadian I met in our foreign service was the type of man of whom Canada could be proud. They were capable, efficient, well trained, and they certainly knew their job. I was really pleased when I had occasion to meet a number of these men in our foreign service in Italy, France, Germany and the United Kingdom, and I have nothing but praise for them.

I think it is to the advantage of the country to have older men in the service along with the younger men. I do not think it would be wise for any country to appoint young men only to foreign service, because the older men who are in it have had many years of experience, particularly those who have served in a military capacity. They can be of great assistance to our younger men. Our young men have been learning very fast, and I was indeed pleased to find that they were doing excellent work in the various countries.

I should like to ask the minister why Canada limits her representation to the small number of representatives we have in the various countries? Canada has grown up to occupy an important position in the world, and in my opinion we have not a sufficient number of men in our foreign service. Surely we could train a number of our younger men who have seen service in the last war and then send them out into various countries. I feel that this vote should be much larger than it is, particularly in view of the uncertain times in which we live. We need representatives abroad in times such as these.

I should also like to ask the minister whether it would not be possible for Canada to employ a number of well-trained experts in this line who at present reside in England. Some of these people have spoken to me. As a matter of fact, they asked me whether it would be possible for them to make application to serve Canada abroad. Some of them speak fluently six or seven or more eastern European languages. We have not the men in Canada who speak these languages. The men I have in mind I met while travelling in Europe, and their qualifications are hard to match. Why should we not employ some of them where we are short of our own trained men? I understand that it is necessary even for the British-born to live ten years in Canada before they may be appointed to work for the external affairs department, but it seems to me that this is a time when we could use a number of these Britishers in various countries, particularly in the east.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I thank the hon. member for his tribute to the members of the external affairs department with whom he has been in contact abroad. I can assure him that it is our constant care to try to get proper representation everywhere. The hon. member says we should expand perhaps more rapidly than we have been doing. In May, 1947, we had ninety-nine representatives classified as officers abroad; in May, 1948, we had twelve more, or a total of 111. When we had ninety-nine, we had a clerical staff abroad of 315, and when we had 111, we had a clerical staff abroad of 493. When you increase your representation abroad, if you are to make the proper use of the reports and information gathered there, you have to make a proportionate increase in your staff in the head office. I find that we have growing pains, even at the rate at which we have proceeded to expand. It was and is, of course, necessary to expand, but we must not be too hasty about this. We try to get into the service persons who, when they are abroad, will give a proper impression of what is a Canadian, and for that reason we want to take in persons who, before they come into the service, have had at least ten years' residence in Canada. We think that will be helpful in enabling them to give a proper impression of what is a typical Canadian.

Item agreed to.

59. Canadian section of Canada-U.S. permanent joint board on defence, $2,500.

Mr. PEARKES: Would the minister give the committee some information regarding this item? For instance, who are the Canadian members of this joint board, what meetings are expected to be held, and where will they be held? This item can hardly be intended to cover salaries.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The meetings of this joint board take place about every two months. This vote is intended to cover the travelling expenses of the board. The members of the board receive no special salary for their services. The chairman of the Canadian section at the present time is General A. G. L. McNaughton. The navy member is Rear Admiral F. L. Houghton. The army member is Major-General C. C. Mann. The air force member is Air Vice Marshal A. L. Morfee. The secretary, who is an officer of the external affairs department, is Mr. David M. Johnson. The place of meeting is determined at each meeting for the subsequent meeting, and they usually alternate between some United States point and some Canadian point.

Item agreed to.

60. To provide for relief of distressed Canadian citizens abroad, $10,000.

Mr. PEARKES: Does this item cover the return expenses of Canadians who were interned by the enemy, particularly the Japanese?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; these expenses were all paid out of a war vote. This is a sort of revolving fund that can be drawn upon by our representatives abroad when they feel that it is proper to make some advances to a Canadian national to help him out of a temporary embarrassment. The losses incurred in these advances are very small.

Mr. PEARKES: All the expenses in connection with the repatriation of interned prisoners have been met, have they?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These expenses were not administered by the Department of External Affairs. I understand that the matter was handled by the immigration branch, and was covered by a vote obtained by that department for that purpose.

Mr. POULIOT: I have a case to submit to the minister. It does not come under this vote, but it may be fixed up by this vote. A Canadian soldier married an English girl in the British isles during the war. After her marriage she did not want to come to Canada. Payments for return to Canada were allowed until December 31 last. This year she decided to come, but her fare would not be paid by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Her husband is much disappointed. I wonder whether he could not come under this item to bring his wife to Canada.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid not. I am afraid it would be stretching pretty far the purpose for which this vote is made to apply it to a condition of that kind. Funds are still being voted for dependents' allowances, and I trust that the hon. member will be able to arrange something there that would appear to come more properly under that kind of vote than this one.

Mr. POULIOT: For that soldier it was a case of distress.

Item agreed to.

61. Canadian representation at international conferences, $300,000.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like to say, as I have said before, that I am, and have been, disappointed at the action of the Canadian government in regard to UNESCO. I think this is the place to say it. I shall deal with the matter under two heads. First of all, as regards Canadian representation, for instance, this year at Mexico City, I do not think the minister takes this matter seriously enough. I do not think he realizes the disappointment that is felt by people in educational, art bodies and scientific bodies in this country in this matter. The Canadian representation at Mexico this year consisted of a group of top civil servants. No doubt they were all fine men in their own right. They were well qualified to be on that particular conference; but the point is that these various organizations in this country, for the most part educational, are very much interested that their views should be placed before this international body. They consider that they are entitled to some representation, and that the government and the minister should make a choice from among these bodies. If these men are appointed it would not preclude the choice of civil servants, but it would give these people some feeling that they had some interest and some participation, if I might say so, in this particular matter.

With regard to the matter of the commission which we had hoped would have been set up, may I say it is now three years since I have been asking the minister questions and he has not been answering them. By that I mean he has been answering them in the same way.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He has not been setting up the commission.

Mr. KNIGHT: Exactly. With that I have some fault to find. Certainly the commission should have been set up. The point is that we have never got to the bottom of the reason why the commission was not set up. Apparently we do not have the whole story, but the minister cannot blame us for that. If there is a story that we have not heard we should like to hear it from the minister as the responsible minister of the crown, because, after all, in the preparatory commission to which Canada was a signatory it was proposed that these national commissions should be set up. I know that the educational bodies, to which I have already referred, have been looking forward with keen anticipation to the setting up of that particular body. There is much more that I could say, and may I say there is much more that the minister could say, but he persists in not saying it. Therefore I suppose I cannot expect him to say it at this late date, having tried, as I have done, over a period of three years to get at the bottom of why this international commission of UNESCO has not been set up to carry on these things which it could carry on to the benefit of this country and to international education and understanding. I merely take this short space of time again to register that particular protest.

Item agreed to.

Mr. JAQUES: May I revert to item 65? I notice an increase of nearly 500 per cent in the estimate. I wonder why the committee passes this very important item without one attempt to discuss it. I should like to know just what is meant by "education". Am I to take it that our own educational institutions are incapable of educating Canadian people in scientific and cultural organization? Is it education, or is it pure propaganda? Is the idea—and this is the idea that I have, and I have spoken on it before—to impose an international culture and education to replace our native culture and our native ideas? Since there is an increase of nearly 500 per cent in the item, the committee certainly should take more notice of it than simply to say "carried", even if it is at the end of the session. I do not like many of the men at the head of UNESCO. I do not like their ideas, and I do not like what can I understand to be their objective; that is, to impose international culture on all native culture. I should like to know how far this is education and how far it is propaganda.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member will have to attend some of their meetings to form his own opinion as to what they do. This is a contribution assessed against Canada as a member of UNESCO under a constitution that was approved by the Canadian government. It appears that there is a substantial increase in the amount here, but it is only in appearance. For 1947 the total was $311,640 United States funds, but only a portion of that is shown here. The larger portion came out of an estimate of the previous fiscal year which was of the same calendar year, but this year the whole assessment is provided in this one vote.

With respect to the activities of UNESCO, one hon. member feels that we are not giving them sufficient encouragement. The main accomplishment to date has been the initiation of campaigns in various countries for funds for educational, scientific and cultural reconstruction in the war devastated countries.

UNESCO has established pilot projects in Haiti, China, British East Africa and Peru to test techniques with respect to fundamental education. It has also made contributions to other educational and cultural movements for the assistance of the war devastated countries.

So far, to answer the hon. member, there would appear to be such obstacles in the way of intellectual co-operation that we have felt it was preferable to go rather slowly, and we think the objects of this organization require to be based upon a feeling of security, stability and world peace in order to be productive of beneficial and long-term results.

Mr. KNIGHT: I wish to make a point in regard to the extra expenditure. I agree with the hon. member who thinks this expenditure is too great, perhaps on the international phase of the question, and I base the argument on the fact that this money is largely a waste if we have not at the same time a national commission of responsible persons in this country who can steer the particular deliberations of UNESCO in any way they like. There is no use in my hon. friend of the Social Credit party, who has spoken, protesting, because we can make it what we like. We can make it serve our own particular purpose. I believe that the whole international business should spring from national roots as far as we are concerned, and we have not a national commission. In that respect we have practically nothing, and to that extent I agree that, in part, the vote is a waste of money. If, on the other hand, the minister had appointed, as we hoped he would, a national commission, we would say, It is our money; it is our business; we are running it and we know where we are going. I have felt that there was something dark and mysterious here that has never been brought into the open. My hon. friend to my left may tell me that the thing is riddled with communist influence. Well, if it is I want to know about it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have no information to that effect.

Mr. JAQUES: I am glad to be able to agree with my hon. friend to my right. I think he has put his finger on my objection in this matter. We have no control over this. We are in the dark about it; I am, at any rate. I think my hon. friend has the same idea that I have, that we are paying this money and have no control over it. It is not so much the way in which the money is spent, as the use to which it is put; that is to say, the policy which is behind the whole idea of UNESCO. I think the committee should have more to say about the matter than it has had. The matter is of vital importance, of greater importance than meets the eye. I thank my hon. friend for the support he has given me.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

33. To provide for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, $1,700,000.

Mr. McLURE: There is $1,300,000 in premiums on high quality cheese, and for standardization of factories there is $400,000, making a total of $1,700,000. I would ask the parliamentary assistant to explain the premiums on cheese. From my point of view, these two items, in dollars and cents, should be reversed. Some of the cheese factories throughout the country should be assisted. Better machinery should be put in. If that were done we would have generally a higher grade in our cheese. There is only $400,000 to assist in cold storage plants and in the way of different kinds of machinery.

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): What the hon. gentleman has suggested can be brought about only by the application of those who are operating cheese factories. If they wish to have help they should apply. Is the hon. member referring to curing rooms?

Mr. McLURE: Yes.

Mr. McCUBBIN: They must make application. The dominion government is willing to assist. There is one cent on 92 point cheese and two cents on anything over 99. They make application for that. Is that what the hon. member has in mind?

Mr. McLURE: What proportion of that would go to the maker, in comparison with what goes to the factory? The maker is entitled to a certain amount.

Mr. McCUBBIN: My understanding is that it all goes to the producer. The factory may keep a portion out, but it is all supposed to go to the producer of cheese. Anything that reverted to the factory would be only at the request of the producer.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like the parliamentary assistant to explain, if he can, the depressing effect that the bonusing of cheese has upon the manufacture of butter, the dispersal of the herds especially in the eastern townships, the consequent shortage of butter and the high price of that commodity.

Mr. McCUBBIN: The question the hon. member for Stanstead has asked may be a difficult one to answer. Some districts have been in the habit of sending milk to the cheese factory for the making of cheese. Others have been in the habit of separating their milk and sending it to the creamery. In a district such as my own, we are creamery butter producers and we stay that way. Other districts are in the cheese business and they stay that way. There may be a swing one way or the other. There may be a few who go to cheese and leave the creameries, and vice versa.

But to answer the last part of the hon. member's question is a difficult thing to do. There may be numerous reasons why the production of butter is not up. Later on, we shall come to that, and I may have something further to say then.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not wish to pursue the question at this moment in view of the statement just made by the parliamentary assistant. But when he comes to the question and to proffer a solution, I should like him to consider the fact that the herds have been greatly reduced because there is no money in making butter owing to the high price of feed, and that there is in consequence a shortage of butter, which threatens not only the convenience but the welfare of the Canadian public.

[Mr. McCubbin.]

Mr. JAQUES: This item is to encourage the improvement of cheese. I should like to suggest that one way to encourage that improvement would be to see that the restaurant in the House of Commons sells good cheese. By that, I do not mean the big brands of factory cheese. I believe there is some cheese called Old Ontario cheese, which is good cheese. My complaint is that you cannot buy it or you cannot get it. Can the minister tell us why it is that good cheese is so hard to come by in this country when it is one of the great cheese-making countries? I know you can buy cheese, and when I say that, I am referring to the big brands. But I do not mean that sort of cheese. I mean the cheese that we used to get years ago. I have repeatedly asked for Old Ontario cheese, but I am never able to get it. I think it would be a great encouragement if we could get it here in the House of Commons, for instance. Can the minister say why it is so scarce?

Mr. McCUBBIN: The demand today is for green cheese and not for the old types of cheese to which the hon. member has referred. The demand is so great that it is taken up and is not allowed to stand the way it used to in years gone by. For that reason we do not get the old brands of which the hon. member speaks.

Mr. JAQUES: Am I to understand that the deliberate choice of the people is green cheese, and that they do not know a good cheese when they taste it?

Mr. McCUBBIN: Oh, no.

Mr. JAQUES: Am I to understand that they actually prefer new green cheese or what is really nothing but curd? If they do not care for the good old cheese, what is the purpose of this item? I thought the people did not eat it because they could not get it. I know that is why I do not eat it.

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): Some time ago I asked the parliamentary assistant with regard to the cheese and butter situation. It would seem to me that we are producing cheese for export and selling it on credit. If my memory serves me aright, we did not get paid for a great deal of what we sold on credit after the first great war, and my opinion is that we shall not get paid for a great deal of what we are to sell now.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I do not wish to stop the hon. member for Middlesex East. As a matter of fact, I should like to hear what he has to say. But I wonder if he would wait until we come to item 45 to say what he intends to say. Will that be all right?

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East): Yes.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. HERRIDGE: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. HERRIDGE: This item for assistance to encourage the improvement of cheese and cheese factories is for a large sum of money, namely, $1,700,000. In my own district a small cheese factory was established which has been of great advantage to the surrounding community. They are producing a high quality of cheese. I think it is a type of cheese that possibly the hon. member for Wetaskiwin would like to purchase. It is something which is a little different from the standard brands.

Mr. JAQUES: I like the taste of it.

Mr. HERRIDGE: That factory has grown to some extent and it is serving an increasing number of farmers. They desire to improve their equipment, to put in cold storage and various things. That company has applied for a loan under the development act and has been refused. In fact the company has applied to all sources of government which are supposed to grant aid or assistance in connection with the improvement of cheese factories, and to date they have received no assistance. Would the parliamentary assistant mind explaining to the committee how this assistance is granted to those who are operating cheese factories and want to improve them? Will he say on what terms assistance is granted and under what circumstances?

Mr. McCUBBIN: I should like to ask the hon. member what type of assistance this cheese factory desires.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Cold storage of some type.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the parliamentary assistant say if item 15 will afford me an opportunity of discussing butter?

Mr. McCUBBIN: Item 45.

Mr. HACKETT: That opportunity will be given under item 45?

Mr. McCUBBIN: That is right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Item stands.

MR. MACDONNELL—SPECIAL EXCISE TAX—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "EVENING CITIZEN"

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to your attention a matter which affects the rights and privileges of myself and of every member of the house. The Evening Citizen carries a report which says a highly placed informant has told the Canadian Press that the government has decided to withdraw the special 25 per cent excise tax imposed on a broad list of goods. If that report is true I suggest that not only is it a gross breach of the privilege of members of parliament, but it is in effect a gross budget leak, and it is also a monkey wrench thrown into the business of the country. The government should inform us in the morning as to what the truth is. I propose to raise the matter again when the house meets in the morning. And I would say that the report further makes the outrageous suggestion that the government is considering whether this should be removed by legislation or by order in council. In other words, this report is suggesting that the government is waiting until parliament is prorogued in order to do this by order in council.

I repeat that if this is true, then whoever was responsible should be dealt with in the most exemplary manner, and I wish further to say that I will raise this question again when the house reassembles tomorrow morning.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Tomorrow we shall proceed with the following measures: the resolution in the name of the Minister of National Defence, concerning certain moneys contributed to the Canadian officers training corps; Bill No. 363, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act; Bill No. 350, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932; Bill No. 351, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act; Bill No. 392, to amend the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944; Bill No. 393, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, Bill No. 229, to amend the Customs Act; and if we have a printed copy of the amended bill, we shall proceed with Bill No. 338, an act respecting income tax—but I am not sure about that. Most of these bills are not contentious.

Then we shall move to go into supply to consider the estimates of the departments of Agriculture, Mines and Resources, Fisheries, National Revenue and Public Works.

Mr. MacNICOL: In that order?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I am not sure about the order.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the minister if the bills he indicated tonight, which would pretty well clean up the order paper, constitute all the measures on the order paper which the government intends to proceed with at this session.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I believe there will be two more bills. I am not sure; I shall have further information tomorrow.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

52. Departmental administration, $1,915,860.

53. Passport office administration, $138,500.

54. Representation abroad—including salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $5,083,082.

55. To provide for hospitality in connection with visitors from abroad, $25,000.

56. Amount required to meet loss on exchange, $45,000.

57. Grant to united nations society in Canada, $5,000.

58. Expenses of the Canadian delegation to the international civil aviation organization, including salaries of the Canadian delegate and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $25,000.

59. Canadian section of Canada-U.S. permanent joint board on defence, $2,500.

60. To provide for relief of distressed Canadian citizens abroad, $10,000.

61. Canadian representation at international conferences, $300,000.

Assessment for membership in the following international or commonwealth organizations—

62. United nations, $1,095,500.

63. Imperial economic committee, $21,500.

64. Imperial shipping committee, $2,000.

65. United nations educational, scientific and cultural organization, $326,000.

66. Food and agriculture organization of the united nations, $191,000.

67. General post—UNRRA relief—Amount required to meet outstanding commitments for relief shipments (revote), $500,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 22, 1948

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAMPBELL—STOPPING OF MOTORCARS FOR SALE OF POLICE BENEFIT TICKETS

Mr. MAX CAMPBELL (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Last Sunday as I was driving to Montreal, two policemen were stopping all traffic just outside the city limits. One stepped over to my car and handed me a ticket for some police benefit and asked me to buy it. I think this is something the public should not be asked to tolerate. I spoke to another motorist who had been stopped in the same way and he told me that when he refused to buy a ticket the police took the number of his car. I protest against that sort of action by municipal police, and I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) might notify the police commission of Montreal that Canadians do not want that sort of thing.

MR. MACDONNELL — SPECIAL EXCISE TAX — REFERENCE TO REPORT IN OTTAWA "EVENING CITIZEN"

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, last evening at eleven o'clock I drew the attention of the house to a statement in the Ottawa Evening Citizen that a "highly-placed informant" had told the Canadian Press that the government had decided to withdraw the special 25 per cent excise tax. I said that if that were true I considered it a gross breach of the privileges of the house, a gross budget leak and a monkey wrench thrown into Canadian business. I said that I would bring up the matter again this morning and ask for a statement. I said that if that statement were true, exemplary treatment should be given to the person or persons responsible.

I think we are getting tired of government not only by radio announcement but by newspaper announcement. I suggest to hon. members of the house in every quarter that when they read about this highly-placed informant they contrast in their minds the very lowly place of the representatives of the people as against the highly-placed informant who is a servant of the government.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, as he said, was good enough to give me newspaper notice of his intention to raise this question. The statement to which he referred was called to my attention at six o'clock yesterday evening. I had been working in treasury board on the supplementary estimates during the afternoon, and had not seen the afternoon papers. I was in the house at half past ten o'clock, but I left at twenty minutes to eleven. However, I am glad to make a statement as suggested by my hon. friend.

I would point out to the house something of which it is well aware. It is most unusual for a minister of finance or any other minister either to confirm or to deny rumours of this kind. But in view of the widespread publicity which has been given to this rumour and the statement of my hon. friend, I have no alternative but to say that the rumour is without foundation.

I understand that my hon. friend used the words "flouting of parliament" in his statement to the house yesterday evening.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If it were true.

Mr. ABBOTT: Allow me to make a speech, please. He used the words, "flouting of parliament", and asked whether it was true that these taxes might be removed by order in council. I have to paraphrase his words, because I have not Hansard before me; it is not yet available. But the hon. member used some such words. He said that if it were true that these taxes might be removed by order in council, it would be flouting parliament.

I want to call the attention of the house to the fact that when the tax bill was introduced I pointed out in clear and specific terms that the taxes were of a special temporary character and that they would be removed as soon as circumstances permitted their removal. I call the attention of the house to subsection 5 of section 1 of Bill No. 172, which reads in part as follows:

> The governor in council may, when he deems it advisable either in order to avoid restricting production of goods for export from Canada or otherwise, by proclamation, declare that a section, or a part thereof, in schedule I of the Excise Tax Act enacted by this act shall cease to have effect on and after a day fixed in the proclamation . . .

I stated repeatedly during the debate on the taxes that these taxes would be removed when circumstances justified their removal. I have had several delegations call on me, and I have reiterated that point to them. All I can say now is that the time when and the extent to which these taxes will be removed is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course and not by any rumour in the newspapers.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to say that I did not overlook the section referred to by the minister. I am fully aware of that, but this highly-placed informant's statement was to the effect, as I read it, that the tax would be withdrawn in toto. That is why I raised the point. I understand and appreciate the minister's point.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Fourth report of the special joint committee on the Indian Act—Mr. Brown.

CATTLE

INQUIRY AS TO EMBARGO ON UNITED STATES SHIPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the Toronto cattle market is practically closed, with a hold-over of 6,000 head of cattle, will not the government now state their present policy with regard to the embargo on shipments of cattle to the United States?

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government will announce its policy in due course, and when it does so I know it will be in the interests of the producers of this country.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If I may ask a supplementary question, the Minister of Agriculture on his estimates said some months ago that negotiations would be carried on with the United States with respect to the quota and lifting the embargo. May I ask what progress has been made in those negotiations?

Mr. McCUBBIN: Good progress has been made, but we are not ready yet to make an announcement.

[Mr. Abbott.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PHYSICAL FITNESS ADMINISTRATION—FINANCIAL STATEMENT PLACED ON RECORD JUNE 16

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) called my attention to what he said was an error in that I had placed on record the financial statement of the national physical fitness administration for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1947. Actually the statement was for 1948, but there was a misprint in the title of the statement.

COST OF LIVING

INQUIRY AS TO SUBSIDIES AND PRESS STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance, relating to a matter of considerable public interest and concern? Will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance reconcile the statement of the Minister of Finance to me a week ago, that there would be no return to subsidies to keep down the cost of living, with the reported statement of the Prime Minister that he agreed with the member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt) that there should be subsidies to keep down the cost of living.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am very happy my hon. friend has raised that question. It gives me a chance to say that I have never made any statement to the member for Waterloo North relating to subsidies. The question of subsidies was never mentioned by me.

May I say that there have been no end of statements attributed to me in the press in the last few days which are wholly unfounded and untrue. I have read one statement to the effect that after that so-called interview the other day in my office I had gone to council chamber and there had been a scene there with the Minister of Finance. I have my colleagues sitting around me at the present time, and I say we never had a pleasanter meeting of council than we had that day.

I read the other day in another paper that I had read the Minister of Finance a lecture, that I had told him that he must be more human, and had given him a list of items on which the excise duties must be removed, and so forth.

Mr. KNOWLES: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." He is echoing these anonymous statements in the press that are without any foundation whatsoever. I have never read the Minister of Finance a lecture in my life, nor has he ever read me one. We each respect the other far too much to act as school boys in a matter relating to public business, and I hope my hon. friend will not follow the example of the press in the particular I have mentioned.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then is there to be no change in government policy with respect to the still rising cost of living?

COAL

INQUIRY AS TO NOVA SCOTIA MINES WORKING HALF-TIME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Has it been brought to his attention that four small operating coal companies in Nova Scotia, employing some eight hundred men, are working half-time because of a lack of markets? Can he explain why Canadian mines should be idle while there are heavy imports of coal from the United States?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There may be several reasons for the lack of markets. One of these small operators called on me a few days ago and made the same statement. I asked him if he had interviewed the coal board, and he said no. I suggested that he do so. He did so, and the board pointed out markets he could easily reach under the usual subvention policy. He went to those markets and sold coal and went back home. Perhaps if the other operators would do the same, the situation would not appear so serious.

CIVIL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO QUESTIONNAIRE CIRCULATED IN CERTAIN DEPARTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Justice yet in a position to answer the questions put to him on Saturday about the questionnaire being circulated in certain departments of the government?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): I am prepared to answer that question; in fact, I have been seeking an opportunity for the last few minutes.

With reference to the questions asked on Saturday, June 19, by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the government are aware of the concern felt by members generally in the matter of the security of government employees. For that reason it is felt to be advisable that a general statement on the subject should be made.

The government is acutely aware of its responsibility in relation to security within the government service, and administrative measures have been taken to ensure the safety of the state in this respect. These measures do not interfere with traditional principles of just treatment.

In the government's view, loyalty is not susceptible to any precise series of tests. Accordingly, after careful consideration, it was decided not to set up an elaborate organization, as had been done elsewhere, to determine and adjudicate upon the loyalty of government employees. As was indicated to the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) on April 14, 1947 (Hansard, page 1993), an interdepartmental panel on security, composed of officials from departments and agencies of government, was set up some time ago to advise on the coordination of the planning, organization and execution of security measures generally which affect government departments. These measures necessarily include the devising of the best methods of carrying out inquiries concerning applicants for government employment in order to determine their suitability from a security point of view. The security panel advises on measures and methods. It does not deal with individual cases.

With regard to the so-called questionnaires, there are, of course, a number of forms used by departments for ordinary administrative purposes as a necessary part of their personnel management. In addition, forms are in use in some departments for the purpose of assembling relevant information concerning persons whose duties include work of a secret character. The use of these so-called questionnaires for security purposes is merely a means of facilitating the work of those who have to make the necessary inquiries. They are employed only for persons in positions of trust and not for the great majority of government employees. In some cases the information required can be and is obtained from departmental personnel records and from the records of the civil service commission. In other cases, the information is requested of the employees themselves by means of questionnaires. The completion of such forms is not compulsory. They are designed to help those responsible to obtain quickly information which may be helpful in assessing the suitability of individuals for confidential employment. Incidentally, departmental practice in this respect is under review and I can assure the house that any objectionable and unnecessary features in such documents, such as questions concerning collateral relatives and any irrelevant inquiry into the private lives of individuals, will not be permitted.

The government is of the opinion that loyalty to the state of employees in positions of trust is an essential aspect of the efficient conduct of public administration. Moreover, there are certain duties of such a secret character that the state would not be justified in employing for their performance any person whose trustworthiness is in doubt.

Under the terms of the Civil Service Act and regulations, the civil service commission is required to satisfy itself as to the character and habits of persons appointed by it to government employment. These provisions do not apply to all employees or departments and agencies, nor do they relieve departments of their responsibility for satisfying themselves as to the suitability of individual employees from a security standpoint.

The particular attention of heads of departments and agencies of government has been drawn to their responsibility with respect to the reliability of employees under their charge from the security point of view. A procedure has been approved which will enable them to discharge this responsibility as a part of their normal administrative function.

This is the position of the government with respect to security in relation to government employees generally. There is, however, the special case of those who are members of or associated with the communist party. The government is satisfied, from all the evidence available, that it would be a risk to the security of the state to employ such persons in positions of trust. For this reason, and in the discharge of its primary responsibility for security, the government has decided that no person who is a member of the communist party or associated with it shall be employed in work of a secret character. I may add that the same rule applies to those associated with fascist organizations.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO RELEASE FUNDS CONTRIBUTED AT EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Department of National Defence Act to release from the consolidated revenue fund certain moneys which were contributed to contingents of the Canadian Officers Training Corps established at various educational institutions throughout Canada by the members thereof by way of assigned pay and otherwise and by other persons.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The purpose of this resolution is merely to introduce legislation amending the Department of National Defence Act by adding a section to it under which certain moneys subscribed to and collected by Canadian Officers Training Corps contingents during the years of war for specific purposes might be released from the consolidated revenue fund and returned to these educational institutions to be used for the purpose for which they were subscribed. During the war, in most universities where C.O.T.C. contingents existed, a voluntary assignment of pay was made by members of the contingents for definite purposes such as buildings for the use of the contingents, establishment of memorial scholarships or bursaries, or such other memorial purposes. To this amount subscribed to by the members of the contingents in some instances subscriptions were made by private individuals for the same purpose. Under the Consolidation Revenue and Audit Act these sums would now be considered public moneys, and as such could not be used for the purposes for which they were subscribed without statutory authority from parliament. This legislation merely seeks to obtain authorization for these contingents to use these funds as intended.

Mr. PEARKES: Were any of these funds raised through canteens conducted by the officers training corps in the various universities?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. None of these funds were collected through canteen funds. They were all assigned pay and public subscriptions.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved to introduce Bill No. 394, to amend the Department of National Defence Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INSURANCE COMPANIES

AMENDMENTS TO CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932, AND FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 350, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps a brief word of explanation of this bill should be made.

The first purpose of the bill is to enlarge the powers of Canadian insurance companies to permit them to invest in mortgages in excess of the usual limit of 60 per cent of the appraised value, where the excess is guaranteed by the government of the province of Ontario under the authority of The Housing Development Act, 1948, passed at the last session of the Ontario legislature.

At the present time there is authority in The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932, for making investment in so-called "excess" mortgages, but only in cases where the excess is insured by the federal housing administrator of the United States of America. The experience under this type of mortgage has been so good that it is considered justifiable to substitute a more general provision for the existing one. The new provision will enable the companies to participate in the Ontario scheme, or any similar national, provincial or state schemes in countries where they are carrying on business, and in so doing to take advantage of sound investment opportunities.

The second purpose of the bill is to enlarge to a limited extent the general investment powers of Canadian insurance companies. The steady increase in the funds to be invested by the companies has been accompanied by increasing difficulty in finding suitable investments within the prescribed classes. This problem has been the subject of discussion between representatives of the companies and officials of the department of insurance from time to time, but more extensively during the last few months. While the principle of restricting the investments of insurance companies to specified classes is unquestionably desirable, nevertheless new types of sound investments not within the prescribed classes are continually coming into existence, very often in limited amounts, and frequently the best of them are available for only a short time before being taken up by other investors—sometimes by British and foreign insurance companies possessing wider investment powers. This situation has pointed to the desirability of granting to Canadian insurance companies a small degree of freedom in their investment powers, subject always to certain general prohibitions and restrictions, and the effect of subsection 3 of section 1 of the bill is to permit relative freedom up to a limit of three per cent of a company's total assets.

When it is remembered that British insurance companies have practically one hundred per cent freedom, and that their record stands as an example to the insurance world, the proposed limit of three per cent for Canadian companies appears to be reasonable and justifiable. Another consideration pointing to a provision of this kind is that the merits of different investments within a particular class vary greatly, and while some of them may undoubtedly be first grade, it might be unsatisfactory in some cases to authorize specifically that particular class as a whole. In addition, it is becoming more difficult to prescribe satisfactory tests for certain desirable investments.

The record of Canadian insurance company management is such as to merit confidence that the additional powers here conferred will be exercised in the best interests of the policyholders. It is a minor change in the investment powers. I would not undertake to make any substantial change without a great deal more study on the part of the department of insurance to the whole question of insurance companies' investment power.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Guaranteed or insured real estate mortgages.

Mr. FRASER: Will this help insurance companies to make it possible for housing to be increased throughout Ontario?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not only throughout Ontario. The main purpose is to facilitate greater investment by insurance companies in mortgages on real estate. The section, to which I made special reference, to implement the new act passed in Ontario, enables them to invest in mortgages beyond the present 60 per cent limit if these mortgages are guaranteed by the province, the state or other governmental authority.

Mr. FRASER: This will not affect in any way the security of the policyholder?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not a bit. I think it improves the policyholder's position.

Mr. HACKETT: Is the guarantee for the whole of the mortgage, or only for the excess over 60 per cent of the appraised value?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can get that information later.

Mr. HACKETT: I am satisfied.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Nature thereof.

Mr. GILLIS: When he was making his statement the minister said that this would prevent Canadian companies investing beyond three per cent of their capital or assets, and he pointed out that the British insurance companies had one hundred per cent latitude in any field in which they might wish to invest. Will this section limit the investment of British insurance companies in Canada to the same extent that Canadian companies are limited?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. This does not affect the investment powers of British insurance companies. British insurance companies doing business in Canada must conform to our requirements with respect to investments, and must deposit with the Receiver General of Canada sufficient approved securities to guarantee their underwritings in Canada. The purpose of section 3 is merely to give the minister, with the approval of treasury board, the right to approve such assets as may be placed in the trust account to secure these underwriting liabilities in Canada.

Of course we have no jurisdiction to affect the investment powers of British or foreign insurance companies. We can say what they have to put up to secure underwriting obligations in Canada. We do in fact do that, and they have to deposit in trust sufficient approved securities to guarantee their obligations here. In section 3 I am adding the words, "or such other assets as the minister, with the approval of the treasury board, may permit". It has always been the practice that the treasury board should be the body to approve the type of assets, provided they come within the limits in the act. There has been some complaint that under the restrictive provisions of section 3, as it stands, they could not even put up cash to secure their obligations here.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO LOANS WITHOUT COLLATERAL SECURITY, ETC.

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 351, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Loans without collateral security.

Mr. FRASER: Will the parliamentary assistant make a statement?

Mr. BELZILE: Perhaps a brief statement would be in order so as to give the committee some information on the subject.

This bill was introduced in the senate, and it pertains to the Quebec savings banks. The Quebec savings banks are institutions operating under special charters. There are two of them, both operating in that province.

In 1846 the Montreal City and District Savings Bank was founded. Its charter was granted by the Dominion of Canada in 1871. This savings bank operates only in the city and district of Montreal, where it has its head office and twenty-five branches. It has some 300,000 depositors.

The Quebec Savings Bank, or La Banque d'Economie de Quebec, was founded in 1848. It was incorporated in 1855 by an act of the Canadian legislature, and given a dominion charter by 34 Victoria, chapter 7. The Quebec Savings Bank operates only in the city and district of Quebec where it has fourteen branches.

These two banks are real savings banks; that is, they were established for the promotion of thrift and to encourage the regular saving of small amounts. The scope of their operations is limited to receiving deposits, investing them in gilt-edged securities, and granting loans guaranteed by the same kind of securities. They do not cater to the ordinary commercial risks. A clause in their charters stipulates that they must confine their operations to the accommodation of the non-business class of depositors.

There is no service charge of any kind for the granting of loans or for the opening and maintenance of accounts, and clients may issue cheques against their accounts.

For the convenience of their clients, the offices or branches of these banks are kept open to business on week-day evenings. It has been found that the great majority of the clients of these banks are of the working class particularly, and that they deposit small weekly or monthly amounts out of their pay cheques. It has been established that they seldom use their savings for ordinary purposes, but that, on the contrary, they will use them only in emergencies such as death, illness, or in special circumstances such as the purchase of a house, outlays for education of children, and the like.

The provisions of their charters and of the act place severe restrictions on the investments which these banks are allowed to make. Section 35, as it now stands, provides that these banks may invest moneys only in bonds, debentures, or other securities of or guaranteed by the government of Canada, or by provincial governments of Canada; in municipal bonds or debentures of school corporations in Canada, or bonds and debentures guaranteed by the United Kingdom, and so on. There is even a provision which makes it an offence and imposes a heavy penalty if the banks place money in unauthorized investments.

Section 37 provides that the banks may not lend any money upon the personal security of individuals, or to corporate bodies without collateral securities up to the amount of the loan, and these collaterals must be only certain kinds of bonds. Furthermore, the provisions of section 39 prohibit the making of a loan upon the security of real or immovable property.

The result has been that these restrictions are so great that the banks cannot actually meet the desires of their clients as to personal or mortgage loans. This bill would remedy this situation and permit the banks to make unsecured personal loans to a client, not exceeding at any time the amount of $1,000, and the aggregate amount of these loans made by the banks are not, at any time, to exceed five per cent of their deposit liabilities. It will further enable the banks to grant such loans on first mortgage on improved property, provided that such loans do not exceed sixty per cent of the value of the mortgaged property; and here again the aggregate amount of these loans shall not exceed five per cent of the deposit liabilities of the lending bank.

These powers to be conferred on these banks are not unlimited, as will be seen by the short explanation which has been given. They would be, in fact, similar to the powers of the trust companies and conform with the provisions of the civil code of the province of Quebec, section 981o, as to the administration of funds by a trustee, tutor or curator.

It has been deemed necessary to permit the enlargement of the powers of the banks in order to give them an opportunity to get their funds into more profitable circulation. These banks are well-managed institutions. Their losses have been few and far between, because they make only loans containing a minimum of risk.

The bill contains some minor amendments to bring the act into line with the Income Tax Act and with the Bank Act, and certain provisions relating to income and investment reports to be made to the Minister of Finance. But the main purpose of the bill is to empower these banks to render additional services to the public in general.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—If amount reserved in excess of reasonable requirements.

Mr. HACKETT: I know the answer is that there is a similar enactment in the Bank Act, but why there should be such stringency of administration in relation to a savings bank which does no commercial business at all, and which is almost a domestic concern, is a little baffling to one who has no more information than I have. I wish the minister or his parliamentary assistant would give some other reason than that a similar provision is in the Bank Act.

Mr. BELZILE: There is a provision in the Income Tax Act to the effect that if any corporation sets aside as reserve a larger proportion of its income than is deemed necessary for the operation of the corporation, the minister may value, for income taxation purposes, the excess amount so put aside. This rule has been introduced into the Bank Act, as the hon. member knows; and I understand the intention of section 3 is to get all banks and similar institutions into line with the special provision of the Income Tax Act so that the minister may at any time, when it is apparent that an amount has been set aside in excess of that which is necessary for the operation of the institution or corporation, value the excess amount so that it will come under the income tax provisions.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not wish to pursue the argument into an unduly controversial field, but every day we see the tentacles of bureaucracy pushed further into the heart of private enterprise and business denied any final discretion in the operation of its own affairs.

I thank the hon. gentleman for telling me about the income tax. It is possible that I was aware of that, but it is not necessary that the Department of Finance arrogate to itself the determination of what is sufficient reserve to enable the minister to collect his taxes. The Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue will collect such taxes as, in the discretion of his department, may seem proper. But here we find something totally different. We find a government official determining when a surplus should cease to be a surplus, and I submit that this government official does not know. He has not the training or the experience to determine what, in the circumstances of any particular case, should be the reserve necessary for the protection and well-being of the institution. The government official is not responsible to anybody for the sufficiency of protection for the shareholders and depositors of a bank, especially a savings bank.

The other day, as a matter of policy, at the decree of the government or one of its creatures, interest rates went up and the market price of bonds fell. Institutions such as these, and others, saw their reserves impinged upon to the extent of thousands or hundreds of thousands or even millions of dollars. How helpless is the institution in the face of conditions over which it has no control; yet this act will deny an institution the right to determine what safety measures should be taken against these unknown and all-pervading influences of uncertainty and chaos.

I cannot but express my profound regret that the government has found it necessary to assume a further measure of control over a purely domestic institution, well administered, concerning which there is no control and no complaint. So far as I am concerned there is no reason for the enactment of this amendment, unless it be to enable the government further to determine what shall be, in the realm of what used to be free enterprise.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION TO GIVE EFFECT TO UNDERTAKINGS IN GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

The house resumed from Thursday, June 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 229, to amend the Customs Act—Mr. McCann—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 5—Valuation of imports prejudicially or injuriously affecting Canadian producers.

[Mr. Hackett.]

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): When this bill was last considered by the committee it was approved with the exception of sections 5 and 6. Section 5 seeks to amend section 43 of the Customs Act by striking out the reference to the British preferential tariff or any lower tariff. This would make the section non-discriminatory, and is in accordance with our commitments at Geneva.

Some hon. gentleman suggested that we should defer discussion of this section until after consideration of the report of the banking and commerce committee on the general agreement on tariffs and trade. That report has not yet been tabled. If that is still the feeling of the committee, the government is prepared to withdraw this section. However, I would point out—and I think this is important—that an emergency might arise in which Canadian producers or manufacturers were prejudicially or injuriously affected, and it would be desirable to have the power to impose values under this section against any country.

I would note that it relates entirely to values and not to rates. Inasmuch as the change has no material effect upon the British preferential tariff rates, the committee might give approval to the section. However, if they do not care to do so, we are ready to withdraw it.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to express my appreciation of the careful study the minister has given these two sections; but I hope the withdrawal is not conditional upon my acceptance of the hatching of another emergency. As the minister knows, my appreciation of that pastime has been frequently announced; and even though I should be the only one to object to it, I hope he will understand my position. But I am glad this matter of the British preferential is to be allowed to remain in abeyance until we have had a further opportunity of finding out exactly what the Geneva agreement means, and have been afforded an opportunity of examining it in further detail.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the minister the consent of the committee to withdraw section 5?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Section 5 withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: Does that apply also to section 6?

Mr. McCANN: No.

On section 6—Goods exported to Canada through another country.

Mr. McCANN: When this section was last considered the senior member for Halifax, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the hon. member for Cumberland expressed some concern about its effect on our Canadian ports. I should like to make it clear that in order to get the benefit of the British preferential rates it will still be necessary for goods to be shipped direct from the originating country to a sea, lake or river port of Canada. The new section simply provides that goods bona fide exported to Canada from any country, but passing in transit through another, shall, upon such terms and conditions as to shipment, documentation, warehousing, transhipment or the like as the governor in council may prescribe, be valued for duty as if they were imported from the first-mentioned country. The change by the new section gives direct statutory authority for such valuation rather than merely empowering the governor in council to make such a provision.

The terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council under both the existing and the new section have been and would be such as are required to establish shipment from the original country destined to Canada, and preclude abuse. In other words, shipment from the original country when destined to Canada would require to be established by the documents. As a general rule, warehousing or remaining in an intermediate country for any purpose other than that of transhipment would void direct shipment from the originating country, and the new section makes no real change in the administration in this regard which has been in effect for over half a century.

The last part of section 6 makes provision for appeals to the tariff board. It consolidates authority for appeal to the tariff board from decisions by the deputy minister both in respect to tariff classifications and valuation for duty, and for further appeal to the courts from the decision of the tariff board.

Mr. ISNOR: I thank the minister for having placed his statement on the record. I am not concerned about the latter part of the section, but I am concerned about the first part which has to do with warehousing and reshipment of goods through United States or other ports. In view of the statement made by the minister I feel quite sure that no harm will be done to Canadian ports. I trust that this legislation will work in the manner in which he says it will. If this provision has been in force for fifty years I cannot see why it is necessary to include these words at this time. That is the point I made when I spoke previously on this question. Could we not carry on with the elimination of those words and continue to operate under the act as it originally stood? I think that would satisfy those who are interested in shipping through Canadian ports. I emphasize the point I made before, that I am not a lawyer, and I am willing to accept the minister's interpretation.

Mr. McCANN: This is putting into statutory form what was done previously by order in council.

Mr. FERGUSON: The minister says that this has been done for fifty years.

Mr. McCANN: It was done by order in council, and this merely puts it in statutory form.

Mr. ISNOR: Am I to understand that goods, we will say shipped from Europe, landed in New York, warehoused for perhaps twenty days and reshipped to Canada, would come in as though they had come direct?

Mr. McCANN: It would depend entirely on what was shown by the shipping documents.

Mr. ISNOR: That is just what I am afraid of. There are free ports in various sections of the world. There is one at New York, another farther south, and I believe one is in operation on the United States west coast. Goods could be shipped to one of those ports, warehoused, repacked and shipped to a Canadian port. Would they come in as they do at present?

Mr. McCANN: I am told that they would not get the benefit unless the original documents showed that they were destined for Canada.

Mr. ISNOR: I understand that at the present time only a bill of lading is necessary for a shipment from London to Montreal, or preferably to Halifax. Why should you depart from that practice and allow goods to go to a United States port and then be transhipped to a Canadian port and still receive the benefit?

Mr. McCANN: I am told that that has always been permitted.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: That concludes the sections and I suppose it is agreeable that certain sections be renumbered?

Mr. HACKETT: That is, as a consequence of the changes?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. McCANN: Section 10 reads:

This act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council.

I wish to withdraw section 10.

Mr. KNOWLES: When will it come into force?

Mr. McCANN: On the day it is passed.

Mr. KNOWLES: When it is given royal assent?

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Section 10 withdrawn.

WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

REMOVAL OF TIME LIMIT IN APPLICATION FOR CERTAIN PENSIONS

Hon. MILTON F. GREGG (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 393, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Application for disability pension to be made within one year.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the bill been printed?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The bill has been printed. We have a copy here, but we have not sufficient copies for distribution. I understand the bill was introduced on the recommendation of the committee on veterans affairs. It was all threshed out in the committee. The bill is quite short and simply removes the time limit so that certain people may benefit under the terms of the act. It seems it was unanimously accepted in the committee, and we would ask the consent of the committee of the whole to proceed.

Mr. LENNARD: I think if the minister gave a short statement it would clarify the situation.

Mr. GREGG: When the house was in committee on the resolution, I made a short statement, but members of the committee on veterans affairs were in session at the time. I should like to confirm the promise given to the hon. member for Vancouver South at the committee stage, that there would be an opportunity to discuss another matter relating to the merchant marine. There will be that opportunity under the item of the estimates which had been held over for such purposes.

This is a short amendment, Mr. Chairman. Its effect is to remove the time limit in so far as it affects applications in respect of dependents of deceased Canadian merchant seamen and salt-water fishermen. Section 7 of the act permits awards of pension in respect of death only when death was a direct result of enemy action or counter-action taken against the enemy, which includes extraordinary marine hazards occasioned by the war.

There have been a limited number of cases in which the dependents owing to illiteracy, ignorance of their statutory rights, lack of dependency at the time of death, or other reasons, failed to make application within the statutory time limit.

In view of the limitations contained in section 7, the removal of the time limit in respect of death would affect only a small number of cases and would permit of an award being made in certain cases of hardship. That is the effect of the amendment to section 1.

Section 2 repeals subsection 2 of the present section 62, and the effect of that is this. Section 59 of the act permits of awards to widows of Canadians who served as civilian air crew with the Royal Air Force Transport Command when death occurred during service as a direct result of enemy action or counter-action taken against the enemy, which includes extraordinary aerial or other hazards occasioned by the war, and the dependents are in necessitous circumstances.

The removal of the time limit is respect of death will permit of an award in a few deserving cases where the dependents, at the time of death or within one year after death, were not in necessitous circumstances but have subsequently fallen into necessitous circumstances.

It will be seen that both amendments are designed to carry out the original intent of the act and deal with the dependents of deceased persons.

Mr. CASE: Does the bill clarify disability due to enemy action?

Mr. GREGG: No, that is not touched upon at all.

Mr. PEARKES: There was a one-year time limit. Is that limit completely removed?

Mr. GREGG: No new time limit is set so far as these amendments are concerned.

The old time limit of one year stands, affecting personnel who served and who may be eligible for pension.

Mr. PEARKES: That is not dealt with in this bill?

Mr. GREGG: There is no change so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. PEARKES: The minister referred to awards to widows of the ferry command personnel. I presume that the benefits will apply to any dependents, not merely to widows.

Mr. GREGG: Yes, any dependent who qualifies under the act. Subsection 2 of section 62 of the act which is being repealed reads:

62 (2) No pension shall be awarded under this part in respect of death unless application is made therefor within one year after the coming into force of this act or within one year after the death, whichever is the later.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I am in favour of any further benefits that may be given to seamen or their dependents who served during the war. I should like to have seen all the benefits that are given to veterans extended also to the merchant seamen. I have in mind a young man who served in the merchant marine during the war and who, after the war, went up for his ticket as a mate only to discover that he was colour blind, which meant that his career in the merchant marine was finished for good. The future is bleak for these men who were exposed to all the hazards of service on the high seas during the war, and I should like to see further benefits given to them and to their dependents. If it cannot be done this session, I hope it will be done next session.

Mr. GREGG: In view of what the hon. member has just said, I indicated at the committee stage that the veterans affairs committee was this week completing its report in which I know a number of matters are dealt with. That report will be completed, I think, today or tomorrow. Therefore the question my hon. friend has raised should not now be opened up, but without violating the confidence of the veterans affairs committee, its chairman might be allowed to make a comment.

Mr. MUTCH: The bill before us is the result of the seventh report of the veterans affairs committee which was tabled in the house last week. This legislation embodies the recommendations which were unanimously made by that committee. At that time the committee was, and it is now, considering questions relating to the merchant seamen and the members of the R.A.F. ferry command. I understand that its report is drafted, but until it is approved and submitted to the house I submit that any discussion of the question my hon. friend has raised would be out of order. It will be in order when we come to discuss the final report of the committee, which I presume will take place on the item which has been allowed to stand over. In the meantime I can only say that this is not the final word of the committee with respect to such representations.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Application for disability pension to be made within one year.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I do not think it is a good principle at any time to be passing bills we have not seen, even though they may represent the unanimous view of a special committee. Would it not be possible to have copies of this bill before us by three o'clock?

Mr. MUTCH: This is a two paragraph bill. It was sent to the printer yesterday. I was able to get only four copies. The pressure of the work of the session has made it impossible to have these bills delivered in the morning. They will be here in the course of the day and will be distributed. The four copies which are available have been in circulation. I can assure the committee that there is nothing in the bill except the two clauses which in effect delete the time limit which my committee unanimously felt was objectionable and should be removed. It may not go far enough, in the opinion of some, but in effect it does one thing which we unanimously agreed should be done.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does this bill require that the dependents shall qualify only if they are in necessitous circumstances?

Mr. GREGG: That is according to the terms of the original act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That still stands?

Mr. GREGG: That still stands so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Who decides whether they are necessitous under the means test?

Mr. GREGG: The decision is reached by the board of pension commissioners.

Mr. SKEY: I presume that the minister's department, or the Department of Transport, the department concerned, will immediately review the cases which have been outlawed and give advice to people who have already applied.

Mr. GREGG: Yes; the interpretation and execution of this act are carried out by the board of pension commissioners in the same way as for all pensioners, and the board will immediately review the cases.

FARM PRICES

POWERS OF AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT BOARD EXTENDED BEYOND MARCH 31, 1948

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 392, to amend the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is this bill printed?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Mr. Speaker, we are in the same position on this bill as we were with the bill that we have just passed.

Mr. HACKETT: How many sections?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Only one section. I have handed a copy to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). The section seems so innocuous—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I shall ask the leader of the opposition to read the section in a moment. It extends the life of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, which expired on March 31, 1948. We have no other way but to proceed with this special legislation to extend the life of the act. I think there is no objection to it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Have you taken the leader of the opposition into the cabinet?

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I shall be glad to read the clause, but before I do so I think I should read a lecture to the government. This house should not be asked to pass the second reading of a bill without having seen it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BRACKEN: Certainly at this stage of any session a bill with only one clause in it, a bill that the government has known must come before parliament, should not be proceeded with until copies are available to all hon. members.

The minister said that it is a short bill. That is true, but hon. members do not know the exact terms of the amendment, and until they know that, they are in no position to discuss the matter intelligently. The measure is a simple one, and I am not now raising this objection on the merits of the bill. I do it as a matter of principle of procedure. I want to say to the government now that in the future we shall expect to have these bills distributed before we are asked to proceed with second reading.

Mr. KNOWLES: Your lecture is having effect; copies of the bill are being distributed now.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister has been very courteous to me in dealing with all these matters in the past. I am sure there was no discourtesy intended here; but with all respect I suggest that this house and the minister should not be put in the position of asking hon. members on this side to accept these measures without having seen them. We ought not to have to speak in this way to the government.

I want to speak briefly now on the bill itself. Its purpose is to extend the powers of what is popularly known as the Agricultural Prices Support Act, an act which is technically described as an act for the support of prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace.

Hon. members will recall that early in the war the government established the policy of fixing ceiling prices for agricultural products. I think it was in 1943 that we took the position, and I emphasized it time and time again, that if we were to have ceiling prices established on agricultural products to prevent prices going up at a time when they would otherwise go up, we should have a policy of establishing floor prices to prevent agricultural prices going away down in times when conditions might otherwise drive them down.

In the following year, 1944, this measure was brought in. It is in effect, as well as in name, a transitional measure, a temporary measure. That certainly was not my intention or our intention then or now. What is needed is a measure that remains in effect, not for any transitional period which the government itself may determine, but for an unfixed period as a matter of permanent policy. That is my main criticism of the bill. The bill does not provide a permanent policy.

As I have said, it is specifically set out in the title to the act that it is only for the transition period from war to peace. Mr. Speaker, the war has been over now for three years. How long is this transition period to continue? If the government is serious about having a floor price policy beyond the immediate or the near future, we should not be extending from time to time a transitional measure. It should be made a permanent policy.

With respect to the merits of this measure, the government, or members of the government, do a lot of talking about floor prices. Yet in effect, what their policy is doing is maintaining ceiling prices. What is the use of talking about floor prices when prices are high? They are using this and other measures not for the purpose of floor prices but for the purpose of preventing farm prices going up. They let nearly everything else go up in price, but indirectly, and in some cases directly, they are preventing farm prices from following the general trend.

This is called an Agricultural Prices Support Act. What the government is doing is keeping farm prices down, not supporting them. One does not need to go far for an illustration. The wheat board is being used for that very purpose. It was built up as a marketing institution for the benefit of producers, and it is now being used by the government, not for that purpose, but to carry a policy of government to part of the price control principle of keeping farm prices from following the normal trend under these conditions.

I have just three comments to make on the measure. The first I have referred to. It is a transitional measure and not a permanent measure. When the impression is left, as it is commonly left with the people of the country, that we have a permanent floor price policy, we are only inviting criticism, doubt and cynicism on the part of the public when we continue to deal with measures from time to time in this manner.

The second point is this. By following policies of the general character of this measure, the government has failed to lay the basis for a permanent policy to provide equitable prices for farmers in the future. They had an opportunity and they lost it. There was a time, and it is with us still, when there was a great demand for wheat, a demand which made the price much higher than it had been in the past. Instead of allowing our wheat to sell at what it was worth, the government required it to be sold at much less. Had the government allowed it to be sold at what it was worth, had they allowed the farmers to receive for it an equitable, a parity, a fair price, the balance being set aside as a reserve, that reserve would have been sufficient to supplement low prices later on for ten or twenty years.

Various figures have been suggested as to what has been lost by the wheat deal with Britain. Some put it at $300 million in two years, and others suggest a higher amount. If we had been allowed to take the world price for this commodity, and if the farmers had been allowed to receive from that high figure a fair price for it now, the balance to be used as a measure to supplement prices when they might be low later on, we could have laid a permanent basis for equitable prices for our farmers for years to come.

As it is, we have kept the price of wheat down, and because the price of wheat has been kept down, coarse grains have been down, and because coarse grains were down livestock prices were kept down indirectly. Because of such policies, we have been denied the right to sell our livestock in the United States. And that brings me to the third point.

The government is now further destroying the confidence of the public in itself and in government generally, by its action with respect to livestock. Across the line to the south the price of beef cattle is 10, 12 and 14 cents per pound higher than it is here. We are denied that market as a matter of government policy, and yet the Minister of Agriculture comes along and leaves the impression that we are going to be allowed to get into that market. He leaves the impression that the embargo is to be removed. He leaves that impression but the government takes no action; and when that impression is left what happens? The farmers hold back stock, expecting a higher price for it. I do not say that they all do, but they can do it, and it looks as if it has been done. They can hold back stock, and the price of meat goes up, and now we have the consumer facing rising meat prices because of that intimation that the embargo would be removed and that prices would go up. The consumers are facing these rising prices at home, and yet we are denied the United States market for that product.

As I said yesterday on another matter, we are getting the worst of two worlds; the embargo has not been removed and yet we have rising prices at home. I will take just a moment or two to read an extract from a western paper showing the reaction to policies of this kind. The Winnipeg Tribune of June 18 states:

> Over the week end Winnipeg housewives and restaurant keepers had a hollow feeling in their stomachs as they watched the price of various cuts of beef shoot up as much as 18 cents a pound. Naturally they were wondering why meat should suddenly jump in price at a time of year when prices usually decline.

I need not read the whole of the article. After referring to the speech of the minister, that the embargo was likely to be removed, and in view of the fact that it was not removed, the newspaper continues:

> The natural reaction of livestock producers to this sort of thing was to withhold their cattle from market. Why shouldn't they, when they have almost official assurance that they can make money by doing so? The scarcity of offerings on the livestock markets was thus reflected in higher prices in the butcher shops.

And now we have the report this morning that there was difficulty in the livestock yards at Toronto. Apparently housewives are not buying much meat with these rising prices, and so meat accumulates in the storehouse and cattle coming to market are not sold, because the government has not been frank with the Canadian people with respect to this matter. If the embargo is to be removed, it should be removed and everyone should know what is going to be done. If it is not to be removed, the impression should not be left that it will be removed, with all these unsatisfactory reactions following.

As I said, this is a transitional, temporary measure. There is no excuse for leaving it in that way. It is still being left so that the governor in council may determine how long it may exist. The government should not ask us to approve that position. We are willing to make this a permanent measure. I cannot speak for every section of the house, but I imagine that on this matter I would be expressing their views and, I would think, the views of hon. members opposite as well. Why therefore leave it as a transitional measure? Why leave it in the hands of the governor in council to determine how long it will continue? Why not make it a permanent policy and be done with it?

Having said that, let me add that half a loaf is better than no bread. Of course this measure will be supported and passed. My criticism is that the government is not fair even to itself in bringing forward a measure of this kind if it is serious about a floor-price policy—and I do not suggest that it is not serious. Dealing with matters in this way, however, leaves it open for people to question whether it is serious or not.
